(4.) The institution of the Temple services, with their frequent ceremonial ablutions, must have rendered a large and constant supply of water necessary; and this could only have been secured by bringing it from a distance by aqueducts. The principal supply was derived from "Solomon's Pools," near Urtâs, about 7 miles from Jerusalem, and from springs in the vicinity. The three pools are cleverly and well constructed, and the great tunnel or Kariz, about 4 miles long, in W. Biâr, is one of the most remarkable works in Palestine. The water was conveyed from the pools to Jerusalem by the "Low Level Aqueduct," about 13 miles long, that crossed the Valley of Hinnom above the B. es-Sultan, which it probably filled, and, winding round the western hill, passed over the causeway and Wilson's Arch to Mount Moriah and the Temple enclosure. Here it was stored in large subterranean reservoirs, excavated in the soft bed of limestone (melekeh) which, at a depth of only 3 to 4 feet, underlies the harder strata (missae). These storage reservoirs may still be seen in the Haram esh-Sherif, and one of them has a capacity of about 3,000,000 gallons. They were connected by an elaborate system of conduits, and the overflow was through one of the rock-hewn passages beneath the Triple Gate. The tradition that ascribes one at least of the pools, the aqueduct, and one or more of the subterranean reservoirs to Solomon, is probably correct. The supply was afterwards increased by constructing a reservoir in W. Arrûb, whence the water was conveyed to "Solomon's Pools" by an aqueduct about 28 miles long, which was apparently made by Pontius Pilate.* From the Pools the water flowed through the "Low Level Aqueduct" to the Temple enclosure, and this perhaps explains Pilate's application of the Corban to the construction of the new aqueduct.

Another aqueduct which exhibits a degree of engineering skill that could scarcely be surpassed at the present day conveyed the water of the "Sealed Fountain," above Solomon's Pools to Jerusalem. This "High Level Aqueduct" crossed the valley between Bethlehem and Mar

Elyas by an inverted syphon, and was capable of delivering water at an elevation of 20 ft. above the sill of the Jaffa Gate. All trace of it is lost on the "Plain of Rephaim," but it probably ran to the B. Mamilla, and thence to the cisterns in the Citadel, near the Jaffa Gate, and to "Hezekiah's Pool." This aqueduct was apparently made by Herod to supply water to his palace, and to the fountains and ponds which were a marked feature of the palace gardens (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 4); and it entered the city at the Tower Hippicus (B. J. v. 7, § 3). The ancient conduit beneath Christ Church Rectory, which was possibly made in the first instance to convey the water of the B. Mamilla to the Temple enclosure, appears to have connected the High and Low Level aqueducts within the city.* A third conduit passed through the grounds of the Russian Convent, and entered the city near the N.W. angle of the wall, but the source from which it derived its supply is unknown (PEFQy. Stat. 1891, p. 279). A fourth aqueduct, which entered the city to the east of the Damascus Gate, has been traced to the "Twin Pools," and thence southwards to the wall of the Haram esh-Sherif which has been built across it. The course of this aqueduct is broken by the deep fosse which lies between Jeremiah's Grotto and "the Quarries," by the ditch which separated Antonia from Bezetha, and by the wall of the Haram esh-Sherif. It must therefore have been in existence when these important works were executed, and it is probably one of the oldest conduits in the city. Whether it derived its supply from a spring, or from a pool near the head of the Tyropoeon Valley, is uncertain; but it was capable of supplying the whole of the eastern hill, and apparently followed its western face at a high level. Another rock-hewn conduit, at a much lower level, was discovered by Sir C. Warren on the west side of the Tyropoeon ravine, beneath "Robinson's Arch." It is cut through by the west wall of the Haram, and is therefore older than the reconstruction of the Temple by Herod. Apparently it was connected with the conduit at the foot of the Hamman esh-Shefa well, and carried water from a small spring, or Kariz, in the Tyropoeon Valley, along the base of the western hill. The tunnel connecting the Virgin's Fountain with the Pool of Siloam has already been noticed. The following altitudes above the sea indicate the quarters of the city supplied by the several pools and aqueducts:—

* Josephus (Ant. xviii. 3, § 2) gives the distance of the source from which the water was derived as 200 stadia; and (B. J. ii. 9, § 4) as 400 stadia. He apparently refers in the first case to the distance between Solomon's Pools and W. Arrûb, and in the latter to the total distance from Jerusalem. The necessity for increasing the supply was probably due to the diversion of the waters of the "Sealed Fountain" above Solomon's Pools, from the Temple enclosure to Herod's Palace on the completion of the "High Level Aqueduct."

* This gave rise to the belief, in the Middle Ages, that the Birket Israil was supplied with water by a Fons Sion close to the Turris David on the western hill (see Marino Sanuto's plan of Jerusalem in Tobler's Planography of Jerusalem).

What has been said above may explain some of the difficulties in understanding the allusions in the Bible and Josephus to the water-supply of the city. Excepting the reference to EN-BOGEL, now the Virgin's Fountain, as a point on the common boundary of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 2; xviii. 16), the earliest distinct allusion to the water-supply is the command to Isaiah to meet Ahaz "at the end of the conduit of the upper pool, in the highway of the fuller's field" (Is. vii. 3). The messengers sent by Sennacherib to summons Hezekiah to surrender (2 K. xviii. 17; Is. xxxvi. 2) stood by the same conduit when they spoke to the people on the wall; and if there be any connexion between the fuller's field and the "monument of the fuller" mentioned by Josephus (B. J. v. 4, § 2), the conduit must have entered the city from the north. Possibly it was the conduit east of the Damascus Gate, and in this case the Upper Pool must have been either that to the north of the "Tombs of the Kings," or a pool at the head of the Tyro-poen Valley; and the Assyrian messengers must have delivered their summons in front of the citadel that occupied the ground upon which the Macedonian Acra was afterwards built.^b In expectation of an attack from the Assyrians,

Hezekiah is said to have "stopped all the fountains and the brook that ran through the midst of the land" (2 Ch. xxxii. 4); he also on this or upon another occasion stopped "the upper spring of the waters of Gihon, and brought it straight down to (or on) the west side of the city of David" (2 Ch. xxxii. 30); "made a pool and a conduit, and brought water into the city" (2 K. xx. 20); and "fortified his city, and brought water into the midst thereof; he digged the hard rock with iron, and made wells for water" (Ecclus. xlvi. 17). The work of Hezekiah is also, apparently, alluded to in the passages "Ye gathered together the waters of the lower pool"

^b According to another view, which derives some support from the position generally assigned to the "Camp of the Assyrians" in the N.W. quarter of the present city, the Birket Mamilla was the Upper Pool. In the 7th century one of the city gates, to the west of the existing Damascus Gate, was called Porta Villae (or Viae) Fullois (Arculfus, l. 1); but this may have been a late tradition.

(Is. xxii. 9), and "Ye made also a ditch between the two walls for the water of the old pool" (xxii. 11). Any identification of these springs and pools must be purely conjectural; the "brook" (בְּרוֹךְ) of 2 Ch. may be the overflow from the Virgin's Fountain; * the spring of Gihon may be the Virgin's Fountain, brought down by the rock-hewn tunnel to the Pool of Siloam at the southern extremity of the eastern hill; or it may be a spring near the head of the Tyropean Valley whose waters were brought down on the west side of the same hill by the aqueduct east of the Damascus Gate [GIHON]. The pool made by Hezekiah was perhaps the B. Mamilla, and the conduit that passing beneath the Jaffa Gate and Christ Church Rectory to the Temple enclosure; the lower pool of Isaiah may have been the B. el-Hamra at Siloam, and the old pool a reservoir higher up the Tyropean Valley. Nehemiah mentions the DRAGON WELL, or spring (Neh. ii. 13), possibly an outflow from the "Low Level" aqueduct above the B. es-Sultan; a fountain, apparently Siloam,⁴ from which one of the city gates took its name (Neh. ii. 14; iii. 15; xii. 37); the Pool of Siloah (iii. 15) or Siloam (John ix. 7), which received the "waters of Shiloah" (Is. viii. 6) [SILOAM], and is perhaps the King's Pool of Neh. ii. 14; and the "pool that was made" (Neh. iii. 16), apparently in the Kedron Valley below the Virgin's Fountain, where Josephus (B. J. v. 4, § 2) places Solomon's Pool. The only other pool mentioned in the Bible is BETHESDA, which appears to have been either the "Twin Pools," or the pool near the Church of St. Anne. Josephus adds to the above the Serpent's Pool (B. J. v. 3, § 2), now the B. Mamilla, which may have derived its name from the serpentine character of the High Level Aqueduct that discharged water into it; the Pool Amygdalon (B. J. v. 11, § 4), perhaps Tower (Migdal) Pool, from the three great towers in its immediate vicinity, which is now "Hezekiah's Pool"; and the pool Struthius* (B. J. v. 11, § 4), near Antonia, now the "Twin Pools" at the N.W. angle of the Haram esh-Sherif. The fountain (אֲרֵז) held by Simon (B. J. v. 6, § 1) is apparently Siloam. Josephus alludes more than once to the conduits and subterranean reservoirs within and without the city; and it was probably into one of the latter in the Temple enclosure, the pit "in the court of the prison" (Jer. xxxviii. 6), that Jeremiah was let down.

Aristeas mentions subterranean reservoirs, supplied by a spring and rain-water, which occupied a space of 5 stadia round the Temple, and were connected by pipes of lead (Gallandii Bib. Vet. Patr. ii. 805). Strabo (xvi. 2, § 40) describes Jerusalem as being well supplied with water within, but externally parched with drought; and Tacitus (Hist. v. 12) writes of the fons perennis aquae, cavati sub terra montis; et piscinae cisternaeque sarvandis imbribus. There are several allusions in the Talmud to the plentiful supply of water in the Temple enclosure, and to the caverns, beneath the courts, in which it was stored. Eusebius and Jerome (*OS.*² p. 266, 72; p. 189, 14) mention a "pool of the fuller," probably Birket el-Hamra, near Tophet and Aeldama; and the Λιμναὶ διδύμοι, or "twin pools" of Bethesda (*OS.*² p. 251, 15; p. 142, 9), which the Bordeaux Pilgrim places further in the city than two other large pools. Constantine constructed reservoirs, one of which still exists, near the basilica that he built at Jerusalem (Itin. Hieros.). All later pilgrims allude, with more or less fulness, to the numerous pools and cisterns; and Antoninus mentions (xxiii) that in front of the ruins of the Temple of Solomon, under the street, water ran down to the fountain of Siloam.

It is evident, from what has been said, that every effort was made to ensure a plentiful supply of water; and in the many sieges that the city underwent, there are only two known instances in which the besieged suffered from want of water: that alluded to by Ezekiel (iv. 16, 17), and that by Antiochus (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 8, § 2). The mean annual rainfall which is such an important element in the water supply is 22·76 inches (Dr. Chaplin in PEFQy. Stat. 1883, p. 9).

Streets, Houses, &c.—Of the nature of these in the ancient city we have only the most scattered notices. The "East street," R. V. the "broad place on the East" (2 Ch. xxix. 4); the "street of the city," R. V. the "broad place at the gate of the city" (xxxii. 6); the "street facing the water gate," R. V. "the broad place that was before the water gate" (Neh. viii. 1, 3, 16) or, according to the parallel account in 1 Esd. ix. 38, the "broad place (ἐὐρύχωρον) of the Temple towards the East" (cp. 2 Ch. xxix. 4; Joseph. Ant. xi. 5, § 5), perhaps the same as the street of the house of God, R. V. the "broad place before the house of God" (Ezra x. 9); the "street of the gate of Ephraim," R. V. the "broad place of the gate of E." (Neh. viii. 16); and the "open place of the first gate towards the East" (1 Esd. v. 47), must have been not "streets" in our sense of the word, so much as the open spaces found in Eastern towns round the inside of the gates. This is evident, not only from the word used, Rechob, which has the force of breadth or room, but also from the nature of the occurrences related in each case. The same places are intended in Zech. viii. 5. Streets, properly so called (Chutzoth), there were (Jer. v. 1; xi. 13, &c.), but the name of only one, "the bakers' street" (Jer. xxxvii. 21), is preserved to us. This is conjectured, from the names, to have been near the tower of ovens (Neh. xii. 38; "furnaces" is incorrect). Jerusalem, like other ancient cities, was probably divided into quarters by main streets that passed out to the country through gates, one of which at least—the "Gate of Ephraim"—took its name from the district to which the road led. The principal streets must, from the nature of the ground, have run from north to south, and these must have been connected by cross-streets, forming insulae, which were no doubt intersected by numberless narrow winding lanes. Such in fact

* Can the "brook" be the stream passing through "Solomon's," the "Low Level" aqueduct, the only running water near Jerusalem?

⁴ Siloam is also called a spring by Josephus (B. J. v. 4, §§ 1, 2; 9, § 4).

* According to Bonar (Imp. Bib. Dict. s. v. Jerusalem), "the Struthius" or "sparrow-pool" may be "flock-pool" or "sheep-pool" (אֲשֶׁרֶת שֶׁבֶט, Ashtoreth = Shek).

was the arrangement of the streets in the 3rd century B.C.; and in character they were not unlike those of Pompeii. There was a roadway for camels, beasts of burthen, and mounted persons; and on either side of it a high trottoir for the convenience of those on foot. Perhaps, as the words of Aristæus (see p. 1608) seem to suggest, the raised pavement was reserved for the use of certain classes of the population. The bazaars, always a prominent feature in an Oriental city, are mentioned by Aristæus; and Josephus states (B. J. v. 8, § 1) that Titus breached the second wall at the point where the cloth, brass, and wool bazaars abutted on the wall. Josephus frequently alludes to the maze of narrow lanes (Ant. xiv. 16, § 2;—B. J. ii. 14, § 9; v. 8, § 1; vi. 6, § 3, &c.), and mentions a market-place (B. J. i. 13, § 2) in which a fight took place between the adherents of Herod and those of Aristobulus; the "upper market-place" (ii. 14, § 9), plundered by the soldiers of Florus, which must have been on the western hill (v. 4, § 1); and the "timber market,"^f apparently on the eastern hill (ii. 19, § 4), which was burnt by Cestius.

It may be inferred from the tendency of main streets to preserve their original direction and position through many centuries, and from the peculiarity of the topographical features, that the principal streets of the modern city represent those of Herodian, and perhaps in some measure those of pre-exilic, Jerusalem. The more important modern streets that appear to retain the lines of older ones are: (1) The street that follows the course of the Tyropeon Valley from the Damascus Gate to the Dung Gate, and Siloam. (2) That which runs, almost in a straight line, from the Damascus Gate to the south wall of the city, and once passed through a gate to the Valley of Hinnom.^g This street, there is some reason to believe, was at one period, possibly the Herodian, adorned with columns like the streets at Samaria, Gadara, Gerasa, &c. (3) That leading southward from the market-place, in front of the "Tower of David," which apparently separated Herod's palace and gardens from the remainder of the town, and ran to the postern and rock-hewn steps in the English cemetery. (4) The two streets leading northward from the Turkish barracks, at the N.E. angle of the Haram, to the Bâb ez-Zahireh. One of these marks the line of the road that, prior to the building of the third wall, ran northward from Antonia, without descending into the valley, and joined the lower road, up the Tyropeon Valley, near the "Tombs of the Kings." This road may possibly be the true Via Dolorosa (see p. 1656).

^f The name δασύων ἀγορά, "Timber Market," is perhaps derived from dachan, the rabbinical word for the oak or pulpit from which the priests blessed and addressed the people. There is no other reference to a timber market in Jerusalem, but the Rabbins speak very frequently of the place called Dukana, where the priests blessed the people when assembled together (Bonar, in Imp. Bib. Dict., s. v. Jerusalem).

^g The present Zion Gate only dates from the rebuilding of the walls in the 16th century; the earlier Zion Gate was at the end of the street, mentioned above, which apparently led to the "Gate of the Essenes" in the old wall.

(5) The Tarik Bâb es-Silsileh, which passes into the Haram over "Wilson's Arch," and retains, in part, the line of the street leading from the Temple to Herod's palace; and (6) the street N. of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which apparently connected the tower Psephinus with Antonia.

To the houses we have even less clue. The ease with which they were burned, and the rapidity and extent of the fires during the Roman siege (Joseph. B. J. i. 7, § 4; v. 6, § 1; vi. 6, § 3, &c.), appear to indicate that they were largely built of wood. On the other hand the scarceness of timber, and the abundance of excellent stone in the quarries close at hand, seem to suggest houses of a more permanent character. Possibly, whilst the residences of the wealthy were substantially built, story upon story, like those of Tyre and Zabulon (B. J. ii. 18, § 9), the mass of the population lived in small rudely constructed houses clustered round the palaces and public buildings.^h Such public buildings are frequently alluded to by Josephus; and one important point where the palace of Agrippa and Berenice, the house of the high-priest, and the Record Office were situated, is called by him the "nerves of the city" (B. J. ii. 17, § 6). The precise form and character of pre-exilic Jerusalem is unknown; but there is no reason to suppose that the general aspect of the city prior to its capture by Titus differed very materially from that of the modern town, shorn of the suburbs that have spread beyond the walls during the last twenty-five years. No doubt the ancient city did not exhibit that air of mouldering dilapidation which is now so prominent there—that sooty look which gives its houses the appearance of "having been burnt down many centuries ago" (Richardson in S. & P. p. 183), and which, as it is characteristic of so many Eastern towns, must be ascribed to Turkish neglect. In another respect, too, the modern city must present a different aspect from the ancient—the dull monotony of colour which, at least during autumn, pervades the slopes of the hills and ravines outside the walls. Not only is this the case on the west, where the city does not relieve the view, but also on the south. A dull leaden ashy hue overspreads all. No doubt this is due, wholly or in part, to the enormous quantities of débris of stone and mortar which have been shot over the precipices after the numerous demolitions of the city. The whole of the slopes south of the Haram area (the ancient Ophel), and the modern Zion, and the west side of the valley of Jehoshaphat, especially south of the St. Stephen's Gate and near the S.E. angle of the wall, are covered with these débris, lying as soft and loose as the day they were poured over, and presenting the appearance of gigantic mounds of rubbish.ⁱ

In this point at least the ancient city stood in favourable contrast with the modern, but in some others the resemblance must have been strong. The nature of the site compels the walls in several places to retain their old positions. The southern part of the summit of the Upper city and the slopes of Ophel are now bare, where previous to the final siege they were covered with houses; but, on the other hand, the West and East and the western corner of the North wall are approximately what they always were. And the look of the walls and gates, especially the Jaffa Gate, with the "Citadel" adjoining, is probably little changed from what it was. True, the minarets, domes, and spires, which give such a variety to the modern town, must have been absent; but their place was supplied by the four great towers at the north-west part of the wall, by the upper stories and turrets of Herod's palace, the palace of the Asmoneans, and the other public buildings; while the lofty fortress of Antonia, towering far above the neighbouring buildings,^k and itself surmounted by the keep on its south-east corner, must have formed a feature in the view not altogether unlike (though more prominent than) the "citadel" of the modern town. The flat roofs and the absence of windows, which give an Eastern city so startling an appearance to a Western traveller, probably existed then as now.

But the greatest resemblance must have been on the south-east side, towards the Mount of Olives. Here the precinct of the Haram esh-Sherif, with its domes and sacred buildings, some of them clinging to the very spot formerly occupied by the Temple, must preserve what we may call the personal identity of this quarter of the city, but little changed in its general features from what it was when the Temple stood there. Nay, more: in the substructions of the enclosure, those massive and venerable walls, which once to see is never to forget, is the very masonry itself, its lower courses undisturbed, which was laid there by Herod the Great, and by Agrippa, possibly even by still older builders.

Climate.—The climate of Jerusalem differs in no respect from that of the hill-country of Judaea and Samaria. A long dry season, lasting from May to October, is regularly followed by a rainy season divided into three periods: the early rain, מורה; the heavy winter rain, נשם; and the latter rain, מלקוש. Snow falls two years out of three, but soon melts. The deepest fall in recent years was 17 in. in 1879. The prevailing winds are from the west, and are moist. The north winds are cold, the east dry, and the south warm. In summer, when the whole country is arid, the westerly winds discharge the moisture, with which they are laden, in copious dew. The sirocco blows from the S.E. and lasts from three to twenty or even thirty days. Earthquakes, but not of any great severity, are occasionally felt. The results of twenty-two years' continuous observations give:—

	Mean.	Max.	Min.
Bar. . . .	27·398	27·816	26·972
Temp. . . .	62·8	112°	25°
Rain	22·76 in.	42·93 in.	12·27 in.
No. of rainy days . . . }	52	71	37

The mean monthly temperature is lowest in February and highest in August. The unhealthy period during which climatic diseases are most prevalent extends from May to October inclusive (Dr. Chaplin in PEFQy. Stat. 1883, pp. 8-40).

Environs of the City.—The various spots in the neighbourhood of the city will be described at length under their own names, and to them the reader is accordingly referred. See EN-ROGEL; HINNOM; KEDRON; OLIVES, MOUNT OF, &c. &c.

II. THE ANNALS OF THE CITY.

In considering the annals of the city of Jerusalem, nothing strikes one so forcibly as the number and severity of the sieges which it underwent. We catch our earliest glimpse of it in the brief notice of the 1st chapter of Judges, which describes how the "children of Judah smote it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire;" and almost the latest mention of it in the New Testament is contained in the solemn warnings in which Christ foretold how Jerusalem should be "compassed with armies" (Luke xxi. 20), and the abomination of desolation be seen standing in the Holy Place (Matt. xxiv. 15). In the fifteen centuries which elapsed between those two points the city was besieged no fewer than seventeen times; twice it was razed to the ground; and on two other occasions its walls were levelled. In this respect it stands without a parallel in any city ancient or modern. The fact is one of great significance. The number of the sieges testifies to the importance of the town as a key to the whole country, and as the depository of the accumulated treasures of the Temple, no less forcibly than do the severity of the contests and their protracted length to the difficulties of the position and the obstinate enthusiasm of the Jewish people. At the same time the details of these operations, scanty as they are, throw considerable light on the difficult topography of the place; and on the whole they are in every way so characteristic, that it has seemed not unfit to use them as far as possible as a framework for the following rapid sketch of the history of the city.

The first siege appears to have taken place almost immediately after the death of Joshua (c. 1400 B.C.). Judah and Simeon had been ordered by the divine oracle at Shiloh or Shechem to commence the task of actual possession of the portions distributed by Joshua. As they traversed the region south of these, they encountered a large force of Canaanites at Bezek. These they dispersed, took prisoner Adoni-bezek, a ferocious petty chieftain, who was the terror of the country, and swept on their southward road. Jerusalem was soon reached.¹ It was evidently too important, and also too near the actual limits of Judah, to be passed by. "They fought against it and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire" (Judg. i. 8). To this brief notice Josephus (Ant. v. 2, § 2) makes a material addition. He tells us that the siege lasted some time (σὸν χρόνον); that the part which was taken at last, and in which the slaughter was made, was the lower city; but that the upper city was so strong, "by reason of its walls and also of the nature of the place," that they relinquished the attempt and moved off to Hebron (Ant. v. 2, §§ 2, 3). These few valuable words of the old Jewish historian reveal one of those topographical peculiarities of the place—the possession of an upper as well as a lower city—which differentiated it so remarkably from the other towns of Palestine, which enabled it to survive so many sieges and partial destructions, and which in the former section we have endeavoured to explain. It is not to be wondered at that these characteristics, which must have been impressed with peculiar force on the mind of Josephus during the destruction of Jerusalem, of which he had only lately been a witness, should have recurred to him when writing the account of the earlier sieges.^a There are, however, strong grounds for supposing that the city of the Jebusites was almost entirely confined to the eastern hill. This question is discussed in Section III. (p. 1648).

^k "Conspicuo fastigio turris Antonia" (Tac. Hist. v. 11).

As long as the citadel remained in the hands of the Jebusites, they practically had possession of the whole; and a Jebusite city in fact it remained for a long period after this. The Benjamites followed the men of Judah to Jerusalem, but with no better result. They could not drive out the Jebusites, "but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day" (Judg. i. 21). At the time of the sad story of the Levite (Judg. xix.)—which the mention of Phinehas (xx. 28) fixes as early in the period of the Judges—Benjamin can hardly have had even so much footing as the passage just quoted would indicate; for the Levite refuses to enter it, not because it was hostile, but because it was "the city of a stranger, and not of Israel." And this lasted during the whole period of the Judges, the reign of Saul, and the reign of David at Hebron. Owing to several circumstances—the residence of the Ark at Shiloh; Saul's connexion with Gibeath, and David's with Ziklag and Hebron; the disunion of Benjamin and Judah, symbolised by Saul's persecution of David—the tide of affairs was drawn northwards and southwards, and Jerusalem, with the places adjacent, was left in possession of the Jebusites. But as soon as a man was found to assume the rule over all Israel, both north and south, so soon was it necessary that the seat of government should be moved from the remote Hebron nearer to the centre of the country, and the choice of David at once fell on the city of the Jebusites.

David advanced to the siege at the head of the men of war of all the tribes who had come to Hebron "to turn the kingdom of Saul to him." They are stated as 280,000 men, choice warriors of the flower of Israel (1 Ch. xii. 23-39). No doubt they approached the city from the south. The ravine of the Kedron, the Valley of Hinnom, the hills south and south-east of the town, the uplands on the west, must have swarmed with these hardy warriors. As before, the lower city was immediately taken, and, as before, the citadel held out. The undaunted Jebusites, believing in the impregnability of their fortress, manned the battlements "with lame and blind"^a (Joseph. Ant. vii. 3, § 1); or, according to 2 Sam. v. 6 (R. V. marg., cp. Luther's translation), taunted David, saying, "Thou shalt not come in hither, the blind and the lame shall drive thee away" (cp. 1 Ch. xi. 5, "Thou shalt not come hither"). But they little understood the temper of the king or of those he commanded. David's anger was thoroughly roused by the insult (ἄγριαισθής, Joseph.), and he at once proclaimed to his host that the first man who would scale the rocky side of the fortress and kill a Jebusite should be made chief captain of the host. A crowd of warriors (ἄνδρες, Joseph.) rushed forward to the attempt, but Joab's superior agility gained him the day,^b and the citadel, the fastness of ZION, was taken (c. 1046 B.C.). It is the first time that that memorable name appears in the history.

David at once proceeded to secure himself in his new acquisition. He enclosed the whole of the city with a wall, and connected it with the citadel. In the latter he took up his own quarters, and the Zion of the Jebusites became "the city of David."^c [ZION; MILLO.] The rest of the town was left to the more immediate care of the new captain of the host (Ant. vii. 3, § 2).

The sensation caused by the fall of this impregnable fortress must have been enormous. It reached even to the distant Tyre, and before long an embassy arrived from Hiram, the king of Phoenicia, with the characteristic offerings of artificers and materials to erect a palace for David in his new abode. The palace was built, and occupied by the fresh establishment of wives and concubines which David acquired. Two attempts were made—the one by the Philistines alone (2 Sam. v. 17-21; 1 Ch. xiv. 8-12), the other by the Philistines with all Syria and Phoenicia (Joseph. Ant. vii. 4, § 1; 2 Sam. v. 22-25)—to attack David in his new situation, but they did not affect the city, and the actions were fought in the "Valley of Giants," apparently the open valley el-Buke'ia, west of Jerusalem, and extending towards Bethlehem. The arrival of the Ark, however, was an event of great importance. The old Tabernacle of Bezaleel and Aboliab being now pitched on the height of Gibeon, a new tent had been spread by David in the "city of David" for the reception of the Ark; and here, "in its place," it was deposited with the most impressive ceremonies, and Zion became at once the great sanctuary of the nation. It now perhaps acquired the name of Beth ha-har, the "house of the mount," of which we catch a glimpse in the LXX. addition to 2 Sam. xv. 24. In this tent the Ark remained, except for its short flight to the foot of the Mount of Olives with David (xv. 24-29), until it was removed to its permanent resting-place in the Temple of Solomon.

^a The passage which forms the latter clause of 2 Sam. v. 8 is generally taken to mean that the blind and the lame were excluded from the Temple. But where is the proof that this was the fact? On one occasion at least we know that "the blind and the lame" came to Christ in the Temple, and He healed them (Matt. xxi. 14). And indeed what had the Temple, which was not founded till long after this, to do with the matter? The explanation, which is in accordance with the accentuation of the Masorets, would seem to be that it was a proverb used afterwards with regard to any impregnable fortress—"The blind and the lame are there; let him enter the place if he can."

^b A romantic legend is preserved in the Midrash Tehillim, on Ps. xviii. 29, of the stratagem by which Joab succeeded in reaching the top of the wall (see it quoted in Eisenmenger, i. 476-7).

^c In the N. T. "the city of David" means Bethlehem.

In the "city of David," too, was the sepulchre of David, which became also that of most of his successors.

The only works of ornament which we can ascribe to David are the "royal gardens," as they are called by Josephus, which appear to have been formed by him in the level space south-east of the city, formed by the confluence of the valleys of Kedron and Hinnom, screened from the sun during part of the day by the shoulders of the enclosing mountains, and irrigated by the Virgin's Fountain and the floodwaters of the Kedron stored in one or more pools (Joseph. Ant. vii. 14, § 4; ix. 10, § 4).

Until the time of Solomon we hear of no additions to the city. His three great works were the Temple, with its east wall and cloister (Joseph. B. J. v. 5, § 1), his own palace, and the Wall of Jerusalem. The two former will be best described elsewhere. [PALACE; SOLOMON; TEMPLE.] Of the last there is an interesting notice in Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 1; 6, § 1; 7, § 7), from which it appears that David's wall was a mere rampart without towers, and only of moderate strength and height. One of the first acts of the new king was to make the walls larger—probably extend them so as to include both the western and the eastern hills—and strengthen them (1 K. iii. 1, with the explanation of Josephus, viii. 2, § 1). But on the completion of the Temple he again turned his attention to the walls, and both increased their height and constructed very large towers along them (ix. 15, and Joseph. Ant. viii. 6, § 1). Another work of his in Jerusalem was the repair or fortification of Millo, whatever that strange term may signify (1 K. ix. 15, 24). It was in the works at Millo and the city of David—it is uncertain whether the latter consisted of closing breaches (as in A. V.) or filling a ditch round the fortress (the Vulg. and others)—that Jeroboam first came under the notice of Solomon (1 K. xi. 27; cp. Ant. viii. 7, § 7). Another was a palace for his Egyptian queen—of the situation of which all we know is that it was not in the city of David (1 K. vii. 8, ix. 24, with the addition in 2 Ch. viii. 11); and was therefore, presumably, on the western hill. But there must have been much besides these to fill up the measure of "all that Solomon desired to build in Jerusalem" (2 Ch. viii. 6): the vast harem for his 700 wives and 300 concubines, and their establishment—the colleges for the priests of the various religions of these women—the stables for the 1400 chariots and 12,000 riding horses. Outside the city, probably on the Mount of Olives, there remained, down to the latest times of the monarchy (2 K. xxiii. 13), the fanes which he had erected for the worship of foreign gods (1 K. xi. 7), and which have still left their name clinging to the "Mount of Offence."

His care of the roads leading to the city is the subject of a special panegyric from Josephus (Ant. viii. 7, § 4). They were, as before observed, paved with black stone, perhaps the hard basalt from the region of Argob, on the east of Jordan, where he had a special resident officer.

As long as Solomon lived, the visits of foreign powers to Jerusalem were those of courtesy and amity; but with his death this was changed. A city in the palaces of which all the vessels were of pure gold; where spices, precious stones, rare woods, and curious animals were accumulated in the greatest profusion; where silver was no more valued than the stones of the street, and considered too mean a material for the commonest of the royal purposes—such a city, governed by such a fainéant prince as Rehoboam, was too tempting a prey for the surrounding kings. He had only been on the throne four years (c. 970 B.C.) before Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded Judah with an enormous host, took the fortified places,⁴ and advanced to the capital. Jerusalem was crowded with the chief men of the realm who had taken refuge there (2 Ch. xii. 5), but Rehoboam did not attempt resistance. He opened his gates apparently on a promise from Shishak that he would not pillage (Joseph. Ant. viii. 10, § 3). However, the promise was not kept, the treasures of the Temple and palace were carried off, and special mention is made of the golden bucklers (120) which were hung by Solomon in the house of the forest of Lebanon (1 K. xiv. 25, 26; 2 Ch. xii. 9; cp. 1 K. x. 17).⁵

Jerusalem was again threatened in the reign of Asa (grandson of Rehoboam), when Zerah the Cushite, or king of Ethiopia (Joseph. Ant. viii. 12, § 1) [CUSH], probably incited by the success of Shishak, invaded the country with an enormous horde of followers (2 Ch. xiv. 9). He came by the road through the low country of Philistia, where his chariots could find level ground. But Asa was more faithful and more valiant than Rehoboam had been. He did not remain to be blockaded in Jerusalem, but went forth and met the enemy at Mareshah, and repulsed him with great slaughter (c. 940). The consequence of this victory was a great reformation extending throughout the kingdom, but most demonstrative at Jerusalem. A vast assembly of the men of Judah and Benjamin, of Simeon, even of Ephraim and Manasseh—now "strangers" (דְּבָרִים)—was gathered at Jerusalem. Enormous sacrifices were offered; a prodigious enthusiasm seized the crowded city, and amidst the clamour of trumpets and shouting, oaths of loyalty to Jehovah were exchanged, and threats of instant death denounced on all who should forsake His service. The Altar of Jehovah in front of the porch of the Temple, which had fallen into decay, was rebuilt; the horrid idol of the queen-mother—the mysterious Asherah, doubtless an abomination of the Syrian worship of her grandmother—was torn down, ground to powder, and burnt in the valley (nachal) of the Kedron. At the same time the vessels of the Temple, which had been plundered by Shishak, were replaced from the spoil taken by Abijah from Ephraim, and by Asa himself from the Cushites (2 Ch. xv. 8–19; 1 K. xv. 12–15). This prosperity lasted for more than ten years, but at the end of that interval the Temple was once more despoiled, and the treasures so lately dedicated to Jehovah were sent by Asa, who had himself dedicated them, as bribes to Benhadad at Damascus, where they probably enriched the temple of Rimmon (2 Ch. xvi. 2, 3; 1 K. xv. 18). Asa was buried in a tomb excavated by himself in the royal sepulchres in the city of David.

The reign of his son Jehoshaphat, though of great prosperity and splendour, is not remarkable as regards the city of Jerusalem. We hear of a “new court” to the Temple, but have no clue to its situation or its builder (2 Ch. xx. 5). An important addition to the government of the city was made by Jehoshaphat in the establishment of courts for the decision of causes both ecclesiastical and civil (2 Ch. xix. 8–11).

Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram was a prince of a different temper. He began his reign (c. 887) by a massacre of his brethren and of the chief men of the kingdom. Instigated no doubt by his wife Athaliah, he re-introduced the profligate licentious worship of Ashtaroth and the high places (2 Ch. xxi. 11), and built a temple for Baal (2 Ch. xxiii. 17; Joseph. Ant. ix. 7, § 4). Though a man of great vigour and courage, he was overcome by an invasion of one of those huge hordes which were now almost periodical. The Philistines and Arabians attacked Jerusalem, broke into the palace, spoiled it of all its treasures, sacked the royal harem, killed or carried off the king's wives, and all his sons but one. This was the fourth siege. Two years after it the king died, universally detested, and so strong was the feeling against him that he was denied a resting-place in the sepulchres of the kings, but was buried without ceremony in a private tomb in the city of David (2 Ch. xxi. 20).

The next events in Jerusalem were the massacre of the royal children by Jehoram's widow Athaliah, and the six years' reign of that queen. During her sway the worship of Baal was prevalent, and that of Jehovah proportionately depressed. The Temple was not only suffered to go without repair, but was even mutilated by the sons of Athaliah, and its treasures removed to the temple of Baal (2 Ch. xxiv. 7). But with the increasing years of Joash, the spirit of the adherents of Jehovah returned, and the confederacy of Jehoiaada the priest with the chief men of Judah resulted in the restoration of the true line. The king was crowned and proclaimed in the Temple. Athaliah herself was hurried out from the sacred precincts to the valley of the Kedron (Joseph. Ant. ix. 7, § 3), and was executed at “the entry of the horse gate” to the king's house” (2 Ch.

xxiii. 15, R. V.; cp. 2 K. xi. 16). The temple of Baal was demolished; his altars and images destroyed, his priests put to death, and the religion of Jehovah was once more the national religion. But the restoration of the Temple advanced but slowly, and it was not till three-and-twenty years had elapsed, that through the personal interference of the king the ravages of the Baal worshippers were repaired (2 K. xii. 6–16), and the necessary vessels and utensils furnished for the service of the Temple (2 Ch. xxiv. 14. But see 2 K. xii. 13; Joseph. Ant. iv. 8, § 2). But this zeal for Jehovah soon expired. The solemn ceremonial of the burial of the good priest in the royal tombs, among the kings, can hardly have been forgotten before a general relapse into idolatry took place, and his son Zechariah was stoned with his family¹ in the very court of the Temple for protesting.

The retribution invoked by the dying martyr quickly followed. Before the end of the year (c. 838), Hazael, king of Syria, after possessing himself of Gath, marched against the much richer prize of Jerusalem. The visit was averted by a timely offering of treasure from the Temple and the royal palace (2 K. xii. 18; 2 Ch. xxiv. 23; Joseph. Ant. ix. 8, § 4), but not before an action had been fought, in which a large army of the Israelites was routed by a very inferior force of Syrians, with the loss of a great number of the principal people and of a vast booty. Nor was this all. These reverses so distressed the king as to bring on a dangerous illness, in the midst of which he was assassinated by two of his own servants, sons of two of the foreign women who were common in the royal harems. He was buried in the city of David, though, like Jehoram, denied a resting-place in the royal tombs (2 Ch. xxiv. 25). The predicted danger to the city was, however, only postponed. Amaziah began his reign (B.C. 837) with a promise of good; his first act showed that while he knew how to avenge the murder of his father, he could also restrain his wrath within the bounds prescribed by the Law of Jehovah. But with success came deterioration. He returned from his victories over the Edomites, and the massacre at Petra, with fresh idols to add to those which already defiled Jerusalem—the images of the children of Seir, or of the Amalekites (Josephus), which were erected and worshipped by the king. His next act was a challenge to Joash, the king of Israel, and now the danger so narrowly escaped from Hazael was actually encountered. The battle took place at Bethshemesh of Judah, at the opening of the second Temple, the only gate on the east side of the outer wall, upon which, according to the Mishna (Middoth, l. 3), the palace of Shushan or Susan was portrayed (Lightfoot, Prosp. of Temple, iii.).

of the hills, about 14½ miles west of Jerusalem. It ended in a total rout. Amaziah, forsaken by his people, was taken prisoner by Joash, who at once proceeded to Jerusalem and threatened to put his captive to death before the walls, if he and his army were not admitted. The gates were thrown open, the treasures of the Temple—still in the charge of the same family to whom they had been committed by David—and the king's private treasures were pillaged, and for the first time the walls of the city were injured. A clear breach was made in them of 400 cubits in length "from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate," and through this Joash drove in triumph, with his captive in the chariot, into the city.* This must have been on the north side of the first wall, and probably towards its eastern extremity.

The long reign of Uzziah (2 K. xv. 1-7; 2 Ch. xxvi.) brought about a material improvement in the fortunes of Jerusalem. He was a wise and good prince (Joseph. ix. 10, § 3), very warlike, and a great builder. After some campaigns against foreign enemies, he devoted himself to the care of Jerusalem for the whole of his life (Josephus). The walls were thoroughly repaired, the portion broken down by Joash was rebuilt and fortified with towers at the corner gate; and other parts which had been allowed to go to ruin—as the gate opening on the Valley of Hinnom,† a spot called the "turning" (see Neh. iii. 19, 20, 24), and others—were renewed and fortified, and furnished for the first time with machines, then expressly invented for shooting stones and arrows against besiegers. Later in this reign happened the great earthquake, which, although unmentioned in the historical books of the Bible, is described by Josephus (ix. 10, § 4), and alluded to by the prophets (Amos i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5) as a kind of era (see Stanley, S. & P. pp. 184, 185). A serious breach was made in the Temple itself, and below the city a large fragment of rock, or landslide, rolling down from the hill at En-rogel‡ blocked up the roads, overwhelmed the king's gardens, and rested against the bottom of the slope of Olivet. After the leprosy of Uzziah, he left the sacred precincts, and resided in the hospital or lazaret-house, outside the city, till his death.§ He was buried in the city of David with the kings (2 K. xv. 7); not in the sepulchre itself, but in a garden or field attached to the spot.

* This is an addition by Josephus (ix. 9, § 9). Since the time of Solomon, chariots would seem to have become unknown in Jerusalem. At any rate we should infer from the notice in 2 K. xiv. 20, that the royal establishment could not at that time boast of one.

† The story of his leprosy at any rate shows his zeal for Jehovah.

‡ 2 Ch. xxvi. 9. The word rendered "the valley" is הַבְּרֵיָה, always employed for the valley on the west and south of the town, as הַבְּרֵיָה is for that on the east.

§ This will be the eastern hill, or Ophel, south of the "Virgin's Fountain." Josephus calls the place Evoge (Ἐβώγη), and it has been suggested (Bonar, Imp. Bib. Dict. s. v. Jerusalem) that this is the Hebrew עֵרְוֵה (Arūgah), a garden, or spice-bed, and not En-rogel.

¶ בית הַמַּפְסוּת. The interpretation given above is that of Kimchi, adopted by Gesenius, Fürst, and Bertheau. Kell (on 2 K. xv. 8) and Hengstenberg, however, contend for a different meaning.

Jotham (c. 756) inherited his father's sagacity, as well as his tastes for architecture and warfare. His works in Jerusalem were building the upper gateway to the Temple—apparently a gate communicating with the palace (2 Ch. xxiii. 20)—and also porticoes leading to the same (Ant. ix. 11, § 2). He also built much on Ophel—probably on the south of Moriah (2 K. xv. 35; 2 Ch. xxvii. 3)—repaired the walls wherever they were dilapidated, and strengthened them by very large and strong towers (Joseph.). Before the death of Jotham (B.C. 740) the clouds of the Syrian invasion began to gather. They broke on the head of Ahaz, his successor: Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, joined their armies and invested Jerusalem (2 K. xvi. 5), where there appears to have been a party in their favour (Is. viii. 6). The fortifications of the two previous kings enabled the city to hold out during a siege of great length (ἐν πολλῶν χρόνων, Joseph.). During its progress Rezin made an expedition against the distant town of Elath on the Red Sea, from which he expelled the Jews, and handed it over to the Syrians, or (R. V. marg.) Edomites (2 K. xvi. 6; Ant. ix. 12, § 1). [AHAZ.] Finding on his return that the place still held out, Rezin ravaged Judaea and returned to Damascus with a multitude of captives, leaving Pekah to continue the blockade.

Ahaz, thinking himself a match for the Israelite army, opened his gates and came forth. A tremendous conflict ensued, in which the three chiefs of the government next to the king, and 120,000 of the able warriors of the army of Judah, are stated to have been killed, and Pekah returned to Samaria with a crowd of captives, and a great quantity of spoil collected from the Benjaminite towns north of Jerusalem (Joseph.). Ahaz himself escaped, and there is no mention in any of the records, of the city having been plundered. The captives and the spoil were, however, sent back by the people of Samaria—a fact which, as it has no bearing on the history of the city, need here only be referred to, because from the narrative it may perhaps be inferred that the most convenient route from Samaria to Jerusalem at that time was not, as now, along the plateau of the country, but by the depths of the Jordan Valley, and through Jericho (2 K. xvi. 5; 2 Ch. xxviii. 5-15; Joseph. Ant. ix. 12, § 2).

To oppose the confederacy which had so injured him, Ahaz had recourse to Assyria. He appears first to have sent an embassy to Tiglath-pileser with presents of silver and gold taken from the treasures of the Temple and the palace (2 K. xvi. 8), which had been recruited during the last two reigns, and with a promise of more if the king would overrun Syria and Israel (Ant. ix. 12, § 3). This Tiglath-pileser did. He marched to Damascus, took the city, and killed Rezin. While there, Ahaz visited him, to make his formal submission of vassalage, and gave him the further presents. To collect these he went so far as to lay hands on part of the permanent works of the Temple—the original constructions of Solomon, which none of his predecessors had been bold enough or needy enough to touch. He cut off the richly-chased panels which ornamented the brass bases of the cisterns, dismounted the large tank or “sea” from the brazen bulls, and supported it on a pedestal of stone, and removed the “cover for the sabbath,” and the ornamental stand on which the kings were accustomed to sit in the Temple (2 K. xvi. 17, 18).

Whether the application to Assyria relieved Ahaz from one or both of his enemies, is not clear. From one passage it would seem that Tiglath-pileser actually came to Jerusalem (2 Ch. xxviii. 20). At any rate the intercourse resulted in fresh idolatries, and fresh insults to the Temple. A new brazen altar was made after the profane fashion of one he had seen at Damascus, and was set up in the centre of the court of the Temple, to occupy the place and perform the functions of the original Altar of Solomon, now removed to a less prominent position (see 2 K. xvi. 12–15, with the explanation of Keil); the very sanctuary itself (הִקְדִּישׁ, and עִזְבֵּהוּ) was polluted by idol-worship of some kind or other (2 Ch. xxix. 5, 16). Horses dedicated to the sun were stabled at the entrance to the court, with their chariots (2 K. xxiii. 11). Altars for sacrifice to the moon and stars were erected on the flat roofs of the Temple (ib. v. 12). Such consecrated vessels as remained in the House of Jehovah were taken thence, and either transferred to the service of the idols (2 Ch. xxix. 19) or cut up and re-manufactured; the lamps of the sanctuary were extinguished* (xxix. 7), and for the first time the doors of the Temple were closed to the worshippers (xxviii. 24), and their offerings seized for the idols (Joseph. Ant. ix. 12, § 3). The famous sun-dial was erected at this time, possibly in the Temple.[†] When Ahaz at last died, it is not wonderful that a meaner fate was awarded him than that of even the leprous Uzziah. He was excluded not only from the royal sepulchres, but from the precincts of Zion, and was buried “in the city—in Jerusalem.”[‡] The very first act of Hezekiah (B.C. 724) was to restore what his father had desecrated (2 Ch. xxix. 3; and see v. 36, “suddenly”). The Levites were collected and inspired; the Temple freed from its impurities both actual and ceremonial; the accumulated abominations being discharged into the valley of the Kedron. The full musical service of the Temple was re-organised, with the instruments and the hymns ordained by David and Asaph; and after a solemn sin-offering for the late transgressions had been offered in the presence of the king and princes, the public were allowed to testify their acquiescence in the change by bringing their own thank-offerings (2 Ch. xxix. 1–36). This was done on the 17th of the first month of his reign. The regular time for celebrating the Passover was therefore gone by. But there was a law (Num. ix. 10, 11) which allowed the Feast to be postponed for a month on special occasions, and of this law Hezekiah took advantage, in his anxiety to obtain from the whole of his people a national testimony to their allegiance to Jehovah and His laws (2 Ch. xxx. 2, 3). Accordingly at the special invitation of the king a vast multitude, not only from his own dominions, but from the northern kingdom, even from the remote Asher and Zebulun, assembled at the capital. Their first act was to uproot and efface all traces of the idolatry of the preceding and former reigns. High-places, altars, the mysterious and obscene symbols of Baal and Asherah, the venerable brazen serpent of Moses itself, were torn down, broken to pieces, and the fragments cast into the valley of the Kedron (2 Ch. xxx. 14; 2 K. xviii. 4). This done, the Feast was kept for two weeks, and the vast concourse dispersed. The permanent service of the Temple was next thoroughly organised, the subsistence of the officiating ministers arranged, and provision made for storing the supplies (2 Ch. xxxi. 2–21). It was probably at this time that the decorations of the Temple were renewed, and the gold or other precious plating[§] which had been removed by former kings re-applied to the doors and pillars (2 K. xviii. 16).

And now approached the greatest crisis which had yet occurred in the history of the city: the dreaded Assyrian army was to appear before its walls. Hezekiah had apparently entered into an alliance with Merodach-baladan, king of Babylon (2 K. xx. 12; Is. xxxix. 1), and, with Edom and Moab, joined the Philistines in their revolt against Assyria, then ruled by Sargon. The Tartan was ordered to besiege Ashdod, and another army, perhaps led by the great king in person, pushed southwards through the mountain passes, and halted at Nob, within sight of the “daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerusalem” (Is. x. 28–32). It has been suggested (Sayce, Fresh Light from the Anct. Monst. pp. 117, 118) that Jerusalem was taken in this the 14th year of Hezekiah's reign (c. 711 B.C.), and that its capture is referred to in Is. x. 6, 12, 22, 24, 34, and xxii. But this is in direct contradiction to the promise made to Hezekiah (Is. xxxviii. 6; cp. xxxix. 8), and there is no record of the conquest of the city by Sargon in the Assyrian inscriptions. Ten years later Jerusalem was again threatened by an Assyrian army. Trusting to the support of Tirhakah, king of Egypt, Hezekiah threw off his allegiance to Assyria, and re-asserted his supremacy over the cities of Philistia. Sennacherib advanced to quell the revolt (c. 701 B.C.), and from Lachish sent the Tartan or commander-in-chief, the Rabshakeh or prime minister, and the Rabsaris or

* In the old Jewish Calendar the 18th of Ab was kept as a fast, to commemorate the putting out of the western light of the great candlestick by Ahaz.

† There is an a priori probability that the dial would be placed in a sacred precinct; but may we not infer, from comparing 2 K. xx. 4 with 9, that it was in the “middle court,” and that the sight of it there as he passed through had suggested to Isalah the “sign” which was to accompany the king's recovery?

‡ Such is the express statement of 2 Ch. xxviii. 27. The Book of Kings repeats its regular formula. Josephus omits all notice of the burial.

§ And yet it would seem, from the account of Josiah's reforms (2 K. xxiii. 11, 12), that many of Ahaz's intrusions survived even the zeal of Hezekiah.

chamberlain, with a large army to Jerusalem. The details of the invasion will be found under the separate heads of HEZEKIAH and SENNACHERIB. The Assyrian king states in an inscription (Schrader, Die Keilinschriften u. d. A. T., pp. 288-294), that he shut up Hezekiah

"like a bird in a cage in Jerusalem, his royal city;" and that he raised a line of forts against him, and prevented any exit from the chief gate of the city. This is probably an exaggeration, for it is in contradiction to the words of Isaiah (xxxvii. 33), that the king of Assyria should not shoot an arrow against Jerusalem, nor come before it with shield, nor cast a bank against it. It is certain, however, that the Assyrian army was encamped before the walls, and that the Rabshakeh held a conversation with Hezekiah's chief officers, outside the walls—probably near the Turkish Barracks, on the eastern hill, or near the Jaffa Gate—while the wall above was crowded with the anxious inhabitants. At the time of Titus's siege the name of "the Assyrian Camp" was still attached to a spot north of the old wall of the city in remembrance either of this or the subsequent visit of Nebuchadnezzar (Joseph. B. J. v. 12, § 2). But though untaken—though the citadel was still the “virgin-daughter of Zion”—yet Jerusalem did not escape unharmed. Hezekiah’s treasures had to be emptied, and the costly ornaments he had added to the Temple were stripped off to make up the tribute.

It was previous to one of these invasions, or perhaps in the interval between them, that Hezekiah took steps to place the city in a thorough state of defence. The movement was made a national one. A great concourse came together. The springs round Jerusalem were stopped—that is, their outflow was prevented, and the water diverted underground to the interior of the city (2 K. xx. 20; 2 Ch. xxxii. 4). This was particularly the case with the spring which perhaps formed the source of the stream of the Kedron,^h elsewhere called the “upper spring of the waters of Gihon” (2 Ch. xxxii. 30; A. V. most incorrectly, “water-course”). It was led down by a subterranean channel “through the hard rock” (2 Ch. xxxii. 30; Ecclus. xlviii. 17), to, or on, the west side of the city of David (2 K. xx. 20); that is, into the valley which separated the Mount Moriah and Zion from the Upper City (see Water Supply, p. 1593). This done, he carefully repaired the walls of the city, furnished them with additional towers, and built a second wall (2 Ch. xxxii. 5; Is. xxii. 10). The water of the reservoir, called the “old pool,” was diverted to a new tank in the city between the two walls¹ (Is. xxii. 11). Nor was this all: as the struggle would certainly be one for life and death, he strengthened the fortifications of the citadel (2 Ch. xxxii. 5, “Millo;” Is. xxii. 9), and prepared abundance of ammunition. He also organised the people, and officered them, gathered them together in the open place at the gate, and inspired them with confidence in Jehovah (2 Ch. xxxii. 6).

The death of this good and great king was indeed a national calamity, and so it was considered. He was buried in “the chiefest (R. V. ascent) of the sepulchres of the sons of David,” and a vast concourse from the country, as well as of the citizens of Jerusalem, assembled to join in the wailings at the funeral (2 Ch. xxxii. 33).

The reign of Manasseh (B.C. 696) must have been an eventful one in the annals of Jerusalem, though only meagre indications of its events are to be found in the documents. He began by plunging into all the idolatries of his grandfather—restoring all that Hezekiah had destroyed, and desecrating the Temple and the city with even more offensive idolatries than those of Ahaz (2 Ch. xxxiii. 2–9; 2 K. xxi. 2–9). In this career of wickedness he was stopped by an invasion of the Assyrian army, by whom he was taken prisoner and carried to Babylon, where he remained for some time.² The rest of his long reign was occupied in attempting to remedy his former misdoings, and in the repair and conservation of the city (Joseph. Ant. x. 3, § 2). He built an outer wall to the city of David, “from the west side of Gihon-in-the-valley to the Fish gate,” i.e. apparently along the western side of the Kedron Valley. He also continued the works which had been begun by Jotham at Ophel, and raised that fortress or structure to a great height (2 Ch. xxxiii. 14). On his death he was buried in a private tomb in the garden attached to his palace, called also the garden of Uzza (2 K. xxi. 18; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 20). Here also was interred his son Amon after his violent death, following an uneventful but idolatrous reign of two years (2 Ch. xxxiii. 21–25; 2 K. xxi. 19–26).

The reign of Josiah (B.C. 639) was marked by a more strenuous zeal for Jehovah than even that of Hezekiah had been. He began his reign at eight years of age, and by his 20th year (12th of his reign—2 Ch. xxxiv. 3) commenced a thorough removal of the idolatrous abuses of Manasseh and Amon, and even some of Ahaz, which must have escaped the purgations of Hezekiah¹ (2 K. xxiii. 12). As on former occasions, these abominations were broken up small and carried down to the bed of the Kedron—which seems to have served almost the purpose of a common sewer—and there calcined and dispersed. The cemetery, which still paves the sides of that valley, had already begun to exist, and the fragments of the broken altars and statues were scattered on the graves that they might be effectually defiled, and thus prevented from further use. On the opposite side of the valley, somewhere on the Mount of Olives, were the erections which Solomon had put up for the deities of his foreign wives. Not one of these was spared; they were all annihilated, and dead bones scattered over the places where they had stood. These things occupied six years, at the expiration of which, in the first month of the 18th year of his reign (2 Ch. xxxv. 1; 2 K. xxxiii. 23), a solemn Passover was held, emphatically recorded to have been the greatest since the time of Samuel (2 Ch. xxxv. 18). This seems to have been the crowning ceremony of the purification of the Temple; and it was at once followed by a thorough renovation of the fabric (2 Ch. xxxiv. 8; 2 K. xxii. 5). The cost was met by offerings collected at the doors (2 K. xxii. 4), and also throughout the country (Joseph. Ant. x. 4, § 1), not only of Judah and Benjamin, but also of Ephraim and the other northern tribes (2 Ch. xxxiv. 9). It was during these repairs that the Book of the Law was found; and shortly after all the people

^h The authority for this is the use here of the word Nachal, which is uniformly applied to the valley east of the city, as Ge is to that west and south; but see GIBSON. Similar measures were taken by the Moslems on the approach of the Crusaders (Will. of Tyre, viii. 4, 7).

² In the Assyrian inscriptions Manasseh is mentioned among the tributaries of both Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal (Schrader, Die Keilinschriften u. d. A. T. pp. 354–357).

were convened to Jerusalem to hear it read, and to renew the national covenant with Jehovah." The mention of Huldah the prophetess (2 Ch. xxiv. 22; 2 K. xxii. 14) introduces us to a part of the city called "the Mishneh" (מִשְׁנֵה, A. V. "college," or R. V. "second quarter").^a The name also survives in the Book of Zephaniah, a prophet of this reign (i. 10), who seems to recognise "the Fish gate," "the second quarter," and "the hills" as the three prominent features of the city.

Josiah's death took place at a distance from Jerusalem; but he was brought there for his burial, and was placed in "his own sepulchre" (2 K. xxiii. 30), or "in the sepulchre of his fathers" (2 Ch. xxxv. 24; Joseph. Ant. x. 5, § 1), perhaps that already tenanted by Manasseh and Amon. (See 1 Esd. i. 31.)

Josiah's rash opposition to Pharaoh-necho cost him his life, his son his throne, and Jerusalem much suffering. Before Jehohaz (B.C. 608) had been reigning three months, the Egyptian king found opportunity to send to Jerusalem from Riblah, where he was then encamped, a force sufficient to depose and take him prisoner, to put his brother Eliakim on the throne, and to exact a heavy fine from the city and country, which was paid in advance by the new king, and afterwards extorted by taxation (2 K. xxiii. 33, 35).

The fall of the city was now rapidly approaching. During the reign of Jehoiakim—such was the new name at Necho's order Eliakim had assumed—Jerusalem was visited by Nebuchadnezzar, with the Babylonian army lately victorious over the Egyptians at Carchemish. The visit was possibly repeated once, or even twice.^b A siege there must have been; but of this we have no account. We may infer how severe was the pressure on the surrounding country, from the fact that the very Bedawin were driven within the walls by "the fear of the Chaldeans and of the Syrians" (Jer. xxxv. 11). We may also infer that the Temple was entered, since Nebuchadnezzar carried off some of the vessels therefrom for his temple at Babylon (2 Ch. xxxvi. 7), and that Jehoiakim was treated with great indignity (ib. 6). In the latter part of this reign we discern the country harassed and pillaged by marauding bands from the east of Jordan (2 K. xxiv. 2).

Jehoiakim was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin (B.C. 597). Hardly had his short reign begun before the terrible army of Babylon re-appeared before the city, again commanded by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K. xxiv. 10, 11). Jehoiachin's disposition appears to have made him shrink from inflicting on the city the horrors of a long siege (B. J. vi. 2, § 1), and he therefore surrendered in the third month of his reign. The treasures of the palace and Temple were pillaged; certain golden articles of Solomon's original establishment, which had escaped the plunder and desecrations of the previous reigns, were cut up (2 K. xxiv. 13); and the more desirable objects out of the Temple carried off (Jer. xxvii. 19). The first deportation that we hear of from the city now took place. The king, his wives, and the queen-mother, with their eunuchs and whole establishment, the princes, 7,000 warriors, and 1,000 artificers—in all 10,000 souls—were carried off to Babylon (2 K. xxiv. 14–16). The uncle of Jehoiachin was made king in his stead, by the name of Zedekiah, under a solemn oath ("by God") of allegiance (2 Ch. xxxvi. 13; Ezek. xvii. 13, 14, 18). Had he been content to remain quiet under the rule of Babylon, the city might have stood many years longer; but he was not. He appears to have been tempted with the chance of relief afforded by the accession of Pharaoh-hophra, and to have applied to him for assistance (Ezek. xvii. 15). Upon this Nebuchadnezzar marched in person to Jerusalem, arriving in the 9th year of Zedekiah, on the 10th day of the 10th month^c (B.C. 588), and at once began a regular siege, at the same time wasting the country far and near (Jer. xxxiv. 7). The siege was conducted by erecting forts on lofty mounds round the city, from which, on the usual Assyrian plan,^d missiles were discharged into the town, and the walls and houses in them battered by rams (Jer. xxxii. 24, xxxiii. 4, lii. 4; Ezek. xxi. 22; Joseph. Ant. x. 8, § 1). The city was also surrounded with troops (Jer. lii. 7). The siege was once abandoned, owing to the approach of the Egyptian army (Jer. xxxvii. 5, 11), and during the interval the gates of the city were re-opened (ib. v. 13). But the relief was only temporary, and in the 11th of Zedekiah (B.C. 586), on the 9th day of the 4th month (Jer. lii. 6), being just a year and a half from the first investment, the city was taken. Nebuchadnezzar had in the meantime retired from Jerusalem to Riblah to watch the more important siege of Tyre, then in the last year of its progress. The besieged seem to have suffered severely both from hunger and disease (Jer. xxxii. 24), but chiefly from the former (2 K. xxv. 3; Jer. lii. 6; Lam. v. 10). But they would perhaps have held out longer had not a breach in the wall been effected on the day named. It was at midnight (Joseph.). The whole city was wrapt in the pitchy darkness^e characteristic of an Eastern town, and nothing was known by the Jews of what had happened till the generals of the army entered the Temple (Joseph.) and took their seats in the middle gate^f (Jer. xxxix. 3; Joseph. Ant. x. 8, § 2). Then the alarm was given to Zedekiah, and collecting his remaining warriors, they stole out of the city by a gate at the south side, in the great bend of the wall above Siloam, passed by the royal

^a This narrative has some interesting correspondences with that of Josiah's coronation (2 K. xi.). Amongst these is the singular expression the king stood "on the pillar." In the present case Josephus understands this as an official spot—ἐν τῷ βήματι.

^b See Kell on 2 K. xxii. 14.

^c It seems impossible to reconcile the accounts of this period in Kings, Chronicles, and Jeremiah, with Josephus and the other sources. For one view, see JEHOIAKIM. For an opposite one, see Rawlinson's Herodotus, i. 509–514.

^d According to Josephus (Ant. x. 7, § 4), this date was the commencement of the final portion of the siege. But there is nothing in the Bible records to support this.

^e For the sieges, see Layard's Ninveh, ii. 366, &c.

gardens, and took the road to the Jordan Valley. At break of day information of the flight was brought to the Chaldeans by some deserters. A rapid pursuit was made: Zedekiah was overtaken near Jericho, his people were dispersed, and he himself captured and reserved for a miserable fate at Riblah. Meantime the wretched inhabitants suffered all the horrors of assault and sack: the men were slaughtered, old and young, prince and peasant, the women violated in Mount Zion itself (Lam. ii. 4; v. 11, 12).

On the 7th day of the following month (2 K. xxv. 8), Nebuzaradan, the commander of the king's body-guard, who seems to have been charged with Nebuchadnezzar's instructions as to what should be done with the city, arrived. Two days were passed, probably in collecting the captives and booty; and on the 10th (Jer. lii. 12) the Temple, the royal palace, and all the more important buildings of the city were set on fire, and the walls thrown down and left as heaps of disordered rubbish on the ground (Neh. iv. 2). The spoil of the city consisted apparently of little more than the furniture of the Temple. A few small vessels in gold⁴ and silver, and some other things in brass, were carried away whole—the former under the especial eye of Nebuzaradan himself (2 K. xxv. 15; cp. Jer. xxvii. 19). But the larger objects, Solomon's huge brazen basin or sea with its twelve bulls, the ten bases, the two magnificent pillars, Jachin and Boaz, too heavy and too cumbersome for transport, were broken up. The pillars were almost the only parts of Solomon's original construction which had not been mutilated by the sacrilegious hands of some Baal-worshipping monarch or other, and there is quite a touch of pathos in the way in which the Chronicler lingers over his recollections of their height, their size, and their ornaments—capitals, wreathen work, and pomegranates, "all of brass."

The previous deportations, and the sufferings endured in the siege, must to a great extent have drained the place of its able-bodied people, and thus the captives on this occasion were but few and unimportant. The high-priest and four other officers of the Temple, the commanders of the fighting men, five⁵ people of the court, the mustering officer of the army, and sixty selected private persons, were reserved to be submitted to the king at Riblah. The daughters of Zedekiah, with their children and establishment (Jer. xli. 10, 16; cp. Ant. x. 9, § 4), and Jeremiah the Prophet (Jer. xl. 5), were placed by Nebuzaradan at Mizpah under the charge of Gedaliah ben-Ahikam, who had been appointed as superintendent of the few poor labouring people left to carry on the necessary husbandry and vine-dressing. In addition to these were some small bodies of men in arms, who had perhaps escaped from the city before the blockade, or in the interval of the siege, and who were hovering on the outskirts of the country watching what might turn up (Jer. xl. 7, 8). [ISHMAEL, 6.] The remainder of the population—numbering, with the seventy-two above named, 832 souls (Jer. lii. 29)—were marched off to Babylon. About two months after this Gedaliah was murdered by Ishmael, and then the few people of consideration left with Jeremiah went into Egypt. Thus the land was practically deserted of all but the very poorest class. Even these were not allowed to remain in quiet. Five years afterwards—the 23rd of Nebuchadnezzar's reign—the insatiable Nebuzaradan, on his way to Egypt (Joseph. Ant. x. 9, § 7), again visited the ruins, and swept off 745 more of the wretched peasants (Jer. lii. 30).

Thus Jerusalem at last had fallen, and the Temple, set up under such fair auspices, was a heap of blackened ruins.⁶ The spot, however, was none the less sacred because the edifice was destroyed, and it was still the resort of devotees, sometimes from great distances, who brought their offerings—in strange heathenish guise indeed, but still with a true feeling—to weep and wail over the holy place (Jer. xli. 5). It was still the centre of hope to the people in Captivity, and the time soon arrived for their return to it. The decree of Cyrus authorizing the rebuilding of the "house of Jehovah, God of Israel, which is in Jerusalem," was issued B.C. 536. In consequence thereof a very large caravan of Jews arrived in the country. The expedition comprised all classes—the royal family, priests, Levites, inferior ministers, lay people belonging to various towns and families—and numbered 42,360⁷ in all. They were well provided with treasure for the necessary outlay; and—a more precious burden still—they bore the vessels of the old Temple which had been preserved at Babylon, and were now destined again to find a home at Jerusalem (Ezra v. 14, vi. 5).

A short time was occupied in settling in their former cities, but on the 1st day of the 7th month (Ezra iii. 6) a general assembly was called together at Jerusalem in "the open place of the first gate towards the east" (1 Esd. v. 47); the Altar was set up, and the daily morning and evening sacrifices commenced.⁸ Other festivals were re-instituted, and we have a record of the celebration of at least one anniversary of the day of the first assembly at Jerusalem (Neh. viii. 1, &c.). Arrangements were made for stone and timber for the fabric, and in the 2nd year after their return (B.C. 534), on the 1st day of ⁴ The events of this period are kept in memory by the Jews of the present day by various commemorative fasts, which were instituted immediately after the occurrences themselves. These are:—the 10th Tebeth, the day of the investment of the city by Nebuchadnezzar; the 10th Ab, destruction of the Temple by Nebuzaradan, and subsequently by Titus; the 3rd Tisri, murder of Gedaliah; 9th Tebeth, when Ezekiel and the other captives at Babylon received the news of the destruction of the Temple. The entrance of the Chaldees into the city is commemorated on the 17th Tamuz, the day of the breach of the Antonia by Titus. The modern dates will be found in the Jewish almanack for the year.

⁶ The Feast of Tabernacles is also said to have been celebrated at this time (Ezra iii. 4; Joseph. Ant. xl. 4, § 1); but this is in direct opposition to Neh. viii. 17, which states that it was first celebrated when Ezra was present (cp. v. 13), which he was not on the former occasion.

the 2nd month (1 Esd. v. 57), the foundation of the Temple was laid amidst the songs and music of the priests and Levites (according to the old rites of David), the tears of the old men and the shouts of the young. But the work was destined to suffer material interruptions. The chiefs of the people by whom Samaria had been colonised, finding that the Jews refused their offers of assistance (Ezra iv. 2), annoyed and hindered them in every possible way; and by this and some natural drawbacks—such as violent storms of wind by which some of the work had been blown down (Hag. i. 9), drought and consequent failure of crops, and mortality amongst both animals and men—the work was protracted through the rest of the reign of Cyrus, and that of Ahasuerus, till the accession of Artaxerxes (Darius I.) to the throne of Persia (B.C. 522). The Samaritans then sent to the court at Babylon a formal memorial (a measure already tried without success in the preceding reign), representing that the inevitable consequence of the restoration of the city would be its revolt from the empire. This produced its effect, and the building entirely ceased for a time. In the meantime houses of some pretension began to spring up—"ceiled houses" (Hag. i. 4),—and the enthusiasm of the builders of the Temple cooled (ib. v. 9). But after two years the delay became intolerable to the leaders, and the work was recommenced at all hazards, amidst the encouragements and rebukes of the two Prophets, Zechariah and Haggai, on the 24th day of the 6th month of Darius' 2nd year. Another attempt at interruption was made by the Persian governor of the district west of the Euphrates* (Ezra v. 3), but the result was only a confirmation by Darius of the privileges granted by his predecessor (vi. 6-13), and an order to render all possible assistance. The work now went on apace, and the Temple was finished and dedicated^b in the 6th year of Darius (B.C. 616) on the 3rd (or 23rd, 1 Esd. vii. 5) of Adar—the last month, and on the 14th day of the new year the first Passover was celebrated. The new Temple was 60 cubits less in altitude than that of Solomon (Joseph. Ant. xv. 11, § 1); but its dimensions and form—of which there are only scanty notices—will be best considered elsewhere. [TEMPLE.] All this time the walls of the city remained as the Assyrians had left them (Neh. ii. 12, &c.). A period of 58 years now passed of which no accounts are preserved to us; but at the end of that time, in the year 457, Ezra arrived from Babylon with a caravan of priests, Levites, Nethinims, and lay people, among the latter some members of the royal family, in all 1777 persons (Ezra vii. viii.), and with valuable offerings from the Persian king and his court, as well as from the Jews who still remained in Babylonia (ib. vii. 14, viii. 25). He left Babylon on the 1st day of the year and reached Jerusalem on the 1st of the 5th month (Ezra vii. 9, viii. 32).

^b Psalm xxx. by its title purports to have been used on this occasion (Ewald, Dichter, i. 210, 223). Ewald also suggests that Ps. lxxviii. was finally used for this festival (Gesch. iv. 127, n.).

Ezra at once set himself to correct some irregularities into which the community had fallen. The chief of them was the practice of marrying the native women of the old Canaanite nations. The people were assembled at three days' notice, and harangued by Ezra—so urgent was the case—in the midst of a pouring rain, and in very cold weather, in the broad place, or court, before (i.e. east of) the Temple (Ezra x. 9; 1 Esd. ix. 6). His exhortations were at once acceded to, a form of trespass-offering was arranged, and no less than seventeen priests, ten Levites, and eighty-six laymen renounced their foreign wives, and gave up an intercourse which had been to their fathers the cause and the accompaniment of almost all their misfortunes. The matter took three months to carry out, and was completed on the 1st day of the new year: but the practice was not wholly eradicated (Neh. xiii. 23), though it never was pursued as before the Captivity.

We now pass another period of eleven years until the arrival of Nehemiah, about B.C. 445. He had been moved to come to Jerusalem by the accounts given him of the wretchedness of the community, and of the state of ruin in which the walls of the city continued (Neh. i. 3). Arrived there, he kept his intentions quiet for three days, but on the night of the third he went out by himself, and, as far as the ruins would allow, made the circuit of the place (ii. 11-16). On the following day he collected the chief people and proposed the immediate rebuilding of the walls. One spirit seized them. Priests, rulers, Levites, private persons, citizens of distant towns,^c as well as those dwelling on the spot, all put their hand vigorously to the work. And notwithstanding the taunts and threats of Sanballat, the ruler of the Samaritans, and Tobiah the Ammonite, in consequence of which one-half of the people had to remain armed while the other half built, the work was completed in fifty-two days, on the 25th of Elul. The wall thus rebuilt was that of the city of Jerusalem as well as the city of David or Zion, as will be shown in the next section, where the account of the rebuilding is examined in detail (Section III.). At this time the city must have presented a forlorn appearance; but few houses were built, and large spaces remained unoccupied, or occupied but with the ruins of the Assyrian destructions (Neh. vii. 4). In this respect it was not unlike much of the modern city. The solemn dedication of the wall, recorded in Neh. xii. 27-43, probably took place at a later period, when the works had been completely finished.

Whether Ezra was here at this time is uncertain.^d [EZRA, p. 1041.] But we meet him during the government of Nehemiah, especially on one interesting occasion—the anniversary, it would appear, of the first return of Zerubbabel's caravan—on the 1st of the 7th month (Neh.

^c Among these we find Jericho, Bethzur, near Hebron, Gibeon, Bethhoron, perhaps Samaria, and the other side of Jordan (see iv. 12, referring to those who lived near Sanballat and Tobiah).

^d The name occurs among those who assisted in the dedication of the wall (xii. 33); but so as to make us believe that it was some inferior person of the same name.

viii. 1). He there appears as the venerable and venerated instructor of the people in the forgotten Law of Moses, amongst other reforms re-instituting the Feast of Tabernacles, which we incidentally learn had not been celebrated since the time that the Israelites originally entered on the land (viii. 17).

Nehemiah remained in the city for twelve years (v. 14, xiii. 6), during which time he held the office and maintained the state of governor of the province (v. 14) from his own private resources (v. 15). He was indefatigable in his regulation and maintenance of the order and dignity both of the city (vii. 3, xi. 1, xiii. 15, &c.) and Temple (x. 32, 39, xii. 44); abolished the excessive rates of usury by which the richer citizens had grievously oppressed the poor (v. 6-12); kept up the genealogical registers, at once so characteristic of, and important to, the Jewish nation (vii. 5, xi., xii.); and in various other ways showed himself an able and active governor, and possessing a complete ascendancy over his fellow-citizens. At the end of this time he returned to Babylon; but it does not appear that his absence was more than a short one,* and he was soon again at his post, as vigilant and energetic as ever (xiii. 7). Of his death we have no record.

The foreign tendencies of the high-priest Eliashib and his family had already given Nehemiah some concern (xiii. 4, 28); and when the checks exercised by his vigilance and good sense were removed, they quickly led to serious disorders, unfortunately the only occurrences which have come down to us during the next epoch. Eliashib's son Joiada, who succeeded him in the high-priesthood (apparently a few years before the death of Nehemiah), had two sons, the one Jonathan (Neh. xii. 11) or Johanan (Neh. xii. 22; Joseph. Ant. xi. 7, § 1), the other Joshua (Joseph. ibid.). Joshua had made interest with the general of the Persian army that he should displace his brother in the priesthood: the two quarrelled, and Joshua was killed by Johanan in the Temple (B.C. c. 366): a horrible occurrence, and even aggravated by its consequences; for the Persian general made it the excuse not only to pollute the sanctuary (vabds) by entering it, on the ground that he was certainly less unclean than the body of the murdered man—but also to extort a tribute of 50 darics on every lamb offered in the daily sacrifice for the next seven years (Joseph. Ant. ibid.).

Johanan in his turn had two sons, Jaddua (Neh. xii. 11, 22) and Manasseh (Joseph. Ant. xi. 7, § 2). Manasseh married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite,† and eventually became the first priest of the Samaritan temple on Gerizim (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, §§ 2, 4). But at first he seems to have been associated in the priesthood of Jerusalem with his brother (Joseph.

μετέχειν τῆς ἀρχιερωσύνης), and to have relinquished it only on being forced to do so on account of his connexion with Sanballat. The foreign marriages against which Ezra and Nehemiah had acted so energetically had again become common among both the priests and laymen. A movement was made by a reforming party against the practice; but either it had obtained a firmer hold than before, or there was nothing to replace the personal influence of Nehemiah, for the movement only resulted in a large number going over with Manasseh to the Samaritans (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, §§ 2, 4). During the high-priesthood of Jaddua occurred the famous visit of Alexander the Great to Jerusalem. Alexander had invaded the north of Syria, beaten Darius's army at the Granicus, and again at Issus, and then, having besieged Tyre, sent a letter to Jaddua inviting his allegiance, and desiring assistance in men and provisions. The answer of the high-priest was, that to Darius his allegiance had been given, and that to Darius he would remain faithful while he lived. Tyre was taken in July B.C. 331 (Kenrick's Phoenicia, p. 431), and then the Macedonians moved along the flat strip of the coast of Palestine to Gaza, which in its turn was taken in October. The road to Egypt being thus secured, Alexander had leisure to visit Jerusalem, and deal in person with the people who had ventured to oppose him. This he did apparently by the route through Beth-horon and Gibeon. The "Sapha" at which he was met by the high-priest must be Scopos—the high ridge to the north of the city, which is crossed by the northern road, and from which the first view—and that a full one—of the city and Temple is procured. The result to the Jews of the visit was an exemption from tribute in the Sabbatical year: a privilege which they retained for long.*

We hear nothing more of Jerusalem until it was taken by Ptolemy Soter, about B.C. 320, during his incursion into Syria. The account given by Josephus (Ant. xii. 1; c. Apion. i. § 22), partly from Agatharchides, and partly from some other source, is extremely meagre, nor is it quite consistent with itself. But we can discern one point to which more than one parallel is found in the later history—that the city fell into the hands of Ptolemy because the Jews would not fight on the Sabbath. Great hardships seem to have been experienced by the Jews after this conquest, and a large number were transported to Egypt and to Northern Africa.

A stormy period succeeded, that of the struggles between Antigonos and Ptolemy for the possession of Syria, which lasted until the defeat of the former at Ipsus (B.C. 301), after which

* The details of this story, and the arguments for and against its authenticity, are given under ALEXANDER; see also HIGH-PRIEST. It should be observed that the part of the Temple which Alexander entered, and where he sacrificed to God, was not the vabds, into which Bagoas had forced himself after the murder of Joshua, but the ισόπεδον—the court only (Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, § 5). The Jewish tradition is that he was induced to put off his shoes before treading the sacred ground of the court, by being told that they would slip on the polished marble (Meg. Taamith, in Reland, Antiq. i. 8, 5).

• Prideaux says five years; but his reasons are not satisfactory, and would apply to ten as well as to five.

† According to Neh. xiii. 28, the man who married Sanballat's daughter was "son of Joiada;" but this is in direct contradiction to the circumstantial statements of Josephus, followed in the text; and the word "son" is often used in Hebrew for "grandson," or even a more remote descendant (see, e.g., CARM).

the country came into the possession of Ptolemy. The contention, however, was confined to the maritime region of Palestine,¹ and Jerusalem appears to have escaped. Scanty as is the information we possess concerning the city, it yet indicates a state of prosperity; the only outward mark of dependence being an annual tax of twenty talents of silver payable by the high-priests. Simon the Just, who followed his father Onias in the high-priesthood (c. B.C. 300), is one of the favourite heroes of the Jews. Under his care the sanctuary (vads) was repaired, and some retaining walls of great height added round the Temple, possibly to gain a larger surface on the top of the hill (Ecclus. l. 1, 2). The large cistern or "sea" of the Temple, which hitherto would seem to have been but temporarily or roughly constructed, was sheathed in brass² (ib. v. 3); the walls of the city were more strongly fortified to guard against such attacks as those of Ptolemy (ib. v. 4); and the Temple service was maintained with great pomp and ceremonial (ib. vv. 11-21). His death was marked by evil omens of various kinds presaging disasters³ (Otho, Lex. Rab. "Messias"). Simon's brother Eleazar succeeded him as high-priest (B.C. 291), and Antigonus of Socho as president of the Sanhedrin⁴ (Prideaux). The disasters presaged did not immediately arrive, at least in the grosser forms anticipated. The intercourse with Greeks was fast eradicating the national character, but it was at any rate a peaceful intercourse during the reigns of the Ptolemies who succeeded Soter, viz. Philadelphus (B.C. 285) and Euergetes (B.C. 247). It was Philadelphus who, according to the story preserved by Josephus, had the translation of the Septuagint⁵ made, in connexion with which he sent Aristæus to Jerusalem during the priesthood of Eleazar. He also bestowed on the Temple very rich gifts, consisting of a table for the shewbread, of wonderful workmanship, basins, bowls, phials, &c., and other articles both for the private and public use of the priests (Joseph. Ant. xii. 2, §§ 5-10, 15). A description of Jerusalem at this period under the name of Aristæus still survives,⁶ which supplies a lively picture of both Temple and city. The Temple was "enclosed with three walls 70 cubits high, and of proportionate thickness. . . . The spacious courts were paved with marble, and beneath them lay immense reservoirs of water, which by mechanical contrivance was made to rush forth, and thus wash away the blood of the sacrifices." The city was "of moderate extent, being about 40 stadia in circuit." The main streets appear to have run north and south; some "along the brow . . . others lower down but parallel, following the course of the valley, with cross streets connecting them." They were "furnished with raised pavements," such as may still be seen in some Oriental towns, either for the convenience of those on foot, or, if we may believe Aristæus, to enable the passengers to avoid contact with persons or things ceremonially unclean. The bazaars were then, as now, a prominent feature of the city. There were to be found gold, precious stones, and spices brought by caravans from the East, and other articles imported from the West by way of Joppa, Gaza, and Ptolemais, which served as its commodious harbour. It is not impossible that among these Phœnician importations from the West may have figured the dyes and the tin of the remote Britain.

⁵ The legend of the translation by seventy-two interpreters is no longer believed; but it probably rests on some foundation of fact. The sculpture of the table and bowls (lilies and vines, without any figures) seems to have been founded on the descriptions in the Law. In 5 Macc. ii. 14, &c., it is said to have had also a map of Egypt upon it.

Eleazar was succeeded (c. B.C. 276) by his uncle Manasseh, brother to Onias I.; and he again (c. 250) by Onias II. Onias was a son of the great Simon the Just; but he inherited none of his father's virtues, and his ill-timed avarice at length endangered the prosperity of Jerusalem. The payment of the annual tax to the court of Egypt having been for several years evaded, Ptolemy Euergetes, about 226, sent a commissioner to Jerusalem to enforce the arrears (Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, § 1; Prideaux). Onias, now in his second childhood (Ant. xii. 4, § 3), was easily prevailed on by his nephew Joseph to allow him to return with the commissioner to Alexandria, to endeavour to arrange the matter with the king. Joseph, a man evidently of great ability,⁷ not only procured the remission of the tax in question,⁸ but also persuaded Ptolemy to grant him the lucrative privilege of farming the whole revenue of Judæa, Samaria, Coele-Syria, and Phœnicia—a privilege which he retained till the province was taken from the Ptolemies by Antiochus the Great. Hitherto the family of the high-priest had been the most powerful in the country; but Joseph had now founded one able to compete with it, and the contention and rivalry between the two—manifesting itself at one time in enormous bribes to the court, at another in fierce quarrels at home—at last led to the interference of the chief power with the affairs of a city which, if wisely and quietly governed, might never have been molested.

Onias II. died about 217, and was succeeded by Simon II. In 221 Ptolemy Philopator had succeeded Euergetes on the throne of Egypt. He had only been king three years when Antiochus the Great attempted to take Syria from him. Antiochus partly succeeded, but in a battle at Raphia, south of Gaza, fought in the year 217 (the same as that of Hannibal at Thrasymene), he was completely routed and forced to fly to Antioch. Ptolemy shortly after visited Jerusalem. He offered sacrifice in the court of the Temple, and would have entered the sanctuary, had he not been prevented by the firmness of the high-priest Simon, and also by a supernatural terror which struck him and stretched him paralysed on the pavement of the court (3 Macc. ii. 22).⁴ This repulse Ptolemy never forgave, and the Jews of Alexandria suffered severely in consequence.

Like the rest of Palestine, Jerusalem now became alternately a prey to each of the contending parties (Joseph. Ant. xii. 3, § 3). In 203 it was taken by Antiochus. In 199 it was retaken by Scopas, the Alexandrian general, who left a garrison in the citadel. In the following year Antiochus again beat the Egyptians, and then the Jews, who had suffered most from the latter, gladly opened their gates to his army, and assisted them in reducing the Egyptian garrison. This service Antiochus requited by large presents of money and articles for sacrifice, by an order to Ptolemy to furnish cedar and other materials for cloisters and other additions to the Temple, and by material relief from taxation. He also published a decree affirming the sacredness of the Temple from the intrusion of strangers, and forbidding any infractions of the Jewish law (Joseph. Ant. xii. 3, §§ 3, 4).

Simon was followed in 195 by Onias III. In 187 Antiochus the Great died, and was succeeded by his son Seleucus Soter (Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, § 10). Jerusalem was now in much apparent prosperity. Onias was greatly respected, and governed with a firm hand; and the decree of the late king was so far observed, that the whole expenditure of the sacrifices was borne by Seleucus (2 Macc. iii. 1-3). But the city soon began to be much disturbed by the disputes between Hyrcanus, the illegitimate son of Joseph the collector, and his elder and legitimate brothers, on the subject of the division of the property left by their father. The high-priest Onias, after some hesitation, seems to have taken the part of Hyrcanus, whose wealth—after the suicide of Hyrcanus (about B.C. 180)—he secured in the treasury of the Temple. The office of governor (ῥοιστάρχης) of the Temple was now held by one Simon, who is supposed to have been one of the legitimate brothers of Hyrcanus. By this man Seleucus was induced to send Heliodorus to Jerusalem to get possession of the treasure of Hyrcanus. How the attempt failed, and the money was for the time preserved from pillage, may be seen in 2 Macc. iii. 24-30, and in the well-known picture of Raffaele Sanzio.

In 175 Seleucus Soter died, and the kingdom of Syria came to his brother, the infamous Antiochus Epiphanes. His first act towards Jerusalem was to sell the office of high-priest—still filled by the good Onias III.—to Onias' brother Joshua (2 Macc. iv. 7; Ant. xii. 5, § 1). Greek manners had made many a step at Jerusalem, and the new high-priest was not likely to discourage their further progress. His first act was to Grecise his own name, and to become "Jason;" his next to set up a gymnasium—that is, a place where the young men of the town were trained naked—to introduce the Greek dress, Greek sports, and Greek appellations. Now (1 Macc. i. 13, &c.; 2 Macc. iv. 9, 12) for the first time we hear of an attempt to efface the distinguishing mark of a Jew—again to "become uncircumcised." The priests quickly followed the example of their chief (2 Macc. iv. 14), and the Temple service was neglected. A special deputation of the youth of Jerusalem—"Antiochians" they were now called—was sent with offerings from the Temple of Jehovah to the festival of Hercules at Tyre. In 172 Jerusalem was visited by Antiochus. He entered the city at night by torch-light and amid the acclamations of Jason and his party, and after a short stay he returned* (2 Macc. iv. 22). And now the treachery of Jason was to be required to him. His younger brother, also called Onias, who had assumed the Greek name of Menelaus, in his turn bought the high-priesthood from Antiochus, and drove Jason out to the other side of the Jordan (2 Macc. iv. 26). To pay the price of the office, Menelaus had laid hands on the consecrated plate of the Temple. This became known, and a riot was the consequence (2 Macc. iv. 32, 39, 40).

During the absence of Antiochus in Egypt, Jason suddenly appeared before Jerusalem with a thousand men, and whether by the fury of his attack, or from his having friends in the city, he entered the walls, drove Menelaus into the citadel, and slaughtered the citizens without mercy. Jason seems to have failed to obtain any of the valuables of the Temple, and shortly after retreated beyond Jordan, where he miserably perished (2 Macc. v. 7-10). But the news of these tumults reaching Antiochus on his way from Egypt brought him again to Jerusalem (B.C. 170). He appears to have entered the city without much difficulty.^a An indiscriminate massacre of the adherents of Ptolemy followed, and then a general pillage of the contents of the Temple. Under the guidance of Menelaus, Antiochus went into the Sanctuary, and took from thence the golden altar, the candlestick, the magnificent table of shewbread, and all the vessels and utensils, with 1800 talents out of the treasury. These things occupied three days. He then quitted for Antioch, carrying off, besides his booty, a large train of captives, and leaving, as governor of the city, a Phrygian named Philip, a man of a more savage disposition than himself (1 Macc. i. 20-24; 2 Macc. v. 11-22; Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, § 3; B. J. i. 1, § 1). But something worse was reserved for Jerusalem than pillage, death, and slavery, worse than even the pollution of the presence of this monster in the holy place of Jehovah. Nothing less than the total extermination of the Jews was resolved on, and in two years (B.C. 168) an army was sent under Apollonius to carry the resolve into effect. He waited till the Sabbath, and then for the second time the entry was made while the people were engaged in their devotions. Another great slaughter took place; the city was now in its turn pillaged and burnt, and the walls destroyed (2 Macc. v. 24-26).

The foreign garrison took up its quarters in what had from the earliest times been the strongest part of the place—the ancient city of David (1 Macc. i. 33, vi. 32), and built a citadel on an eminence adjoining^b the North wall of the Temple, and so high as to overlook it (Ant. xii. 5, § 4). This hill was now fortified with a very strong wall with towers, and within it the garrison secured their booty, cattle, and

xii. 5, § 3). This, however, does not agree with the festal character given to it in 2 Macc., and followed above.

^a There is a great discrepancy between the accounts of 1 Macc., 2 Macc., and Josephus.

^b This may be inferred from many of the expressions concerning this citadel; but Josephus expressly uses the word ἐνέκτρο (Ant. xii. 9, § 3), and says it was on an eminence in the lower city, i.e. the Eastern hill, as contradistinguished from the Western hill or upper city.

Antiochus next issued an edict to compel heathen worship in all his dominions, and one Athenaeus was sent to Jerusalem to enforce compliance. As a first step, the Temple was reconsecrated to Zeus Olympius (2 Macc. vi. 2). The worship of idols (1 Macc. i. 47), with its loose and obscene accompaniments (2 Macc. vi. 4), was introduced there—an altar to Zeus was set up on the brazen altar of Jehovah, pig's-flesh offered thereon, and the broth or liquor sprinkled about the Temple (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 8, § 2). And while the Jews were compelled not only to tolerate, but to take an active part in these foreign abominations, the observance of their own rites and ceremonies—sacrifice, the sabbath, circumcision—was absolutely forbidden. Many no doubt complied (Ant. xii. 5, § 4); but many also resisted, and the torments inflicted, and the heroism displayed in the streets of Jerusalem at this time, almost surpass belief. But though a severe, it was a wholesome discipline, and under its rough teaching the old spirit of the people began to revive.

The battles of the Maccabees were fought on the outskirts of the country, and it was not till the defeat of Lysias at Bethzur that they thought it safe to venture into the recesses of the central hills. Then they immediately turned their steps to Jerusalem. On ascending the Mount Moriah, and entering the quadrangle of the Temple, a sight met their eyes, which proved at once how complete had been the desecration, and how short-lived the triumph of the idolaters; for while the altar still stood there with its abominable burden, the gates in ashes, the priests' chambers in ruins, and, as they reached the inner court, the very sanctuary itself open and empty—yet the place had been so long disused that the whole precincts were full of vegetation, "the shrubs grew in the courts as in a forest." The precincts were at once cleansed, the polluted altar put aside, a new one constructed, and the holy vessels of the sanctuary replaced, and on the third anniversary of the desecration—the 25th of the month Chisleu, in the year B.C. 165—the Temple was dedicated with a feast which lasted for eight days.* After this the outer wall of the Temple † was very much strengthened (1 Macc. iv. 60), and it was in fact converted into a fortress (cp. vi. 26, 61, 62), and occupied by a garrison (iv. 61). The Acra was still held by the soldiers of Antiochus. One of the first acts of Judas on entering the Temple had been to detach a party to watch them, and two years later (B.C. 163) so frequent had their sallies and annoyances become—particularly an attempt on one occasion to confine the worshippers within the Temple enclosure ‡ (1 Macc. vi. 18)—that Judas collected his people to take it, and began a siege with banks and engines. In the meantime Antiochus had died (B.C. 164), and was succeeded by his son Antiochus Eupator, a youth. The garrison in the Acra, finding themselves pressed by Judas, managed to communicate with the king, who brought an army from Antioch and attacked Bethzur, one of the fortified positions of the Maccabees. This obliged Judas to give up the siege of the Acra, and to march southwards against the intruder (1 Macc. vi. 32; Joseph. Ant. xii. 9, § 4). Antiochus's army proved too much for his little force; his brother Eleazar was killed, and he was compelled to fall back on Jerusalem and shut himself up in the Temple. Thither Lysias, Antiochus's general—and later, Antiochus himself—followed him (vi. 48, 51, 57, 62) and commenced an active siege. How long it lasted we are not informed, but the provisions of the besieged were rapidly becoming exhausted, and famine had driven many to make their escape (vi. 54), when news of an insurrection elsewhere induced Lysias to advise Antiochus to offer terms to Judas (vi. 55-58). The terms, which were accepted by him, were liberty to live after their own laws, and immunity to their persons and their fortress. On inspection, however, Antiochus found the place so strong that he refused to keep this part of the agreement; and before he left, the walls were pulled down (vi. 62; Ant. xii. 9, § 7). Judas apparently remained in Jerusalem for the next twelve months. During this time Antiochus and Lysias had been killed, and the throne seized by Demetrius (B.C. 162), and the new king had dispatched Bacchides and Alcimus, the then high-priest—a man of Grecian principles—with a large force, to Jerusalem. Judas was again within the walls of the Temple, which in the interval he must have rebuilt. He could not be tempted forth, but sixty of the Assideans were treacherously murdered by the Syrians, who then moved off, first to a short distance from the city, and finally back to Antioch (1 Macc. vii. 1-25; Ant. xii. 10, §§ 1-3). Demetrius then sent another army under Nicanor, but with no better success. An action was fought at Caphar-salama, an unknown place not far from the city. Judas was victorious, and Nicanor escaped and took refuge in the Acra at Jerusalem. Shortly after Nicanor came down from the fortress and paid a visit to the Temple, where he insulted the priests (1 Macc. vii. 33, 34; 2 Macc. xiv. 31-33). He also caused the death of Razis, one of the elders of Jerusalem, a man greatly esteemed, who killed himself in the most horrible manner, rather than fall into his hands (2 Macc. xiv. 37-46). He then procured some reinforcements, met Judas at Adasa, now Kh. Adaseh, 8 miles south of Gophna, was killed, and his army thoroughly beaten. Nicanor's head and right arm were brought to Jerusalem. The head was nailed on the wall of the Acra, and the hand and arm on a conspicuous spot facing the Temple (2 Macc. xv. 30-35), where their memory was perhaps perpetuated in the name of the gate Nicanor, the eastern entrance to the Great Court (Reland, Antiq. i. 9, 4).

* The Feast of the Dedication is alluded to in John x. 22. Chisleu was the mid-winter month.

† In 1 Macc. iv. 60 it is said that they builded up "Mount Zion;" but in the parallel passages, vi. 7, 26, the word used is "sanctuary," or rather "holy places," ἁγίασμα. The meaning probably is the entire enclosure. Josephus (Ant. xii. 7, § 7) says "the city."

‡ ἠσχυρίσθητες τὸν Ἰσραὴλ κύκλῳ τῶν ἁγίων. The E. V., "shut up the Israelites round about the sanctuary," does not here give the sense, which seems to be as above.

The death of Judas took place in 161. After it Bacchides and Alcimus again established themselves at Jerusalem in the Acra (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 1, § 3), and, in the intervals of their contests with Jonathan and Simon, added much to its fortifications, furnished it with provisions, and confined there the children of the chief people of Judaea as hostages for their good behaviour (1 Macc. ix. 50-53). In the second month (May) of 160 the high-priest Alcimus began to make some alterations in the Temple, apparently doing away with the enclosure between one court and another, and in particular demolishing some wall or building to which peculiar sanctity was attached as "the work of the prophets" (1 Macc. ix. 54). The object of these alterations was doubtless to lessen the distinction between Jew and Gentile. But they had hardly been commenced before he was taken suddenly ill and died.

Bacchides now returned to Antioch, and Jerusalem remained without molestation for a period of seven years. It does not appear that the Maccabees resided there; part of the time they were at Michmash, in the entangled country about 8 miles north of Jerusalem, and part of the time fighting with Bacchides at Beth-basi in the Jordan Valley near Jericho. All this time the Acra was held by the Macedonian garrison (Ant. xiii. 4, § 9) and the malcontent Jews, who still held the hostages taken from the other part of the community (1 Macc. x. 6). In the year 153 Alexander Balas, the real or pretended son of Antiochus Epiphanes, having landed at Ptolemais, Demetrius sent a communication to Jonathan with the view of keeping him attached to his cause (1 Macc. x. 1, &c.; Ant. xiii. 2, § 1). Upon this Jonathan moved up to Jerusalem, rescued the hostages from the Acra, and began to repair the city. The destructions of the last few years were remedied, the wall round Mount Zion particularly being rebuilt in the most substantial manner, as a regular fortification (x. 11). From this time forward Jonathan received privileges and professions of confidence from both sides. First, Alexander authorized him to assume the office of high-priest, which had not been filled up since the death of Alcimus (cp. Ant. xx. 10, § 1). This he took at the Feast of Tabernacles, in the autumn of the year 153, and at the same time collected soldiers and ammunition (1 Macc. x. 21). Next, Demetrius, amongst other immunities granted to the country, recognised Jerusalem and its environs as again "holy and free," relinquished all right to the Acra—which was henceforward to be subject to the high-priest (x. 31, 32)—endowed the Temple with the revenues of Ptolemais, and also with 15,000 shekels of silver charged in other places, and ordered not only the payment of the same sum, in regard to former years, but the release of an annual tax of 5,000 shekels hitherto exacted from the priests. Lastly, he authorized the repairs of the holy place, and the building and fortifying of the walls of Jerusalem to be charged to the royal accounts, and gave the privilege of sanctuary to all persons, even mere debtors, taking refuge in the Temple or in its precincts (1 Macc. x. 31, 32, 39-45).

The contentions between Alexander and Demetrius, in which he was actively engaged, prevented Jonathan from taking advantage of these grants till the year 145. He then began to invest the Acra (xi. 20; Ant. xiii. 4, § 9), but, owing partly to the strength of the place, and partly to the constant disensions abroad, the siege made little progress during fully two years. It was obvious that no progress could be made so long as the inmates of the Acra could get into the city or the country, and there buy provisions (xiii. 49), as hitherto was the case; and, therefore, at the first opportunity, Jonathan built a wall or bank at the base of the citadel-hill, so as to cut off all communication with the city, and completed the investment on all sides (xii. 36; cp. xiii. 49). At the same time the wall of the Temple enclosure was repaired and strengthened, especially on the east side, towards the valley of Kedron. In the meantime Jonathan was killed at Ptolemais, and Simon succeeded him both as chief and as high-priest (xiii. 8, 42). The investment of the Acra proved successful, but three years still elapsed before this enormously strong place could be reduced, and at last the garrison capitulated only from famine (xiii. 49; cp. v. 21). Simon entered it on the 23rd of the 2nd month B.C. 142. The fortress was then entirely demolished, and the eminence on which it stood lowered, so that the Temple might be higher than it. The last operation occupied three years (Ant. xiii. 6, § 7). The valley between Acra and the "third hill" was probably filled up at this time (B. J. v. 4, § 1). A fort was then built on the north side of, and in close proximity to, the Temple, so as directly to command the site of the Acra, and here Simon and his immediate followers resided (xiii. 52). This was the Baris—so called after the Hebrew word Birah—which, after having been rebuilt by Herod and called Antonia, became so prominent a feature of the city. Simon's other achievements, and his alliance with the Romans, must be reserved for another place. We hear of no further occurrences at Jerusalem during his life except the placing of two brass tablets, commemorating his exploits on Mount Zion, in the precinct of the sanctuary (xiv. 27, 48). In 135 Simon was murdered at Docus, 'Am Dûk, near Jericho, and then all was again confusion in Jerusalem (xvi. 15, 16).

One of the first steps of his son John Hyrcanus was to secure both the city and the Temple (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 7, § 4). The people were favourable to him, and repulsed Ptolemy, Simon's murderer, when he attempted to enter (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 7, § 4; B. J. i. 2, § 3). Hyrcanus was made high-priest. Shortly after this, Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, brought an army into Southern Palestine, ravaged and burnt the country, and attacked Jerusalem. To invest the city, and cut off all chance of escape, it was encircled by a girdle of seven camps. The active operations of the siege were carried on as usual at the north, where the ground within and without the walls was on nearly the same level. Here a hundred towers of attack were erected, each of three stories, from which projectiles were cast into the city, and a double ditch, broad and deep, was excavated before them to protect them from the sudden sallies which the besieged were constantly making. On one occasion the wall of the city was undermined, the supporting timber burnt, and thus a temporary breach effected (5 Macc. xxi. 5). For the first and last time we hear of a want of water inside the city, but from this a seasonable rain relieved them. In other respects the besieged seem to have been very well off. Hyrcanus however, with more prudence than humanity, anticipating a long siege, turned out of the city all the infirm and non-fighting people. The Feast of Tabernacles had now arrived, and, at the request of Hyrcanus, Antiochus, with a moderation which gained him the title of "the Pious," agreed to a truce. This led to further negotiations, which ended in the siege being relinquished. Antiochus wished to place a garrison in the city, but this the late experience of the Jews forbade, and hostages and a payment were substituted. The money for this subsidy was obtained by Hyrcanus from the sepulchre of David, the outer chamber of which he is said to have opened, and to have taken 3000 talents of the treasure which had been buried with David and had hitherto escaped undiscovered (Ant. vii. 15, § 3; xiii. 8, § 4; B. J. i. 2, § 5). After Antiochus's departure Hyrcanus carefully repaired the damage done to the walls (5 Macc. xxi. 18); and it may have been at this time that he enlarged the Baris or fortress adjoining the Temple, which had been founded by his father, and which he used for his own residence and for the custody of his sacred vestments worn as high-priest (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4, § 3).

During the rest of his long and successful reign John Hyrcanus resided at Jerusalem, ably administering the government from thence, and regularly fulfilling the duties of the high-priest (see 5 Macc. xxiii. 3; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 10, § 3). The great sects of Pharisees and Sadducees first appear in prominence at this period. Hyrcanus, as a Maccabee, had belonged to the Pharisees, but an occurrence which happened near the end of his reign caused him to desert them and join the Sadducees, and even to persecute his former friends (see the story in Joseph. Ant. xiii. 10, § 5; 5 Macc. xxv. 7-11; Milman, ii. 73). He died in peace and honour (Ant. xiii. 10, § 7). There is no mention of his burial, but it is nearly certain that the "monument of John the high-priest," which stood near the north-west corner of the city and is so frequently referred to in the account of the final siege, was his tomb; at least no other high-priest of the name of John is mentioned. [HIGH-PRIEST, p. 1368.]

Hyrcanus was succeeded (B.C. 107) by his son Aristobulus.* Like his predecessors, he was high-priest; but, unlike them, he assumed the title as well as the power of a king (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 11, § 1; 5 Macc. xxvii. 1). Aristobulus resided in the Baris (Ant. xiii. 11, § 2). A passage, or vaulted gateway, dark and subterranean (B. J. i. 3, § 3), led from the Baris to the Temple; this passage, or gateway, was called "Strato's Tower," and here Antigonus, brother of Aristobulus, was murdered by his order.† Aristobulus died very tragically immediately after, having reigned but one year. His brother Alexander Jannaus (B.C. 105), who succeeded him, was mainly engaged in wars at a distance from Jerusalem, returning thither however in the intervals (Ant. xiii. 12, § 3, ad fin.). About the year 95 the animosities of the Pharisees and Sadducees came to an alarming explosion. Like his father, Alexander belonged to the Sadducees. The Pharisees had never forgiven Hyrcanus for having deserted them, and at the Feast of Tabernacles, as the king was officiating, they invited the people to pelt him with the citrons which they carried in the feast (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13, § 5; cp. 10, § 5; Reland, Ant. iv. 5, § 9). Alexander retaliated, and 6,000 persons were at that time killed by his orders. But the dissensions lasted for six years, and no fewer than 50,000 are said to have lost their lives (Ant. xiii. 13, § 5; 5 Macc. xxix. 2). These severities made him extremely unpopular with both parties, and led to their inviting the aid of Demetrius Euchaerus, king of Syria, against him. The actions between them were fought at a distance from Jerusalem; but the city did not escape a share in the horrors of war; for when, after some fluctuations, Alexander returned successful, he crucified publicly 800 of his opponents, and had their wives and children butchered before their eyes, while he and his concubines feasted in sight of the whole scene (Ant. xiii. 14, § 2). Such an iron sway as this was enough to crush all opposition, and Alexander reigned till the year 79 without further disturbances. He died while besieging a fortress called Ragaba, somewhere beyond Jordan. He is commemorated as having, at the time of his disputes with the people, erected a wooden screen round the altar and the sanctuary (vab's), as far as the parapet of the priests' court, to prevent access to him as he was ministering* (Ant. xiii. 13, § 5). The "monument of king Alexander" was doubtless his tomb. It stood somewhere near, but outside, the north wall of the Temple (B. J. v. 7, § 3). In spite of opposition the Pharisees were now by far the most powerful party in Jerusalem, and Alexander had therefore before his death instructed his queen, Alexandra—whom he left to succeed him with two sons—to commit herself to them. She did so, and the consequence was that though the feuds between the two great parties continued at their height, yet the government, being supported by the strongest, was always secure. The elder of the two sons, Hyrcanus, was made high-priest, and Aristobulus had the command of the army. The queen lived till the year 70. On her death, Hyrcanus attempted to take the crown, but was opposed by his brother, to whom in three months he yielded its possession, Aristobulus becoming

* Josephus's words are not very clear:—ἐπιφάκτων ζύλων περι τὸν βασιμὸν καὶ τὸν ναὸν βαλλόμενος μὴ τοῦ θρησκῶ, εἰς τὸν μόνους ἐξῆν τοῖς ἱερῶσαν εἰσίναν.

* The adoption of Greek names by the family of the Maccabees, originally the great opponents of everything Greek, shows how much and how unconsciously the Jews were now departing from their ancient standards.

king in the year 69. Before Alexandra's death she had imprisoned the family of Aristobulus in the Baris (B. J. i. 5, § 4). There too Hyrcanus took refuge during the negotiations with his brother about the kingdom, and from thence had attacked and vanquished his opponents who were collected in the Temple (Ant. xiv. 1, § 2). Josephus here speaks of it as the Acropolis,⁴ and (xiii. 16, § 5) as being above the Temple (ἄνω τοῦ ἱεροῦ). After the reconciliation Aristobulus took possession of the royal palace (τὰ βασιλεία). This can hardly be other than the "palace of the Asmoneans," of which Josephus gives some notices at a subsequent part of the history (Ant. xx. 8, § 11; B. J. ii. 16, § 3). From these it appears that it was situated west of the Temple, on the east side of the upper city (the modern Zion), immediately facing the Temple enclosure, and at the west end of the bridge which led from the Temple to the Xystus.

The brothers soon quarrelled again, when Hyrcanus called to his assistance Aretas, king of Damascus. Before this new enemy Aristobulus fled to Jerusalem and took refuge within the fortifications of the Temple. And now was witnessed the strange anomaly of the high-priest in alliance with a heathen king besieging the priests in the Temple. Suddenly a new actor appears on the scene; the siege is interrupted and eventually raised by the interference of Scaurus, one of Pompey's lieutenants, to whom Aristobulus paid 400 talents for the relief. This was in the year 65. Shortly after Pompey himself arrived at Damascus. Both the brothers came before him in person (Ant. xiv. 3, § 2), and were received with moderation and civility. Aristobulus could not make up his mind to submit, and after a good deal of shuffling betook himself to Jerusalem and prepared for resistance. Pompey advanced by way of Jericho. As he approached Jerusalem, Aristobulus, who found the city too much divided for effectual resistance, met him and offered a large sum of money and surrender. Pompey sent forward Gabinus to take possession of the place; but the bolder party among the adherents of Aristobulus had meantime gained the ascendancy, and he found the gates closed. Pompey on this threw the king into chains and advanced on Jerusalem. Hyrcanus was in possession of the city and received the invader with open arms. The Temple on the other hand was held by the party of Aristobulus, which included the priests (xiv. 4, § 3). They cut off the bridges and causeways which connected the Temple with the town, and prepared for an obstinate defence. Pompey put a garrison into the palace of the Asmoneans, and into other positions in the upper city, and fortified the houses adjacent to the Temple. The north side was the most practicable, and there he commenced his attack. But even there the Temple was protected by an artificial ditch in addition to a very deep natural valley, above which rose a wall defended by lofty towers (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2; B. J. i. 7, § 1).

Pompey appears to have stationed some part of his force on the high ground south-west of the city (Joseph. B. J. v. 12, § 2), but he himself commanded in person at the north. The first efforts of his soldiers were devoted to filling up the ditch* and the valley, and to constructing the banks on which to place the military engines, for which purpose they cut down all the timber in the environs. These had in the meantime been sent for from Tyre, and as soon as the banks were sufficiently raised the balistae were set to work to throw stones over the wall into the crowded courts of the Temple; and lofty towers were erected, from which to discharge arrows and other missiles. But these operations were not carried on without great difficulty, for the wall of the Temple was thronged with slingers, who most seriously interfered with the progress of the Romans. Pompey, however, remarked that on the seventh day the Jews regularly desisted from fighting (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2; Strab. xvi. p. 763), and this afforded the Romans a great advantage, for it gave them the opportunity of moving the engines and towers nearer the walls, filling up the trenches, adding to the banks, and in other ways making good the damage of the past six days without the slightest molestation. In fact Josephus gives it as his opinion, that but for the opportunity thus afforded, the necessary works never could have been completed. In the Temple itself, however fierce the attack, the daily sacrifices and other ceremonial, down to the minutest detail, were never interrupted, and the priests pursued their duties undeterred, even when men were struck down near them by the stones and arrows of the besiegers. At the end of three months the besiegers had approached so close to the wall that the battering-rams could be worked, and a breach was effected in the largest of the towers, through which the Romans entered, and, after an obstinate resistance and loss of life, remained masters of the Temple. Many Jews were killed by their countrymen of Hyrcanus's party who had entered with the Romans; some in their confusion set fire to the houses which abutted on a portion of the Temple walls, and perished in the flames, while others threw themselves over the precipices (B. J. i. 7, § 4). The whole number slain is reported by Josephus at 12,000 (Ant. xiv. 4, § 4). During the assault the priests maintained the same calm demeanour which they had displayed during the siege, and were actually slain at their duties while pouring their drink-offerings and burning their incense (B. J. i. 7, § 4). It should be observed that in the account of this siege the Baris is not once mentioned; the attack was on the Temple alone, instead of on the fortress, as in Titus's siege. The inference is that at this time it was either in the hands of the followers of Hyrcanus, or was a small and unimportant adjunct to the main fortifications of the Temple.

Pompey and many of his people explored the recesses of the Temple, and the distress of the Jews was greatly aggravated by their holy places being thus exposed to intrusion and profanation (B. J. i. 7, § 6). In the sanctuary were found the great golden vessels—the table of shewbread, the candlestick, the censers, and other articles proper to that place. But what most astonished the intruders, on passing beyond the sanctuary, and exploring the total darkness of the Holy of Holies, was to find in the adytum neither image nor shrine. It evidently caused much remark ("inde vulgatum"), and was the one fact regarding the Temple which the historian thought worthy of preservation—"nulla intus deum effigie; vacuum sedem et inania arcana" (Tacitus, Hist. v. 9). Pompey's conduct on this occasion does him great credit. He left the treasures thus exposed to his view—even the spices and the money in the treasury—untouched; and his examination over, he ordered the Temple to be cleansed and purified from the bodies of the slain, and the daily worship to be resumed. Hyrcanus was continued in his high-priesthood, but without the title of king (Ant. xx. 10); a tribute was laid upon the city, the walls were entirely demolished (κατασφραγίσαι . . . τὰ τεύχη πόλιος, Strabo, xvi. p. 763), and Pompey took his departure for Rome, carrying with him Aristobulus, his sons Alexander and Antigonus, and his two daughters. The Temple was taken in the year 63, in the 3rd month (Sivan), on the day of a great fast (Ant. xiv. 4, § 3); probably that for Jeroboam, which was held on the 23rd of that month.

During the next few years nothing occurred to affect Jerusalem, the struggles which desolated the unhappy Palestine during that time having taken place away from its vicinity. In 56 it was made the seat of one of the five senates or Sanhedrin, to which under the constitution of Gabinus the civil power of the country was for a time committed. Two years afterwards (B.C. 54) the rapacious Crassus visited the city on his way to Parthia, and plundered it not only of the money which Pompey had spared, but of a considerable treasure accumulated from the contributions of Jews throughout the world, in all a sum of 10,000 talents, or about 2,000,000*l.* sterling. The pillage was aggravated by the fact of his having first received from the priest in charge of the treasure a most costly beam of solid gold, on condition that everything else should be spared (Ant. xiv. 7, § 1).

During this time Hyrcanus remained at Jerusalem, acting under the advice of Antipater the Idumean, his chief minister. The assistance which they rendered to Mithridates, the ally of Julius Caesar, in the Egyptian campaign of 48-47, induced Caesar to confirm Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, and to restore him to the civil government under the title of Ethnarch (Ant. xiv. 10). At the same time he rewarded Antipater with the procuratorship of Judaea (Ant. xiv. 8, § 5), and allowed the walls of the city to be rebuilt (Ant. xiv. 10, § 5). The year 47 is also memorable for the first appearance of Antipater's son Herod in Jerusalem, when, a youth of fifteen (or more probably twenty-five), he characteristically overawed the assembled Sanhedrin. In B.C. 43 Antipater was murdered in the palace of Hyrcanus by one Malichus, who was very soon after himself slain by Herod (Ant. xiv. 11, §§ 4, 6). The tumults and revolts consequent on these murders kept Jerusalem in commotion for some time (B. J. i. 12). But a more serious danger was at hand. Antigonus, the younger and now the only surviving son of Aristobulus, suddenly appeared in the country supported by a Parthian army. Many of the Jews of the district about Carmel and Joppa* flocked to him, and he instantly made for Jerusalem, giving out that his only object was to pay a visit of devotion to the Temple (5 Macc. xlix. 5). So sudden was his approach, that he got into the city and reached the king's palace without resistance. Here however he was met by Hyrcanus and Phasaelus (Herod's brother) with a strong party of soldiers. A fight ensued in the market-place, which ended in Antigonus being driven over the bridge into the Temple, where he was constantly harassed and annoyed by Hyrcanus and Phasaelus from the city. Pentecost arrived, and the city and the immediate environs of the Temple were crowded with peasants and others who had come up to keep the feast. Herod too arrived, and with a small party occupied the palace. Phasaelus kept the wall. Some of Antigonus' people seem (though the account is very obscure) to have got into the suburbs to the north of the city. Here Herod and Phasaelus attacked, dispersed, and cut them up. At the earnest request of Antigonus, Pacorus, the Parthian general, and 500 horse were admitted, ostensibly to mediate. The result was, that Phasaelus and Hyrcanus were outwitted, and Herod overpowered, and the Parthians got possession of the place. Antigonus was made king, and as Hyrcanus knelt a suppliant before him, the new king—with all the wrongs which his father and himself had suffered full in his mind—bit off the ears of his uncle, so as effectually to incapacitate him from ever again taking the high-priesthood. Phasaelus killed himself in prison. Herod alone escaped (Ant. xiv. 13).

Thus did Jerusalem (B.C. 40) find itself in the hands of the Parthians.

In a few months Herod returned from Rome king of Judaea, and in the beginning of 39 appeared before Jerusalem with a force of Romans, commanded by Silo, and pitched his camp on the west side of the city (B. J. i. 15, § 5). Other occurrences, however, called him away from the siege at this time, and for more than two years he was occupied elsewhere. In the meantime Antigonus held the city, and had dismissed his Parthian allies. In 37 Herod appeared again, now driven to fury by the death of his favourite brother, Joseph, whose dead body Antigonus had shamefully mutilated (B. J. i. 17, § 2). He came, as Pompey had done, from Jericho, and, like Pompey, he pitched his camp and made his attack on the north side of the Temple. The general circumstances of the siege seem also very much to have resembled the former, except that there were now apparently two walls north of the Temple, and that the driving of mines was a great feature in the siege operations (B. J. i. 18, § 1; Ant. xiv. 16, § 2). The Jews distinguished themselves by the same reckless courage as before; and although it is not expressly said that the services of the Temple were carried on with such minute regularity as when they excited the astonishment of Pompey, yet we may infer it from the fact that, during the hottest of the operations, the besieged desired a short truce in which to bring in animals for sacrifice (Ant. xiv. 16, § 2). In one respect—the factions which raged among the besieged—this siege somewhat foreshadows that of Titus.

For a short time after the commencement of the operations Herod absented himself for his marriage at Samaria with Mariamne. On his return he was joined by Sosius, the Roman governor of Syria, with a force of from 50,000 to 60,000 men, and the siege was then resumed in earnest (Ant. xiv. 16).

The first wall was taken in forty days, and the second in fifteen more.^a Then the outer court of the Temple and the lower city were taken, and the Jews were driven into the inner parts of the Temple and to the upper city. At this point some delay seems to have arisen, as the siege is distinctly said to have occupied in all five months (B. J. i. 18, § 2; see also Ant. xiv. 16, § 2). At last, losing patience, Herod allowed the place to be stormed; and an indiscriminate massacre ensued, especially in the crowded narrow streets, which was only terminated at his urgent and repeated solicitations.¹ Herod and his men entered first, and, in his anxiety to prevent any plunder and desecration of the Temple, he himself hastened to the entrance of the sanctuary, and there, standing with a drawn sword in his hand, threatened to cut down any of the Roman soldiers who attempted to enter.

Through all this time the Baris had remained impregnable: there Antigonus had taken refuge, and thence, when the whole of the city was in the power of the conquerors, he descended, and in an abject manner craved his life from Sosius. It was granted, but only to be taken from him later at the order of Antony.

Antigonus was thus disposed of, but the Asmonean party was still strong both in numbers and influence. Herod's first care was to put it down. The chiefs of the party, including the whole of the Sanhedrin but two,² were put to death, and their property, with that of others whose lives were spared, was seized. The appointment of the high-priest was the next consideration. Hyrcanus returned from Parthia soon after the conclusion of the siege; but even if his mutilation had not incapacitated him for the office, it would have been unwise to appoint a member of the popular family. Herod therefore bestowed the office (B.C. 36) on one Ananel, a former adherent of his and a Babylonian Jew (Ant. xv. 3, § 1), a man without interest or influence in the politics of Jerusalem (xv. 2, § 4). Ananel was soon displaced through the machinations of Alexandra, mother of Herod's wife Mariamne, who prevailed on him to appoint her son Aristobulus, a youth of sixteen. But the young Asmonean was too warmly received by the people (B. J. i. 22, § 2) for Herod to allow him to remain. Hardly had he celebrated his first feast before he was murdered at Jericho, and then Ananel resumed the office (Ant. xv. 3, § 3).

^a These periods probably date from the return of Herod with Sosius, and the resumption of more active hostilities.

The intrigues and tragedies of the next thirty years are too complicated and too long to be treated of here. A general sketch of the events of Herod's life will be found under his name, and other opportunities will occur for noticing them. Moreover, a great part of these occurrences have no special connexion with Jerusalem, and therefore have no place in a brief notice like the present of those things which more immediately concern the city.

In many respects this period was a repetition of that of the Maccabees and Antiochus Epiphanes. True, Herod was more politic, and more prudent, and also probably had more sympathy with the Jewish character than Antiochus. But the spirit of stern resistance to innovation and of devotion to the Law of Jehovah burnt no less fiercely in the breasts of the people than it had done before; and it is curious to remark how every attempt on Herod's part to introduce foreign customs was met by outbreak, and how futile were all the benefits which he conferred both on the temporal and ecclesiastical welfare of the people when these obnoxious intrusions were in question.¹

In the year 34 the city was probably visited by Cleopatra, who, having accompanied Antony to the Euphrates, was now returning to Egypt through her estates at Jericho (Ant. xv. 4, § 2).

In the spring of 31, the year of the battle of Actium, Judaea was visited by an earthquake, the effects of which appear to have been indeed tremendous: 10,000 (Ant. xv. 5, § 2) or, according to another account (B. J. i. 19, § 3), 20,000 persons were killed by the fall of buildings, and an immense quantity of cattle. The panic at Jerusalem was very severe; but it was calmed by the arguments of Herod, then departing to a campaign on the east of Jordan for the interests of Cleopatra.

The following year was distinguished by the death of Hyrcanus, who, though more than eighty years old, was killed by Herod, ostensibly for a treasonable correspondence with the Arabians, but really to remove the last remnant of the Asmonean race, who, in the fluctuations of the times, and in Herod's absence from his kingdom, might have been dangerous to him. He appears to have resided at Jerusalem since his return; and his accusation was brought before the Sanhedrin (Ant. xv. 6, §§ 1-3).

Mariamne was put to death in the year 29, whether in Jerusalem or in the Alexandreion, in which she had been placed with her mother when Herod left for his interview with Octavius, is not certain. But Alexandra was now in Jerusalem again; and in Herod's absence, ill, at Samaria (Sebaste), she began to plot for possession of the Baris, and of another fortress situated in the city. The attempt, however, cost her her life. The same year saw the execution of Costobarus, husband of Herod's sister Salome, and of several other persons of distinction (Ant. xv. 7, §§ 8-10).

Herod now began to encourage foreign practices and usages, probably with the view of "counterbalancing by a strong Grecian party the turbulent and exclusive spirit of the Jews." Amongst his acts of this description was the building of a theatre^a at Jerusalem (Ant. xv. 8, § 1). Of its situation no information is given, nor have any certain indications yet been discovered. It was ornamented with the names of the victories of Octavius, and with trophies of arms conquered in the wars of Herod. Quinquennial games in honour of Caesar were instituted on the most magnificent scale, with racing, boxing, musical contests, fights of gladiators and wild beasts. The zealous Jews took fire at these innovations, but their wrath was specially excited by the trophies round the theatre at Jerusalem, which they believed to contain figures of men. Even when shown that their suspicions were groundless, they remained discontented. The spirit of the old Maccabees was still alive, and Herod only narrowly escaped assassination, while his would-be assassins endured torments and death with the greatest heroism. At this time he occupied the old palace of the Asmoneans, which crowned the eastern face of the upper city, and stood adjoining the Xystus at the end of the bridge which formed the communication between the north part of the Temple and the upper city (xv. 8, § 5; cp. xx. 8, § 11, and B. J. ii. 16, § 3). This palace was not yet so magnificent as he afterwards made it, but it was already most richly furnished (xv. 9, § 2). Herod had now also completed the reconstruction of the Baris—the fortress built by John Hyrcanus on the foundations of that of Simon Maccabaeus—which he had enlarged and strengthened at great expense, and named Antonia, after his friend Mark Antony.^b A description of this celebrated fortress will be given in treating of the TEMPLE, with which, as reconstructed by Herod, it was closely connected. It stood near the N.W. corner of the Temple, with which it was connected by cloisters. See Section III. p. 1643.

^a The theatre is perhaps the hippodrome (B. J. ii. 3, § 1) which lay to the south of the Temple, and of which there appear to be traces to the south of the "Double Gate." The remains of a theatre, which faced the Temple, have been found on the steep slope of a hill on the right bank of the Wady en-Nâr, below Hir Eyûb, PEPQY. Stat. 1887, p. 161; but this can scarcely be one of those mentioned by Josephus.

^b The amphitheatre "in the plain" mentioned in this passage is commonly supposed to have been also at Jerusalem (Barclay, City of Great King, p. 174, and others); but this is not a necessary inference. The word πεδιον is generally used of the plain of the Jordan near Jericho, where we know there was an amphitheatre (B. J. i. 33, § 8). From another passage (B. J. i. 21, § 8) it appears there was one at Caesarea. Still the comparatively level ground north of Jerusalem is called "the plain" in B. J. ii. 1, § 3; and even as late as the fifth century it was apparently known as the Meidân (F. Fabri), or as the plain of the Sâkirah (Le Strange, Palestine under the Moslems, p. 220).

^c The name was probably not bestowed later than B.C. 34 or 33—the date of Herod's closest relations with Antony: and we may therefore infer that the alterations to the fortress had been at least seven or eight years in progress.

The year 25—the next after the attempt on Herod's life in the theatre—was one of great misfortunes. A long drought, followed by unproductive seasons, involved Judaea in famine, and its usual consequence, a dreadful pestilence (Ant. xv. 9, § 1). Herod took a noble and at the same time a most politic course. He sent to Egypt for corn, sacrificing for the purchase the costly decorations of his palace and his silver and gold plate. He was thus able to make regular distribution of corn and clothing, on an enormous scale, for the present necessities of the people, as well as to supply seed for the next year's crop (Ant. xv. 9, § 2). The result of this was to remove to a great degree the animosity occasioned by his proceedings in the previous year.

In this year or the next Herod took another wife, the daughter of an obscure priest of Jerusalem named Simon. Shortly before the marriage Simon was made high-priest in the room of Joshua, or Jesus, the son of Phanens, who appears to have succeeded Ananel, and was now deposed to make way for Herod's future father-in-law (Ant. xv. 9, § 3). It was probably on the occasion of this marriage that he built a new and extensive palace^c immediately adjoining the old wall, at the north-west corner of the upper city (B. J. v. 4, § 4), about the spot now occupied by the Citadel and Barracks, in which, as memorials of his connexion with Caesar and Agrippa, a large apartment—superior in size to the Sanctuary of the Temple—was named after each (B. J. i. 21, § 1). This palace was very strongly fortified; it communicated with the three great towers on the wall erected shortly after, and it became the citadel, the special fortress (Ἰδιον φρούριον, B. J. v. 5, § 8), of the upper city. A road led to it from one of the gates in the west wall of the Temple enclosure (Ant. xv. 14, § 5). But all Herod's works in Jerusalem were eclipsed by the rebuilding of the Temple in more than its former extent and magnificence. He announced his intention in the year 19, probably when the people were collected in Jerusalem at the Passover. At first it met with some opposition from the fear that what he had begun he would not be able to finish, and the consequent risk involved in demolishing the old Temple. This he overcame by engaging to make all the necessary preparations before pulling down any part of the existing buildings. Two years appear to have been occupied in these preparations—among which Josephus mentions the teaching of some of the priests and Levites to work as masons and carpenters—and then the work began (xv. 11, § 2). Both Sanctuary and Cloisters—the latter double in extent and far larger and loftier than before—were built from the very foundations (B. J. i. 21, § 1; Ant. xv. 11, § 3). [TEMPLE.] The Holy House itself (ναός)—i.e. the Porch, Sanctuary, and Holy of Holies—was finished in a year and a half (xv. 11, § 6). Its completion on the anniversary of Herod's inauguration, B.C. 16, was celebrated by lavish sacrifices and a great feast. Immediately after this Herod made a journey to Rome to fetch home his two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus—with whom he returned to Jerusalem, apparently in the spring of 15 (Ant. xvi. 1, § 2). In the autumn of this year he was visited by his friend Marcus Agrippa, the favourite of Augustus. Agrippa was well received by the people of Jerusalem, whom he propitiated by a sacrifice of a hundred oxen and by a magnificent entertainment (Ant. xvi. 2, § 1). Herod left again in the beginning of 14 to join Agrippa in the Black Sea. On his return, in the autumn or winter of the same year, he addressed the people assembled at Jerusalem—for the Feast of Tabernacles—and remitted them a fourth of the annual tax (xv. 2, § 4). Another journey was followed by a similar assembly in the year 11, at which time Herod announced Antipater as his immediate successor (xvi. 4, § 6; B. J. i. 23, § 4).

About B.C. 9—eight years from the commencement—the court and cloisters of the Temple were finished (Ant. xv. 11, § 5), and the bridge leading to the south cloister was doubtless now built with that massive masonry of which some remains still survive (see the woodcut, p. 1638). At this time equally magnificent works were being carried on in another part of the city, viz. in the old wall at the north-west corner, contiguous to the palace, where three towers of great size and magnificence were erected on the wall, and one as an outwork to the north. The latter was called Psephinus (B. J. v. 4, §§ 2, 3, 4); the three former were Hippicus, after one of his friends—Phasaelus, after his brother—and Mariamne, after his queen (Ant. xvi. 5, § 2; B. J. v. 4, § 3). For their positions, see Section III. p. 1644. Phasaelus appears to have been erected first of the three (Ant. xvii. 10, § 2), though it cannot have been begun at the time of Phasaelus's death, as that took place some years before Jerusalem came into Herod's hands.

About this time occurred—if it occurred at all, which seems more than doubtful (Prideaux, Anno 134)—Herod's unsuccessful attempt to plunder the sepulchre of David of the remainder of the treasures left there by Hyrcanus (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 7, § 1).

In or about the year 7 occurred the affair of the golden eagle,—a parallel to that of the theatre, and, like that, important, as showing how strongly the Maccabean spirit of resistance to innovations on the Jewish Law still existed, and how vain were any concessions in the other direction in the presence of such innovations. Herod had fixed a large golden eagle, the symbol of the Roman empire, of which Judaea was now a province, over the entrance to the Sanctuary, probably at the same time that he inscribed the name of Agrippa on the gate (B. J. i. 21, § 8). As a breach of the second commandment—not as a badge of dependence—this had excited the indignation of the Jews, and especially of two of the chief rabbis, who instigated their disciples to tear it down. A false report of the king's death was made the occasion of doing this in open day, and in the presence of a large number of people. Being taken before Herod, the rabbis defended their conduct and were burnt alive. The high-priest Matthias was deposed, and Joazar took his place.

This was the state of things in Jerusalem

when Herod died, in the year 4 B.C. of the common chronology (Dionysian era), but really a few months after the birth of Christ (see p. 1663).

The government of Judaea, and therefore of Jerusalem, had by the will of Herod been bequeathed to Archelaus. He lost no time after the burial of his father in presenting himself in the Temple, and addressing the people on the affairs of the kingdom—a display of confidence and moderation, strongly in contrast to the demeanour of the late king. It produced an instant effect on the excited minds of the Jews, still smarting from the failure of the affair of the eagle, and from the chastisement it had brought upon them; and Archelaus was besieged with clamours for the liberation of the numerous persons imprisoned by the late king, and for remission of the taxes. As the people collected for the evening sacrifice the matter became more serious, and assumed the form of a public demonstration, of lamentation for the two martyrs, Judas and Matthias, and indignation against the intruded high-priest. So loud and shrill were the cries of lament that they were heard over the whole city. Archelaus meanwhile temporised and promised redress when his government should be confirmed by Rome. The Passover was close at hand, and the city was fast filling with the multitudes of rustics and of pilgrims (ἐκ τῆς ἰερουσαλῆμ), who crowded to the great Feast (B. J. ii. 1, § 3; Ant. xvii. 9, § 3). These strangers not being able or willing to find admittance into the houses, pitched their tents (τοὺς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐκκεννοκόρας) on the open ground around the Temple (Ant. ibid.). Meanwhile the tumult in the Temple itself was maintained and increased daily; a multitude of fanatics never left the courts, but continued there, incessantly clamouring and imprecating.

Longer delay in dealing with such a state of things would have been madness; a small party of soldiers had already been roughly handled by the mob (B. J. ii. 1, § 3), and Archelaus at last did what his father would have done at first. He despatched the whole garrison, horse and foot, the foot-soldiers by way of the city to clear the Temple, the horse-soldiers by a detour round the level ground north of the town, to surprise the pilgrims on the eastern slopes of Moriah, and prevent their rushing to the succour of the fanatics in the Temple. The movement succeeded: three thousand were cut up and the whole concourse dispersed over the country.

During Archelaus' absence at Rome, Jerusalem was in charge of Sabinus, the Roman procurator of the province, and the tumults—ostensibly on the occasion of some exactions of Sabinus, but doubtless with the same real ground as before—were renewed with worse results. At the next Feast, Pentecost, the throng of strangers was enormous. They formed regular encampments round the Temple and on the western hill of the upper city, and besieged the Romans, who appear to have occupied Antonia^p and Herod's palace with its

^p Sabinus, who was no doubt living in Herod's palace when the outbreak occurred, appears to have been taken by surprise and to have been unable to reach the three towers (Ant. xvii. 9, § 3; 10, § 1; B. J. ii. 2, § 2). At last the soldiers in the Antonia made a sally and cut their way into the Temple. The struggle was desperate, a great many Jews were killed, the cloisters of the outer court burnt down, and the sacred treasury plundered of immense sums. But no reverses could quell the fury of the insurgents, and matters were not appeased till Varus, the prefect of the province, arrived from the north with a large force and dispersed the strangers. On this quiet was restored.

In the year 3 B.C. Archelaus returned from Rome ethnarch of the southern province. He immediately displaced Joazar, whom his father had made high-priest after the affair of the eagle, and put Joazar's brother Eleazar in his stead. This is the only event affecting Jerusalem that is recorded in the ten years between the return of Archelaus and his summary departure to trial at Rome (A.D. 6).

Judaea was now reduced to an ordinary Roman province; the procurator of which resided, not at Jerusalem, but at Caesarea on the coast (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 3, § 1). The first appointed was Coponius, who accompanied Quirinus to the country immediately on the disgrace of Archelaus. Quirinus (the CYRENIUS of the N. T.)—now for the second time prefect of Syria—was charged with the unpopular measure of the enrolment or assessment of the inhabitants of Judaea. Notwithstanding the riots which took place elsewhere, at Jerusalem the enrolment was allowed to proceed without resistance, owing to the prudence of Joazar (Ant. xviii. 1, § 1), again high-priest for a short time. One of the first acts of the new governor had been to take formal possession of the state vestments of the high-priest, worn on the three Festivals and on the Day of Atonement. Since the building of the Baris by the Maccabees these robes had always been kept there, a custom continued since its reconstruction by Herod. But henceforward they were to be put up after use in an underground stone chamber, under the seal of the priests, and in charge of the captain of the guard. Seven days before use they were brought out, to be consigned again to the chamber after the ceremony was over (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4, § 3).

Two incidents at once most opposite in their character, and in their significance to that age and to ourselves, occurred during the procuratorship of Coponius. First, in the year 8, the finding of Christ in the Temple. Annas had been made high-priest about a year before. The second occurrence must have been a most distressing one to the Jews, unless they had become inured to such things. But of this we cannot so exactly fix the date. It was nothing less than the pollution of the Temple by some Samaritans, who secretly brought human bones and strewed them about the cloisters during the night of the Passover.^a Up to this time the Samaritans had been admitted to the Temple; they were henceforth excluded.

Antonia where the legion was quartered. He consequently ascended the tower Phasaelus, which adjoined the palace, and thence gave the signal for the attack on the Temple.

^a The mode of pollution adopted by Josiah towards the idolatrous shrines (see p. 1603).

In or about A.D. 10, Coponius was succeeded by M. Ambivius, and he by Annus Rufus. In 14 Augustus died, and with Tiberius came a new procurator—Val. Gratus, who held office till 26, when he was replaced by Pontius Pilate. During this period the high-priests had been numerous,^b but it is only necessary here to say that when Pilate arrived at his government the office was held by Joseph Caiaphas, who had been appointed but a few months before. The freedom from disturbance which marks the preceding twenty years at Jerusalem, was probably due to the absence of the Roman troops, who were quartered at Caesarea out of the way of the fierce fanatics of the Temple. But Pilate transferred the winter quarters of the army to Jerusalem (Ant. xviii. 3, § 1), and the very first day there was a collision. The offence was given by the Roman standards—the images of the emperor and of the eagle—which by former commanders had been kept out of the city. A representation was made to Pilate; and so obstinate was the temper of the Jews on the point, that he yielded, and the standards were withdrawn (Ant. ibid.). He afterwards, as if to try how far he might go, consecrated some gilt shields—not containing figures, but inscribed simply with the name of the deity and of the donor—and hung them in the palace at Jerusalem. This act again aroused the resistance of the Jews; and on appeal to Tiberius they were removed (Philo, ἄποδ Galov, Mangey, ii. 589).

Another riot was caused by his appropriation of the Corban—a sacred revenue arising from the redemption of vows—to the cost of an aqueduct which he constructed for bringing water to the city from a distance of 200 (Ant. xviii. 3, § 2) or 400 (B. J. ii. 9, § 4) stadia. This aqueduct is that leading from Wādī Urtāb to "Solomon's Pools" at Urtāb, and thence to the Temple hill (Water Supply, p. 1591).

A.D. 29. At the Passover of this year our Lord made His first recorded visit to the city since His boyhood (John ii. 13).

A.D. 33. At the Passover of this year, occurred His Crucifixion and Resurrection.

In A.D. 37, Pilate having been recalled to Rome, Jerusalem was visited by Vitellius, the prefect of Syria, at the time of the Passover. Vitellius conferred two great benefits on the city. He remitted the duties levied on produce, and he allowed the Jews again to have the free custody of the high-priest's vestments. He removed Caiaphas from the high-priesthood, and gave it to Jonathan son of Annas. He then departed, apparently leaving a Roman officer (φορπαρχος) in charge of the Antonia (Ant. xviii. 4, § 3). Vitellius was again at Jerusalem this year, probably in the autumn, with Herod the tetrarch (xviii. 5, § 3); while there he again changed the high-priest, substituting for Jonathan, Theophilus his brother. The news of the death of Tiberius and the accession of Caligula reached Jerusalem at this time. Marcellus was appointed procurator by the new emperor. In the following year Stephen was stoned. The Christians were greatly persecuted, and all, except the Apostles, driven out of Jerusalem (Acts viii. 1, xi. 19).

In A.D. 40 Vitellius was superseded by P. Petronius, who arrived in Palestine with an order to place in the Temple a statue of Caligula. This order was ultimately, by the intercession of Agrippa, countermanded, but not until it had roused the whole people as one man (Ant. xviii. 8, §§ 2-9; and see the admirable narrative of Milman, Hist. of Jews, bk. x.).

With the accession of Claudius in 41 came an edict of toleration to the Jews. Agrippa arrived in Palestine to take possession of his kingdom, and one of his first acts was to visit the Temple, where he offered sacrifice and dedicated the golden chain which the late emperor had presented him after his release from captivity. It was hung over the treasury (Ant. xix. 6, § 1). Simon was made high-priest; the house-tax was remitted.

Agrippa resided very much at Jerusalem, and added materially to its prosperity and convenience. The city had for some time been extending itself towards the north, and a large suburb had come into existence on the high ground north of the Temple, and outside of the "second wall," which enclosed the portion of the city immediately west of the street el-Wad. Hitherto the outer portion of this suburb—which was called Bezetha, or "New town," and had grown up very rapidly—was unprotected by any formal wall, and practically lay open to attack.* This defenceless condition attracted the attention of Agrippa, who, like the first Herod, was a great builder, and he commenced enclosing it in so substantial and magnificent a manner as to excite the suspicions of the Prefect, at whose instance it was stopped by Claudius (Ant. xix. 7, § 2; B. J. ii. 11, § 6; v. 4, § 2). Subsequently the Jews seem to have purchased permission to complete the work (Tac. Hist. v. 12; Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 2 ad fin.). This new wall, the outermost of the three which enclosed the city on the north, started from the old wall at the Tower Hippicus, close to the Jaffa Gate. It ran northward, bending by a large circuit to the east, and at last, returning southward, joined the old wall at the "valley called Kedron." Thus it enclosed not only the new suburb, but also the valley north-east of the Temple, which up to the present date had lain open to the country.

The year 43 is memorable as that of St. Paul's first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion. The year 44 began with the murder of St. James by Agrippa (Acts xii. 1), followed at the Passover by the imprisonment and escape of St. Peter. Shortly after Agrippa himself died. Cuspius Fadus arrived from Rome as procurator, and Longinus as prefect of Syria. An attempt was made by the Romans to regain possession of the pontifical robes; but on reference to the emperor the attempt was abandoned. In 45 commenced a severe famine which lasted two years (Ewald, Gesch. vi. 409, note). To the people of Jerusalem it was alleviated by the presence of Helena, queen of Adiabene, a convert to the Jewish faith, who visited the city in 46 and imported corn and dried fruit, which she distributed to the poor (Ant. xx. 2, § 5; 5, § 2). During her stay Helena constructed, at a distance of three stadia from the city, a tomb, marked by three pyramids, to which her remains, with those of her son, were afterwards brought (Ant. xx. 4, § 3). It was situated to the north, and is one of the points referred to by Josephus in his description of the course of the third wall (B. J. v. 4, § 2). At the end of this year St. Paul arrived in Jerusalem for the second time.

A.D. 48. Fadus was succeeded by Ventidius Cumanus. A frightful tumult happened at the Passover of this year, caused, as on former occasions, by the presence of the Roman soldiers in the Antonia and in the courts and cloisters of the Temple during the Festival. Ten (or, according to another account, twenty) thousand are said to have met their deaths, not by the sword, but trodden to death in the crush through the narrow lanes which led from the Temple down into the city (Ant. xx. 5, § 3; B. J. ii. 12, § 1). Cumanus was recalled, and FELIX appointed in his room (Ant. xx. 7, § 1; B. J. ii. 12, § 8), partly at the instance of Jonathan, the then high-priest (Ant. xx. 8, § 5). A set of ferocious fanatics, whom Josephus calls Sicarii, had lately begun to make their appearance in the city, whose creed it was to rob and murder all whom they judged hostile to Jewish interests. Felix, weary of the remonstrances of Jonathan on his vicious life, employed some of these wretches to assassinate him. He was killed in the Temple, while sacrificing. The murder was never inquired into, and, emboldened by this, the Sicarii repeated their horrid act, thus adding, in the eyes of the Jews, the awful crime of sacrilege to that of murder (B. J. ii. 13, § 3; Ant. ibid.). The city, too, was filled with impostors pretending to inspiration, but inspired only with hatred to all government and order. Nor was the disorder confined to the lower classes: the chief people of the city, the very high-priests themselves, robbed the threshing-floors of the tithes common to all the priests, and led parties of rioters to open tumult and fighting in the streets (Ant. xx. 8, § 8). In fact, not only Jerusalem, but the whole country far and wide, was in the most frightful confusion and insecurity.

At length a riot of the most serious description at Caesarea caused the recall of Felix, and in the end of 60 or the beginning of 61 PORCIUS FESTUS succeeded him as procurator. Festus was an able and upright officer (B. J. ii. 14, § 1), and at the same time conciliatory towards the Jews (Acts xxv. 9). In the brief period of his administration he kept down the robbers with a strong hand, and gave the province a short breathing time. His interview with St. Paul (Acts xxv., xxvi.) took place, not at Jerusalem, but at Caesarea. On one occasion both Festus and Agrippa came into collision with the Jews at Jerusalem. Agrippa—who had been appointed king by Nero in 52—had added an apartment to the old Amonean palace on the eastern brow of the upper city, which commanded a full view into the interior of the courts of the Temple (Ant. xx. 8, § 11). This view the Jews intercepted by building a wall on the exhedra of the western wall of the inner court of the Temple.¹ But the wall not only intercepted the view of Agrippa, it also interfered with the view from the western cloisters of the outer court where the Roman guard was stationed during the festivals. Both Agrippa and Festus interfered, and required it to be pulled down; but the Jews pleaded that once built it was a part of the Temple, and entreated to be allowed to appeal to Nero. Nero allowed their plea, but retained as hostages the high-priest and treasurer, who had headed the deputation. Agrippa appointed Joseph, called Cabi, to the vacant priesthood. In 62 (probably Festus died, and was succeeded by Albinus; and very shortly afterwards Joseph was replaced in the high-priesthood by Annas or Ananus, son of the Annas before whom our Lord was taken. Before the arrival of Albinus a persecution was commenced against the Christians at the instance of the new high-priest, a rigid Sadducee, and St. James and others were arraigned before the Sanhedrin (Joseph. Ant. xx. 9, § 1). They were "delivered to be stoned," but St. James at any rate appears not to have been killed till a few years later. The act gave great offence to all, and cost Annas his office after he had held it but three months. Jesus (Joshua), the son of Damneus, succeeded him. Albinus began his rule by endeavouring to keep down the Sicarii and other disturbers of the peace; and indeed he preserved throughout a show of justice and vigour (Ant. xx. 11, § 1), though in secret greedy and rapacious. But before his recall he pursued his end more openly, and priests, people, and governors alike seem to have been bent on rapine and bloodshed: rival high-priests headed bodies of rioters, and stoned each other, and in the words of Josephus, "all things grew from worse to worse" (Ant. xx. 9, § 4). The evils were aggravated by two occurrences—first, the release by Albinus, before his departure, of all the smaller criminals in the prisons (Ant. xx. 9, § 5); and secondly, the sudden discharge of an immense body of workmen, on the completion of the repairs to the Temple (xx. 9, § 7). An endeavour was made to remedy the latter by inducing Agrippa to rebuild the eastern cloister; but he refused to undertake a work of such magnitude, though he consented to pave the city with white stone. The repairs of a part of the sanctuary that had fallen down, and the renewal of the foundations of some portions, were deferred for the present, but the materials were collected and stored in one of the courts (B. J. v. 1, § 5).

Bad as Albinus had been, Gessius Florus, who succeeded him in 65, was worse. In fact, even Tacitus admits that the endurance of the oppressed Jews could last no longer—duravit patientia Judæis usque ad Gessium Florum (Hist. v. 10). So great was his rapacity, that whole cities and districts were desolated, and the robbers openly allowed to purchase immunity in plunder. At the Passover, probably in 66, when Cestius Gallus, the prefect of Syria, visited Jerusalem, the whole assembled people² besought him for redress; but without effect. Florus' next attempt was to obtain some of the treasure from the Temple. He demanded 17 talents in the name of the emperor. The demand produced a frantic disturbance, in the midst of which he approached the city with both cavalry and foot-soldiers. That night Florus took up his quarters in the royal palace—that of Herod near the "Jaffa Gate." On the following morning he took his seat on the Bema, and the high-priest and other principal people being brought before him, he demanded that the leaders of the late riot should be given up. On their refusal he ordered his soldiers to plunder the upper city. This order was but too faithfully carried out; every house was entered and pillaged, and the Jews driven out. In their attempt to get through the narrow streets many were caught and slain, others were brought before Florus, scourged, and then crucified. No grade or class was exempt. Jews who bore the Roman equestrian order were among the victims treated with most indignity. Queen Bernice herself (B. J. ii. 15, § 1)—residing at that time in the Asmonean palace, in the very midst of the slaughter—was so affected by the scene, as to intercede in person and barefoot before Florus, but without avail, and in returning she was herself nearly killed, and only escaped by taking refuge in her palace and calling her guards about her. The further details of this dreadful tumult must be passed over.³ Florus was foiled in an attempt to force his way through the city to the Antonia—whence he would have had nearer access to the treasures—and finding that the Jews had broken down the cloisters which joined the fortress to the Temple, and so destroyed the means of communication between them, he relinquished the attempt and withdrew to Caesarea (B. J. ii. 15, § 6).

Cestius Gallus, the prefect, now found it necessary to visit the city in person. He sent one of his lieutenants to announce him, but before he himself arrived events had become past remedy. Agrippa had shortly before returned from Alexandria, and had done much to calm the people. At his instance they rebuilt the part of the cloisters which had been demolished, and collected the tribute in arrear, but the mere suggestion from him that they should obey Florus until he was replaced, produced such a storm that he was obliged to leave the city (B. J. ii. 16, § 5; 17, § 1). The seditious party in the Temple, led by young Eleazar, son of Ananias, rejected the offerings of the Roman emperor, which since the time of Julius Caesar had been regularly made. This, as a direct renunciation of allegiance, was the true beginning of the war with Rome (B. J. ii. 17, § 2). Such acts were not done without resistance from the older and wiser people. But remonstrance was unavailing; the innovators would listen to no representations. The peace party, therefore, despatched some of their number to Florus and to Agrippa, and the latter sent 3,000 horse-soldiers to assist in keeping order.

Hostilities at once began. The peace party, headed by the high-priest, and fortified by Agrippa's soldiers, threw themselves into the upper city. The insurgents held the Temple and the lower city. In the Antonia was a small Roman garrison. Fierce contests lasted for seven days, each side endeavouring to take possession of the part held by the other. At last the insurgents, who behaved with the greatest ferocity, and were reinforced by a number of Sicarii, were triumphant. They gained the upper city, driving all before them—some of the high-priests and leaders into vaults and subterranean passages; others, amongst whom were Ananias, the high-priest, with the soldiers, into Herod's palace. The Asmonean palace, the high-priest's house, and the repository of the Archives—in Josephus's language, "the nerves of the city" (B. J. ii. 17, § 6)—were set on fire. Antonia was next attacked, and in two days they had effected an entrance, sabred the garrison, and burnt the fortress. The balistæ and catapults found there were preserved for future use (v. 6, § 3). The soldiers in Herod's palace were next besieged; but so strong were the walls, and so stout the resistance, that it was three weeks before an entrance could be effected. The soldiers were at last forced from the palace into the three great towers on the adjoining wall with great loss; and ultimately were all murdered in the most treacherous manner. The high-priest and his brother were discovered hidden in the aqueduct of the palace; they were instantly put to death. Thus the insurgents were now completely masters of both city and Temple. But they were not to remain so long. After the action at Gabao (Gibeon), which checked the advance of the Roman army under Cestius Gallus, dissensions began to arise, and it soon became known that there was still a large moderate party. Cestius took advantage of this to move his camp to Scopus, whence, after waiting three days in the vain hope that the Jews would submit, he advanced upon the city. He made his way through Bezetha, the new suburb north of the Temple, and through the wood-market, Βοκῶν ἄγορα (see p. 1594), burning everything as he went (B. J. ii. 19, § 4; v. 7, § 2), and at last encamped in the upper city, opposite the palace, and close to the second wall. The Jews retired to the inner part of the city and to the Temple. For five days Cestius assaulted the wall without success; on the sixth he resolved to make one more attempt, this time at a different spot—the north wall of the Temple, east of and behind the Antonia. The Jews, however, fought with such fury from the top of the cloisters, that he could effect nothing, and when night came he drew off to his camp at Scopus. Thither the insurgents followed him, and in three days gave him one of the most complete defeats that a Roman army had ever undergone. His catapults and balistæ were taken from him, and reserved by the Jews for the final siege (v. 6, § 3). This occurred on the 8th of Marchesvan (beginning of November), 66.

The war with Rome was now inevitable, and it was evident that the siege of Jerusalem was only a question of time. Ananus, the high-priest, a moderate and prudent man, took the lead; the walls were repaired, arms and warlike instruments and machines of all kinds fabricated, and other preparations made. In this attitude of expectation—with occasional diversions, such as the expedition to Ascalon (B. J. iii. 2, §§ 1, 2), and the skirmishes with Simon Bar-Gioras (ii. 22, § 2)—the city remained while Vespasian was reducing the north of the country, and till the fall of Giscala (Oct. or Nov. 67), when John, the son of Levi, escaped thence to Jerusalem, to become one of the most prominent persons in the future conflict.

From the arrival of John, two years and a half elapsed till Titus appeared before the walls of Jerusalem. The whole of that time was occupied in contests between the moderate party, whose desire was to take such a course as might yet preserve the nationality of the Jews and the existence of the city, and the Zealots or fanatics, the assertors of national independence, who scouted the idea of compromise, and resolved to regain their freedom or perish. The Zealots, being utterly unscrupulous, and resorting to massacre on the least resistance, soon triumphed, and at last reigned paramount, with no resistance but such as sprang from their own internal factions. For the repulsive details of this frightful period of contention and outrage, the reader must be referred to other works.* It will be sufficient to say that at the beginning of 70, when Titus made his appearance, the Zealots themselves were divided into two parties: that of John of Giscala and Eleazar, who held the Temple and its courts, the Antonia, Ophla, and the "valley called Kedron," in which the Rirkat Israel is situated—8,400 men; that of Simon Bar-Gioras, whose head-quarters were in the tower Phasaelus (v. 4, § 3), and who held the upper city, from the present Coenaculum to the Kafat Jaliüd, the third wall, and Bezetha, the fountain of Siloam, and the lower city on the eastern hill—10,000 men, and 5,000 Idumeans (B. J. v. 6, § 1), in all a force of between 23,000 and 24,000 soldiers trained in the civil encounters of the last two years to great skill and thorough recklessness.^a The numbers of the other inhabitants, swelled as they were by the strangers and pilgrims who flocked from the country to the Passover, it is extremely difficult to decide. Tacitus, doubtless from some Roman source, gives the whole at 600,000. Josephus states that 1,100,000 perished during the siege

* Dean Millman's History of the Jews, bks. xiv., xv., xvi.; and Merivale's History of the Romans, vi. ch. 59. To both of these works the writer begs leave to express his obligations throughout the above meagre sketch of "the most soul-stirring struggle of all ancient history." Of course the materials for all modern accounts are in Josephus only, excepting the few touches—strong, but not always accurate—in the 6th book of Tacitus' Histories.

^a These are the numbers given by Josephus; but it is probable that they are greatly exaggerated.

(B. J. vi. 9, § 3; cp. v. 13, § 7), and that more than 40,000 were allowed to depart into the country (vi. 8, § 2), in addition to an "immense number" sold to the army, and who of course form a proportion of the 97,000 "carried captive during the whole war" (vi. 9, § 3). We may therefore take Josephus's computation of the numbers at about 1,200,000. Reasons are given in the third section of this article for believing that even the smaller of these numbers is very greatly in excess, and that the population cannot have exceeded 70,000 (see p. 1647).

Titus's force consisted of four legions, and some auxiliaries—probably about 30,000 men (B. J. v. 1, § 6). These were disposed on their first arrival in three camps—the 12th and 15th legions at Scopus, seven stadia north of the city; the 5th, three stadia to the rear; and the 10th on the top of the Mount of Olives (v. 2, §§ 3, 5), to guard the road to the Jordan Valley. The army was well furnished with artillery and machines of the latest and most approved invention—"cuncta expugnandis urbibus, reperta apud veteres, aut novis ingeniis," says Tacitus (Hist. v. 13); and those of the 10th legion are specially mentioned for their excellence (B. J. v. 6, § 3). The first operation was to level the ground between Scopus and the north wall of the city—fell the timber, destroy the fences of the gardens which fringed the wall, and cut away the rocky protuberances. This occupied four days. After it was done the three legions were marched forward from Scopus, and encamped near the north-west corner of the walls, stretching from the Tower Psephinus to opposite Hippicus. The first step was to get possession of the outer wall. The point of attack chosen was in Simon's portion of the city, at a low and comparatively weak place near the monument of John Hyrcanus (v. 6, § 2), and close to the junction of the three walls. Round this spot the three legions erected banks, from which they opened batteries, pushing up the rams and other engines of attack to the foot of the wall. One of the rams, more powerful than the rest, went among the Jews by the sobriquet of Nikón,^b "the conqueror." Three large towers, 75 feet high, were also erected, overtopping the wall. Simon and his men did not suffer these works to go on without molestation. The catapults, both those taken from Cestius and those found in the Antonia, were set up on the wall, and constant desperate sallies were made. At last the Jews began to tire of their fruitless assaults. They saw that the wall must fall, and, as they had done during Nebuchadnezzar's siege, they left their posts at night and went home. A breach was made by the redoubtable Nikón on the 7th Artemisius (c. April 15); and here the Romans entered, driving the Jews before them to the second wall. A great length of the wall was then broken down; such parts of Bezetha as had escaped destruction by Cestius were levelled, and a new camp was formed within the city, on the spot formerly occupied by the Assyrians, and still known as the "Assyrian camp."

This was a great step in advance. Titus now occupied the ground within the third wall, from the neighbourhood of John's monument to the valley of the Kedron; and was in a position to attack the second wall. A battering-ram was pushed forward to the middle tower of the north side of the wall; and a war of missiles raged almost continuously from the Temple on the east to the Tower Hippicus on the west. Simon was no less reckless in assault, and no less fertile in stratagem, than before; but, notwithstanding all his efforts, in five days a breach was again effected. The district into which the Romans had now penetrated was that between the wall of the Haram and Christian street, occupied then, as it is still, by an intricate mass of narrow and tortuous lanes, and containing the markets of the city—no doubt very like the present bazaars. Titus's breach was where the wool, cloth, and brass bazaars came up to the wall (v. 8, § 1). This district was held by the Jews with the greatest tenacity. Knowing, as they did, every turn of the lanes and alleys, they had an immense advantage over the Romans, and it was only after four days' incessant fighting, much loss, and one thorough repulse, that the Romans were able to make good their position. However, at last Simon was obliged to retreat, and then Titus demolished the wall. This was the second step in the siege.

Meantime some shots had been interchanged in the direction of the Antonia, but no serious attack was made. Before beginning there in earnest, Titus resolved to give his troops a few days' rest, and the Jews a short opportunity for reflection. He therefore called in the 10th legion from the Mount of Olives, and reviewed the whole army on the ground within the third wall—full in view of both the Temple and the upper city, every wall and house in which were crowded with spectators (B. J. v. 9, § 1). But the opportunity was thrown away upon the Jews, and after four days orders were given to recommence the attack. Hitherto the assault had been almost entirely on the city! It was now to be simultaneous on city and Temple. Accordingly four banks were constructed for the battering-rams, two in front of Antonia and two in front of the first wall, near the monument of John Hyrcanus. The first two were erected by the 5th and 12th legions near the pool Struthius—probably the present souterrains at the N.W. corner of the Haram; the remaining two by the 10th and 15th, at the pool called Amygdalon—apparently that now known as the Pool of Hezekiah—and at the high-priest's monument (v. 11, § 4). These banks seem to have been constructed in the usual manner with earth, stones, and wood. They absorbed the incessant labour of seventeen days, and were completed on the 29th Artemisius (c. May 7). John in the meantime had not been idle; he had employed the seventeen days' respite in driving mines, through the solid limestone of the hill,^a from within the fortress (v. 11, § 4; vi. 1, § 3) to below the banks. The ground above the mines was supported with beams of wood, and the galleries partially filled with inflammable materials. When the banks were quite complete, and the engines placed upon them, the timber of the galleries was fired, the superincumbent ground gave way, and the labour of the Romans was totally destroyed. At the other point Simon had maintained a resistance with all his former intrepidity, and more than his former success. He had now greatly increased the number of his machines, and his people were much more expert in handling them than before, so that he was able to impede materially the progress of the works. And when they were completed, and the battering-rams had begun to make a sensible impression on the wall, he made a furious assault on them, and succeeded in firing the rams, with their protecting framework of hurdles, seriously damaging the ^b ὁ Νικόων ... ἀπὸ τοῦ πάρα νικᾶν (B. J. v. 7, § 2). It has been suggested (Bonar, Imp. Bib. Dict. s. v. Jerusalem) that in this case, as in some others, Josephus has translated inaccurately. It is possible that the Jews named the battering-ram "the smiter," from נִכְהוּ (to smite). So also they probably cried out נִכְהוּ נִכְהוּ "the stone cometh," and not נִכְהוּ הַבָּנָה "the son cometh" (ῥῆσιν ἐπὶ τῆρα, B. J. v. 6, § 3) at the approach of the formidable missile from the Roman ballista.

It now became plain to Titus that some other measures for the reduction of the place must be adopted. It would appear that hitherto the southern and western parts of the city had not been closely invested, and on that side a certain amount of communication was kept up with the country, which, unless stopped, might prolong the siege indefinitely (B. J. v. 12, § 1; 10, § 3; 11, § 1; 12, § 3). The number who thus escaped is stated by Josephus at more than five hundred a day (v. 11, § 1). A council of war was therefore held, and it was resolved to encompass the whole place with a wall, and then recommence the assault. The wall began at the Roman camp—probably in the N.W. quarter of the present city. From thence it went to the lower part of Bezetha—about St. Stephen's Gate; then across Kedron to the Mount of Olives; thence south by a rock called Peristereon, the "Pigeon's rock,"—possibly in the modern village of Siloam—to the Mount of Offence. It then turned to the west; again crossed the Kedron, ascended its right bank, by the tomb of Ananus, the high-priest, to the Mount of Evil Counsel, and then, passing by a village called ἑβειθων οἰκός (perhaps Beth-Rabinoth in the Hebrew), ran outside of Herod's monument to its starting-point at the camp. Its entire length was 39 furlongs,—very near 5 miles; and it contained thirteen stations or guard-houses. The whole strength of the army was employed on the work, and it was completed in the short space of three days. The siege was then vigorously pressed. The attack on the first wall was abandoned, and the whole force concentrated on the Antonia (12, § 4). Four new banks of greater size than before were constructed; and as all the timber in the neighbourhood had been already cut down, the materials had to be procured from a distance of 11 miles (vi. 1, § 1). Twenty-one days were occupied in completing the banks. Their position is not specified, but it is evident, from the allusion to John's mining operations, that they were erected at, or near the site of, those which had been destroyed by the Jews during the previous attack (vi. 1, § 3). At length, on the 1st Panemus or Tamuz (c. June 7), the fire from the balistae and catapults commenced, under cover of which the rams were set to work, and that night a part of the wall fell at a spot where the foundations had been weakened by the mines employed against the former attacks. Still this was but an outwork, and between it and the fortress itself a new wall was discovered, which John had taken the precaution to build. At length, after two desperate attempts, this wall and that of the inner fortress were scaled by a bold surprise, and on the 5th Panemus (June 11) the Antonia was in the hands of the Romans (vi. 1, § 7). Another week was occupied in breaking down the outer walls of the fortress for the passage of the machines, and a further delay took place in erecting new banks, on the fresh level, for the bombardment and battery of the Temple. During the whole of this time—the miseries of which are commemorated in the traditional name of yomin de'eka, "days of wretchedness," applied by the Jews to the period between the 17th Tamuz and the 9th Ab—the most desperate hand-to-hand encounters took place, some in the cloisters connecting the Antonia with the Temple, some in the Temple cloisters themselves, the Romans endeavouring to force their way in, the Jews preventing them. But the Romans gradually gained ground. First the western, and then the whole of the northern external cloister was burnt (27th and 28th Pan.), and then the wall enclosing the court of Israel and the Holy House itself. In the interval, on the 17th Panemus, the daily sacrifice had failed, owing to the want of officiating priests; a circumstance which had greatly distressed the people, and was taken advantage of by Titus to make a further though fruitless invitation to surrender. At length, on the 10th day of Lous or Ab (July 15), by the wanton act of a soldier, contrary to the intention of Titus, and in spite of every exertion he could make to stop it, the sanctuary itself was fired (vi. 4, §§ 5-7). It was, by one of those rare coincidences that sometimes occur, the very same month and day of the month that the first Temple had been burnt by Nebuchadnezzar (vi. 4, § 8). John, and such of his party as escaped the flames and the carnage, made their way to the upper city. The whole of the cloisters that had hitherto escaped, including the magnificent triple colonnade of Herod on the south of the Temple, the treasury chambers, and the rooms round the outer courts, were now all burnt and demolished. Only the edifice of the sanctuary itself still remained. On its solid masonry the fire had but comparatively little effect, and there were still hidden in its recesses a few faithful priests who had contrived to rescue the most valuable of the utensils, vessels, and spices of the sanctuary (vi. 6, § 1; 8, § 3).

The Temple was at last gained; but it seemed as if half the work remained to be done. The upper city, higher than Moriah, enclosed by the first wall, and on all sides precipitous except at the north, where it was defended by the wall and towers of Herod, was still to be taken. Titus first tried a parley—he standing on the east end of the bridge between the Temple and the upper city, and John and Simon on the west end. His terms, however, were rejected, and no alternative was left him but to force on the siege. The whole of the lower city—the crowded lanes of which we have so often heard—was burnt, in the teeth of a frantic resistance from the Zealots (vi. 7, § 1), together with the council-house, the repository of the records (doubtless occupied by Simon since its former destruction), the palace of Helena, the place called Ophlas, and the houses as far as Siloam on the lower slopes of the Temple mount.

It took eighteen days to erect the necessary works for the siege; the four legions were once more stationed at the west or north-west corner where Herod's palace abutted on the wall, and where the three magnificent and impregnable

* Josephus contradicts himself about this date, since in vi. 2, § 1, he says that the 17th Panemus was the "very day" that Antonia was entered. The date given in the text agrees best with the narrative. But, on the other hand, the 17th is the day commemorated in the Jewish Calendar.

towers of Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne rose conspicuous (vi. 8, § 1, and § 4 ad fin.). This was the main attack. Opposite the Temple, the precipitous nature of the slopes of the upper city rendered it unlikely that any serious attempt would be made by the Jews, and this part accordingly, between the bridge and the Xystus, was left to the auxiliaries.

The attack was commenced on the 7th of Gorpiaeus (c. Aug. 11), and by the next day a breach was made in the wall, and the Romans at last entered the city. During the attack John and Simon appear to have stationed themselves in the towers just alluded to; and had they remained there, they would probably have been able to make terms, as the towers were considered impregnable (vi. 8, § 4). But on the first signs of a breach, they took flight, and, traversing the city, descended into the valley of Hinnom below Siloam, and endeavoured to make their escape. On being repulsed they took refuge apart in some of the subterraneous caverns or sewers of the city. John shortly after surrendered himself; but Simon held out for several weeks, and did not make his appearance until after Titus had quitted the city. They were reserved for the Triumph at Rome.

The city being taken, such parts as had escaped the former conflagrations were burned, and the whole of both city and Temple was ordered to be demolished, excepting the west wall of the upper city, and Herod's three great towers at the north-west corner, which were left standing as memorials of the massive nature of the fortifications.

Of the Jews, the aged and infirm were killed; the children under seventeen were sold as slaves; the rest were sent, some to the Egyptian mines, some to the provincial amphitheatres, and some to grace the Triumph of the Conqueror.^f Titus then departed, leaving the 10th legion under the command of Terentius Rufus to carry out the work of demolition. Of this Josephus assures us that "the whole" was so thoroughly levelled and dug up that no one visiting it would believe it had ever been inhabited" (B. J. vii. 1, § 1). [G.] [W.]

From its destruction by Titus to the present time.—For more than fifty years after its destruction by Titus, Jerusalem disappears from history. During the revolts of the Jews in Cyrenaica, Egypt, Cyprus, and Mesopotamia, which disturbed the latter years of Trajan, the recovery of their city was never attempted. There is indeed reason to believe that Lucua, the head of the insurgents in Egypt, led his followers into Palestine, where they were defeated by the Roman general Turbo, but Jerusalem is not once mentioned as the scene of their operations. Of its annals during this period we know nothing. Three towers and part of the western wall alone remained of its strong fortifications to protect the cohorts who occupied the conquered city, and the soldiers' huts were long the only buildings on its site. But in the reign of Hadrian it again emerged from its obscurity, and became the centre of an insurrection, which the best blood of Rome was shed to subdue. In despair of keeping the Jews in subjection by other means, the Emperor had formed a design to restore Jerusalem, and thus prevent it from ever becoming a rallying-point for this turbulent race. In furtherance of his plan he had sent thither a colony of veterans, in numbers sufficient for the defence of a position so strong by nature against the then known modes of attack. To this measure Dio Cassius (lxi. 12) attributes a renewal of the insurrection, while Eusebius asserts that it was not carried into execution till the outbreak was quelled. Be this as it may, the embers of revolt, long smouldering, burst into a flame soon after Hadrian's departure from the East in A.D. 132. The contemptuous indifference of the Romans, or the secrecy of their own plans, enabled the Jews to organise a wide-spread conspiracy. Bar Cocheba, their leader,—the third, according to Rabbinical writers, of a dynasty of the same name, princes of the Captivity,—was crowned king at Bethar by the Jews who thronged to him, and by the populace was regarded as the Messiah. His armour-bearer, R. Akiba, claimed descent from Siera, and hated the Romans with the fierce rancour of his adopted nation. All the Jews in Palestine flocked to his standard. At an early period in the revolt they became masters of Jerusalem, and the attempt to rebuild the Temple. The exact date of this attempt is uncertain, but the fact is inferred from allusions in Chrysostom (Or. 3 in Judaeos), Nicephorus (H. E. iii. 24), and George Cedrenus (Hist. Comp. 249), and the collateral evidence of a coin of the period. Hadrian, alarmed at the rapid spread of the in-

^f The prisoners were collected for this final partition in the Court of the Women. Josephus states that during the process 11,000 died! It is a good instance of the exaggeration in which he indulges on these matters; for taking the largest estimate of the Court of the Women (Lightfoot's), it contained 35,000 square feet, i.e. little more than 3 square feet for each of those who died, not to speak of the living.

^g The word used by Josephus—παραβολος τῆς πόλεως—may mean either the whole place, or the enclosing walls, or the precinct of the Temple. The statements of the Talmud perhaps imply that the foundations of the Temple only were dug up (see the quotations in Schwarz, p. 385); and even these seem to have been in existence in the time of Chrysostom (Ad Judaeos, iii. 431). That the demolition of the walls was in many places only partial is attested by existing remains.

surrection, and the ineffectual efforts of his troops to suppress it, summoned from Britain Julius Severus, the greatest general of his time, to take the command of the army of Judaea. Two years were spent in a fierce guerilla warfare before Jerusalem was taken, after a desperate defence in which Bar Cocheba perished. The courage of the defenders was shaken by the falling in of the vaults on Mount Zion, and the Romans became masters of the position (Milman, Hist. of Jews, iii. 122). But the war did not end with the capture of the city. The Jews in great force had occupied the fortress of Bether, and there maintained a struggle with all the tenacity of despair against the repeated onsets of the Romans. At length, worn out by famine and disease, they yielded on the 9th of the month Ab, A.D. 135, and the grandson of Bar Cocheba was among the slain. The slaughter was frightful. The Romans, say the Rabbinical historians, waded to their horse-bridles in blood, which flowed with the fury of a mountain torrent. The corpses of the slain, according to the same voracious authorities, extended for more than thirteen miles, and remained unburied till the reign of Antoninus. Five hundred and eighty thousand are said to have fallen by the sword, while the number of victims to the attendant calamities of war was countless. On the side of the Romans the loss was enormous, and so dearly bought was their victory, that Hadrian, in his letter to the Senate, announcing the conclusion of the war, did not adopt the usual congratulatory phrase. Bar Cocheba has left traces of his occupation of Jerusalem in coins which were struck during the first two years of the war. Four silver coins, three of them undoubtedly belonging to Trajan, have been discovered, restamped with Samaritan characters. But the rebel-leader, amply supplied with the precious metals by the contributions of his followers, afterwards coined his own money. The mint was probably during the first two years of the war at Jerusalem; the coins struck during that period bearing the inscription "to the freedom of Jerusalem," or "Jerusalem the holy." They are mentioned in both Talmuds.

Hadrian's first policy, after the suppression of the revolt, was to obliterate the existence of Jerusalem as a city. The ruins which Titus had left were razed to the ground, and the plough passed over the foundations of the Temple. A colony of Roman citizens occupied the new city which rose from the ashes of Jerusalem, and their number was afterwards augmented by the Emperor's veteran legionaries. A temple to the Capitoline Jupiter was erected on the site of the sacred edifice of the Jews, and among the ornaments of the new city were a theatre, two market-places (δημόσια), a building called τετραώνυμον, and another called κόδρα.^h The city was divided into seven quarters, each of which had its own warden. Mount Zion lay without the walls (Jerome, Mic. iii. 12; Itin. Hieros. p. 592, ed. Wesseling). That the northern wall enclosed the so-called sacred places, though asserted by Deyling, is regarded by Münter as a fable of a later date. A temple to Astarte, the Phœnician Venus, on the site afterwards identified with the Sepulchre, appears on coins, with four columns and the inscription C. A. C., Colonia Aelia Capitolina, but it is doubtful whether it was erected at this time. The worship of Serapis was introduced from Egypt. A statue of the emperor was raised on the site of the Holy of Holies (Niceph. H. E. iii. 24); and it must have been near the same spot that the Bordeaux Pilgrim saw two statues of Hadrian, not far from the "lapis pertusus" which the Jews of his day yearly visited and anointed with oil (Itin. Hieros. p. 591).

It was not, however, till the following year, A.D. 136, that Hadrian, on celebrating his Vicennalia, bestowed upon the new city the name of Aelia Capitolina, combining with his own family title the name of Jupiter of the Capitol, the guardian deity of the colony. Christians and pagans alone were allowed to reside. Jews were forbidden to enter on pain of death, and this prohibition, though occasionally relaxed, remained in force in the time of Tertullian. But the conqueror, though stern, did not descend to wanton mockery. The swine sculptured by the Emperor's command over the gate leading to Bethlehem (Euseb. Chron. Hadr. Ann. xx.), was not intended as an insult to the conquered race to bar their entrance to the city of their fathers, but was one of the signa militaria of the Roman army. About the middle of the 4th century the Jews were allowed to visit the neighbourhood, and afterwards, once a year, to enter the city itself, and weep over it on the anniversary of its capture. Jerome (on Zeph. i. 15) has drawn a vivid picture of the wretched crowds of Jews who in his day assembled at the weeping-place by the west wall of the Temple to bemoan the loss of their ancestral greatness. On the 9th of the month Ab might be seen the aged and decrepit of both sexes, with tattered garments and dishevelled hair, who met to weep over the downfall of Jerusalem, and purchased permission of the soldiery to prolong their lamentations ("et miles mercedem postulat ut illis flere plus liceat").

So completely were all traces of the ancient city obliterated that its very name was in process of time forgotten. It was not till after Constantine built the Martyrion on the supposed site of the Crucifixion, that its ancient appellation was revived. In the 7th canon of the Council of Nicea the Bishop of Aelia is mentioned; but Macarius, in subscribing to the canons, designated himself bishop of Jerusalem. The name Aelia occurs as late as Adamnanus (A.D. 697), and is even found in Edrisi and Mejr ed-Din about 1495.

After the inauguration of the new colony of Aelia the annals of the city again relapse into an obscurity which is only represented in history by a list of twenty-three Christian Bishops, who filled up the interval between the election of Marcus, the first of the series, and Macarius in the reign of Constantine. Already in the 3rd century the Holy Places had become objects of enthusiasm, and the pilgrimage of Alexander, a Bishop in Cappadocia, and afterwards of Jerusalem, is matter of history. In the following century such pilgrimages became more common.

^h The Chronicon Alexandrinum (p. 264) mentions τὰ δύο δημόσια, καὶ τὸ θέατρον, καὶ τὸ τετραώνυμον, καὶ τὸ δωδεκάπυλον τὸ πρὶν ὀνομαζόμενον ἀναβαθμοί, καὶ τὴν κόδραν.

The aged Empress Helena, mother of Constantine, visited Palestine in A.D. 326, and, according to tradition, erected magnificent churches at Bethlehem and on the Mount of Olives. Her son, fired with the same zeal, swept away the shrine of Astarte, which occupied the supposed site of the Resurrection, and founded in its stead a "house of prayer on a scale of rich and imperial costliness." On the east of this was a large court, the eastern side being formed by the Basilica, erected on the spot where the Cross was said to have been found. The latter of these buildings is that known as the Martyrion; the former was the church of the Anastasis, or Resurrection: their locality will be considered in the following section (p. 1653). The Martyrion was completed A.D. 335, and its dedication celebrated by a great Council of Bishops, first at Tyre and afterwards at Jerusalem, at which Eusebius was present. In the reign of Julian (A.D. 362) the Jews, with the permission and at the instigation of the Emperor, made an abortive attempt to rebuild the Temple. From whatever motive, Julian had formed the design of restoring the Jewish worship on Mount Moriah to its pristine splendour, and during his absence in the East the execution of his project was entrusted to his favourite, Alypius of Antioch. Materials of every kind were provided at the Emperor's expense, and so great was the enthusiasm of the Jews that their women took part in the work, and in the laps of their garments carried off the earth which covered the ruins of the Temple. But a sudden whirlwind and earthquake shattered the stones of the former foundations; the workmen fled for shelter to one of the neighbouring churches (ἐπί τι τῶν πλῆσιον ἱερῶν, Greg. Naz. Or. iv. 111), the doors of which were closed against them by an invisible hand, and a fire issuing from the Temple-mount raged the whole day and consumed their tools. Numbers perished in the flames. Some who escaped took refuge in a portico near at hand, which fell at night and crushed them as they slept (Theodor. H. E. iii. 15; Sozomen, v. 21; see also Ambros. Epist. ad Theodosium, lib. ii. ep. 17). Whatever may have been the colouring which this story received as it passed through the hands of the ecclesiastical historians, the impartial narrative of Ammianus Marcellinus (xiii. 1), the friend and companion in arms of the Emperor, leaves no reasonable doubt of the truth of the main facts that the work was interrupted by fire, which all attributed to supernatural agency. In the time of Chrysostom the foundations of the Temple still remained, to which the orator could appeal (Ad Judæos, iii. 431; Paris, 1636). The event was regarded as a judgment of God upon the impious attempt of Julian to falsify the predictions of Christ: a position which Bishop Warburton defends with great skill in his treatise on the subject.

During the 4th and 5th centuries Jerusalem became the centre of attraction for pilgrims from all regions¹; and its bishops contended with those of Caesarea for the supremacy; but it was not till after the Council of Chalcedon (451-453) that it was made an independent patriarchate. In the theological controversies which followed the decision of that Council with regard to the two natures of Christ, Jerusalem bore its share with other Oriental churches, and two of its Bishops were deposed by Monophysite fanatics. The Synod of Jerusalem in A.D. 536 confirmed the decrees of the Synod of Constantinople against the Monophysites.

In A.D. 438 the Empress Eudocia visited Jerusalem, and there, when exiled from Constantinople, she passed the last sixteen years of her life. She founded churches, monasteries, and almshouses, and rebuilt the walls of the city (Soc. H. E. vii. 47; Evag. H. E. i. 20-22); and two of her works—the basilica of St. Stephen, in which she was buried, and the city wall enclosing the Fountain of Siloam—are mentioned by Antoninus (xxv.). To this period, one of great building activity, may perhaps be assigned the Church of St. Sophia, or of the Praetorium, and the Churches of St. Mary (in probatica), the pinnacle of the Temple, Siloam, &c., which are mentioned by writers in the 6th century (see the Breviarium, Theodosius, and Antoninus).

In 529 the Emperor Justinian founded at Jerusalem a splendid church in honour of the Virgin, which has been identified by some writers with the building known in modern times as the Mosque el-Aksa, but of which probably no remains now exist (see p. 1657). Procopius, the historian, ascribes to the same emperor the erection of ten or eleven monasteries in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem and Jericho. Eutychius adds that he built a hospital for strangers in Jerusalem, and that the church above mentioned was begun by the patriarch Elias, and completed by Justinian. Later in the same century Gregory the Great (590-604) sent the abbot Probus to Jerusalem with a large sum of money, and endowed a hospital for pilgrims, which Robinson suggests is the same as that now used by the Muslims for the like purpose, and called by the Arabs et-Takkyeh. It was however, more probably, close to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, perhaps on the site afterwards granted to the merchants of Amalfi.

For nearly five centuries the city had been free from the horrors of war. The merchants of the Mediterranean sent their ships to the coasts of Syria, and Jerusalem became a centre of trade as well as of devotion. But this rest was roughly broken by the invading Persian army under Chosroes II., who swept through Syria, drove the imperial troops before them, and, after the capture of Antioch and Damascus, marched upon Jerusalem. A multitude of Jews from Tiberias and Galilee followed in their train. The city was invested, and taken by assault in June 614; thousands of the monks and clergy were slain; the suburbs were burnt, churches demolished, and that of the Holy Sepulchre injured, if not consumed, by fire.² The invading army in their retreat carried with them the patriarch Zacharias, and the wood of the true Cross, besides multitudes of captives. During the exile of the patriarch, his vicar Modestus, supplied with money and workmen by the munificent John Eleemon, patriarch of Alexandria, restored the churches of the Resurrection and Calvary, and also that of the Assumption.¹ After a struggle of fourteen years the imperial arms were again victorious, and in 628 Heraclius entered Jerusalem on foot, at the head of a triumphal procession, bearing the true Cross on his shoulder. The restoration of the churches is with greater probability attributed by William of Tyre to the liberality of the emperor (Hist. i. 1).

The dominion of the Christians in the Holy City was now rapidly drawing to a close. After an obstinate defence of four months, in the depth of winter, against the impetuous attacks of the Arabs, the patriarch Sophronius surrendered to the Khalif Omar in person A.D. 637. The valour of the besieged extorted unwilling admiration from the victors, and obtained for them terms unequalled for leniency in the history of Arab conquest. The Khalif, after ratifying the terms of capitulation, which secured to the Christians liberty of worship in the churches which they had, but prohibited the erection of more, entered the city, and was met at the gates by the patriarch. Sophronius received him with the uncourteous exclamation, "Verily this is the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place!" and the chronicler does not forget to record the ragged dress and "satanic hypocrisy" of the hardy Khalif (Cedrenus, Hist. Comp. 426). Omar then, in company with the patriarch, visited the Church of the Resurrection, and at the Muslim time of prayer knelt down on the eastern steps of the Basilica, refusing to pray within the buildings, in order that the possession of them might be secured to the Christians. Tradition relates that he requested a site whereon to erect a mosque for the Muhammadan worship, and that the patriarch assigned him the spot occupied by the reputed stone of Jacob's vision: over this he is said to have built the mosque afterwards known by his name (Eutychn. Chron. ii. 285; Ockley, Hist. of Sar. pp. 205-214, Bohn), and which tradition still points out in the S.E. corner of the Aksa. Henceforth Jerusalem became for Muslims, as well as Christians, a sacred place, and the Mosque of Omar shared the honours of pilgrimage with the renowned Kaaba of Mecca.

Towards the close of the 7th century the Khalif Abd ul-Melik, wishing, from political motives, to set up another place of pilgrimage to replace the Kaaba, brought the Sakhrâh within the precincts of the Moslem Sanctuary, and either built the existing "Dome of the Rock" over it, or, more probably, restored and covered by a dome a previously existing church. His son El-Walid completed the work by extending the Haram to the north so as to bring the Dome of the Rock into the centre of the sacred area (Eutychn. Annal. ii. 365, 373).

In the reign of Charlemagne (771-814) ambassadors were sent by the emperor of the West to distribute alms in the Holy City, and on their return were accompanied by envoys from the enlightened Khalif Hârûn er-Rashid, bearing to Charlemagne the keys of Calvary and of the Holy Sepulchre. But these amenities were not of long continuance. The dissensions which ensued upon the death of the Khalif spread to Jerusalem, and churches and convents suffered in the general anarchy. About the same period the feud between the Joktanite and Ishmaelite Arabs assumed an alarming aspect. The former, after devastating the neighbouring region, made an attempt upon Jerusalem, but were repulsed by the signal valour of its garrison. In the reign of the Khalif El-Mamûn the buildings of the Haram esh-Sherif were thoroughly restored at great cost; and in that of El-Motasem Jerusalem was held for a time by the rebel chief Tamûn Abu-Hareb.

With the fall of the Abassides the Holy City passed into the hands of the Fatimite conqueror Muez, who fixed the seat of his empire at Musr el-Kâhirah, the modern Cairo (A.D. 969). Under the Fatimite dynasty the sufferings^m of the Christians in Jerusalem reached their height, when el-Hâkim, the third of his line, ascended the throne (A.D. 996). The Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which had been seven times dismantled and burnt within the previous seventy years (Eutychn. Ann. ii. 529, 530; Cedren. Hist. Comp. p. 661), was again demolished (Ademari Chron. A.D. 1010), and its successor was not completed till A.D. 1048. A small chapel ("oratoria valde modica," Will. Tyr. viii. 3) supplied the place of the magnificent Basilica on Golgotha.

The pilgrimages to Jerusalem in the 11th century became a source of revenue to the Muslims, who exacted a tax of a byzant from every visitor to the Holy Sepulchre. Among the most remarkable pilgrimages of this century were those of Robert of Normandy (1035), Liébert of Cambay (1054), and the German Bishops (1065).

In 1077 Jerusalem was pillaged by Atsiz the Kharezmian, commander of the army sent by Melik Shañ against the Syrian dominions of the Khalif. About the year 1084 it was bestowed by Tutush, the brother of Melik Shah, upon Urtuk, chief of a Turkman horde under his command. From this time till 1091 Urtuk was Emir of the city, and on his death it was held as a kind of fief by his sons el-Ghâzi and Sukmân, whose severity to the Christians became the proximate cause of the Crusades. Rudhwân, son of Tutush, made an ineffectual attack upon Jerusalem in 1096. The city was ultimately taken, after a siege of forty days, by Afdal, vizir of the Khalif of Egypt, and for eleven months had been governed by the Emir Iftikar ed-Daulah, when, on the 7th of June, 1099, the Crusading army appeared before the walls. After the fall of Antioch in the preceding year the remains of their numerous host marched along between Lebanon and the sea, passing

^m It is worthy of notice that Mukaddasi (A.D. 935) describes the Christians and Jews as having the upper band at Jerusalem; and it was probably about this period that the merchants of Amalfi were allowed to found a monastery near the Holy Sepulchre (William of Tyre, xviii. 4, 5).

Byblos, Beirût, and Tyre on their road, and so through Lydda, Ramlah, and the ancient Emmaus-Nicopolis, to Jerusalem. The Crusaders, 40,000 in number, but with little more than 20,000 effective troops, reconnoitred the city, and determined to attack it on the north. Their camp extended from the Gate of St. Stephen (Damascus Gate) to that beneath the Tower of David. Godfrey of Lorraine occupied the extreme left (East); next him was Count Robert of Flanders; Robert of Normandy held the third place; and Tancred was posted at the N.W. corner tower, afterwards called by his name. Raymond of Toulouse originally encamped against the west gate, but afterwards withdrew half his force to the part between the city and the church of Zion. At the tidings of their approach the Khalif of Egypt gave orders for the repair of the towers and walls; the fountains and wells for five or six miles round (Will. Tyr. vii. 23), with the exception of Siloam, were stopped, as in the days of Hezekiah, when the city was invested by the Assyrians. On the fifth day after their arrival the Crusaders attacked the city and drove the Saracens from the outworks, but were compelled to suspend their operations till the arrival of the Genoese engineers. Another month was consumed in constructing engines to attack the walls, and meanwhile the besiegers suffered all the horrors of thirst in a burning sun. At length the engines were completed and the day fixed for the assault. On the night of the 13th of July Godfrey had changed his plan of attack, and removed his engines to a weaker part of the wall between the Gate of St. Stephen (Damascus Gate) and the corner tower overlooking the valley of Jehoshaphat on the north. At break of day the city was assaulted in three points at once. Tancred and Raymond of Toulouse attacked the walls opposite their own positions. Night only separated the combatants, and was spent by both armies in preparations for the morrow's contest. Next day, after seven hours' hard fighting, the drawbridge from Godfrey's tower was let down. Godfrey was first upon the wall, followed by the Count of Flanders and the Duke of Normandy; the northern gate was thrown open, and at 3 o'clock on Friday the 15th of July Jerusalem was in the hands of the Crusaders. Raymond of Toulouse entered without opposition by the Zion gate. The carnage was terrible: 10,000 Muslims fell within the sacred enclosure. Order was gradually restored, and Godfrey of Bouillon elected king (Will.

Tyr. viii.). Churches were established, and for eighty-eight years Jerusalem remained in the hands of the Christians. In 1187 it was retaken by Saladin after a siege of several weeks. Five years afterwards (1192), in anticipation of an attack by Richard of England, the fortifications were strengthened and new walls built, and the supply of water again cut off (Barhebr. Chron. p. 421). During the winter of 1191-2 the work was prosecuted with the utmost vigour. Fifty skilled masons, sent by Alaeddin of Mosul, rendered able assistance, and two thousand Christian captives were pressed into the service. The Sultan rode round the fortifications each day encouraging the workmen, and even brought them stones on his horse's saddle. His sons, his brother el-Melik el-Adil, and the Emirs ably seconded his efforts, and within six months the works were completed, solid and durable as a rock (Wilken, Kreuzzüge, iv. 457, 458). The walls and towers were demolished by order of the Sultan el-Melik el-Mo'azzem of Damascus in 1219, and in this defenceless condition the city was ceded to the Christians by virtue of the treaty with the Emperor Frederick II. An attempt to rebuild the walls in 1239 was frustrated by an assault by David of Kerak, who dismantled the city anew. In 1243 it again came into the hands of the Christians, and in the following year sustained a siege by the wild Kharezmian hordes, who slaughtered the priests and monks who had taken refuge in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and after plundering the city withdrew to Gaza. After their departure Jerusalem again reverted to the Muhammadans, in whose hands it still remains. The defeat of the Christians at Gaza was followed by the occupation of the Holy City by the forces of the Sultan of Egypt.

In 1277 Jerusalem was nominally annexed to the kingdom of Sicily. In 1517 it passed under the sway of the Ottoman Sultan Selim I., whose successor Suleiman built the present walls of the city in 1542. Muhammad Ali, the Pasha of Egypt, took possession of it in 1832. In 1834 it was seized and held for a time by the Fellahin during the insurrection, and in 1840, after the bombardment of Acre, was again restored to the Sultan.

Such in brief is a sketch of the chequered fortunes of the Holy City since its destruction by Titus. The details will be found in Gibbon's Decline and Fall; Prof. Robinson's Bibl. Res. i. 365-407; the Rev. G. Williams' Holy City, vol. i.; Wilken's Gesch. der Kreuzzüge; Deyling's Diss. de Aeliae Capitolinae orig. et historia; Bp. III. TOPOGRAPHY OF THE CITY.

There is perhaps no city in the ancient world the topography of which ought to be so easily determined as that of Jerusalem. In the first place, the city was always small, and surrounded by deep valleys; whilst the form of the ground within its limits was so strongly marked that there should apparently be no great difficulty in ascertaining its general extent, or in fixing its more prominent features. On the other hand we have in the works of Josephus a more full and complete topographical description of this city than of almost any other in the ancient world. It is certain that he was intimately acquainted with the localities he describes; and as his copious descriptions can be tested by comparing them with the details of the siege by Titus which he afterwards narrates, there ought to be no difficulty in settling at least all the main points. Nor would there ever have been any, but for the circumstance that, for a long period after the destruction of the city by Titus, the place was practically deserted by its original inhabitants, and the continuity of tradition consequently broken; and that after this, when it again appears in history, it is as a sacred city, and at a period the most uncritical of any known in the modern history of the world. During at least ten centuries of what are called most properly the Dark ages, it was thought necessary to find a locality for every event mentioned in the sacred Scriptures which had taken place within or near its walls. These were in most instances fixed arbitrarily, there being no constant tradition to guide the topographer, so that the confusion which has arisen has become perplexing, to a degree that can only be appreciated by those who have attempted to unravel the tangled thread; and now that long centuries of constant tradition have added sanctity to the localities, it is extremely difficult to shake oneself free from its influence, and to investigate the subject in that critical spirit which is necessary to elicit the truth so long buried in obscurity. The question is further complicated by the enormous quantity of rubbish, the débris of ancient Jerusalem, which has turned the deep Tyropoeon ravine into a shallow depression, has completely covered the "Upper Market Place" and the "Via Dolorosa," and has obliterated many of the ancient landmarks.

It is only by piecing together the results of excavation, and by a careful comparison of the ample historical materials with the local indications, that we can hope to arrive at a solution of the many difficult problems connected with the topography of ancient Jerusalem. Much has already been done, but there are still no satisfactory data for the determination of some of the most important points at issue. It is true that we now know within very narrow limits the position of the Tower Hippicus, and the course of the walls leading thence eastward to the Temple enclosure, and southward above the Valley of Hinnom. But the sites of the Temple, of the Tombs of the Kings, and of the Tower Psephinus, as well as the courses of the second and third walls, and of the first wall above Siloam, are still uncertain, and will remain so until the excavations carried out by Sir C. Warren* for the Palestine Exploration Fund are resumed.

Numerous attempts have been made to solve the disputed questions, but so uncertain are the data available that the views advanced differ widely from each other in many essential features. The two sites of greatest interest are those of the Temple, and of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The Temple, according to Messrs. Fergusson, Thrupp and Lewin, Prof. Robertson Smith, and others, occupied a square of about 600 ft. at the S.W. angle of the Haram esh-Sherif, and this is the view adopted in the present article. On the other hand, Dr. Robinson, Rev. G. Williams, Sir C. Warren, Major Conder, and all French and German authorities, maintain that it was near the centre of that enclosure. Four distinct views have been advanced with regard to the site of the Holy Sepulchre.

1. The first of these theories is the most obvious, and has at all events the great merit of simplicity. It consists in the belief that all the sacred localities were correctly ascertained in the early ages of Christianity; and, what is still more important, that none have been changed during the dark ages that followed, or in the numerous revolutions to which the city has been exposed: consequently inferring that all which the traditions of the Middle Ages have handed down to us may be implicitly relied upon. The advantages of this theory are so manifest, that it is little wonder that it should be so popular and find so many advocates.

The first person who ventured publicly to express his dissent from this view was Korte, a German printer, who travelled in Palestine about the year 1728. On visiting Jerusalem, he was struck with the apparent impossibility of reconciling the site of the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre with the exigencies of the Bible narrative, and on his return home he published a work denying the authenticity of the so-called sacred localities. His heresies excited very little attention at the time, or for long afterwards; but the spirit of enquiry which has sprung up during the present century has revived the controversy which has so long been dormant, and many pious and earnest men, both Protestant and Catholic, have expressed with more or less distinctness the difficulties they feel in reconciling the assumed localities with the indications in the Bible. The arguments in favour of the present localities being the correct ones, were well summed up by the Rev. George Williams in his work on the Holy City, and with the assistance of Professor Willis all was said that could be urged in favour of their authenticity. The admitted difficulties of the case were explained with great ingenuity; but no new facts were brought forward to counter-balance the significance of those urged on the other side.

2. Dr. Robinson, on the other hand, in his elaborate works on Palestine, brought together all the arguments which existed in his day against the authenticity of the mediæval sites and traditions. The result of his researches was the conclusion that the site of the Holy Sepulchre was now, and must in all probability for ever remain, a mystery. The effect was, that those who were opposed to his views clung all the more firmly to those they before entertained, preferring a site and a sepulchre which had been hallowed by the tradition of ages rather than launch forth on the shoreless sea of speculation which Dr. Robinson's negative conclusion opened out before them.

3. The third theory is that which was put forward by Mr. James Fergusson.* It agrees generally with the views urged by all those, from Korte to Robinson, who doubt the authenticity of the present site of the sepulchre; but instead of acquiescing in the view taken by the latter, it goes on to assert, that the building within the Haram esh-Sherif, known as the Kubbet es-Sakhrah, "Dome of the Rock," is the identical church which Constantine erected over the Rock that contained the Tomb of Christ; and that the site of the Holy Sepulchre was transferred from the eastern to the western hill after the death of el-Hakem in the first half of the 11th century. Mr. Fergusson supported his views by arguments drawn from the architectural details of the "Dome of the Rock," and his great reputation as a writer upon architecture gave them an importance which they would not otherwise have possessed. They were never received with much favour, and, when first enounced, gave rise to bitter controversy.

4. The fourth theory is that the site now occupied by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is that which Constantine believed to be the scene of Christ's Crucifixion and burial, and the one upon which he built his churches; but that the true site of the Crucifixion must be looked for outside the north wall of the modern city, either on the hill above "Jeremiah's Grotto," or on the hill to the east. The first of these views has been brought prominently to notice by Major Conder and the late General Gordon; the second, and perhaps the more correct view, is that which was held by Bishop Gobat of Jerusalem.

The most satisfactory way of investigating the subject will probably be to commence at the time of the greatest prosperity of Jerusalem, immediately before its downfall, which also happens to be the period when we have the greatest amount of knowledge regarding its features. If we can determine what was then its extent, and fix the more important localities at that period, there will be no great difficulty in ascertaining the proper sites for the events which may have happened either before or after. All that now remains of the ancient city of course existed then; and the descriptions of Josephus, in so far as they are to be trusted, apply to the city as he then saw it; so that the evidence is at that period more complete and satisfactory than at any other time, and the city itself being then at its greatest extent, it necessarily included all that existed either before or afterwards.

It will not be necessary here to dwell upon the much disputed point of the veracity of the historian on whose testimony we must principally rely in this matter. It will be sufficient to remark that every new discovery, every improved plan that has been made, has served more and more to confirm the testimony of Josephus, and to give a higher idea of the accuracy of his local knowledge. In no one instance has he yet been convicted of any material error in describing localities in plan. Many difficulties which were thought at one time to be insuperable have disappeared with a more careful investigation of the data; and now that the city has been carefully mapped[†] and partially explored by excavation, there seems a greater probability of our being able to reconcile all his descriptions with the appearance of the existing localities. So much indeed is this the case that one cannot help suspecting that, though writing at Rome, Josephus had before him data which checked and guided him in all that he said as to horizontal dimensions. This becomes more probable when we consider how moderate all these are, and how consistent with existing remains, and compare them with his exaggerated statements whenever he speaks of heights or describes the arrangement of buildings which had been destroyed in the siege, and of which it may be supposed no record or correct description then existed. He seems to have felt himself at liberty to indulge his national vanity in respect to these, but to have been checked when speaking of what still existed, and could never be falsified. The consequence is, that in almost all instances we may rely on anything he says with regard to the plan of Jerusalem, and as to anything that existed or could be tested at the time he wrote, but must receive with the greatest caution any assertion with regard to what did not then remain, or respecting which no accurate evidence could be adduced to refute his statement.

In attempting to follow the description of Josephus it is necessary, in the first place, to consider how far his remarks on the topographical features are in accordance with local indications; and in the next to fix the positions of the Temple and the Tower Hippicus.

1. Topography.—Jerusalem stands, as already stated (p. 1585), on the southern extremity of a small plateau which is intersected by two ravines, and almost encircled by the valleys of the Kedron and of Hinnom. Within the limits of the city walls the ravines are almost filled with, and their slopes, where not precipitous, are completely covered by, the ruins of ancient Jerusalem; whilst, even at the higher levels, the rubbish has in places accumulated to a height of more than 30 feet. The natural features of the ground are thus partially concealed; and their true forms and relative importance to each other can only be ascertained by excavation. Thus far excavation has thrown much light on the character of the larger features; but the original form of the ground is still undetermined at several important points, and little is yet known of those minor features which must have influenced the trace of the fortifications, the selection of sites for important buildings, and the direction of the streets.⁴ The most marked feature of the Jerusalem plateau is the ravine, the larger of the two, which breaks it up into two spurs of unequal size. The western spur is broad-backed, and much straighter and higher than the eastern spur,—a narrow rocky ridge, with steep almost precipitous sides,—which sweeps round in a bold curve (Joseph. ἀμφικύρτος) facing the west. The ravine itself rises as a broad shallow depression outside the Damascus Gate, and, gradually contracting as it descends, runs in a south-east direction to Wilson's Arch. Hereabouts it is joined by a small ravine⁵ or gully, which, rising near the Jaffa Gate on the west, indicates very clearly the line of the first or old wall, and the limits of that portion of the western hill called by Josephus "the Upper Market Place." A little below Wilson's Arch the ravine changes its direction to the south, and falls rapidly to its junction with the Kedron Valley below the Pool of Siloam. It was this well-marked topographical feature, and not the little gully running down from the Jaffa Gate, which Josephus had in his mind when he wrote (B. J. v. 4, § 1) that Jerusalem "was built on two hills opposite to one another, but divided in the middle by a ravine"; and that this ravine, called the Tyropoeon, extended as far as Siloam, and "separated the hill of the Upper City from that of the Lower." Of these hills he writes (see Plate II. and Plan No. 2, sections 1, 2, 3, p. 1637) that externally, except on the north, they were bounded by inaccessible ravines, and that the one which "contained the Upper City was much higher, and in length more direct," whilst the other, "which was called Acra, and supported the Lower City, was curved like the moon in her third quarter" (ἀμφικύρτος). The language could scarcely be more precise. The second ravine rises in the eastern half of the plateau, to the N. of "Jeremiah's Grotto," and pursuing a S.E. course enters the Valley of the Kedron to the north of the Golden Gate. This ravine, of which the exact form has not yet been ascertained, is apparently the "Valley called Kedron" (τὴν Κεδρώνα καλουμένην φάραγγα), which is mentioned by Josephus as having, with the Temple and Ophla, been occupied during the Roman siege by John, and which must therefore have been within the walls (B. J. v. 6, § 1); as the point at which the wall of Agrippa joined the old wall (4, § 2); and as being below the N.E. angle of the Temple cloisters (vi. 3, § 2).

The western hill or spur is divided into two parts, which differ somewhat in character, by the gully running eastward from the Jaffa Gate. The ground south of the gully falls abruptly on the W. and S. to the Valley of Hinnom, and on these sides the hill was made practically inaccessible by cutting the rock vertically downwards so as to leave cliffs or scarps with here and there narrow flights of rock-hewn steps. On the east side there is a natural cliff, and at its foot, bordering the Tyropoeon Valley, lies a strip of comparatively level ground. Above the cliff stood the Palace of the Asmoneans, in which Agrippa lived (B. J. ii. 16, § 3; 17, § 5); and along its edge, perhaps, ran a wall for the defence of the Upper City. On the lower ground at the foot of the cliff, possibly the Parbar of 1 Ch. xxvi. 18 and "the suburbs" of Josephus (Ant. xv. 11, § 5), was the Xystus (B. J. ii. 16, § 3; v. 4, § 2; vi. 6, § 2). On the north side lay the gully, which was apparently rugged and deep towards the east, and connected with the Valley of Hinnom, on the west, by a rock-hewn ditch, which is now, in part, represented by the ditch of the citadel near the Jaffa Gate. This portion of the western hill was thus protected on all sides by natural or artificial scarps of rock, and it was, as Josephus correctly states (B. J. vi. 8, § 1), "so precipitous that it could not possibly be taken without raising earthworks." The ground immediately to the north of the gully falls sharply, but not abruptly, to the Valley of Hinnom on the west, and more gradually towards the Tyropoeon Valley on the east; its form is that of a small spur projecting eastward between the gully and the Tyropoeon. Near the middle of the spur stands the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; and some authorities maintain that at its eastern extremity there was at one time a large knoll, or mamelon, upon which the Macedonian Acra was built. There is, however, no conclusive evidence of the existence of a knoll at this spot, and the lower portion of the spur would rather seem to be the "third hill," which, according to Josephus (B. J. v. 4, § 1), was opposite to (ἀντικεῖν), but naturally lower than Acra, and formerly parted from it by a broad valley. This valley, filled up by the Asmoneans when they levelled the Acra, is apparently that part of the Tyropeon immediately west of the Bab en-Názir of the Haram. The high ground to the west, between the Jaffa Gate and Ka'at Jafúd, is called by Josephus (B. J. ii. 19, § 4) "the Upper City," whilst the lower ground to the east, or "third hill," was probably occupied by "the other city,"* to which one of the gates of the Temple enclosure led (Ant. xv. 11, § 5). All the higher ground of the western hill was thus called "the Upper City," whilst the lower slopes were known on the S. as "the suburbs," and on the N. as "the third hill." At Ka'at Jafúd the wall is protected by a shallow rock-hewn ditch which runs eastward towards the Damascus Gate, and southwards towards the Jaffa Gate; but it is evident, as indeed may be inferred from Josephus, that the defences on this side of the city were weak, and not to be compared with those of the "Upper Market Place" to the south.

The eastern hill runs in a S.E. direction from the knoll above "Jeremiah's Grotto" to the Triple Gate of the Haram, and thence southerly to its termination near the Pool of Siloam. Its crest was originally continuous, but the rock has been cut away in several places, and this has given an appearance of prominence and isolation to certain points, such as the Sakhrah, which they did not at one time possess. On the east the ground falls abruptly to the "Valley called Kedron," and to the Kedron itself, and on the west it falls no less steeply to the Tyropeon; whilst on the south, in the vicinity of Siloam, the rock has apparently been scarped for purposes of defence. The exact form of the hill, however, is not known at several important points, and this is more especially the case where the features are concealed by the massive masonry of the sacred enclosure of the Muslims,—the Haram esh-Sherif. Between "Jeremiah's Grotto," on the north, and the city wall there is a broad and deep rock-hewn ditch, which is connected with and originally formed part of the extensive subterranean quarries known as the "Cotton Grotto," and called by Josephus (B. J. v. 4, § 2) "the Royal caverns" (Plan No. 2, section 2). To the south of the ditch lies that part of the hill named Bezetha, which extends southwards to the "Ecce Homo Arch," where the continuity of the ridge is again broken by the rock-hewn ditch that separated Bezetha from the Castle of Antonia. About 90 ft. south of this ditch the rock has been cut away to a depth of some 23 ft., leaving an isolated mass of rock upon which the Turkish Barracks now stand. Further south there are traces of a third ditch, which was cut across the ridge at its narrowest point, and is perhaps alluded to by Josephus in his account of the attack upon the Temple by

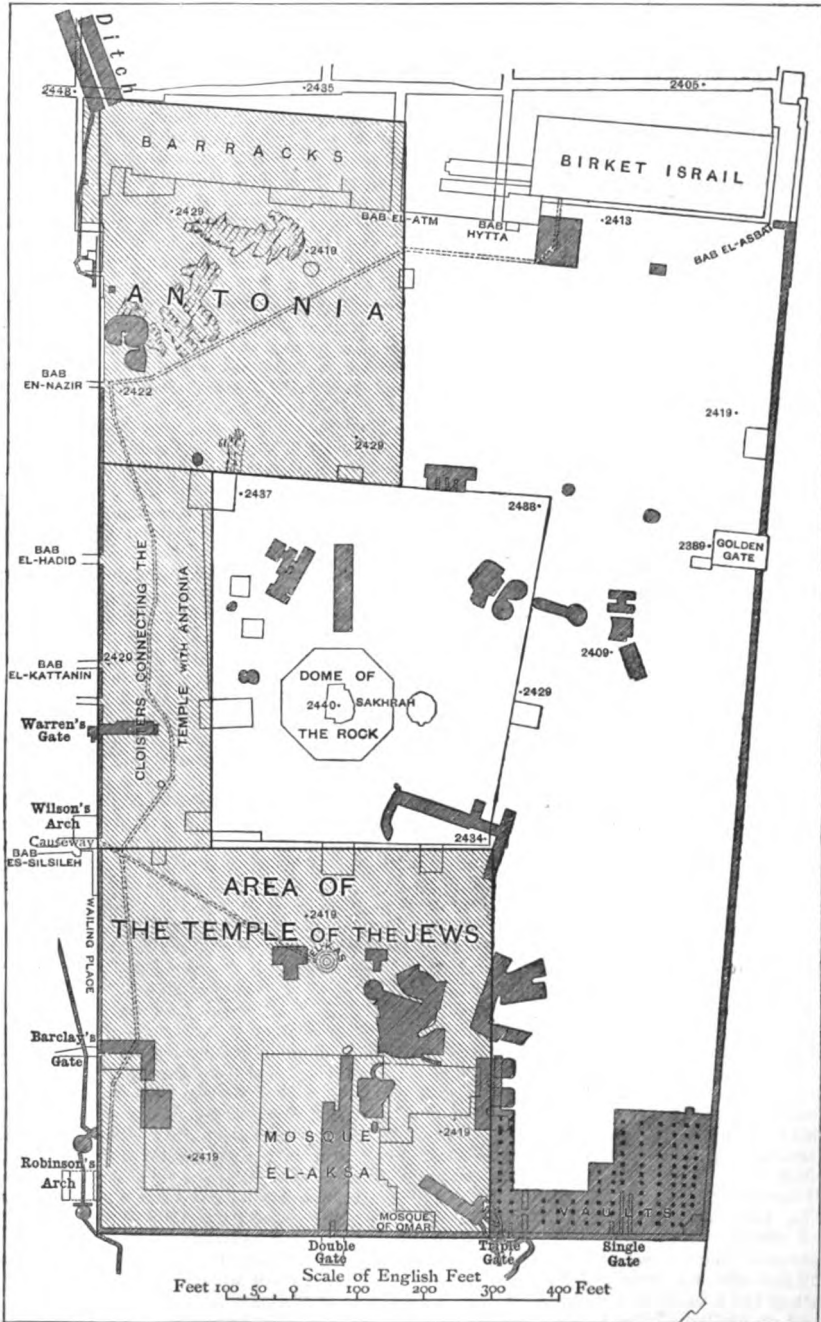

* Probably so called because it lay between the second and the first walls, and formed a separate quarter of the city.

Pompey (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2; B. J. i. 7, § 2). The space between the second and third ditches was occupied by the Macedonian Acra, and later by the Castle of Antonia. About 600 ft., or, according to some views, directly south of the third ditch, lay the Temple, and beyond its southern cloisters the hill was thickly covered with houses as far as Siloam. The position of Bezetha, which Josephus calls "the fourth hill" of Jerusalem, is clearly defined. It was opposite to the Castle of Antonia, and separated from it by a rock-hewn ditch; the Antonia lay between it and the Temple, and it was the highest of all the hills, and the only one that shut out the view of the Temple from the north (B. J. ii. 15, § 5; 19, § 4; v. 4, § 2; 5, § 8). This description can only apply to the northern part of the eastern hill; it would appear, however, that in a wider sense Bezetha was held to include the quarter called Coenopolis or "New Town," enclosed by the wall of Agrippa, which spread beyond the limits of the hill. Acra is the name given by Josephus (B. J. i. 1, § 4; v. 4, § 1; 6, § 1) to the hill upon which the Lower City was built; and it was no doubt so called from the Macedonian fortress (Acra) which stood upon it, in close proximity to the Temple (Ant. xii. 5, § 4). The hill was gibbous in form, and separated from the Upper City by a valley which reached as far as Siloam,—a description that applies perfectly to the eastern hill (see Plate II.). Although the term Acra included that portion of the hill upon which the Macedonian fortress and the Temple stood, it was more especially applied to the quarter of the city lying between the Temple cloisters and Siloam (B. J. v. 6, § 1; vi. 6, § 3; 7, § 2). Josephus may possibly include the low-lying ground, elsewhere called "the suburbs," within the limits of the Lower City; but there is no single instance in which he speaks of that portion of the city which occupied the "third" hill, and lay between the second and first walls, as Acra, or the Lower City.

The hill to the east of the "Valley called Kedron," on which the Church of St. Anne now stands, is not mentioned by Josephus. It can never have been of much importance, and the wall was apparently extended in this direction for the protection of the two large pools in the valley, and not with the object of enclosing the hill.

2. Site of the Temple.—Without any exception all topographers are agreed that the Temple stood within the limits of the great enclosure now known as the Haram esh-Sherif, though few are agreed as to the portion of that space which it covered. It is certain that the Holy House and Altar in the times of Zerubbabel and Herod occupied the site of the Temple and altar of Solomon (Joseph. Ant. xi. 4, § 1; Maimonides, Beth Hab. ii. 2); and that if the position of the outer court of the Temple, as rebuilt by Herod, could be determined, there would be no difficulty in fixing, within narrow limits, the sites of the original Temple and Altar of the Jews. Of Herod's Temple there are two independent descriptions: one in the works of Josephus, the other in the treatise Middoth. There are also remains of Herodian and, perhaps, of older masonry in the retaining walls of the Haram, and many rock-hewn tanks and conduits. Josephus, who was personally familiar with the Temple and its precincts, treats fully of the arrangement and dimensions of the several courts and buildings. In so far as the plan of the Temple is concerned, he appears to be singularly accurate; but when he has to describe elevation, he shows a marked tendency to exaggeration. The writers of the Mishna made a special study of the Temple measurements, and quote the recollections of men who had taken part, as Levites, in the Temple services. But they wrote long after the fall of Jerusalem; none of them had seen the Temple, and their description of it, in the Middoth, is less full in several particulars than that of the Jewish historian. They may be more accurate in matters of detail, such as the height and breadth of steps; but in all that relates to the general arrangement and external dimensions of the sacred buildings, their evidence cannot have the same weight as the direct testimony of Josephus.

* The omission of any allusion to Acra, or to the Lower City, in the account of the capture of the second wall, and the events which immediately followed it, is inexplicable if Acra were in the position assigned to it by some authorities.

The Haram esh-Sherif (Plan No. 1) is a quadrangular enclosure, with walls of massive masonry, within which lies the central portion of the eastern hill. The sides are unequal, but two of the angles, at the S.W. and N.E. corners, are right angles. The west side measures 1590 feet, the east 1525 feet, the south 921 feet, and the north 1036 feet. The included area is about 35 acres. The surface has been roughly levelled, partly by filling up hollows, partly by cutting away the rock, and partly by building supporting vaults of masonry. The general level is 2,419 feet above the Mediterranean; but in front of the Golden Gate there is a deep hollow; and in the centre there is a raised platform, above which the Sakhrah rises to an altitude of 2,440 feet. The crest of the hill runs southward across the Haram from a point about 60 feet east of the N.W. angle, where its altitude is 2,462 feet, to the Triple Gate in the south wall, where it has an altitude of 2,378 feet. If the hill were stripped of the maak that conceals it, and restored to its original form, it would appear as a ridge of bare rock, with abrupt slopes on either side. The narrowest point would be a little east of Bab en-Nazir, and the broadest part that covered by the platform. At the N.W. corner of the Haram the rock has been cut away so as to leave a scarp 23 feet high beneath the Turkish Barracks, and the upper strata have been completely removed as far as the raised platform. This excavation is no doubt that made by the Asmoneans, when they levelled the hill upon which the Acra stood (Ant. xiii. 6, § 7). About 90 feet north of the scarp is the ditch, 165 feet wide, that separated Antonia from Bezetha; and 280 feet south of it, where the ridge is narrowest, there appears to have been a ditch, 153 feet wide, which may possibly have formed part of the defences of the Acra, and have been filled up by Herod when he built the Castle of Antonia.

The raised platform probably dates from the erection of the "Dome of the Rock," above the Sakhrah, as it was evidently designed to give additional importance to that building. It is quadrilateral in form, and has unequal sides. Its surface is from 15 feet to 19 feet above the general level, and its area is about $5\frac{1}{2}$ acres. The rock is visible on the surface at the N.W. corner, and the Sakhrah, which is a portion of the ridge, rises 4 feet 9 inches above the platform. The length of the Sakhrah is about 56 feet, and its breadth about 40 feet; and beneath it is a small cave, under the floor of which, according to Muslim tradition, there is a well, the Br el-Arwah, or "Well of the Spirits." The "Dome of the Rock" is generally considered to be the work of the Khalif Abd ul-Melik; but it seems rather to be the "Church of St. Sophia" which, in the 6th century, stood upon the supposed site of the Prætorium (Ant. Mart. xxiii.; Theodosius, vii.; Brev. de Hierosol.). Possibly the church was built at the close of the 5th or commencement of the 6th century, and was restored and turned into a mosque in the 7th century, when Abd ul-Melik enlarged the precincts of the Muslim sanctuary, and brought the Sakhrah within its limits (Eutyh. An. ii. 365).

The N.E. corner of the Haram has been formed by filling up a deep ravine, "the ravine called Kedron" of Josephus (B. J. v. 4, § 2; 6, § 1; vi. 3, § 2), which here crosses the enclosure. There are several indications, such as the accumulation of rubbish on the N. side of the Golden Gate, that the ravine was wholly or partially filled up at a comparatively recent date—perhaps by El-Walid, son of Abd ul-Melik, when he enlarged the Haram so as to bring the Sakhrah into the centre of the sacred area (Eutyh. An. ii. 373). The bed of the ravine is 144 feet below the present surface, and its sides must be steep and rocky. The S.W. corner is also made ground, and its surface is from 82 feet to 129 feet above the bed of the Tyropeean valley which runs beneath it. Here there is every reason to believe that the hollow space was filled up solidly when Herod enlarged the Temple enclosure. At the S.E. corner, on the other hand, the ground is supported by a series of weak vaults of masonry, which may possibly be as old as the time of Justinian. Amongst the most remarkable features of the Haram are the rock-hewn cisterns in which the water required for the Temple services was stored. They are from 25 feet to 50 feet deep, and it is estimated that more than twelve million gallons of water could be stored in them. The largest, called the "Great Sea," would hold between two and three million gallons. The cisterns were supplied by the aqueduct from Solomon's Pools, which crossed the Tyropeean Valley on the causeway, and then ran in a S.E. direction towards the fountain El-Kas. The cisterns were connected with each other by conduits, and there was apparently an overflow beneath the Triple Gate. It may be remarked, as bearing upon the site of the Temple, that all the large rock-hewn cisterns except one are situated to the south of the raised platform.

The retaining walls of the Haram have a height of from 30 feet to 170 feet, and they are perhaps the finest examples of mural masonry in the world. Partially concealed as they are, here by 60 feet, there by 130 feet of rubbish, they still fill the traveller with admiration; and their great height and the magnificence of their masonry almost justify the glowing terms in which they are described by Josephus (Ant. xv. 11, §§ 1-5; B. J. v. 5, § 1). The stones are of great size,* and set so closely together that the blade of a pen-knife can hardly be inserted between them. Those of the older masonry have a chiselled draft round their margins, and their faces are either finely dressed, or, when not intended to be seen, left rough. The grey stones of to-day were originally white, and the massive masonry of the Temple platform, when fresh from the builder's hands, must, under the brilliant sun of Palestine, have presented a most imposing and dazzling appearance. The west wall (Plan No. 3, Elevation 6, p. 1642) has only been examined for 600 feet from the S.W. angle, but it is apparently of one building period throughout, and is probably the work of Herod. The architect conceived the bold scheme of extending the Temple area westward across the bed of the Tyropoeon; and, in laying the foundations of the massive retaining wall, he cut through an ancient rock-hewn conduit (p. 1591). The wall formed the western limit of the Temple enclosure and of the Antonia; and above the level of the Haram it appears to have been ornamented with pilasters similar to those of the wall of the Haram at Hebron.⁷ It also closed the west end of the ditch within the Haram, which was probably filled in when the wall was built. The remains of four ancient approaches to the enclosure have been discovered in connexion with the west wall—over "Robinson's Arch," through the passage from "Barclay's Gate," over the causeway and "Wilson's Arch," and through the passage from "Warren's Gate." The first and third must have been on a level with the outer court of the Temple; the second and fourth pierced the retaining wall at a lower level, and reached the surface by steps or a ramp. In the south wall (Plan No. 3, Section 4) the older masonry is of two, if not three, different periods. From the S.W. angle to the "Double Gate" it is probably Herodian; beyond this point it is marked by a course of stones of double height, and is supposed by Sir C. Warren to be the work of Solomon, but by others to be possibly as late as the reign of Justinian. The wall is pierced by two ancient gateways: the "Double Gate," which opens into a vestibule, whence a passage leads to the surface of the Haram; and the "Triple Gate," which, in its original form, was a double gate with a passage to the enclosure similar to that from the "Double Gate." Beneath the "Triple Gate" are rock-hewn passages through which the blood from the Altar and the overflow from the cisterns may have passed to the Kedron Valley (see Middoth, iii. 2).^a At the S.E. angle there appears to have been a massive tower, 108 feet square, of older date than the adjoining portions of the wall, and it was on the stones at the base of this tower that Sir C. Warren found the Phœnician letters which were considered by Mr. E. Deutsch to be "partly letters, partly numerals, and partly special mason's or quarry signs." At this point a small vase^b was found in a hole cut out of the rock, where it may possibly have been placed when the wall was built. The east wall (Plan No. 3, Elevation 5) has only been examined for 161 feet from the S.E. angle, and 179 feet from the N.E. angle; between these two points, or for a distance of 1185 feet, the masonry has nowhere been seen below the surface of the ground. There is, however, some reason to suppose that between the S.E. angle and a point 50 feet or 60 feet north of the Golden Gate the wall is older than it is to the north of the latter point. About 132 feet south of the N.E. angle the wall is carried across the bed of the "ravine called Kedron," and it is here 168 feet high. The only entrance to the Haram on the east side, of which traces remain, is the "Golden Gate,"^b—a Byzantine structure of uncertain date, which has been closed for several centuries. Its floor is from 30 feet to 40 feet above the natural surface of the ground, and it appears to have had in front of it a terrace whence there was a descent to the Kedron by steps. The north boundary of the Haram is formed partly by the rock-scarp at the N.W. angle, and partly by the wall, of unknown but presumably late date, that forms the southern side of the Birket Israil. The Haram esh-Sherif is thus girt on three sides by walls which, if entirely exposed to view, would

* The north side 616 feet, the south 419 feet, the west 552 feet, and the east 528 feet.

* One stone 38 ft. 9 in. long, 4 ft. high, and 10 ft. deep, has been built into the wall at a height of 85 ft. from the surface.

^a According to Rabbi Obadiah of Bartenora, the blood and water was sold to the gardeners for use as manure.

^b This vase is said by various authorities to be of "a common Græco-Phœnician type," to be possibly "as old as the 4th or 5th century B.C.," and to date from the period of the Jewish monarchy.

present unbroken faces of solid masonry from 920 feet to 1590 feet long, and, for a large portion of those distances, from 100 feet to 160 feet in height.* On the north side alone there is no imposing mass of masonry, but here, in the time of Josephus, lay the deep, rugged "ravine called Kedron," unfilled by the accumulations of centuries, and the great Castle of Antonia rising high above the surrounding buildings.

The difficulty experienced in fixing the exact position of the Temple (ιερόν) arises from the fact that it has completely disappeared,⁴—not one stone has been left upon another. The local indications have been so differently interpreted by the numerous writers on the subject, that it is maintained on the one hand that the Temple occupied the S.W. corner of the Haram, and on the other that it stood near the centre of the enclosure. Both views are surrounded by difficulties that can only be completely solved by excavation.

(1.) According to Josephus (Ant. xv. 11, § 3; B. J. vi. 5, § 4) and the Mishna (Middoth, ii. 1), the Temple was a square, and the only right angles in the ancient masonry of the Haram are the S.W. and N.E. angles. The masonry of the S.W. angle, and of the wall for some distance to the north and east, is generally admitted to be Herodian, and it must have formed part of the west and south walls of the Temple enclosure. If the Temple was in the centre of the Haram, Herod's object in building this massive wall at great cost and labour, and in the face of considerable engineering difficulties, is not clear; but it is easily explained on the supposition that the Temple (ναός) stood near the S.W. angle, and that he could not otherwise obtain a firm foundation for the cloisters that he added on its west and south sides. Josephus states directly and indirectly that each side of the Temple was a stadium (Ant. xv. 11, §§ 3, 5), or 400 cubits (Ant. xx. 9, § 7). Now 588 feet east of the S.W. angle is the "Triple Gate," where the ground commences to fall rapidly towards the east, and the solid character of the area gives place to a series of vaults erected in comparatively recent times (Plan No. 3, Section 4); and 586 feet north of the same point is "Wilson's Arch," which marks the position of one of the principal approaches to the Temple. These dimensions differ, it is true, from a stadium; but it is impossible to suppose, as some contend, that the statement of Josephus refers to the whole Haram area, which is approximately $1\frac{1}{2}$ stadia wide and $2\frac{3}{4}$ long. Further, Josephus mentions (Ant. xv. 11, § 5) that on the south front of the Temple stood the Royal Cloister, Stoa Basilica, with three aisles, which reached "from the east valley unto that on the west, for it was impossible it should reach any further" (westward). This cloister was 1 stadium long, and had "pillars that stood in four rows, one over against the other all along;" the number of pillars was 162, and their capitals were of the Corinthian order. The breadth of each side aisle was 30 feet, and of the central aisle 45 feet; and these dimensions agree very closely with the position and width of "Robinson's Arch," which must have led to the central aisle. It is quite certain that the Stoa terminated at the "Triple Gate," for, as shown in the annexed diagram, it could never have extended over the weak, irregularly spaced vaults at the S.E. angle of the Haram. "Had it done so, some piers or foundations must have remained to indicate how it was supported, but there is absolutely nothing." It may convey some idea of the dimensions of this the most remarkable feature of Herod's Temple, "if we compare it with under pain of death, to pass the balustrade (επιφρακτος) round the Temple (ιερόν), which was discovered by M. Clermont-Ganneau in 1871 (Une stèle du Temple de Jérusalem; PEFQy. Stat. 1871, p. 132). This inscription affords strong evidence of the general accuracy of Josephus.

York, the largest of our English cathedrals. If the transepts of that church were removed from the centre and added to the ends, we should have a building of about the same length, and nearly also of the same section, and, barring the style, not differing much in material and construction" (Fergusson, Temples of the Jews, pp. 75, 83). Again, Josephus states (Ant. xv. 11, § 5) that on the west side of the enclosure there were four gates, and this agrees with the existing remains. The first gate, which "led to the king's palace, and went to a passage over the intermediate valley," must have been above Wilson's Arch, which connects the Haram with the remains of the old causeway across the valley (Plan No. 2, Section 3). The road from Herod's palace, now represented by "David's Street," which passed over the causeway and bridge, must have been one of the principal approaches to the Temple; and the tradition that places the "Beautiful Gate" at the Bâb es-Sûleik, above Wilson's Arch, may perhaps be correct. This may also be the Gate Kipunus, the only entrance on the west side mentioned in the Mishna (Middoth, i. 3). Two other gates led to the suburbs, or Parbar, apparently the strip of low-lying and comparatively level ground which lay between the cliff of the Upper City and the wall of the Temple enclosure (Plan No. 2, Section 1; No. 3, Section 4). These gates are represented by Barclay's Gate, at the entrance of a subway leading, apparently, to the Court of the Gentiles; and the gate above Robinson's Arch, whence there was probably a descent to the valley, partly by a viaduct, and partly by steps or a ramp. The fourth gate leading "to the other city (εις την ἄλλην πόλιν), where the road descended down into the valley by a great number of steps, and thence up again by the ascent," was apparently Warren's Gate, through which the "other city" lying between the causeway and the second wall could be easily reached from the cloisters connecting Antonia with the Temple. The south front of the Temple, Josephus says, had "gates at about the middle," and these still exist as the "Double Gate," from which a double passage leads up to the Haram area by a gentle incline. It is certain that the Double Gate and the vestibule within are really parts of the substructures of the Stoa Basilica which Herod added to the Temple, and they probably represent the Gate Huldah, which led direct to the Water Gate of the Inner Temple, and thence to the Altar (Middoth, i. 3, 4; Lightfoot, p. 350). If, as the Mishna seems to indicate, there were two Huldah or "Mole" Gates* in the south wall, the second must have been at the Triple Gate, whence a passage leads upwards at an angle that would have brought it to the surface in front of the central point of the eastern cloister of the Temple. The gates Shushan in the east and Tadi in the north wall (Middoth, i. 3) are not mentioned by Josephus, possibly because they did not lead to the inhabited quarters of the city.

The south-west corner of the Haram has a perfectly level surface, and is solid throughout except where pierced by gateways, and where hollowed out into cisterns such as are known to have existed beneath the Temple courts (Water Supply, p. 1591). A large proportion of it is made ground, and within its limits are nearly all the large cisterns. This agrees with the description which Josephus gives (Ant. viii. 3, § 9; xv. 11, § 3; B. J. v. 5, § 1) of the construction of the Temple platform; and the statement in the Mishna (Parah, iii. 3), that "the mountain of the house and the courts were hollow underneath," lest there should be a hidden grave beneath. Josephus also writes (B. J. v. 3, § 1) of the "subterranean caverns of the Temple."

The Temple was connected with the Upper City by a bridge, which also led to the Xystus (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2;—B. J. i. 7, § 2; ii. 16, § 3; vi. 6, § 2), at or close to the point at which the first wall joined the western cloister (B. J. v. 4, § 2). This bridge must have been that connecting the Temple with the causeway at Wilson's Arch, where the first wall ended, and the Xystus was apparently commensurate with the west side of the Temple.

It may be inferred from the absence of any indication in Josephus that the Antonia, which stood on a higher level than the Temple, ever served as a vantage-ground for the discharge of missiles against the defenders of the Temple cloisters, that the Castle and the Temple were at least a bow-shot distant from each other. It would also appear (B. J. i. 7, § 4) that, at the time of Pompey's siege, there was an interval of open ground between the Temple and the north wall of the enclosure, which, at that time, seems to have run along the north side of the platform on which the "Dome of the Jews' walling place.

Rock" stands, and above the "Valley called Kedron" (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2; B. J. i. 7, § 3). Josephus, moreover, states (Ant. xx. 8, § 11) that the Jews erected a high wall upon the eschedra of the west wall of the inner Temple, to shut out the view of the sacrifices from Agrippa's palace, on the brow of the western hill; and it may be added that the aqueduct from "Solomon's Pools," which passes over the causeway to the Haram,

* According to Lightfoot (l. 1054), the Huldah Gates were so placed as to be at equal distances from each other and from the two ends of the walls. This is only approximately correct of the Double and Triple Gates, which divide the south wall of the Haram into three sections, respectively 352 feet, 256 feet, and 312 feet.

runs towards the S.E. after its entrance. All that has been said above is in favour of the position assigned to the Temple at the S.W. angle; and it may be remarked that, in this case, the present "Wailing Place" of the Jews would be opposite to the site of the Holy of Holies, and in closer proximity to it than any other spot outside the enclosure.

The earlier pilgrims mention the site of the Temple without distinct reference to its position; but it may be inferred from Antoninus (xxiii.) that the "Dome of the Rock," which he identifies with the Prætorium, was not considered to be within the Temple area. It is known from Arculfus (i.) and Theophanes (Chron. 281) that the first Muslim mosque was built on what was pointed out to Omar as the site of the Temple, and from Eutychius (ii. 289) that that mosque lay to the south of the Sakhrah, "which was not embraced in the precincts of the Muslim sanctuary till the reign of Abd ul-Melik" (ii. 365). In accordance with this, is the modern Muslim tradition which points to the Mosque of Omar, above the south wall of Haram, as the spot where Omar first prayed.

According to the above view, the Temple enclosure occupied a square of about 588 feet in the S.W. corner of the Haram. On the west there were approaches over Wilson's and Robinson's Arches to the northern and southern cloisters, and through "Barclay's Gate" to the Court of the Gentiles. On the south there was an ascent from the old City of David to the Temple enclosure by the passage from the "Double Gate," and to the central gate of the eastern cloister by the ancient passage from the Triple Gate.^f It has been objected to this conclusion, that if the Temple were only 600 feet square, it would be impossible to find space within its walls for all the courts and buildings mentioned by Josephus and in the Talmud. This difficulty, however, has no real foundation in fact, and the mode in which the interior may have been arranged so as to meet all the exigencies of the case will be explained in treating of the TEMPLE. It has also been urged that the S.W. corner is the lowest part of the Haram; but it is nowhere stated that the Temple was built upon a mount or isolated eminence. Josephus says (B. J. v. 5, § 1) that it was erected upon a strong hill (ἐπὶ λόφου καρπεροῦ, where λόφος simply refers to the eastern hill, Moriah); and the Antonia certainly stood on higher ground (Ant. xiii. 16, § 5; xv. 11, § 4;—B. J. v. 5, § 8) and on the "top of the hill" (B. J. vi. 1, § 5). It is more important to notice that Josephus states that the eastern cloister of the outer court was situated in a deep valley (Ant. xx. 9, § 7), and (B. J. vi. 3, § 2) that the N.E. angle of the cloisters was above the "Valley called Kedron," apparently the ravine that crosses the N.E. angle of the Haram. These statements cannot easily be reconciled with the view that the Temple was at the S.W. corner of the Haram; unless we may suppose that Josephus refers here to the outer enclosure (Plate II.).

According to the Mishna (Middoth, ii. 1), the "mountain of the house" was 500 cubits by 500 cubits, but it is possible that these dimensions are due to a misconception of the statement of Ezekiel (xlii. 16–20), that the boundaries of the sanctuary were 500 reeds each way. It is further stated that "the mount was far larger than 500 cubits square, but only so much was taken in for the holy ground" (Pisk. Tesaph ad Midd. quoted by Lightfoot, i. 1050). The Temple, it is evident, only occupied a portion of the area enclosed by Herod. There was open ground upon which the people pitched their tents at the time of the Passover (Ant. xvii. 9, § 3); and even at an earlier period there was a "broad place," or open space, to the east of the Temple (2 Ch. xxix. 4, Ezra x. 9; cp. Ant. xi. 5, § 5), and in front of the Water Gate (Neh. viii. 1). Some portions of the enclosure appear to have been built over, as houses are mentioned in close proximity to the Temple (Ant. xiv. 4, § 2; 13, § 3;—B. J. i. 13, § 2; v. 1, § 4; cp. Ezek. xliii. 8); and the "Valley called Kedron," where the outcrop of the melekeh stratum must have offered great facilities for the excavation of tombs, was possibly used as a place of burial (B. J. v. 7, § 3).

(2.) The alternative view that the Temple was situated near the centre of the Haram, on the ground now covered by the platform of the "Dome of the Rock," is maintained by many authorities, but opinion differs widely as to the exact position that it occupied. Robinson, Thomson, Williams, Tobler, Furrer, Perrot, and Guérin place the Altar on the Sakhrah; Sepp and Conder identify the Sakhrah with the "stone of foundation"; and whilst De Vogüé places the Altar to the north of the Sakhrah, Warren places it to the south. It has been urged that, as the Temple courts descended in terraces round the Holy House, the Temple and Altar must have been on the top of the hill, and that the levels of the various courts, ascertained by the number of steps leading to them, can be brought into accordance with the actual levels of the rock in this part of the Haram, and nowhere else; that, from the description of the sacrifice of the red heifer (Mid. ii. 4), the Temple must have been opposite the summit of the Mount of Olives; that the Sakhrah is either the "stone of foundation" upon which the Ark rested (Yoma, v. 2), or the site of the Altar; that the cistern immediately north of the "Dome of the Rock" is part of the passage running under the Chel, from the Gate-house Moked to the Gate Tadi; and that Muslim tradition has always associated the Sakhrah with the sacred site of the Jews.

The principal objections to these arguments are that the Temple is nowhere stated to have been on the top of a hill, except possibly in Ezek. xliii. 12; that the rock being everywhere near the surface of the platform, there is ample space for the erection of a small building like the Temple without great foundations such as those indicated by Josephus (Ant. xv. 11, § 3; B. J. v. 5, § 1); that there is no such complete accordance between the levels of the several courts and the actual level of the rock as has been suggested;^a and that there is little trace in this part of the Haram of the substructures, vaults, cisterns, &c., which are said (Parah, iii. 3; Maimonides, Beth Hab. v. 1) to have existed beneath the Temple and its courts. The omission of any allusion by Josephus to such a remarkable work as the viaduct which is supposed to have connected Mount Moriah with the Mount of Olives is calculated to raise a doubt as to the accuracy of the description of the sacrifice of the red heifer; but, in any case, a building on the platform would not be more directly opposite the summit of the Mount of Olives, than one at the S.W. angle. The "stone of foundation" was not a portion of the rocky ridge of Moriah, but was a movable stone (פֶּתֶן), and it was so regarded by Jewish tradition;^b besides, the Holy of Holies, only 20 cubits square, could scarcely have included the Sakhrah, which is 56 feet long and 40 feet wide. There is no indication in Josephus or the Mishna that the Altar was erected over a cave such as that beneath the Sakhrah; and there is no evidence that the cistern, north of the "Dome of the Rock," was ever part of a subterranean passage. According to Professor Robertson Smith (Encyc. Brit. s.v. Temple) the first person to identify the Sakhrah with the "stone of foundation," or to associate it with the Temple, was the Muslim Jew Wahb ibn Monabbih, who enriched Islam with so many Jewish fables, and died a century after Jerusalem was taken by the Arabs (Tabari, p. 571; Ibn al-Fakih, p. 97). It may be added that if the Temple were on the platform it would have been within easy range of and completely commanded by the Castle of Antonia, and its situation with reference to the approaches to the enclosure from the south and west would have been awkward and inartistic.

^f The distance from the S.W. angle to the north side of "Wilson's Arch," and to the east side of the ancient passage from the "Triple Gate," is, in each case, 630 feet; and, if we may suppose the Temple to have been a square of 630 feet, the roadway over "Wilson's Arch" would have led directly to the northern cloister, and the passage from the "Triple Gate" would have risen to the surface near the centre of the eastern cloister.

3. Antonia.—The Tower or Castle (φρούριον) of Antonia, which replaced the citadel of the Asmoneans, was on the north side of the Temple, but did not cover the whole of it (Ant. xv. 11, § 4;—B. J. i. 5, § 4; 21, § 1; v. 7, § 3). It is more particularly defined as having been at the north-west corner of the Temple; and it was connected with the cloisters of the Temple by two parallel cloisters, called "limbs" or "legs," by which the Roman guards went down, fully armed, to their posts during the Jewish festivals. One of the two cloisters was a continuation of the western cloister of the Temple, and the demolition of both of them made the Temple a square (B. J. ii. 15, § 6; 16, § 5; v. 5, § 8; vi. 2, § 9; 5, § 4). The Antonia was near the Temple, but there was a certain space between them which was the scene of some hard fighting between the Jews and the Romans during the siege. The distance between the two buildings was greater than the effective range of the darts and stones thrown by the Roman engines of war; and it was possibly a stadium¹ (Ant. xv. 8, § 5; xviii. 4, § 3;—B. J. v. 5, § 2; vi. 2, §§ 5–7). The Castle was at a higher level than the Temple, and, being built on "the top of the hill," on a precipitous rock 50 cubits high, was very conspicuous (Ant. xiii. 16, § 5; xv. 11, § 4;—B. J. v. 5, § 8; vi. 1, § 5;—Acts xxi. 30–40; Tacitus, v. 11). It occupied the whole ridge so completely that the walls had to be partially thrown down before Titus could bring up his engines of war and attack the Temple; and it was generally regarded as the most important feature in the defences of the city (Ant. xv. 7, § 8;—B. J. ii. 15, §§ 5, 6; v. 5, § 8; vi. 2, §§ 1–7). It adjoined Bezetha, and the "New Town," from which it was separated by a deep ditch; was near the Pool Struthion, and was the point at which the second wall terminated (B. J. v. 4, § 2; 5, § 8; 11, § 4). The Antonia must have covered a large area. It is said to have resembled both "a city" and "a royal palace," and to have contained rooms, cloisters, places for bathing, and broad spaces for camps; and the Roman garrison of Jerusalem, an entire legion, was quartered in it. The Castle was rectangular in form, and at each angle there was a tower. The walls were 40 cubits high, whilst three of the towers were 50 cubits, and that at the S.E. corner, which appears to have been more particularly called the "Tower of Antonia," was 70 cubits high. The construction was similar to that of the still existing Tower of Phasaelus (Tower of David),—a sloping scarp of smooth stone surmounted by a breastwork, and behind the breastwork a chemin des rondes, and the solid masonry of the walls and towers. A secret subterranean passage led from the Castle to a tower over the eastern gate of the inner Temple (Ant. xv. 11, §§ 4, 7;—B. J. i. 21, § 1; v. 5, § 8).

The citadel (ἀκρόπολις) which Herod enlarged and named Antonia, in honour of Antony, was called by the Asmoneans the Baris. It was originally built by Hyrcanus, possibly on or near the site of the earlier "castle (Birah) that appertaineth to the house" (Neh. ii. 8, R. V.); and was used as a royal residence, and sometimes as a prison. The Baris was well fortified, and of extraordinary strength; and it was approached from the Temple side by the dark passage or gateway known as Strato's Tower,² in which Antigonus was killed. The vestments of the high-priest were kept in it; and this custom was continued in the later Antonia. Herod's object in enlarging and strengthening the old citadel was to "secure and guard the Temple"; and the greatest importance was afterwards attached, by friend and foe alike, to the possession of the new fortress (Ant. xiii. 11, § 2; xiv.

^a Isolated levels are taken to indicate the general level of the rock over large spaces hidden from view; and in the outer court the rock rises, in places, from 9 feet to 15 feet above the assumed level.

^b See the traditions as given by Dr. Chaplin in PEPQy. Stat. 1886, pp. 50, 51. There is no instance in which the term "Eben" is applied to solid rock, and the Eben Shithlah, "stone of foundation," may be compared with the "Ebena" mentioned in the Bible; though whether it stood upright, or lay on its face, is uncertain. It was possibly the lapis pertusus mentioned in the Ibn. Hirosol.

¹ The meaning of Josephus (B. J. v. 5, § 2) appears to be that the cloisters which enclosed the square of the Temple were four stadia, and that with the addition of the two cloisters joining the Temple to Antonia they were six stadia. The two connecting cloisters would therefore be a stadium each.

² It has been suggested (Imp. Bib. Dict., s.v. Jerusalem) that there was here an old tower called Ashoreth, or flock tower; and that "Ashoreth" was confounded with "Strato."

16, § 2; xv. 11, § 4; xviii. 4, § 3;—B. J. i. 3, § 3; 5, § 4).

The Antonia was certainly situated in the N.W. corner of the Haram area; but no trace of its foundations has yet been found, and the space that it occupied is unknown. Its western limit is defined by the line of the western wall, and its northern by the rock-hewn ditch that separated it from Bezetha; its southern and eastern limits must for the present remain conjectural.

4. The Acra (A. V. "stronghold," "fortress," "tower") was built or restored by Antiochus Epiphanes, c. B.C. 168-7, and was situated in the "Lower City," i.e. on the eastern hill, upon a rocky height that was afterwards cut down and levelled (1 Macc. i. 33; Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, § 4; xiii. 6, § 7). It was in close proximity to and overlooked the Temple (1 Macc. iv. 41, xiii. 52; Ant. xii. 5, § 4; 9, § 3; 10, § 5); and was within the limits of the "City of David" (1 Macc. i. 33; xiv. 36; vii. 32: cp. Ant. xii. 10, § 4). Its walls and towers were originally great and strong (1 Macc. i. 33; Ant. xii. 5, § 4); and they were afterwards specially strengthened by Bacchides (1 Macc. ix. 52; Ant. xiii. 1, § 3). The Acra, until it was destroyed by Simon Maccabaeus, was regarded as the Citadel or Acropolis of Jerusalem (1 Macc. vi. 26, ix. 53, x. 32, xi. 41; Ant. xii. 6, § 2; xiii. 2, § 1); and it is frequently mentioned, often in connexion with the Temple, in the history of the wars of the Maccabees (1 Macc. iii. 45; iv. 2; vi. 18, 24-27, 32; ix. 52, 53; x. 6, 7, 9, 32; xi. 20, 21, 23, 41; xii. 36; xiii. 49, 50, 52; xiv. 7, 36; 2 Macc. xv. 31-35). The gymnasium built by Antiochus Epiphanes was "under the Acra" (2 Macc. iv. 12; cp. 1 Macc. i. 14; Ant. xii. 5, § 1); and it was apparently in the same locality that Jonathan Maccabaeus afterwards built a wall or mound to shut off the Macedonian garrison in the Acra from the market-place (ἀγορά) in the city (1 Macc. xii. 36; Ant. xiii. 5, § 11).

With very few exceptions¹ writers on the topography of Jerusalem place the Acra in the N.W. corner of the Haram, where there is abundant evidence of the levelling operations of Simon Maccabaeus (Ant. xiii. 6, § 7). This position, strong by nature and improved by art, was, prior to the construction of the Acra, occupied by a fortress which is described by Aristæus as standing on a commanding eminence to the N. of the Temple, fortified with towers to the summit of the hill, and constructed with enormous stones (Williams, Holy City, i. 73, 74); and this fortress again was probably built on the foundations of the citadel of Pre-Exilic Jerusalem, and of the Acropolis of the Jebusites.² After the destruction of the Acra, Simon Maccabaeus fortified the "hill of the Temple" near it, and there "dwelt with his company" (1 Macc.

xiii. 52). At a later date, Hyrcanus built the Baris, near the Temple, and made it his place of residence (Ant. xviii. 4, § 3). The Baris is called by Josephus the fortress (τὸ φρούριον) that was above the Temple (Ant. xiii. 16, § 5), and the Acropolis (xiv. 1, § 2; xv. 11, § 4); and after its reconstruction by Herod, it received the name of Antonia.

The view suggested is that the Acropolis of the Jebusites was situated at the N.W. corner of the Haram, and that it was enlarged and strengthened by David and his successors. After the return from the Captivity the citadel was rebuilt in the form in which it was seen by Aristæus, and it was afterwards more strongly fortified by Antiochus Epiphanes. When the Macedonians were finally expelled from Jerusalem, Simon Maccabaeus demolished the citadel and cut away the higher part of the ridge on which it stood. At the same time he built a new, or restored an existing, wall (Ant. xiii. 6, § 4) that ran along the northern end of the platform of the "Dome of the Rock" (Ant. xiv. 4, §§ 1, 2; B. J. i. 7, §§ 1, 3, 4), and protected it by towers, in one of which he lived (1 Macc. xiii. 52). During the prosperous reign of Hyrcanus a portion of the site of the Acra was re-occupied and the Baris built, and in this condition the defences on the N. side of the Temple remained until they were remodelled by Herod. That king threw down the wall erected by Simon, filled up the ditch to the north of the platform, built the west wall of the Haram, and included the north-west corner of the Haram within the walls of the Castle of Antonia, which thus formed part of the Temple precincts. It may be observed that until the reign of Herod only one citadel, that on the eastern hill, is mentioned in connexion with Jerusalem; but after the erection of the three towers and the palace, near the Jaffa Gate, a distinction is made between the citadel belonging to the city and that belonging to the Temple (Ant. xv. 7, § 8; B. J. ii. 3, § 1). The latter—the Antonia—was always occupied by the garrison of Jerusalem; the only soldiers in Herod's palace and the towers were those forming the guard of the Procurator or Roman governor.

5. Hippicus.—The position of the Tower Hippicus—the point at which Josephus commences his description of the fortifications of Jerusalem (B. J. v. 4, §§ 1, 2)—is a question of great importance, and one fortunately to which there can be but one answer. It was close to the Jaffa Gate, and its site is now occupied by one of the towers of the citadel. Hippicus³ was one of the three royal towers (B. J. ii. 17, § 8)—the others being Phasaelus and Mariamne—which Herod built in connexion with his palace, and together they formed the citadel (τὸ φρούριον) of the western hill (B. J. ii. 3, § 2; v. 5, § 8). The towers stood in the line of the old wall that ran along the northern face of that portion of the western hill which is called by

² Warren, Underground Jerusalem, p. 54, and Conder, Hbk. to Bible, p. 346, place the Acra on a presumed knoll between the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the Tyropoeon Valley.

Josephus the "Upper Market Place;" and adjoining them, on the south, was the Royal Palace (B. J. v. 4, § 4). They were built with great magnificence, and were "for largeness, beauty, and strength, beyond all that were in the habitable earth" (v. 4, § 3). Hippicus was 25 cubits square and 80 cubits high; Phasaelus was 40 cubits square and 90 cubits high, and resembled in appearance the Pharos at Alexandria (Ant. xvi. 5, § 2); and Mariamne was 20 cubits square and 50 cubits high. The stones used in their construction were of great size, and so perfect was the masonry that the joints between the stones were scarcely visible, and each tower looked like a mass of rock fashioned by the hand of a sculptor (B. J. v. 4, § 4; vi. 9, § 1). After the capture of the city, the towers were left standing by Titus, "as a monument of his good fortune" (vi. 9, § 1; viii. 1, § 1); but only one, the well-known "Tower of David," now remains. This tower corresponds, in size and construction, very closely to Phasaelus, and the beautiful masonry at its base is distinctly Herodian in character. During the siege one of the legions camped two stadia from Hippicus (v. 3, § 5); and it was through a postern close to that tower that the Jews made a desperate sally at the commencement of the siege, and attempted to destroy the siege works thrown up by the Romans against the third or outer wall (v. 6, § 5). The cisterns of Hippicus, which were supplied by an aqueduct that entered the city at a neighbouring gate (vi. 7, § 3), are still used. They lie beneath the tower at the Jaffa Gate, and traces of the conduit, which conveyed water to them, have been found (O.S. Notes, p. 47). The position of Mariamne is uncertain; if Josephus be taken literally, it must have been east of the "Tower of David," but it is possibly represented by the existing tower to the south.

6. The Walls, &c.—Josephus states (B. J. v. 4, § 1) that where Jerusalem was girt by impassable ravines it was defended by only one wall, and that on those sides which had no natural defences it was protected by three walls. The first or old wall (Plate II.), which Josephus (§ 2) ascribes to David and his successors, began at the Tower Hippicus, and, extending to the Xystus, joined the council house, and ended at the west cloister of the Temple. That is, starting from the Jaffa Gate, it ran eastward along the northern face of modern Sion, where traces of it have been found (Lewin, Siege of J., pp. 215–17), crossed the Tyropeon Valley, possibly on the causeway, and ended at the Haram wall, at or near "Wilson's Arch." Its southern course from Hippicus is described as passing through Bethso to the Gate of the Essenes; then, facing the south, it made a bend above the Fountain of Siloam, where it again turned, facing the east, at Solomon's Pool, and, extending as far as a certain place called Ophlas, it united itself to the cloister of the Temple which faces the east. The line of this wall, south of the Jaffa Gate, is marked by the scarped rock in the Protestant cemetery, at the S.W. corner of modern Sion, where there appears to have been a descent to the Valley of Hinnom, by flights of rock-hewn steps. This spot may possibly be Bethso, "the dung place"; which we may perhaps identify with Bethson, "the place of the scarp." The next point, the "Gate of the Essenes," was probably at the southern end of the long street which, commencing at the Damascus Gate, runs southward, almost in a straight line, through and beyond the city to the brink of the Valley of Hinnom. This street, a continuation of the great road from the north, must always have been one of the principal thoroughfares of Jerusalem, and it is possible that the name of the sect of the Essenes has been confounded with the Hebrew word Yeshanah, "Old," which the LXX., in Neh. iii. 6, give as a proper name, Ἰασαῖα. The "Gate of the Essenes" would thus be "the old gate" or "the gate of the old wall." Above the Fountain of Siloam, which was outside the fortifications (B. J. v. 9, § 4), the wall curved inwards so as to cross the Tyropeon Valley at a more convenient altitude.^p This loop or bend is perhaps referred to by Tacitus in the expression, "muri per artem obliqui aut introrsus sinuati" (Hist. v. 11); and between its walls ran "the way of the king's garden" (Jer. xxxix. 4, lii. 7; 2 K. xxv. 4). The place called Ophlas (B. J. ii. 17, § 9; v. 6, § 1), which may have given the name of Ophel (2 Ch. xxvii. 3, xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 26, 27, xi. 21) to that part of the eastern hill immediately south of the Haram, was a public building, close to but distinct from the Temple, that was burnt by the Romans during the siege (B. J. vi. 6, § 3). It appears to have been at the S.E. corner of the Haram, and the city wall,^q on reaching this point, was connected with the east cloister of the Temple by the south wall of the Haram.

The second wall commenced at the Gate Gennath, which was in the first wall, and, encircling the quarter that lay to the north, went up to Antonia. No certain trace of this wall has yet been found, and it is matter of dispute whether the ground now occupied by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre was included or excluded. The wall must have run along the S. side of the ditch that separated Antonia from Bezetha, and the point at which it ended is therefore known within narrow limits. Another point of the wall is perhaps indicated by the ruined gateway seen by Felix Fabri (A.D. 1483) between the Damascus Gate and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and called the Porta Judicaria (p. 136*b*; Eng. Trans., p. 440). The position of the Gate Gennath^r is uncertain, but it was ^p The wall probably ran along the edge of the cliff above the Pool of Siloam; and, instead of crossing the valley in a straight line, kept northwards, on the same level, until it met the bed of the Tyropeon, where it turned southwards and passed along the eastern face of modern Sion. The Pools of Siloam were first included within the limits of the city by the Empress Eudocia, between A.D. 438–450 (Ant. Mart. xxv.).

^q The city wall, or "wall of Ophel," which has been partially traced by Sir C. Warren (PEP. Mem. Jerusalem, 226 sq.) and Prof. H. Guthe (ZDPV. vol. v.), is at a much lower level than that of the Haram, and there is a straight joint between the two walls, indicating that they belong to two distinct building periods. This may perhaps account for the obscurity in the description of Josephus.

^r It has been suggested that Gennath is equivalent to Ge-hennath, and that the gate led to the valley of Hinnom; but the usual explanation that it derived its name from the rose garden mentioned in the Mishna (Maaseroth, ii. §5), or from the fact of its leading to gardens evidently to the east of Herod's three towers, and not far from them. It may also, perhaps, be inferred from B. J. v. 11, § 4, compared with 6, § 2, and 7, § 3, that the Pool Amygdalon and John's monument were situated between the second wall and the third, which commenced at Hippicus. In this case the Gate Gennath must have been near the south end of "Christian street," and Plate II. shows the wall running along that street and including the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The alternative view is that the wall excluded the church, and that traces of its ditch exist in the great cistern of Constantine and other excavations near it. In the quarter of the town between the second and first walls—the "other city" of Josephus (Ant. xv. 11, § 5)—were the bazaars (B. J. v. 8, § 1), occupying the same position, near the middle of the second wall (7, § 4), that they do now.

The third wall was not commenced till twelve years after the Crucifixion, when it was undertaken by king Herod Agrippa. It was intended to enclose the suburbs that had grown out on the northern sides of the city, which before this had been left exposed (B. J. v. 4, § 2). It began at the Tower Hippicus and ran towards the north quarter of the city as far as the Tower Psephinus; it then passed opposite the monuments of Helena, queen of Adiabene, and, running across the Royal Caverns, turned at the corner tower, near the spot known as the Monument of the Fuller, and joined the old wall at the valley called Kedron. The wall was constructed of large stones, so fitted to each other that they could scarcely have been undermined by iron tools or shaken by engines; and had it been completed, the city would have been impregnable. Agrippa, however, left off building through fear of Claudius Caesar, and the wall was hurriedly finished before the siege. Various opinions have been expressed with regard to the direction of this wall. Robinson, Schultz, Fergusson, Thrupp, and Tobler, carry it so far north as to pass close to the "Tombs of the Kings." Warren and Conder place Psephinus near the Russian Cathedral beyond the N.W. angle of the city, and carry the wall thence, eastward and southward, to join the existing wall at the Quarries, near the Damascus Gate. Kraft, Lewin, Sepp, De Vogüé, De Saulcy, Menke, Caspari, Furrer, and Wilson, identify the third wall with the present north wall of the city. The principal, and almost conclusive, argument against the first two theories is that, although the ground supposed to have been included has been largely built over during the last twenty-five years, no trace of a city wall or of a rock-hewn ditch has been found to the north of the existing fortifications.

The Tower Psephinus was at the N.W. corner of the wall, and opposite to Hippicus. It was octagonal, and was 70 cubits high, and from it could be seen Arabia, and the utmost limits of the land of the Hebrews as far as the sea (B. J. v. 3, § 5; 4, § 3). The view is exaggerated, but the description is otherwise applicable to a tower at or near Ka'at Jalûd, in the N.W. angle of the city. The name is perhaps derived from הַדָּבָר, "north," or הַדָּבָר, "to watch," thus meaning the "watch tower," rather than from ψῆφος, "a pebble," because it was built of rubble masonry. The monuments of Helena were three stadia from Jerusalem (Ant. xx. 4, § 3), and opposite to a gate protected by the "women's towers" (B. J. v. 2, § 2). They were well known to Eusebius (H. E. ii. 12); were on the left-hand side of a traveller approaching the city from the north (Jerome, Ep. Paul. vi.); and the tomb was closed by a stone door that could only be opened by a concealed mechanical contrivance (Paus. viii. 16, § 5). The στήλαι that surmounted the sepulchre had disappeared, but the "Tombs of the Kings," although four and not three stadia from the wall, is no doubt the place intended. The gate (B. J. v. 2, § 2) would be that by which the great road from the north entered the city,—the Damascus Gate,—and the Women's Towers (γυναικείαι πύργοι, either an altered form or an attempted translation of a Hebrew word) were the flanking towers on either side. The Royal Caverns were the great quarries, near the Damascus Gate; and they were probably so called from their vast extent, as the Royal Cloister south of the Temple was so named from its superior size and magnificence.* The corner tower was that at the N.E. angle of the city, and the existence near it of a fuller's monument may be explained by the proximity of the large pool near the Church of St. Anne, and possibly of the aqueduct that supplied it. The valley called Kedron was evidently within the walls (B. J. v. 6, § 1), and must have been the ravine running across the N.E. corner of the Haram. The point at which the third joined the old wall is, however, uncertain. It would appear from Sir C. Warren's excavations to have been south of the St. Stephen's Gate, but may have been on the other side of the ravine near the Golden Gate.† Josephus, it may be observed, does not mention the east wall of the Haram, which he appears to have regarded as the outer wall of the Temple precincts, and not as a portion of the city wall proper.

After describing the three walls, Josephus adds that the third had 90 towers, 200 cubits apart, the second 14, and the first 60 towers; and that the city was 33 stadia in circumference. Taking the distance of the towers as 150 feet, or 100 cubits, from centre to centre, which is probably near the truth on the average, the extent of the first wall would be 9,150 feet, and this is roughly the length of the wall from "Wilson's Arch" to the Jaffa Gate, and thence round by Siloam to the S.E. corner of the Haram, as shown on Plate II. In the same way the extent of the second wall would be 2,250 feet, which corresponds with the length shown on Plate II. The third wall with its 90 towers would be 13,650 feet, and

* The stone from this quarry is known as melech, "royal" stone.

† Possibly the great wall, 166 feet high, which closes the gorge of the "valley called Kedron," at the N.E. angle of the Haram (PEF. Mem. Jerusalem, pp. 134 sq.), was that which was built by Agrippa, and attracted the notice of Claudius Caesar. In this case the junction of the third with the old wall must have been about 50 feet north of the Golden Gate.

this distance is so nearly equal to the combined lengths of the third wall from the N.E. corner of the Haram to the Jaffa Gate and of the first wall thence to the S.E. corner of the Haram, that it is reasonable to suppose that Josephus has here given the total number of towers in the whole circuit of the outer wall. If the statement of Josephus (B. J. v. 12, § 1) be correct, that the wall of circumvallation, which ran along the further sides of the valleys of Kedron and Hinnom, was only 39 stadia, the circumference of the city, which lay within those valleys, could not have been as much as 33 stadia, and was probably not more than 25 stadia.

Several places of interest are mentioned by Josephus as being within or near the city. The palace built by Herod (Ant. xv. 9, § 3; B. J. i. 21, § 1), sometimes called the "royal palace" (B. J. ii. 19, § 4; vi. 8, § 1), was situated immediately to the south of the three great towers Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne (v. 4, § 4), and formed with them the citadel of the upper city (v. 5, § 8; vi. 8, § 4). It was constructed with great magnificence (v. 4, § 4), and two of its spacious chambers were named Caesarium and Agrippium (i. 21, § 1). After the death of Herod, it became the residence of the Roman governor (ii. 3, § 2; 14, § 8). The palace of Agrippa, originally built by the Asmonean princes (Ant. xx. 8, § 11; B. J. ii. 16, § 3), and sometimes distinguished as the "King's palace" (Ant. xv. 11, § 5; xvii. 10, § 2), was situated on the western hill (Ant. xvii. 10, § 2; B. J. ii. 3, § 2), on an eminence whence there was a fine view of the city, and whence the Temple courts and the Altar were visible (Ant. xx. 8, § 11). The palace, which was burnt by the insurgents under Eleazar (B. J. ii. 17, § 6), was near and above the Xystus, at the street leading to the upper city where the bridge joined the Xystus to the Temple (Ant. xx. 8, § 11; B. J. ii. 16, § 3), and one of the west gates of the Temple led to it by a causeway (Ant. xv. 11, § 5). From these indications it is clear that the palace stood on the brow of the cliff above the Tyropoeon Valley a little S. of "David's Street." The palace of Helena was S. of the Temple, in the middle of Acra (B. J. v. 6, § 1; vi. 6, § 3). In the lower part of the same quarter, not far from Siloam, was the palace of Monobazus (v. 6, § 1); and in the upper part, apparently close to the Temple, was the palace of Grapte (iv. 9, § 1). In the vicinity of Agrippa's palace were the house of Ananias, the high-priest, the Record Office (ii. 17, § 6), the Council House (v. 4, § 2; vi. 6, § 3), and the Xystus, which appears to have stretched southwards from the causeway that leads to Wilson's Arch (ii. 16, § 3; iv. 9, § 12; v. 4, § 2; vi. 3, § 2; 6, § 2). Closely connected with the Temple were the Treasury (John viii. 20; Ant. xix. 6, § 1; B. J. v. 5, § 2) and the Pastophoria (iv. 9, § 12). The Hippodrome, perhaps the same place as the Theatre (Ant. xv. 8, § 1), was south of the Temple (Ant. xvii. 10, § 2; B. J. ii. 3, § 1), apparently below the mosque el-Aksa; and the Camp of the Assyrians, where Titus pitched his camp, was within the third wall (v. 7, § 3), between the N.W. angle of the city and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The tomb of King Alexander, near the Antonia and the north cloister of the Temple (v. 7, § 3), was possibly in the valley called Kedron; that of John the High Priest was 30 cubits from the Pool Amygdalon, between the second and third walls, and close to the first wall and Hippicus (v. 6, § 2; 7, § 3; 9, § 2; 11, § 4); and that of Ananus the High Priest was on the west side of the Kedron ravine (v. 12, § 2). The tomb of Herod, possibly that prepared for Aristobulus (Ant. xv. 3, § 4), and that in which Pheroræ was afterwards buried (Ant. xvii. 3, § 3), was near the Serpent's Pool (B. J. v. 3, § 2), and included in the wall of circumvallation thrown up by Titus (12, § 2). It is clear from the context that the tomb must have been close to the Birket Mamilla, but no trace of it has yet been found.

7. Population.—There is no point in which the exaggeration in which Josephus occasionally indulges is more apparent than in speaking of the population of the city. The inhabitants were dead; no record remained; and to magnify the greatness of the city was a compliment to the prowess of the conquerors. Still the assertions that the numbers assembled at the Passover were sometimes 2,700,000 (B. J. vi. 9, § 3), and sometimes 3,000,000 (ii. 14, § 3); that 600,000 dead bodies were cast out of the gates (v. 13, § 7); that 1,100,000 perished during the siege; that 97,000 were taken captive (vi. 9, § 3), besides 40,000 set at liberty (8, § 2), are so childish that it is surprising that anyone could ever have repeated them. Even the more moderate calculation of Tacitus (v. 13) of 600,000 inhabitants is far beyond the limits of probability.*

No town in the East can be pointed out where each inhabitant has not at least 50 square yards on an average allowed to him. In some of the crowded cities of the West, such as parts of London, Liverpool, Hamburg, &c., the space is reduced to about 30 yards, and in very limited areas to 9½ yards, to each inhabitant; but this only applies to the poorest and more crowded places, with houses many stories high, not to cities containing palaces and public buildings. The area of the plateau upon which Jerusalem stands, does not exceed 5,000,000 square yards; and this, allowing 30 square yards for each inhabitant, only gives a population of 166,666. At the time of the Roman siege, however, when the city covered a greater extent of ground than it did before or afterwards, its area did not exceed 1,379,980 square yards; this gives a population of 46,000, and if a deduction be made for the space occupied by the Temple, the palaces and the gardens, the total may be reduced to 40,000. The population of Jerusalem, in its days of greatest prosperity, may thus have amounted to at most 46,000 souls; and assuming that in times of Festival there was an addition of one-half to these numbers, which is an extreme estimate, there may have been about 70,000 in the city when Titus came up against it. As no one would stay in a beleaguered city who had a home to flee to, it is hardly probable that the men who came up to fight for the defence of the city would equal the number of women and children who would seek refuge elsewhere; so that the probability is that about the usual population of the city were in it at that time.

* Possibly this was the official residence of the high-priest, and the same place as the house of Calaphas (Matt. xxvi. 68; Mark xiv. 64; Luke xxii. 64; John xviii. 6).

* It is instructive to compare these with the moderate figures of Jeremiah (lxx. 28-30), where he enumerates the number of persons carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar in three deportations from both city and province s only 4,600.

It may also be mentioned that the army which Titus brought up against Jerusalem did not exceed from 25,000 to 30,000 effective men of all arms, which, taking the probabilities of the case, is about the number that would be required to attack a fortified town defended by from 8,000 to 10,000 men capable of bearing arms. Had the garrison been more numerous, the siege would have been improbable. Josephus indeed states (B. J. v. 6, § 1) that the number of fighting men was 23,400, but, taking the whole incidents of his narrative, there is nothing to lead us to suppose that the Jews could ever have mustered 10,000 combatants at any period of the siege; 7,000 or 8,000 is probably nearer the truth. Had the besieged been more numerous, Titus would never have broken up his army into three divisions, and posted them at such widely spaced intervals as he did (v. 3, § 5); nor would the Jews have been unable to break through the long wall of circumvallation.

8. Pre-exilic Jerusalem, according to Josephus (B. J. v. 4, §§ 1, 2), covered the eastern and western hills, and this is the generally accepted view. It has, however, been contested by Prof. Robertson Smith (Encyc. Brit. s. v. Jerusalem) and by Prof. Sayce (PEFQy. Stat. 1883, p. 215 sq.), who maintain that, prior to the Captivity, the city had not spread beyond the limits of the eastern hill. This theory is open to the objections that the area of the eastern hill is insufficient for the population that must have been present in Jerusalem during the prosperous reigns of Solomon and some of his successors; and that there is no indication in the books of Maccabees, or in Josephus, that any important additions were made to the city between the rebuilding of the walls by Nehemiah and the reign of Herod.

Jerusalem, when it first comes into view, bears the name Jebus (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 28; Judg. xix. 10). It was then a royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. x. 1, 23); but, excepting that its king, who was nearest to the point of danger, took the lead in the league against the Gibeonites, there is no indication that it was of more importance, or of greater size, than the other towns whose chiefs, or kinglets, opposed the advance of the Israelites. In fact the Jebusites are always mentioned last, as if of least importance, in the formula by which the Promised Land is designated; and they appear to have occupied a very limited tract of country.

† The eastern hill has an area of 255,939 square yards, which at 50 square yards for each inhabitant, a low estimate when the nature of the ground is considered, would give a population of 5,100.

There is no reason to suppose that the growth of Jerusalem differed, in any material respect, from that of other ancient cities. The first colony would naturally settle on the eastern hill, in close proximity to the spring at its foot, and the western hill would be gradually occupied as wealth and population increased. The view adopted in the present article is that when the Israelites entered Palestine Jebus was confined to the eastern hill, and that it then consisted of an acropolis, and of a walled town covering the rocky slopes of the hill above Siloam. Perhaps too, as some ancient rock-hewn chambers seem to suggest, there was a small suburb on the S.E. slope of the western hill; but it is improbable that the whole of that hill was covered with buildings at such an early period. Jebus was attacked by Judah, and by Benjamin, and, upon one occasion, the lower or walled town was captured and burned (Judg. i. 8). The Acropolis, however,—the stronghold or mountain fortress (צְרָתִים) of Zion,—held out and resisted all attempts at capture, until David carried it by storm (2 Sam. v. 7; 1 Ch. xi. 5). David strengthened the Acropolis with new walls, and made it his place of residence. Hence it was called the "city of David" (2 Sam. v. 9; 1 Ch. xi. 7), a name originally confined to the Acropolis, but afterwards, as in the similar case of the Macedonian Acra, applied to all that portion of the city that lay on the eastern hill.*

After its capture Jerusalem became the religious and political centre of the Jews; and during the reign of Solomon it was enlarged and fortified (1 K. iii. 1, ix. 15; Joseph. Ant. viii. 2, § 1; 6, § 1), and adorned with a Temple and palace (1 K. vii.; Ant. viii. 5, §§ 1, 2). It was probably during this period, one of great commercial activity, when there was a large and rapid increase of wealth and prosperity, that the western hill was enclosed by walls and joined to the "City of David." This new quarter was no doubt, at first, largely composed of the houses and gardens of the wealthy; and here, apparently, was the house built by Solomon for the daughter of Pharaoh (1 K. ix. 24; 2 Ch. viii. 11). The fortifications were afterwards repaired and strengthened by Uzziah, Jotham, Hezekiah, and Manasseh; and the two last kings added new walls to the city (2 Ch. xxvi. 9, xxvii. 3, xxxii. 5, xxxiii. 14; Joseph. Ant. ix. 10, § 3; 11, § 2; x. 3, § 2). Hezekiah greatly improved the water supply (2 K. xx. 20; 2 Ch. xxxii. 30); and it was possibly during his reign that the "second wall" (p. 1603) was built (2 Ch. xxxii. 5).

Pre-exilic Jerusalem, according to the above view, occupied the same area that the city did in the time of Christ,—that is, before Agrippa added the third wall; and the division into two quarters, corresponding apparently to the upper and lower cities, was already recognised (2 K.

* The passages in which the City of David is mentioned are: 2 Sam. vi. 12, 16; 1 K. ii. 10, iii. 1, viii. 1, ix. 24, xi. 27, 43, xiv. 31, xv. 8, 24, xxii. 60; 2 K. viii. 24, ix. 28, xii. 21, xiv. 20, xv. 7, 38, xvi. 20; 1 Ch. xiii. 13, xv. 1, 29; 2 Ch. v. 2, viii. 11, ix. 31, xii. 16, xiv. 1, xvi. 14, xxi. 1, 20, xxiv. 16, 25, xxvii. 9, xxxii. 6, 30, 33, xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 15, xii. 37; 1 Macc. i. 33, vii. 32, xiv. 36; Joseph. Ant. vii. 3, § 2.

xxii. 14; Zeph. i. 10: cp. 2 K. xx. 4; Neh. iii. 9). There is no indication in the Bible of the character of the fortifications or of the architectural features of the houses; but the walls were provided with towers, especially at the gates and corners, and with battlements (2 Ch. xxvi. 9, 15, xxxii. 5; Ps. xlviii. 12, 13; Ant. x. 3, § 2). One tower only, Hananeel (R. V. Hananel), is specially mentioned (Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. xiv. 10); and this, from the later description in Nehemiah (iii. 1, xii. 39), appears to have been to the north of and close to the Temple (see Plate III.). Closely connected with the fortifications was MILLO (2 Sam. v. 9; 1 K. ix. 15, 24, xi. 27; 2 K. xii. 20; 1 Ch. xi. 8; 2 Ch. xxxii. 5), an archaic word, perhaps of Canaanite origin, which, except in one case (2 Ch. xxxii. 5), is translated by the LXX. ἡ ἄρα, — a word that they employ nowhere else in the O. T., and that is used throughout the books of Maccabees for the fortress on Mount Zion (p. 1644). Some authorities suppose Millo to have been a place of assembly, others an embankment, a tower on a mound, or a valley (Lightfoot, Cent. Chor. xxiv.). The view taken here is that it was either the Acropolis or one of its towers, and that it stood on or near the site of the later Acra. In close proximity to the south wall of the Temple was the place or quarter called "the OPHEL," which derived its name from, or gave it to, an important tower in the line of fortifications above the Kedron (2 Ch. xxvii. 3, xxxiii. 14; Is. xxxii. 14 [Heb.]; Mic. iv. 8 [Heb.]; cp. Tal. Jer. Taanith, iii. 11). Ophel was the residence of the Nethinim (Neh. iii. 26, 27); and it is mentioned by Josephus in his account of the last days of Jerusalem as "the Ophla" (B. J. ii. 17, § 9; v. 4, § 2; 6, § 1; vi. 6, § 3).

The gates, those important features of an Oriental city, are referred to generally in Ps. ix. 14, lxxxvii. 2; Jer. xvii. 19. They would naturally be at the ends of the principal streets, and the names of several of them are specially mentioned. (1) The Gate of Ephraim was 400 cubits from the Corner Gate (2 K. xiv. 13; 2 Ch. xxv. 23), and, according to Nehemiah (viii. 16, xii. 39), was between the Old Gate and the broad wall, and at the end of a street of the same name. Jerome (Quaest. Heb.) identifies it with the Valley Gate; but there can be little doubt that it was the gate, on the north side of the city, through which the road to the north ran, and it may be placed with some degree of certainty near the junction of the "Via Dolorosa," with the street from the Damascus Gate, where the porta judicaria was shown in the Middle Ages. (2) The Gate of Benjamin, by which Jeremiah left the city (Jer. xxxvii. 13), must also have been in the north wall. It is mentioned again (Zech. xiv. 10), and was perhaps the same as the Gate of Ephraim.* There was a Temple gate of the same name (Jer. xx. 2, xxxviii. 7; cp. v. 14), apparently the Miphkad of Nehemiah (iii. 31); and there was to be a Gate of Benjamin on the east side of the restored, holy Jerusalem (Ezek. xlvi. 32). (3) The First Gate is mentioned, apparently in order, between the Gate of Benjamin and the Corner Gate (Zech. xiv. 10), and is perhaps the same as (4) the Middle Gate, in which the princes of Babylon sat after the capture of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxix. 3), and as the Old Gate (Neh. iii. 6). In this case the First Gate would be at the north end of the street running up the Tyropoeon Valley. (5) The Fish Gate (2 Ch. xxxiii. 14), which occupied a prominent position (Zeph. i. 10), was between the Tower of Hananeel and the Old Gate (Neh. iii. 1-6, xii. 39); and if the position assigned to the Tower of Hananeel, at the N.W. corner of the Haram, be correct, it must have been the gate through which the direct road from the eastern hill to the north, now Tarik bâb ez-Zahie, passed. It was perhaps so called from its vicinity to the fish market where the Tyrian merchants sold their fish (Neh. xiii. 16); Jerome (Quaest. Heb.) identifies it with the Jaffa Gate, but this is inadmissible if he refers to the modern gate of that name. (6) The Corner Gate (2 K. xiv. 3; 2 Ch. xxv. 23, xxvi. 9; Zech. xiv. 10) is mentioned in connexion with the Tower of Hananeel (Jer. xxxi. 38), and was possibly the same as the Fish Gate. (7) The Horse Gate, by which horses entered "the king's house," was near the Temple (2 K. xi. 16; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 15), close to a corner of the east wall (Jer. xxxi. 40) and to the wall of Ophel (Neh. iii. 27, 28), and according to Josephus (Ant. ix. 7, § 3) it opened on to the Kedron Valley. It must have been near the S.E. corner of the Haram area. (8) The gate between the two walls was close to the king's gardens (2 K. xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4), and is apparently identical with the Fountain Gate (Neh. iii. 15), which was near the same place. (9) The Gate Harsith, which led to the Valley of Hinnom (Jer. xix. 2), was perhaps the later Dung Gate (Neh. iii. 14), and Gate of the Essenes (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 2), at the end of the main street running southward, over the western hill, from the Gate of Ephraim. (10) The Valley Gate, or Gate of the Ravine, gâi (2 Ch. xxvi. 9), which, from its name, must have led to the Valley of Hinnom, was between the Tower of the Furnaces and the Dung Gate, and apparently opposite to or near the "dragon's well" (Neh. ii. 13-15, iii. 11-13). It was possibly a gate in the west wall to the south of the present citadel. (11) The Gate of Joshua, the governor of the city, is mentioned (2 K. xxxiii. 8), without any indication of position. Other gates are referred to in connexion with the king's house and the Temple (2 K. xi. 6, 19, xv. 35; 1 Ch. ix. 18, xxvi. 16; 2 Ch. xxxii. 5, 20; Jer. xxvi. 10, xxxvii. 10; Ezek. ix. 2), but no traces of them now exist. There were open spaces and bazârs in the city (2 Ch. xxxii. 6; Jer. xxxvii. 21); reservoirs, or tanks supplied by conduits (p. 1591); and, in the valley below Siloam, gardens kept green and fresh by irrigation.

The pre-exilic Temple and its courts covered a much smaller area than the Temple of Herod, but the altars of both temples were erected on the same spot, near the S.W. corner of the Haram (p. 1641). The position of the royal palaces is uncertain. David, who at first resided in the Acropolis, moved afterwards to a "house of cedar" built for him by Tyrian workmen (2 Sam. v. 9-11; 1 Ch. xiv. 1), which appears to have been in sight of, and at a lower level than, the threshing-floor of Araunah (2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 18; 1 K. viii. 1, 6). In the time of Nehemiah the traditional house of David stood on the eastern hill, not far from the Temple (Neh. xii. 37); and in the same quarter was the Armoury (iii. 19), which was no doubt the "tower of David builded for an armoury, whereon there hang a thousand bucklers, all the shields of the mighty men" (Cant. iv. 4). It is possible that the more magnificent house of Solomon (1 K. vii. 1-12) was an enlargement or reconstruction of David's "house of cedar," and that it afterwards became the "king's house," or royal palace. This "king's house" was in close proximity to the Temple (2 K. xi. 5, 16, 19, 20; 2 Ch. xxiii. 15, 20; Ezek. xliii. 7, 8), and apparently within its precincts (2 K. xxiii. 11). It was connected by a covered way with the outer court (2 K. xvi. 8), and lay partly under the treasury (Jer. xxxviii. 11), which, as at a later period (John viii. 10; Joseph. Ant. xix. 6, § 1; B. J. v. 5, § 2), appears to have been an adjunct of the Temple. The same palace is probably alluded to as the "king's high house" (Neh. iii. 25), which was near the wall of Ophel. There was also a "winter house" (Jer. xxvi. 22), and a "house" for the daughter of Pharaoh (p. 1598). According to the Mishna (Parah, iii. 2) it was the custom to bury inside the walls at the time of the first Temple, i.e. during the pre-exilic period; and this accords with the statements in the Bible with regard to the burial of David and most of his successors (1 K. ii. 10, xi. 43, xv. 24, xxii. 50, &c.). At a later date all the tombs, i.e. the bones in them, excepting those of the family of David, and that of Huldah, appear to have been removed outside the city (Josefta Baba Bathra, i.). The position of the tomb of David, which became the burial-place of the kings of Judah, is uncertain. It is distinctly stated to have been in the "City of David" (l. c.), that is, on the eastern hill; and this is not only confirmed by Nehemiah, who mentions it (iii. 15, 16) after Siloam in a description proceeding from west to east, but by a curious Jewish tradition that the tombs of the kings were connected by a hollow way or tunnel with the Kedron Valley (quoted by Dr. Chaplin, PEFQy. Stat. 1885, p. 192, note). The locality seems to have been well known up to the time of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (Acts ii. 29; Joseph. Ant. xvi. 7, § 1); and it was apparently within the walls when the city was besieged by Antiochus (Joseph. Ant. vii. 15, § 3; xiii. 8, § 4; B. J. i. 2, § 5). Many suggestions have been made with regard to the position of the tomb, and of these the most plausible is perhaps that of M. Clermont-Ganneau. He supposes that the sepulchre of David was a pit-tomb of the Phœnician type,—a sepulchral chamber or chambers, reached from the surface by a shaft,—and that it was at the southern extremity of the eastern hill, in the bend made by the rock-hewn conduit between the Fountain of the Virgin and the Pool of Siloam. The statement of Josephus (Ant. xvi. 7, § 1) that Herod built a monument on the mouth, ἐπὶ τῷ στρομίῳ, of David's tomb seems to favour the view that it was a pit-tomb; and Epiphanius, Theodore, Nicolas of Damascus, and the Paschal Chronicle connect the Siloam conduit with the tomb (Recue Critique, 1887). Eusebius and Jerome, on what authority is not stated, place the tomb of David at Bethlehem (OS. p. 246, 22; p. 135, 5). It is now shown, outside the Sion Gate, on the western hill of Jerusalem.

9. Zion.—One of the most difficult points connected with the topography of ancient Jerusalem is the correct fixation of the locality of the sacred Mount of Zion. Unfortunately the name Zion is not found in the works of Josephus, so that we have not his assistance, which would be invaluable in this case, and there is no passage in the Bible which directly asserts the identity of the hills Moriah and Zion, though many that cannot well be understood without this assumption. The cumulative proof, however, is such as almost to supply this want.

From the passages in 2 Sam. v. 7, 9, 1 K. viii. 1, 1 Ch. xi. 5, 7, and 2 Ch. v. 2, it is quite clear that Zion and the City of David were identical, for it is there said, "David took the strong hold of Zion; the same is the City of David" (R. V.); "and David dwelt in the strong hold, and called it the City of David" (R. V.). When David moved from the stronghold to the palace of cedar which the Tyrian craftsmen built for him, the names Zion and City of David were no doubt, as in the parallel case of the Macedonian Acra, applied both to the Acropolis and to the town beneath its walls. Mount Zion originally, and in a narrow sense, was the hill upon which Zion, the City of David, was built; and, as the Temple apparently stood above the City of David (2 Sam. xxiv. 18; 1 K. viii. 1, 4; 2 Ch. v. 2), it follows that Mount Zion must have been the lower or eastern, and not the higher or western hill of Jerusalem. The name Zion is, it is true, often applied to the whole of the city (Ps. liii. 6, cxxvii. 1, cxlvi. 10; Is. i. 27, xiv. 32; Lam. i. 4), and is sometimes a mere reduplication of Jerusalem; but, as a rule, a distinction is made between the two places. In the following passages, for instance, Zion is apparently spoken of as a different city, or quarter, from Jerusalem: "For out of Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant, and they that escape out of Mount Zion" (2 K. xix. 31). "Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion; build thou the walls of Jerusalem" (Ps. li. 18). "For the people shall dwell in Zion at Jerusalem" (Is. xxx. 19). "Thy holy cities are a wilderness, Zion is a wilderness, Jerusalem a desolation" (Is. lxiv. 10). "Zion shall be plowed like a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps" (Jer. xxvi. 18; Mic. iii. 12). "The Lord shall roar out of Zion, and utter His voice from Jerusalem" (Joel iii. 16; Amos i. 2). "The Lord shall get comfort in Zion, and shall yet choose Jerusalem" (Zech. i. 17).^b This quality of designation indicates precisely the twofold character of the city,—the Acropolis (Zion) with the houses and palaces (Ps. xlviii. 3) clustering round it,—the "lower city" of Josephus,—on the eastern hill; and the town itself (Jerusalem)—the “upper city” of the same author—on the western hill. There are also numerous passages in which Zion is spoken of as a Holy place in such terms as are never applied to Jerusalem, and which can only be understood on the supposition that they apply to the Holy Temple Mount. As, for instance, “I set my king on my holy hill of Zion” (Ps. ii. 6). “The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob” (Ps. lxxxvii. 2). “The Lord has chosen Zion” (Ps. cxxiii. 13). “The city of the Lord, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel” (Is. lx. 14). “Arise ye, and let us go up to Zion to the Lord” (Jer. xxxi. 6). “Thus saith the Lord, I am returned to Zion” (Zech. viii. 3). “I am the Lord thy God, dwelling in Zion, my holy mountain” (Joel iii. 17). “For the Lord dwelleth in Zion” (Joel iii. 21); and other passages* which will occur to every one at all familiar with the Scriptures. Though these cannot be taken as absolute proof, they certainly amount to strong presumptive evidence that Zion and the Temple Hill were one and the same place. There is one curious passage, however, which is scarcely intelligible on any other hypothesis than this. It is known that the sepulchres of David and his successors were on Mount Zion, or in the City of David, but the wicked king Ahaz for his crimes was buried in Jerusalem, “in the city,” and “not in the sepulchres of the kings” (2 Ch. xxvii. 27). Jehoram (2 Ch. xxi. 20) narrowly escaped the same punishment, and the distinction is so marked that it cannot be overlooked. It also follows from Neh. iii. 15, 16, that the name Zion was applied to the eastern hill.

^b See also 1 K. viii. 1; 2 K. xix. 21; Ps. cxxviii. 8, cxlvii. 12; Is. li. 3, xxiv. 23, xxxi. 4, 5, xxxvii. 32, lii. 1; Mic. iv. 2, xxiv. 10, 11; and after the Captivity, Ecclus. xxxvi. 13, 14.

When from the Old Testament we turn to the books of the Maccabees, we find passages, written by persons who certainly were acquainted with the localities, which seem to fix the site of Zion with a considerable amount of certainty; as, for instance, “(They) went up into Mount Zion. And when they saw the sanctuary desolate, and the altar profaned, and the gates burned up, and shrubs growing in the courts as in a forest” (1 Macc. iv. 37, 38; cp. v. 60). “After this went Nicanor up to Mount Zion, and there came out of the sanctuary certain of the priests” (1 Macc. vii. 33; cp. 2 Macc. xiv. 31). “They went up to Mount Zion with joy and gladness, where they offered burnt offerings” (1 Macc. v. 54). See also 1 Macc. vi. 48, 51, xiv. 27; cp. v. 48, &c. These passages leave no doubt that at that time Zion and the Temple Hill were considered one and the same place. In agreement with this are also the references in Eccles. xiv. 10; 1 Esd. viii. 81; 2 Esd. v. 25; Judith ix. 13. Josephus, it is true, places the “City of David” and the citadel stormed by Joab on the western hill, and clearly identifies them with the “Upper City” (Ant. vii. 3, §§ 1, 2; cp. B. J. v. 4, § 1); but the statements of the Jewish historian cannot be regarded as equal in authority to those of the writers of the books of Maccabees, Esdras, and Ecclesiasticus.

The question whether the stronghold of Zion was to the north or to the south of the Temple cannot be solved with our present knowledge. Lightfoot (Op. i. 553; ii. 187) is in favour of the former, and refers to the words, “Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great king” (Ps. xlviii. 2), and also to Is. xiv. 13 and Ezek. xl. 2. Reland (Pal. p. 846 sq.) controverts this view, and argues in favour of the identification of Zion with the “Upper City” of Josephus. The more probable view seems to be that the author of the First Book of Maccabees was right in identifying Zion with the Temple Mount and its stronghold with the Acra (i. 31–33, 36; iii. 45; vii. 32).

During the first four centuries after Christ the name Zion was applied sometimes to the eastern and sometimes to the western hill. From the 5th century inclusive the latter only has been known as Zion. The Rabbis with one accord place the Temple on Mount Zion; and though their authority in matters of doctrine may be valueless, still their traditions ought to have been sufficiently distinct to justify their being considered as authorities on a merely topographical point of this sort. Lightfoot (Fall of Jerusalem, § 1) quotes from the Talmud: “The wicked Turnus Rufus ploughed up the place of the Temple, and the places about it, to accomplish what is said, Zion shall become a ploughed field.” Origen (in Joan. iv. 19, 20) clearly identifies Zion with the Temple Mount, and so do Eusebius (in Is. xxii. 1) and apparently Jerome (in Is. xxii. 1, 2). On the other hand, Eusebius and Jerome in the Onomasticon (*O.S.*² p. 257, 21; p. 162, 25; p. 134, 20) and in other places refer to the western hill as Zion, and so does the Bordeaux Pilgrim (Itin. Hieros.).

It has been suggested that the name Zion was originally applied to the western hill, that after the return from Captivity it was transferred to the eastern hill, and that in the 4th century A.D. it was retransferred to the western hill; but this theory is quite untenable. A more probable view is that the eastern hill was regarded as Zion until Christianity became the religion of the State, and that, when Constantine built “New Jerusalem” (i.e. the Church of the Anastasia, and the Basilica) over against the one celebrated of old (i.e. the Jewish Temple), the name Zion was transferred to the western hill. It may be added that, the Antonia having been completely demolished, the great towers attached to Herod’s palace, which were left standing by Titus, would naturally become in the eyes of an uncritical age the ancient Acropolis of Jerusalem,—the stronghold of Zion.

10. Topography of the Book of Nehemiah.—The only description of the ancient city of Jerusalem which exists in the Bible, so extensive in form as to enable us to follow it as a topographical description, is that found in the Book of Nehemiah; and although it is hardly sufficiently distinct to enable us to settle all the moot points, it contains such valuable indications that it is well worthy of the most attentive examination.

The easiest way to arrive at any correct conclusion regarding it, is to take first the description of the Dedication of the Walls in ch. xii. (31-40), and, drawing such a diagram as this, we easily get at the main features of the old wall at least.

* Ps. ix. 11, 1, 2, lxxiv. 2, 3, lxxvi. 2, lxxviii. 68, 69, lxxxiv. 7, xcix. 2, cxxxix. 3; Is. viii. 18, xviii. 7; Jer. viii. 19, l. 28; Obad. v. 17. It should be remembered, with reference to the expressions in some of the Psalms, that the Ark was in the City of David, on Mount Zion, for many years during David’s reign.

Diagram of places mentioned in dedication of walls.

The order of procession was that the princes of Judah went up upon the wall at some point as nearly as possible opposite to the Temple, and one half of them, turning to the right, went towards the Dung Gate, "and at the fountain gate, which was over against them" ("by the fountain gate, and straight before them," R. V.), or, in other words, on the opposite or Temple side of the city, "went up by the stairs of the city of David at the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the water-gate eastward." The Water Gate, therefore, was one of the southern gates of the Temple (iii. 26; viii. 1, 3, 16), and the stairs that led up towards it are here identified with those of the city of David, and consequently with Zion.

The other party turned to the left, or northwards, and passed from beyond ("above," R. V.) the Tower of the Furnaces even "unto the broad wall," and passing the Gate of Ephraim, the Old Gate, the Fish Gate, the towers of Hananeel and Meah, to the Sheep Gate, "stood still in the prison-gate" ("gate of the guard," R. V.), as the other party had in the Water Gate. "So stood the two companies of them that gave thanks in the house of God."

If from this we turn to the 3rd chapter, which gives a description of the repairs of the wall, we have no difficulty in identifying all the places mentioned in the first sixteen verses with those enumerated in the 12th chapter. The repairs began at the Sheep Gate on the north side, and in immediate proximity to the Temple, and all the places named in the dedication, excepting the Gate of Ephraim, are again named, but in the reverse order, till we come to the Tower of the Furnaces, which must have stood on or near the site afterwards occupied by the Tower Hippicus (p. 1644). Mention is then made, but now in the direct order of the dedication, of "the valley-gate," the "dung-gate," "the fountain-gate;" and lastly, the "stairs that go down from the city of David." Between these last two places we find mention made of the Pool of Siloah and the king's garden, so that we have long passed the so-called sepulchre of David on the modern Zion, and have crossed the valley that separates it from the hill upon which the Temple stood. What follows is most important (v. 16), "After him repaired Nehemiah, the son of Azbuk, the ruler of the half part of Bethzur, unto the place over against the sepulchres of David, and to the pool that was made, and unto the house of the mighty." This passage, when taken with the context, seems in itself quite sufficient to set at rest the question of the position of the city of David, of the sepulchres of the kings, and consequently of Zion, all which could not be mentioned after Siloah if placed where modern tradition has located them.

In the enumeration of the places repaired, in the last part of the chapter, we have two which we know, from the description of the dedication, really belonged to the Temple. The prison-court ("court of the guard," R. V., iii. 25), which must have been connected with the prison-gate ("gate of the guard," R. V.), and which, as shown by the order of the dedication, must have been on the north side of the Temple, is here also connected with the king's high or upper house; all this apparently referring to the Castle of David, which originally occupied the site of the Turris Antonia. We have on the opposite side the "water-gate," mentioned in the next verse to Ophel, and consequently as clearly identified with the southern gate of the Temple. We have also the Horse Gate, that by which Athaliah was taken out of the Temple (2 K. xi. 16; 2 Ch. xxiii. 15), which Josephus states led to the Kedron (Ant. ix. 7, § 3), and which is here mentioned as connected with the priests' houses, and probably, therefore, in close proximity to the Temple. Mention is also made of the house of Eliashib, the high-priest, and of the eastern gate, probably that of the Temple. In fact, no place is mentioned in these last verses which cannot be more or less directly identified with the localities on the Temple hill, and not one which can be located in Jerusalem, on the western hill. The whole of the City of David, however, was so completely rebuilt and remodelled by Herod, that there are no local indications to assist us in ascertaining the line which the order of description of the places mentioned after v. 16 follows. It is enough to know that the description in the last seventeen verses applies to Zion, or the City of David; as this is sufficient to explain almost all the difficult passages in the Old Testament which refer to the ancient topography of the city.

11. Site of the Holy Sepulchre.—Three important questions have to be considered in connexion with the site of the Holy Sepulchre. First, did Constantine, and those who acted with him, possess sufficient information to enable them to ascertain exactly the precise localities of the Crucifixion and Burial of Christ? Second, does the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre stand upon the ground once occupied by the Churches of Constantine? Third, where should the site of Christ's tomb be sought?

Eusebius, who was present at the consecration of Constantine's churches, A.D. 335, states that, in order to hide the "Divine cave" from the eyes of men, and so conceal the truth, certain ungodly and impious persons had covered up the whole place with earth, paved it with stone, and erected above it a temple dedicated to Aphrodite. Constantine, "inspired by the Divine Spirit," ordered the temple to be destroyed, and the soil to be dug up to a considerable depth. When this was done, the cave, "contrary to all expectation," became visible. This discovery the emperor regarded as a miracle which it was beyond the capacity of man to understand (Vit. Const. iii. 25-28). Elsewhere Eusebius writes (Theophania, Lee's Translation, p. 199): "It is astonishing to see even the rock standing out erect and alone on a level land, and having only one cave in it; lest, had there been many, the miracle of Him who overcame death might have been obscured." No other writer in the 4th century alludes to the circumstances attending the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre, but all the historians of the following century describe the discovery of the Tomb and the Cross as having been miraculous, and the act of the Empress Helena. The erection of the temple of Aphrodite is at the same time generally ascribed to the enemies of Christianity (Soc. H. E. i. 17; Theod. H. E. i. 18; Soz. H. E. ii. 1).

With regard to the "Invention of the Cross" which is so intimately connected with the discovery of the Tomb by historians of the 5th and succeeding centuries, Eusebius, who mentions (Orat. de Laud. Const. ix.) that the Basilica was dedicated to the Cross, and the Bordeaux Pilgrim, who visited Jerusalem in A.D. 333, are silent. Yet twenty years later Cyril speaks of its existence as a well-known fact, and before the close of the century it played an important part in the ritual of the Church at Jerusalem^d (S. Silviee Aq. Per. ad L. S., pp. 66, 67).

It has been urged (Chateaubriand, Itin. 2^o Mém., i. p. 122 sq.) that the members of the first Christian Church must have been well acquainted with the site of the Holy Sepulchre, and that, as there was a regular succession of bishops from the Apostle James to Hadrian's reign, the tradition could not have been lost. Also that the erection of a temple by Hadrian on the site is a proof that it was well known in his time. That the early Christians knew the position of the tomb is true, but there is no evidence in the N. T., or in the history of the primitive Church, that they attached the slightest importance to it. The regular succession of bishops from James to Hadrian's time rests on the authority of Eusebius, who states (H. E. iv. 5) that he wrote from report, and not from documentary evidence.* Jerome, it is true, hints (Ep. 49, ad Paul.) that the temple was one of the many buildings with which Hadrian adorned Aelia; but there is no certainty that he built it, that he did so at the place known as Golgotha in his day, or that he intentionally erected a temple above the tomb of Christ. As Dean Stanley well says (S. and P. p. 458), "It is hardly conceivable that Hadrian could have had any motive in such a purpose, when his whole object in establishing his new city of Aelia was to insult, not the Christians, but the Jews, from whom, in Palestine at that time, the Christians were emphatically divided."

It has been suggested (Finlay, On the Site of the Holy Sepulchre) that, as the Romans made accurate maps and plans of the principal localities in their conquered provinces, Constantine could have had no difficulty in ascertaining the exact position of Golgotha. To this it may be objected that, unless Golgotha were the public place of execution, the spot at which three men were crucified would not have been of sufficient importance to be shown on a map; and that if the finders of the Tomb had been guided by a map, they would not have spoken of its discovery as miraculous. Possibly a tradition may have lingered as to the general direction, but that the exact spot was unknown seems to follow from the silence of Eusebius with regard to the place of Christ's burial in his earlier writings.^f

The view (Conder, PEFQy. Stat., 1883, p. 69 sq.) that the cave beneath the temple of Aphrodite was a natural cavern,^g connected with the mysteries of Venus, which was adopted by Macarius as the Sepulchre of Christ, and reconsecrated as a Christian Holy Place, derives some support from the statement of Jerome that from the time of Hadrian onwards Adonis had been worshipped in the Grotto at Bethlehem (Ep. xlix, ad Paulin.), and from the manner in which the "three holy caves" are alluded to by Eusebius (de Laud. Const. ix.). On the other hand, if there had been any doubt as to the authenticity of the site, Julian would probably have brought it forward as an instance of Christian duplicity. It is only natural to suppose that those who discovered the Tomb of Christ made every effort to ascertain the true site; yet it is difficult to resist the conclusion that they were guided by no definite tradition and by no trustworthy historical evidence.

The identity of the traditional Holy Sepulchre with the cave discovered by Constantine may be regarded as certain. Eusebius and Jerome (OS.^h p. 257, 22; p. 162, 25) place Golgotha to the north of Mount Zion, evidently the western hill; the Bordeaux Pilgrim passing from Zion, along the main street of the ancient city, to the "Gate of Neapolis," at or near the Damascus Gate, had Golgotha on his left hand and the Praetorium on his right (Itin. Hieros.); and S. Paula, after leaving the Sepulchre, ascends Zion (Ep. Paul.

^f Eusebius, writing ten or more years before the journey of Helena, refers to pilgrimages to the cave on the Mount of Olives in which Christ taught His disciples, and mentions the cave of the Nativity at Bethlehem (Demonst. Ev. vi. 18, p. 288; vii. 2, p. 343); and it is difficult to believe that he would not have alluded to the Tomb if its site had been known.

^g It is to be observed that Eusebius always speaks of the sepulchre as τὸ ἄντρον, which usually implies a natural cavern, rather than an excavated tomb (Vit. Const. iii. 25-33); and that he uses the same word when writing of the grotto of the Nativity at Bethlehem, and the cave of the Apostles on the Mount of Olives (iii. 43; Orat. de Laud. Const. ix.). The word used in the N. T. is generally μνημείον. Matt. xxvii. 61, xxviii. 1, has also τάφος.

^d It appears that special precautions had to be taken to prevent pilgrims biting pieces out of the cross when kissing it on Good Friday (S. Sil. I. c.).

* The arguments for and against the existence of any tradition respecting the site of the Tomb are given by Robinson (ll. 70 sq.).

vii.). Eucherius, c. A.D. 530 (§§ 1-5), distinctly places Golgotha to the north of modern Zion, and no other position is assigned to it by subsequent writers.

The Tomb was richly decorated by Constantine, who, in A.D. 326-335, erected over and near it two great churches: one, the Anastasis or Church of the Resurrection, contained the Sepulchre; the other, the Basilica or Martyrium, was dedicated to the Cross. There was also a smaller church of Golgotha or Calvary, which, though not mentioned by Eusebius, must have been built at the same time or soon afterwards. The Basilica stood in an open court with cloisters on three sides, and to the east of it were an atrium, with exedrae, and a porch. These buildings remained intact until 614, when they are said to have been destroyed or greatly injured by the Persians. They are described by Eusebius (Vit. Const. iii. 25-42), who was present at their dedication, and they were seen, whilst in a perfect state, by several pilgrims who have left records, more or less full, of what they saw (Itin. Hieros.; S. Silvae Aq. Per.; Jerome, Per. S. Paulae; Eucherius, De Loc. Sanct. i.-viii.; Brev. de Hieros.; Theodosius, De Sit. T. S. §§ 1-14; Antoninus, De Loc. Sanct. xvi.-xxvii.). After the Persian invasion and before the capture of the city by the Arabs, A.D. 637, the churches were repaired or rebuilt by Modestus, and in this state they were seen by Arculfus, c. 670-80, who, besides giving a detailed description of the buildings, is the first pilgrim to furnish a plan (De Loc. Sanct. i. 2-13); by Willibald (Hodoep.); and by Bernard (Itin.).

It is clear from a careful comparison of these ancient records, and especially of the plan of Arculfus, with the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre and its adjuncts, that many traces of the original churches remain. The relative position of the churches is the same; the circular Church of the Anastasis has preserved its form; the south wall of the Basilica can be traced from "Calvary" eastward; portions of the paved court have been brought to light; and one of the large cisterns constructed by Constantine has been discovered. The original surface of the ground inclined to the S.E., and a level platform was obtained by cutting away the rock at the western end to a depth of about 30 ft. below the level of Christian Street. At the same time the rock masses of the Tomb and "Calvary" were isolated so as to stand out prominently above the general level. This explains the remark of Dositheus (ii. 1, § 7), that on account of the hill there was only the wall of the enclosure on the west side of the Sepulchre; and it is probable that the isolation of the rock at "Calvary" gave rise to the term "Mount" (Monticulus) Calvary. The existence of two rock-hewn tombs, one to the west, the other to the north-east of the Holy Sepulchre, shows that this locality was used by the Jews as a place of burial, and that the Sepulchre may well have formed part of an ancient tomb. Cyril expressly states (Cat. xiv. 9) that the outer cave was cut away to facilitate the decoration of the Tomb itself, and there would have been no difficulty in doing this (Willis, Holy Sepulchre; Wilson, PEFQy. Stat., 1877, p. 130 sq.), though it is somewhat surprising that Eusebius does not mention an excavation of such churches were originally built, and very different views have been advanced on the subject;^b but no successful restoration can be made until the ground round the existing church has been examined by excavation.

The view that the Church of the Holy Sepulchre stands upon the site once occupied by Constantine's churches was contested by the late Mr. James Fergusson, who maintained, chiefly upon architectural grounds, that the original churches were situated within the Haram area, that the "Dome of the Rock" was the Church of the Resurrection, and that there was a transference of site during the first half of the 11th century (Essay, p. 154; D. of B. 1st ed. s. v. Jerusalem, Sect. x.; Temples of the Jews, p. 258 sq.) This theory, which from its novelty and from the heat imparted to the controversy by its originator and his opponents attracted much attention at the time, was not very favourably received, and the fuller information of the present day shows it to be quite untenable.

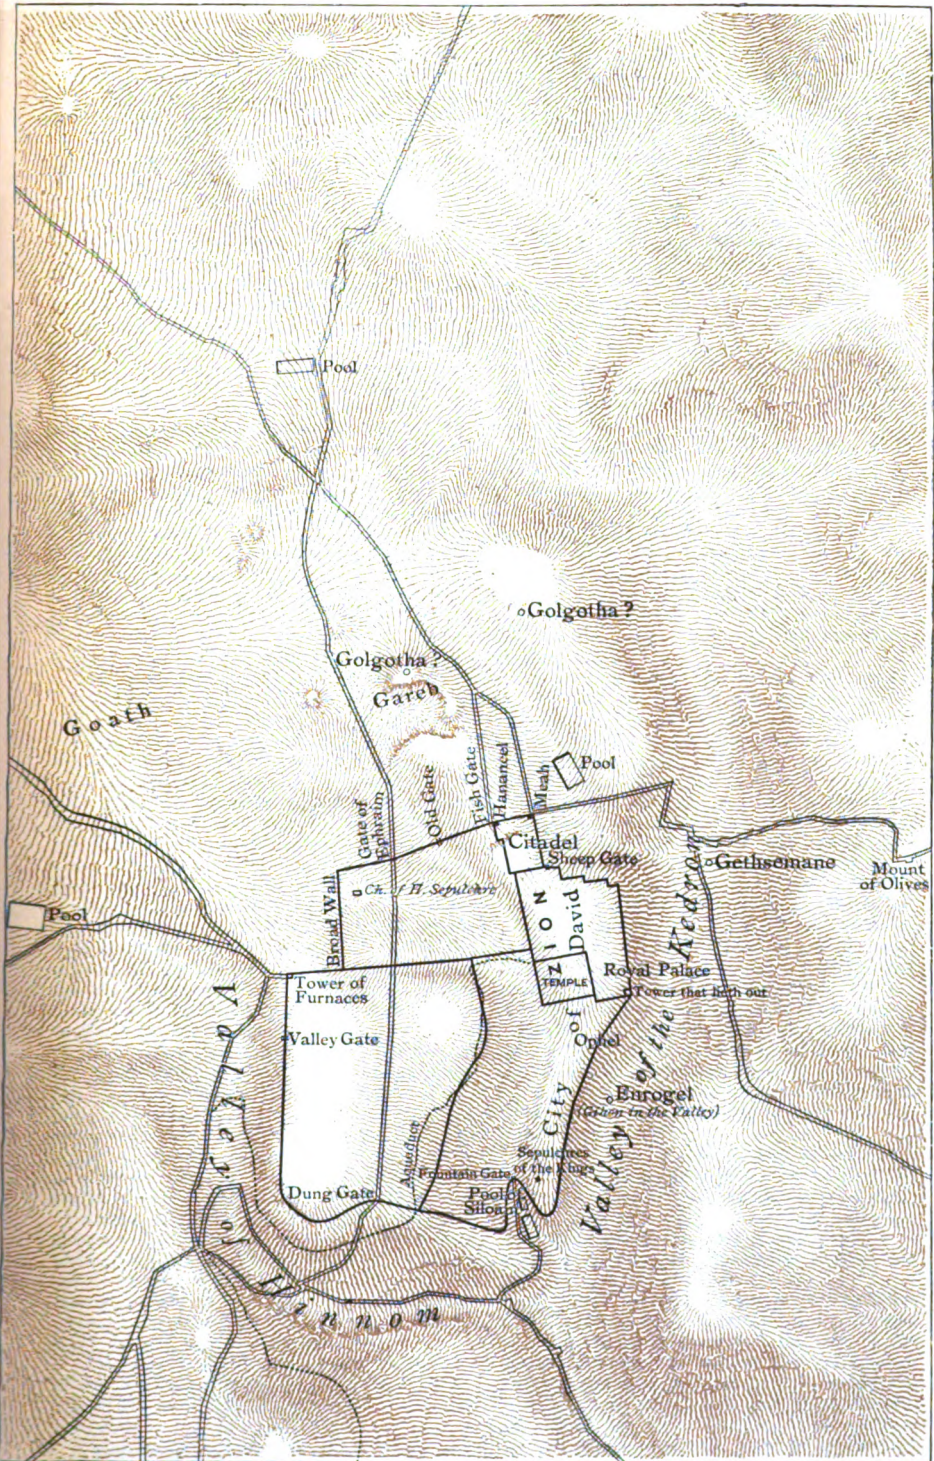

The history of the churches since their restoration by Modestus may be briefly told. About A.D. 1010 the Church of the Sepulchre was razed to its foundations (usque ad solum diruta, W. of Tyre, Hist. i. 4), and an attempt made to destroy the Tomb itself by order of the Fatimite Khalif el-Hâkim. The restoration of the churches was completed in A.D. 1048, and a few years after the capture of Jerusalem by the Crusaders the buildings were seen and described by Saewulf (P. P. Text Soc. Series) and Abbot Daniel (the same series). During the Latin occupation of the city the church was reconstructed so as to bring all the Holy Places under one roof; and this building, of which there are many detailed descriptions, existed until it was partially destroyed by fire in 1808.¹ The restoration of the church in its present form was completed in 1810.

The determination of the true sites of Golgotha and the Tomb of Christ must rest chiefly on topographical considerations, and unfortunately the information to be obtained from the Bible on this head is most meagre. We are told that Jesus was led away from Gethsemane to the house of the High Priest, possibly his official residence, and the same as that mentioned by Josephus (B. J. ii. 17, § 6); and that at daybreak next morning He was questioned by the Sanhedrin (Luke xxii. 66), which probably sat in the "Council House," between the Xystus and the western cloister of the Temple (B. J. v. 4, § 2), close to "Wilson's Arch." From the council chamber Jesus was taken to the Praetorium, and brought before Pilate (John xviii. 28, 29), who, after judgment, delivered Him to the Roman soldiers to be crucified. He was then led away to Golgotha and crucified with two malefactors.

The Praetorium could only have been one of two places,—the palace of Herod, on the western hill, or the Castle of Antonia, north of the Temple. The first was certainly occupied by Gessius Florus, who, Josephus says, in words that are almost an echo of the Gospels, "had his tribunal set before it, and sat upon it, when the High Priests, and the principal people, and all those of the greatest eminence in the city, came before his tribunal" (B. J. ii. 14, § 8). How long previously the palace had been the residence of the Roman Procurators is uncertain, but it is scarcely probable that Pilate, whose wife was with him, would have lived with the soldiers of the garrison in the Antonia, when Herod's palace, with its gardens and banqueting halls, was at his disposal. On the other hand, a tradition at least as old as the 4th cent. (Itin. Hieros.) places the Praetorium to the east of the Sepulchre; Theodosius and Antoninus in the 6th century mention that the Church of St. Sophia occupied the site of the Praetorium, apparently that on which the "Dome of the Rock" now stands; and later tradition identifies it with the Antonia, which stood at the N.W. angle of the Haram. A possible explanation is that Jesus was in the first place taken to Herod's palace,—the Praetorium, in which Pilate resided; that after judgment He was taken by the Roman soldiers to the Antonia, which was at once the head-quarters of the garrison and the state prison; and that from thence He was led out with the two thieves to be crucified.

The place of the Crucifixion was in a garden (John xix. 41), without the gate (Heb. xiii. 12: cp. Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 20; John xix.

17), and nigh to the city (John xix. 20), yet not necessarily close to it, for the Mount of Olives is said (Acts i. 12) to have been "nigh" to the city, and the transference of the cross, and the visits of the disciples and the women, give the idea of distance. It was near a frequented thoroughfare leading from one of the city gates to the country (Matt. xxvii. 39; Mark xv. 21, 29; Luke xxiii. 26), and was visible from afar off (Mark xv. 40; Luke xxiii. 49), and presumably from the Temple, or some point of vantage whence the high priests could look on without the risk of ceremonial defilement (Matt. xxvii. 41; Mark xv. 31; cp. John xviii. 28). Possibly also, as the sin offering was to be burned some distance from the camp, and to the north of the Altar (Lev. i. 10, 11; iv. 21: cp. Heb. xiii. 11, 12), Christ the Antitype suffered in the same position. In the garden in which He was crucified was the rock-hewn tomb in which "never man had yet lain" (Matt. xxvii. 60; Mark xv. 46; Luke xxiii. 53; John xix. 41).

In discussing the site of Golgotha, it is necessary to bear in mind that, at the time of the Crucifixion, the third wall, or that of Agrippa (as shown on Plate II.), had not been built; and that of the main roads entering the city, the one from the north, after passing the "Tomb of the Kings," probably led by three separate ways to the Antonia, to the principal gate of the second wall, and to the Gate Gennath and Herod's palace. The sites that have been suggested are:—

(i.) The traditional spot is now well within the city, and has not yet been proved to have been without the walls at the time of the Crucifixion. Nothing is yet certainly known of the course of the second wall; and the question whether it ran so as just to exclude or just to include the present site, can only be solved by excavation. The discoverers of the Sepulchre apparently believed that it was outside the walls, and that it was brought within their limits by Hadrian when he rebuilt the city. Amongst the arguments in favour of the site are the early tradition, the existence of rock-hewn tombs in the immediate vicinity, and the easy access, through the Gate Gennath, from Herod's palace, supposing that building to have been the Praetorium and the starting-point of the way to Golgotha. On the other hand, the tradition is not wholly reliable, the presence of tombs does not necessarily imply that the spot was outside the wall, and the position is west rather than north of the Haram esh-Sherif, in which the Temple stood.

(ii.) The site in the Haram advocated by Mr. Fergusson is too close to the position he assigned to the Temple, and it was apparently within the wall of Herod. The historical evidence is decisive against it, and there is no evidence that the cave beneath the Sakhrah was ever used as a place of burial.

(iii.) M. Renan (Vie de Jésus, p. 269) considers that the site of the Crucifixion must have been to the north or north-west of the city, on the plateau between the Kedron and the Hinnom valleys; and he is inclined to place it near the N.W. angle of the present wall, or on the hill side above the Birket Mamilla. This position, suitable in many respects, is too far to the west to meet the requirements of Lev. i. 10, 11.

(iv.) The proximity of the knoll above "Jeremiah's Grotto" to the great road from the north, its prominence, and its northerly position with regard to the Temple led Otto Thenius, as early as 1849, to identify it with Golgotha; and this view has since been strongly advocated by Felix Howe (1871), the late General Gordon, Major Conder, and other English and American writers. The principal argument in its favour, in addition to those just mentioned, is that according to modern Jewish tradition it is the place of execution by stoning, called in the Talmud the Beth has-Sekilah, or "House of Stoning." The existence of a cliff, the legends connected with the valley to the east, and the very early belief that St. Stephen suffered martyrdom outside the Damascus Gate, support the view that this spot was the "House of Stoning;" and if Christ had been condemned by the Sanhedrin for an offence against the religious law, He would probably have suffered death here. It must, however, be remembered that He was condemned by Pilate and crucified by Roman soldiers; and there is not the least evidence that the Roman place of crucifixion and the Jewish "House of Stoning" were identical. The contrary seems the more reasonable supposition. The Roman custom was to carry out executions beside a public highway, and the soldiers would scarcely have selected a place of execution so peculiarly Jewish. It is hardly probable either that the garden of Joseph of Arimathea included the "House of Stoning," or that Joseph would have made a new tomb in such close proximity to the common Jewish place of execution.

(v.) There are now no means of ascertaining the true site of the Crucifixion, but it may well be that Christ, having been brought from Herod's palace to the Antonia, was led out, with the two thieves, along that branch of the north road which kept to the eastern hill without descending into the Tyropeon valley. The line of this road is clearly marked, within and without the city, and somewhere close to it the three crosses were possibly erected. The hill of Bezetha, forming as it does a prolongation of the ridge of Mount Moriah, would appear to be a suitable spot, but it must at that time have been covered with the "new town," which soon afterwards necessitated the construction of the third wall. Perhaps the view which best meets all the requirements of the case is that which was held by the late Bishop Gobat of Jerusalem, who maintained that Christ suffered directly to the north of the Temple, on the hill or spur to the east of Jeremiah's Grotto.

12. Buildings: Constantine to Godfrey.—The attempt of Julian, "the Apostate," to rebuild the Temple of the Jews was commenced about six months before his death; and according to Frontispiece of Julian in south wall of Haram.

Mr. Fergusson, traces of his work may still be seen in the south wall of the Haram. "The great tunnel-like vault under the Mosque el-Aksa, with its four-domed vestibule, is almost certainly part of the temple of Herod [see TEMPLE], and coeval with his period; but externally to this, certain architectural decorations have been added (see above), and that so slightly, that daylight can be perceived between the old walls and the subsequent decorations, except at the points of attachment." From their classical forms these adjuncts cannot be so late as the time of Justinian; and they may with very tolerable certainty be ascribed to the age of Julian. Above them an inscription bearing the name of Hadrian has been inserted in the wall, but turned upside down; and the whole of the masonry being of an intermediate character between that which we know to be ancient, and that which we easily recognise as the work of the Muhammadans, there can be little doubt but that it belongs to this period.

The principal bearing of Julian's attempt on the topography of Jerusalem consists in the fact of its proving not only that the site of the Jewish temple was perfectly well known at this period—A.D. 362—but that the spot was then, as always, held accursed by the Christians, and as doomed by the denunciation of Christ Himself never to be re-established.

During the reign of Constantine two churches were erected on the Mount of Olives, and there was a church on Mount Zion, which was called the mater omnium ecclesiarum, and was said to date from the time of Hadrian* (Epiphanius, De M. et P. 15; Theodosius, § 6). The tract of Eucherius (c. A.D. 440) mentions no other churches, but the visit of the Empress Eudocia to Jerusalem, A.D. 438, appears to have initiated a period of great building activity. To this period belonged the Church of St. Stephen, outside the Damascus Gate, and many of the churches mentioned by writers in the 6th century. The most important of these were St. Peter's, once the house of Caiaphas; St. Mary's, at the Pool of Bethesda; and the churches of the Tomb of the Virgin, Siloam, and the pinnacle of the Temple. The Church of St. Sophia or of the Praetorium, which, from the description given of it, must have stood on the site now occupied by "the Dome of the Rock," was apparently built towards the close of the 5th or commencement of the 6th century. It is only mentioned in documents of the 6th century (Brev. de Hieros.; Theodosius; and Antoninus), and was probably, with the Mary Church of Justinian close to it, destroyed during the Persian invasion.

Nearly two centuries after the attempt of Julian to rebuild the Temple, Justinian, according to Mr. Fergusson, "erected a church at Jerusalem; of which, fortunately, we have so full and detailed an account in the works of Procopius (de Aedificiis Const.) that we can have little difficulty in fixing its site, though no remains (at least above ground) exist to verify our conjectures. The description given by Procopius is so clear, and the details he gives with regard to the necessity of building up the substructure point so unmistakably to the spot near to which it must have stood, that almost all topographers have jumped to the conclusion that the Mosque el-Aksa is the identical church referred to. The architecture of that building is, however, alone sufficient to refute any such idea. No seven-aisled basilica was built in that age, and least of all by Justinian, whose favourite plan was a dome on pendentives, which in fact, in his age, had become the type of an Oriental Church. Besides, the Aksa has no apse, and, from its situation, never could have had either that or any of the essential features of a Christian basilica. Its whole architecture is that of the end of the 7th century, and its ordinance is essentially that of a mosque. It is hardly necessary to argue this point, however, as the Aksa stands on a point which was perfectly known at the time to be the very centre of the site of Solomon's Temple. Not only is this shown from Julian's attempt, but all the historians, Christian and Muhammadan, who refer to Omar's visit to Jerusalem, relate that the Sakhrah was covered with filth and abhorred by the Christians; and more than this, we have the direct testimony of Eutychius, writing in the 9th century, from Alexandria (Annales, ii. 289), 'That the Christians had built no church within the area of the Temple on account of the denunciations of the Lord, and had left it in ruins.'

"Notwithstanding this, there is no difficulty in fixing on the site of this church, inasmuch as the vaults that fill up the south-eastern angle of the Haram area are almost certainly of the age of Justinian (woodcuts, pp. 1635, 1639), and are just such as Procopius describes; so that if it were situated at the northern extremity of the vaults, all the arguments that apply to the Aksa equally apply to this situation." After a careful re-examination of the whole question, Prof. Hayter Lewis has come to the same conclusion with regard to the position of the church (Holy Places, p. 88).

The "Hostel" and Church of St. Mary founded by Charlemagne in the first years of the 9th century complete the list of Christian buildings of interest.

The Muslims are said to have built two important mosques at Jerusalem—the Kubbet es-Sakhrah, "Dome of the Rock," and the Mosque el-Aksa. The erection of the first is ascribed by Arab historians to the Khalif Abd ul-Melik, and a Cufic inscription in the mosque states that it was built A.H. 72, or A.D. 691. The building is so perfect in form, and so classical in detail, that doubts have, from time to time, arisen with regard to its Arab origin. Mr. Fergusson believed that it was the original church of the Anastasis erected by Constantine (Temples of the Jews, p. 192 sq.); whilst Prof. Sepp considers it to be the work of Justinian (Die Felsenkuppel eine Just. Sophien Kirche). The supporters of the Arab origin of the mosque maintain that it was designed for the Arabs by a Byzantine or Persian architect, and built by Persian or Byzantine workmen, before the Arabs had developed any definite style of art of their own (Hayter Lewis, Holy Places, p. 72). The fact that the Arabs never erected a building so purely classical in feeling elsewhere gives rise to the suspicion that Abd ul-Melik did nothing more than restore a Christian church. There is probably no more foundation for the assertion that he was the builder of the "Dome of the Rock" than there is for the statement that el-Walid built the mosque at Damascus when he only restored and enlarged a church. It may be suggested that the "Dome of the Rock" was originally the Church of St. Sophia, built on the supposed site of the Praetorium; that it was destroyed by the Persians; that it was rebuilt with the old material by Abd ul-Melik, who covered it with a dome; and that it was again repaired and redecored by el-Mamûn. The Mosque el-Aksa was built, c. 690, on the site of the Mosque of Omar, by Abd ul-Melik, on a scale of great grandeur out of the ruins of Justinian's Church of St. Mary. In 746 or 755 it was partly thrown down by an earthquake, and it was afterwards rebuilt by el-Mahdi (775-785) with fifteen aisles, of which seven

* Possibly there was also a church near the site of the Temple, the ἱερόν to which Julian's workmen fled when driven from their works by the globes of fire that issued from the foundations of the Temple (Gregory Nazianzen, ad Jud. et Gent. 7, 1, and confirmed by Sozomen). It is a question, however, whether the building referred to was not that mentioned by the Bordeaux Pilgrim as standing on the site of the Temple, possibly the temple erected by Hadrian.

only now remain (Hayter Lewis, H. P. p. 82 sq.; Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, p. 91 sq.).

13. Mediæval Jerusalem.—There are so many descriptions of Jerusalem during the Latin occupation that it is possible to construct a plan of the city at that time with considerable accuracy. The walls, afterwards partly remodelled by Suleiman the Magnificent, did not differ greatly from those of the present day. The Gate of David is now the Jaffa Gate; the Postern of St. Lazarus was in the north wall to the west of the Damascus (then called St. Stephen's) Gate; the Madeleine Postern is now "Herod's Gate," and the Gate of Jehoshaphat that of St. Stephen. The Golden Gate was open, and processions passed through it to the Holy Places on the slopes of Olivet; the Postern of the Tannery is the present Dung Gate, and the Zion Gate was to the east of the modern gate of the same name. From David's Gate a street in part called David Street and in part Temple Street ran eastward to the Haram, which it entered by the "Beautiful Gate," now Bâb es-Silsûeh. From St. Stephen's Gate a street of the same name ran southward to the "Syrian Exchange" at the north end of the bazaars, which, then as now, were three covered streets; at the south end of the bazaars was the "Latin Exchange," whence Mount Zion Street led directly to the Zion Gate. Parallel to and east of Mount Zion Street was the Street of the Arch of Judas, in which Judas was said to have hanged himself; and further east was the Street of the Germans. An unnamed street ran from St. Stephen's Gate down the valley and under "Wilson's Arch" to the Postern of the Tannery, and this was joined near the Austrian Consulate by the Street of Jehoshaphat. From David Street, the Street of the Patriarch (now Christian Street) led northward past the gate of the Hospital, the west end of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, and the house of the Patriarch to the Street of the Sepulchre. To the south of the great church, with its cloisters and dormitories, were the Hospital of the Knights of St. John, and the churches of St. Mary the Latin and St. Mary the Great, occupying, with their adjuncts, the Muristân. Within the Haram enclosure were the "Templum Domini," Kubbet es-Sakhrah, the "Templum Salomonis," Mosque el-Aksa, the Chapel of St. James (now the "Dome of the Chain"), and, at the S.E. angle, the Chapel of "the Cradle." Outside the walls on the north were the Church of St. Stephen, the Lepers' Hospital, and the Anerie, in which the asses and horses of the Hospitallers and pilgrims were stabled; on the south were the Coenaculum, the Church of St. Saviour, and the Church of St. Peter in Gallicante; and on the east Gethsemane and the Church of St. Mary of Jehoshaphat. Within the city were also the churches of St. Anne, St. Mary Magdalene, St. James of Galicia, St. Caristo, St. Peter ad Vincula, and St. Martin.

Plan of Jerusalem in the 12th century.

Descriptions of Modern Jerusalem will be found in Murray's and Baedeker's Handbooks to Syria and Palestine. [W.]

JERU'SHA (יְרוּשָׁה) = taken in possession; 'Iepovâ, B. 'Epoûs, A. 'Iepoûs; Jerusa, daughter of Zadok, queen of Uzziah, and mother of Jotham king of Judah (2 Kings xv. 33). In Chronicles the name is given under the altered form of JERUSHAH (יהושׁה); 'Ιερουσα, B. 'Ιερουσα; Jerusa), 2 Ch. xxvii. 1. See the preceding article.

JESAI'AH, R. V. JESHAI'AH (יהושׁע); B. 'Ισαβ, A. 'Ιεσειδ; Jeseias). 1. Son of Hananiah, brother of Pelatiah, and grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. iii. 21). But according to the LXX. and the Vulgate, he was the son of Pelatiah. For an explanation of this genealogy, and the difficulties connected with it, see Lord A. Hervey's Genealogies of our Lord, ch. iv. § v. 2. (יהושׁע), i.e. Jeshaiiah, as in R. V.; 'Ιεσα, A. 'Ιεσσα, N. 'Ιεσαδ; Isaia.) A Benjamite, whose descendants were among those chosen by lot to reside in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 7).

JESHAI'AH. 1. (יהושׁע = salvation of Jehovah): B. Σαϊδ και Σεμελ in 1 Ch. xxv. 3, and 'Ιωσα, B. 'Ιωσειδ in v. 15; in the former A. has 'Ιεσα και Σεμελ, and in the latter 'Ιωσα: the Vulg. has Jeseias and Jesaias.) One of the six sons of Jeduthun, set apart for the musical service of the Temple, under the leadership of their father, the inspired minstrel: he was the chief of the eighth division of the singers. The Hebrew name is identical with that of the prophet Isaiah.

2. (BA. 'Ωσαις; Isatas.) A Levite in the reign of David, eldest son of Rehabiah, a descendant of Amram through Moses (1 Ch. xxvi. 25). He is called Isshiah (יהושׁע) in 1 Ch. xxiv. 21, in A. V. and R. V., though the Hebrew is merely another form of the name. Shebuel, one of his ancestors, appears among the Hemanites in 1 Ch. xxv. 4, and is said in Targ. on 1 Ch. xxvi. 24 to be the same as Jonathan the son of Gershom, the priest of the idols of the Danites, who afterwards returned to the fear of Jehovah.

3. (יהושׁע; B. 'Ιωσειδ, A. 'Ηρατα; Isaias.) The son of Athaliah and chief of the house of the Bene Elam who returned with Ezra (Ezra viii. 7). In 1 Esd. viii. 33 he is called Josias.

4. (B. 'Ωσαις; Isaias.) A Merarite, who returned with Ezra (Ezra viii. 19). He is called Osaias in 1 Esd. viii. 48.

JESHA'NAH (יהושׁנא) = ancient; B. Καβ, A. 'Ανά, Joseph. ἡ 'Ισανά, Euseb. 'Ιασανά; Jesana), a town which, with its dependent villages (Heb. and LXX. A. "daughters"), was one of the three taken from Jeroboam by Abijah (2 Ch. xiii. 19; cp. Joseph. Ant. viii. 11, § 3). The other two were Bethel and Ephraim (R. V. Ephron), and Jeshanah is named between them. A place of the same name (ἡ 'Ισανας) was the scene of an encounter between Herod and Pappus, the general of Antigonus' army, related by Josephus with curious details (Ant. xiv. 15, § 12), which however convey no indication of its position. It is not mentioned in the Onomasticon, unless we accept the conjecture of Reland (Pal. p. 861) that Jerome's "Jethaba, urbs antiqua Judaeae" (OS. p. 166, 30), is at once a corruption and a translation of the name Jeshana, which signifies "old." It has been identified by M. Clermont-Ganneau with the village of

'Ain Sinia, which stands on an ancient site about 3½ miles N. of Bethel (PEFQy. Stat. 1877, p. 206). There are here abundant springs, and many rock-hewn tombs, on the door of one of which there is an inscription in ancient Hebrew character (PEF. Mem. ii. 291, 302). [G.] [W.]

JESHARE'LAH (יהרשׁלח); B. 'Ισρηλά, A. 'Ισρηλά; Isracla), head of the seventh of the twenty-four wards into which the musicians of the Levites were divided (1 Ch. xxv. 14). [HEMAN; JEDUTHUN.] He belonged to the house of Asaph, and had twelve of his house under him. In v. 2 his name is written Asarelah, with an initial א instead of י; in the LXX. B. 'Εραηλ, A. 'Ισρηλ. [A. C. H.]

JESHEB-E-AB (בן ישׁבאב) = the Father bringeth back; B. Γελαβ, A. 'Ισβαδλ; Isbaab), head of the fourteenth course of priests (1 Ch. xxiv. 13). [JEOHARIB.] [A. C. H.]

JESHER (ישׁר) = uprightness; BA. 'Ιωσαρ; Jaser), one of the sons of Caleb the son of Hezron by his wife Azubah (1 Ch. ii. 18). In two of Kennicott's MSS. it is written יתר, Jether, from the preceding verse, and in one MS. the two names are combined. The Peshitto Syriac has Oshir, the same form in which Jasher is represented in 2 Sam. i. 18.

JESHI'MON (יהושׁימון) = the waste: in Num. ἡ ἔρημος; in Sam. δ' 'Ιεσσαμῶς and 'Ιεσσαμῶς; A. Eiessaμῶς: desertum, solitudo, Jesimon), a name which occurs in Num. xxi. 20 and xxiii. 28, in designating the position of Pisgah and Peor: both described as "facing (על-פני) the Jeshimon"; R. V. "that looketh down upon the desert." Not knowing more than the general locality of either Peor or Pisgah, this gives us no clue to the situation of Jeshimon. But it is elsewhere used in a similar manner with reference to the position of two places very distant from both the above—the hill of Hachilah, "on the south of" or "facing the Jeshimon" (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1, 3), and the wilderness of Maon, also south of it (xxiii. 24). Ziph (xxiii. 15) and Maon are known at the present day. They lie a few miles south of Hebron, so that the district strictly north of them is the hill-country of Judah. But a line drawn between Maon and the probable position of Peor—on the high country opposite Jericho—passes over the dreary, barren waste of the hills lying immediately on the west of the Dead Sea. To this district the name, if interpreted as a Hebrew word, would be not inapplicable. It would also suit as to position, as it would be full in view from an elevated point on the highlands of Moab, and not far from north of Maon and Ziph. On the other hand, the use of the word ἡ-Arābūh, in 1 Sam. xxiii. 24, must not be overlooked, meaning, as that elsewhere does, the sunk district of the Jordan and Dead Sea, the modern Ghor. Beth-Jeshimoth too, which by its name ought to have some connexion with Jeshimon, would appear to have been on the lower level, somewhere near the mouth of the Jordan. [BETH-JESHIMOTH.] In R. V. the word is always translated "the desert;" and it is doubtful whether it should be taken to be a proper name.

In that case the particular desert mentioned in Numb. would not be the same as that referred to in 1 Samuel xxiii. The passages in which it is first mentioned are indisputably of very early date, and it is quite possible that it is an archaic name found and adopted by the Israelites (PEF. Mem. iii. 299; Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 535). [G.] [W.]

JESHISHAI (יֵשׁוּשַׁי, (?)) = old (gray); B. 'Isai, A. 'Iesai; Jesisi), one of the ancestors of the Gadites who dwelt in Gilead, and whose genealogies were made out in the days of Jotham king of Judah (1 Ch. v. 14). In the Peshitto Syriac the latter part of the verse is omitted.

JESHOHA'IAH (יְהוֹחָאִיאַח, (?)) = bowing before Jehovah; BA. 'Iasouia; Jsuhaia), a chief of one of the families of that branch of the Simeonites which was descended from Shimei, and was more numerous than the rest of the tribe (1 Ch. iv. 36). He was concerned in the raid upon the Hamites in the reign of Hezekiah.

JESHU'A (יֵשׁוּעַ; 'Iησοῦς; Jeshue and Joshue), a later Hebrew pronunciation of Joshua, implied by Jehoshua. [JEHOSHUA.]

1. Joshua, the son of Nun, is called Jeshua in one passage (Neh. viii. 17). [JOSHUA.]

2. R. V. A priest in the reign of David, to whom the ninth course fell by lot (1 Ch. xxiv. 11). He is called Jeshuah in the A. V. One branch of the house, viz. the children of Jedaiah, returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 36; but see JEDAIAH).

3. One of the Levites in the reign of Hezekiah, after the reformation of worship, placed in trust in the cities of the priests in their classes, to distribute to their brethren of the offerings of the people (2 Ch. xxxi. 15).

4. Son of Jehozadak, first high-priest of the third series, viz. of those after the Babylonish Captivity, and ancestor of the fourteen high-priests his successors down to Joshua or Jason, and Onias or Menelaus, inclusive. [HIGH-PRIEST.] Jeshua, like his contemporary Zerubbabel, was probably born in Babylon, whither his father Jehozadak had been taken captive while young (1 Ch. vi. 15, A. V.). He came up from Babylon in the first year of Cyrus with Zerubbabel, and took a leading part with him in the rebuilding of the Temple, and in the restoration of the Jewish Commonwealth. Everything we read of him indicates a man of earnest piety, patriotism, and courage. One of less faith and resolution would never have surmounted all the difficulties and opposition he had to contend with. His first care on arriving at Jerusalem was to rebuild the Altar, and restore the daily sacrifice, which had been suspended for some fifty years. He then, in conjunction with Zerubbabel, hastened to collect materials for rebuilding the Temple, and was able to lay the foundation of it as early as the second month of the second year of their return to Jerusalem (B.C. 536). The services on this occasion were conducted by the priests in their proper apparel, with their trumpets, and by the sons of Asaph, the Levites, with their cymbals, according to the ordinance of king David (Ezra iii.). However, the progress of the work was hindered by the enmity of the Samaritans, who bribed the counsellors of the kings of Persia so effectually to obstruct it that the Jews were unable to proceed with it till the second year of Darius Hystapes—an interval of about fourteen years. In that year, B.C. 520, at the prophesying of Haggai and Zechariah (Ezra v. 1, vi. 14; Hagg. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 1-9; Zech. i.-viii.), the work was resumed by Jeshua and Zerubbabel with redoubled vigour, and was happily completed on the third day of the month Adar (= March), in the sixth of Darius (B.C. 516). The dedication of the Temple, and the celebration of the Passover, in the next month, were kept with great solemnity and rejoicing (Ezra vi. 15-22), and especially "twelve he-goats, according to the number of the tribes of Israel," were offered as a sin-offering for all Israel. Jeshua's zeal in the work is commended by the Son of Sirach (Ecclus. xlix. 12). Besides the great importance of Jeshua as a historical character, from the critical times in which he lived, and the great work which he accomplished, his name (= Jesus), his restoration of the Temple, his office as high-priest, and especially the two prophecies concerning him in Zech. iii. and vi. 9-15, point him out as an eminent type of Christ. [HIGH-PRIEST.] Nothing is known of Jeshua later than the seventh year of Darius, with which the narrative of Ezra i.-vi. closes. Josephus, who says that the Temple was seven years in building, and places the dedication of it in the ninth year of Darius, contributes no information whatever concerning him: his history here, with the exception of the 9th sect. of b. xi. ch. 4, being merely a paraphrase of Ezra and 1 Esdras, especially the latter. [ZERUBBABEL.] Jeshua had probably conversed often with Daniel and Ezekiel, and may or may not have known Jehoiachin at Babylon in his youth. He probably died at Jerusalem (see Hunter, After the Exile, ch. iii. sq.). His name is written Jeshushua in Zech. iii. 1, 3, &c.; Hagg. i. 1, 12, &c.

5. Head of a Levitical house, one of those which returned from the Babylonish Captivity, and took an active part under Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The name is used to designate either the whole family or the successive chiefs of it (Ezra ii. 40, iii. 9; Neh. iii. 19, viii. 7, ix. 4, 5, xii. 8, &c.). Jeshua, and Kadmiel, with whom he is frequently associated, were both "sons of Hodaviah" (called Judah, Ezra iii. 9), but Jeshua's more immediate ancestor was Azaniah (Neh. x. 9). In Neh. xii. 24 "Jeshua the son of Kadmiel" should probably be "Jeshua (and) Kadmiel." The LXX. read καὶ υἱὸν Καθμάρχα. It is more likely that ⲓⲛ is an accidental error for ⲓ).

6. A branch of the family of Pahath-Moab, one of the chief families, probably, of the tribe of Judah (Neh. vii. 11, x. 14, &c.; Ezra x. 30). His descendants were the most numerous of all the families which returned with Zerubbabel. Neh. vii. 11, "The children of Pahath-Moab,

* The connexion with Bani, Hashabiah (or Hashabniah), Henadad, and the Levites (vii. 17-19), indicates that Jeshua, the father of Ezer, is the same person as in the other passages cited.

of the children of Jeshua and Joab," represents Pahath-Moab (i.e. governor of Moab) as the head of the family. [A. C. H.]

JESHU'A (יֵשׁוּעַ; 'Ἰησοῦ; Jesuc), one of the towns re-inhabited by the people of Judah after the return from Captivity (Neh. xi. 26). Being mentioned with Moladah, Beersheba, &c., it was apparently in the extreme south. It does not, however, occur in the original lists of Judah and Simeon (Josh. xv., xix.), nor is there any name in those lists of which this would be probably a corruption. It is not mentioned elsewhere. Conder (PEF. Mem. iii. pp. 404, 409) has suggested Kh. S'auah, an important site on the edge of the Beersheba desert. [G.] [W.]

JESHU'AH (יֵשׁוּעָה, contr. form of יֵשׁוּעַהוּ; 'Ἰησοῦς; Jesua), a priest in the reign of David (1 Ch. xxiv. 11), the same as JESHUA, No. 2.

JESHU'RUN, and once by mistake in A. V. JESU'RUN, Is. xlv. 2 (יֵשׁוּרֻן; ὁ ἠγαπημένος, once with the addition of 'Ἰσραήλ, which the Arabic of the Lond. Polyglot adopts to the exclusion of the former; dilectus, rectissimus), a symbolical name for Israel in Deut. xxiii. 15, xxxiii. 5, 26; Is. xlv. 2. The Targum and Peshitto Syriac uniformly render Jeshurun by "Israel."* The termination ך is intensive, as the Vulgate takes it, and not an affectionate diminutive (see Dillmann² on Deut. xxiii. 15, and Delitzsch⁴ on Is. l. c.). [F.]

JESI'AH, R. V. ISSHIAH (יֵשִׁיָּהוּ; i.e. Yish-shiyahu = whom Jehovah lends; B. 'Ἰησοῦελ, A. 'Ἰεσῖά; Jesia). 1. A Korhite, one of the mighty men, "helpers of the battle," who joined David's standard at Ziklag during his flight from Saul (1 Ch. xii. 6).

2. (יֵשִׁיָּהוּ; B. 'Ἰεσῖά, A. 'Ἰεσοῖά.) The second son of Ūzziel, the son of Kohath (1 Ch. xxiii. 20). He is the same as Isshiah, whose representative was Zechariah (1 Ch. xxiv. 25); but in A. V. the translators in the present instance followed the Vulg., as they have too often done in the case of proper names.

JESI-MI'EL (יֵשִׁימְיֵאל; T. 'Ἰεσμαήλ, B. omits; Ismiel), a Simeonite, descended from the prolific family of Shimei, and a prince of his own branch of the tribe, whom he led against the peaceful Hamites in the reign of Hezekiah (1 Ch. iv. 36).

JES'SE (יֵשֶׁ; i.e. Yishai; B. 'Ἰεσσαί, Joseph. 'Ἰεσσαῖος; Isai: in the margin of 1 Ch. x. 14, the A. V. translators have given the Vulgate form), the father of David, and thus the immediate progenitor of the whole line of the kings of Judah, and ultimately of Christ. He is the only one of his name who appears in the sacred records. Jesse was the son of OBED, who again was the fruit of the union of Boaz and the Moabitess Ruth. Nor was Ruth's the only foreign blood that ran in his veins; for his great-grandmother was no less a person than Rahab the Canaanite, of Jericho (Matt. i. 5). Jesse's genealogy^o is twice given in full in the Old Testament,—viz. Ruth iv. 18–22, and 1 Ch. ii. 5–12. We there see that long before David had rendered his family illustrious, it belonged to the greatest house of Judah, that of Pharez, through Hezron his eldest son. One of the links in the descent was Nahshon (N. T., R. V.), chief man of the tribe at the critical time of the Exodus. In the N. T. the genealogy is also twice given (Matt. i. 3–5; Luke iii. 32–34).

He is commonly designated as "Jesse the Bethlehemite" (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 18). So he is called by his son David, then fresh from home (xvii. 58); but his full title is "the Ephrathite of Bethlehem-Judah" (xvii. 12). The double expression and the use of the antique word Ephrathite perhaps imply that he was one of the oldest families in the place. He is an "old man" when we first meet with him (1 Sam. xvii. 12), with eight sons (xvi. 10, xvii. 12), residing at Bethlehem (xvi. 4, 5). It would appear, however, from the terms of xvi. 4, 5, and of Josephus (Ant. vi. 8, § 1), that Jesse was not one of the "elders" of the town.

The few slight glimpses we can catch of him are soon recalled. According to an ancient Jewish tradition, recorded in the Targum on 2 Sam. xxi. 19, Jesse was a weaver of the veils of the sanctuary; but as there is no contradiction, so there is no corroboration, of this in the Bible, and it is possible that it was suggested by the occurrence of the word oregim, "weavers," in connexion with a member of his family. [JAARE-OREGIM.] Jesse's wealth seems to have consisted of a flock of sheep and goats (יָבֵשׁ, A. V. "sheep"), which were under the care of David (xvi. 11; xvii. 34, 35). Of the produce of this flock we find him on two occasions sending the simple presents which in those days the highest persons were wont to accept—milk cheeses to the captain of the division of the army in which his sons were serving (xvii. 18), and a kid to Saul (xvi. 20); with the accompaniment in each case of parched corn from the fields of Boaz, loaves of the bread from which Bethlehem took its very name, and wine from the vineyards which still enrich the terraces of the hill below the village.

When David's rupture with Saul had finally driven him from the court, and he was in the cave of Adullam, "his brethren and all his father's house" joined him (xxii. 1). His "brother" (probably Eliab) is mentioned on a former occasion (xx. 29) as taking the lead in the family. This is no more than we should expect from Jesse's great age. David's anxiety at the same period to find a safe refuge for his parents from the probable vengeance of Saul, is also quite in accordance with their helpless condition. He took his father and his mother into the country of Moab, and deposited them with the king, and there they disappear from our view in the records of Scripture. But another old Jewish tradition (Rabboth Seder, 872, 256, col. 2) states that after David had quitted the hold, his parents and brothers were put to death by the king of Moab, so that there remained, besides David, but one brother, who took refuge with Nahash, king of the Bene-Ammon. In the 4th century Jesse's tomb was shown near Bethlehem (Itin. Hierosol.); it is now pointed out, with that of Ruth, in the Deir el-Arb'ain close to Hebron. In the 12th century the "house of Jesse" was shown at Bethel, a bow-shot east of Bethlehem (Abbot Daniel, Pilg. xlix.).

Who the wife of Jesse was we are not told. His eight sons will be found displayed under DAVID, p. 721. The family contained in addition two female members, Zeruih and Abigail, but it is uncertain whether these were Jesse's daughters; for though they are called the sisters of his sons (1 Ch. ii. 16), yet Abigail is said to have been the daughter of Nahash (2 Sam. xvii. 25). Of this two explanations have been proposed. (1.) The Jewish—that NAHASH was another name for Jesse (Jerome, Q. Hebr. on 2 Sam. xvii. 25^d). (2.) Dean Stanley's—that Jesse's wife had been formerly wife or concubine to Nahash, possibly the king of the Ammonites [DAVID, p. 722].

An English reader can hardly fail to remark how often Jesse is mentioned long after the name of David had become famous enough to supersede that of his obscure and humble parent. While David was a struggling outlaw, it was natural that to friend and foe—to Saul, Doeg, and Nabal, no less than to the captains of Judah and Benjamin—he should be merely the "son of Jesse" (1 Sam. xxii. 9, 13: cp. xxiv. 16, xxv. 10; 1 Ch. xii. 18); but that Jesse's name should be brought forward in records of so late a date as 1 Ch. xxix. 26 and Ps. lxxii. 20, long after the establishment of David's own house, is certainly worthy of notice. Especially is it to be observed that it is in his name—the "shoot out of the stem of Jesse . . . the root of Jesse which should stand as an ensign to the people" (Is. xi. 1, 10), that Isaiah announces the most splendid of his promises, intended to rouse and cheer the heart of the nation at the time of its deepest despondency. ⁴ This is given also in the Targum to Ruth iv. 22. "And Obed begat Ishai (Jesse), whose name is Nachash, because there were not found in him iniquity and corruption, that he should be delivered into the hand of the Angel of Death that he should take away his soul from him; and he lived many days until was brought to mind before Jehovah the counsel which the Serpent gave to Chavvah the wife of Adam, to eat of the tree, of the fruit of which when they did eat they were able to discern between good and evil; and by reason of this counsel all the inhabitants of the earth became guilty of death, and in that iniquity only died Ishai the righteous."

1. Joshua the priest, the son of Jehozadak (1 Esd. v. 5, 8, 24, 48, 56, 68, 70, vi. 2, ix. 19; Ecclus. xlix. 12). Also called Jeshua. [JESHUA, No. 4.]

JESUS THE FATHER OF SIRACH. [JESUS THE SON OF SIRACH.]

JESUS THE SON OF SIRACH (Ἰησοῦς υἱὸς Σεραχ; Jesus filius Sirach) is described in the text of Ecclesiasticus (l. 27) as the author of that book, which in the LXX., and generally, except in the Western Church, is called by his name, the Wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach, or simply the Wisdom of Sirach. The same passage speaks of him as a native of Jerusalem (Ecclus. l. c.); and the internal character of the book confirms its Palestinian origin. The name JESUS was of frequent occurrence, and was often represented by the Greek Jason. In the apocryphal list of the 72 commissioners sent by Eleazar to Ptolemy it occurs twice (Arist. Hist. ap. Hody, De text. p. vii.); but there is not the slightest ground for connecting the author of Ecclesiasticus with either of the persons there mentioned. The various conjectures which have been made as to the position of the son of Sirach from the contents of his book—as, for instance, that he was a priest (from vii. 29 sq., xlv. xlix., l.), or a physician (from xxxviii. 1 sq.)—are equally unfounded.

Among the later Jews the "Son of Sirach" was celebrated under the name of Ben Sira as a writer of proverbs, and some of those which have been preserved offer a close resemblance to passages in Ecclesiasticus; but in the course of time a later compilation was substituted for the original work of Ben Sira (Zunz, Gottesd. Vortr. d. Juden, p. 100 sq.), and tradition has preserved no authentic details of his person or his life.

The chronological difficulties which have been raised as to the date of the Son of Sirach are noticed elsewhere [ECCLESIASTICUS].

According to the first prologue to the book of Ecclesiasticus, taken from the Synopsis of the Pseudo-Athanasius (iv. p. 377, ed. Migne), the translator of the book bore the same name as the author of it. It is, however, most likely that the last chapter, "The prayer of Jesus the son of Sirach," gave occasion to this conjecture. The prayer was attributed to the translator, and then the table of succession followed necessarily from the title attached to it [see ECCLESIASTICUS]. [B. F. W.]

JES'US, called JUSTUS, a Christian who was with St. Paul at Rome, and joined him in sending salutations to the Colossians. He was one of the fellow-workers who were a comfort to the Apostle (Col. iv. 11). In the Acta Sanct. Jun. iv. 67, he is commemorated as bishop of Eleutheropolis. [W. T. B.]

JESUS CHRIST.* The name Jesus (Ἰησοῦς) signifies Saviour. Its origin is explained above, and it seems to have been not an uncommon name among the Jews. It is assigned in the N. T. (1) to our Lord Jesus Christ, Who "saves His people from their sins" (Matt. i. 21); also (2) to Joshua the successor of Moses, who brought the Israelites into the land of promise (Num. xxvii. 18; Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8); and (3) to Jesus surnamed Justus, a converted Jew, associated with St. Paul (Col. iv. 11).

The name of Christ (Χριστός, from χρίω, I anoint) signifies Anointed. Priests were anointed amongst the Jews, as their inauguration to their office (1 Ch. xvi. 22; Ps. cv. 15), and kings also (2 Macc. i. 24; Eccus. xlvi. 19). In the N. T. the name Christ is used as equivalent to Messiah (Greek Messias; Hebrew מָשִׁיחַ, John i. 41), the name given to the long-promised Prophet and King Whom the Jews had been taught by their Prophets to expect; and therefore = ὁ ἐρχόμενος (Acts xix. 4; Matt. xi. 3). The use of this name as applied to the Lord has always a reference to the promises of the Prophets. In Matt. ii. 4, xi. 2, it is assumed that the Christ when He should come would live and act in a certain way, described by the Prophets. So Matt. xxii. 42, xxiii. 10, xxiv. 5, 23; Mark xii. 35, xiii. 21; Luke iii. 15, xx. 41; John vii. 27, 31, 41, 42, xii. 34, in all which places there is a reference to the Messiah as delineated by the Prophets. That they had foretold that Christ should suffer appears from Luke xxiv. 26, 46. The name of Jesus is the proper Name of our Lord, and that of Christ is added to identify Him with the promised Messiah. Other names are sometimes added to the Names Jesus Christ, or Christ Jesus: thus "Lord" (frequently), "a King" (added as a kind of explanation of the word Christ, Luke xxiii. 2), "King of Israel" (Mark xv. 32), Son of David (Mark xii. 35; Luke xx. 41), chosen of God (Luke xxiii. 35).

Remarkable are such expressions as "the Christ of God" (Luke ii. 26, ix. 20; Rev. xi. 15, xii. 10); and the phrase "in Christ," which occurs about 78 times in the Epistles of St. Paul, and is almost peculiar to them. But the germ of it is to be found in the words of our Lord Himself, "Abide in Me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in Me" (John xv. 4, also 5, 6, 7, 9, 10).

* This article, by the late Archbishop of York, is reprinted without change. A literary supplement is placed at the end of it.—EDDORS.

The idea that all Christian life is not merely an imitation and following of the Lord, but a living and constant union with Him, causes the Apostle to use such expressions as "fallen asleep in Christ" (1 Cor. xv. 18), "I knew a man in Christ" (2 Cor. xii. 2), "I speak the truth in Christ" (1 Tim. ii. 7), and many others (see Schleusner's Lexicon; Wahl's Clavis; Fritzsche on St. Matthew; De Wette's Commentary; Schmidt's Greek Concordance, &c.).

The Life, the Person, and the Work of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ occupy the whole of the New Testament. Of this threefold subject the present article includes the first part, namely, the Life and Teaching; the Person of our Lord will be treated under the article SON OF GOD; and His Work will naturally fall under the word SAVIOUR.

Towards the close of the reign of Herod the Great, arrived that "fulness of time" which God in His inscrutable wisdom had appointed for the sending of His Son; and Jesus was born at Bethlehem, to redeem a sinful and ruined world. According to the received chronology, which is in fact that of Dionysius Exiguus in the 6th century, this event occurred in the year of Rome 754. But modern writers, with hardly an exception, believe that this calculation places the Nativity some years too late; although they differ as to the amount of error. Herod the Great died, according to Josephus, in the thirty-seventh year after he was appointed king (Ant. xvii. 8, § 1; B. J. i. 33, § 8). His elevation coincides with the consulship of Cn. Domitius Calvinus and C. Asinius Pollio, and this determines the date A.U.C. 714 (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 14, § 5). There is reason to think that in such calculations Josephus reckons the years from the month Nisan to the same month; and also that the death of Herod took place in the beginning of the thirty-seventh year, or just before the Passover (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 9, § 3); if then thirty-six complete years are added, they give the year of Herod's death A.U.C. 750 (see Note on Chronology at the end of this article). As Jesus was born during the life of Herod, it follows from these data that the Nativity took place some time before the month of April 750; and if it took place only a few months before Herod's death, then its date would be four years earlier than the Dionysian reckoning (Wieseler).

Three other chronological data occur in the Gospels, but the arguments founded on them are not conclusive. 1. The Baptism of Jesus was followed by a Passover (John ii. 13), at which certain Jews mention that the restoration of their Temple had been in progress for forty-six years (ii. 20), Jesus Himself being at this time "about thirty years of age" (Luke iii. 23). As the date of the Temple-restoration can be ascertained, it has been argued from these facts also that the Nativity took place at the beginning of A.U.C. 750. But it is sometimes argued that the words that determine our Lord's age are not exact enough to serve as the basis for such a calculation. 2. The appearance of the star to the wise men has been thought likely, by the aid of astronomy, to determine the date. But the opinion that the star in the East was a remarkable conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the sign Pisces, is now rejected. Besides the difficulty of reconciling it with the sacred narrative (Matt. ii. 9), it would throw back the birth of our Lord to A.U.C. 747, which is too early. 3. Zacharias was "a priest of the course of Abia" (Luke i. 5), and he was engaged in the duties of his course when the birth of John the Baptist was foretold to him; and it has been thought possible to calculate, from the place which the course of Abia held in the cycle, the precise time of the Saviour's birth. All these data are discussed below (p. 1700).

In treating of the Life of Jesus, a perfect record of the events would be no more than a reproduction of the four Gospels, and a discussion of those events would swell to the compass of a voluminous commentary. Neither of these would be appropriate here, and in the present article a brief sketch only of the Life can be attempted, drawn up with a view to the two remaining articles, on the SON OF GOD and SAVIOUR.

The Man Who was to redeem all men and do for the human race what no one could do for his brother, was not born into the world as others are. The salutation addressed by the Angel to Mary His mother, "Hail! thou that art highly favoured," was the prelude to a new act of Divine creation; the first Adam that sinned was not born but created; the second Adam, that restored, was born indeed, but in supernatural fashion. "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee; therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke i. 35). Mary received the announcement of a miracle, the full import of which she could not have understood, with the submission of one who knew that the message came from God; and the Angel departed from her. At first, her betrothed husband, when he heard from her what had taken place, doubted her, but a supernatural communication convinced him of her purity, and he took her to be his wife. Not only was the approaching birth of Jesus made the subject of supernatural communications, but that of John the Baptist the forerunner also. Thus before the birth of either had actually taken place, a small knot of persons had been prepared to expect the fulfilment of the Divine promises in the Holy One that should be born of Mary (Luke i.).

The prophet Micah had foretold (v. 2) that the future king should be born in Bethlehem of Judaea, the place where the house of David had its origin; but Mary dwelt in Nazareth. Augustus, however, had ordered a general census of the Roman Empire; and although Judaea, not being a province of the Empire, would not necessarily come under such an order, it was included, probably because the intention was already conceived of reducing it after a time to the condition of a province (see note on Chronology). That such a census was made we know from Cassiodorus (Var. iii. 52). That in its application to Palestine it should be made with reference to Jewish feelings and prejudices, being carried out no doubt by Herod the Jewish king, was quite natural; and so Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem, the city of David, to be taxed. From the well-known and much-canvassed passage in St. Luke (ii. 2) it appears that the taxing was not completed till the time of Quirinus [CYRENIUS], some years later; and how far it was carried now, cannot be determined; all that we learn is that it brought Joseph, who was of the house of David, from his home to Bethlehem, where the Lord was born. As there was no room in the inn, a manger was the cradle in which Christ the Lord was laid. But signs were not wanting of the greatness of the event that seemed so unimportant. Lowly shepherds were the witnesses of the wonder that accompanied the lowly Saviour's birth; an Angel proclaimed to them "good tidings of great joy;" and then the exceeding joy that was in heaven amongst the Angels about this mystery of love broke through the silence of night with the words—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men" (Luke ii. 8-20). We need not suppose that these simple men were cherishing in their hearts the expectation of the Messiah which others had relinquished; they were chosen from the humble, as were our Lord's companions afterwards, in order to show that God "hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty" (1 Cor. i. 26-31), and that the poor and meek could apprehend the message of salvation to which kings and priests could turn a deaf ear.

The subject of the Genealogy of our Lord, as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke, is discussed fully in another article. [See GENEALOGY OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.]

The child Jesus is circumcised in due time, is brought to the Temple, and the mother makes the offering for her purification. That offering wanted its peculiar meaning in this case, which was an act of new creation, and not a birth after the common order of our fallen nature. But the seed of the new kingdom was to grow undiscernibly as yet; no exemption was claimed by the "highly favoured" mother, and no portent intervened. She made her humble offering like any other Judæan mother, and would have gone her way unnoticed; but here too God suffered not His beloved Son to be without a witness, and Simeon and Anna, taught from God that the object of their earnest longings was before them, prophesied of His Divine work: the rejoicing that his eyes had seen the salvation of God, and the other speaking of Him "to all that looked for redemption in Jerusalem" (Luke ii. 28-38).

Thus recognised amongst His own people, the Saviour was not without witness amongst the heathen. "Wise men from the East"—that is, Persian magi of the Zend religion, in which the idea of a Zoziash or Redeemer was clearly known—guided miraculously by a star or meteor created for the purpose, came and sought out the Saviour to pay Him homage. We have said that in the year 747 occurred a remarkable combination of the planets Jupiter and Saturn, and this is supposed to be the sign by which the wise men knew that the birth of some great one had taken place. But, as has been said, the date does not agree with this view, and the account of the Evangelist describes a single star moving before them and guiding their steps. We must suppose that God saw good to speak to the Magi in their own way: they were seeking light from the study of the stars, whence only physical light could be found, and

He guided them to the Source of spiritual light, to the cradle of His Son, by a star miraculously made to appear to them, and to speak intelligibly to them through their preconceptions. The offerings which they brought have been regarded as symbolical: the gold was tribute to a king, the frankincense was for the use of a priest, and the myrrh for a body preparing for the tomb.

"Aurea nascenti fuderunt munera regi, Thura dedere Deo, myrrham tribuere sepulto," says Sedulius: but in a more general view these were at any rate the offerings made by worshippers, and in that light must the Magi be regarded. The events connected with the Birth of our Lord are all significant, and here some of the wisest of the heathen kneel before the Redeemer as the first-fruits of the Gentiles, and as a sign that His dominion was to be not merely Jewish, but as wide as the whole world (see Matt. ii. 1-12; Münter, Star of the Wise Men, Copenhagen, 1827; the Commentaries of Alford, Williams, Olshausen, and Heubner, where the opinions as to the nature of the star are discussed).

A little child made the great Herod quake upon his throne. When he knew that the Magi were come to hail their King and Lord, and did not stop at his palace, but passed on to a humbler roof, and when he found that they would not return to betray this child to him, he put to death all the children in Bethlehem that were under two years old. The crime was great; but the number of the victims, in a little place like Bethlehem, was small enough to escape special record amongst the wicked acts of Herod from Josephus and other historians, as it had no political interest. A confused indication of it, however, is found in Macrobius (Saturn. ii. 4).

Joseph, warned by a dream, flees to Egypt with the young child, beyond the reach of Herod's arm. This flight of our Lord from His own land to the land of darkness and idolatry—a land associated even to a proverb with all that was hostile to God and His people—impresses on us the reality of His humiliation. Herod's cup was well-nigh full; and the doom that soon overtook him could have arrested him then in his bloody attempt: but Jesus, in accepting humanity, accepted all its incidents. He was saved, not by the intervention of God, but by the obedience of Joseph; and from the storms of persecution He had to use the common means of escape (Matt. ii. 13-23; Thomas à Kempis, iii. 15, and Commentaries). After the death of Herod, in less than a year, Jesus returned with His parents to their own land, and went to Nazareth, where they abode.

Except as to one event the Evangelists are silent upon the succeeding years of our Lord's life down to the commencement of His ministry. When He was twelve years old He was found in the Temple, "hearing" the doctors "and asking them questions" (Luke ii. 40-52). We are shown this one fact that we may know that at the time when the Jews considered childhood to be passing into youth, Jesus was already aware of His mission, and consciously preparing for it, although years elapsed before its actual commencement. This fact at once confirms and illustrates such a general expression as "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man" (Luke ii. 52). His public ministry did not begin with a sudden impulse, but was prepared for by His whole life. The consciousness of His Divine nature and power grew, and ripened and strengthened until the time of His showing unto Israel.

Thirty years had elapsed from the Birth of our Lord to the opening of His ministry. In that time great changes had come over the chosen people. Herod the Great had united under him almost all the original kingdom of David; after the death of that prince it was dismembered for ever. Archelaus succeeded to the kingdom of Judaea, under the title of Ethnarch; Herod Antipas became tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa, and Philip tetrarch of Trachonitis, Gaulonitis, Batanæa, and Paneas. The Emperor Augustus promised Archelaus the title of king, if he should prove worthy; but in the tenth year of his reign (A.U.C. 759) he was deposed in deference to the hostile feelings of the Jews, was banished to Vienne in Gaul, and from that time his dominions passed under the direct power of Rome, being annexed to Syria, and governed by a procurator. Neither king nor ethnarch held Judaea afterwards, if we except the three years when it was under Agrippa I. Marks are not wanting of the irritation kept up in the minds of the Jews by the sight of a foreigner exercising acts of power over the people whom David once ruled. The publicans (portitores) who collected tribute for the Roman Empire were everywhere detested; and as a marked class is likely to be a degraded one, the Jews saw everywhere the most despised among the people exacting from them all, and more than all (Luke iii. 13), that the foreign tyrant required. Constant changes were made by the same power in the office of high-priest, perhaps from a necessary policy. Josephus says that there were twenty-eight high-priests from the time of Herod to the burning of the Temple (Ant. xx. 10). The sect of Judas the Gaulonite, which protested against paying tribute to Cæsar, and against bowing the neck to an alien yoke, expressed a conviction which all Jews shared. The sense of oppression and wrong would tend to shape all the hopes of a Messiah, so far as they still existed, to the conception of a warrior who should deliver them from a hateful political bondage.

It was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius the Emperor, reckoning from his joint rule with Augustus (Jan. A.U.C. 765), and not from his sole rule (Aug. A.U.C. 767), that John the Baptist began to teach. In this year (A.U.C. 779) Pontius Pilate was procurator of Judaea, the worldly and time-serving representative of a cruel and imperious master; Herod Antipas and Philip still held the tetrarchies left them by their father. Annas and Caiaphas are both described as holding the office of high-priest; Annas was deposed by Valerius Gratus in this very year, and his son-in-law Joseph, called also Caiaphas, was appointed, after some changes, in his room; but Annas seems to have retained after this time (John xviii. 13) much of the authority of the office, which the two administered together. John the Baptist, of whom a full account is given below under his own name, came to preach in the wilderness. He was the last representative of the prophets of the Old Covenant; and his work was twofold—to enforce repentance and the terrors of the old Law, and to revive the almost forgotten expectation of the Messiah (Matt. iii. 1-10; Mark i. 1-8; Luke iii. 1-18). Both these objects, which are very apparent in his preaching, were connected equally with the coming of Jesus, since the need of a Saviour from sin is not felt but when sin itself is felt to be a bondage and a terror. The career of John seems to have been very short; and it has been asked how such great influence could have been attained in a short time (Matt. iii. 5). But his was a powerful nature which soon took possession of those who came within its reach; and his success becomes less surprising if we assume with Wieseler that the preaching took place in a sabbatical year (Baumgarten, Geschichte Jesu, p. 40). It is an old controversy whether the baptism of John was a new institution, or an imitation of the baptism of proselytes as practised by the Jews. But at all events there is no record of such a rite, conducted in the name of and with reference to a particular person (Acts xix. 4), before the ministry of John. Jesus came to Jordan with the rest to receive this rite at John's hands: first, in order that the Sacrament by which all were hereafter to be admitted into His kingdom might not want His example to justify its use (Matt. iii. 15); next, that John might have an assurance that his course as the herald of Christ was now completed by His appearance (John i. 33); and last, that some public token might be given that He was indeed the Anointed of God (Heb. v. 5). A supposed discrepancy between Matt. iii. 14 and John i. 31, 33, disappears when we remember that from the relationship between the families of John and our Lord (Luke i.), John must have known already something of the power, goodness, and wisdom of Jesus; what he did not know was, that this same Jesus was the very Messiah for Whom he had come to prepare the world. Our Lord received the rite of baptism at His servant's hands, and the Father attested Him by the Voice of the Spirit, Which also was seen descending on Him in a visible shape: "This is My Beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased" (Matt. iii. 13-17; Mark i. 9-11; Luke iii. 21, 22).

Immediately after this inauguration of His ministry Jesus was led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil (Matt. iv. 1-11; Mark i. 12, 13; Luke iv. 1-13). As the baptism of our Lord cannot have been for Him the token of repentance and intended reformation which it was for sinful men, so does our Lord's sinlessness affect the nature of His temptation; for it was the trial of One Who could not possibly have fallen. This makes a complete conception of the temptation impossible for minds wherein temptation is always associated with the possibility of sin. But whilst we must be content with an incomplete conception, we must avoid the wrong conceptions that are often substituted for it. Some suppose the account before us to describe what takes place in a vision or ecstasy of our Lord; so that both the temptation and its answer arise from within. Others think that the temptation was suggested from within, but in a state, not of sleep or ecstasy, but of complete consciousness. Others consider this narrative to have been a parable of our Lord, of which He has made Himself the subject. All these suppositions set aside the historical testimony of the Gospels: the temptation as there described arose not from the sinless mind of the Son of God, where indeed thoughts of evil could not have harboured, but from Satan, the enemy of the human race. Nor can it be supposed that this account is a mere parable, unless we assume that St. Matthew and St. Luke have wholly misunderstood their Master's meaning. The story is that of a fact, hard indeed to be understood, but not to be made easier by explanations such as would invalidate the only testimony on which it rests (Heubner's Practical Commentary on Matthew).

The three temptations are addressed to the three forms in which the disease of sin makes its appearance on the soul—to the solace of sense, and the love of praise, and the desire of gain (1 John ii. 16). But there is one element common to them all—they are attempts to call up a wilful and wayward spirit in contrast to a patient self-denying one.

In the first temptation the Redeemer is hungered and when the Devil bids Him, if He be the Son of God, command that the stones may be made bread, there would seem to be no great sin in this use of Divine power to overcome the pressing human want. Our Lord's answer is required to show us where the essence of the temptation lay. He takes the words of Moses to the children of Israel (Deut. viii. 3), which mean, not that men must dispense with bread and feed only on the study of the Divine word, but that our meat and drink, our food and raiment, are all the work of the creating hand of God; and that a sense of dependence on God is the duty of man. He tells the Tempter that as the sons of Israel standing in the wilderness were forced to humble themselves and to wait upon the hand of God for the bread from heaven which He gave them, so the Son of Man, fainting in the wilderness from hunger, will be humble and will wait upon His Father in heaven for the word that shall bring Him food, and will not be hasty to deliver Himself from that dependent state, but will wait patiently for the gifts of His goodness. In the second temptation, it is not probable that they left the wilderness, but that Satan was allowed to suggest to our Lord's mind the place, and the marvel that could be wrought there. They stood, as has been suggested, on the lofty porch that overhung the valley of Kedron, where the steep side of the valley was added to the height of the Temple (Joseph. Ant. xv. 11, § 5), and made a depth that the eye could scarcely have borne to look down upon. "Cast Thyself down"—perform in the Holy City, in a public place, a wonder that will at once make all men confess that none but the Son of God could perform it. A passage from Psalm xci. is quoted to give a colour to the argument. Our Lord replies by an allusion to another text that carries us back again to the Israelites wandering in the wilderness: "Ye shall not tempt the Lord your God, as ye tempted Him in Massah" (Deut. vi. 16). Their conduct is more fully described by the Psalmist as a tempting of God: "They tempted God in their heart by asking meat for their lust; yea, they spake against God: they said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? Behold He smote the rock that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed. Can He give bread also? Can He provide flesh for His people?" (Ps. lxxviii.) Just parallel was the temptation here:—"God has protected Thee so far, brought Thee up, put His seal upon Thee by manifest proofs of His favour. Can He do this also? Can He send the angels to buoy Thee up in Thy descent? Can He make the air thick to sustain, and the earth soft to receive Thee?" The appropriate answer is, "Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." In the third temptation it is not asserted that there is any mountain from which the eyes of common men can see the world and its kingdoms at once displayed; it was with the mental vision of One Who knew all things that these kingdoms and their glory were seen. And Satan has now begun to discover, if he knew not from the beginning, that One is here Who can become the King over them all. He says, "All these things will I give Thee if Thou wilt fall down and worship me." In St. Luke the words are fuller: "All this power will I give Thee, and the glory of them, for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will I give it;" but these words are the lie of the Tempter, which he uses to mislead. "Thou art come to be great—to be a King on the earth; but I am strong, and will resist Thee. Thy followers shall be imprisoned and slain; some of them shall fall away through fear; others shall forsake Thy cause, loving this present world. Cast in Thy lot with me; let Thy kingdom be an earthly kingdom, only the greatest of all—a kingdom such as the Jews seek to see established on the throne of David. Worship me by living as the children of this world live, and so honouring me in Thy life: then all shall be Thine." The Lord knows that the Tempter is right in foretelling such trials to Him; but though clouds and darkness hang over the path of His ministry, He must work the work of Him that sent Him, and not another work: He must worship God and none other. "Get thee hence, Satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve." As regards the order of the temptations, there are internal marks that the account of St. Matthew assigns them their historical order: St. Luke transposes the two last, for which various reasons are suggested by commentators (Matt. iv. 1-11; Mark i. 12, 13; Luke iv. 1-13).

Deserting for a time the historical order, we shall find that the records of this first portion of His ministry, from the Temptation to the Transfiguration, consist mainly—(1) of miracles, which prove His Divine commission; (2) of discourses and parables on the doctrine of "the kingdom of heaven"; (3) of incidents showing the behaviour of various persons when brought into contact with our Lord. The two former may require some general remarks, the last will unfold themselves with the narrative.

1. The Miracles.—The power of working miracles was granted to many under the Old Covenant: Moses (Ex. iii. 20, vii.-xi.) delivered the people of Israel from Egypt by means of them; and Joshua, following in his steps, enjoyed the same power for the completion of his work (Josh. iii. 13-16). Samson (Judg. xv. 19), Elijah (1 K. xvii. 10, &c.), and Elisha (2 K. ii.-vi.) possessed the same gift. The Prophets foretold that the Messiah, of Whom Moses was the type, would show signs and wonders as he had done. Isaiah, in describing His kingdom, says—"Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped. Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing" (xxxv. 5, 6). According to the same Prophet, the Christ was called "to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison-house" (xlii. 7). And all who looked for the coming of the Messiah expected that the power of miracles would be one of the tokens of His commission. When John the Baptist, in his prison, heard of the works of Jesus, he sent his disciples to inquire, "Art Thou He that should come (ὁ ἐρχόμενος = the Messiah), or do we look for another?" Our Lord, in answer to this, only points to His miracles, leaving to John the inference from them, that no one could do such works except the promised One. When our Lord cured a blind and dumb demoniac, the people, struck with the miracle, said, "Is not this the Son of David?" (Matt. xii. 23). On another like occasion it was asked, "When Christ cometh, will He do more miracles than these which this man hath done?" (John vii. 31). So that the expectation that Messiah would work miracles existed amongst the people, and was founded on the language of prophecy. Our Lord's miracles are described in the New Testament by several names: they are signs (σημεία), wonders (τέρατα), works (ἔργα, most frequently in St. John), and mighty works (δυνάμεις), according to the point of view from which they are regarded. They are indeed astonishing works, wrought as signs of the Might and Presence of God; and they are powers or mighty works because they are such as no power short of the Divine could have effected. But if the object had been merely to work wonders, without any other aim than to astonish the minds of the witnesses, the miracles of our Lord would not have been the best means of producing the effect, since many of them were wrought for the good of obscure people, before witnesses chiefly of the humble and uneducated class, and in the course of the ordinary life of our Lord, which lay not amongst those who made it their special business to inquire into the claims of a prophet. When requests were made for a more striking sign than those which He had wrought, for "a sign from heaven" (Luke xi. 16), it was refused. When the Tempter suggested that He should cast Himself down from the pinnacle of the Temple before all men, the temptation was rejected. The miracles of our Lord were to be, not wonders merely, but signs; and not merely signs of preternatural power, but of the scope and character of His ministry, and of the Divine Nature of His Person. This will be evident from an examination of those which are more particularly described in the Gospels. Nearly forty cases of this kind appear; but that they are only examples taken out of a very great number, the Evangelists frequently remind us (John ii. 23; Matt. viii. 16 and parall., iv. 23, xii. 15 and parall.; Luke vi. 19; Matt. xi. 5, xiii. 58, ix. 35, xiv. 14, 36, xv. 30, xix. 2, xxi. 14). These cases might be classified. There are three instances of restoration to life, each under peculiar conditions: the daughter of Jairus was lately dead; the widow's son at Nain was being carried out to the grave; and Lazarus had been four days dead, and was returning to corruption (Matt. ix. 18; Luke vii. 11, 12; John xi. 1, &c.). There are about six cases of demoniac possession, each with its own circumstances: one in the synagogue at Capernaum, where the unclean spirit bore witness to Jesus as "the Holy One of God" (Mark i. 24); a second, that of the man who dwelt among the tombs in the country of the Gadarenes, whose state is so forcibly described by St. Mark (v. 2), and who also bore witness to Him as "the Son of the Most High God"; a third, the case of a dumb man (Matt. ix. 32); a fourth, that of a youth who was brought to Him as He came down from the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 15), and whom the disciples had vainly tried to heal; a fifth, that of another dumb man, whom the Jews thought he had healed "through Beelzebub the prince of the devils" (Luke xi. 15); and a sixth, that of the Syro-Phoenician girl whose mother's faith was so tenacious (Matt. xv. 22). There are about seventeen recorded cases of the cure of bodily sickness, including fever, leprosy, palsy, inveterate weakness, the maimed limb, the issue of blood of twelve years' standing, dropsy, blindness, deafness, and dumbness (John iv. 47; Matt. viii. 2, 14, ix. 2; John v. 5; Matt. xii. 10, viii. 5, ix. 20, 27; Mark viii. 22; John ix. 1; Luke xiii. 10, xvii. 11, xviii. 35, xxii. 51). These three groups of miracles all pertain to one class; they all brought help to the suffering or sorrowing, and proclaimed what love the Man that did them bore towards the children of men. There is another class, showing a complete control over the powers of nature: first by acts of creative power, as when in the beginning of His ministry He made the water wine; and when He fed at one time five thousand, and at another four, with bread miraculously provided (John ii. 7, vi. 10; Matt. xv. 32); secondly, by setting aside natural laws and conditions—now in passing unseen through a hostile crowd (Luke iv. 30); now in procuring miraculous draughts of fishes, when the fisher's skill had failed (Luke v. 4; John xxi. 6); now in stilling a tempest (Matt. viii. 26); now in walking to His disciples on the sea (Matt. xiv. 25); now in the transformation of His countenance by a heavenly light and glory (Matt. xvii. 1); and again in seeking and finding the shekel for the customary tribute to the Temple in the fish's mouth (Matt. xvii. 27). In a third class of these miracles we find our Lord overawing the wills of men; as when He twice cleared the Temple of the traders (John ii. 13; Matt. xxi. 12); and when His look staggered the officers that came to take Him (John xviii. 6). And in a fourth subdivision will stand one miracle only, where His power was used for destruction—the case of the barren fig-tree (Matt. xxi. 18). The destruction of the herd of swine does not properly rank here; it was a permitted act of the devils which He cast out, and is no more to be laid to the account of the Redeemer than are all the sicknesses and sufferings in the land of the Jews which He permitted to waste and destroy, having, as He showed by His miracles, abundant power to prevent them. All the miracles of this latter class show our Lord to be One Who wields the power of God. No one can suspend the laws of nature save Him Who made them: when bread is wonderfully multiplied and the fickle sea becomes a firm floor to walk on, the God of the Universe is working the change, directly or through His deputy. Very remarkable, as a claim to Divine power, is the mode in which Jesus justified acts of healing on the Sabbath—"My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (John v. 17): which means, "As God the Father, even on the Sabbath-day, keeps all the laws of the universe at work, making the planets roll, and the grass grow, and the animal pulses beat, so do I My work; I stand above the law of the Sabbath, as He does."^b

On reviewing all the recorded miracles, we see at once that they are signs of the nature of Christ's Person and mission. None of them are done merely to astonish; and hardly any of them, even of those which prove His power more than His love, but tend directly towards the good of men in some way or other. They show how active and unwearyed was His love; they also show the diversity of its operation. Every degree of human need—from Lazarus now returning to dust—through the palsy that has seized on brain and nerves, and is almost death—through the leprosy which, appearing on the skin, was really a subtle poison that had tainted every drop of blood in the veins—up to the injury to the particular limb—received succour from the powerful word of Christ; and to wrest His buried friend from corruption and the worm was neither more nor less difficult than to heal a withered hand or restore to its place an ear that had been cut off. And this intimate connexion of the miracles with the work of Christ will explain the fact that faith was in many cases required as a condition for their performance. According to the common definition of a miracle, any one would seem to be a capable witness of its performance: yet Jesus sometimes refrained from working wonders before the unbelieving (Mark vi. 5, 6), and sometimes did the work that was asked of Him because of the faith of them that asked it (Mark vii. 29). The miracles were intended to attract the witnesses of them to become followers of Jesus and members of the kingdom of heaven. Where faith was already so far fixed on Him as to believe that He could do miracles, there was the fit preparation for a faith in higher and heavenly things. If they knew that He could heal the body, they only required teaching to enlarge their view of Him into that of a healer of the diseased spirit, and a giver of true life to those that are dead in trespasses and sins. On the other hand, where men's minds were in a state of bitterness and antagonism against Him, to display miracles before them would but increase their condemnation. "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did, they had not had sin; but now have they both seen and hated both Me and My Father" (John xv. 24). This result was inevitable: in order to offer salvation to those who are to be saved, the offer must be heard by some of those who will reject it. Miracles then have two purposes—the proximate and subordinate purpose of doing a work of love to them that need it, and the higher purpose of revealing Christ in His own Person and nature as the Son of God and Saviour of men. Hence the rejection of the demand for a sign from heaven—for some great celestial phenomenon which all should see and none could dispute. He refused to give such a sign to the "generation" that asked it: and once He offered them instead the fact that Jonah was a type of Him as to His Burial and Resurrection, thus refusing them the kind of sign which they required. So again, in answer to a similar demand, He said, "Destroy this Temple and in three days I will raise it up"—alluding to His Death and Resurrection. It is as though He had said, "All the miracles that I have been working are only intended to call attention to the one great miracle of My Presence on earth in the form of a servant. No other kind of miracle will I work. If you wish for a greater sign, I refer you to the great miracle about to be wrought in Me—that of My Resurrection." The Lord's words do not mean that there shall be no sign; He is working wonders daily: but that He will not travel out of the plan He has proposed for Himself. A sign in the sun and moon and stars would prove that the power of God was there; but it would not teach men to understand the mission of God Incarnate, of the loving and suffering Friend and Brother of men. The miracles which He wrought are those best suited to this purpose; and those who had faith, though but in small measure, were the fittest to behold them. They knew Him but a little; but even to think of Him as a Prophet Who was able to heal their infirmity was a germ of faith sufficient to make them fit hearers of His doctrine and spectators of His deeds. But they gained nothing from the Divine work who, unable to deny the evidence of their eyes and ears, took refuge in the last argument of malice, "He casteth out devils through Beelzebub the prince of the devils."

What is a miracle? A miracle must be either something done in contravention of all law, or it is a transgression of all the laws known to us, but not of some law which further research may discover for us; or it is a transgression of all natural laws, whether known now or to be known hereafter, on account of some higher law whose operation interferes with them. Only the last of these definitions could apply to the Christian miracles. God having chosen to govern the world by laws, having impressed on the face of nature in characters not to be mistaken the great truth that He rules the Universe by law and order, would not adopt in the kingdom of grace a different plan from that which in the kingdom of nature He has pursued. If the seen universe requires a scheme of order, and the spiritual world is governed without a scheme (so to speak) by caprice, then the God of Nature appears to contradict the God of Grace. Spinoza has not failed to make the most of this argument; but he assails not the true Christian idea of a miracle, but one which he substitutes for it (Tract. Theol. Polit. 6). Nor can the Christian miracles be regarded as cases in which the wonder depends on the anticipation only of some law that is not now understood, but shall be so hereafter. In the first place many of them go beyond, in the amount of their operation, all the wildest hopes of the scientific discoverer. In the second place, the very conception of a miracle is vitiated by such an explanation. All distinction in kind between the man who is somewhat in advance of his age in physical knowledge, and the worker of miracles, would be taken away; and the miracles of one age, as the steam-engine, the telegraph-wire, become the tools and toys of the next. It remains then that a miracle is to be regarded as the overruling of some physical law by some higher law that is brought in. We are invited in the Gospels to regard the miracles not as wonders, but as the wonderful acts of Jesus of Nazareth. They are identified with the work of redemption. There are even cautions against teaching them separately—against severing them from their connexion with His work. Eye-witnesses of His miracles were strictly charged to make no report of them to others (Matt. ix. 30; Mark. v. 43, vii. 36). And yet when John the Baptist sent his disciples to ascertain whether the Messiah were indeed come or not, the answer they took back was the very thing which was forbidden to others—a report of miracles. The explanation of this seeming contradiction is that wherever a report of the signs and wonders was likely to be conveyed without a right conception of the Person of Christ and the kind of doctrine which He taught, there He suffered not the report to be carried. Now, had the purpose been to reveal His Divine Nature only, this caution would not have been needed, nor would faith have been a needful preliminary for the apprehension of miracles, nor would the temptations of Satan in the wilderness have been the cunning snares they were intended to be, nor would it have been necessary to refuse the convincing sign from heaven to the Jews that asked it. But the part of His work to which attention was to be directed in connexion with the miracles, was the mystery of our redemption by One "Who being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men: and being found in fashion as a man, He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross" (Phil. ii. 5-8). Very few are the miracles in which Divine power is exercised without a manifest reference to the purpose of assisting men. He works for the most part as the Power of God in a state of humiliation for the good of men. Not insignificant here are the cases in which He condescends to use means, wholly inadequate indeed in any other hands than His; but still they are a token that He has descended into the region where means are employed, from that in which even the spoken word can control the subservient agents of nature. He laid His hand upon the patient (Matt. viii. 3, 15, ix. 29, xx. 34; Luke vii. 14, xxii. 51). He anointed the eyes of the blind with clay (John ix. 6). He put His finger into the ear and touched the tongue of the deaf and dumb sufferer in Decapolis (Mark vii. 33, 34). He treated the blind man at Bethsaida in like fashion (Mark viii. 23). Even when He fed the four and five thousand, He did not create bread out of nothing, which would have been as easy for Him, but much bread out of little; and He looked up to heaven and blessed the meat as a thankful man would do (Matt. xiv. 19; John vi. 11; Matt. xv. 36). At the grave of Lazarus He lifted up His eyes and gave thanks that the Father had heard Him (John xi. 41, 42), and this great miracle is accompanied by tears and groanings, that show how One so mighty to save has truly become a man with human soul and sympathies. The worker of the miracles is God become Man; and as signs of His Person and work are they to be measured. Hence, when the question of the credibility of miracles is discussed, it ought to be preceded by the question, Is redemption from the sin of Adam a probable thing? Is it probable that there are spiritual laws as well as natural, regulating the relations between us and the Father of our spirits? Is it probable that, such laws existing, the needs of men and the goodness of God would lead to an expression of them, complete or partial, by means of revelation? If these questions are all decided in the affirmative, then Hume's argument against miracles is already half overthrown. "No testimony," says Hume, "is sufficient to establish a miracle, unless the testimony be of such a kind that its falsehood would be more miraculous than the fact which it endeavours to establish; and even in that case there is a mutual destruction of arguments, and the superior only gives us an assurance suitable to that degree of force which remains after deducting the inferior" (Essays, vol. ii. p. 130). If the Christian miracles are parts of a scheme which bears other marks of a Divine origin, they point to the existence of a set of spiritual laws with which Christianity is connected, and of which it is the expression; and then the difficulty of believing them disappears. They are not "against nature," but above it; they are not the few caprices of Providence breaking in upon ages of order, but they are glimpses of the Divine spiritual cosmos permitted to be seen amidst the laws of the natural world, of which they take precedence, just as in the physical world one law can supersede another. And as to the testimony for them let Paley speak:—"If twelve men, whose probity and good sense I had long known, should seriously and circumstantially relate to me an account of a miracle wrought before their eyes, and in which it was impossible they should be deceived; if the governor of the country, hearing a rumour of this account, should call those men into his presence, and offer them a short proposal, either to confess the imposture or submit to be tied up to a gibbet; if they should refuse with one voice to acknowledge that there existed any falsehood or imposture in the case; if this threat were communicated to them separately, yet with no different effect; if it was at last executed, if I myself saw them one after another consenting to be racked, burnt or strangled, rather than give up the truth of their account; . . . there exists not a sceptic in the world who would not believe them, or who would defend such incredulity" (Evidences, Introduction, p. 6). In the theory of a "mutual destruction" of arguments so that the belief in miracles would represent exactly the balance between the evidence for and against them, Hume contradicts the commonest religious, and indeed worldly, experience; he confounds the state of deliberation and examination with that of conviction. When Thomas the Apostle, who had doubted the great central miracle of the Resurrection, was allowed to touch the Saviour's wounded side, and in an access of undoubting faith exclaimed, "My Lord and my God!" who does not see that at that moment all the former doubts were wiped out, and were as though they had never been? How could he carry about those doubts or any recollection of them, to be a set-off against the complete conviction that had succeeded them? It is so with the Christian life in every case; faith, which is "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," could not continue to weigh and balance evidence for and against the truth; the conviction either rises to a perfect moral certainty, or it continues tainted and worthless as a principle of action.

The lapse of time may somewhat alter the aspect of the evidence for miracles, but it does not weaken it. It is more difficult (so to speak) to cross-examine witnesses who delivered their testimony ages ago; but another kind of evidence has been gathering strength in successive ages. The miracles are all consequences and incidents of one great miracle, the Incarnation; and if the Incarnation is found true, the rest become highly probable. But this very doctrine has been thoroughly proved through all these ages. Nations have adopted it, and they are the greatest nations of the world. Men have lived and died in it, have given up their lives to preach it; have found that it did not disappoint them, but held true under them to the last. The existence of Christianity itself has become an evidence. It is a phenomenon easy to understand if we grant the miracle of the Incarnation, but is an effect without an adequate cause if that be denied.

Miracles then are offered us in the Gospels, not as startling violations of the order of nature, but as consequences of the revelation of Himself made by Jesus Christ for men's salvation, and as such they are not violations of order at all, but interferences of the spiritual order with the natural. They are abundantly witnessed by earnest and competent men, who did not aim at any earthly reward for their teaching; and they are proofs, together with His pure life and holy doctrine, that Jesus was the Son of God (see Dean Trench on the Miracles, an important work; Baumgarten, Leben Jesu; Paley's Evidences; Butler's Analogy; Hase, Leben Jesu; with the various Commentaries on the New Testament).

2. The Parables.—In considering the Lord's teaching we turn first to the parables. In all ages the aid of the imagination has been sought to assist in the teaching of abstract truth, and that in various ways: in the parable, where some story of ordinary doings is made to convey a spiritual meaning, beyond what the narrative itself contains, and without any assertion that the narrative does or does not present an actual occurrence: in the fable, where a story, for the most part an impossible one, of talking beast and reasoning bird, is made the vehicle of some shrewd and prudent lesson of worldly wisdom: in the allegory, which is a story with a moral or spiritual meaning, in which the lesson taught is so prominent as almost wholly to supersede the story that clothes it, and the names and actions are so chosen that no interpreter shall be required for the application: and lastly, in the proverb, which is often only a parable or a fable condensed into a few pithy words [PARABLE] (Ernesti, Lex. Tech. Græcum, under παραβολή, λόγος, ἀλληγορία; Trench, On the Parables; Alford on Matt. xiii. 1, and other Commentators; Hase, Leben Jesu, § 67, 4th edit.; Neander, Leben Jesu, p. 568 sq.). Nearly fifty parables are preserved in the Gospels, and they are only selected from a larger number (Mark iv. 33). Each Evangelist, even St. Mark, has preserved some that are peculiar to himself. St. John never uses the word parable, but that of προφοιμία (parabolē), which the other Evangelists nowhere employ. In reference to this mode of teaching, our Lord tells the disciples, "Unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God; but to others in parables, that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand" (Luke viii. 10): and some have hastily concluded from this that the parable—the clearest of all modes of teaching—was employed to conceal knowledge from those who were not susceptible of it, and that this was its chief purpose. But it was chosen not for this negative object, but for its positive advantages in the instruction of the disciples. The nature of the kingdom of heaven was not understood even by disciples; hard even to them were the sayings that described it, and the hearing of them caused many to go back and walk no more with Him (John vi. 66). If there was any mode of teaching better suited than another to the purpose of preserving truths for the memory that were not yet accepted by the heart—for keeping the seed safe till the time should arrive for the quickening Spirit to come down and give it growth—that mode would be the best suited to the peculiar position of the disciples. And any means of translating an abstract thought into sensuous language has ever been the object of poet and teacher in all countries. He who can best employ the symbols of the visible world for the deeper acts of thought has been the clearest and most successful expositor. The parable affords just such an instrument as was required. Who could banish from his mind, when once understood, the image of the house built on the sand, as the symbol of the faithless soul unable to stand by the truth in the day of temptation? To whom does not the parable of the prodigal son bring back the thought of God's merciful kindness towards the erring? But without such striking images it would have been impossible (to use mere human language) to make known to the disciples in their half-enlightened state the mysteries of faith in the Son of God as a principle of life, of repentance from sin, and of an assurance of peace and welcome from the God of mercy. Eastern teachers have made this mode of instruction familiar; the originality of the parables lay not in the method of teaching by stories, but in the profound and new truths which the stories taught so aptly. And Jesus had another purpose in selecting this form of instruction: He foresaw that many would reject Him, and on them He would not lay a heavier burden than they needs must bear. He did not offer them daily and hourly, in their plainest form, the grand truths of sin and atonement, of judgment and heaven and hell, and in so doing multiply occasions of blaspheming. "Those that were without" heard the parable; but it was an aimless story to them if they sought no moral purpose under it, and a dark saying, passing comprehension, if they did so seek. When the Lord gathered round Him those that were willing to be His, and explained to them at length the parable and its application (Matt. xiii. 10-18), then the light thus thrown on it was not easy to extinguish in their memory. And amongst those without there was no doubt a difference; some listened with indifferent, and some with unbelieving and resisting minds; and of both minds some remained in their aversion, more or less active, from the Son of God unto the end, and some were converted after He was risen. To these we may suppose that the parables which had rested in their memories as vivid pictures, yet still a dead letter, so far as moral import is concerned, became by the Holy Spirit, Whose business it was to teach men all things and to bring all things to their remembrance (John xiv. 26), a quick and powerful light of truth, lighting up the dark places with a brightness never again to fade from their eyes. The parable unapplied is a dark saying; the parable explained is the clearest of all teaching. When language is used in Holy Scripture which would seem to treat the parables as means of concealment rather than of instruction, it must be taken to refer to the unexplained parable—to the cypher without the key—the symbol without the interpretation.

Besides the parables, the more direct teaching of our Lord is conveyed in many discourses, dispersed through the Gospels; of which three may be here selected as examples,—the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v.-vii.), the discourse after the feeding of the five thousand (John vi. 22-65), and the final discourse and prayer which preceded the Passion (John xiv.-xviii.). These are selected principally because they mark three distinct periods in the ministry of Jesus,—the opening of it, the principal change in the tone of its teaching, and the solemn close.

Notwithstanding the endeavour to establish that the Sermon on the Mount of St. Matthew is different from the Sermon on the Plain of St. Luke, the evidence for their being one and the same discourse greatly preponderates. If so, then its historical position must be fixed from St. Luke; and its earlier place in St. Matthew's Gospel must be owing to the Evangelist's wish to commence the account of the ministry of Jesus with a summary of His teaching; an intention further illustrated by the mode in which the Evangelist has wrought in with his report of the discourse several sayings which

St. Luke connects with the various facts which on different occasions drew them forth (cp. Luke xiv. 34, xi. 33, xvi. 17, xii. 58, 59, xvi. 18, with places in Matt. v.; also Luke xi. 1-4, xii. 33, 34, xi. 34-36, xvi. 13, xii. 22-31, with places in Matt. vi.; also Luke xi. 9-13, xiii. 24, 25-27, with places in Matt. vii.). Yet this is done without violence to the connexion and structure of the whole discourse. St. Matthew, to whom Jesus is ever present as the Messiah, the Anointed Prophet of the chosen people, the successor of Moses, sets at the head of His ministry the giving of the Christian law with its bearing on the Jewish. From St. Luke we learn that Jesus had gone up into a mountain to pray, that on the morning following He made up the number of His twelve Apostles, and solemnly appointed them, and then descending He stood upon a level place (καταβὰς μετ' αὐτῶν ἕσθη ἐπὶ τόπου πεδινῷ, Luke vi. 17), not necessarily at the bottom of the mountain, but where the multitude could stand round and hear; and there He taught them in a solemn address the laws and constitution of His new kingdom, the kingdom of Heaven. He tells them who are meet to be citizens of that heavenly polity, and in so doing rebukes almost every quality on which the world sets a value. The poor in spirit, that is the lowly-minded, the mourners and the meek, those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, the merciful, the pure, the peace-makers, are all "blessed," are all possessed of the temper which will assort well with that heavenly kingdom, in contrast to the proud, the confident, the great and successful, whom the world honours. (St. Luke adds denunciations of woe to the tempers which are opposed to the Gospel, which St. Matthew omits.) This novel exordium startles all the hearers, for it seems to proclaim a new world, new hopes, and new virtues; and our Lord then proceeds to meet the question that rises up in their minds—"If these dispositions and not a literal obedience to minute precepts constitute a Christian, what then becomes of the Law?" Answering this tacit objection, the Lord bids them "think not that I am come to destroy (καταλύσαι, abolish) the Law and the Prophets, I am not come to destroy but to fulfil" (πληρῶσαι, complete, Matt. v. 17). He goes on to tell them that not one point or letter of the Law was written in vain; that what was temporary in it does not fall away till its purpose is answered, what was of permanent obligation shall never be lost. He then shows how far more deep and searching a moral lawgiver He is than was Moses His prototype, who like Him spoke the Mind of God. The eternal principles which Moses wrote in broad lines, such as a dull and unspiritual people must read, He applies to deeper-seated sins and to all the finer shades of evil. Murder was denounced by the Law; but anger and provoking speech are of the same stock. It is not only murder, but hate, that is the root of that poisonous fruit which God abhors. Hate defiles the very offering that a man makes to God; let him leave his gift unoffered and get the hate cast out, and not waste his time in an unacceptable sacrifice. Hate will affect the soul for ever, if it goes out of the world to meet its Judge in that defiling garment: "Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him" (c. 25).

The act of adultery is deadly, and Moses forbid it. But to permit the thought of lust to rest in the heart, to suffer the desire to linger there without combating it (βλέπετε ἄφ' ὅπου τὸ ἐπιθυμῆσαι) is of the same nature, and shares the condemnation. The breach of an oath (Lev. xix. 12) was forbidden by the Law; and the rabbinical writers had woven a distinction between oaths that were and oaths that were not binding (Maimonides in Lightfoot, Hor. Hæb. ii. p. 127). Jesus shows that all oaths, whether they name the Creator or not, are an appeal to Him, and all are on that account equally binding. But the need of an oath "cometh of evil;" the bare asseveration of a Christian should be as solemn and sacred to him as the most binding oath. That this in its simple literal application would go to abolish all swearing is beyond a question; but the Lord is sketching out a perfect Law for a perfect kingdom; and this is not the only part of the Sermon on the Mount which in the present state of the world cannot be carried out completely. Men there are on whom a word is less binding than an oath; and in judicial proceedings the highest test must be applied to them to elicit the truth; therefore an oath must still form part of a legal process, and a good man may take what is really kept up to control the wicked. Jesus Himself did not refuse the oath administered to Him in the Sanhedrin (Matt. xxvi. 63). And yet the need of an oath "cometh of evil," for among men who respect the truth it would add nothing to the weight of their evidence. Almost the same would apply to the precepts with which our Lord replaces the much-abused law of retaliation, "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth" (Ex. xxi. 24). To conquer an enemy by submission where he expected resistance is of the very essence of the Gospel; it is an exact imitation of our Lord's own example, Who, when He might have summoned more than twelve legions of Angels to His aid, allowed the Jews to revile and slay Him. And yet it is not possible at once to wipe out from our social arrangements the principle of retribution. The robber who takes a coat must not be encouraged to seize the cloak also; to give to every one that asks all that he asks would be an encouragement to aloth and shameless impertunity. But yet the awakened conscience will find out a hundred ways in which the spirit of this precept may be carried out, even in our imperfect social state; and the power of this loving policy will be felt by those who attempt it. Finally, our Lord sums up this portion of His Divine law by words full of sublime wisdom. To the cramped and confined love of the Rabbis, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy," He opposes this nobler rule—"Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you, that ye may be the children of your Father Which is in heaven; for He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. . . . Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father Which is in heaven is perfect" (Matt. v. 44, 45, 48). To this part of the sermon, which St. Luke has not preserved, but which St. Matthew, writing as it were with his face turned towards his Jewish countrymen, could not pretermit, succeed precepts on almsgiving, on prayer, on forgiveness, on fasting, on trust in God's providence, and on tolerance; all of them tuned to one or two notes: that a man's whole nature must be offered to God, and that it is man's duty to do to others as he would have them do to him. An earnest appeal on the difficulty of a godly life, and the worthlessness of mere profession, cast in the form of a parable, concludes this wonderful discourse. The differences between the reports of the two Evangelists are many. In the former Gospel the sermon occupies one hundred and seven verses; in the latter, thirty. The longer report includes the exposition of the relation of the Gospel to the Law: it also draws together, as we have seen, some passages which St. Luke reports elsewhere and in another connexion; and where the two contain the same matter, that of St. Luke is somewhat more compressed. But in taking account of this, the purpose of St. Matthew is to be borne in mind: the morality of the Gospel is to be fully set forth at the beginning of our Lord's ministry, and especially in its bearing on the Law as usually received by the Jews, for whose use especially this Gospel was designed. And when this discourse is compared with the later examples to which we shall presently refer, the fact comes out more distinctly, that we have here the Code of the Christian Lawgiver, rather than the whole Gospel; that the standard of Christian duty is here fixed, but the means for raising men to the level where the observance of such a law is at all possible are not yet pointed out. The hearers learned how Christians would act and think, and to what degree of moral purity they would aspire, in the state of salvation; but how that state was to be purchased for them, and conveyed over to them, is not yet pointed out.

The next example of the teaching of Jesus must be taken from a later epoch in His ministry. It is probable that the great discourse in John vi. took place about the time of the Transfiguration, just before which He began to reveal to the disciples the story of His sufferings (Matt. xvi. and parallels), which was the special and frequent theme of His teaching until the end. The effect of His personal work on the disciples now becomes the prominent subject. He had taught them that He was the Christ, and had given them His law, wider and deeper far than that of Moses. But the objection to every law applies more strongly the purer and higher the law is; and "how to perform that which I will" is a question that grows more difficult to answer as the standard of obedience is raised. It is that question which our Lord proceeds to answer here. The feeding of the five thousand had lately taken place; and from this miracle He preaches yet a greater, namely, that all spiritual life is imparted to the disciples from Him, and that they must feed on Him that their souls may live. He can feed them with something more than manna, even with Himself; "for the Bread of God is He Which cometh down from heaven and giveth life unto the world" (John vi. 26-40). The Jews murmur at this hard doctrine, and He warns them that it is a kind of test of those who have been with Him: "No man can come to Me except the Father Which hath sent Me draw him." He repeats that He is the Bread of Life; and they murmur yet more (vv. 41-52). He presses it on them still more strongly: "Verily, verily I say unto you, Except ye eat the Flesh of the Son of man and drink His Blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth My Flesh and drinketh My Blood hath eternal Life; and I will raise him up at the last day. For My Flesh is meat indeed, and My Blood is drink indeed. He that eateth My Flesh, and drinketh My Blood, dwelleth in Me and I in him. As the living Father hath sent Me, and I live by the Father, so he that eateth Me, even he shall live by Me" (vv. 53-57). After this discourse many of the disciples went back and walked no more with Him. They could not conceive how salvation could depend on a condition so strange; nay, even so revolting. However we may blame them for their want of confidence in their Teacher, it is not to be imputed to them as a fault that they found a doctrine, which in itself is difficult, and here was clothed in dark and obscure expressions, beyond the grasp of their understanding at that time. For that doctrine was, that Christ had taken our fleshly nature, to suffer in it, and to shed His Blood in it; and that those to whom the benefits of His atoning death are imparted find it to be their spiritual food and life, and the condition of their resurrection to life everlasting.

Whether this passage refers, and in what degree, to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, is a question on which commentators have been much divided, but two observations should in some degree guide our interpretation: the one, that if the primary reference of the discourse had been to the Lord's Supper, it would have been uttered at the institution of that rite, and not before, at a time when the disciples could not possibly make application of it to a Sacrament of which they had never even heard; the other, that the form of speech in this discourse comes so near that which is used in instituting the Lord's Supper, that it is impossible to exclude all reference to that Sacrament. The Redeemer alludes here to His Death, to the Body which shall suffer on the Cross, and to the Blood which shall be poured out. This great sacrifice is not only to be looked on, but to be believed; and not only believed, but appropriated to the believer, to become part of his very heart and life. Faith, here as elsewhere, is the means of apprehending it: but when it is once laid hold of, it will be as much a part of the believer as the food that nourishes the body becomes incorporated with the body. In three passages in the other Evangelists, in which our Lord about this very time prepares them for His sufferings, He connects with the announcement a warning to the disciples that all who would come after Him must show the fruit of His death in their lives (Matt. xvi., Mark viii., Luke ix.). And this new principle, infused into them by the life and death of the Redeemer, by His taking our flesh and then suffering in it (for neither of these is excluded), is to believers the seed of eternal life. The believer "hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (John vi. 54). Now the words of Jesus in instituting the Lord's Supper come very near to the expressions in this discourse: "This is My Body which is given for you (ὄψαρ ὑμῶν) . . . This cup is the new testament in My Blood, which is shed for you" (Luke xxii. 19, 20). That the Lord's Supper is a means of applying to us through faith the fruits of the Incarnation and the Atonement of Christ, is generally admitted; and if so, the discourse before us will apply to that Sacrament, not certainly to the exclusion of other means of appropriating the saving Death of Christ, but still with great force, inasmuch as the Lord's Supper is the most striking symbol of the application to us of the Lord's Body. Here in a bold figure the disciples are told that they must eat the Flesh of Christ and drink His Blood; whilst in the Sacrament the same figure becomes an act. Here the language is meant to be general; and there it finds its most striking special application, but not its only one. And the uttering of these words at an epoch that preceded by some months the first celebration of the Lord's Supper was probably intended to preclude that special and limited application of it which would narrow it down to the Sacrament only, and out of which much false and even idolatrous teaching has grown (cp. Commentaries of Alford, Lücke, Meyer, Stier, Heubner, Williams, Tholuck, and others, on this passage). It will still be asked how we are to account for the startling form in which this most profound Gospel-truth was put before persons to whom it was likely to prove an offence. The answer is not difficult. Many had companied with the Lord during the early part of His ministry, to see His miracles, perhaps to derive some fruit from them, to talk about Him, and to repeat His sayings, who were quite unfit to go on as His followers to the end. There was a wide difference between the two doctrines, that Jesus was the Christ, and that the Christ must hang upon the tree, as to their effects on unregenerate and worldly minds. For the latter they were not prepared: though many of them could possibly accept the former. Now this discourse belongs to the time of transition from the easier to the harder doctrine. And we may suppose that it was meant to sift the disciples, that the good grain might remain in the garner and the chaff be scattered to the wind. Hence the hard and startling form in which it was cast; not indeed that this figure of eating and drinking in reference to spiritual things was wholly unknown to Jewish teachers, for Lightfoot, Schöttgen, and Wetstein have shown the contrary. But hard it doubtless was; and if the condition of discipleship had been that they should then and there understand what they heard, their turning back at this time would have been inevitable. But even on the twelve Jesus imposes no such condition. He only asks them, "Will ye also go away?" If a beloved teacher says something which overturns the previous notions of the taught, and shocks their prejudices, then whether they will continue by his side to hear him explain further what they find difficult, or desert him at once, will depend on the amount of their confidence in him. Many of the disciples went back and walked no more with Jesus, because their conviction that He was the Messiah had no real foundation. The rest remained with Him for the reason so beautifully expressed by Peter: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God" (John vi. 68, 69). The sin of the faint-hearted followers who now deserted Him was not that they found this difficult; but that finding it difficult they had not confidence enough to wait for light.

The third example of our Lord's discourses which may be selected is that which closes His ministry—"Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in Him. If God be glorified in Him, God shall also glorify Him in Himself, and shall straightway glorify Him" (John xiii. 31, 32). This great discourse, recorded only by St. John, extends from the xiiiith to the end of the xvith chapter. It hardly admits of analysis. It announces the Saviour's departure in the fulfilment of His mission; it imposes the "new commandment" on the disciples of a special love towards each other which should be the outward token to the world of their Christian profession; it consoles them with the promise of the Comforter Who should be to them instead of the Saviour; it tells them all that He would do for them, teaching them, reminding them, reproving the world and guiding the disciples into all truth. It offers them, instead of the Bodily Presence of their beloved Master, free access to the throne of His Father, and spiritual blessings such as they had not known before. Finally, it culminates in that sublime prayer (ch. xvii.) by which the High-Priest, as it were, consecrates Himself the Victim; and, so doing, prays for those who shall hold fast and keep the benefits of that Sacrifice, offered for the whole world, whether His disciples already, or to be brought to Him thereafter by the ministry of Apostles. He wills that they shall be with Him and behold His glory. He recognises the righteousness of the Father in the plan of salvation, and in the result produced to the disciples; in whom that highest and purest love wherewith the Father loved the Son shall be present, and with and in that love the Son Himself shall be present with them. "With this elevated thought," says Olshausen, "the Redeemer concludes His prayer for the disciples, and in them for the Church through all ages. He has compressed into the last moments given Him for intercourse with His own the most sublime and glorious sentiments ever uttered by human lips. Hardly has the sound of the last word died away when Jesus passes with His disciples over the brook Kedron to Gethsemane; and the bitter conflict draws on. The seed of the new world must be sown in death that thence life may spring up."

These three discourses are examples of the Saviour's teaching—of its progressive character from the opening of His ministry to the close. The first exhibits His practical precepts as Lawgiver of His people; the second, an exposition of the need of His Sacrifice, but addressed to the world without, and intended to try them rather than to attract; and the third, where Christ, the Lawgiver and the High-Priest, stands before God as the Son of God, and speaks to Him of His inmost counsels, as One Who had known them from the beginning. They will serve as illustrations of the course of His doctrine; whilst others will be mentioned in the narrative as it proceeds.

The scene of the Lord's ministry.—As to the scene of the ministry of Christ, no less than as to its duration, the three Evangelists seem at first sight to be at variance with the fourth. St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke record only our Lord's doings in Galilee; if we put aside a few days before the Passion, we find that they never mention His visiting Jerusalem. St. John, on the other hand, whilst he records some acts in Galilee, devotes the chief part of his Gospel to the transactions in Judaea. But when the supplemental character of St. John's Gospel is borne in mind, there is little difficulty in explaining this. The three Evangelists do not profess to give a chronology of the ministry, but rather a picture of it: notes of time are not frequent in their narrative. And as they chiefly confined themselves to Galilee, where the Redeemer's chief acts were done, they might naturally omit to mention the Feasts, which being passed by our Lord at Jerusalem, added nothing to the materials for His Galilean ministry. St. John, on the other hand, writing later, and giving an account of the Redeemer's life which is still less complete as a history (for more than one-half of the fourth Gospel is occupied with the last three months of the ministry, and seven chapters out of twenty-one are filled with the account of the few days of the Passion), vindicates his historical claim by supplying several precise notes of time: in the occurrences after the Baptism of Jesus, days and even hours are specified (i. 29, 35, 39, 43, ii. 1); the first miracle is mentioned, and the time at which it was wrought (ii. 1-11). He mentions not only the Passovers (ii. 13, 23; vi. 4; xiii. 1, and perhaps v. 1), but also the Feast of Tabernacles (vii. 2) and of Dedication (x. 22); and thus it is ordered that the Evangelist who goes over the least part of the ground of our Lord's ministry is yet the same who fixes for us its duration, and enables us to arrange the facts of the rest more exactly in their historical places. It is true that the three Gospels record chiefly the occurrences in Galilee; but there is evidence in them that labours were wrought in Judaea. Frequent teaching in Jerusalem is implied in the Lord's lamentation over the lost city (Matt. xxiii. 37). The appearance in Galilee of Scribes and Pharisees and others from Jerusalem (Matt. iv. 25, xv. 1) would be best explained on the supposition that their enmity had been excited against Him during visits to Jerusalem. The intimacy with the family of Lazarus (Luke x. 38, &c.), and the attachment of Joseph of Arimathea to the Lord (Matt. xxvii. 57), would imply, most probably, frequent visits to Jerusalem. But why was Galilee chosen as the principal scene of the ministry? The question is not easy to answer. The Prophet would resort to the Temple of God; the King of the Jews would go to His own royal city; the Teacher of the chosen people would preach in the midst of them. But their hostility prevented it. The Saviour, Who, accepting all the infirmities of "the form of a servant" which He had taken, fled in His childhood to Egypt, betakes Himself to Galilee to avoid Jewish hatred and machinations, and lays the foundations of His Church amid a people of impure and despised race. To Jerusalem He comes occasionally, to teach and suffer persecution, and finally to die: "for it cannot be that a prophet perish out of Jerusalem" (Luke xiii. 33). It was upon the first outbreak of persecution against Him that He left Judaea: "When Jesus had heard that John was cast into prison, He departed into Galilee" (Matt. iv. 12). And that this persecution aimed at Him also we gather from St. John: "When therefore the Lord knew how that the Pharisees had heard that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John . . . He left Judaea and departed into Galilee" (iv. 1, 3). If the light of the Sun of Righteousness shone on the Jews henceforward from the far-off shores of the Galilean lake, it was because they had refused and abhorred that light.

Duration of the Ministry.—It is impossible to determine exactly from the Gospels the number of years during which the Redeemer exercised His ministry before the Passion; but the doubt lies between two and three; for the opinion, adopted from an interpretation of Isaiah lxi. 2 by more than one of the ancients, that it lasted only one year, cannot be borne out (Euseb. iii. 24; Clem. Alex. Strom. 1; Origen, Princ. 4, 5). The data are to be drawn from St. John. This Evangelist mentions six Feasts, at five of which Jesus was present: the Passover that followed His Baptism (ii. 13); "a Feast of the Jews" (εορτη without the article, v. 1); a Passover during which Jesus remained in Galilee (vi. 4); the Feast of Tabernacles to which the Lord went up privately (vii. 2); the Feast of Dedication (x. 22); and lastly the Feast of Passover, at which He suffered (xii. xiii.). There are certainly three Passovers, and it is possible that "a Feast" (v. 1) may be a fourth. Upon this possibility the question turns. Lücke in his Commentary (vol. ii. p. 1), in collecting with great research the various opinions on this place, is unable to arrive at any definite conclusion upon it, and leaves it unsolved. But if this Feast is not a Passover, then no Passover is mentioned by St. John between the first (ii. 13) and that which is spoken of in the sixth chapter; and the time between those two must be assumed to be a single year only. Now, although the record of John of this period contains but few facts, yet when all the Evangelists are compared, the amount of labour compressed into this single year would be too much for its compass. The time during which Jesus was baptizing (by His disciples) near the Jordan was probably considerable, and lasted till John's imprisonment (John iii. 22-36, and see below). The circuit round Galilee, mentioned in Matt. iv. 23-25, was a missionary journey through a country of considerable population, and containing two hundred towns; and this would occupy some time. But another such journey, of the most comprehensive kind, is undertaken in the same year (Luke viii. 1), in which He "went throughout every city and village." And a third circuit of the same kind, and equally general (Matt. ix. 35-38), would close the same year. Is it at all probable that Jesus, after spending a considerable time in Judaea, would be able to make three circuits of Galilee in the remainder of the year, preaching and doing wonders in the various places to which He came? This would be more likely if the journeys were hurried and partial; but all three are spoken of as though they were the very opposite. It is, to say the least, easier to suppose that the "Feast" (John v. 1) was a Passover, dividing the time into two, and throwing two of these circuits into the second year of the ministry; provided there be nothing to make this interpretation improbable in itself. The words are, "After this there was a Feast of the Jews; and Jesus went up to Jerusalem." These two facts are meant as cause and effect; the Feast caused the visit. If so, it was probably one of the three Feasts at which the Jews were expected to appear before God at Jerusalem. Was it the Passover, the Pentecost, or the Feast of Tabernacles? In the preceding chapter the Passover has been spoken of as "the Feast" (v. 45); and if another Feast were meant here, the name of it would have been added, as in vii. 2, x. 22. The omission of the article is not decisive, for it occurs in other cases where the Passover is certainly intended (Matt. xxvii. 15; Mark xv. 6); nor is it clear that the Passover was called the Feast, as the most eminent, although the Feast of Tabernacles was sometimes so described. All that the omission could prove would be that the Evangelist did not think it needful to describe the Feast more precisely. The words in John iv. 35, "There are yet four months and then cometh harvest," would agree with this, for the barley harvest began on the 16th Nisan, and reckoning back four months would bring this conversation to the beginning of December, i.e. the middle of Kisleu. If it be granted that our Lord is here merely quoting a common form of speech (Alford), still it is more likely that He would use one appropriate to the time at which He was speaking. And if these words were uttered in December, the next of the three great Feasts occurring would be the Passover. The shortness of the interval between v. 1 and vi. 4 would afford an objection, if it were not for the scantiness of historical details in the early part of the ministry in St. John: from the other Evangelists it appears that two great journeys might have to be included between these verses. Upon the whole, though there is nothing that amounts to proof, it is probable that there were four Passovers, and consequently that our Lord's ministry lasted somewhat more than three years, the "beginning of miracles" (John ii.) having been wrought before the first Passover. On data of calculation that have already been mentioned, the year of the first of these Passovers was U.C. 780, and the Baptism of our Lord took place either in the beginning of that year or the end of the year preceding. The ministry of John the Baptist began in U.C. 779 (see Commentaries on John v. 1, especially Kuinoel and Lücke. Also Winer, Realwörterbuch, art. Jesus Christ; Greswell, Dissertations, i., Diss. 4, ii. Diss. 22).

After this sketch of the means, the scene, and the duration of the Saviour's ministry, the historical order of the events may be followed without interruption.

Our Lord has now passed through the ordeal of temptation, and His ministry has begun. At Bethabara, to which He returns, disciples begin to be drawn towards Him; Andrew and another, probably John, the sole narrator of the fact, see Jesus, and hear the Baptist's testimony concerning Him. Andrew brings Simon Peter to see Him also; and he receives from the Lord the name of Cephas. Then Philip and Nathanael are brought into contact with our Lord. All these reappear as Apostles, if Nathanael be, as has often been supposed, the same as Bartholomew; but the time of their calling to that office was not yet. But that their minds, even at this early time, were wrought upon by the expectation of the Messiah appears by the confession of Nathanael: "Thou art the Son of God; Thou art the King of Israel" (John i. 35-51). The two disciples last named saw Him as He was about to set out for Galilee, on the third day of His sojourn at Bethabara. The third day after his interview Jesus is at Cana in Galilee, and works His first miracle, by making the water wine (John i. 29, 35, 43; ii. 1). All these particulars are supplied from the fourth Gospel, and come in between the 11th and 12th verses of the fourth chapter of St. Matthew. They show that our Lord left Galilee expressly to be baptized and to suffer temptation, and returned to His own country when these were accomplished. He now betakes Himself to Capernaum, and, after a sojourn there of "not many days," sets out for Jerusalem to the Passover, which was to be the beginning of His ministry in Judaea (John ii. 12, 13).

The cleansing of the Temple is associated by St. John with this first Passover (ii. 12-22), and a similar cleansing is assigned to the last Passover by the other Evangelists. These two cannot be confounded without throwing discredit on the historical character of one narrative or the other; the notes of time are too precise. But a host of interpreters have pointed out the probability that an action symbolical of the power and authority of Messiah should be twice performed, at the opening of the ministry and at its close. The expulsion of the traders was not likely to produce a permanent effect, and at the end of three years Jesus found the tumult and the traffic defiling the court of the Temple as they had done when He visited it before. Besides the difference of time, the narrative of St. John is by no means identical with those of the others; he mentions that Jesus made a scourge of small cords (φραγγέλιον εκ σχοινίων, ii. 15) as a symbol—we need not prove that it could be no more—of His power to punish; that here He censured them for making the Temple "a house of merchandise," whilst at the last cleansing it was pronounced "a den of thieves," with a distinct reference to the two passages of Isaiah and Jeremiah (Is. lvi. 7; Jer. vii. 11). Writers like Strauss would persuade us that "tact and good sense" would prevent the Redeemer from attempting such a violent measure at the beginning of His ministry, before His authority was admitted. The aptness and the greatness of the occasion have no weight with such critics. The usual sacrifices of the Law of Jehovah, and the usual half-shekel paid for tribute to the Temple, the very means that were appointed by God to remind them that they were a consecrated people, were made an excuse for secularising even the Temple; and in its holy precincts all the business of the world went on. It was a time when "the zeal of God's house" might well supersede the "tact" on which the German philosopher lays stress; and Jesus failed not in the zeal, nor did the accusing consciences of the traders fail to justify it, for at the rebuke of one man they retreated from the scene of their gains. Their hearts told them, even though they had been long immersed in hardening traffic, that the House of God could belong to none other but God; and when a Prophet claimed it for Him, conscience deprived them of the power to resist. Immediately after this, the Jews asked of Him a sign or proof of His right to exercise this authority. He answered them by a promise of a sign by which He would hereafter confirm His mission, "Destroy this Temple and in three days I will raise it up" (John ii. 19), alluding, as the Evangelist explains, to His Resurrection. But why is the name of the building before them applied by our Lord so darkly to Himself? There is doubtless a hidden reference to the Temple as a type of the Church, which Christ by His Death and Resurrection would found and raise up. He Who has cleared of buyers and sellers the courts of a perishable Temple made with hands, will prove hereafter that He is the Founder of an eternal Temple made without hands, and their destroying act shall be the cause. The reply was indeed obscure; but it was meant as a refusal of their demand; and to the disciples afterwards it became abundantly clear. At the time of the Passion this saying was brought against Him, in a perverted form—"At the last came two false witnesses, and said, This fellow said, I am able to destroy the Temple of God, and to build it in three days" (Matt. xxvi. 61). They hardly knew perhaps how utterly false a small alteration in the tale had made it. They wanted to hold Him up as one who dared to think of the destruction of the Temple; and to change "destroy" into "I can destroy," might seem to do no great violence to the truth. But those words contained not a mere circumstance but the very essence of the saying, "You are the destroyers of the Temple; you that were polluting it now by turning it into a market-place shall destroy it, and also your city, by staining its stones with My Blood." Jesus came not to destroy the Temple but to widen its foundations; not to destroy the Law but to complete it (Matt. v. 17). Two syllables changed their testimony into a lie.

The visit of Nicodemus to Jesus took place about this first Passover. It implies that our Lord had done more at Jerusalem than is recorded of Him even by St. John; since we have here a Master of Israel (John iii. 10), a member of the Sanhedrin (John vii. 50), expressing his belief in Him, although too timid at this time to make an open profession. The object of the visit, though not directly stated, is still clear: he was one of the better Pharisees, who were expecting the kingdom of Messiah, and, having seen the miracles that Jesus did, he came to enquire more fully about these signs of its approach. This indicates the connexion between the remark of Nicodemus and the Lord's reply: "You recognise these miracles as signs of the kingdom of God; verily I say unto you, no one can truly see and know the kingdom of God, unless he be born again" (δνωθεν, from above; see Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. in loc., vol. iv.). The visitor boasted the blood of Abraham, and expected to stand high in the new kingdom in virtue of that birthright. He did not wish to surrender it and set his hopes upon some other birth (cp. Matt. iii. 9); and there is something of wilfulness in the question—"How can a man be born when he is old?" (v. 4). Our Lord again insists on the necessity of the renewed heart, in him who would be admitted to the kingdom of heaven. The new birth is real though it is unseen, like the wind which blows hither and thither though the eye cannot watch it save in its effects. Even so the Spirit sways the heart towards good, carries it away towards heaven, brings over the soul at one time the cloud, at another the sunny weather. The sound of Him is heard in the soul, now as the eager east wind bringing pain and remorse; now breathing over it the soft breath of consolation. In all this He is as powerful as the wind; and as unseen is the mode of His operations. For the new birth, of water and of the Holy Ghost, without which none can come to God, faith in the Son of God is needed (v. 18); and as implied in that, the renouncing of those evil deeds that blind the eyes to the truth (vv. 19, 20). It has been well said that this discourse contains the whole Gospel in epitome; there is the kingdom of grace into which God will receive those who have offended Him, the new truth which God the Holy Spirit will write in all those who seek the kingdom; and God the Son crucified and slain that all who would be saved may look on Him when He is lifted up, and find health thereby. The three Persons of the Trinity are all before us carrying out the scheme of man's salvation. If it be asked how Nicodemus, so timid and half-hearted as yet, was allowed to hear thus early in the ministry what our Lord kept back even from His disciples till near the end of it, the answer must be, that, wise as it was to keep back from the general body of the hearers the doctrine of the Crucifixion, the Physician of souls would treat each case with the medicine that it most required. Nicodemus was an enquiring spirit, ready to believe all the Gospel, but for his Jewish prejudices and his social position. He was one whom even the shadow of the Cross would not estrange; and the Lord knew it, and laid open to him all the scheme of salvation. Not in vain. The tradition, indeed, may not be thoroughly certain, which reports his open conversion and his baptism by Peter and John (Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 171). But three years after this conversation, when all the disciples have been scattered by the death of Jesus, he comes forward with Joseph of Arimathaea, at no little risk, although with a kind of secrecy still, to perform the last offices for the Master to Whom his soul cleaves (John xix. 39).

After a sojourn at Jerusalem of uncertain duration, Jesus went to the Jordan with His disciples; and they there baptized in His name. The Baptist was now at Aenon near Salim; and the jealousy of his disciples against Jesus drew from John an avowal of his position, which is remarkable for its humility (John iii. 27-30), "A man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven. Ye yourselves bear me witness, that I said, I am not the Christ, but that I have been sent before Him. He that hath the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom, which standeth and heareth him, rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice: this my joy therefore is fulfilled. He must increase, but I must decrease." The speaker is one who has hitherto enjoyed the highest honour and popularity, a prophet extolled by all the people. Before the Sun of Righteousness his reflected light is turning pale; it shall soon be extinguished. Yet no word of reluctance, or of attempt to cling to a temporary and departing greatness, escapes him. "He must increase, but I must decrease." It had been the same before; when the Sanhedrin sent to enquire about him, he claimed to be no more than "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said the Prophet Esaias" (John i. 23); there was One "Who coming after me is preferred before me, Whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose" (i. 27). Strauss thinks this height of self-renunciation beautiful, but impossible (Leben Jesu, ii. 1, § 46); but what Divine influence had worked in the Baptist's spirit, adorning that once rugged nature with the grace of humility, we do not admit that Dr. Strauss is in a position to measure.

How long this sojourn in Judaea lasted is uncertain. But in order to reconcile John iv. 1 with Matt. iv. 12, we must suppose that it was much longer than the "twenty-six or twenty-seven" days to which the learned Mr. Greswell upon mere conjecture would limit it. From the two passages together it would seem that John was after a short time cast into prison (Matt.), and that Jesus, seeing that the enmity directed against the Baptist would now assail Him, because of the increasing success of His ministry (John), resolved to withdraw from its reach.

In the way to Galilee Jesus passed by the shortest route, through Samaria. This country, peopled by men from five districts, whom the king of Assyria had planted there in the time of Hoshea (2 K. xvii. 24, &c.), and by the residue of the ten tribes that was left behind from the Captivity, had once abounded in idolatry, though latterly faith in the true God had gained ground. The Samaritans even claimed to share with the people of Judaea the restoration of the Temple at Jerusalem, and were repulsed (Ezra iv. 1-3). In the time of our Lord they were hated by the Jews even more than if they had been Gentiles. Their corrupt worship was a shadow of the true; their temple on Gerizim was a rival to that which adorned the hill of Zion. "He that eats bread from the hand of a Samaritan," says a Jewish writer, "is as one that eats swine's flesh." Yet even in Samaria were souls to be saved; and Jesus would not shake off even that dust from His feet. He came in His journey to Sichem, which the Jews in mockery had changed to Sychar, to indicate that its people were drunkards (Lightfoot), or that they followed idols (Reland; see Hab. ii. 18). Wearied and athirst, He sat on the side of Jacob's well. A woman from the neighbouring town came to draw from the well, and was astonished that a Jew should address her as a neighbour, with a request for water. The conversation that ensued might be taken for an example of the mode in which Christ leads to Himself the souls of men. The awakening of her attention to the privilege she is enjoying in communing with Him (John iv. 10-15); the self-knowledge and self-conviction which He arouses (v. 15-19), and which whilst it pains does not repel; the complete revelation of Himself, which she cannot but believe (v. 19-29), are effects that

He has wrought in many another case. The woman's lightness and security, until she finds herself in the presence of a Prophet, Who knows all her past sins; her readiness afterwards to enter on a religious question, which perhaps had often been revolved in her mind in a worldly and careless way, are so natural that they are almost enough of themselves to establish the historical character of the account.

In this remarkable dialogue are many things to ponder over. The living water which Christ would give; the announcement of a change in the worship of Jew and Samaritan; lastly, the confession that He Who speaks is truly the Messiah, are all noteworthy. The open avowal that He is the Messiah, made to the daughter of an abhorred people, is accounted for if we remember that this was the first and last time when He taught personally in Samaria, and that the woman showed a special fitness to receive it, for she expected in the Christ a spiritual teacher not a temporal prince: "When He is come, He will tell us all things" (v. 25). The very absence of national pride, which so beset the Jews, preserved in her a right conception of the Christ. Had she thought—had she said, "When He is come, He will restore the kingdom to Israel, and set His followers in high places, on His right and on His left," then He could not have answered, as now, "I that speak unto thee am He." The words would have conveyed a falsehood to her. The Samaritans came out to Him on the report of the woman; they heard Him and believed: "We have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world" (v. 42). Was this great grace thrown away upon them? Did it abide by them, or was it lost? In the persecution that arose about Stephen, Philip "went down to a city of Samaria (not "the city," as in A. V. [and R. V.]), and preached Christ unto them" (Acts viii. 5). We dare not pronounce as certain that this city was Sychar; but the readiness of the Samaritans to believe (viii. 6) recalls the candour and readiness of the men of Sychar, and it is difficult not to connect the two events together.

Jesus now returned to Galilee, and came to Nazareth, His own city. In the Synagogue He expounded to the people a passage from Isaiah (lxi. 1), telling them that its fulfilment was now at hand in His Person. The same truth that had filled the Samaritans with gratitude, wrought up to fury the men of Nazareth, who would have destroyed Him if He had not escaped out of their hands (Luke iv. 16-30). He came now to Capernaum. On His way thither, when He had reached Cana, He healed the son of one of the courtiers of Herod Antipas (John iv. 46-54), who "himself believed, and his whole house." This was the second Galilean miracle. At Capernaum He wrought many miracles for them that needed. Here two disciples who had known Him before, namely, Simon Peter and Andrew, were called from their fishing to become "fishers of men" (Matt. iv. 19), and the two sons of Zebedee received the same summons. After healing on the Sabbath a demoniac in the Synagogue, a miracle which was witnessed by many, and was made known everywhere, He returned the same day to Simon's house, and healed the mother-in-law of Simon, who was sick of a fever. At sunset, the multitude, now fully aroused by what they had heard, brought their sick to Simon's door to get them healed. He did not refuse His succour, and healed them all (Mark i. 29-34). He now, after showering down on Capernaum so many cures, turned His thoughts to the rest of Galilee, where other "lost sheep" were scattered:—"Let us go into the next towns (κωμοπόλεις) that I may preach there also, for therefore came I forth" (Mark i. 38). The journey through Galilee, on which He now entered, must have been a general circuit of that country. His object was to call on the Galileans to repent and believe the Gospel. This could only be done completely by taking such a journey that His teaching might be accessible to all in turn at some point or other. Josephus mentions that there were two hundred and four towns and villages in Galilee (Vita, 45): therefore such a circuit as should in any real sense embrace the whole of Galilee would require some months for its performance. "The course of the present circuit," says Mr. Greswell (Dissertations, ii. 293), "we may conjecture, was, upon the whole, as follows:—First, along the western side of the Jordan, northward, which would disseminate the fame of Jesus in Decapolis; secondly, along the confines of the tetrarchy of Philip, westward, which would make Him known throughout Syria; thirdly, by the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, southward; and lastly, along the verge of Samaria, and the western region of the lake of Galilee—the nearest points to Judaea proper and to Perea—until it returned to Capernaum." In the course of this circuit, besides the works of mercy spoken of by the Evangelists (Matt. iv. 23-25; Mark i. 32-34; Luke iv. 40-44) He had probably called to Him more of His Apostles. Four at least were His companions from the beginning of it. The rest (except perhaps Judas Iscariot) were Galileans, and it is not improbable that they were found by their Master during this circuit. Philip of Bethsaida and Nathanael or Bartholomew were already prepared to become His disciples by an earlier interview. On this circuit occurred the first case of the healing of a leper; it is selected for record by the Evangelists, because of the incurableness of the ailment. So great was the dread of this disorder—so strict the precautions against its infection—that even the raising of Jairus' daughter from the dead, which probably occurred at Capernaum about the end of this circuit, would hardly impress the beholders more profoundly.

Second year of the Ministry.—Jesus went up to Jerusalem to "a feast of the Jews," which we have shown (p. 1675) to have been probably the Passover. At the pool Bethesda (= house of mercy), which was near the sheep-gate (Neh. iii. 1) on the north-east side of the Temple, Jesus saw many infirm persons waiting their turn for the healing virtues of the water (John v. 1-18). On the genuineness of the fourth verse, see Scholz, N. T.; Tischendorf, N. T.; and Lücke, in loc. It is wanting in three out of the four chief MSS.; it is singularly disturbed with variations in the MSS. that insert it, and it abounds in words which do not occur again in this Gospel). Among them was a man who had had an infirmity thirty-eight years: Jesus made him whole by a word, bidding him take up his bed and walk. The miracle was done on the Sabbath; and the Jews, by which name in St. John's Gospel we are to understand the Jewish authorities who acted against Jesus, rebuked the man for carrying his bed. It was a labour; and, as such, forbidden (Jer. xvii. 21). The answer of the man was too logical to be refuted: "He that made me whole, the same said unto me, Take up thy bed and walk" (v. 11). If He had not authority for the latter, whence came His power to do the former? Their anger was now directed against Jesus for healing on the Sabbath, even for well-doing. They sought to put Him to death. In our Lord's justification of Himself, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (v. 17), there is an unequivocal claim to the Divine Nature. God the Father never rests: if sleep could visit His Eyelids for an instant; if His Hand could droop for a moment's rest, the Universe would collapse in ruin. He rested on the seventh day from the creation of new beings; but from the maintenance of those that exist He never rests. His love streams forth on every day alike; as do the impartial beams from the sun that He has placed in the heavens. The Jews rightly understood the saying: none but God could utter it; none could quote God's example, as setting Him over and above God's law, save One Who was God Himself. They sought the more to kill Him. He expounded to them more fully His relation to the Father. He works with the strength of the Father and according to His will. He can do all that the Father does. He can raise men out of bodily and out of spiritual death; and He can judge all men. John bore witness to Him; the works that He does bear even stronger witness. The reason that the Jews do not believe is their want of discernment of the meaning of the Scriptures; and that comes from their worldliness, their desire of honour from one another. Unbelief shall bring condemnation; even out of their Law they can be condemned, since they believe not even Moses, who foretold that Christ should come (John v. 19-47).

Another discussion about the Sabbath arose from the disciples plucking the ears of corn as they went through the fields (Matt. xii. 1-8). The time of this is somewhat uncertain: some would place it a year later, just after the third Passover (Clausen); but its place is much more probably here (Newcome, Robinson, &c.). The needy were permitted by the Law (Deut. xxxiii. 25) to pluck the ears of corn with their hand, even without waiting for the owner's permission. The disciples must have been living a hard and poor life to resort to such means of sustenance. But the Pharisees would not allow that it was lawful on the Sabbath-day. Jesus reminds them that David, whose example they are not likely to challenge, ate the sacred shewbread in the Tabernacle, which it was not lawful to eat. The priests might partake of it, but not a stranger (Ex. xxix. 33; Lev. xxiv. 5, 9). David, on the principle that mercy was better than sacrifice (Hos. vi. 6), took it and gave it to the young men that were with him that they might not perish for hunger. In order further to show that a literal mechanical observance of the law of the Sabbath would lead to absurdities, Jesus reminds them that this law is perpetually set aside on account of another: "The priests profane the Sabbath and are blameless" (Matt. xii. 5). The work of sacrifice, the placing of the shewbread, go on on the Sabbath, and labour even on that day may be done by priests, and may please God. It was the root of the Pharisees' fault that they thought sacrifice better than mercy, ritual exactness more than love: "If ye had known what this meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless. For the Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath-day" (Matt. xii. 7, 8). These last words are inseparable from the meaning of our Lord's answer. In pleading the example of David, the king and prophet, and of the priests in the Temple, the Lord tacitly implies the greatness of His own position. He is indeed Prophet, Priest, and King; and had He been none of these, the argument would have been not merely incomplete, but misleading. It is undeniable that the law of the Sabbath was very strict. Against labours as small as that of winning the corn a severe penalty was set. Our Lord quotes cases where the Law is superseded or set aside, because He is One Who has power to do the same. And the rise of a new law is implied in those words which St. Mark alone has recorded: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." The law upon the Sabbath was made in love to men, to preserve for them a due measure of rest, to keep room for the worship of God. The Son of Man has power to readjust this law, if its work is done, or if men are fit to receive a higher.

This may have taken place on the way from Jerusalem after the Passover. On another Sabbath, probably at Capernaum, to which Jesus had returned, the Pharisees gave a far more striking proof of the way in which their hard and narrow and unloving interpretation would turn the beneficence of the Law into a blighting oppression. Our Lord entered into the synagogue, and found there a man with a withered hand—some poor artisan perhaps whose handiwork was his means of life. Jesus was about to heal him—which would give back life to the sufferer—which would give joy to every beholder who had one touch of pity in his heart. The Pharisees interfere: "Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath-day?" Their doctors would have allowed them to pull a sheep out of a pit; but they will not have a man rescued from the depth of misery. Rarely is that loving Teacher wroth, but here His anger, mixed with grief, showed itself: He looked round about upon them "with anger, being grieved at the hardness of their hearts," and answered their cavils by healing the man (Matt. xii. 9-14; Mark iii. 1-6; Luke vi. 6-11).

In placing the ordination or calling of the Twelve Apostles just before the Sermon on the Mount, we are under the guidance of St. Luke (vi. 13, 17). But this more solemn separation for their work by no means marks the time of their first approach to Jesus. Scattered notices prove that some of them at least were drawn gradually to the Lord, so that it would be difficult to identify the moment when they earned the name of disciples. In the case of St. Peter, five degrees or stages might be traced (John i.

41-43; Matt. iv. 19, xvi. 17-19; Luke xxii. 31, 32; John xxi. 15-19), at each of which he came somewhat nearer to his Master. That which takes place here is the appointment of twelve disciples to be a distinct body, under the name of Apostles. They are not sent forth to preach until later in the same year. The number twelve must have reference to the number of the Jewish tribes: it is a number selected on account of its symbolical meaning, for the work confided to them might have been wrought by more or fewer. Twelve is used with the same symbolical reference in many passages of the O. T. Twelve pillars to the Altar which Moses erected (Ex. xxiv. 4); twelve stones to commemorate the passing of the Ark over Jordan (Josh. iv. 3); twelve precious stones in the breastplate of the priest (Ex. xxviii. 21); twelve oxen bearing up the molten sea in the Temple of Solomon (1 K. vii. 25); twelve officers over Solomon's household (1 K. iv. 7): all these are examples of the perpetual repetition of the Jewish number. Bähr (Symbolik, vol. i.) has accumulated passages from various authors to show that twelve, the multiple of four and three, is the type or symbol of the Universe, but it is enough here to say that the use of the number in the foundation of the Christian Church has a reference to the tribes of the Jewish nation. Hence the number continues to be used after the addition of St. Paul and St. Barnabas had made it inapplicable. The Lord Himself tells them that they "shall sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. xix. 27, 28). When He began His ministry in Galilee, He left His own home at Nazareth, and separated Himself from His kinsmen after the flesh, in order to devote Himself more completely to His prophetic office; and these Twelve were "to be with Him" (Mark), and to be instead of family and friends. But the enmity of the Jews separated Him also from His countrymen. Every day the prospect of the Jews receiving Him as their Messiah, to their own salvation, became more faint; and the privileges of the favoured people passed gradually over to the new Israel, the new Church, the new Jerusalem, of which the Apostles were the foundation. The precise day in which this defection was completed could not be specified. The Sun of Righteousness rose on the world, and set for the Jews, through all the shades of twilight. In the education of the Twelve for their appointed work, we see the superseding of the Jews; in the preservation of the symbolical number we see preserved a recognition of their original right.

In the four lists of the names of the Apostles preserved to us (Matt. x., Mark iii., Luke vi., Acts i.), there is a certain order preserved, amidst variations. The two pairs of brothers, Simon and Andrew, and the sons of Zebedee, are always named the first; and of these Simon Peter ever holds the first place. Philip and Bartholomew, Thomas and Matthew, are always in the next rank; and of them Philip is always the first. In the third rank James the son of Alphaeus is the first, as Judas Iscariot is always the last, with Simon the Zealot and Thaddæus between. The principle that governs this arrangement cannot be determined very positively; but as no doubt Simon Peter stands first because of his zeal in his Master's service, and Judas ranks last because of his treason, it is natural to suppose that they are all arranged with some reference at least to their zeal and fitness for the apostolic office. Some of the Apostles were certainly poor and unlearned men; it is probable that the rest were of the same kind. Four of them were fishermen, not indeed the poorest of their class; and a fifth was a "publican," one of the portitores, or tax-gatherers, who collected the taxes farmed by Romans of higher rank. Andrew, who is mentioned with Peter, is less conspicuous in the history than he, but he enjoyed free access to his Master, and seems to have been more intimate with him than the rest (John vi. 8, xii. 22, with Mark xiii. 3). But James and John, who are sometimes placed above him in the list, were especially distinguished by Jesus. They were unmarried; and their mother, of whose ambition we have a well-known instance, seems to have had much influence over them. The zeal and fire of their disposition is indicated in the name of Boanerges bestowed upon them. One seems hardly to recognise in the fierce enthusiasts who would have called down fire from heaven to consume the inhospitable Samaritans (Luke ix. 52-56) the Apostle of Love and his brother. It is probable that the Bartholomew of the Twelve is the same as Nathanael (John i.); and the Lebbaeus or Thadæus the same as Judas the brother of James. Simon the Zealot was so called probably from his belonging to the sect of Zealots, who, from Num. xv. 7, 8, took it on themselves to punish crimes against the Law. If the name Iscariot (= man of Cariot = Kerioth) refers the birth of the traitor to Kerioth in Judah (Josh. xv. 25), then it would appear that the traitor alone was of Judaean origin, and the eleven faithful ones were despised Galileans.

From henceforth the education of the twelve Apostles will be one of the principal features of the Lord's ministry. First He instructs them; then He takes them with Him as companions of His wayfaring; then He sends them forth to teach and heal for Him. The Sermon on the Mount, although it is meant for all the disciples, seems to have a special reference to the chosen Twelve (Matt. v. 11, &c.). Its principal features have been sketched already; but they will miss their full meaning if it is forgotten that they are the first teaching which the Apostles were called on to listen to after their appointment.

About this time it was that John the Baptist, long a prisoner with little hope of release, sent his disciples to Jesus with the question, "Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" In all the Gospels there is no more touching incident. Those who maintain that it was done solely for the sake of the disciples, and that John himself needed no answer to support his faith, show as little knowledge of the human mind as exactness in explaining the words of the account. The great privilege of John's life was that he was appointed to recognise and bear witness to the Messiah (John i. 31). After languishing a year in a dungeon, after learning that even yet Jesus had made no steps towards the establishment of His kingdom of the Jews, and that His following consisted of only twelve poor Galileans, doubts began to cloud over his spirit. Was the kingdom of Messiah as near as he had thought? Was Jesus not the Messiah but some forerunner of that Deliverer, as he himself had been? There is no unbelief; he does not suppose that Jesus has deceived; when the doubts arise, it is to Jesus that he submits them. But it was not without great depression and perplexity that he put the question, "Art thou He that should come?" The scope of the answer given lies in its recalling John to the grounds of his former confidence. The very miracles are being wrought that were to be the signs of the kingdom of heaven; and therefore that kingdom is come (Isa. xxxv. 5; xlii. 6, 7). There is more of grave encouragement than of rebuke in the words, "Blessed is he who shall not be offended in me" (Matt. xi. 6). They bid the Forerunner to have a good heart, and to hope and believe to the end. He has allowed sorrow, and the apparent triumph of wickedness, which is a harder trial, to trouble his view of the Divine plan; let him remember that it is blessed to attain that state of confidence which these things cannot disturb; and let the signs which Jesus now exhibits suffice him to the end (Matt. xi. 1-6; Luke vii. 18-23).

The testimony to John which our Lord graciously adds is intended to reinstate him in that place in the minds of His own disciples which he had occupied before this mission of doubt. John is not a weak waverer; not a luxurious courtier, attaching himself to the new dispensation from worldly motives; but a prophet, and more than a prophet, for the prophets spoke of Jesus afar off, but John stood before the Messiah, and with his hand pointed Him out. He came in the spirit and power of Elijah (Mal. iii. 1, iv. 5), to prepare for the kingdom of heaven. And yet great as he was, the least of those in the kingdom of heaven when it is completely planted should enjoy a higher degree of religious illumination than he (Matt. xi. 7-11; Luke vii. 24-28).

Now commences the second circuit of Galilee (Luke viii. 1-3), to which belong the parables in Matt. xiii.; the visit of our Lord's mother and brethren (Luke viii. 19-21), and the account of his reception at Nazareth (Mark vi. 1-6).

During this time the twelve have journeyed with Him. But now a third circuit in Galilee is recorded, which probably occurred during the last three months of this year (Matt. ix. 35-38); and during this circuit, after reminding them how great is the harvest and how pressing the need of labourers, He carries the training of the disciples one step further by sending them forth by themselves to teach (Matt. x. xi.). Such a mission is not to be considered as identical in character with the mission of the Apostles after the Resurrection. It was limited to the Jews; the Samaritans and heathen were excluded; but this arose, not from any narrowness in the limits of the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xxviii. 19; Mark xvi. 15), but from the limited knowledge and abilities of the Apostles. They were sent to proclaim to the Jews that "the kingdom of heaven," which their Prophets taught them to look for, was at hand (Matt. x. 7); but they were unfit as yet for the task of explaining to Jews the true nature of that kingdom, and still more to Gentiles who had received no preparation for any such doctrine. The preaching of the Apostles whilst Jesus was yet on earth was only ancillary to His and a preparation of the way for Him. It was probably of the simplest character. "As ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand." Power was given them to confirm it by signs and wonders; and the purpose of it was to throw the minds of those who heard it into an inquiring state, so that they might seek and find the Lord Himself. But whilst their instructions as to the matter of their preaching were thus brief and simple, the cautions, warnings, and encouragements as to their own condition were far more full. They were to do their work without anxiety for their welfare. No provision was to be made for their journey; in the house that first received them in any city they were to abide, not seeking to find the best. Dangers would befall them, for they were sent forth "as sheep in the midst of wolves" (Matt. x. 16); but they were not to allow this to disturb their thoughts. The same God Who wrought their miracles for them would protect them; and those who confessed the name of Christ before men would be confessed by Christ before the Father as His disciples. These precepts for the Apostles even went somewhat beyond what their present mission required; it does not appear that they were at this time delivered up to councils, or scourged in synagogues. But in training their feeble wings for their first flight the same rules and cautions were given which would be needed even when they soared the highest in their zeal and devotion to their crucified Master. There is no difficulty here, if we remember that this sending forth was rather a training of the Apostles than a means of converting the Galilean people.

They went forth two and two; and our Lord continued His own circuit (Matt. xi. 1), with what companions does not appear. By this time the leaven of the Lord's teaching had begun powerfully to work among the people. Herod, we read, "was perplexed, because that it was said of some, that John was risen from the dead, and of some that Elijah had appeared; and of others, that one of the old Prophets was risen again" (Luke ix. 7, 8). The false apprehensions about the Messiah that He should be a temporal ruler, were so deep-rooted, that whilst all the rumours concurred in assigning a high place to Jesus as a Prophet, none went beyond to recognise Him as the King of Israel—the Saviour of His people and the world.

After a journey of perhaps two months' duration the Twelve return to Jesus, and give an account of their ministry. The third Passover was now drawing near; but the Lord did not go up to it, because His time was not come for submitting to the malice of the Jews against Him; because His ministry in Galilee was not completed; and especially, because He wished to continue the training of the Apostles for their work, now one of the chief objects of His ministry. He wished to commune with them privately upon their work, and, we may suppose, to add to the instruction they had already received from Him (Mark vi. 30, 31). He therefore went with them from the neighbourhood of Capernaum to a mountain on the eastern shore of the Sea of Tiberias, near Bethsaida Julias, not far from the head of the sea. Great multitudes pursued them; and here the Lord, moved to compassion by the hunger and weariness of the people, wrought for them one of His most remarkable miracles. Out of five barley loaves and two small fishes, He produced food for five thousand men besides women and children. The act was one of creation, and therefore was both an assertion and a proof of Divine power; and the discourse which followed it, recorded by St. John only, was an important step in the training of the Apostles, for it hinted to them for the first time the unexpected truth that the Body and Blood of Christ, that is, His Passion, must become the means of man's salvation. This view of the doctrine of the kingdom of heaven which they had been preaching, could not have been understood; but it would prepare those who still clave to Jesus to expect the hard facts that were to follow these hard words. The discourse itself has already been examined (p. 1673). After the miracle, but before the comment on it was delivered, the disciples crossed the sea from Bethsaida Julias to Bethsaida of Galilee, and Jesus retired alone to a mountain to commune with the Father. They were toiling at the oar, for the wind was contrary, when, at the night drew towards morning, they saw Jesus walking to them on the sea, having passed the whole night on the mountain. They were amazed and terrified. He came into the ship, and the wind ceased. They worshipped Him at this new proof of Divine power—"Of a truth Thou art the Son of God" (Matt. xiv. 33). The storm had been another trial of their faith (cp. Matt. viii. 23-26), not in a present Master, as on a former occasion, but in an absent one. But the words of St. Mark intimate that even the feeding of the five thousand had not built up their faith in Him,—“for they considered not the miracle of the loaves: for their heart was hardened” (vi. 52). St. Peter, however, as St. Matthew relates, with his usual reverence, wishing to show that he really possessed that faith in Jesus which perhaps in the height of the storm had been somewhat forgotten, requests Jesus to bid him come to Him upon the water. When he made the effort, his faith began to fail, and he cried out for succour. Christ's rebuke, "O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" does not imply that he had no faith, or that it wholly deserted him then. All the failings of Peter were of the same kind; there was a faith full of zeal and eagerness, but it was not constant. He believed that he could walk on the waters if Jesus bade him; but the roar of the waves appalled him, and he sank from the same cause that made him deny his Lord afterwards.

When they reached the shore of Gennesaret, the whole people showed their faith in Him as a Healer of disease (Mark vi. 53-56); and He performed very many miracles on them. Nothing could surpass the eagerness with which they sought Him. Yet on the next day the great discourse just alluded to was uttered, and "from that time many of His disciples went back and walked no more with Him" (John vi. 66).

Third year of the Ministry.—Hearing perhaps that Jesus was not coming to the feast, Scribes and Pharisees from Jerusalem went down to see Him at Capernaum (Matt. xv. 1). They found fault with His disciples for breaking the tradition about purifying, and eating with unwashed hands. It is not necessary to suppose that they came to lie in wait for Jesus. The objection was one which they would naturally take. Our Lord in His answer tries to show them how far external rule, claiming to be religious, may lead men away from the true spirit of the Gospel. "Ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father or his mother, It is a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me; and honour not his father or his mother, he shall be free" (Matt. xv. 5, 6). They admitted the obligation of the fifth commandment, but had introduced a means of evading it, by enabling a son to say to his father and mother who sought his help that he had made his property "a gift" to the Temple, which took precedence of his obligation. Well might He apply to a people where such a miserable evasion could find place, the words of Isaiah (xxix. 13): "This people draweth nigh unto Me with their mouth, and honoureth Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me. But in vain they do worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."

Leaving the neighbourhood of Capernaum, our Lord now travels to the north-west of Galilee, to the region of Tyre and Sidon. The time is not strictly determined, but it was probably the early summer of this year. It does not appear that He retired into this heathen country for the purpose of ministering; more probably it was a retreat from the machinations of the Jews. A woman of the country, of Greek education (Ἑλληνὶς Συροφονικίσσα, Mark), came to entreat Him to heal her daughter who was tormented with an evil spirit. The Lord at first repelled her by saying that He was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; but not so was her maternal love to be baffled. She sought Him again and was again repelled; the bread of the children was not to be given to dogs. Still persisting, she besought His help even as one of the dogs so despised: "the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from the master's table." Faith so sincere was not to be resisted. Her daughter was made whole (Matt. xv. 21-28; Mark vii. 24-30).

Returning thence, He passed round by the north of the sea of Galilee to the region of Decapolis on its eastern side (Mark vii. 31-37). In this district He performed many miracles, and especially the restoration of a deaf man who had an impediment in his speech, remarkable for the seeming effort with which He wrought it. To these succeeded the feeding of the four thousand with the seven loaves (Matt. xv. 32). He now crossed the Lake of Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees asked and were refused a "sign;" some great wonder wrought expressly for them to prove that He was the Christ. He answers them as He had answered a similar request before: "the sign of the Prophet Jonas" was all that they should have. His own Resurrection after a death of three days should be the great sign, and yet in another sense no sign should be given them, for they should neither see it nor believe it. The unnatural alliance between Pharisee and Sadducee is worthy of remark. The zealots of tradition and the political partisans of Herod (for "leaven of the Sadducees," in Matt. xvi. 6—"leaven of Herod, Mark viii. 15) joined together for once with a common object of hatred. After they had departed, Jesus crossed the lake with His disciples, and, combining perhaps for the use of the disciples the remembrance of the feeding of the four thousand with that of the conversation they had just heard, warned them to "beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the leaven of Herod" (Mark viii. 15). So little however were the disciples prepared for this, that they mistook it for a reproof for having brought only one loaf with them! They had forgotten the five thousand and the four thousand, or they would have known that where He was, natural bread could not fail them. It was needful to explain to them that the leaven of the Pharisees was the doctrine of those who had made the Word of God of none effect by traditions which appearing to promote religion really overlaid and destroyed it, and the leaven of the Sadducees was the doctrine of those who, under the show of superior enlightenment, denied the foundations of the fear of God by denying a future state. At Bethsaida Julius, Jesus restored sight to a blind man; and here, as in a former case, the form and preparation which He adopted are to be remarked. As though the human Saviour has to wrestle with and painfully overcome the sufferings of His people, He takes him by the hand, and leads him out of the town, and spits on his eyes and asks him if he sees aught. At first the sense is restored imperfectly; and Jesus lays His hand again upon him and the cure is complete (Mark viii. 22-26).

The ministry in Galilee is now drawing to its close. Through the length and breadth of that country Jesus had proclaimed the kingdom of Christ, and has shown by mighty works that He is the Christ that was to come. He begins to ask the disciples what are the results of all His labour. "Whom say the people that I am?" (Luke ix. 18). It is true that the answer shows that they took Him for a Prophet. But we are obliged to admit that the rejection of Jesus by the Galileans had been as complete as His preaching to them had been universal. Here and there a few may have received the seeds that shall afterwards be quickened to their conversion. But the great mass had heard without earnestness the preached word, and forgotten it without regret. "Whereunto shall I liken this generation?" says Christ. "It is like children sitting in the market, and calling unto their fellows, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented" (Matt. xi. 16, 17). This is a picture of a wayward people without earnest thought. As children, from want of any real purpose, cannot agree in their play, so the Galileans quarrel with every form of religious teaching. The message of John and that of Jesus they did not attend to; but they could discuss the question whether one was right in fasting and the other in eating and drinking. He denounces woe to the cities where He had wrought the most—to Chorazin, Bethsaida, and Capernaum—for their strange insensibility, using the strongest expressions. "Thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell; for if the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day. But I say unto you, that it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for thee" (Matt. xi. 23, 24). Such awful language could only be used to describe a complete rejection of the Lord. And in truth nothing was wanting to aggravate that rejection. The lengthened journeys through the land, the miracles, far more than are recorded in detail, had brought the Gospel home to all the people. Capernaum was the focus of His ministry. Through Chorazin and Bethsaida He had no doubt passed with crowds behind Him, drawn together by wonders that they had seen, and by the hope of others to follow them. Many thousands had actually been benefited by the miracles; and yet of all these there were only twelve that really clung to Him, and one of them was Judas the traitor. With this rejection an epoch of the history is connected. He begins to unfold now the doctrine of His Passion more fully. First inquiring whom the people said that He was, He then put the same question to the Apostles themselves. Simon Peter, the ready spokesman of the rest, answers, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." It might almost seem that such a manifest inference from the wonders they had witnessed was too obvious to deserve praise, did not the sight of a whole country which had witnessed the same wonders, and despised them, prove how thoroughly callous the Jewish heart was. "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but My Father Which is in heaven. And I also say unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven" (Matt. xvi. 16-20). We compare the language applied to Capernaum for its want of faith with that addressed to St. Peter and the Apostles, and we see how wide is the gulf between those who believe and those who do not. Jesus now in the plainest language tells them what is to be the mode of His departure from the world: "how that He must go unto Jerusalem, and suffer many things of the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised again the third day" (Matt. xvi. 21). St. Peter, who had spoken as the representative of all the Apostles before, in confessing Jesus as the Christ, now speaks for the rest in offering to our Lord the commonplace consolations of the children of this world to a friend beset by danger. The danger they think will be averted: such an end cannot befall one so great. The Lord, "when He had turned about and looked on His disciples" (Mark), to show that He connected Peter's words with them all, addresses Peter as the tempter—"Get thee behind Me, Satan; thou art an offence unto Me." These words open up to us the fact that this period of the ministry was a time of special trial and temptation to the sinless Son of God:—"Escape from sufferings and death! Do not drink the cup prepared of Thy Father; it is too bitter; it is not deserved." Such was the whisper of the prince of this world at that time to our Lord; and St. Peter has been unwittingly taking it into his mouth. The doctrine of a suffering Messiah, so plainly exhibited in the Prophets, had receded from sight in the current religion of that time. The announcement of it to the disciples was at once new and shocking. By repelling it, even when offered by the Lord Himself, they fell into a deeper sin than they could have conceived. The chief of them was called "Satan," because he was unconsciously pleading on Satan's side (Matt. xvi. 21-23).

Turning now to the whole body of those who followed Him (Mark, Luke), He published the Christian doctrine of self-denial. The Apostles had just shown that they took the natural view of suffering, that it was an evil to be shunned. They shrank from conflict, and pain, and death, as it is natural men should. But Jesus teaches that, in comparison with the higher life, the life of the soul, the life of the body is valueless. And as the renewed life of the Christian implies his dying to his old wishes and desires, suffering, which causes the death of earthly hopes and wishes, may be a good. "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his Cross and follow Me. For whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for My sake shall find it. For what is a man profited, if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" (Matt. xvi.). From this part of the history to the end we shall not lose sight of the sufferings of the Lord. The Cross is darkly seen at the end of our path; and we shall ever draw nearer that mysterious implement of human salvation (Matt. xvi. 21-28; Mark viii. 31-38; Luke ix. 22-27).

The Transfiguration, which took place just a week after this conversation, is to be understood in connexion with it. The minds of the Twelve were greatly disturbed at what they had heard. The Messiah was to perish by the wrath of men. The Master Whom they served was to be taken away from them. Now, if ever, they needed support for their perplexed spirits, and this their loving Master failed not to give them. He takes with Him three chosen disciples—St. Peter, St. John, and St. James—who formed as it were a smaller circle nearer to Jesus than that of the rest, into a high mountain apart by themselves. There are no means of determining the position of the mountain; although Caesarea Philippi was the scene of the former conversations, it does not follow that this occurred on the eastern side of the lake, for the intervening week would have given time enough for a long journey thence. There is no authority for the tradition which identifies this mountain with Mount Tabor, although it may be true. The three disciples were taken up with Him, who should afterwards be the three witnesses of His Agony in the garden of Gethsemane: those who saw His glory in the holy mount would be sustained by the remembrance of it when they beheld His lowest humiliation. The calmness and exactness of the narrative preclude all doubt as to its historical character. It is no myth, nor vision; but a sober account of a miracle. When Jesus had come up into the mountain, He was praying; and as He prayed, a great change came over Him. "His face did shine as the sun (Matt.); and His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them" (Mark). Beside Him appeared Moses the great Lawgiver, and Elijah, great amongst the Prophets; and they spake of His departure, as though it was something recognised both by Law and Prophets. The three disciples were at first asleep with weariness; and when they woke, they saw the glorious scene. As Moses and Elijah were departing (Luke), St. Peter, wishing to arrest them, uttered those strange words, "Lord, it is good for us to be here, and let us make three tabernacles, one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah." They were the words of one astonished and somewhat afraid, yet of one who felt a strange peace in this explicit testimony from the Father that Jesus was His. It was good for them to be there, he felt, where no Pharisees could set traps for them, where neither Pilate nor Herod could take Jesus by force. Just as he spoke a cloud came over them, and the voice of the Heavenly Father attested once more His Son—"This is My beloved Son; hear Him." There has been much discussion on the purport of this great wonder. But thus much seems highly probable. First, as it was connected with the prayer of Jesus, to which it was no doubt an answer, it is to be regarded as a kind of inauguration of Him in His new office as the High-Priest Who should make atonement for the sins of the people with His own Blood. The mystery of His trials and temptations lies too deep for speculation: but He received strength against human infirmity—against the prospect of sufferings so terrible—in this His glorification. Secondly, as the witnesses of this scene were the same three disciples who were with the Master in the garden of Gethsemane, it may be assumed that the one was intended to prepare them for the other, and that they were to be borne up under the spectacle of His Humiliation by the remembrance that they had been eyewitnesses of His Majesty (2 Pet. i. 16-18).

As they came down from the mountain He charged them to keep secret what they had seen till after the Resurrection; which shows that this miracle took place for His use and for theirs, rather than for the rest of the disciples. This led to questions about the meaning of His rising again from the dead, and in the course of it, and arising out of it, occurred the question, "Why then (ὅτι), which refers to some preceding conversation) say the Scribes that Elias must first come?" They had been assured by what they had just seen that the time of the kingdom of God was now come; and the objection brought by the Scribes, that before the Messiah Elijah must reappear, seemed hard to reconcile with their new conviction. Our Lord answers them that the Scribes have rightly understood the prophecies that Elijah would first come (Mal. iv. 5, 6), but have wanted the discernment to see that this prophecy was already fulfilled. "Elias is come already, and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatever they listed." In John the Baptist, who came in the spirit and power of Elijah, were the Scriptures fulfilled (Matt. xvii. 1-13; Mark ix. 2-13; Luke ix. 28-36).

Meantime amongst the multitude below a scene was taking place which formed the strongest contrast to the glory and the peace which they had witnessed, and which seemed to justify Peter's remark, "It is good for us to be here." A poor youth, lunatic and possessed by a devil—for here as elsewhere the possession is superadded to some known form of that bodily and mental evil which came in at first with sin and Satan—was brought to the disciples who were not with Jesus, to be cured. They could not prevail; and when Jesus appeared amongst them, the agonised and disappointed father appealed to Him, with a kind of complaint of the impotence of the disciples. "O faithless and perverse generation!" said our Lord; "how long shall I be with you? how long shall I suffer you?" The rebuke is not to the disciples, but to all, the father included; for the weakness of faith that hindered the miracle was in them all. St. Mark's account, the most complete, describes the paroxysm that took place in the lad on our Lord's ordering him to be brought; and also records the remarkable saying, which well described the father's state, "Lord, I believe; help Thou my unbelief!" What the disciples had failed to do, Jesus did at a word. He then explained to them that their want of faith in their own power to heal, and in His promises to bestow the power upon them, was the cause of their inability (Matt. xvii. 14-21; Mark ix. 14-29; Luke ix. 37-43).

Once more did Jesus foretell His sufferings on their way back to Capernaum; but "they understood not that saying, and were afraid to ask Him" (Mark ix. 30-32).

But a vague impression seems to have been produced on them that His kingdom was now very near. It broke forth in the shape of a dispute amongst them as to which should rank the highest in the kingdom when it should come. Taking a little child, He told them that, in His kingdom, not ambition, but a childlike humility, would entitle to the highest place (Matt. xviii. 1-5; Mark ix. 33-37; Luke ix. 46-48). The humility of the Christian is so closely connected with consideration for the souls of others, that the transition to a warning against causing offence (Matt., Mark), which might appear abrupt at first, is most natural. From this Jesus passes naturally to the subject of a tender consideration for "the lost sheep;" thence to the duty of forgiveness of a brother. Both of these last points are illustrated by parables. These, and some other discourses belonging to the same time, are to be regarded as designed to carry on the education of the Apostles, whose views were still crude and unformed, even after all that had been done for them (Matt. xviii.).

From the Feast of Tabernacles, Third Year.—The Feast of Tabernacles was now approaching. For eighteen months the ministry of Jesus had been confined to Galilee; and His brothers, not hostile to Him, yet only half-convinced about His doctrine, urged Him to go into Judaea that His claims might be known and confessed on a more conspicuous field. This kind of request, founded in human motives, was one which our Lord would not assent to: witness His answer to Mary at Cana in Galilee when the first miracle was wrought. He told them that, whilst all times were alike to them, whilst they could always walk among the Jews without danger, His appointed time was not come. They set out for the feast without Him, and He abode in Galilee for a few days longer (John vii. 2-10). Afterwards He set out, taking the more direct but less frequented route by Samaria, that His journey might be "in secret." It was in this journey that James and John conceived the wish—so closely parallel to facts in the Old Covenant, so completely at variance with the spirit of the New—that fire should be commanded to come down from heaven to consume the inhospitable Samaritans (Luke ix. 51-62).

St. Luke alone records, in connexion with this journey, the sending forth of the seventy disciples. This event is to be regarded in a different light from that of the twelve. The seventy had received no special education from our Lord, and their commission was of a temporary kind. The number has reference to the Gentiles, as twelve had to the Jews; and the scene of the work, Samaria, reminds us that this is a movement directed towards the stranger. It takes place six months after the sending forth of the twelve; for the Gospel was to be delivered to the Jew first and afterwards to the Gentile. In both cases probably the preaching was of the simplest kind—"The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." The instructions given were the same in spirit; but, on comparing them, we see that now the danger was becoming greater and the time for labour shorter (Luke x. 1-16).

After healing the ten lepers in Samaria, He came "about the midst of the feast" to Jerusalem. Here the minds of the people were strongly excited and drawn in different ways concerning Him. The Pharisees and rulers sought to take Him; some of the people, however, believed in Him, but concealed their opinion for fear of the rulers. To this division of opinion we may attribute the failure of the repeated attempts on the part of the Sanhedrin to take One Who was openly teaching in the Temple (John vii. 11-53; see esp. vv. 30, 32, 44, 45, 46). The officers were partly afraid to seize in the presence of the people the favourite Teacher; and they themselves were awed and attracted by Him. They came to seize Him, but could not lift their hands against Him. Notwithstanding the ferment of opinion, and the fixed hatred of those in power, He seems to have taught daily to the end of the Feast in the Temple before the people.

The history of the woman taken in adultery belongs to this time. But it must be premised that several MSS. of highest authority omit this passage, and that in those which insert it the text is singularly disturbed (see Lücke in loc., and Tischendorf, Gr. Test., ed. vii.). The remark of Augustine is perhaps not far from the truth, that this story formed a genuine portion of the apostolic teaching, but that mistaken people excluded it from their copies of the written Gospel, thinking it might be perverted into a license to women to sin (Ad Pollent. ii. ch. 7). That it was thus kept apart, without the safeguards which Christian vigilance exercised over the rest of the text, and was only admitted later, would at once account for its absence from the MSS. and for the various forms assumed by the text where it is given. But the history gives no ground for such apprehensions. The Law of Moses gave the power to stone women taken in adultery. But Jewish morals were sunk very low, like Jewish faith; and the punishment could not be inflicted on a sinner by those who had sinned in the same kind: "Etenim non est ferendus accusator is qui quod in altero vitium reprehendit, in eo ipso deprehenditur" (Cicero, c. Verrum, iii.). Thus the punishment had passed out of use. But they thought, by proposing this case to our Lord, to induce Him either to set the Law formally aside, in which case they might accuse Him of profaneness; or to sentence the guilty wretch to die, and so become obnoxious to the charge of cruelty. From such temptations Jesus was always able to escape. He threw back the decision upon them; He told them that the man who was free from that sin might cast the first stone at her. Conscience told them that this was unanswerable, and one by one they stole away, leaving the guilty woman alone before One Who was indeed her Judge. It has been supposed that the words "Neither do I condemn thee" convey an absolute pardon for the sin of which she had just been guilty. But they refer, as has long since been pointed out, to the doom of stoning only. "As they have not punished thee, neither do I; go, and let this danger warn thee to sin no more" (John viii. 1-11).

The conversations (John viii. 12-59) show in a strong light the perversity of the Jews in misunderstanding our Lord's words. They refuse to see any spiritual meaning in them, and drag them as it were by force down to a low and carnal interpretation. Our Lord's remark explains the cause of this, "Why do ye not understand My speech [way of speaking]? Even because ye cannot hear My word" (v. 43). His mode of expression was strange to them, because they were neither able nor willing to understand the real purport of His teaching. To this place belongs the account, given by John alone, of the healing of one who was born blind, and the consequences of it (John ix. 1-41, x. 1-21). The poor patient was excommunicated for refusing to undervalue the agency of Jesus in restoring him. He believed on Jesus; whilst the Pharisees were only made the worse for what they had witnessed. Well might Jesus exclaim, "For judgment I am come into this world, that they which see not might see; and that they which see might be made blind" (ix. 39). The well-known parable of the Good Shepherd is an answer to the calumny of the Pharisees, that He was an impostor and breaker of the law, "This man is not of God, because He keepeth not the Sabbath day" (ix. 16).

We now approach a difficult portion of the sacred history. The note of time given us by St. John immediately afterwards is the Feast of the Dedication, which was celebrated on the 25th of Kislev, answering nearly to December. According to this Evangelist, our Lord does not appear to have returned to Galilee between the Feast of Tabernacles and that of Dedication, but to have passed the time in and near Jerusalem. St. Matthew and St. Mark do not allude to the Feast of Tabernacles. St. Luke appears to do so in ix. 51; but the words there used would imply that this was the last journey to Jerusalem. Now in St. Luke's Gospel a large section, from ix. 51 to xviii. 14, seems to belong to the time preceding the departure from Galilee; and the question is, How is this to be arranged, so that it shall harmonize with the narrative of St. John? In most Harmonies a return of our Lord to Galilee has been assumed, in order to find a place for this part of Luke's Gospel. "But the manner," says the English editor of Robinson's Harmony, "in which it has been arranged, after all, is exceedingly various. Some, as Le Clerc (Harm. Evang. p. 264), insert nearly the whole during this supposed journey. Others, as Lightfoot, assign to this journey only what precedes Luke xiii. 23; and refer the remainder to our Lord's sojourn beyond Jordan, John x. 40 (Chron. Temp. N. T., Opp. ii. pp. 37, 39). Greswell (ii. Dissert. xvi.) maintains that the transactions in Luke ix. 51-xviii. 14 all belong to the journey from Ephraim (through Samaria, Galilee, and Peraea) to Jerusalem, which he dates in the interval of four months, between the Feast of Dedication and our Lord's last Passover. Wieseler (Chron. Synops. p. 328) makes a somewhat different arrangement; according to which, Luke ix. 51-xiii. 21 relates to the period from Christ's journey from Galilee to the Feast of the Tabernacles till after the Feast of Dedication (parallel to John vii. 10-x. 42). Luke xiii. 22-xvii. 10 relates to the interval between that time and our Lord's stay at Ephraim (parallel to John xi. 1-54); and Luke xvii. 11-xviii. 14 relates to the journey from Ephraim to Jerusalem, through Samaria, Galilee, and Pernea" (Robinson's Harmony, English ed. p. 92). If the table of the Harmony of the Gospels given above is referred to [GOSPELS], it will be found that this great division of St. Luke (x. 17-xviii. 14) is inserted entire between John x. 21 and 22; not that this appeared certainly correct, but that there are no points of contact with the other Gospels to assist us in breaking it up. That this division contains partly or chiefly reminiscences of occurrences in Galilee prior to the Feast of Tabernacles, is untenable. A journey of some kind is implied in the course of it (see xiii. 22), and beyond this we shall hardly venture to go. It is quite possible, as Wieseler supposes, that part of it should be placed before, and part after the Feast of Dedication. Notwithstanding the uncertainty, it is as the history of this period of the Redeemer's career that the Gospel of St. Luke possesses its chief distinctive value for us. Some of the most striking parables, preserved only by this Evangelist, belong to this period. The parables of the good Samaritan, the prodigal son, the unjust steward, the rich man and Lazarus, and the Pharisee and publican, all peculiar to this Gospel, belong to the present section. The instructive account of Mary and Martha, on which so many have taken a wrong view of Martha's conduct, reminds us that there are two ways of serving the truth, that of active exertion and that of contemplation. The preference is given to Mary's meditation, because Martha's labour belonged to household cares, and was only indirectly religious. The miracle of the ten lepers belongs to this portion of the narrative. Besides these, scattered sayings that occur in St. Matthew are here repeated in a new connexion. Here too belongs the return of the seventy disciples, but we know not precisely where they rejoined the Lord (Luke x. 17-20). They were full of triumph, because they found even the devils subject to them through the weight of Christ's word. In anticipation of the victory, which was now begun, over the powers of darkness, Jesus replies, "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven." He sought however to humble their triumphant spirit, so near akin to spiritual pride: "Notwithstanding, in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, because your names are written in heaven."

The account of the bringing of young children to Jesus unites again the three Evangelists. Here, as often, St. Mark gives the most minute account of what occurred. After the announcement that the disposition of little children was the most meet for the kingdom of God, "He took them up in His arms, put His hands upon them and blessed them." The childlike spirit, which in nothing depends upon its own knowledge but seeks to be taught, is in contrast with the haughty pharisaism with its boast of learning and wisdom; and Jesus tells them that the former is the passport to His kingdom (Matt. xix. 13-15; Mark x. 13-16; Luke xviii. 15-17).

The question of the ruler, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" was one conceived wholly in the spirit of Judaism. The man asked not how he should be delivered from sin, but how his will, already free to righteousness, might select the best and most meritorious line of conduct. The words, "Why callest thou Me good? there is none good but One, that is God," were meant first to draw him down to a humbler view of his own state; the title good is easy to give, but hard to justify, except when applied to the One Who is all good. Jesus by no means repudiates the title as applied to Himself, but only as applied on any other ground than that of a reference to His true Divine Nature. Then the Lord opened out to him all the moral law, which in its full and complete sense no man has observed; but the ruler answered, perhaps sincerely, that he had observed it all from his youth up. Duties however there might be which had not come within the range of his thoughts; and as the demand had reference to his own special case, our Lord gives the special advice to sell all his possessions and to give to the poor. Then for the first time did the man discover that his devotion to God and his yearning after the eternal life were not so perfect as he had thought; and he went away sorrowful, unable to bear this sacrifice. And Jesus told the disciples how hard it was for those who had riches to enter the kingdom. St. Peter, ever the most ready, now contrasts, with somewhat too much emphasis, the mode in which the disciples had left all for Him, with the conduct of this rich ruler. Our Lord, sparing him the rebuke which he might have expected, tells them that those who have made any sacrifice shall have it richly repaid even in this life in the shape of a consolation and comfort, which even persecutions cannot take away (Mark); and shall have eternal life (Matt. xix. 16-30; Mark x. 17-31; Luke xviii. 18-30). Words of warning close the narrative, "Many that are first shall be last, and the last shall be first." lest the disciples should be thinking too much of the sacrifices, not so very great, that they had made. And in St. Matthew only, the well-known parable of the labourer of the vineyard is added to illustrate the same lesson. Whatever else the parable may contain of reference to the calling of the Jews and Gentiles, the first lesson Christ was to give was one of caution to the Apostles against thinking too much of their early calling and arduous labours. They would see many, who, in comparison with themselves, were as the labourers called at the eleventh hour, who should be accepted of God as well as they. But not merit, not self-sacrifice, but the pure love of God and His mere bounty, conferred salvation on either of them: "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with my own?" (Matt. xx. 1-16).

On the way to Jerusalem through Perea, to the Feast of Dedication, Jesus again puts before the minds of the twelve what they are never now to forget, the sufferings that await Him. They "understood none of these things" (Luke), for they could not reconcile this foreboding of suffering with the signs and announcements of the coming of His kingdom (Matt. xx. 17-19; Mark x. 32-34; Luke xviii. 31-34). In consequence of this new, though dark, intimation of the coming of the kingdom, Salome, with her two sons, James and John, came to bespeak the two places of highest honour in the kingdom. Jesus tells them that they know not what they ask; that the places of honour in the kingdom shall be bestowed, not by Jesus in answer to a chance request, but upon those for whom they are prepared by the Father. As sin ever provokes sin, the ambition of the ten was now aroused, and they began to be much displeased with James and John. Jesus once more recalls the principle that the childlike disposition is that which He approves. "Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant: even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many" (Matt. xx. 20-28; Mark x. 35-45).

The healing of the two blind men at Jericho is chiefly remarkable among the miracles from the difficulty which has arisen in harmonizing the accounts. Matthew speaks of two blind men, and of the occasion as the departure from Jericho; Mark of one, whom he names, and of their arrival at Jericho; and Luke agrees with him. This point has received much discussion; but the view of Lightfoot finds favour with many eminent expositors, that there were two blind men, and both were healed under similar circumstances, except that Bartimaeus was on one side of the city, and was healed by Jesus as He entered, and the other was healed on the other side as they departed (see Greswell, Diss. xx. ii.; Wieseler, Chron. Syn. p. 332; Matt. xx. 29-34; Mark x. 46-52; Luke xviii. 35-43).

The calling of Zacchaeus has more than a mere personal interest. He was a publican, one of a class hated and despised by the Jews. But he was one who sought to serve God; he gave largely to the poor, and restored fourfold where he had injured any man. Justice and love were he law of his life. From such did Jesus wish to call His disciples, whether they were publicans or not. "This day is salvation come to this house, for that he also is a son of Abraham. For the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke xix. 1-10).

We have reached now the Feast of Dedication but, as has been said, the exact place of the events in St. Luke about this part of the ministry has not been conclusively determined. After being present at the Feast, Jesus returned to Bethabara beyond Jordan, where John had formerly baptized, and abode there. The place which the beginning of His ministry had consecrated, was now to be adorned with His Presence as it drew towards its close, and the scene of John's activity was now to witness the presence of the Saviour Whom he had so faithfully proclaimed (John x. 22-42). The Lord intended by this choice to recall to the minds of many the good which John had done them, and also, it may be, to prevent an undue exaltation of John in the minds of some who had heard him only. "Many," we read, "resorted to Him, and said John did no miracle: but all things that John spake of this man were true. And many believed on Him there" (cv. 41, 42).

How long He remained here does not appear. It was probably for some weeks. The sore need of a family in Bethany, who were what men call the intimate friends of our Lord, called Him thence. Lazarus was sick, and his sister sent word of it to Jesus, whose power they well knew. Jesus answered that the sickness was not unto death, but for the glory of God and of the Son of God. This had reference to the miracle about to be wrought; even though he died, not his death but his restoration to life was the purpose of the sickness. But it was a trial to the faith of the sisters to find the words of their friend apparently falsified. Jesus abode for two days where He was, and then proposed to the disciples to return. The rage of the Jews against Him filled the disciples with alarm; and Thomas, whose mind leant always to the desponding side, and saw nothing in the expedition but certain death to all of them, said, "Let us also go that we may die with Him." It was not till Lazarus had been four days in the grave that the Saviour appeared on the scene. The practical energy of Martha, and the retiring character of Mary, show themselves here, as once before. It was Martha who met Him, and addressed to Him words of sorrowful reproach. Jesus probed her faith deeply, and found that even in this extremity of sorrow it would not fail her. Mary now joined them, summoned by her sister; and she too reproached the Lord for the delay. Jesus does not resist the contagion of their sorrow, and as a Man He weeps true human tears by the side of the grave of a friend. But with the Power of God He breaks the fetters of brass in which Lazarus was held by death, and at His word the man on whom corruption had already begun to do its work, came forth alive and whole (John xi. 1-45). It might seem difficult to account for the omission of this, perhaps the most signal of the miracles of Jesus, by the three synoptical Evangelists. No doubt it was intentional, and the wish not to direct attention, and perhaps persecution, to Lazarus in his lifetime may go far to account for it. But it stands well in the pages of St. John, whose privilege it has been to announce the highest truths connected with the Divine Nature of Jesus, and who is now also permitted to show Him touched with sympathy for a sorrowing family with whom He lived in intimacy.

A miracle so public—for Bethany was close to Jerusalem, and the family of Lazarus well known to many people in the mother-city—could not escape the notice of the Sanhedrin. A meeting of this Council was called without loss of time, and the matter discussed, not without symptoms of alarm, for the members believed that a popular outbreak, with Jesus at its head, was impending, and that it would excite the jealousy of the Romans and lead to the taking away of their “place and nation.” Caiaphas the high-priest gave it as his opinion that it was expedient for them that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation should not perish. The Evangelist adds that these words bore a prophetic meaning, of which the speaker was unconscious: “This spake he not of himself, but being high-priest that year he prophesied that Jesus should die for that nation.” That a bad and worldly man may prophesy, the case of Balaam proves (Num. xxii.); and the Jews, as Schöttgen shows, believed that prophecy might also be unconscious. But the connexion of the gift of prophecy with the office of the high-priest offers a difficulty. It has been said that, though this gift is never in Scripture assigned to the high-priest as such, yet the popular belief at this time was that he did enjoy it. There is no proof, however, except this passage, of any such belief; and the Evangelist would not appeal to it except it were true, and, if it were true, then the O. T. would contain some allusion to it. The endeavours to escape from the difficulty by changes of punctuation are not to be thought of. The meaning of the passage seems to be this:—The Jews were about to commit a crime, the real results of which they did not know, and God overruled the words of one of them to make him declare the reality of the transaction, but unconsciously; and as Caiaphas was the high-priest, the highest minister of God, and therefore the most conspicuous in the sin, it was natural to expect that he and not another would be the channel of the prophecy. The connexion between his office and the prophecy was not a necessary one; but if a prophecy was to be uttered by unwilling lips, it was natural that the high-priest, who offered for the people, should be the person compelled to utter it. The death of Jesus was now resolved on, and He fled to Ephraim for a few days, because His hour was not yet come (John xi. 45–57).

We now approach the final stage of the history, and every word and act tend towards the great act of suffering. The hatred of the Pharisees, now converted into a settled purpose of murder, the vile wickedness of Judas, and the utter fickleness of the people, are all displayed before us. Each day is marked by its own events or instructions. Our Lord entered into Bethany on Friday the 8th of Nisan, the eve of the Sabbath, and remained over the Sabbath.

Saturday the 9th of Nisan (April 1st).—As He was at supper in the house of one Simon, surnamed “the leper,” a relation of Lazarus, who was at table with Him, Mary, full of gratitude for the wonderful raising of her brother from the dead, took a vessel containing a quantity of pure ointment of spikenard and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped His feet with her hair, and anointed His head likewise. She thought not of the cost of the precious ointment, in an emotion of love which was willing to part with anything she possessed to do honour to so great a Guest, so mighty a Benefactor. Judas the traitor, and some of the disciples (Matt., Mark), who took their tone from him, began to murmur at the waste: “It might have been sold for more than three hundred pence, and have been given to the poor.” But Judas cared not for the poor; already he was meditating the sale of his Master’s life, and all that he thought of was how he might lay hands on something more, beyond the price of blood. Jesus, however, who knew how true was the love which had dictated this sacrifice, silenced their censure. He opened out a meaning in the action which they had not sought there: “She is come aforehand to anoint My Body to the burying.”

Passion Week. Sunday the 10th day of Nisan (April 2nd).—The question of John the Baptist had no doubt often been repeated in the hearts of the expectant disciples:—“Art Thou He that should come, or do we look for another?” All His conversations with them of late had been filled, not with visions of glory, but with forebodings of approaching death. The world thinks them deceived, and its mockery begins to exercise some influence even over them. They need some encouraging sign under influences so depressing, and this Jesus affords them in the triumphal entry into Jerusalem. If the narrative is carefully examined, it will be seen how remarkably the assertion of a kingly right is combined with the most scrupulous care not to excite the political jealousy of the Jewish powers. When He arrives at the Mount of Olives, He commands two of His disciples to go into the village near at hand, where they would find an ass and a colt tied with her. They were neither to buy nor hire them, and “if any man shall say aught unto you, ye shall say, The Lord hath need of them; and straightway he will send them.” With these beasts, impressed as for the service of a king, He was to enter into Jerusalem. The disciples spread upon the ass their ragged cloaks for Him to sit on. And the multitudes cried aloud before Him, in the words of the cxviii. Psalm, “Hosanna (Save now)! blessed is He that cometh in the Name of the Lord.” This Messianic Psalm they applied to Him, from a belief, sincere for the moment, that He was the Messiah. It was a striking and to the Pharisees an alarming sight; but it only serves in the end to show the feeble hearts of the Jewish people. The same lips that cried Hosanna will before long be crying, “Crucify Him, crucify Him!” Meantime, however, all thoughts were carried back to the promises of a Messiah. The very act of riding in upon an ass revived an old prophecy of Zechariah (ix. 9). Words of prophecy out of a Psalm sprang unconsciously to their lips. All the city was moved. Blind and lame came to the Temple when He arrived there and were healed. The august conspirators of the Sanhedrin were sore displeased. But all these demonstrations did not deceive the Divine insight of Christ. He wept over the city that was hailing Him as its King, and said, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes" (Luke). He goes on to prophesy the destruction of the city, just as it afterwards came to pass. After working miracles in the Temple, He returned to Bethany. The 10th of Nisan was the day for the separation of the paschal lamb (Ex. xii. 3). Jesus, the Lamb of God, entered Jerusalem and the Temple on this day; and although none but He knew that He was the Paschal Lamb, the coincidence is not undesigned (Matt. xxi. 1-11, 14-17; Mark xi. 1-11; Luke xix. 29-44; John xii. 12-19).

Monday the 11th of Nisan (April 3rd).—The next day Jesus returned to Jerusalem, again to take advantage of the mood of the people to instruct them. On the way He approached one of the many fig-trees which grew in that quarter (Bethphage = house of figs), and found that it was full of foliage, but without fruit. He said, "No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever!" and the fig-tree withered away. This was no doubt a work of destruction, and as such was unlike the usual tenor of His acts. But it is hard to understand the mind of those who stumble at the destruction of a tree which seems to have ceased to bear by the word of God the Son, yet are not offended at the famine or the pestilence wrought by God the Father. The right of the Son must rest on the same ground as that of the Father. And this was not a wanton destruction; it was a type and a warning. The barren fig-tree had already been made the subject of a parable (Luke xiii. 6), and here it is made a visible type of the destruction of the Jewish people. He had come to them seeking fruit, and now it was time to pronounce their doom as a nation—there should be no fruit on them for ever (Matt. xxi. 18, 19; Mark xi. 12-14). Proceeding now to the Temple, He cleared its court of the crowd of traders that gathered there. He had performed the same act at the beginning of His ministry, and now at the close He repeats it, for the house of prayer was as much a den of thieves as ever. With zeal for God's house His ministry began, with the same it ended (see p. 1676; Matt. xxi. 12, 13; Mark xi. 15-19; Luke xix. 45-48). In the evening He returned again to Bethany.

Tuesday the 12th of Nisan (April 4th).—On this the third day of Passion week Jesus went into Jerusalem as before, and visited the Temple. The Sanhedrin came to Him to call Him to account for the clearing of the Temple. "By what authority doest Thou these things?" The Lord answered their question by another, which, when put to them in their capacity of judges of spiritual things, and of the pretensions of prophets and teachers, was very hard either to answer or to pass in silence—what was their opinion of the baptism of John? If they replied that it was from heaven, their own conduct towards John would accuse them; if of men, then the people would not listen to them even when they denounced Jesus, because none doubted that John was a prophet. They refused to answer, and Jesus refused in like manner to answer them. In the parable of the Two Sons, given by Matthew, the Lord pronounces a strong condemnation on them for saying to God, "I go, Sir," but not going (Matt. xxi. 23-32; Mark xi. 27-33; Luke x. 1-8). In the parable of the wicked husbandmen the history of the Jews is represented, who had stoned and killed the prophets, and were about to crown their wickedness by the death of the Son. In the parable of the wedding garment the destruction of the Jews, and the invitation to the Gentiles to the feast in their stead, are vividly represented (Matt. xxi. 33-46, xxii. 1-14; Mark xii. 1-12; Luke xx. 9-19).

Not content with their plans for His death, the different parties try to entangle Him in argument and to bring Him into contempt. First come the Pharisees and Herodians, as if to ask Him to settle a dispute between them. "Is it lawful to give tribute to Caesar, or not?" The spirit of the answer of Christ lies here: that, since they had accepted Caesar's money, they had confessed his rule, and were bound to render to the civil power what they had confessed to be due to it, as they were to render to God and to His Holy Temple the offerings due to it. Next appeared the Sadducees, who denied a future state, and put before Him a contradiction which seemed to them to arise out of that doctrine. Seven brethren in succession married a wife (Deut. xxv. 5): whose wife should she be in a future state? The answer was easy to find. The law in question referred obviously to the present time: it would pass away in another state, and so would all such earthly relations, and all jealousies or disputes founded on them. Jesus now retorts the argument on the Sadducees. Appealing to the Pentateuch, because His hearers did not acknowledge the authority of the later Books of the Bible, He recites the words, "I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob," as used to Moses, and draws from them the argument that these men must then have been alive. Although the words would not at first sight suggest this inference, they really contain it; for the form of expression implies that He still exists and they still exist (Matt. xxii. 15-33; Mark xii. 13-27; Luke xx. 20-40). Fresh questions awaited Him, but His wisdom never failed to give the appropriate answer. And then He uttered to all the people that terrible denunciation of woe to the Pharisees with which we are familiar (Matt. xxiii. 1-39). If we compare it with our Lord's account of His own position in reference to the Law, in the Sermon on the Mount, we see that the principles there laid down are everywhere violated by the Pharisees. Their almsgiving was ostentation; their distinctions about oaths led to falsehood and profaneness; they were exact about the small observances and neglected the weightier ones of the Law; they adorned the tombs of the Prophets, saying that if they had lived in the time of their fathers they would not have slain them; and yet they were about to fill up the measure of their fathers' wickedness by slaying the greatest of the Prophets, and persecuting and slaying His followers. After an indignant denunciation of the hypocrites who, with a show of religion, had thus contrived to stifle the true spirit of religion and were in reality its chief persecutors, He apostrophizes Jerusalem in words full of compassion, yet carrying with them a sentence of death: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the Prophets and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you, Ye shall not see Me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the Name of the Lord" (Matt. xxiii.).

Another great discourse belongs to this day, which, more than any other, presents Jesus as the great Prophet of His people. On leaving the Temple His disciples drew attention to the beauty of its structure, its "goodly stones and gifts," their remarks probably arising from the threats of destruction which had so lately been uttered by Jesus. Their Master answered that not one stone of the noble pile should be left upon another. When they reached the Mount of Olives, the disciples, or rather the first four (Mark), speaking for the rest, asked Him when this destruction should be accomplished. To understand the answer it must be borne in mind that Jesus warned them that He was not giving them an historical account such as would enable them to anticipate the events. "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the Angels of heaven, but My Father only." Exact data of time are to be purposely withheld from them. Accordingly, two events, analogous in character but widely sundered by time, are so treated in the prophecy that it is almost impossible to disentangle them. The destruction of Jerusalem and the day of judgment—the national and the universal days of account—are spoken of together or alternately without hint of the great interval of time that separates them. Thus it may seem that a most important fact is omitted; but the highest work of prophecy is not to fix times and seasons, but to disclose the Divine significance of events. What was most important to them to know was that the destruction of Jerusalem followed upon the probation and rejection of her people, and that the Crucifixion and that destruction were connected as cause and effect (Matt. xxiv.; Mark xiii.; Luke xxi.). The conclusion which Jesus drew from His own awful warning was, that they were not to attempt to fix the date of His return: "Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh." The lesson of the parable of the Ten Virgins is the same; the Christian soul is to be ever in a state of vigilance and preparation (Matt. xxiv. 44, xxv. 13). And the parable of the Talents, here repeated in a modified form, teaches how precious to souls are the uses of time (xxv. 14-30). In concluding this momentous discourse, our Lord puts aside the destruction of Jerusalem, and displays to our eyes the picture of the final judgment. There will He Himself be present, and will separate all the vast family of mankind into two classes, and shall appraise the works of each class as works done to Himself, present in the world though invisible; and men shall see, some with terror and some with joy, that their life here was spent either for Him or against Him, and that the good which lay before them to do was provided for them by Him, and not by chance, and the reward and punishment shall be apportioned to each (Matt. xxv. 31-46).

With these weighty words ends the third day; and whether we consider the importance of His recorded teaching, or the amount of opposition and of sorrow presented to His mind, it was one of the greatest days of all His earthly ministrations. The general reflections of John (xii. 37-50), which contain a retrospect of His ministry and of the strange reception of Him by His people, may well be read as if they came in here.

Wednesday the 13th of Nisan (April 5th).— This day was passed in retirement with the Apostles. Satan had put it into the mind of one of them to betray Him; and Judas Iscariot made a covenant to betray Him to the chief priests for thirty pieces of silver. The character of Judas, and the degrees by which he reached the abyss of guilt in which he was at last destroyed, deserve much attention. There is no reason to doubt that when he was chosen by Jesus he possessed, like the rest, the capacity of being saved, and was endowed with gifts which might have made him an able minister of the New Testament. But the innate worldliness and covetousness were not purged out from him. His practical talents made him a kind of steward of the slender resources of that society, and no doubt he conceived the wish to use the same gifts on a larger field, which the realization of "the kingdom of Heaven" would open out before him. These practical gifts were his ruin. Between him and the rest there could be no real harmony. His motives were worldly, and theirs were not. They loved the Saviour more as they knew Him better. Judas, living under the constant tacit rebuke of a most holy example, grew to hate the Lord; for nothing, perhaps, more strongly draws out evil instincts than the enforced contact with goodness. And when he knew that his Master did not trust him, was not deceived by him, his hatred grew more intense. But this did not break out into overt act until Jesus began to foretell his own Crucifixion and Death. If these were to happen, all his hopes that he had built on following the Lord would be dashed down. If they should crucify the Master, they would not spare the servants; and, in place of a heavenly kingdom, he would find contempt, persecution, and probably death. It was high time, therefore, to treat with the powers that seemed most likely to prevail in the end; and he opened a negotiation with the high-priests in secret, in order that, if his Master were to fall, he might be the instrument, and so make friends among the triumphant persecutors. And yet, strange contradiction, he did not wholly cease to believe in Jesus: possibly he thought that he would so act that he might be safe either way. If Jesus was the Prophet and Mighty One that he had once thought, then the attempt to take Him might force Him to put forth all His resources and to assume the kingdom to which He laid claim, and then the agent in the treason, even if discovered, might plead that he foresaw the result: if He were unable to save Himself and His disciples, then it were well for Judas to betake himself to those who were stronger. The bribe of money, not very considerable, could not have been the chief motive; but as two vicious appetites could be gratified instead of one, the thirty pieces of silver became a part of the temptation. The treason was successful, and the money paid; but not one moment's pleasure did those silver pieces purchase for their wretched possessor, not for a moment did he reap any fruit from his detestable guilt. After the Crucifixion, the avenging belief that Jesus was what He professed to be rushed back in full force upon his mind. He went to those who had hired him; they derided his remorse. He cast away the accursed silver pieces, defiled with the "innocent blood" of the Son of God, and went and hanged himself (Matt. xxvi. 14-16; Mark xiv. 10-11; Luke xxii. 1-6).

Thursday the 14th of Nisan (April 6th).—On "the first day of unleavened bread," when the Jews were wont to put away all leaven out of their houses (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Mark xiv. 12), the disciples asked their Master where they were to eat the Passover. He directed Peter and John to go into Jerusalem, and to follow a man whom they should see bearing a pitcher of water, and to demand of him, in their Master's name, the use of the guestchamber in his house for this purpose. All happened as Jesus had told them, and in the evening they assembled to celebrate, for the last time, the paschal meal. The sequence of the events is not quite clear from a comparison of the Evangelists; but the difficulty arises with St. Luke, and there is external evidence that he is not following the chronological order (Wieseler, Chron. Syn. p. 399). The order seems to be as follows. When they had taken their places at table and the supper had begun, Jesus gave them the first cup to divide amongst themselves (Luke). It was customary to drink at the paschal supper four cups of wine mixed with water; and this answered to the first of them. There now arose a contention among the disciples which of them should be the greatest; perhaps in connexion with the places they had taken at this feast (Luke). After a solemn warning against pride and ambition, Jesus performed an act which, as one of the last of His life, must ever have been remembered by the witnesses as a great lesson of humility. He rose from the table, poured water into a basin, girded Himself with a towel, and proceeded to wash the disciples' feet (John). It was an office for slaves to perform, and from Him, knowing, as He did, "that the Father had given all things into His Hand, and that He was come from God and went to God," it was an unspeakable condescension. But His love for them was infinite; and if there were any way to teach them the humility which as yet they had not learned, He would not fail to adopt it. Peter, with his usual readiness, was the first to refuse to accept such menial service—"Lord, dost Thou wash my feet?" When he was told that this act was significant of the greater act of humiliation by which Jesus saved His disciples and united them to Himself, his scruples vanished. After all had been washed, the Saviour explained to them the meaning of what He had done. "If I, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you." But this act was only the outward symbol of far greater sacrifices for them than they could as yet understand. It was a small matter to wash their feet; it was a great one to come down from the glories of heaven to save them. Later the Apostle Paul put this same lesson of humility into another form, and rested it upon deeper grounds. "Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus: Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God: but made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men, and being found in fashion as a man He humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. ii. 5-8; Matt. xxvi. 17-20; Mark xiv. 12-17; Luke xxii. 7-30; John xiii. 1-20).

From this act of love it does not seem that even the traitor Judas was excluded. But his treason was thoroughly known; and now Jesus denounces it. One of them should betray Him. They were all sorrowful at this, and each asked "Is it I?" and even Judas asked and received an affirmative answer (Matt.), but probably in an undertone, for when Jesus said, "That thou dost do quickly," none of the rest understood. The traitor having gone straight to his wicked object, the end of the Saviour's ministry seemed already at hand. "Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God is glorified in Him." He gave them the new commandment, to love one another, as though it were a last bequest to them. To love was not a new thing, it was enjoined in the old Law; but to be distinguished for a special Christian love and mutual devotion was what He would have, and this was the new element in the commandment. Founded by a great act of love, the Church was to be marked by love (Matt. xvi. 21-25; Mark xiv. 18-21; Luke xxii. 21-23; John xiii. 21-35).

Towards the close of the meal Jesus instituted the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. He took bread, and gave thanks and brake it, and gave to His disciples, saying, "This is My Body which is given for you; this do in remembrance of Me." He then took the cup, which corresponded to the third cup in the usual course of the paschal supper, and, after giving thanks, He gave it to them, saying, "This is My Blood of the new testament [covenant] which is shed for many." It was a memorial of His Passion and of this last supper that preceded it; and in dwelling on His Passion in this Sacrament, in true faith, all believers draw nearer to the Cross of His sufferings and taste more strongly the sweetness of His love and the efficacy of His atoning Death (Matt. xxvi. 26-29; Mark xiv. 22-25; Luke xxii. 19, 20; 1 Cor. xi. 23-25).

The denial of St. Peter is now foretold, and to no one would such an announcement be more incredible than to St. Peter himself. "Lord, why cannot I follow Thee now? I will lay down my life for Thy sake." The zeal was sincere, and as such did the Lord regard it; but here, as elsewhere, St. Peter did not count the cost. By and by, when the Holy Spirit has come down to give them a strength not their own, St. Peter and the rest of the disciples will be bold to resist persecution, even to the death. It needs strong love and deep insight to view such an act as this denial with sorrow and not with indignation (Matt. xxvi. 31-35; Mark xiv. 27-31; Luke xxii. 31-38; John xiii. 36-38).

That great final discourse, which St. John alone has recorded, is now delivered. Although in the middle of it there is a mention of departure (John xiv. 31), this perhaps only implies that they prepared to go; and then the whole discourse was delivered in the house before they proceeded to Gethsemane. Of the contents of this discourse, which is the voice of the Priest in the holy of holies, something has been said already (p. 1674; John xv.-xvii.).

Friday the 15th of Nisan (April 7), including part of the eve of it.—"When they had sung a hymn," which perhaps means, when they had sung the second part of the Hallel, or song of praise, which consisted of Psalms cxv.-cxviii., the former part (Psalms cxiii.-cxiv.) having been sung at an earlier part of the supper, they went out into the Mount of Olives. They came to a place called Gethsemane (oil-press), and it is probable that the place now pointed out to travellers is the real scene of that which follows, and even that its huge olive-trees are the legitimate successors of those which were there when Jesus visited it. A moment of terrible agony is approaching, of which all the Apostles need not be spectators, for He thinks of them, and wishes to spare them this addition to their sorrows. So He takes only His three proved companions, St. Peter, St. James, and St. John, and passes with them farther into the garden, leaving the rest seated, probably near the entrance. No pen can attempt to describe what passed that night in that secluded spot. He tells them, "My Soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here and watch with Me," and then leaving even the three He goes further, and in solitude wrestles with an inconceivable trial. The words of St. Mark are still more expressive—"He began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy" (ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι καὶ ἀβημονεῖν, xiv. 33). The former word means that He was struck with a great dread; not from the fear of physical suffering, however excruciating, we may well believe, but from the contact with the sins of the world, of which, in some inconceivable way, He here felt the bitterness and the weight. He did not merely contemplate them, but bear and feel them. It is impossible to explain this scene in Gethsemane in any other way. If it were merely the fear of the terrors of death that overcame Him, then the martyr Stephen and many another would surpass Him in constancy. But when He says, "Abba, Father, all things are possible unto Thee; take away this cup from Me: nevertheless not what I will but what Thou wilt" (Mark), the cup was filled with a far bitterer potion than death; it was flavoured with the poison of the sins of all mankind against its God. Whilst the sinless Son is thus carried two ways by the present horror and the strong determination to do the Father's Will, the disciples have sunk to sleep. It was in search of consolation that He came back to them. The disciple who had been so ready to ask, "Why cannot I follow Thee now?" must hear another question, that rebukes his former confidence—"Couldst not thou watch one hour?" A second time He departs and wrestles in prayer with the Father; but although the words He utters are almost the same (Mark says "the same"), He no longer asks that the cup may pass away from Him—"If this cup may not pass away from Me except I drink it, Thy will be done" (Matt.). A second time He returns and finds them sleeping. The same scene is repeated yet a third time; and then all is concluded. Henceforth they may sleep and take their rest; never more shall they be asked to watch one hour with Jesus, for His ministry in the flesh is at an end. "The hour is at hand, and the Son of Man is betrayed into the hands of sinners" (Matt.). The prayer of Jesus in this place has always been regarded, and with reason, as of great weight against the Monothelite heresy. It expresses the natural shrinking of the human will from a horror which the Divine nature has admitted into it, yet without sin. Never does He say, "I will flee;" He says, "If it be possible;" and leaves that to the decision of the Father. That horror and dread arose from the spectacle of human sin; from bearing the weight and guilt of human sin as about to make atonement for it; and from a conflict with the powers of darkness. Thus this scene is in complete contrast to the Transfiguration. The same companions witnessed both; but there was peace, and glory, and honour, for the sinless Son of God; here fear and conflict; there God bore testimony to Him; here Satan for the last time tempted Him. (On the account of the Agony see Krummacher, Der Leidende Christus, p. 206; Matt. xxvi. 36-46; Mark xiv. 32-42; Luke xxii. 39-46; John xviii. 1.)

Judas now appeared to complete his work. In the doubtful light of torches, a kiss from him was the sign to the officers whom they should take. St. Peter, whose name is first given in St. John's Gospel, drew a sword and smote a servant of the high-priest, and cut off his ear; but his Lord refused such succour, and healed the wounded man. He treated the seizure as a step in the fulfilment of the prophecies about Him, and resisted it not. All the disciples forsook Him and fled (Matt. xxvi. 47-56; Mark xiv. 43-52; Luke xxii. 47-53; John xviii. 2-12).

There is some difficulty in arranging the events that immediately follow, so as to embrace all the four accounts.—The data will be found in the Commentary of Olshausen, in Wieseler (Chron. Syn. p. 401 sqq.), and in Greswell's Dissertations (iii. 200 sqq.). On the capture of Jesus He was first taken to the house of Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas (see p. 1665) the high-priest. It has been argued that as Annas is called, conjointly with Caiaphas, the high-priest, he must have held some actual office in connexion with the priesthood, and Lightfoot and others suppose that he was the vicar or deputy of the high-priest, and Selden that he was president of the Council of the Sanhedrin; but this is uncertain.* It might appear from the course of St. John's narrative that the examination of our Lord, and the first denial of St. Peter, took place in the house of Annas (John xviii. 13, 14). But the 24th verse is retrospective—"Now Annas had sent Him bound unto Caiaphas the high-priest" (ἀπέστειλε, aorist for pluperfect: see Winer's Grammar); and probably all that occurred after v. 14 took place not at the house of Annas, but at that of

* Mr. Greswell sees no uncertainty, and asserts as a fact that he was the high-priest, vicar, and vice-president of the Sanhedrin (p. 200).

Caiaphas. It is not likely that St. Peter gained admittance to two houses in which two separate judicial examinations took place with which he had nothing ostensibly to do, and this would be forced on us if we assumed that St. John described what took place before Annas, and the other Evangelists what took place before Caiaphas. The house of the high-priest consisted probably, like other Eastern houses, of an open central court with chambers round it. Into this court a gate admitted them, at which a woman stood to open. St. Peter, who had fled like the rest from the side of Jesus, followed afar off with another disciple, probably St. John, and the latter procured him admittance into the court of the high-priest's house. As he passed in, the lamp of the portress threw its light on his face, and she took note of him; and afterwards, at the fire which had been lighted, she put the question to him, "Art not thou also one of this man's disciples?" (John.) All the zeal and boldness of St. Peter seem to have deserted him. This was indeed a time of great spiritual weakness and depression, and the power of darkness had gained an influence over the Apostle's mind. He had come in secret; he is determined so to remain, and he denies his Master! Feeling now the danger of his situation, he went out into the porch, and there some one, or, looking at all the accounts, probably several persons, asked him the question a second time, and he denied more strongly. About an hour after, when he had returned into the court, the same question was put to him a third time, with the same result. Then the cock crew; and Jesus, Who was within sight, probably in some open room communicating with the court, "turned and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how He had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny Me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly" (Luke). Let no man who cannot fathom the utter perplexity and distress of such a time presume to judge the zealous disciple hardly. He trusted too much to his own strength; he did not enter into the full meaning of the words, "Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation." Self-confidence betrayed him into a great sin; and the most merciful Lord restored him after it. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall" (1 Cor. x. 12; Matt. xxvi. 57, 58, 69-75; Mark xiv. 53, 54, 66-72; Luke xxii. 54-62; John xviii. 13-18, 24-27).

The first interrogatory to which our Lord was subject (John xviii. 19-24) was addressed to Him by Caiaphas (Annas?, Olshausen, Wieseler), probably before the Sanhedrin had time to assemble. It was the questioning of an inquisitive person who had an important criminal in his presence, rather than a formal examination. The Lord's refusal to answer is thus explained and justified. When the more regular proceedings begin, He is ready to answer. A servant of the high-priest, knowing that he should thereby please his master, smote the cheek of the Son of God with the palm of his hand. But this was only the beginning of horrors. At the dawn of day the Sanhedrin, summoned by the high-priest in the course of the night, assembled, and brought their band of false witnesses, whom they must have had ready before. These gave their testimony (see Psalm xxvii. 12), but even before this unjust tribunal it could not stand; it was so full of contradictions. At last two false witnesses came, and their testimony was very like the truth. They deposed that He had said, "I will destroy this temple, that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands" (Mark xiv. 58). The perversion is slight but important; for Jesus did not say that He would destroy (see John ii. 19), which was just the point that would irritate the Jews. Even these two fell into contradictions. The high-priest now with a solemn adjuration asks Him whether He is the Christ the Son of God. He answers that He is, and foretells His return in glory and power at the last day. This is enough for their purpose. They pronounce Him guilty of a crime for which death should be the punishment. It appears that the Council was now suspended or broken up; for Jesus is delivered over to the brutal violence of the people, which could not have occurred whilst the supreme court of the Jews was sitting. The Prophets had foretold this violence (Is. l. 6), and also the meekness with which it would be borne (Is. liii. 7). And yet this "lamb led to the slaughter" knew that it was He that should judge the world, including every one of His persecutors. The Sanhedrin had been within the range of its duties in taking cognizance of all who claimed to be Prophets. If the question put to Jesus had been merely, Art Thou the Messiah? this body should have gone into the question of His right to the title, and decided upon the evidence. But the question was really twofold, "Art Thou the Christ, and in that Name dost Thou also call Thyself the Son of God?" There was no blasphemy in claiming the former name, but there was in assuming the latter. Hence the proceedings were cut short. They had closed their eyes to the evidence, accessible to all, of the miracles of Jesus, that He was indeed the Son of God, and without these they were not likely to believe that He could claim a title belonging to no other among the children of men (John xviii. 19-24; Luke xxii. 63-71; Matt. xxvi. 59-68; Mark xiv. 55-65).

Although they had pronounced Jesus to be guilty of death, the Sanhedrin possessed no power to carry out such a sentence (Josephus, Ant. xx. 6). So as soon as it was day they took Him to Pilate, the Roman procurator. The hall of judgment, or praetorium, was probably a part of the Tower of Antonia near the Temple, where the Roman garrison was. Pilate, hearing that Jesus was an offender under their Law, was about to give them leave to treat him accordingly; and this would have made it quite safe to execute Him. But the council, wishing to shift the responsibility from themselves, from a fear of some reaction amongst the people in favour of the Lord, such as they had seen on the first day of that week, said that it was not lawful for them to put any man to death; and having condemned Jesus for blasphemy, they now strove to have Him condemned by Pilate for a political crime, for calling Himself the King of the Jews. But the Jewish punishment was stoning; whilst crucifixion was a Roman punishment, inflicted occasionally on those who were not Roman citizens; and thus it came about that the Lord's saying as to the mode of His Death was fulfilled (Matt. xx. 19, with John xii. 32, 33). From the first Jesus found favour in the eyes of Pilate; His answer that His kingdom was not of this world, and therefore could not menace the Roman rule, was accepted, and Pilate pronounced that he found no fault in Him. Not so easily were the Jews to be cheated of their prey. They heaped up accusations against Him as a disturber of the public peace (Luke xxiii. 5). Pilate was no match for their vehemence. Finding that Jesus was a Galilean, he sent Him to Herod to be dealt with; but Herod, after cruel mockery and persecution, sent Him back to Pilate. Now commenced the fearful struggle between the Roman procurator, a weak as well as cruel man, and the Jews. Pilate was detested by the Jews as cruel, treacherous, and oppressive. Other records of his life do not represent him merely as the weakling that he appears here. He had violated their national prejudices, and had used the knives of assassins to avert the consequences. But the Jews knew the weak point in his breast-plate. He was the merely worldly and professional statesman, to whom the favour of the Emperor was life itself, and the only evil of life a downfall from that favour. It was their policy therefore to threaten to denounce him to Caesar for lack of zeal in suppressing a rebellion, the leader of which was aiming at a crown. In his way Pilate believed in Christ; this the greatest crime of a stained life was that with which his own will had the least to do. But he did not believe so as to make him risk delation to his Master and all its possible consequences. He yielded to the stronger purpose of the Jews, and suffered Jesus to be put to death. Not many years after, the consequences which he had stained his soul to avert came upon him. He was accused and banished, and like Judas, the other great accomplice in this crime of the Jews, put an end to his own life. [See PILATE.] The well-known incidents of the second interview are soon recalled. After the examination by Herod, and the return of Jesus, Pilate proposed to release Him, as it was usual on the Feast-day to release a prisoner to the Jews out of grace. Pilate knew well that the priests and rulers would object to this; but it was a covert appeal to the people, also present, with whom Jesus had so lately been in favour. The multitude, persuaded by the priests, preferred another prisoner, called Barabbas. In the meantime the wife of Pilate sent a warning to him to have nothing to do with the death of "that just man," as she had been troubled in a dream on account of Him. Obligated, as he thought, to yield to the clamours of the people, he took water and washed his hands before them, and adopting the phrase of his wife, which perhaps represented the opinion of both of them formed before this time, he said, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it." The people imprecated on their own heads and those of their children the blood of Him Whose doom was thus sealed.

Pilate released unto them Barabbas, "that for sedition and murder was cast into prison, whom they had desired" (cp. Acts iii. 14). This was no unimportant element in their crime. The choice was offered them between one who had broken the laws of God and man, and One Who had given His whole life up to the doing good and speaking truth amongst them. They condemned the latter to death, and were eager for the deliverance of the former. "And in fact their demanding the acquittal of a murderer is but the parallel to their requiring the death of an innocent person, as St. Ambrose observes:— for it is but the very law of iniquity, that they which hate innocence should love crime. They rejected therefore the Prince of Heaven, and chose a robber and a murderer, and an insurrectionist, and they received the object of their choice; so was it given them, for insurrections and murders did not fail them till the last, when their city was destroyed in the midst of murders and insurrections, which they now demanded of the Roman governor" (Williams on the Passion, p. 215).

Now came the scourging, and the blows and insults of the soldiers, who, uttering truth when they thought they were only reviling, crowned Him and addressed Him as King of the Jews. According to St. John, Pilate now made one more effort for His release. He thought that the scourging might appease their rage, he saw the frame of Jesus bowed and withered with all that it had gone through; and, hoping that this moving sight might inspire them with the same pity that he felt himself, he brought the Saviour forth again to them, and said, "Behold the Man!" Not even so was their violence assuaged. He had made Himself the Son of God, and must die. Pilate still sought to release Jesus: but the last argument, which had been in the minds of both sides all along, was now openly applied to him: "If thou let this man go, thou art not Caesar's friend." This saying, which had not been uttered till the vehemence of rage overcame their decent respect for Pilate's position, decided the question. He delivered Jesus to be crucified (Matt. xxvii. 15–30; Mark xv. 6–19; Luke xxiii. 17–25; John xviii. 39, 40, xix. 1–16). St. John mentions that this occurred about the sixth hour, whereas the Crucifixion, according to St. Mark, was accomplished at the third hour; but there is every reason to think, with Greswell and Wieseler, that St. John reckons from midnight, and that this took place at six in the morning, whilst in St. Mark the Jewish reckoning from six in the morning is followed, so that the Crucifixion took place at nine o'clock, the intervening time having been spent in preparations.

Difficult, but not insuperable, chronological questions arise in connexion with (a) John xiii. 1, "before the Feast of the Passover;" (b) John xviii. 28, "and they themselves went not into the judgment-hall lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover;" and (c) John xix. 14, "And it was the preparation of the Passover, about the sixth hour," in all of which the account of John seems dissonant with that of the other Evangelists. These passages are discussed in the various commentaries, but nowhere more fully than in a paper by Dr. Robinson (Bibliotheca Sacra, 1845, p. 405), reproduced in his (English) Harmony in an abridged form.

One Person alone has been calm amidst the excitements of that night of horrors. On Him is now laid the weight of His Cross, or at least of the transverse beam of it; and, with this pressing Him down, they proceed out of the city to Golgotha or Calvary, a place the site of which is now uncertain. As He began to droop, His persecutors, unwilling to defile themselves with the accursed burden, lay hold of Simon of Cyrene and compel him to carry the Cross after Jesus. Amongst the great multitude that followed, were several women, who bewailed and lamented Him. He bade them not to weep for Him, but for the widespread destruction of their nation which should be the punishment for His Death (Luke). After offering Him wine and myrrh, they crucified Him between two thieves. Nothing was wanting to His humiliation; a thief had been preferred before Him, and two thieves share His punishment. The soldiers divided His garments and cast lots for them (see Psalm xxii. 18). Pilate set over Him in three languages the inscription "Jesus, the King of the Jews." The chief priests took exception to this that it did not denounce Him as falsely calling Himself by that name, but Pilate refused to alter it. The passers-by and the Roman soldiers would not let even the minutes of deadly agony pass in peace; they reviled and mocked Him. One of the two thieves underwent a change of heart even on the cross: he reviled at first (Matt.); and then, at the sight of the constancy of Jesus, repented (Luke) (Matt. xxvii.; Mark xv.; Luke xxiii.; John xix.).

In the depths of His bodily suffering, Jesus calmly commended to St. John, who stood near, the care of Mary His mother. "Behold thy son! behold thy mother!" From the sixth hour to the ninth there was darkness over the whole land. At the ninth hour (3 P.M.) Jesus uttered with a loud voice the opening words of the xxii. Psalm, all the inspired words of which referred to the suffering Messiah. One of those present dipped a sponge in the common sour wine of the soldiers, and put it on a reed to moisten the Sufferer's lips. Again He cried with a loud voice, "It is finished" (John), "Father, into Thy Hands I commend My Spirit" (Luke); and gave up the ghost. His words upon the Cross had all of them shown how truly He possessed His Soul in patience even to the end of the sacrifice He was making: "Father, forgive them!" was a prayer for His enemies. "This day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise," was a merciful acceptance of the offer of a penitent heart. "Woman, behold thy son," was a sign of loving consideration, even at the last, for those He had always loved. "Why hast Thou forsaken Me?" expressed the fear and the need of God. "I thirst," the only word that related to Himself, was uttered because it was prophesied that they were to give Him vinegar to drink. "It is finished," expresses the completion of that work which, when He was twelve years old, had been present to His Mind, and never absent since; and "Into Thy Hands I commend My Spirit," was the last utterance of His resignation of Himself to what was laid upon Him (Matt. xxvii. 31-56; Mark xv. 20-41; Luke xxiii. 33-49; John xix. 17-30).

On the Death of Jesus the veil which covered the most Holy Place of the Temple, the place of the more especial Presence of Jehovah, was rent in twain, a symbol that we may now have "boldness to enter into the holiest by the Blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, through His flesh" (Heb. x. 19, 20). The priesthood of Christ superseded the priesthood of the Law. There was a great earthquake. Many who were dead rose from their graves, although they returned to the dust again after this great token of Christ's quickening power had been given to many (Matt.); they were "saints" that slept—probably they, having most earnestly longed for the salvation of Christ, were the first to taste the fruits of His conquest of death. The Centurion who kept guard, witnessing what had taken place, came to the same conclusion as Pilate and his wife, "Certainly this was a righteous man;" he went beyond them, "Truly this Man was the Son of God" (Mark). Even the people who had joined in the mocking and reviling were overcome by the wonders of His Death, and "smote their breasts and returned" (Luke xxiii. 48). The Jews, very zealous for the Sabbath in the midst of their murderous work, begged Pilate that he would put an end to the punishment by breaking the legs of the criminals (Lactant. iv. 26), that they might be taken down and buried before the Sabbath, for which they were preparing (Deut. xxi. 23; Joseph. B. J. iv. 5, § 2). They who were to execute this duty found that Jesus was dead and the thieves still living; so they performed this work on the latter only, that a bone of Him might not be broken (Ex. xii. 46; Ps. xxxiv. 20). The Death of the Lord before the others was, no doubt, partly the consequence of the previous mental suffering which He had undergone, and partly because His Will to die lessened the natural resistance of the frame to dissolution. Some seek for a "mysterious cause" of it, something out of the course of nature; but we must beware of such theories as would do away with the reality of the Death, as a punishment inflicted by the hands of men. Joseph of Arimathea, a member of the Council but a secret disciple of Jesus, came to Pilate to beg the Body of Jesus, that he might bury it. Nicodemus assisted in this work of love, and they anointed the Body and laid it in Joseph's new tomb (Matt. xxvii. 50-61; Mark xv. 37-47; Luke xxiii. 46-56; John xix. 30-42).

Saturday the 16th of Nisan (April 8th).—Love having done its part, hatred did its part also. The chief priests and Pharisees, with Pilate's permission, set a watch over the tomb, "lest His disciples come by night and steal Him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead" (Matt. xxvii. 62-66).

Sunday the 17th of Nisan (April 9th).—The Sabbath ended at six on the evening of Nisan 16th. Early the next morning the Resurrection of Jesus took place. Although He had lain in the grave for about thirty-six or forty hours, yet these formed part of three days; and thus, by a mode of speaking not unusual to the Jews (Josephus frequently reckons years in this manner, the two extreme portions of a year reckoning as two years), the time of the dominion of death over Him is spoken of as three days. The order of the events that follow is somewhat difficult to harmonise; for each Evangelist selects the facts which belong to his purpose.⁴ The exact hour of the Resurrection is not mentioned by any of the Evangelists. But from St. Mark xvi. 2 and 9 we infer that it was not long before the coming of the women; and from the time at which the guards went into the city to give the alarm the same inference arises (Matt. xxviii. 11). Of the great mystery itself, the resumption of life by Him who was truly dead, we see but little. "There was a great earthquake, for the Angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door and sat upon it. His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow; and for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men" (Matt.). The women, who had stood by the cross of Jesus, had prepared spices on the evening before, perhaps to complete the embalming of our Lord's Body, already performed in haste by Joseph and Nicodemus. They came very early on the first day of the week to the sepulchre. The names of the women are differently put by the several Evangelists, but with no real discrepancy. St. Matthew mentions the two Marys; St. Mark adds Salome to these two; St. Luke has the two Marys, Joanna, and others with them; and St. John mentions Mary Magdalene only. In thus citing such names as seemed good to him, each Evangelist was no doubt guided by some reason. St. John, from the especial share which Mary Magdalene took in the testimony to the fact of the Resurrection, mentions her only. The women discuss with one another who should roll away the stone, that they might do their pious office on the Body. But when they arrive, they find the stone rolled away, and Jesus no longer in the sepulchre. He had risen from the dead. Mary Magdalene at this point goes back in haste; and at once, believing that the Body has been removed by men, tells St. Peter and St. John that the Lord had been taken away. The other women, however, go into the Sepulchre, and they see an Angel (Matt., Mark), or two Angels (Luke), in bright apparel, who declare to them that the Lord is risen, and will go before the disciples into Galilee. The two Angels, mentioned by St. Luke, are probably two separate appearances to different members of the group; for he alone mentions an indefinite number of women. They now leave the sepulchre, and go in haste to make known the news to the Apostles. As they were going, "Jesus met them, saying, All hail. And they came and held Him by the Feet, and worshipped Him. Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid: go tell My brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see Me." The eleven do not believe the account when they receive it. In the meantime St. Peter and St. John came to the sepulchre. They ran, in their eagerness, and St. John arrived first and looked in; St. Peter afterwards came up, and it is characteristic that the awe which had prevented the other disciple from going in appears to have been unfelt by St. Peter, who entered at once, and found the grave-clothes lying, but not Him Who had worn them. This fact must have suggested that the removal was not the work of human hands. They then returned, wondering at what they had seen. Mary Magdalene, however, remained weeping at the tomb, and she too saw the two Angels in the tomb, though St. Peter and St. John did not. They address her, and she answers, still, however, without any suspicion that the Lord is risen. As she turns away she sees Jesus, but in the tumult of her feeling does not even recognise Him at His first address. But He calls her by name, and then she joyfully recognises her Master. He says, "Touch Me not, for I am not yet ascended to My Father: but go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascend unto My Father and your Father, and to My God and your God." The meaning of the prohibition to touch Him must be sought in the state of mind of Mary, since St. Thomas, for whom it was desirable as an evidence of the identity of Jesus, was permitted to touch Him. Hitherto she had not realized the mystery of the Resurrection. She saw the Lord, and would have touched His hand or His garment in her joy. Our Lord's answer means, "Death has now set a gulf between us. Touch not, as you once might have done, this Body, which is now glorified by its conquest over death, for with this Body I ascend to the Father" (so Euthymius, Theophylact, and others). Space has been wanting to discuss the difficulties of arrangement that attach to this part of the narrative. The remainder of the appearances present less matter for dispute; in enumerating them the important passage in 1 Cor. xv. must be brought in. The third appearance of our Lord was to St. Peter (Luke, Paul); the fourth to the two disciples going to Emmaus in the evening (Mark, Luke); the fifth in the same evening to the eleven as they sat at meat (Mark, Luke, John). All of these occurred on the first day of the week, the very day of the Resurrection. Exactly a week after, He appeared to the Apostles, and gave St. Thomas a convincing proof of His Resurrection (John); this was the sixth appearance. The seventh was in Galilee, where seven of the Apostles were assembled, some of them probably about to return to their old trade of fishing (John). The eighth was to the eleven (Matt.), and probably to five hundred brethren assembled with them (Paul) on a mountain in Galilee. The ninth was to St. James (Paul); and the last to the Apostles at Jerusalem just before the Ascension (Acts).

Whether this be the exact enumeration, whether a single appearance may have been quoted twice, or two distinct ones identified, it is clear that for forty days the Lord appeared to His disciples and to others at intervals. These disciples, according to the common testimony of all the Evangelists, were by no means enthusiastic and prejudiced expectants of the Resurrection. They were sober-minded men. They were only too slow to apprehend the nature of our Lord's Kingdom. Almost to the last they shrank from the notion of His suffering death, and thought that such a calamity would be the absolute termination of all their hopes. But from the time of the Ascension they went about preaching the truth that Jesus was risen from the dead. Kings could not alter their conviction on this point: the fear of death could not hinder them from proclaiming it (see Acts ii. 24, 32, iv. 8, 13, iii., x., xiii.; 1 Cor. xv. 5; 1 Pet. i. 21). Against this event no real objection has ever been brought, except that it is a miracle. So far as historical testimony goes, nothing is better established.

In giving His disciples their final commission, the Lord said, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. xxviii. 18-20). The living energy of Christ is ever present with His Church, even though He has withdrawn from it His bodily Presence. And the facts of the Life that has been before us are the substance of the apostolic teaching now as in all ages. That God and man were reconciled by the mission of the Redeemer into the world, and by His self-devotion to death (2 Cor. v. 18; Eph. i. 10; Col. i. 20); that this sacrifice has procured for man the restoration of the Divine love (Rom. v. 8, viii. 32; 1 John iv. 9); that we by His Incarnation become the children of God, knit to Him in bonds of love, instead of slaves under the bondage of the Law (Rom. viii. 15, 29; Gal. iv. 1); these are the common ideas of the apostolic teaching. Brought into such a relation to Christ and His Life, we see in all its acts and stages something that belongs to and instructs us. His Birth, His Baptism, Temptation, Lowliness of Life and Mind, His Sufferings, Death, Burial, Resurrection, and Ascension, all enter into the apostolic preaching, as furnishing motives, examples, and analogies for our use. Hence every Christian should study well this sinless Life, not in human commentaries only, still less in a bare abstract like the present, but in the living pages of inspiration. Even if he began the study with a lukewarm belief, he might hope, with God's grace, that the conviction would break in upon him that did upon the Centurion at the cross—"Truly this is the Son of God."

CHRONOLOGY.—Year of the birth of Christ.—It is certain that our Lord was born before the death of Herod the Great. Herod died, according to Josephus (Ant. xvii. 8, § 1), "having reigned thirty-four years from the time that he had procured Antigonus to be slain; but thirty-seven from the time that he had been declared king by the Romans" (see also B. J. i. 33, § 8). His appointment as king, according to the same writer (Ant. xiv. 14, § 5), coincides with the 184th Olympiad, and the consulship of C. Domitius Calvinus and C. Asinius Pollio. It appears that he was made king by the joint influence of Antony and Octavius; and the reconciliation of these two men took place on the death of Fulvia in the year 714. Again, the death of Antigonus and the siege of Jerusalem, which form the basis of calculation for the thirty-four years, coincide (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 16, § 4) with the consulship of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and L. Caninius Gallus,—that is, with the year of Rome 717; and occurred in the month Sivan (=June or July). From these facts we are justified in placing the death of Herod in A.U.C. 750. Those who place it one year later overlook the mode in which Josephus reckons Jewish reigns. Wieseler shows by several passages that he reckons the year from the month Nisan to Nisan, and that he counts the fragment of a year at either extreme as one complete year. In this mode, thirty-four years, from June or July 717, would apply to any date between the first of Nisan 750 and the first of Nisan 751. And thirty-seven years from 714 would apply likewise to any date within the same termini. Wieseler finds facts confirmatory of this in the dates of the reigns of Herod Antipas and Archelaus (see his Chronologische Synopse, p. 55). Between these two dates Josephus furnishes means for a more exact determination. Just after Herod's death the Passover occurred (Nisan 15th), and upon Herod's death Archelaus caused a seven-days' mourning to be kept for him (Ant. xvii. 9, § 3; xvii. 8, § 4); so that it would appear that Herod died somewhat more than seven days before the Passover in 750, and therefore in the first few days of the month of Nisan A.U.C. 750. Now, as Jesus was born before the death of Herod, it follows that the Dionysian era, which corresponds to A.U.C. 754, is at least four years too late.

Many have thought that the star seen by the wise men gives grounds for an exact calculation of the time of our Lord's birth. It will be found, however, that this is not the case. For it has first been assumed that the star was not properly a star, but an astronomical conjunction of known stars. Kepler finds a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the sign Pisces in A.U.C. 747, and again in the spring of the next year, with the planet Mars added; and from this he would place the birth of Jesus in 748. Ideler, on the same kind of calculation, places it in A.U.C. 747. But this process only proves a highly improbable date, on highly improbable evidence. The words of St. Matthew are extremely hard to reconcile with the notion of a conjunction of planets; it was a star that appeared, and it gave the Magi ocular proof of its purpose by guiding them to where the young child was. But a new light has been thrown on the subject by the Rev. C. Pritchard, who has made the calculations afresh. Ideler (Handbuch d. Chronologie) asserts that there were three conjunctions of Jupiter and Saturn in B.C. 7, and that in the third they approached so near that, "to a person with weak eyes, the one planet would almost seem to come within the range of the dispersed light of the other, so that both might appear as one star." Dean Alford puts it much more strongly, that on November 12 in that year the planets were so close "that an ordinary eye would regard them as one star of surpassing brightness" (Greek Test. in loc.). Mr. Pritchard finds, and his calculations have been verified and confirmed at Greenwich, that this conjunction occurred not on November 12 but early on December 5; and that even with Ideler's somewhat strange postulate of an observer with weak eyes, the planets could never have appeared as one star, for they never approached each other within double the apparent diameter of the moon (Memoirs R. Astr. Soc. vol. xiv.). [STAR IN THE EAST.] Most of the chronologists find an element of calculation in the order of Herod to destroy all the children "from two years old and under" (ἀπὸ δύοῦν καὶ κατωτέρω, Matt. ii. 16). But the age within which he destroyed would be measured rather by the extent of his fears than by the accuracy of the calculation of the Magi. Greswell has laboured to show that, from the inclusive mode of computing years, mentioned above in this article, the phrase of the Evangelist would apply to all children just turned one year old, which is true; but he assumes that it would not apply to any that were older, say to those aged a year and eleven months. Herod was a cruel man, angry and afraid; and it is vain to assume that he adjusted the limit of his cruelties with the nicest accuracy. As a basis of calculation the visit of the Magi, though very important to us in other respects, must be dismissed (but see Greswell, Dissertations, &c., Diss. xviii.; Wieseler, Chron. Syn. p. 57 sqq., with all the references there).

The census taken by Augustus Caesar, which led to the journey of Mary from Nazareth just before the Birth of the Lord, has also been looked on as an important note of time, in reference to the chronology of the life of Jesus. Several difficulties have to be disposed of in considering it. (i.) It is argued that there is no record in other histories of a census of the whole Roman empire in the time of Augustus. (ii.) Such a census, if held during the reign of Herod the Great, would not have included Judaea, for it was not yet a Roman province. (iii.) The Roman mode of taking such a census was with reference to actual residence, so that it would not have been requisite for Joseph to go to Bethlehem. (iv.) The state of Mary at the time would render such a journey less probable. (v.) St. Luke himself seems to say that this census was not actually taken until ten years later (ii. 2).

To these objections, of which it need not be said Strauss has made the worst, answers may be given in detail, though scarcely in this place with the proper completeness. (i.) "As we know of the legis actiones and their abrogation, which were quite as important in respect to the early period of Roman history, as the census of the empire was in respect to a later period, not from the historical works of Livy, Dionysius, or Polybius, but from a legal work, the Institutes of Gaius; so we should think it strange if the works of Paullus and Ulpian De Censibus had come down to us perfect, and no mention were made in them of the census of Augustus; while it would not surprise us that in the ordinary histories of the time it should be passed over in silence" (Huschke in Wieseler, p. 78). "If Suetonius in his life [of Augustus] does not mention this census, neither does Spartian in his life of Hadrian devote a single syllable to the edictum perpetuum, which, in later times, has chiefly adorned the name of that emperor" (ib.). Thus it seems that the argumentum de taciturnitate is very far from conclusive. The edict possibly affected only the provinces, and in them was not carried out at once; and in that case it would attract less attention at any one particular moment.

In the time of Augustus all the procurators of the empire were brought under his sole control and supervision for the first time

A.U.C. 731 (Dio Cass. liii. 32). This movement towards centralisation renders it not improbable that a general census of the empire should be ordered, although it may not have been carried into effect suddenly, nor intended to be so. But proceedings in the way of an estimate of the empire, if not an actual census, are distinctly recorded to have taken place in the time of Augustus. "Huic addendae sunt mensurae limitum et terminorum ex libris Augusti et Neronis Caesarum: sed et Balbi mensuris, qui temporibus Augusti omnium provinciarum et civitatum formas et mensuras compertas in commentarios retulit et legem agrariam per universitatem provinciarum distinxit et declaravit" (Frontinus, in the Rei Agrar. Auct. of Goes, p. 109, quoted by Wieseler). This is confirmed from other sources (Wieseler, pp. 81, 82). Augustus directed, as we learn, a brevarium totius imperii to be made, in which—according to Tacitus, "Opes publicae contine, bantur, quantum civium sociorumque in armis, quot classes, regna, provinciae, tributa aut vectigalia et necessitates ac largitiones" (Tacit. Annal. i. 11; Sueton. Aug. 28, 101; Dio Cass. liii. 30, lvi. 33, given in Wieseler; see also Ritschl, in Rhein. Mus. für Philol. N. S., i. 481). All this makes a census by order of Augustus in the highest degree probable, apart from St. Luke's testimony. The time of our Lord's Birth was most propitious. Except some troubles in Dacia the Roman world was at peace, and Augustus was in the full enjoyment of his power. But there are persons who, though they would at once believe this fact on the testimony of some inferior historian, added to these confirmatory facts, reject it just because an Evangelist has said it.

Next comes the objection (ii. and iii.), that, as Judaea was not yet a Roman province, such a census would not have included that country, and that it was not taken from the residence of each person, but from the place of his origin. It is very probable that the mode of taking the census would afford a clue to the origin of it. Augustus was willing to include in his census all the tributary kingdoms, for the regna are mentioned in the passage in Tacitus; but this could scarcely be enforced. Perhaps Herod, desiring to gratify the Emperor, and to emulate him in his love for this kind of information, was ready to undertake the census for Judaea; but in order that it might appear to be his rather than the Emperor's, he took it in the Jewish manner rather than in the Roman, in the place whence the family sprang, rather than in that of actual residence. There might be some hardship in this, and we might wonder that a woman about to become a mother should be compelled to leave her home for such a purpose, if we were sure that it was not voluntary. A Jew of the house and lineage of David would not willingly forego that position; and if it were necessary to assert it by going to the city of David, he would probably make some sacrifice to do so. Thus the objection (iv.), on the ground of the state of Mary's health, is entitled to little consideration. It is said indeed that "all went to be taxed, every one into his own city" (Luke ii. 3); but not that the decree prescribed that they should. Nor could there well be any means of enforcing such a regulation. But the principle being adopted, that Jews were to be taxed in the places to which their families belonged, St. Luke tells us by these words that as a matter of fact it was generally followed. (v.) The objection that, according to St. Luke's own admission, the census was not taken now, but when Quirinus was governor of Syria, remains to be disposed of. St. Luke makes two statements, that at the time of our Lord's birth ("in those days") there was a decree for a census, and that this taxing first came about, or took effect (ἡ πρώτη ἐγένετο), when Cyrenius, or Quirinus, was governor of Syria (Luke ii. 1, 2) [see CYRENIUS]. And as the two statements are quite distinct, and the very form of expression calls special attention to some remarkable circumstance about this census, no historical inaccuracy is proved, unless the statements are shown to be contradictory, or one or other of them to be untrue. That Strauss makes such a charge without establishing either of these grounds, is worthy of a writer so dishonest (Leben Jesu, i. ch. iv. 32). Now, without going into all the theories that have been proposed to explain this second verse, there is no doubt that the words of St. Luke can be explained in a natural manner, without violence to the sense or contradiction. Herod undertakes the census according to Jewish forms; but his death the same year puts an end to it, and no more is heard of it: and but for its influence as to the place of our Lord's Birth it would not have been recorded at all. But the Evangelist knows that, as soon as a census (ἀπογραφὴ) is mentioned, persons conversant with Jewish history will think at once of the census taken after the banishment of Archelaus, or about ten years later, which was avowedly a Roman census, and which caused at first some resistance in consequence (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1, § 1). The second verse therefore means—"No census was actually completed then, and I know that the first Roman census was that which followed the banishment of Archelaus; but the decree went out much earlier, in the time of Herod." That this is the only possible explanation of so vexed a passage cannot of course be affirmed.* But it will bear this interpretation, and upon the whole evidence there is no ground whatever for denying either assertion of the Evangelist, or for considering them irreconcilable. Many writers have confounded an obscurity with a proved inaccuracy. The value of this census, as a fact in the chronology of the life of Christ, depends on the connexion which is sought to be established between it and the insurrection which broke out under Matthias and Judas, the son of Sariphaeus, in the last illness of Herod (Joseph. Ant. xv. 6, § 1). If the insurrection arose out of the census, a point of connexion between the sacred history and that of Josephus is made out. Such a connexion, however, has not been clearly made out (see Wieseler, Olshausen, and others, for the grounds on which it is supposed to rest).

* See a summary of the older theories in Kulnoel (in Luc. ii. 2); also in Meyer (in Luc. ii. 2), who gives an account of the view, espoused by many, that Quirinus was now a special commissioner for this census in Syria (ἵψευ. τῆς Συρίας), which the Greek will not bear. But if the theory of the younger Zumpt be correct, then Quirinus was twice governor of Syria, and the Evangelist would here refer to his former rule. The difficulty is that Josephus (Ant. xviii. 1, § 1) mentions that Quirinus was sent, after the banishment of Archelaus, to take a census. Either Zumpt would set this authority aside, or would hold that Quirinus, twice governor, twice made a census; which is scarcely an easier hypothesis than some others.

The age of Jesus at His Baptism (Luke iii. 23) affords an element of calculation. "And Jesus Himself began to be about (ὄνει) thirty years of age." Born in the beginning of A.U.C. 756 (or the end of 749), Jesus would be thirty in the beginning of A.U.C. 780 (A.D. 27). Greswell is probably right in placing the Baptism of our Lord in the beginning of this year, and the first Passover during His ministry would be that of the same year; Wieseler places the Baptism later, in the spring or summer of the same year. (On the sense of ἀρχόμενος, see the commentators.) To this first Passover after the Baptism attaches a note of time which will confirm the calculations already made. "Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this Temple in building (ἡκοδομήθη), and wilt Thou rear it up in three days?" There can be no doubt that this refers to the rebuilding of the Temple by Herod: it cannot mean the second Temple, built after the Captivity, for this was finished in twenty years (B.C. 535 to B.C. 515). Herod, in the eighteenth year of his reign (Joseph. Ant. xv. 11, § 1), began to reconstruct the Temple on a larger and more splendid scale (A.U.C. 734). The work was not finished till long after his death, till A.U.C. 818. It is inferred from Josephus (Ant. xv. 11, §§ 5, 6) that it was begun in the month Cisleu, A.U.C. 734. And if the Passover at which this remark was made was that of A.U.C. 780, then forty-five years and some months have elapsed, which, according to the Jewish mode of reckoning (p. 1663), would be spoken of as "forty and six years."

Thus the death of Herod enables us to fix a boundary on one side to the calculations of our Lord's Birth. The building of the Temple, for forty-six years, confirms this, and also gives a boundary on the other. From the star of the Magi nothing conclusive can be gathered, nor from the census of Augustus. One datum remains: the commencement of the preaching of John the Baptist is connected with the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar (Luke iii. 1). The rule of Tiberius may be calculated either from the beginning of his sole reign, after the death of Augustus, A.U.C. 767, or from his joint government with Augustus, i.e. from the beginning of A.U.C. 765. In the latter case the fifteenth year would correspond with A.U.C. 778, which goes to confirm the rest of the calculations relied on in this article.

An endeavour has been made to deduce the time of the year of the Birth of Jesus from the fact that Zacharias was "a priest of the course of Abia" (Luke i. 5). The twenty-four courses of priests served in the Temple according to a regular weekly cycle, the order of which is known. The date of the conception of John would be about fifteen months before the birth of our Lord; and if the date of the latter be A.U.C. 750, then the former would fall in A.U.C. 748. Can it be ascertained in what part of the year 748 the course of Abia would be on duty in the Temple? The Talmud preserves a tradition that the Temple was destroyed by Titus, A.D. 70, on the ninth day of the month Ab. Josephus mentions the date as the 10th of Ab (Bel. Jud. vi. 4, §§ 5, 8). Without attempting to follow the steps by which these are reconciled, it seems that the "course" of Jehoiarib had just entered upon its weekly duty at the time the Temple was destroyed. Wieseler, assuming that the day in question would be the same as the 5th of August, A.U.C. 823, reckons back the weekly courses to A.U.C. 748, the course of Jehoiarib being the first of all (1 Ch. xxiv. 7). "It follows," he says, "that the ministration of the course of Abia, 74 years 10 months and 2 days, or (reckoning 19 intercalary years) 27,335 days, earlier (= 162 hieratic circles and 119 days earlier), fell between the 3rd and 9th of October, A.U.C. 748. Reckoning from the 10th of October, on which Zacharias might reach his house, and allowing nine months for the pregnancy of Elizabeth, to which six months are to be added (Luke i. 26), we have in the whole one year and three months, which gives the 10th of January as the date of Christ's birth." Greswell, however, from the same starting-point, arrives at the date April 5th; and when two writers so laborious can thus differ in their conclusions, we must rather suspect the soundness of their method than their accuracy in the use of it.

Similar differences will be found amongst eminent writers in every part of the chronology of the Gospels. For example, the Birth of our Lord is placed in B.C. 1 by Pearson and Hug; B.C. 2 by Scaliger; B.C. 3 by Baronius, Calvinus, Süsskind, and Paulus; B.C. 4 by Lamy, Bengel, Äger, Wieseler, and Greswell; B.C. 5 by Ussher and Petavius; B.C. 7 by Ideler and Sanclemente. And whilst the calculations given above seem sufficient to determine us, with Lamy, Ussher, Petavius, Bengel, Wieseler, and Greswell, to the close of B.C. 5, or early part of B.C. 4, let it never be forgotten that there is a distinction between these researches, which the Holy Spirit has left obscure and doubtful, and "the weightier matters" of the Gospel, the things which directly pertain to man's salvation. The silence of the inspired writers, and sometimes the obscurity of their allusions to matters of time and place, have given rise to disputation. But their words admit of no doubt when they tell us that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, and that wicked hands crucified and slew Him, and that we and all men must own Him as the Lord and Redeemer.

SOURCES.—The bibliography of the subject of the Life of Jesus has been most fully set out in Hase, Leben Jesu, Leipsic, 1854, 4th edition. It would be vain to attempt to rival that enormous catalogue. The principal works employed in the present article are the FOUR GOSPELS, and the best-known commentaries on them, including those of Bengel, Wetstein, Lightfoot, De Wette, Lücke, Olshausen, Stier, Alford, Williams, and others; Neander, Loben Jesu (Hamburg, 1837), as against Strauss, Leben Jesu (Tübingen, 1837); and, also consulted, Stackhouse's History of the Bible; Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, vol. v., Christus (Göttingen, 1857); Baumgarten, Geschichte Jesu (Brunswick, 1859); Krummacher, Der Leidende Christus (Bielefeld, 1854). Upon the harmony of the Gospels, see the list of works given under GOSPELS: the principal works used for the present article have been, Wieseler, Chronologische Synopse, &c., Hamburg, 1843;

Greswell's Harmony, Prolegomena, and Dissertations, Oxford, v. y.; two papers by Dr. Robinson in the Bibliotheca Sacra for 1845; and Clausen, Tabulae Synopticae, Havniae, 1829. Special works, such as Dean Trench on the Parables and on the Miracles, have also been consulted; and detached monographs, sermons, and essays in periodicals. For the text of the Gospels, the 7th edition of Tischendorf's Greek Text has been employed. [W. T.]

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—The above article was published in 1863, when the literature was already enormous. It was written, therefore, before the appearance of Renan's Vie de Jésus (1863), of Strauss' new and more popular work, Das Leben Jesu für das deutsche Volk gearbeitet (1864), of Schenkel's Charakterbild Jesu (1864), of Keim's Geschichte Jesu von Nazara (1867-72), of Renan's Les Évangiles (1877), and of the countless writings which these five works have inspired or provoked. The best source of information respecting this overwhelming literature is the summary made by Hase in his Leben Jesu (5th ed. 1865; Eng. tr. by Clarke, Boston, 1881) and in his Geschichte Jesu (1875). The list of authorities in Edersheim's Life and Times of the Messiah (2nd ed. 1886) and in Farrar's Life of Christ (24th ed. 1891), with the literary sketch at the end of the articles on JESUS CHRIST in Herzog's Real-Encycl. (2nd ed. 1880) and in the Encycl. Britan. (9th ed. 1881), will be found useful. Schaff's History of the Church; Apostolic Christianity, i. pp. 90-99 (2nd ed. 1883), contains a discriminating list of leading works: see also Zoecler's Handbuch der theologischen Wissenschaften, i. ii. pp. 184-188 (3rd ed. 1889). Both these notice primitive sources as well as modern literature; and Zoecler adds information about mediæval works (for which see Rippold's Loben Jesu im Mittelalter, Bern, 1884) and about the Reformation period. For literature on the historical, chronological, and geographical questions which beset the subject, Schürer's Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes (1885; Eng. tr., The Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, Edinb. 1885-90) is indispensable: the bibliographical information given throughout the volumes is immense. See also Edersheim, History of the Jewish Nation (1892).

Only a brief outline of the literature which led up to the crisis provoked by Strauss, and which that crisis in turn produced, will be attempted here. It takes us back to the Deistical controversy; for which see A. S. Farrar's Bampton Lectures, 1862, esp. Lect. vi. and vii. with the notes. The sceptical and sometimes scurrilous rationalism of Woolston (1733), Chubb (1747), and Reimarus (1768) was followed by the "natural" explanations of Bahrdt (1782, 1784), Venturini (1800), and Paulus (1828); who were answered by Hess (1774, 8th ed. 1823), Reinhard (1781, 5th ed. 1830; Eng. tr. 1831), Herder (1796), and Ullmann (1828). Ullmann's Die Sündlosigkeit Jesu (7th ed. 1864; Eng. tr. 1870) remains one of the best treatises on the subject. Schleiermacher's Vorlesungen über das Leben Jesu were delivered in and before 1832 at Berlin, where Strauss attended them, and were published from his pupils' notes long after the author's death (1864). He maintained the sinlessness of Jesus, but denied the miraculous birth. The first

Leben Jesu of Strauss (1835) was answered on the Protestant side by W. Hoffmann, Harless, Sack, &c. in 1836; Tholuck, Hamb. 1837; Neander, Hamb. 1837 (7th ed. Gotha, 1873; Eng. tr. 1848); Ebrard, Frankf. 1842 (3rd ed. 1868; abridged Eng. tr. 1869); Lange, Heidelb. 1868 (still of great value; Eng. tr. 1869); &c., &c. Roman Catholic replies by F. Baader, 1836; Kuhn, Tübing. 1838; Hug, Frankf. 1841 (2nd ed. 1854); Sepp, Regensb. 1843 (mixed with legend; 2nd ed. 1865); Bucher, Stuttg. 1859; &c. The title of most of these works is Das Leben Jesu, with or without addition. Among the chief disciples of Strauss are Weisse (1838, 1856), Gfrörer (1838), Salvator (Paris, 1838), Hennell (Researches concerning the Origin of Christianity, Lond. 1838), Lützelberger (1840), Volkmar (1857), Lang (1872). Volkmar in his Jesus Nazareus (1881) has gathered together all the main results of radically destructive criticism. Against Strauss, Renan, Schenkel, and their disciples we have, among Protestants, Ewald, Götting. 1855 (3rd ed. 1867, vol. v. of his Gesch. des Volkes Israel; Eng. tr. vol. vi.); Lichtenstein, Erlang. 1856; Riggenbach, Bas. 1858 (commended); Baumgarten, Braunsch. 1859; Ellicott, Hulsean Lectures, 1859 (useful notes; 6th ed. 1876); Bushnell, The Character of Jesus, New York, 1859; Andrews, New York, 1863 (best American Life; new ed. 1892); Oosterzee, Utrecht, 1863; Beyschlag, Haar, Luthardt, Schulze, with Scherer and Coquerel, all in 1864; Schaff, The Person of Christ, Boston, 1865 (12th ed. 1882: often translated); Presensé, Paris, 1865; Plumtree, Boyle Lectures, 1866; Steinmeyer, Apologetische Beiträge, 1866-73 (of some importance); Schiekkopp, 1867 (against Keim); Delitzsch, Jesus und Hillel, 1867 (3rd ed. 1879), Handwerkerleben zur Zeit Jesu, 1875 (Eng. tr. 1877), Ein Tag in Kapernaum, 1871; &c. Among Roman Catholics, Freppel, Paris, 1863; Passaglia, Micheli, Deutinger, and Haneberg, all in 1864; Dupanloup, Paris, 1870; Bougaud, Le Christianisme et les temps présents, Paris, 1871 (3rd ed. 1877); Schegg, 1874; Grimm, 1876; &c. Strauss himself was one of the keenest critics of Schenkel (as previously of Paulus) in Die Halben und die Ganzen, Berl. 1865. Uhlhorn gives a popular and clear account of the main features of Strauss, Renan, Schenkel, Keim, Delff, and others in Das Leben Jesu in seinen neueren Darstellungen, Stuttg. 1892. Lichtenberger supplies much information about many of the writers mentioned above in his Histoire des idées religieuses en Allemagne, Paris, 1873, 2nd ed. 1888; Eng. tr. History of German Theology, Edinb. 1889: see also Hagenbach's Kirchengesch. des 18ten und 19ten Jahrh. 1856; Eng. tr. New York, 1869. In England Ecce Homo, Lond. 1864 [attributed to J. R. Seeley], produced a considerable literature of its own.

Since 1880 works on Jesus Christ have had less reference to Strauss, Renan, and the Tübingen School. Most of the following are positive and in the main orthodox; and where no title is given it may be assumed that the book is a Life of Jesus. Quite the most important is that of B. Weiss, Berl. 1882 (3rd ed. 1888; Eng. tr. Edinb. 1883; critical and boldly constructive); Steinmeyer, Beiträge zur Christologie, 1882; Eidersheim, Lond. 1883 (2nd ed. 1886; strong, but not infallible, in Jewish lore; abridged by Sanday, 1890); Seidel, Leipz. 1882 (popular, but solid); Canus, Paris, 1883 (2nd ed. 1887; Rom. Cath.); Zündel, Jesus in Bildern aus seinem Leben, Zür. 1885; Usteri, Die Selbstbezeichnung Jesu als des Menschen Sohn, Zür. 1886 (the title expresses His mission, not His nature); Gess, Christi Person und Werk, Bas. 1887 (important; strongly emphasises the Kenosis); Friedlieb, Müntst. 1887 (Rom. Cath.); Schanz, Apologie d. Christenthums, Freib. 1888 (Rom. Cath.); Beyschlag, 2nd ed. 1888; Baldensperger, Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, Strassb. 1888 (full as to the Messianic expectations of the time); Dalman, Der leidende und der sterbende Messias der Synagoge, Berl. 1888; Latham, Pastor Pastorum or the Schooling of the Apostles by our Lord, Camb. 1890 (excellent); Noesgen, Gesch. d. neutestamentlichen Offenbarung, Münch. 1891 (conservative); Didon, Paris, 1891 (important; eloquent, stately, and firmly doctrinal, but not very critical); Fouard, Paris, 7th ed. 1891 (more critical than Didon, but inferior); Laible, Jesus Christus im Talmud, Berl. 1891 (useful collection of notices of Jesus in the Talmud). For articles in magazines and reviews, see Poole's Index to Periodical Literature, Lond. 1883 and 1888: for literature in which the Fourth Gospel is specially concerned, see Watkins, Bampton Lectures, Lond. 1890, esp. v. and vi., and Sanday's papers in the Expositor, 1892. JETHER (יֶתֶר). 1. (יֶתֶר; Jethro.) Jethra, the father-in-law of Moses, is so called in Ex. iv. 18 and the margin of A. V., though in the Heb. Sam. text and Sam. Version the reading is יִתְרִי, as in the Syriac and Targ. Jon., one of Kennicott's MSS., and a MS. of Targ. Onk., No. 16 in De Rossi's collection.

2. (יֶתֶר; Jether.) The firstborn of Gideon's seventy sons, who were all, with the exception of Jotham, the youngest, slain at Ophrah by Abimelech. At the time of his father's victorious pursuit of the Midianites and capture of their kings he was still a lad on his first battle-field, and feared to draw his sword at Gideon's bidding, and avenge, as the representative of the family, the slaughter of his kinsmen at Tabor (Judg. viii. 20).

3. (BA. יֶתֶר in 1 K. ii. 5, 32; B. יֶתֶר, A. יֶתֶר, in 1 Ch. ii. 17; Jether.) The father of Amasa, captain-general of Absalom's army. Jether is merely another form of Ithra (2 Sam. xvii. 25), the latter being probably a corruption. He is described in 1 Ch. ii. 17 as an Ishmaelite, which again is more likely to be correct than the "Israelite" of the Heb. in 2 Sam. xvii. (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the B.C. of Samuel, in loco). Josephus calls him יֶתֶרֶן (Ant. vii. 10, § 1). He married Abigail, David's sister, probably during the sojourn of the family of Jesse in the land of Moab, under the protection of its king.

4. The son of Jada, a descendant of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. ii. 32). He died without children, and being the eldest son the succession fell to his brother's family.

5. The son of Ezra, whose name occurs in a dislocated passage in the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 17). In the LXX. the name is repeated: "and Jether begat Meon," &c. By the author of the Quaest. Hebr. in Par. he is said to have been Aaron, Ezra being another name for Amram.

G. (B. Ἰεθέρ, A. Ἰεθέρ.) The chief of a family of warriors of the line of Asher, and father of Jephunneh (1 Ch. vii. 38). He is probably the same as Ithran in the preceding verse (B. Θερά). One of Kennicott's MSS. and the LXX. A. had Jether in both cases. [W. A. W.]

JETHETH (יֶתֶת): in Gen. A. Ἰεβέρ, D^m. Ἰεθέρ; in Ch. B. Ἰεθέρ, A. Ἰεθῶ: Jetheth, one of the phylarchs (A. V. "dukes") who came of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 40; 1 Ch. i. 51), enumerated separately from the genealogy of Esau's children in the earlier part of the chapter, "according to their families, after their places, by their names," and "according to their habitations in the land of their possession" (vv. 40-3). This record of the Edomite phylarchs may point specially to the places and habitations, or towns, named after or occupied by them; and even otherwise, we may look for some trace of their names, after the custom of the wandering tribes to leave such footprints in the changeless desert. Identifications of several in the list have been proposed: Jetheth, as far as the writer knows, has not been yet recovered. He may perhaps be found if with Gesenius (Thesaur. s. v.) we adopt the likely suggestion of Simonis, יֶתֶת = יֶתֶת, "a peg," "a tent-pin" (and metaphorically "a prince" or "chief," like the masculine form יֶתֶת).

Zech. x. 4; cp. Is. xxii. 23) = Arab. وتد watid, "a peg," which is said to be used in the like metaphorical sense. Al-Watidah, الوتدة

(n. of unity of the former), is a place in Nag'd, said to be in the Dahná (see ISHBAK); there is also a place called Al-Watid; and Al-Watidat (perhaps pl. of the first-named), which is the name of mountains belonging to Banū 'Abd-Allah Ibn Ghatafan (Marásiid, s. vv.). The objection is (1) that Jetheth is a doubtful word in the Hebrew text itself, as is clear from the LXX. Jeber, with which might be compared

[E. S. P.] [C. J. B.]

JETH-LAH (יֶתֶלַח), i.e. Jithlah; Σιλαθά, B. Σιλαθά, A. Ἰεθλά; Jethela, one of the cities of the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 42), named with Ajalon, Elon, and Thimnathah. In the Onomasticon it is mentioned, without any description or indication of position, as Ἰεθλάν (*OS*² p. 289, 78). The site is not certainly known, but Conder has suggested Beit Túl, 3 miles S.E. of Yálo, Ajalon (PEF. Mem. iii. 43). [G.] [W.]

JETHRO (יֶתְרוֹ), i.e. Jithro; Ἰοθρό, called also Jether and Hobab, the son of REUEL, was priest or prince of Midian, both offices probably being combined in one person. Moses spent the forty years of his exile from Egypt, or part of them, with him, and married his daughter

Zipporah. By the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed deputies to judge the congregation and share the burden of government with himself (Ex. xviii.). On account of his local knowledge he was entreated to remain with the Israelites throughout their journey to Canaan; his room however was supplied by the Ark of the covenant, which supernaturally indicated the places for encamping (Num. x. 31, 33). The idea conveyed by the name of Jethro or Jether is probably that of excellence; and as Hobab may be connected with loving or beloved, it is quite possible that both appellations were given to the same person for similar reasons. That the custom of having more than one name was common among the Jews we see in the case of Benjamin, Benoni; Solomon, Jedidiah, &c. &c.

It is said in Ex. ii. 18 that the priest of Midian whose daughter Moses married was Reuel; afterwards, at ch. iii. 1, he is called Jethro, as also in ch. xviii.; but in Num. x. 29 "Hobab the son of Raguel the Midianite" is called Moses' father-in-law: assuming the identity of Hobab and Jethro, we must suppose that "Reuel, their father," in Ex. ii. 18, was really their grandfather, and that the person who said, "How is it that ye are come so soon to-day?" was the priest of v. 16: whereas, proceeding on the hypothesis that Jethro and Hobab are not the same individual, it seems difficult to determine the relationship of Reuel, Jethro, Hobab, and Moses. The hospitality, freehearted and unsought, which Jethro at once extended to the unknown homeless wanderer, on the relation of his daughters that he had watered their flock, is a picture of Eastern manners no less true than lovely. We may perhaps suppose that Jethro, before his acquaintance with Moses, was not a worshipper of the true God. Traces of this appear in the delay which Moses had suffered to take place with respect to the circumcision of his son (Ex. iv. 24-26): indeed it is even possible that Zipporah had afterwards been subjected to a kind of divorce (Ex. xviii. 2, יִתְּרָהּ), on account of her attachment to an alien creed, but that growing convictions were at work in the mind of Jethro, from the circumstance of Israel's continued prosperity, till at last, acting upon these, he brought back his daughter, and declared that his impressions were confirmed, for "now he knew that the Lord was greater than all gods, for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly He was above them:" consequently we are told that "Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, took a burnt-offering and sacrifices for God: and Aaron came, and all the elders of Israel, to eat bread with Moses' father-in-law before God;" as though to celebrate the event of his conversion. Whether or not the account given at Num. x. 29-32 refers to this same event, the narrative at Ex. xviii. 27 coincides with Hobab's own words at Num. x. 30; and, comparing the two, we may suppose that Moses did not prevail upon his father-in-law to stay with the congregation. Calvin (in 5 lib. Moisis Comment.) understands v. 31, 32 thus: "Thou hast gone with us hitherto, and hast been to us instead of eyes; and now what profit is it to thee if, having suffered so many troubles and difficulties, thou dost not go on with us to inherit the promised bleasing?" And Matthew Henry imagines that Hobab complied with this invitation, and that traces of the settlement of his posterity in the land of Canaan are apparent at Judg. i. 16 and 1 Sam. xv. 6. Some, and among them Calvin, take Jethro and Reuel to be identical, and call Hobab the brother-in-law of Moses. The present punctuation of the English Bible does not warrant this. Why, at Judg. i. 16, Moses' father-in-law is called 'יְתֹרָא (Kenite, cp. Gen. xv. 19), or why, at Num. xii. 1, Zipporah, if it be Zipporah, as indeed does not seem probable, is called 'צִפּוֹרָה, A. V. Ethiopian, is not clear. Those who see in the apparent discrepancies of the existing kind evidence of separate and independent narratives must account for their place and connexion as well as for the fact of their combination in it.

The Mohammedan name of Jethro is Shoab (Koran 7 and 11). There is a tale in the Midrash that Jethro was a counsellor of Pharaoh, who tried to dissuade him from slaughtering the Israelitish children, and consequently, on account of his clemency, was forced to flee into Midian, but was rewarded by becoming the father-in-law of Moses (see Weil's Biblical Legends, p. 93, note). [JETHER; HOBAB.] [S. L.]

JETUR (יְתֹרָא): in Gen. B. 'יֵטוֹרָא, DE. 'יֵטוֹרָא; in 1 Ch. i., BA. 'יֵטוֹרָא; in v., B. Toupaioi, A. 'Itroupaioi: Jethur, Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Ch. i. 31, v. 19. [ITURAEA.]

JEU-UE. I. (יְהוּדָא); B. 'עִקְיָא, A. 'יעָא; Jewel. A chief man of Judah, one of the Bene-Zerah; apparently at the time of the first settlement in Jerusalem (1 Ch. ix. 6; cp. 2). [JIEEL.]

2. (B. Γεουήα, A. 'Ιεουήα; Gebel.) One of the Bene-Adonikam who returned to Jerusalem with Esdras (1 Esd. viii. 39). [JIEEL.]

JEU'SH (יְהוּשָׁ; Jehus, Jaus).

1. Son of Esau, by Aholibamah, the daughter of Anah, the son of Zibeon the Hivite (Gen. xxxvi. 5 [A. 'Ιεούς, E. 'Ιεσβούς], 14 [A. 'Ιεός, DE. 'Ιεούς], 18 [A. 'Ιεούα, D. 'Ιεουήα, E. 'Ιεούς]; 1 Ch. i. 35 [BA. 'Ιεούα]). It appears from Gen. xxxvi. 20-25, that Anah is a man's name (not a woman's, as might be thought from v. 2), and, by comparison with v. 2, that the Horites were Hivites. Jehus was one of the Edomitish dukes (v. 18). The Kethib has repeatedly יְהוּשָׁ, Jeish.

2. (B. 'Ιαούς, A. 'Ιεός.) Head of a Benjamite house, which existed in David's time, son of Bilhan, son of Jediel (1 Ch. vii. 10, 11).

3. (BA. 'Ιώας.) A Levite, of the house of Shimei, of the family of the Gershonites. He and his brother Beriah were reckoned as one house in the census of the Levites taken in the reign of David (1 Ch. xxiii. 10, 11).

4. (B. 'Ιαούθ, A. om.) Son of Rehoboam king of Judah, by Abihail, the daughter of Eliab, the son of Jesse (2 Ch. xi. 18, 19). [A. C. H.]

JEU'Z (יְהוּזָ; B. 'Ιδώς, A. 'Ιεούς; Jehus), head of a Benjamite house, in an obscure genealogy (1 Ch. viii. 10), apparently son of Shaharaim and Hodesh his third wife, and born in Moab. [A. C. H.]

JEW (יְהוּדָא; 'Ιουδαίος; Judaeus, i.e. Judaeus; 'Ιουδαίος, Esth. viii. 17; 'Ιουδαϊσμός, 2 Macc. ii. 21). This name was properly applied to a member of the kingdom of Judah after the separation of the ten tribes. In this sense it occurs twice in the Second Book of Kings (2 K. xvi. 6, xxv. 25), and seven times in the later chapters of Jeremiah (xxxii. 12, xxxiv. 9 [in connexion with Hebrew], xxxviii. 19, xl. 12, xli. 3, xlii. 1, lii. 28). After the Return the word received a larger application. Partly from the predominance of the members of the old kingdom of Judah among those who returned to Palestine, partly from the identification of Judah with the religious ideas and hopes of the people, all the members of the new state were called Jew- (Judaeans), and the name was extended to the remnants of the race scattered throughout the nations (Dan. iii. 8, 12; Ezra iv. 12, 23; Neh. i. 2, ii. 16, v. 1, &c.; Esth. iii. 4 sq., &c. Cp. Jos. Ant. xi. 5, § 7, ἐκλήθησαν δὲ τὸ ὄνομα [Ἰουδαίαι] ἐξ ἧς ἡμέρας ἀνεβήσαν ἐκ Βαβυλώνας ἐπὶ τῆς Ἰούδα φαλῆς . . .).

Under the name of "Judaeans," the people of Israel were known to classical writers. The most famous and interesting notice by a heathen writer is that of Tacitus (Hist. v. 2 sq.; cp. Orelli's Excursus). The trait of extreme exclusiveness with which he specially charged them is noticed by many other writers (Juv. Sat. xiv. 103; Diod. Sic. Ecl. 34, 1; Quint. Inst. iii. 7, 21). The account of Strabo (xvi. pp. 760 sq.) is more favourable (cp. Just. xxxvi. 2), but it was impossible that a stranger could clearly understand the meaning of Judaism as a disciple and preparation for a universal religion (F. C. Meier, Judaica seu veterum scriptorum profanorum de rebus Judaicis fragmenta, Jenae, 1832).

The force of the title 'Ιουδαίος is seen particularly in the Gospel of St. John. While the other Evangelists scarcely ever use the word except in the title "King of the Jews" (as given by Gentiles),* St. John, standing within the boundary of the Christian age, very rarely uses any other term to describe the opponents of our Lord. The name, indeed, appeared at the close of the Apostle's life to be the true antithesis to Christianity, as describing the limited and definite form of a national religion; but at an earlier stage of the progress of the faith, it was contrasted with Greek ('Ελληνη) as implying an outward covenant with God (Rom. i. 16, ii. 9, 10; Col. iii. 11, &c.). In this sense it was of wider application than Hebrew, which was the correlative of Hellenist [HELLENIST], and marked a division of language subsisting within the entire body, and at the same time less expressive than Israelite, which brought out with especial clearness the privileges and hopes of the children of Jacob (2 Cor. xi. 22; John i. 47; 1 Macc. i. 43, 53, and often).

The history of Judaism is divided by Jost—the most profound writer who has investigated it—into two great eras: the first extending to the close of the collections of the oral laws, 536

* The exceptions are, Matt. xxviii. 15 (a note of the Evangelist of later date than the substance of the Gospel); Mark vii. 3 (a similar note); Luke vii. 3 xxiii. 51.

B.C.—600 A.D.; and the second reaching to the present time. According to this view, the first is the period of original development, the second of formal construction; the one furnishes the constituent elements, the second the varied shape of the present faith. But as far as Judaism was a great stage in the Divine revelation, its main interest closes with the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. From that date its present living force was stayed, and its history is a record of the human shapes in which the Divine truths of earlier times were enshrined and hidden. The old age (αιών) passed away, and the new age began when the Holy City was finally wrested from its citizens and the worship of the Temple closed.

Yet this shorter period from the Return to the destruction of Jerusalem was pregnant with great changes. Four different dynasties in succession directed the energies and influenced the character of the Jewish nation. The dominion of Persia (536–333 B.C.), of Greece (333–167 B.C.), of the Asmonaeans (167–63 B.C.), of the Herods (40 B.C.–70 A.D.) sensibly furthered in various ways the discipline of the people of God, and prepared the way for a final revelation. An outline of the characteristic features of the several periods is given in other articles. Briefly it may be said that the supremacy of Persia was marked by the growth of organisation, order, ritual [CYRUS; DISPERSION OF THE JEWS], that of Greece by the spread of liberty and speculation [ALEXANDER; ALEXANDRIA; HELLENISTS], that of the Asmonaeans by the strengthening of independence and faith [MACCABEES], that of the Herods by the final separation of the elements of temporal and spiritual dominion into antagonistic systems [HEROD]; and so at length the inheritance of six centuries, painfully won in times of exhaustion and persecution and oppression, was transferred to the treasury of the Christian Church. [B. F. W.]

JEW (יהוּדָי), JEWS (יהוּדִים, Ch. יהוּדָיִם; in Ezra and Dan.). Originally “man or men of Judah.” The term first makes its appearance just before the Captivity of the ten tribes, and then is used to denote the men of Judah who held Elath, and were driven out by Rezin king of Syria (2 K. xvi. 6). Elath had been taken by Azariah or Uziah, and made a colony of Judah (2 K. xiv. 22). The men of Judah in prison with Jeremiah (Jer. xxxii. 12) are called “Jews” in our A. V., as are those who deserted to the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxviii. 19), and the fragments of the tribe which were dispersed in Moab, Edom, and among the Ammonites (Jer. xl. 11). Of these latter were the confederates of Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, who were of the blood-royal of Judah (Jer. xli. 3). The fugitives in Egypt (Jer. xlv. 1) belonged to the two tribes, and were distinguished by the name of the more important; and the same general term is applied to those who were carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. lii. 28, 30) as well as to the remnant which was left in the land (2 K. xxv. 25; Neh. i. 2, ii. 16, &c.). That the term Yehudi or “Jew” was in the latter history used of the members of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin without distinction is evident from the case of Mordecai, who, though of the tribe of Benjamin, is called a Jew (Esth. ii. 5, &c.), while the people of the Captivity are called “the people of Mordecai” (Esth. iii. 6). After the Captivity the appellation was universally given to those who returned from Babylon. [W. A. W.]

JEWEL. [PRECIOUS STONES.]

JEWESS (Ἰουδαία; Judaea), a woman of Hebrew birth, without distinction of tribe (Acts xvi. 1, xxiv. 24). It is applied in the former passage to Eunice the mother of Timothy, who was unquestionably of Hebrew origin (cp. 2 Tim. iii. 15), and in the latter to Drusilla, the wife of Felix and daughter of Herod Agrippa I.

JEWISH (Ἰουδαϊκός; Judaicus), of or belonging to Jews: an epithet applied to the Rabbinical legends against which the elder Apostle warns his younger brother (Tit. i. 14).

JEWRY (יהוּדִיָּה; Ἰουδαία; Judaea), the same word elsewhere rendered Judah and Judaea. It occurs but once in the O. T., Dan. v. 13, in which verse the Chaldee is translated both by Judah and Jewry: the A. V. retaining the latter as it stands in Coverdale, Tyndale, and the Geneva Bible. The variation possibly arose from a too faithful imitation of the Vulg., which has Juda and Judaea. Jewry comes to us through the Norman-French, and is of frequent occurrence in Old English. It is found besides in 1 Esd. i. 32, ii. 4, iv. 49, v. 7, 8, 57, vi. 1, viii. 81, ix. 3; Bel. 33; 2 Macc. x. 24; Luke xxiii. 5; John vii. 1. In the N. T. the earlier English Versions have generally Jewry (Jurie) for Judaea.

JEWS' LANGUAGE, IN THE (יהוּדִית). Literally “Jewishly:” for the Hebrew must be taken adverbially, as in the LXX. (Ἰουδαϊστῆ) and Vulgate (Judaice). The term is only used of the language of the two southern tribes after the Captivity of the northern kingdom (2 K. xviii. 26, 28; 2 Ch. xxxii. 18; Is. xxxvi. 11, 13), and of that spoken by the captives who returned (Neh. xiii. 24). It therefore denotes as well the pure Hebrew as the dialect acquired during the Captivity, which was characterised by Aramaic forms and idioms. Elsewhere (Is. xix. 18) in the poetical language of Isaiah it is called “the lip of Canaan.”

JEWS' RELIGION (2 Macc. viii. 1, xiv. 38; Gal. i. 14, 15).

JEZANIAH (יהוֹנָיָה = יהוֹנָיָה = Jehovah hears: Bk. Ἰεζωνίας, A. Ἰεζωνίας in Jer. xl. 8; יהוֹנָיָה; Ἀζαπίας in Jer. xlii. 1: Jezonias), the son of Hoshaiiah, the Maachathite, and one of the captains of the forces, who had escaped from Jerusalem during the final attack of the beleaguering army of the Chaldeans. In the consequent pursuit, which resulted in the capture of Zedekiah, the army was scattered from him and dispersed throughout the open country among the neighbouring Ammonites and Moabites, watching from thence the progress of events. When the Babylonians had departed, Jezaniah, with the men under his command, was one of the first who returned to Gedaliah at Mizpah. In the events which followed the assassination of that officer Jezaniah took a prominent part. He joined Jehohan in the pursuit of Ishmael and his murderous associates, and in the general consternation and distrust which ensued he became one of the foremost advocates of the migration into Egypt, so strongly opposed by Jeremiah. Indeed in their interview with the prophet at the Khan of Chimham, when words ran high, Jezaiah (there called Azariah) was apparently the leader in the dispute, and for once took precedence of Johanan (Jer. xliii. 2). In 2 K. xxv. 23 he is called Jaazaniah, in which form the name was easily corrupted into Azariah.

JEZEBEL זֵבֶל; LXX. and N. T. 'Ιε(α-β)βα; Joseph. 'Ιε(αβ)βαλη; Jezebel: probably a name, like Agnes, signifying "chaste," sine coitu, Gesenius in voc. [see Müller's conjecture in M.V.¹¹], wife of Ahab, king of Israel, and mother of Athaliah, queen of Judah, and Ahaziah and Joram, kings of Israel.* She was a Phœnician princess, daughter of "Ethbaal king of the Zidonians" (or Ithobal king of the Syrians and Sidonians, Menander apud Joseph. Ant. viii. 13, § 2; c. Apion. i. 18). Her marriage with Ahab was a turning point in the history of Israel. Not only was the union with a Canaanitish wife unprecedented in the northern kingdom, but the character of the queen gave additional force and significance to what might else have been regarded merely as a commercial and political measure, natural to a king devoted, as was Ahab, to the arts of peace and the splendour of regal luxury. She was a woman in whom, with the reckless and licentious habits of an Oriental queen, were united the sternest and fiercest qualities inherent in the Phœnician people. The royal family of Tyre was remarkable at that time both for its religious fanaticism and its savage temper. Her father Ethbaal united with his royal office the priesthood of the goddess Astarte, and had come to the throne by the murder of his predecessor Phelles (Joseph. c. Ap. i. 18). The next generation included within itself Sichaëus, or Matgenes, king and priest of Baal, the murderer Pygmalion, and Elisa or Dido, foundress of Carthage (ib.). Of this stock came Jezebel. In her hands her husband became a mere puppet (1 K. xxi. 25). Even after his death, through the reigns of his sons, her influence was the evil genius of the dynasty. Through the marriage of her daughter Athaliah with the king of Judah, it extended even to the rival kingdom. The wild license of her life, the magical fascination of her arts or of her character, became a proverb in the nation (2 K. ix. 22). Long afterwards her name lived as the byword for all that was execrable, and in the Apocalypse it is given to a church or an individual^b in Asia Minor,

* Amongst the Spanish Jews the name of Jezebel was given to Isabella "the Catholic," in consequence of the detestation in which her memory was held as their persecutor (Ford's Handbook of Spain, 2nd ed. p. 486). Whether the name Isabella was originally connected with that of Jezebel is doubtful.

^b According to the reading of AB. and the older Versions, it is τῆν γυναῖκα σου, "thy wife." In that case she must be the wife of the "Angel;" and the expression would thus confirm the interpretation which makes "the Angel" to be the Bishop or presiding officer of the Church of Thyatira; and this woman would thus combining in like manner fanaticism and profligacy (Rev. ii. 20). If we may trust the numbers of the text, she must have married Ahab before his accession. He reigned 22 years: and 12 years from that time her grandson Ahaziah was 21 years of age. Her daughter Athaliah must have been born therefore at least 37 years before.

The first effect of her influence was the immediate establishment of the Phœnician worship on a grand scale in the court of Ahab. At her table were supported no less than 450 prophets of Baal, and 400 of Astarte (1 K. xvi. 31, 32; xviii. 19). The prophets of Jehovah, who up to this time had found their chief refuge in the northern kingdom, were attacked by her orders and put to the sword (1 K. xviii. 13; 2 K. ix. 7). When at last the people, at the instigation of Elijah, rose against her ministers, and slaughtered them at the foot of Carmel, and when Ahab was terrified into submission, she alone retained her presence of mind; and when she received in the palace of Jezreel the tidings that her religion was all but destroyed (1 K. xix. 1), her only answer was one of those fearful vows which have made the leaders of Semitic nations so terrible whether for good or evil—expressed in a message to the very man who, as it might have seemed but an hour before, had her life in his power:—"As surely as thou art Elijah and as I am Jezebel (LXX.), so may God do to me and more also, if by this time tomorrow I make not thy life as the life of one of them" (1 K. xix. 2). Elijah, who had encountered undaunted the king and the whole force of the prophets of Baal, "feared" (LXX.) the wrath of the awful queen, and fled for his life beyond the furthest limits of Israel (1 K. xix. 3). [ELIJAH.]

The next instance of her power is still more characteristic and complete. When she found her husband cast down by his disappointment at being thwarted by Naboth, she took the matter into her own hands, with a spirit which reminds us of Clytemnestra or Lady Macbeth. "Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel? (play the king, ποιεῖς βασιλεία. LXX.). Arise and eat bread and let thine heart be merry, and I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite" (1 K. xxi. 7). She wrote a warrant in Ahab's name, and sealed it with his seal. It was couched in the official language of the Israelite law—a solemn fast—witnesses—a charge of blasphemy—the authorized punishment of stoning. To her, and not to Ahab, was sent the announcement that the royal wishes were accomplished (1 K. xxi. 14), and she bade her husband go and take the vacant property; and on her accordingly fell the prophet's curse, as well as on her husband (1 K. xxi. 23).

We hear no more of her for a long period. But she survived Ahab by 14 years, and still, as queen-mother (after the Oriental custom), was a great personage in the court of her sons, and, as such, became the special mark for vengeance when Jehu advanced against Jezreel to overthrow the dynasty of Ahab. "What peace so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?" (2 K. ix. 22). But in that supreme hour of her house the spirit of the aged queen rose within her, equal to the dreadful emergency. She was in the palace, which stood by the gate of the city, overlooking the approach from the east. Beneath lay the open space under the city walls. She determined to face the destroyer of her family, whom she saw rapidly advancing in his chariot.* She painted her eyelids in the Eastern fashion with antimony, so as to give a darker border to the eyes and make them look larger and brighter (Keil), possibly in order to induce Jehu, after the manner of Eastern usurpers, to take her, the widow of his predecessor, for his wife,⁴ but more probably as the last act of regal splendour. She tired ("made good") her head, and, looking down upon him from the high latticed window in the tower (Joseph. Ant. ix. 6, § 4), she met him by an allusion to a former act of treason in the history of her adopted country, which conveys a different expression, according as we take one or other of the different interpretations given to it. (1) "Was there peace to Zimri, who slew his 'lord'?" as if to remind Jehu, now in the fulness of his triumph, how Omri, the founder of the dynasty which he was destroying, had himself come into power as the avenger of Zimri, who had murdered Baasha, as he now had murdered Jehoram; or (2) a direct address to Jehu, as a second Zimri: "Is it peace?" (following up the question of her son in 2 K. ix. 21). "Is it peace, O Zimri, slayer of his lord?" (So Keil and LXX. ἡ εἰρήνη Ζαυββί δὲ φωνεῖται τοῦ κυρίου αὐτοῦ;) Or (3) "Peace to Zimri, who slew his 'lord'" (according to Josephus, Ant. ix. 6, § 4, καλὸς δοῦλος δὲ ἀποκτείνων τὸν δεσποτὴν)—which again may be taken either as an ironical welcome, or (according to Ewald, iii. 166, 260) as a reminder that as Zimri had spared the seraglio of Baasha, so she was prepared to welcome Jehu. The general character of Jezebel, and the doubt as to the details of the history of Zimri, would lead us rather to adopt the sterner view of her speech. Jehu looked up from his chariot—and his answer, again, is variously given in the LXX. and in the Hebrew text. In the former he exclaims, "Who art thou?—Come down to me." In the latter, "Who is on my side, who?" In either case the issue is the same. Two or three eunuchs of the royal harem show their faces at the windows, and at his command dashed* the ancient princess down from the chamber. She fell immediately in front of the conqueror's chariot. The blood flew from her mangled corpse over the palace-wall behind, and over the advancing horses in front. The merciless destroyer passed on; and the last remains of life were trampled out by the horses' hoofs. The body was left in that open space called in modern Eastern language "the mounds," where offal is thrown from the city-walls. The dogs of Eastern cities, which prowl around these localities, and which the present writer met on this very spot by the modern village which occupies the site of Jezreel, pounced upon this unexpected prey. Nothing was left by them but the hard portions of the human skeleton, the skull, the hands, and the feet. Such was the sight which met the eyes of the messengers of Jehu, whom he had sent from his triumphal banquet, struck with a momentary feeling of compassion for the fall of so much greatness: "Go, see now this cursed woman and bury her, for she is a king's daughter." When he heard the fate of the body, he exclaimed in words which no doubt were long remembered as the epitaph of the greatest and wickedest of the queens of Israel: "This is the word of Jehovah, which He spake by His servant Elijah the Tishbite, saying, In the portion of Jezreel shall 'the' dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel; and the carcase of Jezebel shall be as dung on the face of the earth; so that they shall not say, This is Jezebel" (2 K. ix. 36, 37). [A. P. S.]

JEZELUS (Ἰεζήλος; Zecholeus). 1. The same as JAHAZIEL (1 Esd. viii. 32).

2. (Jehelus) JEHIEL, the father of Obadiah (1 Esd. viii. 35).

JEZER (יֶזְרַע) = formation: Ἰσσαρα in Gen. xlv. 24; B. Ἰεζρά, A. Ἰεζρά, in Num. xxvi. 49; B. Ἰσσερή, A. Σαρά, in 1 Ch. vii. 13: Jessor, the third son of Naphtali, and father of the family of the Jezerites, who were numbered in the plains of Moab.

JEZERITES, THE (יֶזְרַעִי; B. δ' Ἰεζερί, A. δ' Ἰεζρά, F. δ' Ἰεζερί; Jezerites). A family of the tribe of Naphtali, descendants of Jezer (Num. xxvi. 49).

JEZIAH (יֶזְיָא; = Jehovah makes to spring up [MV.¹¹]; B. Ἀζεία, Ν. Ἀδειά, A. Ἀζία; Jeziā), properly Yizziyyah, a descendant of Parosh, and one of the laymen who, after the return from Babylon, had married strange wives, and at Ezra's bidding had promised to put them away (Ezra x. 25). In 1 Esd. ix. 26 he is called Eddias. The Syriac of Ezra reads Jezeanias.

JEZIEL (יֶזְיִל; Qeri יֶזְיִי, which is the reading of some MSS.; B. Ἰωήλ, A. Ἀζήλ; Jaziel), one of the skilled Benjamite archers or slingers who joined David in his retreat at Ziklag. He was probably the son of Azmaveth of Bahurim, one of David's heroes (1 Ch. xii. 3). In the Syriac Jeziel is omitted, and the sons of Azmaveth are there Pelet and Berachah.

JEZLIAH (יֶזְלִיָּה; B. Ζαπειά, A. Ἐζλιά), one of a long list of Benjamite heads of houses, sons of Elpaal, who dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Ch. viii. 18). [A. C. H.]

JEZO'AR (יֶזְעָר; Σαδρ; Isaar), the son of Helah, one of the wives of Asher, the father or founder of Tekoa, and posthumous son of Hezron (1 Ch. iv. 7). The Qeri has יֶזְעָר "and Zohar," which was followed by the LXX. and by the A. V. of 1611.

* A graphic conception of this scene occurs in Racine's Athalie, Act II. Sc. 6.

* יֶזְעָר, "dash," as from a precipice (Ps. cxli. 6).

JEZRAHI'AH (יְרֵחַיָּה = Jehovah shütes forth; om. Bⁿ*A.; Jezraia), a Levite, the leader of the chorists at the solemn dedication of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42). The singers had built themselves villages in the environs of the city and the Oasis of the Jordan, and with the minstrels they gathered themselves together at the first summons to keep the dedication with gladness.

JEZ'RE-EL (יְרֵעֵל = God will sow; B. Ἀΐραήλ, Aⁿ. Ἰεζραήλ; Jezrahel), according to the received text, a descendant of the father or founder of Etam, of the line of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 3). But as the verse now stands, we must supply some such word as "families:" "these (are the families of) the father of Etam." Both the LXX. and Vulg. read בְּנֵי, "sons," for אֲבֹת, "father," and six of Kennicott's MSS. have the same, while in two of De Rossi's the readings are combined. The Syriac is singularly different from all: "And these are the sons of Aminodob, Achizar'el, &c., Neshmo, and Dibosh," the last clause of v. 3 being entirely omitted. But, although the Syriac text of the Chronicles is so corrupt as to be of little authority in this case, there can be no doubt that the genealogy in cc. 3, 4 is so confused as to be attended with almost insuperable difficulties. Tremellius and Junius regard Etam as the proper name of a person, and Jezreel as one of his sons, while Bertheau considers them both names of places. The Targum on Chron. has, "And these are the Rabbis dwelling at Etam, Jezreel," &c. In v. 4 Hur is referred to as the ancestor of this branch of the tribe of Judah, and therefore, if the present text be adopted, we must read, "and these, viz. Abi-Etam, Jezreel," &c. But the probability is that in v. 3 a clause has been omitted.

JEZ-RE-EL (יְרֵעֵל): LXX. Ἰεζραήλ, Ἰεζραήλ, Ἰεζραήλ, Ἰεζραήλ; B. Ἰαζήλ, Ἰεζραήλ, Ἰεζραήλ; A. also Ἰεζραήλ: Jezrahel, Jezrahel, Jezrahel: Joseph. Ἰεζραήλ, Ant. viii. 13, § 6; Ἰεζραήλ, Ant. ix. 6, § 4; Ἰζάρα, Ant. viii. 15, §§ 4, 6; Ἰεζραήλ, or Ἰεζραήλ, Judith i. 8, iii. 9; B. Ἰεζραήλ, A. Ἰεζραήλ, Judith i. 6; Eusebius, Ἰεζραήλ, s. v. Ἰεζραήλ [OS.² p. 268, 52]; Jerome, Jezrahel [OS.² p. 165, 14]; Bourdeau Pilgrim [Itin. Hierosol. p. 586], Latinized into Stradela. Its modern name is Zer'in, which is in fact the same word, and which first appears in William of Tyre (xvii. 26) as Gerin (Gerinum), and Benjamin of Tudela as Zarzin. The history of the identification of these names is well given in Robinson, B. R. 1st ed. iii. 163, 165, and is curious as an example of the tenacity of a local tradition, in spite of the carelessness of modern travellers. According to Eusebius and Jerome (l. c.), it was in the great plain between Legio, Lejjün, and Scythopolis, Beisán. In the Itin. Hierosol. its distance from Scythopolis is given as xii. M.P.

The name is used in Josh. xvii. 16, Judg. vi. 33, 2 Sam. ii. 9 and (?) iv. 4, and Hos. i. 5, for the valley or plain between Gilboa and Little Hermon; and to this plain, in its widest extent, the general form of the name Esdraelon (first used in Judith i. 8) has been applied in modern times. It is probably from the richness of the plain that the name is derived, "God soweth," "God's sowing." For the events connected with this great battle-field of Palestine, see ESDRAELON.

In its more limited sense, as applied to the city, it first appears in Josh. xix. 18, where it is mentioned as a city of Issachar, in the neighbourhood of Chesulloth and Shunem; and it had citizens (1 K. xxi. 1-3), elders, and nobles of its own (1 K. xxi. 8-11, 2 K. x. 1-11). But its historical importance dates from the reign of Ahab; who chose it for his chief residence, as Omri had chosen Samaria, and Baasha Tirzah.

The situation of the modern village of Zeria still remains to show the fitness of his choice. It is on one of the gentle swells which rise out of the fertile plain of Esdraelon; but with two peculiarities which mark it out from the rest. One is its strength. On the N.E. the hill presents a steep rocky descent of at least 100 feet (Robinson, 1st ed. iii. 162; PEF. Mem. ii. 88; Guérin, Samarie, i. 311 sq.). The other is its central locality. It stands at the opening of the middle branch of the three eastern forks of the plain, and looks straight towards the wide western level; thus commanding the view towards the Jordan on the east (2 K. ix. 17), and visible from Carmel on the west (1 K. xviii. 45, 46).

In the neighbourhood, or within the town probably, was a temple and grove of Astarte, with an establishment of 400 priests supported by Jezebel (1 K. xvi. 33; 2 K. x. 11). The palace of Ahab (1 K. xxi. 1, xviii. 46), probably containing his "ivory house" (1 K. xxii. 39), was on the eastern side of the city, forming part of the city wall (cp. 1 K. xxi. 1; 2 K. ix. 25, 30, 33). The seraglio, in which Jezebel lived, was on the city wall, and had a high window facing eastward (2 K. ix. 30). Close by, if not forming part of this seraglio (as Josephus supposes, στῆρα ἐπὶ τοῦ πύργου, Ant. ix. 6, § 4), was a watch-tower, well known as "the tower in Jezreel," on which a sentinel stood, to give notice of arrivals from the disturbed district beyond the Jordan (2 K. ix. 17). The gateway of the city on the east was also the gateway of the palace (2 K. ix. 34). Immediately in front of the gateway, and under the city wall, was an open space, such as existed before the neighbouring city of Bethshan (2 Sam. xxi. 12), and is usually found by the walls of Eastern cities, under the name of "the mounds" (see Arabian Nights, passim), whence the dogs, the scavengers of the East, prowled in search of offal (2 K. ix. 25). Here Jezebel met with her end (2 K. ix. 35). [JEZEBEL.] A little further East, but adjoining to the royal domain (1 K. xxi. 1), was a smooth tract of land cleared out of the uneven valley (2 K. ix. 25), which belonged to Naboth, a citizen of Jezreel (2 K. ix. 25), by an hereditary right (1 K. xxi. 3); but the royal grounds were so near that it would have been easily turned into a garden of herbs for the royal use (1 K. xxi. 2, cp. v. 23). Here Elijah met Ahab, Jehu, and Bidkar (1 K. xxi. 17, 18); and here Jehu met Joram and Ahaziah (2 K. ix. 21, 25).

[ELIJAH; JEHU.] Whether the vineyard of Naboth was here or at Samaria is a doubtful question. [NABOTH.] Jezreel is also mentioned in 1 Sam. xxix. 11; 1 K. iv. 12; 2 K. viii. 29, ix. 10, 15, 37; 2 Ch. xxii. 6.

Still in the same eastern direction are two springs, one half a mile, the other one and a half miles from the town. The former, 'Ain el-Meiqiteh, issues from the rock, and affords a good supply of clear water. The latter, 'Ain Jālūd, "flows from under a sort of cavern in the wall of conglomerate rock, which here forms the base of Gilboa. The water is excellent; and issuing from crevices in the rocks, it spreads out at once into a fine limpid pool, 40 or 50 feet in diameter, full of fish" (Robinson, B. R. iii. 168). The 'Ain Jālūd, both from its size and situation, would appear to have been the spring known as "the (A. V. a) fountain which is in Jezreel" (1 Sam. xxix. 1), i.e. in the valley of Jezreel (cp. Josh. xvii. 6; 2 Sam. ii. 9, &c.). Perhaps also the 'Ain Jālūd was the spring (A. V. well) of HAROD, where Gideon encamped before his night attack on the Midianites (Judg. vii. 1).

According to Josephus (Ant. viii. 15, §§ 4, 6), the fountain of Jezreel, and the pool attached to it, was the spot where Naboth and his sons were executed, where the dogs and swine licked up their blood and that of Ahab, and where the harlots bathed in the blood-stained water (LXX.). But the natural inference from the present text of 1 K. xxii. 38 makes the scene of these events to be the pool of Samaria. [See NABOTH.]

With the fall of the house of Ahab the glory of Jezreel departed. No other king is described as living there, and the name was so deeply associated with the family of its founder, that when the Divine retribution overtook the house of their destroyer, the eldest child of the prophet Hosea, who was to be a living witness of the coming vengeance, was called "Jezreel:" "for I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu . . . and at that day I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel; . . . and great shall be the day of Jezreel" (Hos. i. 4, 5, 11). And then out of that day and place of humiliation the name is to go back to its original signification as derived from the beauty and fertility of the rich plain, and to become a pledge of the revived beauty and richness of Israel. "I will 'hear and answer' the heavens, and 'they will hear and answer' the earth, and the earth shall 'hear and answer' the corn and the wine and the oil [of that fruitful plain], and they shall 'hear and answer' Jezreel [that is, the seed of God], and I will sow her unto me in the earth" (Hos. ii. 22; see Ewald ad loc., and Gesenius in voce Jezreel). From this time the image seems to have been continued as a prophetic expression for the sowing the people of Israel, as it were broadcast; as though the whole of Palestine and the world were to become, in a spiritual sense, one rich plain of Jezreel. "I will sow them among the people, and they shall remember me in far countries" (Zech. x. 9). "Ye shall be tilled and sown, and I will multiply men upon you" (Ezek. xxxvi. 9, 10). "I will sow the house of Israel and the house of Judah with the seed of men and with the seed of beast" (Jer. xxxi. 27). Hence the consecration of the image of "sowing," as it appears in the N. T., Matt. xiii. 2.

2. (B. 'Iarīthl, A. 'Ieθραῖλ in Josh.; B. 'Ioraphleitis, A. Eίραηλείτις; A. 'Iζραηλείτις in 1 Sam. xxx.). A town in Judah, in the neighbourhood of the southern Carmel (Josh. xv. 56). Here David in his wanderings took Ahinoam the Jezreelitess for his first wife (1 Sam. xxvii. 3, xxx. 5). The site is unknown.

[A. P. S.] [W.]

JEZ-RE-EL (יֶזְרְעֵל; 'Ieθραῖλ; Jezrahel). The eldest son of the Prophet Hosea (Hos. i. 4), significantly so called because Jehovah said to the Prophet, "Yet a little while and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu," and "I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel." [W. A. W.]

JEZ'RE-ELITE (יֶזְרְעֵלִית; B. -ετ-, A. -ιτης; once 2 K. ix. 21 'Iζραηλίτης; Jezrahelita). An inhabitant of Jezreel (1 K. xxi. 1, 4, 6, 7, 15, 16; 2 K. ix. 21, 25). [W. A. W.]

JEZRE-ELITNESS (יֶזְרְעֵלִיט; B. 'Ioraphleitis and -ιτης; A. Eίραηλείτις, 'Iζραηλείτις, 'Ioraphleitis; Jezrahelitis, Jezraelitis). A woman of Jezreel (1 Sam. xxvii. 3, xxx. 5; 2 Sam. ii. 2, iii. 2; 1 Ch. iii. 1). [W. A. W.]

JIB'SAM, R. V. IB'SAM (יִבְסָם; 'Iemaśān, B. Βασάν, A. 'Iεβασάν; Jebsem), one of the sons of Tola the son of Issachar, who were heads of their father's house and heroes of might in their generations (1 Ch. vii. 2). His descendants appear to have served in David's army, and with others of the same clan mustered to the number of upwards of 22,000.

JID'LAPH (יִדְלָפ; A. 'Ieδδῶ, D. om.; Jed-laph), a son of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 22), or a Nahorean; probably a chief and clan or tribe of the Nahorites (Arameans) who were settled at Harran (Carrhae) on the E. side of the Euphrates. See Ewald, Hist. Isr. i. 287, Eng. Tr. As to the meaning of the name Jidlaph, cp. the Aramaic יִדְלָפ, yedlaph, stillat, יִדְלָפָה, delphā, stillatio, with Num. xxiv. 7, whence we may infer that the name signifies "prolific." [C. J. B.]

JIM'NA, R. V. IM'NAH (יִמְנָה; 'Iaimn, A. 'Iaimin; Jemna), the firstborn of Asher, represented in the numbering on the plains of Moab by his descendants the Jimnites (Num. xxvi. 44). He is elsewhere called in the A. V. JIMNAH (Gen. xli. 17) and IMNAH (1 Ch. vii. 30), the Hebrew in both instances being the same.

JIM'NAH, R. V. IM'NAH (יִמְנָה; 'Iaimn, A. 'Iaimn; Jamne)=JIMNA=IMNAH (Gen. xli. 17).

JIM'NITES, R. V. IM'NITES, THE (יִמְנִי; i.e. the Jimnah; Sam. and one MS. יִמְנִי; δ 'Iaimn, B. 'Iaimneil, A. δ 'Iaimni; Jennattae), descendants of the preceding (Num. xxvi. 44).

JIPH'TAH, R. V. IPH'TAH (יִפְתָּח; i.e. Yiftāch; B. omits, A. 'Ieφθά; Jephthā), one of the cities of Judah in the maritime lowland, or Shefelah (Josh. xv. 43). It is named in the same group with Mareshah, Nezib, and others. Both the last-mentioned places have been discovered, the former to the south, the latter to the east of Beit Jibrin, not as we should expect on the plain, but in the mountains. Here Jiphthah may some day be found, though it has not yet been met with. [G.] [W.]

JIPH'THAAH-EL, R. V. IPH'TAH-EL, THE VALLEY OF (יְבִי'תָהַל: גַּאֲפָהָל, ἐκ Γαί καὶ Φθαήλ; A. Γαί 'Ιεφθαήλ, ἐν Γαί 'Ιεφθαήλ: vallis Jephthahel), a valley which served as one of the land-marks for the boundary both of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 14) and Asher (v. 27). The position of this ravine, Gai, is not known. Robinson suggested (Later Res. p. 107) that Jiphthah-el was identical with Jotapata, the city which so long withstood Vespasian (Joseph. B. J. iii. 7), and that they survive in the modern Jesut, a village in the mountains of Galilee, half-way between the Bay of Acre and the Lake of Gennesareth. But this is too far to the south. Conder (Hbk. p. 267) with more probability identifies it with the valley running from the plain of Rameh to the sea. Conder has also suggested (PEF. Qy. Stat. 1883, p. 137) Wady el-Kurn; but this valley lies to the north of the ridge that so sharply separated Upper from Lower Galilee, and possibly marked the northern limit of Zebulun. [G.] [W.]

JO'AB (יֹאָב = Jehovah-father; יֹאָב; Joab).

1. The eldest and most remarkable of the three nephews of David, the children of Zeruiah, David's sister. Their father is unknown,* but seems to have resided at Bethlehem, and to have died before his sons, as we find mention of his sepulchre at that place (2 Sam. iii. 32). They all exhibit the activity and courage of David's constitutional character. But they never rise beyond this to the nobler qualities which lift him above the wild soldiers and chieftains of the time. Asahel, who was cut off in his youth, and seems to have been the darling of the family, is only known to us from his gazelle-like agility (2 Sam. ii. 18). Abishai and Joab are alike in their implacable revenge. Joab, however, combines with these ruder qualities something of a more statesman-like character, which brings him more nearly to a level with his youthful uncle; and unquestionably gives him the second place in the whole history of David's reign.

1. He first appears after David's accession to the throne at Hebron, thus differing from his brother Abishai, who was already David's companion during his wanderings (1 Sam. xxvi. 6). He with his two brothers went out from Hebron at the head of David's "servants," or guards, to keep a watch on the movements of Abner, who with a considerable force of Benjamites had crossed the Jordan, and come as far as Gibeon, perhaps on a pilgrimage to the sanctuary. The two parties sat opposite each other, on each side of the tank by that city. Abner's challenge, to which Joab assented, led to a desperate struggle between twelve champions from either side. [GIBEON.] The left-handed Benjamites, and the right-handed men of Judah—their sword-hands thus coming together—seized each his adversary by the head, and the whole number fell by the mutual wounds they received.

This roused the blood of the rival tribes; a general encounter ensued; Abner and his company were defeated, and in his fight, being hard pressed by the swift-footed Asahel, he reluctantly killed the unfortunate youth. The expressions which he uses, "Wherefore should I smite thee to the ground? how then should I hold up my face to Joab thy brother?" (2 Sam. ii. 22), imply that up to this time there had been a kindly, if not a friendly, feeling between the two chiefs. It was rudely extinguished by this deed of blood. The other soldiers of Judah, when they came up to the dead body of their young leader, halted, struck dumb by grief. But his two brothers, on seeing the corpse, only hurried on with greater fury in the pursuit. At sunset the Benjamite force rallied round Abner,^b and he then made an appeal to the generosity of Joab not to push the war to extremities. Joab reluctantly consented, drew off his troops, and returned, after the loss of only nineteen men, to Hebron. They took the corpse of Asahel with them, and on the way halted at Bethlehem in the early morning, or at dead of night, to inter it in their family burial-place (3 Sam. ii. 32).

But Joab's revenge on Abner was only postponed. He had been on another of these predatory excursions from Hebron, when he was informed on his return that Abner had in his absence paid a visit to David, and been received into favour (2 Sam. iii. 23). He broke out into a violent remonstrance with the king, and then, without David's knowledge, immediately sent messengers after Abner, who was overtaken by them at the well of Sirah, according to Josephus (Ant. vii. 1, § 5), about two miles from Hebron.^c Abner, with the unsuspecting generosity of his noble nature, returned at once. Joab and Abishai met him in the gateway of the town; Joab took him aside (2 Sam. iii. 27), as if with a peaceful intention, and then struck him a deadly blow "under the fifth rib." It is possible that with the passion of vengeance for his brother may have been mingled the fear lest Abner should supplant him in the king's favour. David burst into passionate invective and imprecations on Joab when he heard of the act, and forced him to appear in sackcloth and torn garments at the funeral (iii. 31). But it was an intimation of Joab's power which David never forgot. The awe in which he stood of the sons of Zeruiah cast a shade over the whole remainder of his life (iii. 39).

II. There was now no rival left in the way of Joab's advancement, and soon the opportunity occurred for his legitimate accession to the highest post that David could confer. At the siege of Jebus, the king offered the office of chief of the army, now grown into a "host," to any one who would lead the forlorn hope, and scale the precipice on which the besieged fortress stood. With an agility equal to that of David himself, or of his brother Asahel, Joab succeeded in the attempt, and became in consequence commander-in-chief—"captain of the host"—the same office that Abner had held under Saul, the highest in the state after the king (1 Ch. xi. 6; 2 Sam. viii. 16). His importance was immediately shown by his undertaking the fortification of the conquered city, in conjunction with David (1 Ch. xi. 8).

^b The word describing the halt of Abner's band, and rendered "troop" in the A. V. and "band" in the R. V. (2 Sam. iii. 25), is an unusual one, יְהַיָּבָה (Agudabab), elsewhere employed for a bunch or knot of hyssop.

^c Possibly the spring which still exists about that distance out of Hebron on the left of the road going northward, and bears the name of 'Ain-Serah. The road has doubtless always followed the same track.

* By Josephus (Ant. vii. 1, § 3) his name is given as Suri (Σουρι) and thus may be merely a repetition of Sarouah (Σαρουα).

In this post he was content, and served the king with undeviating fidelity. In the wide range of wars which David undertook, Joab was the acting general, and he therefore may be considered as the founder, as far as military prowess was concerned, the Marlborough, the Belisarius, of the Jewish empire. Abishai, his brother, still accompanied him, as captain of the king's "mighty men" (1 Ch. xi. 20; 2 Sam. x. 10). He had a chief armour-bearer of his own, Naharai, a Beerothite (2 Sam. xxiii. 37; 1 Ch. xi. 39), and ten attendants to carry his equipment and baggage (2 Sam. xviii. 15). He had the charge, formerly belonging to the king or judge, of giving the signal by trumpet for advance or retreat (2 Sam. xviii. 16). He was called by the almost regal title of "Lord" (2 Sam. xi. 11), "the prince of the king's army" (1 Ch. xxvii. 34). His usual residence (except when campaigning) was in Jerusalem; but he had a house and property, with barley-fields adjoining, in the country (2 Sam. xiv. 30), in the "wilderness" (1 K. ii. 34), probably on the N.E. of Jerusalem (cp. 1 Sam. xiii. 18; Josh. viii. 15, 20), near an ancient sanctuary, called from its nomadic village "Baalhazor" (2 Sam. xiii. 23; cp. with xiv. 30), where there were extensive sheepwalks. It is possible that this "house of Joab" may have given its name to Ataroth, Beth-Joab (1 Ch. ii. 54), to distinguish it from Ataroth-adar. There were two Ataroths in the tribe of Benjamin [see ATAROTH].

1. His great war was that against Ammon, which he conducted in person. It was divided into three campaigns. (a) The first was against the allied forces of Syria and Ammon. He attacked and defeated the Syrians, whilst his brother Abishai did the same for the Ammonites. The Syrians rallied with their kindred tribes from beyond the Euphrates, and were finally routed by David himself. [HADAREZER.] (b) The second was against Edom. The decisive victory was gained by David himself in the "valley of salt," and celebrated by a triumphal monument (2 Sam. viii. 13). But Joab had the charge of carrying out the victory, and remained for six months, extirpating the male population, whom he then buried in the tombs of Petra (1 K. xi. 15, 16). So long was the terror of his name preserved that only when the fugitive prince of Edom, in the Egyptian court, heard that "David slept with his fathers, and that Joab the captain of the host was dead," did he venture to return to his own country (ib. xi. 21, 22). (c) The third was against the Ammonites. They were again left to Joab (2 Sam. x. 7-19). He went against them at the beginning of the next year "at the time when kings go out to battle"—to the siege of Rabbah. The Ark was sent with him, and the whole army was encamped in booths or huts round the beleaguered city (2 Sam. xi. 1, 11). After a sortie of the inhabitants, which caused some loss to the Jewish army, Joab took the lower city on the river, and then, with true loyalty, sent to urge David to come and take the citadel, "Rabbah," lest the glory of the capture should pass from the king to his general (2 Sam. xii. 26-28).

2. The services of Joab to the king were not confined to these military achievements. In the entangled relations which grew up in David's domestic life, he bore an important part. (a) The first occasion was the unhappy correspondence which passed between him and the king during the Ammonite war respecting Uriah the Hittite, which led to the treacherous sacrifice of Uriah in the above-mentioned sortie (2 Sam. xi. 1-25). It shows both the confidence reposed by David in Joab, and Joab's too unscrupulous fidelity to David. From the possession which Joab thus acquired of the terrible secret of the royal household, has been dated, with some probability,⁴ his increased power over the mind of the king.

(b) The next occasion on which it was displayed was in his successful endeavour to reinstate Absalom in David's favour, after the murder of Amnon. It would almost seem as if he had been guided by the effect produced on the king by Nathan's parable. A similar apologue he put into the mouth of a "wise woman of Tekoah." The exclamation of David on perceiving the application intimates the high opinion which he entertained of his general, "Is not the hand of Joab in all this?" (2 Sam. xiv. 1-20). A like indication is found in the confidence of Absalom that Joab, who had thus procured his return, could also go a step further and demand his admission to his father's presence. Joab, who evidently thought that he had gained as much as could be expected (2 Sam. xiv. 22), twice refused to visit the prince, but, having been entrapped into an interview by a stratagem of Absalom, undertook the mission, and succeeded in this also (ib. xiv. 28-33).

(c) The same keen sense of his master's interests that had prompted this desire to heal the breach in the royal family ruled the conduct of Joab no less, when the relations of the father and son were reversed by the successful revolt of Absalom. His former intimacy with the prince did not impair his fidelity to the king. He followed him beyond the Jordan, and in the final battle of Ephraim assumed the responsibility of taking the rebel prince's dangerous life in spite of David's injunction to spare him, and when no one else had courage to act so decisive a part (2 Sam. xviii. 2, 11-15). He was well aware of the terrible effect it would have on the king (ib. xviii. 20), and on this account possibly dissuaded his young friend Ahimaaz from bearing the news; but when the tidings had been broken, he had the spirit himself to rouse David from the frantic grief which would have been fatal to the royal cause (2 Sam. xix. 5-7). His stern resolution (as he had himself anticipated) well-nigh proved fatal to his own interests. The king could not forgive it, and went so far in his unreasonable resentment as to transfer the command of the army from the too faithful Joab to his other nephew Amasa, the son of Abigail, who had even sided with the insurgents (2 Sam. xix. 32). In like manner he returned only a reproachful answer to the vindictive loyalty of Joab's brother, Abishai (ib. 22).

(d) Nothing brings out more strongly the good and bad qualities of Joab than his conduct in this trying crisis of his history. On the one hand, he remained still faithful to his master. On the other hand, as before in the case of Abner, he was determined not to lose the post he so highly valued. Amasa was commander-in-chief, but Joab had still his own small following of attendants; and with him were the mighty men commanded by his brother Abishai (2 Sam. xx. 7, 10), and the body-guard of the king. With these he went out in pursuit of the remnants of the rebellion. In the heat of pursuit, he encountered his rival Amasa, more leisurely engaged in the same quest. At "the great stone" in Gibeon, the cousins met. Joab's sword was attached to his girdle; by design or accident it protruded from the sheath. Amasa rushed into the treacherous embrace, to which Joab invited him, holding fast his sword by his own right hand, whilst the protruding sword in his left hand plunged into Amasa's stomach; a single blow from that practised arm, as in the case of Abner, sufficed to do its work. Joab and his brother hurried on to discharge their commission, whilst one of his ten attendants stayed by the corpse, calling on the royal party to follow after Joab. But the deed produced a frightful impression. The dead body was lying in a pool of blood by the roadside; every one halted, as they came up, at the ghastly sight, till the attendant dragged it out of the road, and threw a cloak over it. Then, as if the spell was broken, they followed Joab, now once more captain of the host (2 Sam. xx. 5-13). He too, when they overtook him, presented an aspect long afterwards remembered with horror. The blood of Amasa had spirted all over the girdle to which the sword was attached, and the sandals on his feet were red with the stains left by the falling corpse (1 K. ii. 5).

(e) But, at the moment, all were absorbed in the pursuit of the rebels. Once more a proof was given of the wide-spread confidence in Joab's judgment. In the besieged town of Abel-Bethmaachah, far in the north, the same appeal was addressed to his sense of the evils of an endless civil war, that had been addressed to him years before by Abner near Gibeon. He demanded only the surrender of the rebel chief, and on the sight of his head thrown over the wall withdrew the army and returned to Jerusalem (2 Sam. xx. 16-22). [SHEBA.]

(f) His last remonstrance with David was on the announcement of the king's desire to number the people. "The king prevailed against Joab" (2 Sam. xxiv. 1-4). But Joab's scruples were so strong that he managed to avoid numbering two of the tribes, Levi and Benjamin (1 Ch. xxi. 6).

3. There is something mournful in the end of Joab. At the close of his long life, his loyalty, so long unshaken, at last wavered. "Though he had not turned after Absalom [or, as in LXX. or Joseph. Ant. viii. 1, § 4, "He turned not after Solomon"], he turned after Adonijah" (1 K. ii. 28). This probably filled up the measure of the king's long cherished resentment. We learn from David's last song that his powerlessness over his courtiers was even then present to his mind (2 Sam. xxiii. 6, 7), and now, on his deathbed, he recalled to Solomon's recollection the two murders of Abner and Amasa (1 K. ii. 5, 6), with an injunction not to let the aged soldier escape with impunity.

The revival of the pretensions of Adonijah after David's death was sufficient to awaken the suspicions of Solomon. The king deposed the high-priest Abiathar, Joab's friend and fellow-conspirator—and the news of this event at once alarmed Joab himself. He claimed the right of sanctuary within the curtains of the sacred tent, under the shelter of the altar at Gibeon. He was pursued by Benaiah, who at first hesitated to violate the sanctuary of the refuge; but Solomon urged that the guilt of two such murders overrode all such protection. With his hands on the altar therefore, the grey-headed warrior was slaughtered by his successor. The body was carried to his house "in the wilderness," and there interred. He left descendants, but nothing is known of them, unless it may be inferred from the double curse of David (2 Sam. iii. 29) and of Solomon (1 K. ii. 35) that they seemed to dwindle away, stricken by a succession of visitations—weakness, leprosy, lameness, murder, starvation. His name is by some supposed (in allusion to his part in Adonijah's coronation on that spot) to be preserved in the modern appellation of Enrogel, "the well of Job," corrupted from Joab. [A. P. S.]

2. (𐤍𐤏); B. 'Iwšāš, A. 'Iwšāš; Joab) Son of Seraiah, and descendant of Kenaz (1 Ch. ix. 14). He was father, or prince, as Jarchi explains it, of the valley of Charashim (R. V. "Ge-harashim"), or "craftsmen," so called, according to the tradition quoted by Jeronimus (Quaest. Heb. in Paral.), because the architects of the Temple were selected from among his sons.

3. ('Iwšāš; Job in 1 Esd.) The head of a family, not of priestly or Levitical rank, whose descendants, with those of Jeshua, were the most numerous of all who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 6, viii. 9; Neh. vii. 11; 1 Esd. viii. 35). It is not clear whether Jeshua and Joab were two prominent men among the children of Pahath-Moab (A. V. and R. V.), the ruler or sultan (shālṭōn) of Moab, as the Syriac render, or whether, in the registration of those who returned, the descendants of Jeshua and Joab were represented by the sons of Pahath-Moab. If the latter be accepted, the verse (Ezra ii. 6; Neh. vii. 11) should be rendered: "the sons of Pahath-Moab, for (i.e. representing) the sons of Jeshua and Joab." In this case the Joab of Ezra viii. 9 and 1 Esd. viii. 35 was probably a distinct personage.

JOA'CHAZ (B. 'Iexoytas, A. 'Iwšāš; Jochonias) = Jehozahaz (1 Esd. i. 34 [LXX. v. 32]); the son of Josiah. The LXX. and Vulgate are in this case followed by St. Matthew (i. 11), or have been altered so as to agree with him.

JO'ACHIM ('Iwaxeiμ; Joachim). 1. (Bar. i. 3) = Jehoiachim, called also Joasim.

2. A "high-priest" (δ ἱερεὺς) at Jerusalem in the time of Baruch "the son of Chelcias," i.e. Hilkiyah (Bar. i. 7). The name does not occur in the list in 1 Ch. vi. 13 sq. [B. F. W.]

JO'ACIM (LXX. usually Ἰωακείμ; Joacim).

1. = Jehoiakim (1 Esd. i. 37, 38, 39). [JOACHIM, 1.]

2. (Joachim) = Jehoiachin (1 Esd. i. 43).

3. = Joiakim, the son of Jeshua (1 Esd. v. 5). He is by mistake called the son of Zerubbabel, as is clear from Neh. xii. 10, 26. Burrington (Geneal. i. 72) proposed to omit the words Ἰωακίμ δ τοῦ altogether as an interpolation.

[W. A. W.]

4. "The high-priest which was in Jerusalem" (Jud. iv. 6, 14) in the time of Judith, who welcomed the heroine after the death of Holofernes, in company with "the ancients of the children of Israel" (ἡ γερουσία τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραήλ, xv. 8 sq.). The name occurs with the various reading Eliakim, but it is impossible to identify him with any historical character. No such name occurs in the lists of high-priests in 1 Ch. vi. (Joseph. Ant. x. 8, § 6); and it is a mere arbitrary conjecture to suppose that Eliakim, mentioned in 2 K. xviii. 18, was afterwards raised to that dignity. Still less can be said for the identification of Joacim with Hilkiyah (2 K. xxii. 4; Ἐλιακίας, Joseph. Ant. x. 4, § 2; Χελκίας, LXX.). The name itself ("The Lord will set up") is appropriate to the position which the high-priest occupies in the story of Judith, and the person must be regarded as a necessary part of the fiction.

5. The husband of Susanna (Sus. v. 1 sq.). The name seems to have been chosen, as in the former case, with a reference to its meaning; and it was probably for the same reason that the husband of Anna, the mother of the Virgin, is called Joacim in early legends (Protev. Jac. i., &c.).

JO-A'DANUS (Ἰωαδάνος; Joadeus), one of the sons of Jeshua, the son of Jozadak (1 Esd. ix. 19). His name occupies the same position as that of Gedaliah in the corresponding list in Ezra x. 18, but it is uncertain how the corruption originated.

JO'AH (Ἰωᾶ): Ἰωᾶχ in Isaiah; BA. Ἰωσαφᾶτ in 2 K. xviii. 18; BA. Ἰωᾶς in v. 26, 37, and A. Ἰωσαφᾶτ in v. 18: Joahē). 1. The son of Asaph, and chronicler, or keeper of the records, to Hezekiah. He was one of the three chief officers sent to communicate with the Assyrian general at the conduit of the upper pool (Is. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22), and probably belonged to the tribe of Levi.

2. (BA. Ἰωᾶβ; Joah). The son or grandson of Zimzah, a Gershonite (1 Ch. vi. 21), and apparently the same as Ethan (v. 42), unless, as is not improbable, in the latter list some names are supplied which are omitted in the former, and vice versa. For instance, in v. 42 Shimei is added, and in v. 43 Libni is omitted (cp. v. 20). If Joah and Ethan are identical, the passage must have been early corrupted, as all ancient Versions give it as it stands at present, and there are no variations in the MSS.

3. (B. Ἰωᾶδ, A. Ἰωᾶδ; Joahā). The third son of Obed-edom (1 Ch. xxvi. 4), a Korhite, and one of the door-keepers appointed by David. With the rest of his family he is characterised as a man of excellence in strength for the service (v. 8). They were appointed to keep the southern gate of the Temple, and the house of Asuppim, or "gatherings," which was either a store-house or council-chamber in the outer court (v. 15).

4. (B. om., A. Ἰωᾶ; Joah). A Gershonite, the son of Zimzah, and father of Eden (2 Ch. xxix. 12). As one of the representatives of the great Levitical family to which he belonged, he took a leading part in the purification of the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah. In the last clause of the verse the LXX. have Ἰωαχᾶ, which is the reading of both MSS.; but there is nothing to show that the same person is not in both instances intended, nor any MS. authority for the variant reading.

5. (B. Ἰωᾶχ, A. Ἰωᾶς; Joah). The son of Joahaz, and keeper of the records or annalist to Josiah. Together with the chief officers of state, Shaphan the scribe, and Maaseiah, the governor of the city, he superintended the repair of the Temple, which had been neglected during the two previous reigns (2 Ch. xxxiv. 8). Josephus calls him Ἰωᾶρης, as if he read Ἰωᾶ. The Syriac and Arabic omit the name altogether.

JOA'HAZ (Ἰωᾶζ); A. Ἰωᾶχαζ, B. Ἰωᾶχ; Joahaz), the father of Joah, the chronicler or keeper of the records to king Josiah (2 Ch. xxxiv. 8). One of Kennicott's MSS. reads Ἰωᾶ, i.e. Ahaz, and the margin of Bomberg's Bible gives Ἰωᾶῖτ, i.e. Jehoahaz. In the Syr. and Arab. Versions the name is omitted.

JOA'NAN (B. Ἰωᾶνᾶ, A. Ἰωᾶνᾶν; Jonathas) = JOHANAN, the son of Eliashib (1 Esd. ix. 1).

JOAN'NA (Ἰωᾶνᾶς, Ἰωᾶνᾶν; Joanna), son of Rhesa, according to the text of Luke iii. 27, and one of the ancestors of Christ. But according to the view explained in a previous article, son of Zerubbabel, and the same as Hananiah in 1 Ch. iii. 19. [GENEAL. OF CHRIST; HANANIAH, 8.] [A. C. H.]

JOAN'NA (Ἰωᾶννα, modern form "Joan," of the same origin as Ἰωᾶνᾶς, the reading of most MSS.; also rendered A. V. "Joanna," St. Luke iii. 27. and Ἰωᾶννης = Hebr. JEHOHANAN), the name of a woman, occurring twice in Luke (viii. 3, xxiv. 10), but evidently denoting the same person. In the first passage she is expressly stated to have been "wife of Chusa, steward (ἀντιπορὸς) of Herod;" that is, Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee. Prof. Blunt has observed in his Coincidences, that "we find here a reason why Herod should say to his servants (Matt. xiv. 2), 'This is John the Baptist' . . . because his steward's wife was a disciple of Jesus, and so there would be frequent mention of Him among the servants in Herod's court" (Alford, ad loc.; cp. Luke ix. 7). Professor Blunt adds the still more interesting instance of Manaen (Acts xiii. 1), the tetrarch's own "foster-brother" (σύντροφος, Blunt, p. 263, ed. 1859). Another coincidence is, that our Lord's ministry was mostly confined to Galilee, the seat of Herod's jurisdiction. Farther, if we might suppose Herod at length to have dismissed Chusa from his service, on account of Joanna's attachment to one already in ill odour with the higher powers (see particularly Luke xiii. 31), the suppression of her husband's name, now no longer holding a distinguished office, would be very natural in the second passage. However, Joanna continued faithful to our Lord throughout His ministry; and as she was one of those whose circumstances permitted them to "minister unto Him out of their substance" during His lifetime, so she was one of those who brought spices and ointments to embalm His Body when dead. [E. S. Ff.]

JOAN'NAN (Ἰωάννης, A. Ioannes; Joannes), the eldest brother of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. ii. 2). He had the surname of Caddis, and is elsewhere called John. [JOHN, 2.]

JO-ARIB (Ἰωαρίβ, A. Ioarib; Joarib), chief of the first of the twenty-four courses of priests in the reign of David, and ancestor of the Maccabees (1 Macc. ii. 1). His name appears also in the A. V. as Jehoiarib (1 Ch. xxiv. 7) and Jarib (1 Macc. xiv. 29). Josephus retains the form adopted by the LXX. (Ant. xii. 6, § 1).

JO'ASH (יוֹאָשׁ), the contracted form of the name JEHOASH, in which it is frequently found; Ἰώσ; Joas). 1. Son of Ahaziah king of Judah, and the only one of his children who escaped the murderous hand of Athaliah. Jehoram having himself killed all his own brethren; and all his sons, except Ahaziah, having been killed by the irruption of the Philistines and Arabians; and all Ahaziah's remoter relations having been slain by Jehu; and now all his sons having been put to death by Athaliah (2 Ch. xxi. 4, 17; xxii. 1, 8-10), the house of David was reduced to the lowest ebb, and Joash appears to have been the only surviving descendant of Solomon. After his father's sister Jehoshabeath, the wife of Jehoiada, had stolen him from among the king's sons, he was hid for six years in the chambers of the Temple. In the 7th year of his age and of his concealment, a successful revolution placed him on the throne of his ancestors, and freed the country from the tyranny and idolatries of Athaliah. [JEHOIADA.] For at least twenty-three years, while Jehoiada lived, his reign was very prosperous. Excepting that the high places were still resorted to for incense and sacrifice, pure religion was restored; large contributions were made for the repair of the Temple, which was accordingly restored; and the country seems to have been free from foreign invasion and domestic disturbance. But, after the death of Jehoiada, Joash, who was evidently of weak character, fell into the hands of bad advisers, at whose suggestion he revived the worship of Baal and Ashtaroth. When he was rebuked for this by Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, who had probably succeeded to the high-priesthood, with base ingratitude and daring impiety Joash caused him to be stoned to death in the very court of the Lord's House, "between the Temple and the Altar" (Matt. xxiii. 35). The vengeance imprecated by the murdered high-priest was not long delayed. That very year, Hazael king of Syria, after a successful campaign against the Philistines, came up against Jerusalem, and carried off a vast booty as the price of his departure. A decisive victory, gained by a small band of Syrians over a great host of the king of Judah, had thus placed Jerusalem at his mercy. This defeat is expressly said to be a judgment upon Joash for having forsaken the God of his fathers. He had scarcely escaped this danger, when he fell into another and a fatal one. Two of his servants, taking advantage of his severe illness, some think of a wound received in battle, conspired against him, and slew him in his bed in the fortress of Millo, thus avenging the innocent blood of Zechariah. He was buried in the city of David, but not in the sepulchres of the kings of Judah. Possibly the fact of Jehoiada being buried there had something to do with this exclusion. Joash's reign lasted forty years, from 837 to 798 B.C. (Riehm). He was tenth king from David inclusive, reckoning the reign of the usurper Athaliah. He is one of the three kings (Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah) omitted by St. Matthew in the genealogy of Christ.

With regard to the different accounts of the Syrian invasion given in 2 K. and in 2 Ch., which have led some to imagine two distinct Syrian invasions, and others to see a direct contradiction or at least a strange incompleteness in the narratives, the difficulty exists solely in the minds of the critics. The narrative given above, which is also that of Keil and E. Bertheau (Ereg. Handb. z. A. T.) as well as of Josephus, perfectly suits the two accounts, which are merely different abridgments of the one fuller account contained in the original chronicles of the kingdom.

It should be added that the prophet Elisha flourished in Israel throughout the days of Joash; and there is some ground for concluding with Winer (agreeing with Credner, Movers, Hitze, Meier, and others) that the prophet Joel also prophesied in the former part of this reign. (See Movers, Chronik, pp. 119-121.)

2. Son and successor of Jehoahaz on the throne of Israel from B.C. 798 to 783 (Riehm), and for two full years a contemporary sovereign with the preceding (2 K. xv. 1; cp. with xiii. 1, xiii. 10). When he succeeded to the crown, the kingdom was in a deplorable state from the devastations of Hazael and Benhadad, kings of Syria, of whose power at this time we had also evidence in the preceding article. In spite of the perseverance of Joash in the worship set up by Jeroboam, God took compassion upon the extreme misery of Israel, and in remembrance of His covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, interposed to save them from entire destruction. On the occasion of a friendly visit paid by Joash to Elisha on his deathbed, where he wept over his face, and addressed him as "the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof," the Prophet promised him deliverance from the Syrian yoke in Apek. the scene of Ahab's great victory over a former Benhadad (1 K. xx. 26-30). He then bade him smite upon the ground, and the king smote thrice and then stayed. The Prophet rebuked him for staying, and limited to three his victories over Syria. Accordingly Joash did beat Benhadad three times on the field of battle, and recovered from him the cities which Hazael had taken from Jehoahaz. The other great military event of Joash's reign was his successful war with Amaziah king of Judah. The grounds of this war are given fully in 2 Ch. xxv. [AMAZIAH.] The hiring of 100,000 men of Israel for

100 talents of silver by Amaziah is the only instance on record of such a transaction, and implies that at that time the kingdom of Israel was free from all fear of the Syrians. These mercenary soldiers having been dismissed by Amaziah, at the instigation of a prophet, without being allowed to take part in the Edomitish expedition, returned in great wrath to their own country, and sacked and plundered the cities of Judah in revenge for the slight put upon them, and also to indemnify themselves for the loss of their share of the plunder. It was to avenge this injury that Amaziah, on his return from his triumph over the Edomites, declared war against Joash, in spite of the warning of the Prophet, and the contemptuous dissuasion of Joash under the fable of the cedar and the thistle. The result was that the two armies met at Bethshemesh, that Joash was victorious, put the army of Amaziah to the rout, took him prisoner, brought him to Jerusalem, broke down the wall of Jerusalem, all along the north side from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate, a distance of 400 cubits, plundered the Temple of its gold and silver vessels, seized the king's treasures, took hostages, and then returned to Samaria, where he died, probably not very long afterwards, and was buried in the sepulchres of the kings of Israel. He died in the 15th year of Amaziah king of Judah, and was succeeded by his son Jeroboam II. There is a discrepancy between the Bible account of his character and that given by Josephus. For whereas the former says of him, "He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord" (2 K. xiii. 11), the latter says that he was a good man, and very different from his father. Josephus probably was guided by the account of Joash's friendly intercourse with Elisha, which certainly indicates some good disposition in him, although he followed the sin of Jeroboam. [A. C. H.]

3. The father of Gideon, and a wealthy man among the Abiezrites. At the time of the Midianitish occupation of the country, he appears to have gone so far with the tide of popular opinion in favour of idolatry, that he had on his own ground an altar dedicated to Baal, and an Asherah. In this, however, he submitted rather to the exigencies of the time, and the influence of his family and neighbours, and was the first to defend the daring act of his son, and protect him from the vengeance of the Abiezrites, by sarcasm only less severe than that which Elijah employed against the priests of Baal in the memorable scene on Carmel (Judg. vi. 11, 29, 30, 31; vii. 14; viii. 13, 29, 32). The LXX. B. puts the speech in vi. 31 most inappropriately into the mouth of Gideon, but this is corrected in the Alex. MS. In the Vulg. the name is omitted in vi. 31 and viii. 13.

4. Apparently a younger son of Ahab, who held a subordinate jurisdiction in the lifetime of his father, and was appointed viceroy (ἐξουρία, LXX. of 2 Ch. xviii. 25) during his absence in the attack on Ramoth-Gilead (1 K. xxii. 26; 2 Ch. xviii. 25). Or he may have been merely a prince of the blood-royal. The Vulgate calls him "the son of Amealch," taking the article as part of the noun, and the whole as a proper name. Thenius suggests that he may have been placed with the governor of the city for the purpose of military education.

5. A descendant of Shelah the son of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 22). The Vulgate rendering of this name by Securus, according to its etymology, as well as of the other names in the same verse, is very remarkable. The Hebrew tradition, quoted by Jerome (Quaest. Hebr. in Paral.) and Rashi (Comm. in loc.), applies it to Mahlon, the son of Elimelech, who married a Moabitess. The expression rendered in A. V., "who had the dominion (יְרֵדָה, dār'ādā) in Moab," would, according to this interpretation, signify "who married in Moab." The same explanation is given in the Targum of R. Joseph.

6. A Benjamite, son of Shemaah of Gibeah (1 Ch. xii. 3). He was one of the heroes, "helpers of the battle," who resorted to David at Ziklag, and assisted him in his excursions against the marauding parties to whose attacks he was exposed (c. 21). He was probably with David in his pursuit of the Amalekites (cp. 1 Ch. xii. 21 with 1 Sam. xxx. 8, where יְרֵדָה should be "troop" in both passages). The Peshitto-Syriac, reading יְרֵדָה for יְרֵדָה, makes him the son of Ahiezer.

7. One of the officers of David's household, to whose charge were entrusted the store-houses of oil, the produce of the plantations of sycamores and the olive-yards of the lowlands of Judah (1 Ch. xxvii. 28). [W. A. W.]

JO'ASH (יְרֵדָה), a different name from the preceding; Joas; Joas, son of Becher, and head of a Benjamite house, which existed in the time of king David (1 Ch. vii. 8). [A. C. H.]

JO'ATHAM (יְוָתָם; Jotham) = Jotham the son of Uzziah (Matt. i. 9).

JOAZAB'DUS (B. Καθ'αβδος, A. καθ'αβδος; Joradus) = Jozabad the Levite (1 Esd. ix. 48; cp. Neh. viii. 7).

JOB (יֹב; A. Ἰασοῦφ, D. -β; Job), the third son of Issachar (Gen. xli. 13), called in another genealogy JASHUB (1 Ch. vii. 1, B. Ἰασσοῦφ, A. Ἰασοῦφ), which is the reading of the Sam. Codex in Genesis, and of some MSS. of the LXX.

JOB (Heb. יֹב; Greek Ἰώβ), one of the Hagiographa, of the class of literature called Khochmāh, consisting of a poetical dialogue with prologue and epilogue in prose. It is the only specimen in Hebrew of this form of composition which has been compared with Greek Tragedy,* and, less correctly, with the Makāmas of the Arabs. In respect of the matter it has analogues in the Book of Ecclesiastes and in some of the Psalms, especially Pss. xxxvii., xlix., and lxxiii.

1. Plan of the Book.—Job, in the Prologue, is represented as a man of the highest integrity and piety, and corresponding prosperity. "The Satan" in the heavenly council asserts that his worship is mercenary, and that he will blaspheme as soon as the prosperity is withdrawn. That this may be put to the proof, "the Satan" is allowed to deprive Job of all his worldly goods, including his children. This trial Job undergoes with resignation. "The Satan" then obtains permission to attack his person, and smites him with a sore disease (probably elephantiasis) from head to foot. This second test Job also endures at first resignedly, although his wife tempts him to blaspheme. Three friends then come to comfort him, and the dialogue with them occupies the bulk of the Book, divided as follows:—Job's complaint (ch. iii.); addresses to Job by the three friends, two of whom speak three times and the third twice, each speech being answered by Job (chs. iv.—xxvi.); soliloquy of Job in two parts (chs. xxvii., and chs. xxviii.—xxxii.). A fifth speaker then comes forward, who delivers four continuous discourses (chs. xxxiii., xxxiii.; ch. xxxiv.; ch. xxxv.; chs. xxxvi., xxxvii.), and is followed by the Deity "from the whirlwind," who delivers two discourses (chs. xxxviii., xxxix.; chs. xl., xli.), with brief answers from Job. In a final speech (ch. xlii. 7, 8) the Deity gives a verdict on the foregoing controversy, and we learn in the epilogue that Job was healed, and restored to a greater prosperity than he had previously possessed.

* Attempts at analysing the poem in accordance with dramatic terminology have been made by H. Hüpfeld (Deutsche Zeitschrift für christliche Wissenschaft und christliches Leben, 1850, No. 35) and F. Delltsch (Herzog's Encyclopädie, art. Höb). The justice of the comparison is discussed with great care by Gustav Baur (Theol. Studien und Kritiken, 1856, pp. 582-652), who calls it "a lyrical, or, more accurately, didactic-lyrical poem."

The original question therefore to which Job's sufferings were intended to give the answer is left undecided, or has to be inferred by the reader from the course of the dialogue; for Satan is not mentioned after the Prologue.^b Since in xlii. 6 Job prays for forgiveness, it would seem that he must in the course of the dialogue have fallen away from his sinlessness (i. 22, ii. 10); and this supposition has the support of the Targum (on ii. 10) and the Talmud of Babylon (Ilaba Bathra, f. 15 b). Nevertheless many writers (e.g. in recent times A. Hahn, S. Cox, B. Szolt) maintain that Job endures the second trial successfully to the end, whereas some (e.g. J. B. Mozley) endeavour to find an intermediate course. The difficulty of deciding this question is partly occasioned by the uncertainty of the import of the phrase יָרַךְ in i. 11, and of the degree and nature of the impiety which it implies.^c It will be assumed in the following section that the first of the foregoing accounts is the true one.

2. Scope and purpose.—Although the brilliancy and power of the dialogue are almost universally acknowledged, much difference of opinion has existed concerning the scope of the whole work, which some regard as theoretical, others as practical, with further differences among the former concerning the theorem which is proved, among the latter concerning the precept which is inculcated. The literature on this subject is very fully given by August Hahn, Commentar über das Buch Hiob (1850), pp. 5–8, and W. Volck, de summa sententia carminis Jobi (Dorpat, 1869), to whose collections little has been added of importance. It is generally agreed that the subject of the discussion is the relation of suffering to sin, and the question why the righteous suffer. To this question some suppose that no answer is given, and that the author would demonstrate that the world is not governed according to human ideas of justice. "It is the discovery of the Book of Job," says Hoffmann, "that man's suffering is greater than his sin before God." This opinion has found its most eloquent exponent in J. B. Mozley (Essays Historical and Theological, ii. 164 sqq.), who among other striking ideas suggests that the purpose of the Book in the scheme of the Bible was to prepare the Jews for a Christ who should be a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, by showing that suffering need not imply sin in the sufferer. Others suppose that the Book is a theodicy, and does attempt to justify the ways of God: in the opinion of Volck, by showing that the problems of the world are insoluble without a direct revelation, such as the Jews possessed; in that of Ewald, and more recently of W. H. Green (The Argument of the Book of Job unfolded, New York, 1874), by pointing to the doctrine of immortality; while K. Budde and Hengstenberg hold that we are to learn that the purpose of Job's suffering (and therefore of that of every righteous man) was to bring to the surface the sin that slumbered at the bottom of his heart, that he might repent of it and be forgiven. Others suppose that more than one answer is offered, the work containing merely pensées on the great question of suffering; the appearance of unity which it offers being due to interpolation and revision (so T. K. Cheyne, Joi and Solomon, 1886). Of those who suppose the Book written with a practical purpose, we may notice the theory of B. Szolt, that it is to point out generally the reflections from which a just man should seek consolation in the time of trial; that of Rübiger (de sententia primaria libri Jobi, 1861), that it teaches that real virtue should be independent of circumstances; and also theories which suppose the consolation contained in it is addressed not to an individual but to a nation: the nation allegorically personified in Job being the whole nation of Israel, according to Bruno Bauer (Die Religion des A. Testaments, ii. 478); the northern kingdom, according to Hermann von der Hardt (1728) and Hitzig; the kingdom of Judah, according to Warburton, Joannes Clericus, and Bernstein; the "Servant of the Lord," i.e. the pious kernel of the latter, according to Seinecke (Der Grundgedanke des B. Hiob, Clauthal, 1863) and Hoekstra (Theologisch Tijdschrift for 1871, pp. 1–56; see on this question Kuenen, Theol. Tijd. for 1873, pp. 493–542). On this subject the following suggestions may be made:—

(a) If the Book of Job were, as was long supposed,^d a historical record of speeches actually delivered, we should not demand from it any unity of design, but at most inquire for what purpose the discourses had been perpetuated. Viewed as a work of art, the Book may admit of similar treatment. It does not, like a Platonic dialogue, work out a definition through a series of objections, but rather portrays a scene. That scene is, the most perfect man on earth afflicted, and consoled by the wisest of his contemporaries. The hero is one who will bear affliction as well as it can be borne, and the friends persons who will administer the best of human comfort. And because neither party understands God's counsel, Job, who has the honour of proving by his conduct the sterling worth of the human race and of beating down Satan under his feet, summons God to trial for ill-treating him, and the friends maintain that Job must be suffering for some sin when in reality he is suffering because he is sinless. Both parties rely for their statements on a partial experience, grow warmer as the discussion proceeds, and heap reproaches on each other; reproaches which the reader is of course not intended to re-echo, for the poet has made all the speeches refined, dignified, eloquent, and impressive. The irony of this situation is intended to awake in the spectator the same feelings as the irony of the Greek dramas calls out; and from the Greek theatre, too, can be paralleled the procedure by which the characters are made to leave the stage still ignorant of the solution of which the spectator has from the commencement been in possession. The doctrine which the whole scene impresses is the same as that which is poetically explained in ch. xxviii.; viz., that the secret of the government of the world is not to be discovered by human research; that God possesses the solution, but what He communicates to mankind is not theoretical, but a practical law for life. Only what the poet of ch. xxviii. expresses in aphorisms, the Book itself personifies: we see on the stage human patience exhausted and human wisdom baffled; and instead of a philosophical contemplation of nature God is made to speak (somewhat as Nature in the 3rd book of Lucretius addresses mankind), asking whether the wisdom and power manifest in His works are not a guarantee of His justice when it is least apparent. The explanation of the Prologue is not given to Job, lest the reader should conclude that the same explanation holds good in every case in which men fail to get their deserts; whereas the author's doctrine is rather that in every case there is a ground, which human wisdom has no means of fathoming, and for the discovery of which submission and faith must be substituted (cp. Hupfeld, l. c. p. 286, note).

^b Hoffmann (Hiob, 1890) would read in v. 21, יְשׁוּעָה לְיִשְׂרָאֵל, with reference to i. 7. See also T. K. Cheyne in the Expositor for May 1891.

^c The best discussion of this subject is in the Dutch Commentary of Matthes, 2nd ed. pp. 18–21.

^d Modern representatives of this position are the Rev. W. Turner, Studies Biblical and Oriental, p. 170; W. H. Green, ut supra, p. 11; and, it would seem, Dr. Samuel Cox.

(b) The three friends maintain the opinion that suffering is the result of sin, and indeed proportionate to it; and that the world is morally governed in detail as well as in general. They do not represent different standpoints (this is stated in xlii. 7), but rather different sorts of persons. If Job be a historical or semi-historical personage, it is likely that his friends are such also; and the poet's purpose in bringing them to console Job will be similar to that with which Herodotus brings Solon and Croesus together. The fact that Eliphaz repeats a particular saying (iv. 17-19=xv. 15, 16) is somewhat in favour of this (Schlottmann). Or, if all the characters be fictitious, the fame of Teman for wisdom (Jer. xlix. 7; Baruch iii. 22, 23) may have been the ground for bringing the first speaker thence; the reason for the nationality of the others—Bildad the Shuhite from the Keturaean Shuah (Gen. xxv. 2), and Zophar the Naamathite (perhaps from Naamah in Judaea, Joseph. v. 41)—is less obvious.* Reuss (H Job, 1888) suggests that their coming from different regions symbolises the universality of the doctrine which they maintain. It cannot be said with exactitude that "Eliphaz relies for his statements on revelation, Bildad on the wisdom of the ancients, Zophar on common-sense"; perhaps Eliphaz is most dignified, Zophar more coarse than the others (see especially K. Budde, Beiträge zur Kritik des Buches Hiob, pp. 147-8). By introducing three representatives of the doctrine, the poet has provided variety in its treatment, and has also gained time for the development of Job's character and ideas. Similarly the three cycles of speeches do not represent fresh stages in the argument so much as progressive states of mind in the speakers.† In the first cycle all offer Job the prospect of a bright future if he will accept his chastisement and turn to God: in the second they all paint vividly the fearful end of the wicked: in the third Eliphaz accuses Job openly of crimes of which Job afterwards solemnly declares himself innocent,‡ whereas Bildad merely makes a brief reiteration of Eliphaz's maxim; by making Zophar silent the poet gives it to be understood that Job has won. By the author's making this doctrine of rewards and punishments universal, it is clear that no special polemic against the Mosaic doctrine is intended; and indeed with regard to the individual no such doctrine is taught in the Old Testament.‡ Concerning the speeches themselves, the remark of Delitzsch seems true, that "what the friends say considered in itself is true; the error lies in its inadequacy and inapplicability to the case before them." And indeed, without violent rearrangement of the text, we cannot get rid of the fact that Job himself repeats some part of what they have said, and that in some places they even anticipate the Deity.

(c) The eleven discourses of Job are not progressive, nor do they answer directly his interlocutors' addresses, but present the expression of different emotions. "The elevation of Job's conception of God into a higher unity is the goal of the development of the drama" (Delitzsch), but a goal which is not reached till the very end. Job is represented as "accusing God in order that he may justify himself" (xl. 8): the curses heaped on his birthday (ch. iii.), and the prayer for death from the standpoint of a re-

* If Derenbourg's conjecture about Uz (v. infra) be correct, perhaps וְיָזַע may be meant to suggest וְיָזַע, "to meditate." W. H. Green, l. c. p. 264, thinks the names Ram and Buz in Elithu's pedigree suggest a land of divine intervention as opposed to the land of the highest earthly wisdom. Other conjectures in Wright, p. 138.

† The statements e.g. of B. Szolt (Baltimore, 1886) that the first cycle deals with the particular, the second with the general, and that in the first it is argued that all suffering is for sin and in the second that all sin is punished, are not justified by close analysis.

‡ Yet the view of Szolt that xlii. 5 sqq. are a supposed quotation of what God would say has much in its favour.

§ K. Stüder (Das Buch Hiob für Geistliche, Bremen, 1881) endeavours to prove the contrary; cp. Senecke, l. c. pp. 1-7. See on the other side, Hengstenberg (1870), i. 26, 27.

ligion in which God was the God of the living, exhibit the state of mind of one who is near abandoning God (Räbiger). He denies the moral government of the world (ix. 22, 23); attributes to God a spiteful design in creating him (x. 13); summons God to judgment against Himself (xvi. 18, 19); complains bitterly that God does not appear at his demand (xxiii. 8, 9); and, it would seem, somewhat exaggerates his calamities (chs. xxix., xxx.). These bitter utterances are mixed with pathetic and even affectionate appeals; just as his addresses to his friends are composed of angry reproaches and of applications for sympathy. "Of this compound character is the complaint of angry Job, charging the Divine government of the world with injustice. He sees a world in disorder, and, looking simply to the responsibility of absolute power, he lays the blame of it on the Divine Possessor of that power. But simultaneously with this charge came a recollection of God's absolute goodness. He thus alternates from anger to love, and from blame to adoration; with fiery quickness the indignant complaint darts from him, and immediately he is a tender suppliant, according as his idea of responsible power, or according as his whole religious conviction, including the belief of God's absolute goodness, is expressed" (Mozley, Essays, ii. 218). The main position of Job, however, is that human justice is greater than God's (ix. 21, 22); in this sense he is said to represent a school (xxv. 4 b; cp. xxiv. 8, xxii. 15).

(d) Job's complaints culminate in xix. 6, where he gives a verdict in his own case against God, Whom in xiii. 22 he had formally summoned to trial. This prepares the way for the Theophany, the necessity of which had already been indicated by Zophar (xi. 5); and that Job's calling God to judgment is the most important result of the dialogue is shown by the numerous allusions to it (e.g. by Elihu, xxxiii. 7, 13). The Deity, however, does not appear in the Theophany, as Job had desired, as an equal antagonist (xiii. 19-22), in order to justify His conduct; nor, as Zophar had wished, to prove to Job that his punishment was not so great as he had deserved; but to bring home to Job by a series of ironical questions the truth that finite power and knowledge have no rights against infinite power and knowledge; and that those for whom the arrangement of the universe is an impenetrable mystery, and who are too weak to grapple with God's creatures, must not criticise His doings or array themselves against Him. Hence of the two discourses put into the mouth of Jehovah the first deals mainly with His wisdom, the second with His power. There is psychological truth also in the reflection of Mozley (p. 219), that as "in very truth mere power wins by subduing, and the intense consciousness that some one has the absolute power to do what he will with us puts us into the position of love to him; making us imagine him as our benefactor and friend, because we turn beforehand his absolute choice of saving or destroying, into the alternative most favourable to ourselves: just so the power of the Almighty Maker and Governor of the world impresses Job; such amazing power softens him."

In the Epilogue Jehovah fulfils the wish expressed by Job in xvi. 21 that He would decide between Job and God and between Job and his friends. Both Job and they in the dialogue had assumed that God is under some obligation to reward a man according to his works; and Job finding himself not so recompensed accuses God of injustice, whereas the friends, supposing that God must be just, accuse Job on no other evidence than that of his sufferings of indefinite crimes. The verdict in the Theophany (xlii. 7) makes it clear that the latter standpoint is more to be condemned than the former; and that the wilful rejection of experience in favour of a preconceived notion is more culpable than a blasphemous conclusion arrived at in accordance with a partial experience. Hence, as Job had predicted (xiii. 7-11), the friends are more severely rebuked than he; and the fact that Job intercedes for them before his restoration (xlii. 10) is a sign of his complete submission, and also a convincing proof of his innocence (cp. xi. 13).

3. Authorship, time, and place of composition.
—To these questions very different answers were given by the early Rabbis, whose opinions are recorded in the Talmud (Bab. Baba Bathra, 14-16), although the favourite hypothesis ascribed the Book to Moses; possibly, as Im. Deutch suggests (de Elihu sermonum originæ auctore, Breslau, 1873), because there was a tradition that God revealed to Moses on Sinai the reason why men were not always recompensed according to their works (B. Berachoth, 7 a), and this Book seemed to deal with the problem. With equal arbitrariness Heman the Ezrahite, Solomon, Isaiah, Baruch, Ezra, and, most recently, Jeremiah have been suggested as authors. The question whether Job had any existence, mythical or historical, is closely connected with these. The LXX. translator who identified him with the Idumean king Jobab (Gen. xxxvi. 33, 34), was misled by a similarity of name which belongs to the Greek rather than to the Hebrew form. An early critic (Resh Lakesh in Baba Bathra, l. c.) suggested that the Book of Job was altogether a parable; and some of the later Rabbis allow this to be a possible view, although they do not ordinarily regard it with favour. Modern writers who regard Job as a purely imaginary character (e.g. Reuss, Merx, Hengstenberg) insist mainly on the numerical symmetry of his family, possessions, and calamities, which points to the efforts of the fancy; and urge against those (e.g. Ewald, Renan, Schlottmann) who would endeavour to sever the historical from the fictitious elements in the Book, that enough is not left of the former to constitute a myth, much less a record.

If Job be a creation of this Book, it must be earlier, and indeed much earlier, than Ezekiel, who (xiv. 14) mentions Job among the three perfect men, it might seem with special reference to xxii. 30 and xlii. 9. If on the other hand he be mythical or historical, the passage of Ezekiel throws no light on this question.¹

² Bernstein, Ueber das Alter u. s. v. des Buches Hiob, in Kell and Tschirner's Analekten, 1813, p. 13, suggested that the passage of Ezekiel was interpolated. A stranger conjecture is offered by Bunsen, Gott in der Geschichte, i. 473.

This last alternative has in its favour the fact that the name Iyōb (although its similarity to ōyēb, "an enemy," is played upon in xiii. 24 and elsewhere) has no etymological appropriateness to the situation,¹ whether it be interpreted from the Hebrew, "the attacked one," or from the Arabic, "the returner," as the Prophet Mohammed seems to suggest.² It is also maintained (without due ground) that the invention of character is alien from the methods of the ancients, who preferred borrowing their heroes from the man of current tradition. The allusions to historical events which some critics (e.g. Ewald, Hitzig, Wright) have endeavoured to find are too vague to afford any note of time; and the same must be said of the state of society described (e.g. in x. 24). A terminus a quo is given by the mention of the gold of Ophir (xxviii. 16), with the use of Ophir as a name of gold (xxii. 24), which points to some post-Solomonic period; whereas a terminus ad quem is given by the use of the name Satan without the article in 1 Ch. xxi. 1 (circa 400 B.C.), which must evidently be a later usage than that with the article which appears in this Book and Zechariah. In default of other evidence, special attention has been paid to the parallels between this Book and the rest of the Old Testament,³ which are very numerous. In most, if not all, of these, it is uncertain whether the ideas are borrowed by or from the author of Job; but little force can be assigned to the à priori argument urged by Canon Cook, that if the author of Job be supposed in most of these cases to be the borrower, his work becomes a kind of cento; for in a highly artificial poem of this sort (to judge from the Arabic Makāmas) one of the beauties would naturally consist in reminiscences of the classics. Of the hemistichs which are common to Job and other Books, the most noticeable are (1) xii. 19=Isaiah xli. 20; here it seems certain that Job is quoting the prophet, for otherwise it is difficult to understand why the name ḥīlī, which is elsewhere (cp. however xxviii. 28) avoided in the dialogue, should be employed; and (2) Job xiv. 11, which would seem to be a quotation of Isaiah xix. 5: in the case of (3) Job xii. 21 and (4) Job xii. 24 b, it seems more probable that the writer of Job quoted Ps. cvii. 40 in two separate passages, than that the author of the Psalm united two hemistichs of Job into a verse. It seems probable that the author of Job had before him both parts of Isaiah (cp. besides Is. lviii. 2 with Job xxi. 14; Is. lix. 4 with xv. 35; Is. lx. 6 with xxii. 11). His relation to Jeremiah has been much more questioned. The most important passage is Job iii. 3-26 compared with Jer. xx. 14-18; whereas most critics (e.g. Renan, Reuss, Volck) regard Jeremiah as the imitator, it has been urged (with more reason) by Kleinert (Theol. Stud. u. Krif. 1886, p. 272) and Hoffmann (Hiob, 1890, p. 30) that the imaginary situation is far more likely to be an imitation than the real one. The other parallels with Jeremiah (e.g. vi. 23 with Jer. xv. 21, vi. 20 with Jer. xiv. 3, xviii. 19 with Jer. xiv. 11), and especially with the Lamentations, make it probable that the author had Jeremiah before him also. Of the minor Prophets he would seem to have made use of Hosea (cp. xiii. 2 with Job xv. 2, xiii. 12 with Job xiv. 17) and Amos (cp. i. 11 with Job xv. 9, according to Szolt's explanation). The question whether he employed Zechariah or not is of some importance. Besides such parallels as Zech. ix. 3 with Job xxvii. 16, and ix. 14 with Job xx. 5, Hoffmann (l. c. pp. 31-34) points to the heavenly council (Zech. i. 9, iii. 1; cp. Job i. 6), the person of "the Satan" (Zech. iii. 1; regarded by Hoffmann as an invention of the Prophet), the crown (Zech. vi. 11; Job xxxi. 36), and finds Zechariah everywhere original. Great attention has also been paid to the parallels with the Proverbs, which the author of Job would seem to have possessed in their existing form: thus Job xv. 7 seems definitely to refer to Prov. viii. 24, the simile of vi. 3 finds its explanation in a reminiscence of Prov. xxvii. 3, iii. 25 seems consciously modelled on Prov. x. 24. (The attempt of Barth [v. infra] to prove that the author of Job was acquainted with the "first collection" of Proverbs [i.-xxv.], but not with the second, must be regarded as unsuccessful.) The parallels with the Psalms are especially numerous, and these too the author may have possessed in their present form: e.g. Job x. 9 sqq. might seem to be suggested by Ps. cxxxviii. 8, followed by Ps. cxxxix., and Job xxv. 14 to follow a worse reading of Ps. xxxvii. 6. The evidence therefore of the parallels would seem to be in favour of a very late date, e.g. the Persian period to which the Book is assigned by Vatke, Bruno Bauer, Cheyne, Hoffmann; the brilliancy of the language must in this case be accounted for by a hypothetical renaissance, or an endeavour on the part of the writer to renovate the Hebrew language. Many others place it somewhat earlier, during the Babylonian captivity (so Graetz, C. P. Tiele); the large majority of critics at some period prior to Jeremiah (Renan, Ewald, Reuss, Merz, Hitzig, Barth, Volck); Hahn, Schlottmann, and Delitzsch, in the Solomonic age; Vaihinger somewhat earlier (see F. Barth, Ueber die Entstehungszeit des Buches Hiob, Jahresbericht des Rabbin. Seminars für das orthodoxe Judenthum, Berlin, 5634; T. K. Cheyne, Job and Solomon, 1886; F. Seyring, Die Abhängigkeit der Sprüche Salomons Cap. i.-ix. vom Hiob, Halle, 1889).

² Hahn suggests "the enemy of the gods;" J. Derenbourg (Revue des Etudes Juives, 1880, p. 5), "the complainer," from the root ḥīl = ḥīl; Wright (p. 134), from the same root + ḥīl privative, "the non-exultant." Other conjectures are collected by Carpovius, Introd. ii. 32.

The place of composition is no less uncertain. A suggestion made by Ibn Ezra (on ii. 12), which however has found little favour, was that the Book was a translation: in this case there would be some ground for supposing the "land of Uz" (see below) to be the country of the author as well as of his hero. The descriptions of the crocodile and hippopotamus (in chs. xl. and xli.), supposing them to be genuine, would point to Egypt (although some scholars profess to detect errors in these descriptions); and Hitzig and Hirzel insist that the Book has throughout an Egyptian colouring, in illustration of which the former points to iii. 14, 15 (according to Ewald's interpretation), vii. 12, viii. 11, ix. 11, xii. 21, xiv. 11, xxviii. 10, xxix. 18, xxxi. 36, xxxix. 19. A few more phrases which tell of Egypt are noticed in the commentary of Canon Cook; and Studer suggests that the simile of the white of an egg in vi. 6 (supposing that to be the true interpretation) would be more naturally drawn in Egypt than in Palestine (cp. Delitzsch). Those who maintain that the author was a contemporary of Jeremiah suppose him to have fled to Egypt with the other Israelites whose flight is recorded by Jer. xliii. 7. Much of this Egyptian colouring is, however, clearly fallacious, as Hengstenberg (pp. 51, 52) shows; nor are the arguments by which the author is shown to have lived in the South of Judaea (by Schlottmann and others) more valid.* The use of the Jordan in xl. 23, as an example of a great river, makes it more likely that the author lived in Palestine; and the à priori arguments urged by Hengstenberg in favour of Jerusalem as the place of composition have considerable force. The locality of the hero, the "land of Uz," is also very doubtful. The LXX. (after xlii. 17) places it on the boundaries between Idumaea and Arabia; this may have been suggested by Lam. iv. 21, where the daughter of Edom is described as dwelling in the land of Uz. Sprenger (Das Leben und die Lehre des Mohammed, iii. 205) places it yet further south, near the later Jewish settlement Khaibar. A tradition which can be traced up to about 300 A.D. makes the land of Uz part of Batanaea in the Hauran (see Wetzstein in Delitzsch's Commentary, E. T. ii. 395-447). Friedrich Delitzsch (Zeitschrift für Keilschriftforschung, ii. 87-98), on the authority of cuneiform inscriptions, removes it further north towards Palmyra; and also discovers from inscriptions the localities of Shuah and Buz. The theory of J. Derenbourg (Revue des Études Juives, vol. i.) that Uz is merely a symbolical name, signifying the land of Uz , or "the Divine counsel," has much to recommend it; and would agree with the opinion of Hoffmann (Hieb, p. 35), that the author may have known as little as we of the locality. An old opinion (Rashi) that the "land of Uz" is a poetical name for Aram or Syria has still many adherents.

4. Range of ideas.—The consistency which the author maintains with regard to the patriarchal age in which he places the story has won much admiration. To this belong the age of Job (xlii. 16), the nature of his wealth (i. 3 compared with Gen. xii. 16), the coin mentioned in xlii. 21 (cp. Gen. xxxiii. 19), and the musical instruments to which incidental allusion is made (xxi. 12, xxx. 31, compared with Gen. iv. 21, xxxi. 27). The shortness of life of which the speakers sometimes complain when comparing their lives with those of their ancestors (viii. 9) corresponds with the diminished longevity of the later patriarchs. It is possible, as Schlottmann suggests, that Job is represented as a strange prince, like Abraham, living among a heathen population (cp. xxix. 7); but it is more probable that he is a member of an aristocracy (ch. xxix.): to the oppressed and subject castes which are described in chs. xxiv. and xxx. it is difficult to find in the Old Testament an exact analogue. The only form of idolatry alluded to is star-worship (xxxi. 27; xii. 6 must not be interpreted of idolatry), perhaps a trait of antiquity. The head of the family is represented as performing priestly functions (chs. i., xlii.), modelled, it would seem, on those performed by Balak, the Moabite king (Derenbourg, l. c.; Wright); and in the only mention that is made of priests (xii. 19) the context implies that prince-priests are signified. The ancient Versions find an allusion to concubinage in xix. 17; and polygamy would seem to be referred to in xxvii. 15.† Nevertheless the state of things with which the author is familiar is rather the advanced civilisation of the Solomonic or post-Solomonic age (Bernstein, l. c., p. 81 sqq.): to this belong the war-horse (xxxix. 18-25), the taste for the precious metals and precious stones (xxii. 24-26, &c.), the elaborate forms of judicial procedure (ix. 33, xvii. 3, 4, xxxi. 37; see especially Kleinert, Das spezifisch Hebräische im Buch Hiob in Theologische Stud. u. Krit. 1886, p. 274), writing on stone, lead, and parchment (ix. 23, xxxi. 36), sealing-clay (xxxviii. 14), glass (xxviii. 17). Existing literature is noticed in xxxvi. 24, and perhaps xxi. 29. Wetzstein has endeavoured to trace special allusions to the customs of the Hauran in xxi. 32, xxiv. 5-8, 16, 24, xxx. 3-6; the mention of the customs of the Israelites would seem to be intentionally avoided by the author (unless the Uz of xix. 25 and the "vows" of xxii. 27 be considered to fall under this head; the Mosaic law of inheritance, Num. xxxvi. 8, seems purposely contradicted in xlii. 15); the existence of a written law is dimly indicated in vi. 10, xxi. 14, xxiii. 12; no reference is made to the national history; and the passages in which patriarchal history is thought to be noticed (xviii. 15, the Cities of the Plain; xxii. 16, the Flood; xxxi. 33, Adam) all admit of other interpretations. It was owing to the apparent oblivion of Israel that many writers supposed the author to have been an Idumæan or Arab (an idea refuted by Bernstein, l. c.). Among the peculiar characteristics of the Book should be noticed the astronomical allusions (ix. 9, xxxviii. 31-33), regarded by some writers as indicating Arabian authorship, which show the author in possession of a somewhat fuller and more developed nomenclature than appears elsewhere in the Bible, and also familiar with some astronomical myths,‡ such as are found among other nations; a similar myth would seem to be the destruction of Rahab and Rahab's helpers (ix. 13, xxvi. 12), and of the Leviathan whom conjurers can wake up (iii. 8; cp. xvi. 13); compare also the phrases xviii. 13, 14,

† That the supposed patriarchal colouring is confined to details is brought out by Bruno Bauer, l. c. p. 494. and Kuenen, l. c.

‡ This is emphatically denied by Hengstenberg, l. i. 127. &c.

* Grätz, Geschichte der Juden, ii. 33, supposes the work to have been composed in Babylon.

xxxiii. 22. The stores of snow and hail provided against the day of war and battle (xxxix. 23) belong to this class of idea. Somewhat after the style of the Arabic poets, too, are the accurate descriptions of the habits of the animals of the desert, and of physical phenomena, in which the author delights: "It would not be too much to say," writes Baur (l. c. p. 621), "that as many descriptions of nature are crowded together in Job as can be found in the whole Bible." These passages are collected by G. H. Gilbert, in The Poetry of Job (Chicago, 1889), who has attempted to analyse their beauties. The frequent reference to Angels deserves notice: they are called the Sons of God (both in the Prologue, i. 6, and in the dialogue, xxviii. 7), Holy Ones (v. 1, xv. 15), God's Servants (iv. 18), Angels. The context in which they are mentioned would seem to imply that they are co-ordinate, and in a manner identified with the heavenly bodies (compare xxv. 5 with iv. 18). Their power of mediation is especially dwelt on by Elihu in xxxiii. 23 (a very remarkable passage), and perhaps alluded to by Eliphaz in v. 1.* Although superior to mankind, their imperfections and infirmities are often dwelt on. From these Angels it is (to some) difficult to separate "the Satan," whose name would seem to suggest the double function of "accuser" and "wanderer;" that he in no way represents an evil power, antagonistic to the Divine power, such as appears in the Zoroastrian religion, is now largely affirmed; Hoffmann finds the advance in the conception of his personality which appears in this Book in the fact that he carries out physical evil, whereas in 1 Ch. xxi. 1 and 1 Sam. xvi. 14-23 he only suggests moral evil. This latter function would seem to be indicated in ii. 2. The doctrine of a resurrection is mentioned (xiv. 13-15) as a possible solution of the difficulties of the moral government of the world, but emphatically rejected; it is not probable that there is any reference to it in the locus classicus, ch. xix. 25-28 (the literature on which is collected by Stichel, de Goele commentatio, Jena, 1832; Volck, l. c., p. 6 sqq.; and Hirzel and Hitzig, ad loc.). The doctrine of "original sin" is not unfrequently indicated, but nowhere clearly analysed. A highly advanced and spiritual code of morals is taught by the author in ch. xxxi., with a remarkable distinction between "capital" offences and others (vv. 10, 28). Of "scepticism" properly so called (Bruch, p. 191) no accurate analysis will find any trace (cp. Kleinert, Das spezifisch Hebräische im Buch Hiob): the words of Job in xlii. 2 imply that he required the Theophany not in order to be convinced of God's existence, but to receive a personal assurance that the world was morally governed. (For an analysis of the ideas of the Book of Job on God, the world, mankind, morality, and the future, see Bruch, Weisheitslehre der Hebräer, 1851, pp. 199-226.)

5. Integrity.—The integrity of the Book of Job, like that of other Books of the Old Testament, has been the subject of much discussion. A large number of verses were omitted in the

LXX. translation (§ 7 a), and Dr. Hatch (Studies in Biblical Greek, p. 215 sqq.) endeavours to show that these formed no part of the original text, but were interpolations in the Hebrew copies. The subscription after ch. xxxi., "the words of Job are ended" (if genuine), might also imply that the work once ended there. Modern criticism has especially attacked the following portions:—

(a) The speeches of Elihu* (chs. xxxii.-xxxvii.). The genuineness of these was first disputed by Stuhlmann (Hiob, 1804), with whom Eichhorn and Bernstein (l. c. pp. 130-132) agreed, and is denied by most modern critics. The speeches of Elihu differ from the others (1) in the length of the poems, (2) in quoting the words of Job, (3) in addressing Job by name, (4) in following each other continuously without answers from Job. Moreover (5), no allusion is made either in the prologue or epilogue to "Elihu, the son of Barachel," whose names, unlike the others, follow Jewish nomenclature, and whose tribe (Buz) seems suggested by that of Job (Uz: see Gen. xxii. 21), while his family (Ram, "the exalted") would seem to contain an allusion to xxxi. 34, and to be intended to prevent any misconception arising from the name Buz ("contempt"); the syntax of iii. 1 also almost excludes the existence of a fourth friend. Although, however, these chapters might be omitted without their loss being directly felt, "the whirlwind" of xxxviii. 1 may well be the whirlwind described in ch. xxviii., and it should not be argued that the opening words of the Theophany (ch. xxxviii. 2), which evidently refer to Job, show that another speaker cannot have intervened; for the speech of Job may still be uppermost in the hearer's mind. The argument from the language urged by many writers against the speeches has been refuted by Stichel (Das Buch Hiob, 1842) and K. Budde (Beiträge zur Kritik des Buches Hiob, p. 92 sqq.), who, by a careful series of arithmetical calculations, proves that the vocabulary of these discourses does not differ in character from that of any other portion of the Book; and, indeed, the similarity of expression is so striking that many who have regarded these speeches as constituting no portion of the original work have supposed them to be an addition by the author himself (e.g. Renan, Wright); their occasional obscurity and apparent incoherence may be reasonably ascribed to corruptions of the text. The argument drawn especially by Renan, Delitzsch (in Herzog's Encyclopädie, vi. 132), and Volck (who once maintained their genuineness), from the want of poetical power and vigour displayed in them, depends too much on personal taste to have much weight in the discussion. It must be added that the judgments passed on Elihu both in the Christian (cp. Schlottmann, p. 53 sqq.) and in the Jewish Church (Deutsch, l. c. pp. 14, 15) have been very various: while some think his speeches a mere cento collected from the rest of the Book, others regard him as the one wise speaker on the stage; and different writers have identified him with Christ and with Satan (the clever essay of Voigtländer in Keil and Tzschirner's Analekten, 1813, p. 27, in which this last view is maintained, deserves notice). It is now, however, generally agreed that Elihu does represent a different standpoint from the friends, and really provides a solution of the problem which they discuss. Whereas they supposed that punishment implied sin, and was proportionate to the sin, he regards it as necessary to perfection, and therefore most likely to overtake the relatively most perfect. This position is best explained by Hengstenberg (i. p. 8), who does not differ materially from other defenders of these speeches (Bruno Bauer, Budde, Im. Deutsch, M. Bölicke, Die Elihu Reden, &c., Halle, 1879; C. Claussen, Das Verhältniss der Lehre des Elihu zu derjenigen der drei Freunde Hiobs, in the Zeitschr. für kirchliche Wissenschaft und kirchliches Leben, 1884, pp. 505-515).¹ This doctrine of perfection by suffering, or, as Hengstenberg terms it, "the mystery of the Cross," is regarded by these writers as the true solution of the problem of the Book; and they suppose it to be put in the mouth of Elihu rather than in that of the Deity, "because it would not have comported with the Divine dignity for the infinite God to place Himself on a level with His dependent creature and enter into an argument with him" (W. H. Green, l. c. p. 260). This explanation seems unsatisfactory, because it makes the speeches of the Deity superfluous; and as such Hengstenberg seems to regard them when he says (i. 22) that "the importance of the Theophany consists in the fact that God appears, not in what He says." Hence Simson (Zur Kritik des Buches Hiob, 1861, p. 34) and others who regard the standpoint of Elihu as an advance on that of the original author reject the speeches on that account; and the description of them as a "first theological criticism on the contents of the Book" (T. K. Cheyne) is the most probable. It should be added that the doctrine of the "mystery of the Cross" is only taught in certain portions of Elihu's discourse; and the nature of the rest corresponds sufficiently well with the theory that some reader, finding in the Book many sayings which bordered on blasphemy not sufficiently refuted by the friends, nor retracted by Job in ch. xxvii., thought proper to collect these offensive sayings, and in the person of Elihu expressly to refute them.

* A remarkable suggestion about this passage is made by W. H. Koeters on p. 117 of his essay, Het ontstaan en de ontwikkeling der Angelologie onder Israel (Theol. Tijdschrift, x. 34-69, 113-141), to which reference may generally be given.

* The literature on this question (down to 1873) is given most fully by Immanuel Deutsch, l. c. pp. 21-23.

(b) Chapters xl. 15-xli. 26 (description of the hippopotamus and the crocodile). The spuriousness of ch. xli. 4-26 was suggested by Stuhlmann (l. c. p. 183), who made some further alterations; Eichhorn (Einleitung, v. 207) followed him, and added xl. 15-xli. 3 to the athetesis. This was approved by Ewald (Tübinger Theol. Jahrb. 1843, p. 740 sqq.), whose grounds are also stated in his Commentary (E. T. p. 318 sqq.), and of more modern writers by Dillmann, Simson (Zur Kritik des Buches Hiob, p. 24), Wright, Cheyne, and Grill. These examples are thought inappropriate, because the omnipotence of God in the government of the world rather than His omnipotence in creation is the point to be proved; and fault is found with the length and minuteness of the descriptions, in which the person of the Speaker is almost forgotten. Some scholars have regarded the animals described as fabulous. The purpose of the interpolator is supposed to have been "to strengthen the argument of the Deity by the description of powerful creatures which indicate the omnipotence of the Creator" (Grill). Bunsen. Gott in der Geschichte, i. 497, arranged the passage as follows: xl. 15-26; xl. 1-14.

(c) Chapter xxviii. is regarded as a later addition by Knobel, Reus, Cheyne, Grill, and others. It gives an interesting description of mining operations, which, difficult and elaborate as they are, are insufficient to produce Wisdom, which is only to be found with God, Who has given to man no part of it but the practical rule to fear Him. The chapter is isolated, and would seem to contain an independent answer to the problem of the Book, not different from the final answer, but surprising in Job's mouth.

(d) Chapter xxvii. 7-23. This passage is one of the most difficult in the Book, for in it Job would appear to adopt the standpoint which he has been combating throughout. Kennicott, followed by several modern critics (e.g. Reus, Hoffmann, Cheyne), assigned this passage to Zophar, who according to the traditional arrangement speaks twice only; and Grätz (Monatschrift, 1872, p. 246) assigns to him ch. xxviii. also. (Bruch, Weisheitslehre der Hebräer, p. 170, would transpose xxvi. 5-14 after xxvii. 23.) Bernstein, Wellhausen, and Grill delete it, as the work of an interpolator, who desired to put into Job's mouth an acknowledgment of the Divine justice. If the passage be retained, the view of Hitzig and others that Job is here quoting the theory of his opponents seems preferable to that of Ewald and Delitzsch, according to which he adopts it in a modified form.

(e) The Prologue and Epilogue were obelized (after a suggestion of A. Schultens) by Stuhlmann, Bernstein, De Wette, and more recently by C. P. Tiele: Prof. Cheyne is inclined to regard them as belonging to a prose Book of Job, which the poet may have made the basis of his composition. They differ from the rest of the work chiefly in the use of the name יְהוָה for the Deity, who is called in the Book itself אֱלֹהִים, אֱלֹהֵי, rarely אֱלֹהִים, and in recognising ritual observances, of which the moral code of ch. xxxi. takes no notice. However, without the Prologue, the situation is unintelligible: and it is difficult to separate the Epilogue from it, although the latter has offended the taste of many, and is characterised by a certain irony.

(f) The verses 38-40 of ch. xxxi. would seem to be displaced, and are transposed by Delitzsch and many others after vv. 8, 25 or 34.

For further atheteses, see Grill, Zur Kritik der Komposition des Buches Hiob (Tübingen, 1890), who would also omit xii. 4-xiii. 2; xxiv. 5-9, 14-21; xxvi. 2-xxvii. 1; xxix., xxx., xxxi. 1: T. K. Cheyne, Job and Solomon; and J. G. Hoffmann, Hiob (1890). The striking reconstruction by Studer (Bremen, 1881) also deserves notice: perhaps the most attractive suggestion which it contains is that chs. xxx., xxx. constituted the original Prologue.

6. The language.—The language of the Book of Job is rich and classical; and the author possesses a peculiar felicity of expression, and, like Ezekiel, delights in displaying the wealth of the Hebrew language. The rhetorical devices of the Arabic poets are employed, but with moderation; e.g. paronomasia (xx. 27, 28; xxii. 24, 25; xxiv. 18; xxix. 4; xxxi. 33, 34), attempts at rhyme (xxvii. 23; xxviii. 8; xxxi. 3), double entendres (xxix. 18; xxx. 4; xxxi. 7, with reference to Deut. xiii. 17), employment of the same word in different senses (xi. 7; probably xxii. 30, xxiv. 17, xxxi. 10). Much has been said of the Arabisms of Job, which were noticed even by Jerome (Praef. in Daniel.), who professes to interpret the Book with the aid of the Syriac and Arabic (Praef. in Iobum). This "Arabism" appears (1) in the employment of certain Hebrew roots in their Arabic senses, e.g. עָטַף, "to turn aside," xxiii. 9; צָרַק, "to speak truly," xxxiii. 12; הִתְמַלְמַל, "to form companies," xvi. 10; בָּטָן, "tribe," xix. 17 (Kosegarten); הָרָא, "fall," xxxvii. 6; אִסָּר, "business," xx. 29, xxii. 28, &c. (2) in the employment of certain grammatical forms which resemble the Arabic rather than the Hebrew idiom, e.g. לִמְוֹ, xxxiii. 21; מְנַהֵז—similarly פָּקַד, xxxv. 15 (Delitzsch) מְסַרְוֵב xxi. 4, seem to follow Arabic syntax: (3) in the employment of vocables existing in Arabic, but not found elsewhere in Hebrew literature, e.g. פַּחְרִים, "thighs," xl. 17; קְנָצִי, "nets," xxviii. 2; עֲנִישָׁה, "aneezing," xli. 10; רִי, xxxvii. 11 (Delitzsch; see a list given by Böttcher, Ausf. Lehrs. i. p. 16). Bernstein is right in saying that these Arabisms do not differ in quality from those which are to be found in other Books of the Bible, and are to be explained by the original affinity of the Semitic dialects and the fact that our knowledge of Hebrew is fragmentary. It is by something of an exaggeration therefore that Delitzsch and Wetzstein speak of the dialect of this Book as "Hauranitic" or "Hebrew-Arabic," and the best critics have been sober in their employment of the Arabic vocabulary in its interpretation. Equally important therefore are the Aramaisms (most fully collected by Bernstein, l. c. pp. 49-79), which some critics have endeavoured, but without success, to distinguish from those which are to be found in the later Books of the Bible generally. It is remarkable that in xviii. 20 the author desiring a synonym for witness (Heb. עָד) borrows one from the Aramaic (שָׁהִד), without accommodating it to Hebrew vocalism. The speeches of Elihu are especially replete with Aramaisms (e.g. xxxvi. 2, כָּתַר וְאֲחֹרֶךְ (תָּעִיר וְאֲחֹרֶךְ); but attempts which have been made to show that the other speakers are distinguished by their dialect (see e.g. Hitzig on iv. 6, viii. 8, 11, 17) are evidently fanciful. A few words are explained by scholars from the Aethiopic (e.g. תְּהִלָּה, iv. 18, according to Dillmann); and besides the Egyptian words in the verses noticed above, the Egyptian name for "crocodile" seems certainly alluded to in xl. 25. There remain, however, a great number of hapax legomena which have not as yet been illustrated from any dialect, and the meaning of which was unknown to the ancient translators. Great similarity has otherwise been traced between the Hebrew of Job and that of the Book of Proverbs.

The orthography throughout shows some peculiarities, such as the omission of matres lectionis, e.g. יָצַי, i. 21; the contraction of consonantal h, e.g. הַמָּה, viii. 21; interchange of h and h, e.g. יָמְלָה, viii. 21: all of which appear also in the Elihu discourses.

Jerome states that in the original the dialogue was written in "hexameters, composed of dactyls and spondees, sometimes admitting other feet, not of the same syllables, but of the same metrical value," yet occasionally rhythmus ipse dulcis et tinnuus fertur numeris lege metri solutus; and he refers to the ordinary authorities (Josephus, Philo, and Origen) in proof of these assertions. These metres Bickell in his Carmina Hebraica has attempted to restore; a somewhat more elaborate attempt has been made by G. H. B. Wright (see the explanation in his translation of Job, pp. 23-31), whereas Prof. Briggs and Merx have attempted simpler analyses. Strophic arrangements of different sorts have been introduced by Köster (1831), Delitzsch, Merx (1872), and others.

7. Ancient Versions.—(a) The SEPTUAGINT translation was the work of a writer well versed in Greek literature; among the authors whom he occasionally imitates are Homer, Aeschylus, and perhaps Apollonius Rhodius and Callimachus (E. Egli in Rheinisches Museum, xii. 444-448); his language, however, is not free from the dialectic peculiarities of the LXX. His knowledge of Hebrew (if, indeed, he had the original before him) must have been very slight; and although he sometimes interprets words after the Syriac (e.g. x. 17, רָגַג; תְּהַרְוֹ לִמְוֹ), and perhaps the Arabic (e.g. xxxix. 20, נָהַר; סַרְתָּהוּ אֵלָיו; cp. Arab. نَصْر; xvi. 12, וְרָפִי; תְּהַרְוֹ לִמְוֹ), his translation is for the most part too free to be of any use for the criticism of the text, and too ignorant to be of any help in interpreting it. One trace of traditional exegesis seems to be preserved in xxix. 18, where for στέλεχος φοίνικος it is probable that φοινῆξ (i.e. the bird Phoenix) should be read. The translator follows the method of the Targums in avoiding all offensive anthropomorphisms; he makes a rhetorical addition in ii. 8, and adds an epilogue which is of some interest. These various characteristics make the middle of the 2nd century B.C. the probable date of this translation (Bickell, de indole ac ratione versionis Alexandrinae in interpretando libro Iobii, Marburg, 1862). There is no doubt that the original LXX. text was much shorter than that which has come down in our MSS.; it omitted the Hebrew verses "sometimes three or four, sometimes fourteen or nineteen" (Origenes, Ep. ad Africanum); the whole number of the omissions being reckoned by Jerome (Praef. in Iobum) at 700 or 800, by Hesychius at 600. The Greek of these verses was supplied by Origen from Theodotus, and marked by him in the Hexapla with asterisks; and they are not translated in the pre-Hexaplarian Sahidic Version, whence we learn that the whole number did not exceed 400 (Dillmann, Textkritisches zum Buche Iob in Sitzungsberichte der k. p. Akademie zu Berlin, Dec. 18, 1890). Bickell (pp. 48-50), who gave an enumeration of them from the authorities then accessible, reckoned the number at 373. An attempt is made by Hatch (Essays in Biblical Greek, pp. 220-245) to show that the verses omitted by the LXX. may have been later interpolations in the Hebrew copies (e.g. xvii. 3-5; xxi. 28-33; xxiv. 14 c-18 a; xxviii. 13-22, the last of which is quoted by Clem. Alex.); and it is certainly remarkable that many of them should occur in the speech of Elihu. We regard the opinion of Bickell (and Dillmann, who l. c. examines them in detail) that these verses were omitted arbitrarily on grounds of difficulty or of taste, as more probable.

Daughter Versions of the LXX.—Of these the Sahidic (Thebaic) was made before the recension of Origen; it exists in a MS. in the Museum Borgianum at Rome, except the last leaves, which are at Naples; the first chapter was published, with Latin translation, by Giovanni Tortoli (Atti del iv Congresso dei Orientalisti, Firenze, 1880, p. 79), who promised an edition of the whole; a project achieved by A. Ciasca (Sacrorum Bibliorum Fragmenta Copto-Sahidica, Rome, 1885). A Memphitic Version, closely following the Alexandrian MS., was published by H. Tattam (London, 1850). The critical marks of Origen are preserved in the Syro-Hexaplar Version (made A.D. 617), which exists in a Milan MS. (edited by Middeldorpf, 1835, carelessly by Ceriani 1876). This version is carefully investigated by Middeldorpf, Curae Hexaplares in Iobum, Breslau, 1817. The Armenian Version (in its printed form) closely follows the Alexandrian MS. The Aethiopic Version is in MS.; the copy in the Bodleian Library exhibits a text on the whole similar to MS. Alex., but very ignorantly rendered (e.g. ΒΙΛΔΑΘ ὁ Σαυχίτης is throughout rendered ΒΙΛΔΑΘΟΣ ΑΥΧΙΤΗΣ) and not infrequently second renderings of verses are introduced (according to Dillmann, Lex. Aeth. col. 90, "from the Syriac and Arabic;" this source however will not account for all, e.g. xxxiv. 9, where רָצַח is rendered by his running): in this case the new translation regularly precedes that which follows the LXX.

(b) Peshitto Syriac.—An account of this version, which was made directly from the Hebrew, is given by Edv. Stenij (de Syriaca Iobi interpretatione quae Peshitta vocatur, Helsingfors, 1881), who collects (1) the various readings; (2) the better readings; (3) the variants of the Hebrew text. The last are of little importance. It is the basis of the Commentary of S. Ephraem.

(c) Targum.—The best edition is by P. de Lagarde (Hagiographa Chaldaica, Leipzig, 1873). There are dissertations on it by S. Cohn (1867), A. Weiss (de libri Iobi paraphrasi Chaldaica, Breslau, 1873), and W. Bacher (in Grätz's Monatschrift, 1871, pp. 208-223). According to the last writers it is the work of a Palestinian Jew of the 4th century A.D., interpolated by a hand of the 8th century. Its variations from the Massoretic text are very remarkable.

(d) Latin Versions.—The Old-Latin was made from the Greek, and omitted the same verses. Jerome is said to have translated the Book twice, once from the Greek, where he marked verses which he had added from the Hebrew with an asterisk, verses which were wanting in the Hebrew with an obelus; and a second time from the Hebrew (Augustine, ed. Migne, ii. 242). The former of these, however, would seem to have been no more than a revision of the Old-Latin; and hence two MSS. of it preserve Jerome's critical marks,—Bodl. 2426, and a Cod. Maerli Monasterii printed in Martianaevus' edition of S. Jerome, and thence in Sabatier's Bibbl. Lat. Versiones Antiquae, vol. i., now Turonensis 18. De Lagarde (Mittheilungen, ii. 189-327) has published a text of this version with the readings of both MSS. Jerome agrees sometimes with Jewish tradition (e.g. xxviii. 6); his work has received, not undeservedly, high praise.

(e) Arabic Versions.—The Version in the Polyglott is from the Peshitto; Tattam (l. c.) made use of a MS. Version from the Coptic. The same, or a similar Version made from the Coptic, is printed by P. de Lagarde in his Psalterium Job Proverbia Arabice (Göttingen, 1876), where the Polyglott Version also is reprinted. An Arabic Version made from the LXX. (perhaps through or with the aid of a daughter Version) was described by Fleischer, ZDMG. 1864, p. 288, and afterwards edited by Baudissin (Translationis antiquae Arabicae libri Iobi quae supersunt, Lips. 1870). Arabic Versions made from the Hebrew are many; that by the Gaon Saadja (ob. 942) has been edited by Dr. J. Cohn (Altona, 1889).

8. History of Exegesis.—The Book of Job must have been much studied in early times, since we find constant imitations of it in the "Wisdom of Ben-Sira," who however makes no mention of Job (just as he makes no mention of Daniel) among the heroes of the world, although (according to the Syriac Version of xlix. 11) he refers to the passage of Ezekiel in which Job is mentioned. In the "Wisdom of Solomon," v. 10. 11 seem to be suggested by the LXX. of Job ix. 26, and in the "Psalms of Solomon" parts of Ps. iii. by Job iii. He is referred to in the Book of Tobit, and by St. James (v. 11); the Book is quoted by St. Paul (1 Cor. iii. 19 = v. 13 a) and is alluded to by Christ (Matt. xxiv. 28 = xxxii. 30). There are copious references to it in the Mishna, Talmudim, and Midrashim (collected by Rabbi Israel Schwarz in the first volume of his work תקנות אנוני, Berlin, 1868). It is assigned different places in the Canon in different lists (W. H. Proby, On certain Questions connected with the Book of Job, 1886, pp. 5-10; Carpovius, Introductio ad libros Biblicos Vet. Test. ii. 31): being regarded by some authors as a poetical book, by others as historical. The latter view is thought to have been held by Josephus (c. Apion. i. c. 10), and was long maintained in the Christian Church. Augustine (contra Prisc. et Origen. ed. Migne, viii. 676) denies that the speeches of the three friends have Divine authority, although "a man of discernment potest ex eorum verbis aliquam sanam sententiam in testimonium veritatis assumere;" but the view taken of Job was on the whole favourable; and even in the Moralia of Gregorius Magnus "the tendency to minimise Job's sin during his afflictions is clearly visible" (Schlottmann, p. 45). After Calvin (Sermon cxxix. on Job) had asserted his sin with some emphasis, Rom. Cath. and especially Jesuit theologians maintained his complete sinlessness; on the other hand, Luther was attacked by the Rom. Caths. for denying the completely historical character of the work (see Carpovius, Introd. ii. p. 34); but when after the initiative of Richard Simon freer ideas on this subject circulated among the Rom. Caths., the Protestants became stricter, and Luther's utterances were explained away (Schlottmann, pp. 6, 7 and 44, 45). The Book of Job was violently attacked in early times by Theodore of Mopsuestia (ob. 428), who regarded Job himself as a historical character, viz. a pious Edomite, but the author of the Book (whom he identified with the LXX. translator) as a vainglorious man, who, in order to parade his learning and poetical skill, had fabricated the whole of the Dialogue (Fritzsche, de Theod. Mopsuest. 1836, pp. 60, 61). A very similar attack was made on the Book in later times by Spinoza (Tract. Theol. Polit. ch. x.).

The inaccuracy of the LXX. Version impeded the understanding of the Book among the Greek fathers, whose comments are collected in the Catena of Nicetas (London, 1637); another Catena (in Latin) was published by Paulus Comitulus (Leyden, 1586, and Venice, 1587). The Commentary of Jerome, which would have been of great value, is lost; that which is printed among his writings is by Philippus Presbyter (A. D. 455). Commentaries were also written by Ambrose and Augustine. The Moralia in Jobum of Gregorius Magnus (ob. 604) was the most important of the early Latin commentaries, and is commended by G. Bradley, Lectures on the Book of Job (1887); another work with the same title was composed by Odo Cluniacensis (10th century). The earliest Jewish exposition printed is by R. Saadja Gaon (v. supra), consisting of brief notes in Arabic, not free from scholasticism: the commentary of his Karaitic opponent, R. Jepheth ibn Ali, exists in MS. in English libraries. Of early Rabbinical commentators, besides Rashi and Ibn Ezra, R. Moses b. Nachman (ob. 1270), R. Levi b. Gerson (ob. 1378), R. Simon b. Zemach (ob. circa 1400; his Comm. is called מורה נבוכים), and R. Abraham b. Farissol (born 1451) are often cited. R. Levi (Gersonides or Raibag) explained the Book philosophically, as Maimonides had done (More Nebuchim, iii. § 22), and as R. Jehudah b. Saadja (13th century) is said to have done. Some others are mentioned by Carpzov, l. c. p. 82, in the Histoire Littéraire de la France, xxvii. pp. 551-6, and in A. Neubauer's Catalogue of Hebrew MSS. in the Bodleian Library, col. 1052. Schiller-Szinessy (Catalogue, p. 40) praises very highly the Commentary of R. Berachyah existing in the Cambridge Library. The Vatican MS. 188 contains a fragment of a Cabbalistic explanation of ch. xxxviii.; fragments of an early commentary have been published with very careful notes by R. Gildemeister (Bruchstücke eines Rabbinischen Hiob-Commentars, Bonn, 1874); see also Frankel, Monatschrift, 1856, p. 223, and אוצר הדפוסים, Vilna, 1880, p. 460. The work of R. Schwarz, referred to above, embodies the Commentaries of R. Isaiah of Trani, R. R. Moses, Daniel, and Joseph Kimchi, and R. Zechariah b. Isaac of Barcelona (1160-1290). Many others have been printed in the last and the present centuries. The most recent Hebrew Commentary (by B. Szolt, Baltimore, 1886) contains much that is valuable, but entirely neglects what has been done by non-Jewish scholars. This class of exposition is represented in English by the extensive work of H. H. Bernard (The Book of Job as expounded to his Cambridge Pupils by H. H. B., edited by F. Chance, London, 1884).

More than sixty authorities, chiefly Christian commentators, were employed by A. Schultens (Leiden, 1737), who assigns the palm among Rom. Cath. scholars to Pineda (Venice, 1608), among Lutherans to Sebastian Schmid (Strasbourg, 1690). His own Commentary is monumental, not only as embodying the labours of his predecessors, but as the result of profound acquaintance with Semitic idioms, and characterised throughout by sound judgment and modesty. His application of Arabic to the interpretation of Job, although excessive, is moderate, if compared with the procedure of scholars both before and after his time. An abridged edition of his work was issued by Vogel (Halle, 1769). Of Schultens' successors De Wette (in his Introduction) is thought to have done most for the interpretation of the work as a whole: for the explanation of particular difficulties Renan (Le Livre de Job, 1860) assigns the palm to Ewald (Dichter des Alten Bundes, 1836, 2nd ed. 1866; translated in the Theological Translation Fund Library), while he specially commends for industry the Handbuch of Hirzel (Leipzig, 1839, re-edited by J. Olshausen, afterwards by A. Dillmann, 1869). The Commentary of A. Hahn (Berlin, 1850) is valuable for its grammatical analysis; that of Schlottmann (Berlin, 1851) chiefly for the varied learning of its introduction, in which parallels both to the plan and to the thought of the Book of Job are collected from the sacred literature of the Indo-Germanic races. The Biblical Commentary of F. Delitzsch (Leipzig, 1864, 2nd ed. 1876, translated in Clark's Foreign Theological Library) is justly regarded as one of the most successful of its author's productions. Much that is original and valuable was added by F. Hitzig in his Commentary (Leipzig, 1874). The posthumous work of E. W. Hengstenberg (Berlin, 1870-6) is controversial and homiletic. The most recent German commentary is by W. Volck in Strack and Zöckler's Exegetisches Handbuch (1890). The commentaries of the Rom. Caths. Welte (1849) and Zschokke (1882), and the translations of A. Merx (1871) and J. G. Hoffmann (1890), deserve mention. The most important commentary in Dutch is that by J. C. Matthes (Het boek Job vertaald en verklaard, 2nd ed., Gröningen, 1876).

Of recent English works the most elaborate is the unfinished Commentary of A. B. Davidson (Edinburgh, 1862); the Commentary in the Speaker's series is by Canon F. C. Cook (London, 1880). The work of G. H. B. Wright (The Book of Job: a new critically revised Translation, with Essays, London, 1883) is mainly critical, that of Samuel Cox (A Commentary on the Book of Job, with a new Translation, London, 1880) mainly homiletic. Some of the special literature has been noticed in the preceding sections.

JO'BAB. 1. (יָבָב): in Gen. A. יַבְבֵּב, E. יַבְבֵּב; in Ch. A. Ἰαβὰβ, B. om.: Jobab. The last of the thirteen sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 29; 1 Ch. i. 23) and the tribal father of a branch of the Joktanide clans. His name has not been discovered among the Arab names of places in Southern Arabia, where he ought to be found with the other sons of Joktan. But Ptolemy (vi. 7, 24) mentions the 'Iωβαβίται near the Sachalitaë on the S. coast of Arabia; and Bochart, followed by Salmasius and Gesenius, suggests the reading 'Iωβαβίται, by the common interchange of ρ and β. The identification is possibly correct, but it has not been connected with an Arab name of a tribe or place; and Bochart's conjecture of its being i. g.

Arab. يَبَاب, yabāb, "a desert," from يَب, though regarded as probable by Gesenius and Michaelis, seems to be unworthy of acceptance. Kalisch (Com. on Gen.) says that it is, "according to the etymology, a district in Arabia Deserta," in apparent ignorance of the famous desert near Hadhramaut, called al-Ahkāf, of proverbial terror; and the more extensive waste on the north-east of the former, called the "deserted quarter," Er-Ruba el-Khālī, which is impassable in the summer, and fitter to be called desert Arabia than the country named deserta by the Greeks. But Kautzsch definitely rejects Bochart's combination Jobabites = Jobarites (Riehm, HWB. s. v. Jobab).

2. Jobab ben Zerah, of Bozrah, the second in the list of "the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (Gen. xxxvi. 33, 34; 1 Ch. i. 44, 45). [EDOM.] An addition to the LXX. version of the Book of Job identifies him with Job, his father being Zerah son of Esau, and his mother Bosorra (Cod. Vat.) or Bossora (Cod. Al.); a name obviously derived from the Bozrah of the original text.

3. Jobab, king of Madon, an ally of Jabin king of Hazor, against Joshua (Josh. xi. 1).

4. Jobab, the name of two clans of Benjamin (1 Ch. viii. 9, 18). [E. S. P.] [C. J. B.]

JO-CHEBED (יְחֶבֶד) if of Hebrew origin = Jehovah is gloriousness [MV.¹¹]; for the Egyptian interpretation, see Nestle, Die Israelit. Eigennamen, p. 77 sq.; 'Iωχαβέδ; Jochabed), the wife and at the same time the aunt of Amram, and the mother of Moses and Aaron (Ex. vi. 20). In order to avoid the apparent illegality of the marriage between Amram and his aunt, the LXX. and Vulg. render the word dōdah "cousin" instead of "aunt" (see Knobel-Dillmann in loco). But this is unnecessary: the example of Abraham himself (Gen. xx. 12) proves that in the pre-Mosaic age a greater latitude was permitted in regard to marriage than in a later age. Moreover it is expressly stated elsewhere (Ex. ii. 1; Num. xvi. 59) that Jochebed was the daughter of Levi, and consequently sister of Kohath, Amram's father. [W. L. B.] [F.]

JO'DA ('Iωδᾶ; Vulg. om.) = Judah the Levite (1 Esd. v. 58, see Speaker's Comm. in loco; cp. Ezra iii. 9). Some words are probably omitted. The name elsewhere appears in the A. V. in the forms Hodaviah (Ezra ii. 40), Hodevah (Neh. vii. 43), Hodijah (Neh. x. 10), and Sudias (1 Esd. v. 26).

JO'ED (יְוֵד) = Jehovah is witness [MV.¹¹]; 'Iωέδ; Joed), a Benjamite, the son of Pedaiah (Neh. xi. 7). Two of Kennicott's MSS. read יְוֵד, i. e. Joezer, and two יְוֵד, i. e. Joel, confounding Joed with Joel the son of Pedaiah the Manassite. The Syriac must have read יְוֵד.

JOEL (יְחֵל) = Jehovah is God; cp. the Phoenician יְחֵל [MV.¹¹; see Nestle, Israelit. Eigennamen, p. 86]: 'Iωήλ; Joel and Johel). 1. Elders son of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Ch. vi. 33, xv. 17), and father of Heman the singer. He and his brother Abiah were made judges in Beersheba when their father was old, and no longer able to go his accustomed circuit. But they disgraced both their office and their parentage by the corrupt way in which they took bribes and perverted judgment. Their grievous misconduct gave occasion for the change of the constitution of Israel to a monarchy. It is in the case of Joel that the singular corruption of the text of 1 Ch. vi. 13 (v. 28, A. V.) has taken place. Joel's name has dropped out; and Vashni, which means "and the second," and is descriptive of Abijah, has been taken for a proper name. The R. V. reads the verse "the firstborn Joel, and the second Abiah."

2. Joel in 1 Ch. vi. 36, A. V. and R. V., is replaced by Shaul in v. 24. [A. C. H.]

3. One of the Minor Prophets, the son of Pethuel, or, according to the LXX., Βαβουήλ. Nothing further is known of his origin: the statements that he was from Bethom of Reuben (Pseudo-Epiphanius, De vit. Proph. xiv.), or from the tribe of Zebulun, seem to be quite untrustworthy. Nor again can any information be gleaned from his writings as to his condition of life: he speaks indeed of the priests with respect (i. 9, 13; ii. 17); but this is no proof that he was himself a priest or Levite, as has been sometimes supposed. We must submit to be ignorant of all the personal history of Joel, however desirous we may be to know more of one who was by no means the least remarkable of the Minor Prophets.

As to the date of his writings extreme diversity of opinion still continues to exist: it is a point which cannot be settled with certainty any more than the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews: only probability is attainable. It has been put (by Credner and Movers) as early as the first years of Joash of Judah (837 B.C.),* or even earlier (Bunsen); by Merx it has been brought down as late as 445; by others it has been placed at various intervening dates. This uncertainty is due to the fact that there is in Joel no marked allusion to foreign politics, such as meets us in Isaiah; no description of the social condition of the people, no denunciation of national sins, which might serve to fix his date: only drunkenness is mentioned. The enemies of Judah who are to be punished for their oppressions are not Assyria and Babylon, who came upon the scene at definite, well-known times: they are Phœnicia, Philistia, Egypt, and Edom, and it is difficult to assign any time for the particular acts of hostility for which they are denounced by the Prophet. Our knowledge of the relations of these peoples to Israel and Judah is probably too fragmentary for us to build any safe conclusions upon it: the Prophet may be alluding to acts which have not been recorded in the chronicles which have descended to us. So in the Psalms it is often impossible to fix upon any known historical facts as the basis of the Psalmist's meaning. From the scattered notices which meet us we may fairly conclude that the enmity of these nations was chronic, venting itself whenever an opportunity might occur. The date of Joel must, it would seem, be placed either early or very late. For although the Prophet seems to allude to coming captivity (ii. 20; iii. 1), yet there is no evidence in his writings of the struggle between idolatry and the worship of Jehovah which meets us in Hosea, Amos, and later Prophets, and continued till the Captivity, when it finally ceased. And yet this very absence of pointed allusion to known historical events may be of value in determining the age of the Prophet. The fact that we find no mention of Assyria or Babylon, that no denunciation of them meets us in Joel, as in Isaiah x. and xiv., would seem to show that these nations had not yet appeared upon the political scene. For when the Prophet speaks (iii. 2) of the gathering of "all nations" to Jerusalem for judgment, he does not mention these overwhelming oppressors, over whose downfall Isaiah exults with such patriotic fervour: he mentions only the petty plunderers of gold and silver and slaves. It may therefore, with some confidence, be assumed that he wrote at a time when these great empires had not yet come into collision with Israel and Judah; that is, before the end of the 8th century B.C. On the other hand, his probable allusion to Jehoshaphat's victory (2 Ch. xx.) over Moab, Edom, and Ammon (iii. 2, 12) would make him subsequent to that event, i.e. to the middle of the 7th century; his time may therefore fairly be sought at some period between these two dates. And many allusions in his Book harmonise well with this assumption. The office of prophet was still highly respected as in the days of David. The nation was apparently more simple in its ways than in the time of Amos. The Temple was still standing, and its ritual cherished. The Prophet dreads lest the offerings of meal and wine should be interrupted (i. 9, 13, 16; ii. 14). The old warlike spirit of Deborah and David seems to be revived in the summons of the Prophet (iii. 9) to all the nations to come and have vengeance dealt to them for the wrongs done by them against the people of the Lord. The purity of Joel's style tends also in the same direction, and there is no reason for supposing that this is due to a careful study of literary models, as has been suggested. Again, the Prophets often quote one from the other, as if to carry on the message entrusted to an older colleague. And so we find the words of Joel iii. 16 (Heb. iv. 16) also occurring in Amos i. 2. Did Joel quote Amos, or Amos Joel? If we may judge from a comparison of the two passages, Joel was the older writer: in him the words in question appear from the construction to be part of an original passage, whereas in Amos they have the look of a quotation. It seems as if Amos had taken almost the concluding words of the older Prophet's message and placed them at the head of his own Book, thus associating his own ministry with that of Joel. Again, Joel iii. 18 (iv. 18) seems to be a component part of the same prophecy, whereas in Amos ix. 13 it has the air of being an insertion. Further correspondences may be found between Joel and other Prophets, as will be seen below, but these do not show from their form which are the originals and which the quotations.

The arguments for assigning a late, post-exilic, date to Joel do not on examination appear to be very convincing. Thus it has been said: "Joel gives no indication of political life at Jerusalem. In chap. i. only elders or sheikhs and priests are mentioned: not the king or princes or warriors or councillors, as before the Exile. The nation has only a municipal organization with a priestly aristocracy, as it had under the Persian empire." It is doubtful, however, whether in any one of the four passages (i. 2, 14; ii. 16; iii. 1) in which Joel uses the word zaqên, he employs it in an official sense. Even if he did, the term is so commonly used under the kings that no argument can be built upon it. That the king is not mentioned may be due to the fact that the prophecy was possibly delivered during the minority of Joash of Judah. If again the Prophet had no special message for the king and other officials, why was he bound to mention them? Again (2): "Joel suits best with a later date, when Syrian slaves were in special request in Greece." Why so? What evidence is forthcoming that the Phoenicians were not slave-dealers as early as the 9th and 8th centuries B.C.? They are mentioned as such in Amos i. 6. In Is. xi. 11 captives of Israel are to be brought back from other parts and from the "islands of the sea," i.e. the coasts of the Mediterranean. There is no reason to suppose that this trade sprung up then and was not in existence centuries earlier. Again (3): "The name Javan (Ionians) is not found in any part of the O. T. certainly older than Ezekiel." Even if it could be proved that the genealogy in Gen. x. 4 is of post-exilic origin, this would not be enough. To serve as an argument for the late date of Joel, it must be shown that the name "Javan" was not known in Palestine till after the Exile: this cannot be proved, and is most improbable.* Again (4): "In Joel Israel has disappeared: only Judah is mentioned. This is inconceivable in the case of an early prophet." Why? Earlier prophets than Joel, Elijah (with one exception, 2 Ch. xxi. 12) and Elisha, seem to have occupied themselves entirely with the affairs of Israel: why should not Joel's ministry have been confined to Judah? Again (5): "The 'daily offering' (i. 9) is cut off and its restoration (ii. 14) promised. Under the monarchy it was the king's private offering; not till Ezra was it the affair of the community." Even if these statements could be proved, they would be beside the mark. Joel is not speaking exclusively of the special daily offering of meal and wine (Ex. xxix. 40), the minhath ha-tamidh of Neh. x.

33; Dan. viii. 11, &c. He has been describing the ravages of the locusts: "The corn is wasted: the new wine is dried up," and so there is none left for a meal- and drink - offering, the invariable accompaniments of all the bloody sacrifices, not of the special morning and evening offerings alone. Again (6): "Joel's allusion to the walls (ii. 7, 9) shows him to be after Ezra and Nehemiah." Were there, then, no walls to Jerusalem before the Exile? Again (7): "It is an assumption inconsistent with history that before the prophetic conflicts of the 8th century spiritual prophecy had unchallenged sway, when there was no gross idolatry or superstition, and when prophets like Joel were in accord with the priests and held the same position as they did after the Exile." If, however, as Credner suggests, Joel is to be placed in the early years of Joash, when idolatry had been put down (2 Ch. xxiii.) and the Temple-worship restored by Jehoiada, the language of the Prophet presents no difficulty. Again (8): "Joel must be a late Prophet, for he has copied the assembling of the nations to judgment from Zeph. iii. 8 and Ezek. xxxviii. 22, where the wonders of fire and blood are also mentioned, and his picture of the fertility of the land is taken from Amos ix. 13, &c." But, as we have seen above, the probability is that Joel was the original writer whose predictions were adopted by later Prophets. We shall therefore not be rash in assigning Joel a date between 850 and 700 B.C., but his exact position is difficult to settle more accurately. The early reign of Joash (837-797) has been selected by Credner, Movers, Hitzig, and other writers of eminence as his most probable date, and there is much to be said in its favour, as has been already remarked. By others he has been placed somewhat later. "There being no internal indication of the date of Joel, we cannot do better than acquiesce in the tradition by which his Book is placed next to that of Hosea, and regard Joel as the Prophet of Judah during the earlier part of Hosea's office towards Israel, and rather earlier than Isaiah."⁴

The prophecy opens with a vivid account (i. 2-13) of the ruin wrought in the land by drought and by the successive inroads of locusts. What one flight had left another had consumed, till crops and fruit-trees had alike been destroyed. Four different names are employed to describe the swarms of destroyers, and thus signify the completeness of the havoc brought about by them.⁵ But yet worse is to come. More terrible ravagers (ch. ii.) are on their way. Is it another flight of locusts which is foretold in this chapter, or are they human enemies? The matter has been warmly disputed by successive generations of commentators, and is not yet settled. Perhaps it may be best to suppose that the Prophet in vision sees the new enemies approaching in the shape of locusts of terrible size and strength, such as those described in Rev. ix. Some parts of the description (e.g. ii. 7) seem to necessitate this view. But that more is implied than mere locusts is evident both from the general description and from the expression (ii. 17), "Give not thine heritage to reproach that the heathen should rule over them;"⁶ and again (ii. 20), "I will remove far off from you the northerner." How are we to interpret this last obscure expression which has been the despair of commentators? It can hardly refer to locusts, as they would naturally make their way from their usual breeding grounds in the Arabian desert on the south of Judah: they would not come from the north. Passages in Jeremiah and Ezekiel⁶ suggest the answer. The invading armies of Babylon are described in them as coming from this quarter, as they would naturally take the road to Judah through Northern Palestine. In the time of Joel the expression would include Assyria as well, the northern kingdoms of Syria and Israel being always the first to feel the attack of these invaders. The precipitate retreat of Sennacherib after his great losses in South Palestine (Is. xxxvii. 36) illustrates the latter part of Joel ii. 20.

The prophecy from ii. 18 onwards is full of promises of mercy to follow upon the repentance of the people. The verbs in v. 18 have been taken by the R. V. and several commentators in the past tense, "Then the Lord answered and said." Indeed Merx characterises the future sense as an "exegetical monstrosity." Nevertheless, as no past tense has previously occurred, it seems right to take the verbs, though joined with vau conversive, in a future sense, as was done in the A. V.⁷ The former and the latter rain shall again descend in their season, and the land shall again give her increase; the heathen enemies shall be removed. But greater promises follow. The Holy Spirit shall be poured forth upon all flesh. Wonders shall be seen in heaven and earth, ushering in the great and terrible day of the Lord, in which however deliverance shall be found in Mount Zion and Jerusalem, and in the faithful remnant whom the Lord shall call. This theme of the coming Day of Judgment is enlarged upon in ch. iii. All nations are to be summoned to the Valley of Jehoshaphat, not probably the valley outside Jerusalem on the east, but the scene of the victory described in 2 Ch. xx.¹ There the ancient wrongs of His people will be avenged, the captives will be restored, while their oppressors Tyre and Zidon, who had sold them to foreign lands for pitiful sums, shall receive a due recompense for their evil deeds. The Lord will roar out of Zion in His fury at the foe, but He will be the hope of His people and the Strength of Israel. Egypt and Edom will be desolate, while plenty shall reign in Judah: the mountains shall be covered with vineyards, and the hills with herds of cattle; and more than this, spiritual blessings like a fertilising stream shall issue from the Temple, and water not only Judah but even the arid valley of the Acacias on the further side of Jordan.

⁷ e.g. Jer. lv. 6, vi. 22, x. 22, &c.; Ezek. xxvi. 1: cp. Zeph. ii. 13.

If the date assigned above to Joel be correct, this Prophet must have exercised considerable influence upon his successors. For not only thoughts which first appear in his writings are taken up by them, but his very words are reproduced.* Thus the nearness of the day of the Lord when He shall come for judgment, and its accompanying gloom and darkness, are described in Joel i. 15, ii. 1, 31, iii. 14, and again reappear in Is. xiii. 6; Amos v. 18, 20; Ezek. xxx. 2; Ob. v. 15; Zeph. i. 14; Mal. iv. 5. The requital of the enemy for their violence, as threatened in Joel iii. 4, 19, is repeated in Obad. cv. 10, 15; their cruelty in having cast lots for the captives is mentioned in Joel iii. 3, and again in Obad. v. 11, Nahum iii. 10; the universality of the judgment to come is foretold in Joel iii. 2 (iv. 2), and also in Is. lxvi. 18, Jer. xxv. 31, and Zech. xiv. 1. The majestic figure of the Lord protecting His people, and roaring from out of Zion as a lion roars at the sight of his enemies, first occurs in Joel iii. 16 (Heb. iv. 16), and again in Amos i. 2 and Jer. xxv. 30. The doctrine that a remnant only, not all Israel, shall be saved, meets us in Joel ii. 32 (iii. 5), and is taken up again by Isaiah (xi. 11, &c.), Jeremiah (xxxi. 7), and Micah (iv. 7, v. 6, 7). Deliverance in Mount Zion is promised in Joel ii. 32 (iii. 5), and repeated in Ob. v. 17. The prophecy that Jerusalem is to be holy, Joel iii. 17 (iv. 17), and unpolluted henceforth by strangers, is taken up by Is. lii. 1 and Obad. v. 17. The figure of the waters (iii. 18, Heb. iv. 18) which shall flow from beneath the Temple and fertilise distant lands, is reproduced with variations in Zech. xiv. 8, and expanded in Ezek. xlvi. Joel's summons to the nations in iii. 10 (iv. 10) to beat their ploughshares into swords, and their spears into pruning-hooks, is reversed in Mic. iv. 3 and Is. ii. 4, and becomes a prophecy of universal peace. The vision of plenty when the mountains shall flow with new wine, Joel iii. 18 (iv. 18), is repeated literally in Amos ix. 13. Above all, the great promise of the outpouring of the Spirit upon all flesh in Joel ii. 28, which is expressly quoted by St. Peter in Acts ii. as fulfilled on the Day of Pentecost, meets us again in Is. xlv. 3, Ezek. xxxix. 29, and Zech. xii. 10. St. Paul (Rom. x. 13) notes the universality of the salvation offered in Joel ii. 32. Indeed it is in the N. T. even more than in the Old, that these great subjects, which first appear in the writings of Joel, are taken up and further developed.

The style of Joel is singularly easy and graceful. He has no ruggedness and obscurity like Hosea. But yet he is full of power and at the same time overflowing with tenderness. In these respects he is, perhaps, surpassed by none of the Prophets but Isaiah.

The literature connected with Joel is of considerable extent. A very full list, commencing from the earliest times, may be found in Wünsche, Die Weissagungen d. Proph. Joel (1872), pp. 61-64. The most noticeable works which have appeared of late bearing upon the subject are those by Rosenmüller, Scholien in V. T. (1827-36); Holzhausen, Joel (1829); Credner, Joel (1831); Maurer, Commentar (1840); Ewald, Die Proph. des Alten Bundes (1840-1); Umbreit, Commentar (1844); Hitzig in Kurzgefasst. exeg. Handb. zum A. T., 4 Aufl. (1881), and in his Propheten des A. T. (1854); Hengstenberg, Christol. d. A. T. (1854), transl. in Clark's For. Theol. Libr. (1854-8); Reinke, Messian. Weissag. (1859-62), vol. 3; Keil, Propheten (1866); Reuss, Les Prophètes (1876); Merx, Die Prophetie des Joel und ihre Ausleger (1879); J. P. Lange, Commentar, Eng. transl. ed. by Schaff, Edinb.; besides useful articles in Hamburger, Real-Encyclop. (1870); Herzog, RE. (1880). In England have been published Henderson, Minor Prophets (1845); Pusey, Minor Prophets (1860); Meyrick, Joel in Speaker's Comm. (1876); W. L. Pearson, Joel (1885); Farrar, Minor Prophets in Men of the Bible Series (1890). He follows Merx; Driver, in Introduction to the Literature of the O. T. (1891). [J. W. N.]

4. (יִשְׂרָאֵל; Ἰσραήλ; Joël.) The head of one of the families of the Simeonites (1 Ch. iv. 35). He formed part of the expedition against the Hamites of Gedor in the reign of Hezekiah.

5. A descendant of Reuben. Junius and Tremellius make him the son of Hanoch, while others trace his descent through Carmi (1 Ch. v. 4). The Syriac for Joel substitutes Carmi, but there is reason to believe that the genealogy is that of the eldest son. Burrington (Geneal. i. 53) maintains that the Joel mentioned in v. 8 was a descendant, not of Hanoch, but one of his brethren, probably Carmi, as Junius and Tremellius print it in their genealogical table. But the passage on which he relies for support (v. 7), as concluding the genealogy of Hanoch, evidently refers to Beerah, the prince of the Reubenites, whom the Assyrian king carried captive (see Oettli in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Komm. in loco). There is, however, sufficient similarity between Shemaiah and Shema, who are both represented as sons of Joel, to render it probable that the latter is the same individual in both instances. Bertheau conjectures that he was contemporary with David, which would be approximately true if the genealogy were traced in each case from father to son.

6. Chief of the Gadites, who dwelt in the land of Bashan (1 Ch. v. 12).

7. (A. Ἰσραήλ, B. Παῦλ; Johel.) The son of Izrahiah, of the tribe of Issachar, and a chief of one of "the troops of the host of the battle" (R. V. "bands of the host for war"), who numbered in the days of David 36,000 men (1 Ch. vii. 3). Four of Kennicott's MSS. omit the words "and the sons of Izrahiah;" so that Joel appears as one of the five sons of Uzzi. The Syriac retains the present text, with the exception of reading "four" for "five." If the number "five" be accurate, a name would seem to have dropped out of the list (cp. QPB.).

8. The brother (LXX. A.; B. reads vids here and in 2 Sam. i. c.) of Nathan of Zobah (1 Ch. xi. 38), and one of David's guard. He is called Igal in 2 Sam. xxiii. 36; but Kennicott contends that in this case the latter passage is corrupt, though in other words it preserved the true reading.

8. The chief of the Gershomites in the reign of David, who sanctified themselves to bring up the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Ch. xv. 7, 11).

10. A Gershomite Levite in the reign of David, son of Jehiel, a descendant of Laadan, and probably the same as the preceding (1 Ch. xxiii. 8; xxvi. 22). He was one of the officers appointed to take charge of the treasures of the Temple.

11. The son of Pedaiiah, and prince or chief of the half-tribe of Manasseh, west of Jordan, in the reign of David (1 Ch. xxvii. 20).

12. A Kohathite Levite in the reign of Hezekiah. He was the son of Azariah, and one of the two representatives of his branch of the tribe in the solemn purification by which the Levites prepared themselves for the restoration of the Temple (2 Ch. xxix. 12).

13. One of the sons of Nebo, who returned with Ezra, and had married a foreign wife (Ezra x. 43). He is called Juel in 1 Esd. ix. 35.

14. The son of Zichri, a Benjamite, placed in command over those of his own tribe and the tribe of Judah, who dwelt at Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 9).

[W. A. W.]

JO-ELAH (יְהוֹאֵל) for יְהוֹאֵל, = May He [God] help! BN. 'EAL, A. 'Iwāḏ; Joēla, son of Jeroham of Gedor, who with his brother joined the band of warriors who rallied round David at Ziklag (1 Ch. xii. 7).

JO-EZER (יְהוֹאֵזֶר), = Jehovah is aid; B. 'Iw(āpa, NA. 'Iw(āp; Joezer), a Korhite, one of David's captains who fought by his side while living in exile among the Philistines (1 Ch. xii. 6).

JOG'BEHAH (יְהוֹבְחָה) = elevated: in Num. the LXX. has translated it as if from יְבֻשָׁה—byssos abrad; in Judg. B. 'Iweβdā; A. εἰ ἐνωρίας Zeβe: Jegbaa, one of the cities on the east of Jordan which were built and fortified by the tribe of Gad when they took possession of their territory (Num. xxxii. 35). It is there mentioned between JAAZER and BETH-NIMRAH, places which are probably now represented by Kh. Sār on the plateau, and Tell Nimrin in the Jordan valley. It is mentioned once again, this time in connexion with Nobah, in the account of Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites (Judg. viii. 11). They were at Karkor, and he made his way from the upper part of the Jordan valley at Succoth and Penuel, and "went up"—ascended from the Ghor—by the way of the dwellers in tents—the pastoral people, who avoided the district of the towns—to the east of Nobah and Jogbehah; making his way towards the waste country in the south-east. Here, according to the scanty information we possess, Karkor would seem to have been situated. Ewald (Gesch. ii. 504, note 4) suggests el-Jubeihāt, or el-Jebeihā, a large site on the plateau between 'Amḡān and es-Sāit; and this has been adopted by Conder (P.E.F. Mem. E. Pal. p. 111). The ruins are very extensive, but apparently later than the Christian era.

If, however, we may infer from Num. xxiii. 35 that Jogbehah was between Jaazer and Beth-nimrah, its site must be looked for to the west of the road from the Jabbok, through Heshbon, to Moab, which would in that case be the way of the dwellers in tents. [G.] [W.]

JO'GLI (יְהוֹגְלִי) = exiled; B. 'Eγλεῖ, A. 'EAL. F. 'Iekal; Jogli, the father of Bukki, a chief man among the Danites (Num. xxxiv. 22).

JO'HA. 1. (יְהוֹחָה) ? a corrupt form of יְהוֹחָה [MV.¹¹]; B. 'Iwḡdā, A. 'Iwāḡd; Joha.) One of the sons of Beriah, the Benjaminite who was a chief of the fathers of the dwellers in Aijalon, and had put to flight the inhabitants of Gath (1 Ch. viii. 16). His family may possibly have founded a colony, like the Danites, within the limits of another tribe, where they were exposed as the men of Ephraim had been, to the attack of the Gittites. Such border-warfare was too common to render it necessary to suppose that the narratives in 1 Ch. vii. 21 and viii. 13 refer to the same encounter, although it is not a little singular that the name Beriah occurs in each.

2. ('Iwāḡd.) The Tizite, one of David's guard (1 Ch. xi. 45). Kennicott decides that he was the son of Shimri, as he is represented in the A. V. and R. V., though in the margin the A. V. has put "Shimrite" for "the son of Shimri" to the name of his brother Jedihel.

JOHANAN (יְהוֹחָנָן); B. 'Iwāḡd, A. -w), a shortened form of Jehohanan = Jehovah hath had mercy. It is the same as John. [JEHOHANAN.]

1. Son of Azariah [AZARIAH, 2], and grandson of Ahimaaḡ the son of Zadok, and father of Azariah, 3 (1 Ch. vi. 9, 10, A. V.). In Josephus (Ant. x. 8, § 6) the name is corrupted to Joramus, and in the Seder Olam to Joahaz. The latter places him in the reign of Jehoshaphat: but merely because it begins by wrongly placing Zadok in the reign of Solomon. Since however we know from 1 K. iv. 2, supported by 1 Ch. vi. 10, A. V., that Azariah the father of Johanan was high-priest in Solomon's reign, and Amariah his grandson was so in Jehoshaphat's reign, we may conclude without much doubt that Johanan's pontificate fell in the reign of Rehobom (see Hervey's Genealogies, &c., ch. x.).

2. (B. 'Iwāḡd, A. -am.) Son of Elioenai, the son of Neariah, the son of Shemaiah, in the line of Zerubbabel's heirs [SHEMAIAH], (1 Ch. iii. 24). [A. C. H.]

3. (B. 'Iwāḡd, A. 'Iwāḡd in 2 K. xxv. 23, in Jer. usually 'Iwāḡd or 'Iwāḡd; Johanan.) The son of Kareah, and one of the captains of the scattered remnants of the army of Judah, who escaped in the final attack upon Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and, after the capture of the king, remained in the open country of Moab and the Ammonites, watching the tide of events. He was one of the first to repair to Mizpah, after the withdrawal of the hostile army, and tender his allegiance to the new governor appointed by the king of Babylon. From his acquaintance with the treacherous designs of Ishmael, against which Gedaliah was unhappily warned in vain, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he may have been a companion of Ishmael in his exile at the court of Baalis king of the Ammonites, the promoter of the plot (Jer. xl. 8-16). After the murder of Gedaliah, Johanan was one of the foremost in the pursuit of his assassin, and rescued the captives he had carried off from Mizpah (Jer. xii. 11-16). Fearing the vengeance of the Chaldeans for the treachery of Ishmael, the captains, with Johanan at their head, halted by the Khan of Chimham, on the road to Egypt, with the intention of seeking refuge there; and, notwithstanding the warnings of Jeremiah, settled in a body at Tahpanhes. They were afterwards scattered throughout the country, in Migdol, Noph, and Pathros, and from this time we lose sight of Johanan and his fellow-captains.

4. (יְהוֹנָתָן; B. 'Iowānās, A. 'Iowān.) The firstborn son of Josiah king of Judah (1 Ch. iii. 15), who either died before his father, or fell with him at Megiddo. Junius, without any authority, identifies him with Zarcas, mentioned in 1 Esd. i. 38.

5. A valiant Benjamite, one of David's captains, who joined him at Ziklag (1 Ch. xii. 4).

6. (B.N. 'Iowān, A. 'Iowān.) The eighth in number of the lion-faced warriors of Gad, who left their tribe to follow the fortunes of David, and spread the terror of their arms beyond Jordan in the month of its overflow (1 Ch. xii. 12).

7. (אֶזְרִיָּה; B. 'Iowānās, A. -av.) The father of Azariah, an Ephraimite in the time of Ahaz (2 Ch. xxviii. 12).

8. The son of Hakkatan, and chief of the Bene-Azgad who returned with Ezra (Ezra viii. 12). He is called Johannes in 1 Esd. viii. 38.

9. (אֶזְרִיָּה.) The son of Eliashib, one of the chief Levites (Neh. xii. 23), to whose chamber (or "treasury," according to the LXX.) Ezra retired to mourn over the foreign marriages which the people had contracted (Ezra x. 6). He is called Joanan in 1 Esd. ix. 1; and some have supposed him to be the same as Jonathan, descendant of another Eliashib, who was afterwards high-priest (Neh. xii. 11).

10. (אֶזְרִיָּה; B. 'Iowān, N. 'Iowān, N. 'Iowān.) The son of Tobiah the Ammonite, who had married the daughter of Meshullam the priest (Neh. vi. 18). [W. A. W.]

JOHAN'NES (Ἰωάννης; Joannes) = Jehohanan son of Bebai (1 Esd. ix. 29; cp. Ezra x. 28). [JEHOHANAN, 4; cp. JOHANAN, 8.]

JOHN (Ἰωάννης), in the Apocrypha. 1. The father of Mattathias, and grandfather of the Maccabean family (1 Macc. ii. 1).

2. The (eldest) son of Mattathias (Ἰωάννης), surnamed Caddis (Καδδῖς: cp. Speaker's Comm. on 1 Macc. ii. 2), who was slain by "the children of Jambri" [JAMBRI] (1 Macc. ii. 2; ix. 36-38). In 2 Macc. viii. 22 he is called Joseph, by a common confusion of name. [MACCABEES.]

3. The father of Eupolemus, one of the envoys whom Judas Maccabaeus sent to Rome (1 Macc. viii. 17; 2 Macc. iv. 11).

4. The son of Simon, the brother of Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. xiii. 53, xvi. 1), "a valiant man," who, under the title of Johannes Hircanus, nobly supported in after-time the glory of his house. [MACCABEES.]

5. An envoy from the Jews to Lysias (2 Macc. xi. 17). [B. F. W.]

JOHN (Ἰωάννης; Cod. Bezae, 'Iowdās: Joannes). 1. One of the high-priest's family, who, with Annas and Caiaphas, sat in judgment upon the Apostles Peter and John for their cure of the lame man and preaching in the Temple (Acts iv. 6). Lightfoot identifies him with R. Johanan ben Zaccai, who lived forty years before the destruction of the Temple, and was president of the great Synagogue after its removal to Jabne, or Jamnia (Lightfoot, Cent. Chor. Matth. praef. ch. 15; see also Selden, De Synedriis, ii. ch. 15). The identification does not appear to be recognised by Schürer (Gesch. d. Jüd. Volkes, ii. 172). Grotius merely says that he was known to Rabbinical writers as "John the priest" (Comm. in Act. iv.); and he may well have been one of those priests who by courtesy or for merit's sake, and as a member of the high-priest's family, was known by the title of ἀρχιερεὺς (Schürer, l. c.).

2. The Hebrew name of the Evangelist St. Mark, who throughout the narrative of the Acts is designated by the name by which he was known among his countrymen (Acts xii. 12, 25; xiii. 5, 13; xv. 37).

JOHN, THE APOSTLE (Ἰωάννης). It will be convenient to divide the life which is the subject of the present article into periods corresponding both to the great critical epochs which separate one part of it from another, and to marked differences in the trustworthiness of the sources from which our materials are derived. In no instance, perhaps, is such a division more necessary than in this. One portion of the Apostle's life and work stands out before us as in the clearness of broad daylight. Over those which precede and follow it there brood the shadows of darkness and uncertainty. In the former we discern only a few isolated facts, and are left to inference and conjecture to bring them together into something like a whole. In the latter we encounter, it is true, images more distinct, pictures more vivid; but with these there is the doubt whether the distinctness and vividness are not misleading—whether half-traditional, half-mythical narrative has not taken the place of history.

I. Before the call to the discipleship.—We have no data for settling with any exactitude the time of the Apostle's birth. The general impression left on us by the Gospel narrative is that he was younger than the brother whose name commonly precedes his (Matt. iv. 21, x. 3, xvii. 1, &c.; but cp. Luke ix. 28, where the order is inverted), younger than his friend St. Peter, possibly also than his Master. The life which was protracted to the time of Trajan (Euseb. H. E. iii. 23, following Irenaeus). See note in Wace and Schaff's edit. in loco) can hardly have begun before the year B.C. 4 of the Dionysian era. The Gospels give us the name of his father Zebedaeus (Matt. iv. 21) and his mother Salome (Matt. xvii. 56, compared with Mark xv. 40, xvi. 1). Of the former we know nothing more. The traditions of the fourth century (Epiphan. iii. Haer. 78) make the latter the daughter of Joseph by his first wife, and consequently half-sister to our Lord. By some recent critics she has been identified with the sister of Mary the mother of Jesus, in John xix. 25 (Wieseler, Stud. in Krit. 1840, p. 648).^a They lived, it may be inferred from John i. 44, in or near the same town [BETHSAIDA] as those who were afterwards the companions and partners of their children. There on the shores of the Sea of Galilee the Apostle and his brother grew up. The mention of the "hired servants" (Mark i. 20), of his mother's "substance" (ἀπὸ τοῦ ὑπαρχόντων, Luke viii. 3), of "his own house" (τὰ ἴδια, John xix. 27), implies a position removed by at least some steps from absolute poverty. The fact that the Apostle was known to the high-priest Caiaphas, as that knowledge was hardly likely to have begun after he had avowed himself the disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, suggests the probability of some early intimacy between the two men or their families.^b The name which the parents gave to their younger child was too common to serve as the ground of any special inference: but it deserves notice (1) that the name appears among the kindred of the high-priest Caiaphas (Acts iv. 6); (2) that it was given to another priestly child, the son of Zacharias (Luke i. 13), as the embodiment and symbol of Messianic hopes. The frequent occurrence of the name at this period, unconnected as it was with any of the great deeds of the old heroic days of Israel, is indeed in itself significant as a sign of that yearning and expectation which then characterised, not only the more faithful and devout (Luke ii. 25, 38), but the whole people. The prominence given to it by the wonders connected with the birth of the future Baptist may have given a meaning to it for the parents of the future Evangelist which it would not otherwise have had. Of the character of Zebedaeus we have hardly the slightest trace. He interposes no refusal when his sons are called to leave him (Matt. iv. 21). After this he disappears from the scene of the Gospel history, and we are led to infer that he had died before his wife followed her children in their work of ministration. Her character meets us as presenting the same marked features as those which were conspicuous in her son. From her, who followed Jesus and ministered to Him of her substance (Luke viii. 3), who sought for her two sons that they might sit, one on His right hand, the other on His left, in His Kingdom (Matt. xx. 20), he might well derive his strong affections, his capacity for giving and receiving love, his eagerness for the speedy manifestation of the Messiah's kingdom. The early years of the Apostle we may believe to have passed under this influence. He would be trained in all that constituted the ordinary education of Jewish boyhood. Though not taught in the schools of Jerusalem, and therefore, in later life, liable to the reproach of having no recognised position as a teacher, no Rabbinical education (Acts iv. 13), he would yet be taught to read the Law and observe its precepts, to feed on the writings of the Prophets with the feeling that their accomplishment was not far off. For him too, as bound by the Law, there would be, at the age of thirteen, the periodical pilgrimages to Jerusalem. He would become familiar with the stately worship of the Temple, with the sacrifice, the incense, the Altar, and the priestly robes. May we not conjecture that then the impressions were first made which never afterwards wore off? Assuming that there is some harmony between the previous training of a Prophet and the form of the visions presented to him, may we not recognise them in the rich liturgical imagery of the Apocalypse—in that union in one wonderful vision of all that was most wonderful and glorious in the predictions of the old Prophets?

^a Ewald (Gesch. Israels, v. p. 171) adopts Wieseler's conjecture, and connects it with his own hypothesis that the sons of Zebedee, and our Lord, as well as the Baptist, were of the tribe of Levi. This conjecture is also adopted by Westcott (in loco). On the other hand, Neander (Phans. u. Leit. p. 609, 4th ed.) and Lücke (Johannes, i. p. 9) reject both the tradition and the conjecture.

^b Ewald (l. c.) presses this also into the service of his strange hypothesis.

Concurrently with this there would be in the boy's outward life as sharing in his father's work. The great political changes which agitated the whole of Palestine would in some degree make themselves felt even in the village-town in which he grew up. The Galilean fisherman must have heard, possibly with some sympathy, of the efforts made (when he was young to join in them) by Judas of Gamala—the great asserter of the freedom of Israel against their Roman rulers (cp. Schürer, Gesch. d. alt. Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, i. 406). Like other Jews, he would grow up with strong and bitter feelings against the neighbouring Samaritans. Lastly, before we pass into a period of greater certainty, we must not forget to take into account that to this period of his life belongs the commencement of that intimate fellowship with Simon Bar-jonah of which we afterwards find so many proofs. That friendship may even then have been, in countless ways fruitful for good upon the hearts of both.

II. From the call to the discipleship to the departure from Jerusalem.—The ordinary life of the fisherman of the Sea of Galilee was at last broken in upon by the news that a Prophet had once more appeared. The voice of John the Baptist was heard in the wilderness of Judaea, and the publicans, peasants, soldiers, and fishermen of Galilee gathered round him. Among these were the two sons of Zebedaeus and their friends. With them perhaps was One Whom they knew not. They heard, it may be, his protests against the vices of their own race—against the hypocrisy of Pharisees and Scribes. But they heard also, it is clear, words which spoke to them of their own sins—of their own need of a deliverer. The words "Behold the Lamb of God Which taketh away the sin of the world" (R. V.) imply that those who heard them would enter into the blessedness of which they spoke. Assuming that the unnamed disciple of John i. 37-40 was the Evangelist himself, we are led to think of that meeting, of the lengthened interview that followed it as the starting-point of the entire devotion of heart and soul which lasted through his whole life. Then Jesus loved him as he loved all earnest seekers after righteousness and truth (cp. Mark x. 21). The words of that evening, though unrecorded, were mighty in their effect. The disciples (John apparently among them) followed their new Teacher to Galilee (John i. 44), were with Him, as such, at the marriage-feast of Cana (ii. 2), journeyed with Him to Capernaum, and thence to Jerusalem (ii. 12, 22), came back through Samaria (iv. 8), and then, for some uncertain interval of time, returned to their former occupations. The uncertainty which hangs over the narratives of Matt. iv. 18 and Luke v. 1-11 (cp. the arguments for and against their relating to the same events in Lampe, Comment. ad Joann. p. 20) leaves us in doubt whether they received a special call to become "fishers of men" once only or twice. In either case they gave up the employment of their life and went to do a work like it, and yet unlike, in God's spiritual Kingdom. From this time they take their place among the company of disciples. Only here and there are there traces of individual character, of special turning-points in their lives. Soon they find themselves in the number of the Twelve who are chosen, not as disciples only, but as their Lord's delegates—representatives—Apostles. In all the lists of the Twelve those four names of the sons of Jonah and Zebedæus stand foremost. They come within the innermost circle of their Lord's friends, and are as the ἐκλεκτῶν ἐκλεκτότεροι. The three, St. Peter, St. James, and St. John, are with Him when none else are, in the chamber of death (Mark v. 37), in the glory of the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1), when He forewarns them of the destruction of the Holy City (Mark xiii. 3, St. Andrew, in this instance, with them), and in the agony of Gethsemane. St. Peter is throughout the leader of that band; to St. John belongs the yet more memorable distinction of being the disciple whom Jesus loved. This love is returned with a more single undivided heart by him than by any other. If St. Peter is the φιλόχριστος, St. John is the φιλιπσοῦς (Grotius, Prolegom. in Joann.). Some striking facts indicate why this was so; what the character was which was thus worthy of the love of Jesus of Nazareth. They hardly sustain the popular notion, fostered by the received types of Christian art, of a nature gentle, yielding, feminine. The name Boanerges (Mark iii. 17) implies a vehemence, zeal, intensity, which gave to those who had it the might of Sons of Thunder.* That spirit broke out, once and again, when they joined their mother in asking for the highest places in the kingdom of their Master, and declared that they were ready to face the dark terrors of the cup that He drank and the baptism that He was baptized with (Matt. xx. 20-24; Mark x. 35-41)—when they rebuked one who cast out devils in their Lord's Name because he was not one of their company (Luke ix. 42)—when they sought to call down fire from heaven upon a village of the Samaritans (Luke ix. 54). About this time Salome, as if her husband had died, takes her place among the women who followed Jesus in Galilee (Luke viii. 3), ministering to Him of their substance, and went up with Him in His last journey to Jerusalem (Luke xxiii. 55). Through her, we may well believe, St. John first came to know that Mary Magdalene whose character he depicts with such a life-like touch, and that other Mary to whom he was afterwards to stand in so close and special a relation. The fulness of his narrative of what the Evangelists omit (John xi.) leads to the conclusion that he was united also by some special ties of intimacy to the family of Bethany. It is not necessary to dwell at length on the familiar history of the Last Supper. What is characteristic is that he is there, as ever, the disciple whom Jesus loved; and, as the chosen and favoured friend, reclines at table with his head upon his Master's breast (John xiii. 23). To him the eager Peter—they had been sent together to prepare the supper (Luke xxii. 8)—makes signs of impatient questioning that he should ask what was not likely to be answered if it came from any other (John xiii. 24). As they go out to the Mount of Olives the chosen three are nearest to their Master. They only are within sight or hearing of the conflict in Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 37). When the betrayal is accomplished, St. Peter and St. John, after the first moment of confusion, follow afar off, while the others simply seek safety in a hasty flight⁴ (John xviii. 15). The personal acquaintance which existed between St. John and Caiaphas enabled him to gain access both for himself and St. Peter, but the latter remains in the porch, with the officers and servants, while St. John himself apparently is admitted to the council-chamber, and follows Jesus thence, even to the prætorium of the Roman Procurator (John xviii. 16, 19, 28). Thence, as if the desire to see the end, and the love which was stronger than death, sustained him through all the terrors and sorrows of that day, he followed—accompanied probably by his own mother, Mary the mother of Jesus, and Mary Magdalene—to the place of Crucifixion. The Teacher Who had been to him as a brother leaves to him a brother's duty. He is to be as a son to the mother who is left desolate (John xix. 26-27). The Sabbath that followed was spent, it would appear, in the same company. He receives St. Peter, in spite of his denial, on the old terms of friendship. It is to them that Mary Magdalene first runs with the tidings of the emptied sepulchre (John xx. 2); they are the first to go together to see what the strange words meant. Not without some bearing on their respective characters is the fact that St. John is the more impetuous, running on most eagerly to the rock-tomb; St. Peter, the least restrained by awe, the first to enter in and look (John xx. 4-6). For at least eight days they continued in Jerusalem (John xx. 26). Then, in the interval between the Resurrection and the Ascension, we find them still together on the Sea of Galilee (John xxi. 1), as though they would calm the eager suspense of that period of expectation by a return to their old calling and their old familiar haunts. Here, too, there is a characteristic difference. St. John is the first to recognise in the dim form seen in the morning twilight the presence of his risen Lord; St. Peter the first to plunge into the water and swim towards the shore where He stood calling to them (John xxi. 7). The last words of the Gospel reveal to us the deep affection which united the two friends. It is not enough for Peter to know his own future. That at once suggests the question—"And what shall this man do?" (John xxi. 21). The history of the Acts shows the same union. They are of course together at the Ascension and on the Day of Pentecost. Together they enter the Temple as worshippers (Acts iii. 1) and protest against the threats of the Sanhedrin (iv. 13). They are fellow-workers in the first great step of the Church's expansion. The Apostle whose wrath had been roused by the unbelief of the Samaritans overcomes his national exclusiveness, and receives them as his brethren (viii. 14). The persecution which was pushed on by Saul of Tarsus did not drive him or any of the Apostles from their post (viii. 1). When the persecutor came back as the convert, he, it is true, did not see him (Gal. i. 12), but this of course does not involve the inference that he had left Jerusalem. The sharper though shorter persecution which followed under Herod Agrippa brought a great sorrow to him in the martyrdom of his brother (Acts xii. 2). His friend, St. Peter, was driven to seek safety in flight. Fifteen years after St. Paul's first visit St. John was still at Jerusalem, and helped to take part in the great settlement of the controversy between the Jewish and the Gentile Christians (Acts xv. 6). His position and reputation there were those of one ranking among the chief "pillars" of the Church (Gal. ii. 9). Of the work of the Apostle during this period we have hardly the slightest trace. There may have been special calls to mission-work like that which drew him to Samaria. There may have been the work of teaching, organising, exhorting the Churches of Judaea. His fulfilment of the solemn charge entrusted to him may have led him to a life of loving and reverent thought rather than to one of conspicuous activity. We may, at all events, feel sure that it was a time in which the natural elements of his character, with all their fiery energy, were being purified and mellowed, rising step by step to that high serenity which we find perfected in the closing portion of his life. Here too we may, without much hesitation, accept the traditions of the Church as recording a historic fact when they ascribe to him a life of celibacy (Tertull. de Monog. c. xiii.). The absence of his name from 1 Cor. ix. 5 tends to the same conclusion. It harmonises with all we know of his character to think of his heart as so absorbed in the higher and diviner love that there was no room left for the lower and the human.

* The consensus of patristic interpretation sees in this name the prophecy of their work as preachers of the Gospel. This, however, would deprive the epithet of all distinguishing force (cp. Sulzer, Thesaurus, s. v. Βροντή; and Lampe, l. p. 27).

III. From his departure from Jerusalem to his death.—The traditions of a later age come in, with more or less show of likelihood, to fill up the great gap which separates the Apostle of Jerusalem from the Bishop of Ephesus. It was a natural conjecture to suppose that he remained in Judaea till the death of the Virgin released him from his trust.* When this took place we can only conjecture. There are no signs of his being at Jerusalem at the time of St. Paul's last visit (Acts xxi.). The Pastoral Epistles set aside the notion that he had come to Ephesus before the work of the Apostle of the Gentiles was brought to its conclusion. Out of many contradictory statements, fixing his departure under Claudius, or Nero, or as late even as Domitian, we have hardly any data for doing more than rejecting the two extremes.† Nor is it certain that his work as an Apostle was transferred at once from Jerusalem to Ephesus. A tradition current in the time of Augustine (Quaest. Evang. ii. 19), and embodied in some MSS. of the N. T., represented the 1st Epistle of St. John as addressed to the Parthians, and so far implied that his Apostolic work had brought him into contact with* them. When the form of the aged disciple meets us again, in the twilight of the Apostolic age, we are still left in great doubt as to the extent of his work and the circumstances of his outward life. Assuming the authorship of the Epistles and the Revelation to be his, the facts which the N. T. writings assert or imply are—(1) that, having come to Ephesus, some persecution, local or general, drove him to Patmos (Rev. i. 9);‡ (2) that the seven Churches, of which Asia was the centre, were special objects of his solicitude (Rev. i. 11); that in his work he had to encounter men who denied the truth on which his faith rested (1 John iv. 1; 2 John v. 7), and others who, with a railing and malignant temper, disputed his authority (3 John vv. 9, 10). If to this we add that he must have outlived all, or nearly all, of those who had been the friends and companions even of his maturer years—that this lingering age gave strength to an old imagination that his Lord had promised him immortality (John xxi. 23)—that, as if remembering the actual words had been thus perverted, the longing of his soul gathered itself up in the cry, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (Rev. xxii. 20)—that from some who spoke with authority he received a solemn attestation of the confidence they reposed in him (John xxi. 24)—we have stated all that has any claim to the character of historical truth. The picture which tradition fills up for us has the merit of being full and vivid, but it blends together, without much regard to harmony, things probable and improbable. He is shipwrecked off Ephesus (Simeon Metaph. in viti Johanae c. 2; Lampe, i. 47), and arrives there in time to check the progress of the heresies which sprang up after St. Paul's departure. Then, or at a later period, he numbers among his disciples men like Polycarp, Papias, Ignatius (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. xvii.). In the persecution under Domitian he is taken to Rome, and there, by his boldness, though not by death, gains the crown of martyrdom. The boiling oil into which he is thrown has no power to hurt him (Tertull. de Præscript. c. xxxvi.).¹ He is then sent to labour in the mines, and Patmos is the place of his exile (Victorinus, in Apoc. ix.; Lampe, i. 66). The accession of Nerva frees him from danger, and he returns to Ephesus. There he settles the canon of the Gospel-history by formally attesting the truth of the first three Gospels, and writing his own to supply what they left wanting (Euseb. H. E. iii. 24). The elders of the Church are gathered together, and he, as by a sudden inspiration, begins with the wonderful opening, "In the beginning was the word" (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. 29). Heresies continue to show themselves, but he meets them with the strongest possible protest. He refuses to pass under the same roof (that of the public baths of Ephesus) as their foremost leader, lest the house should fall down on them and crush them (Iren. iii. 3; Euseb. H. E. iii. 28, iv. 14).² Through his agency the great temple of Artemis is at last left of its magnificence, and even levelled with the ground (Cyril. Alex. Orat. de Mar. Virg.; Nicephor. H. E. ii. 42; Lampe, i. 90). He introduces and perpetuates the Jewish mode of celebrating the Easter Feast (Euseb. H. E. iii. 3). At Ephesus, if not before, as one who was a true priest of the Lord, he bears on his brow the plate of gold (πέταλον; cp. Suicer. Theas. s. v.), with the sacred name engraved on it, which was the badge of the Jewish pontiff (Polycrates, in Euseb. H. E. iii. 31, v. 24).³ In strange contrast with this ideal exaltation, a later tradition tells how the old man used to find pleasure in the playfulness and fondness of a favourite bird, and defended himself against the charge of unworthy trifling by the familiar apologue of the bow that must sometimes be unbent (Cassian. Collat. xxiv.

* The hypothesis of Baronius and Tillemont, that the Virgin accompanied him to Ephesus, has not even the authority of tradition (Lampe, i. 51).

† Lampe fixes A.D. 66, when Jerusalem was besieged by the Roman forces under Cestius, as the most probable date.

‡ In the earlier tradition which made the Apostles formally partition out the world known to them, Parthia falls to the lot of Thomas, while John received Proconular Asia (Euseb. H. E. iii. 1. Cp. note in Wace and Schaff's edition, in loco). In one of the legends connected with the Apostles' Creed, St. Peter contributes the first article, St. John the second, but the tradition appears with great variations as to time and order (cp. Pseudo-August. Serm. ccxli., ccxlii.).

§ Here again the hypotheses of commentators range from Claudius to Domitian, the consensus of patristic tradition preponderating in favour of the latter. [CP. REVELATION.]

c. 2).⁴ More true to the N. T. character of the Apostle is the story, told with so much power and beauty by Clement of Alexandria (Quis dices. c. 42), of his special and loving interest in the younger members of his flock; of his eagerness and courage in the attempt to rescue one of them who had fallen into evil courses. The scene of the old and loving man, standing face to face with the outlaw-chief whom, in days gone by, he had baptized, and winning him to repentance, is one which we could gladly look on as belonging to his actual life—part of a story which is, in Clement's words, ὁ μῦθος ἄλλα λόγος. Not less beautiful is that other scene which comes before us as the last act of his life. When all capacity to work and teach is gone—when there is no strength even to stand—the spirit still retains its power to love, and the lips are still opened to repeat, without change and variation, the command which summed up all his Master's will, "Little children, love one another" (Hieron. in Gal. vi.). Other stories, more apocryphal and less interesting, we may pass over rapidly. That he put forth his power to raise the dead to life (Euseb. H. E. v. 18); that he drank the cup of hemlock which was intended to cause his death, and suffered no harm from it⁵ (Pseudo-August. Soliloq.; Isidor. Hispal. de Morte Sanct. c. 73); that when he felt his death approaching he gave orders for the construction of his own sepulchre, and when it was finished calmly laid himself down in it and died (Augustin. Tract. in Joann. cxxiv.); that after his interment there were strange movements in the earth that covered him (ibid.); that when the tomb was subsequently opened it was found empty (Niceph. H. E. ii. 42); that he was reserved to reappear again in conflict with the personal Antichrist in the last days (Suicer. Theas. s. v. Ἰωάννης): these traditions, for the most part, indicate little else than the uncritical spirit of the age in which they passed current. The very time of his death lies within the region of conjecture rather than of history, and the dates that have been assigned for it range from A.D. 89 to A.D. 120 (Lampe, i. 92).

The result of all this accumulation of apocryphal materials is, from one point of view, disappointing enough. We strain our sight in vain to distinguish between the false and the true—between the shadows with which the gloom is peopled, and the living forms of which we are in search. We find it better and more satisfying to turn again, for all our conceptions of the Apostle's mind and character, to the scanty records of the N. T., and the writings which he himself has left. The truest thought that we can attain to is still that he was "the

² Eusebius and Irenæus make Cerinthus the heretic. In Epiphanius (Haer. xxx. c. 24) Eblion is the hero of the story. To modern feelings the anecdote may seem at variance with the character of the Apostle of Love, but it is hardly more than the development in act of the principle of 2 John 10. To the mind of Epiphanius there was a difficulty of another kind. Nothing less than a special inspiration could account for such a departure from an ascetic life as going to a bath at all.

⁴ The authority of Cassian is but slender in such a case; and the story is hardly to be rejected, on a priori grounds, as incompatible with the dignity of an Apostle. Does it not illustrate the truth—

"He prayeth best who loveth best

All things both great and small?"

disciple whom Jesus loved"—δ ἐπιστήθιος—returning that love with a deep, absorbing, unwavering devotion. One aspect of that feeling is seen in the zeal for his Master's glory, the burning indignation against all that seemed to outrage it, which runs, with its fiery gleam, through his whole life, and makes him, from first to last, one of the Sons of Thunder. To him, more than to any other disciple, there is no neutrality between Christ and Antichrist. The spirit of such a man is intolerant of compromises and concessions. The same strong personal affection shows itself, in another form, in the chief characteristics of his Gospel. While the other Evangelists record principally the discourses and parables which were spoken to the multitude, he treasures up every word and accent of dialogues and conversations, which must have seemed to most men less conspicuous. In the absence of any recorded narrative of his work as a preacher, in the silence which he appears to have kept for so many years, he comes before us as one who lives in the unseen eternal world, rather than in that of secular or even spiritual activity. If there is less apparent power to enter into the minds and hearts of men of different temperament and education, less ability to become all things to all men than there is in St. Paul, there is a perfection of another kind. The image mirrored in his soul is that of the Son of Man, who is also the Son of God. He is the Apostle of Love, not because he starts from the easy temper of a general benevolence, nor again as being of a character soft, yielding, feminine, but because he has grown, ever more and more, into the likeness of Him Whom he loved so truly. Nowhere is the vision of the Eternal Word, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, so unclouded: nowhere are there such distinctive personal reminiscences of the Christ, κατὰ σάρκα, in His most distinctively human characteristics. It was this union of the two aspects of the Truth which made him so truly the "Theologus" of the whole company of the Apostles, the instinctive opponent of all forms of a mystical, or logical, or docetic Gnosticism. It was a true feeling which led the later interpreters of the mysterious forms of the four living creatures round the throne (Rev. iv. 7)—departing in this instance from the earlier tradition—to see in him the eagle that soars into the highest heaven and looks upon the unclouded sun. It will be well to end with the noble words from the hymn of Adam of St. Victor, in which that feeling is embodied:—

"Coelum transit, veri rotam
Solls vidit, ibi totam
Mentis figens aeternam;
Speculator spiritalis
Quasi seraphim sub alas, Dei vidit faciem."*

Cp. the exhaustive Prolegomena to Lampe's Commentary; Neander, Pflanz. u. Leit. pp. 609-652;

* The older interpretation made Mark answer to the eagle, John to the lion (Salzer. Theol. s. v. εὐαγγελιστής).
† Another verse of this hymn, "Volat avis sine meta," et seq., is familiar to most students as the motto prefixed by Olshausen to his commentary on St. John's Gospel. The whole hymn is to be found in Trench's Sacred Latin Poetry, p. 71.

JOHN THE BAPTIST (Ἰωάννης ὁ Βαπτιστής), a saint more signally honoured of God than any other whose name is recorded in either the O. or the N. T. John was of the priestly race by both parents, for his father Zacharias was himself a priest of the course of Abia, or Abijah (1 Ch. xxiv. 10), offering incense at the very time when a son was promised to him; and Elizabeth was of the daughters of Aaron (Luke i. 5). Both, too, were devout persons—walking in the commandments of God, and waiting for the fulfilment of His promise to Israel. The divine mission of John was the subject of prophecy many centuries before his birth, for St. Matthew (iii. 3) tells us that it was John who was prefigured by Isaiah as "the Voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make His paths straight" (Is. xl. 3), while by the prophet Malachi the Spirit announces more definitely, "Behold, I will send My messenger, and he shall prepare the way before Me" (iii. 1). His birth—a birth not according to the ordinary laws of nature, but through the miraculous interposition of Almighty power—was foretold by an Angel sent from God, who announced it as an occasion of joy and gladness to many—and at the same time assigned to him the name of John to signify either that he was to be born of God's especial favour, or, perhaps, that he was to be the harbinger of grace. The Angel Gabriel moreover proclaimed the character and office of this wonderful child even before his conception, foretelling that he would be filled with the Holy Ghost from the first moment of his existence, and appear as the great reformer of his countrymen—another Elijah in the boldness with which he would speak truth and rebuke vice—but, above all, as the chosen forerunner and herald of the long-expected Messiah.

These marvellous revelations as to the character and career of the son, for whom he had so long prayed in vain, were too much for the faith of the aged Zacharias; and when he sought some assurance of the certainty of the promised blessing, God gave it to him in a judgment—the privation of speech—until the event foretold should happen; a judgment intended to serve as at once a token of God's truth, and a rebuke of his own incredulity. And now the Lord's gracious promise tarried not—Elizabeth, for greater privacy, retired into the hill-country, whither she was soon afterwards followed by her kinswoman Mary, who was herself the object and channel of Divine grace beyond measure greater and more mysterious. The two cousins, who were thus honoured above all the mothers of Israel, came together in an unnamed city belonging to the tribe of Judah in the hilly district, south of Jerusalem, of which Hebron was the centre (see Speaker's Comm. in loco); and immediately God's purpose was confirmed to them by a miraculous sign; for as soon as Elizabeth heard the salutations of Mary, the babe leaped in her womb, thus acknowledging, as it were even before birth, the Presence of his Lord (Luke i. 43, 44). Three months after this, and while Mary still remained with her, Elizabeth was delivered of a son. The birth of John preceded by six months that of our blessed Lord. [Respecting this date, see JESUS CHRIST, p. 1700.] On the eighth day the child of promise was, in conformity with the Law of Moses (Lev. xii. 3), brought to the priest for circumcision; and as the performance of this rite was the accustomed time for naming a child, the friends of the family proposed to call him Zacharias after the name of his father. The mother, however, required that he should be called John—a decision which Zacharias, still speechless, confirmed by writing on a tablet, "his name is John." The judgment on his want of faith was then at once withdrawn, and the first use which he made of his recovered speech was to praise Jehovah for His faithfulness and mercy (Luke i. 64). God's wonderful interposition in the birth of John had impressed the minds of many with a certain solemn awe and expectation (Luke iii. 15). God was surely again visiting His people. His providence, so long hidden, seemed once more about to manifest itself. The child thus supernaturally born must doubtless be commissioned to perform some important part in the history of the chosen people. Could he be the Messiah? Could he be Elijah? Was the era of their old Prophets about to be restored? With such grave thoughts were the minds of the people occupied, as they mused on the events which had been passing under their eyes, and said one to another, "What manner of child shall this be?" while Zacharias himself, "filled with the Holy Ghost," broke forth in that glorious strain of praise and prophecy so familiar to us in the morning service of our Church—a strain in which it is to be observed that the father, before speaking of his own child, blesses God for remembering His covenant and promise, in the redemption and salvation of His people through Him, of Whom his own son was the prophet and forerunner.

A single verse contains all that we know of John's history for a space of thirty years—the whole period which elapsed between his birth and the commencement of his public ministry: "The child grew and waxed strong in the spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel" (Luke i. 80). John, it will be remembered, was ordained to be a Nazarite (see Num. vi. 1–21) from his birth, for the words of the Angel were, "He shall drink neither wine nor strong drink" (Luke i. 15). What we are to understand by this brief announcement is probably this:—The chosen forerunner of the Messiah and herald of His Kingdom was required to forego the ordinary pleasures and indulgences of the world, and live a life of the strictest self-denial in retirement and solitude. It was thus that the holy Nazarite, dwelling by himself in the wild and thinly peopled region westward of the Dead Sea, called "Desert" in the text, prepared himself by self-discipline, and by constant communion with God, for the wonderful office to which he had been divinely called. Here year after year of his stern probation passed by, till at length the time for the fulfilment of his mission arrived. The very appearance of the holy Baptist was of itself a lesson to his countrymen; his dress was that of the old prophets—a garment woven of camel's hair (2 K. i. 8), attached to the body by a leathern girdle. His food was such as the desert afforded—locusts (Lev. xi. 22) and wild honey (Ps. lxxxi. 16).

And now the long-secluded hermit came forth to the discharge of his office. His supernatural birth—his hard ascetic life—his reputation for extraordinary sanctity—and the generally prevailing expectation that some great one was about to appear—these causes, without the aid of miraculous power, for "John did no miracle" (John x. 41), were sufficient to attract to him a great multitude from "every quarter" (Matt. iii. 5). Brief and startling was his first exhortation to them—"Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." Some score verses contain all that is recorded of John's preaching, and the sum of it all is repentance; not mere legal ablation or expiation, but a change of heart and life. Herein John, though exhibiting a marked contrast to the Scribes and Pharisees of his own time, was but repeating with the stimulus of a new and powerful motive the lessons which had been again and again impressed upon them by their ancient Prophets (cp. Is. i. 16, 17, lv. 7; Jer. vii. 3–7; Ezek. xviii. 19–32, xxxvi. 25–27; Joel ii. 12, 13; Mic. vi. 8; Zech. i. 3, 4). But while such was his solemn admonition to the multitude at large, he adopted towards the leading sects of the Jews a severer tone, denouncing Pharisees and Sadducees alike as "a generation of vipers," and warning them of the folly of trusting to external privileges as descendants of Abraham (Luke iii. 8). Now at last he warns them that "the axe was laid to the root of the tree"—that formal righteousness would be tolerated no longer, and that none would be acknowledged for children of Abraham but such as did the works of Abraham (cp. John viii. 39). Such alarming declarations produced their effect, and many of every class pressed forward to confess their sins and to be baptized.

What then was the baptism which John administered? Not altogether a new rite, for it was the custom of the Jews to baptize proselytes to their religion—not an ordinance in itself conveying remission of sins, but rather a token and symbol of that repentance which was an indispensable condition of forgiveness through Him, Whom John pointed out as "the Lamb of God Which taketh away the sin of the world" (R. V.). Still less did the baptism of John impart the grace of regeneration—of a new spiritual life (Acts xix. 3, 4). This was to be the mysterious effect of Baptism "with the Holy Ghost," which was to be ordained by that "Mightier One," Whose coming he proclaimed. The preparatory baptism of John was a visible sign to the people, and a distinct acknowledgment by them, that a hearty renunciation of sin and a real amendment of life were necessary for admission into the Kingdom of Heaven, which the Baptist proclaimed to be at hand. But the fundamental distinction between John's baptism unto repentance, and that Baptism accompanied with the gift of the Holy Spirit which our Lord afterwards ordained, is clearly marked by John himself (Matt. iii. 11, 12).

As a preacher, John was eminently practical and discriminating. Self-love and covetousness were the prevalent sins of the people at large: on them therefore he enjoined charity, and consideration for others. The publicans he cautioned against extortion, the soldiers against violence and plunder. His answers to them are, no doubt, to be regarded as instances of the appropriate warning and advice which he addressed to every class.

The mission of the Baptist—an extraordinary one for an extraordinary purpose—was not limited to those who had openly forsaken the covenant of God, and so forfeited its principles. It was to the whole people alike. This we must infer from the baptism of one who had no confession to make, and no sins to wash away. Jesus Himself came from Galilee to Jordan to be baptized of John, on the special ground that it became Him “to fulfil all righteousness,” and, as Man, to submit to the customs and ordinances which were binding upon the rest of the Jewish people. John, however, naturally at first shrank from offering the symbols of purity to the sinless Son of God. But here a difficult question arises—How is John’s acknowledgment of Jesus at the moment of His presenting Himself for baptism compatible with his subsequent assertion that he knew Him not, save by the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Him, which took place after His baptism (see Westcott in loco)? If it be difficult to imagine that the two cousins were not personally acquainted with each other, it must be borne in mind that their places of residence were at the two extremities of the country, with but little means of communication between them. Perhaps, too, John’s special destination and mode of life may have kept him from the stated festivals of his countrymen at Jerusalem. It is possible therefore that the Saviour and the Baptist had never before met. It was certainly of the utmost importance that there should be no suspicion of concert or collusion between them. John, however, must assuredly have been in daily expectation of Christ’s manifestation to Israel, and so a word or sign would have sufficed to reveal to him the Person and Presence of our Lord, though we may well suppose such a fact to be made known by a direct communication from God, as in the case of Simeon (Luke ii. 26; cp. Jackson on the Creed, Works, Ox. Ed. iv. 404). At all events, it is wholly inconceivable that John should have been permitted to baptize the Son of God without being enabled to distinguish Him from any of the ordinary multitude. Upon the whole, the true meaning of the words καὶ ἐὼς οὐκ ᾔδειν αὐτὸν would seem to be as follows:—And I, even I, though standing in so near a relation to Him, both personally and ministerially, had no assured knowledge of Him as the Messiah. I did not know Him as such, and I had not authority to proclaim Him as such, till I saw the predicted sign in the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Him. It must be borne in mind that John had no means of knowing by previous announcement, whether this wonderful acknowledgment of the Divine Son would be vouchsafed to His forerunner at His Baptism, or at any other time (see Dr. Mill’s Hist. Character of St. Luke’s Gospel, and the authorities quoted by him).

With the Baptism of Jesus John’s more especial office ceased. The King had come to his Kingdom. The function of the herald was discharged. It was this that John had with singular humility and self-renunciation announced beforehand: “He must increase, but I must decrease.”

John, however, still continued to present himself to his countrymen in the capacity of witness to Jesus. Especially did he bear testimony to Him at Bethany beyond Jordan (for Bethaar, not Bethabara, is the reading of the best MSS.). So confidently indeed did he point out the Lamb of God, on Whom he had seen the Spirit alighting like a dove, that two of his own disciples, St. Andrew, and probably St. John, being convinced by his testimony, followed Jesus as the true Messiah.

From incidental notices in Scripture we learn that John and his disciples continued to baptize some time after our Lord entered upon His ministry (see John iii. 23, iv. 1; Acts xix. 3). We gather also that John instructed his disciples in certain moral and religious duties, as fasting (Matt. ix. 14; Luke v. 33) and prayer (Luke xi. 1).

But shortly after he had given his testimony to the Messiah, John’s public ministry was brought to a close. He had at the beginning of it condemned the hypocrisy and worldliness of the Pharisees and Sadducees, and he now had occasion to denounce the lust of a king. In daring disregard of the Divine laws, Herod Antipas had taken to himself the wife of his brother Philip; and when John reproved him for this, as well as for other sins (Luke iii. 19), Herod cast him into prison. The place of his confinement was the castle of Machærus—a fortress on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. It was here that reports reached him of the miracles which our Lord was working in Judæa—miracles which, doubtless, were to John’s mind but the confirmation of what he expected to hear as to the establishment of the Messiah’s Kingdom. But if Christ’s Kingdom were indeed established, it was the duty of John’s own disciples no less than of all others to acknowledge it. They, however, would naturally cling to their own master, and be slow to transfer their allegiance to another. With a view therefore of overcoming their scruples, John sent two of them to Jesus Himself to ask the question, “Art Thou He that should come?” They were answered not by words, but by a series of miracles wrought before their eyes—the very miracles which prophecy had specified as the distinguishing credentials of the Messiah (Is. xxxv. 5, lxi. 1); and while Jesus bade the two messengers carry back to John as His only answer the report of what they had seen and heard, He took occasion to guard the multitude who surrounded Him, against supposing that the Baptist himself was shaken in mind, by a direct appeal to their own knowledge of his life and character. Well might they be appealed to as witnesses that the stern prophet of the wilderness was no waverer, bending to every breeze, like the reeds on the banks of Jordan. Proof abundant had they that John was no worldling with a heart set upon rich clothing and dainty fare—the luxuries of a king’s court—and they must have been ready to acknowledge that one so inured to a life of hardness and privation was not likely to be affected by the ordinary terrors of a prison. But our Lord not only vindicates His forerunner from any suspicion of inconstancy, He goes on to proclaim him a prophet, and more than a prophet; nay, inferior to none born of woman, though in respect to spiritual privileges behind the least of those who were to be born of the Spirit and admitted into the fellowship of Christ's Body (Matt. xi. 11). It should be noted that the expression $\delta \delta\epsilon \mu\kappa\rho\upsilon\tau\epsilon\rho\varsigma, \kappa.\tau.\lambda.$ is understood by Chrysostom, Augustin, Hilary, and some modern commentators, to mean Christ Himself, but this interpretation is less agreeable to the spirit and tone of our Lord's discourse.

Jesus further proceeds to declare that John was, according to the true meaning of the prophecy, the Elijah of the new covenant, foretold by Malachi (iii. 4). The event indeed proved that John was to Herod what Elijah had been to Ahab, and a prison was deemed too light a punishment for his boldness in asserting God's Law before the face of a king and a queen. Nothing but the death of the Baptist would satisfy the resentment of Herodias. Though foiled once, she continued to watch her opportunity, which at length arrived. A court festival was kept at Machaerus in honour of the king's birthday. After supper, the daughter of Herodias came in and danced before the company, and so charmed was the king by her grace that he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she should ask.

Salome, prompted by her abandoned mother, demanded the head of John the Baptist. The promise had been given in the hearing of his distinguished guests, and so Herod, though loth to be made the instrument of so bloody a work, gave instructions to an officer of his guard, who went and executed John in the prison, and his head was brought to feast the eyes of the adulteress whose sins he had denounced.

Thus was John added to that glorious army of martyrs who have suffered for righteousness' sake. His death is supposed to have occurred just before the third Passover, in the course of the Lord's ministry. It is by Josephus (Ant. xviii. 5, § 2) attributed to the jealousy with which Herod regarded his growing influence with the people. Herod undoubtedly looked upon him as some extraordinary person, for no sooner did he hear of the miracles of Jesus than, though a Sadducee himself, and as such a disbeliever in the Resurrection, he ascribed them to John, whom he supposed to have risen from the dead. Holy Scripture tells us that the body of the Baptist was laid in the tomb by his disciples, and Ecclesiastical history records the honours which successive generations paid to his memory.

The brief history of John's life is marked throughout with the characteristic graces of self-denial, humility, and holy courage. So great indeed was his abstinence that worldly men considered him possessed. "John came neither eating nor drinking, and they said he hath a devil." His humility was such that he had again and again to disavow the character, and decline the honours which an admiring multitude almost forced upon him. To their questions he answered plainly, he was not the Christ, nor the Elijah of whom they were thinking, nor one of their old Prophets. He was no one—a voice merely—the Voice of God calling His people to repentance in preparation for the coming of Him whose shoe latchet he was not worthy to unloose.

For his boldness in speaking truth, he went a willing victim to prison and to death.

ST. JOHN, GOSPEL OF. The questions which occur at the threshold of an examination of any writing which has confessedly come down from remote antiquity are: Who is its author? How do we know this from history, how from the writing itself? What are the contents of the writing? Is there anything special in their matter or their form? At what date was it written, and what object did the writer put before himself? Are there other extant writings of the same author, or other extant writings on the same subjects by other authors? and, if so, how is this writing related to them? Does the present copy faithfully represent the original text? These questions are not logically distinct, and the answers to them must here and there overlap, but, as applied to the present writing, they will fall with sufficient accuracy into the following scheme:—

I. AUTHORSHIP.

(i.) Evidence of History.

A. The Second Century.—It is beyond question that from the close of the third quarter of the second century the Fourth Gospel was accepted as the work of St. John. The evidence is cumulative. Asia Minor and Gaul, Alexandria and Carthage; Irenaeus, Clement, and Tertullian; the Peshitto Syriac and the Old Latin Versions; the Muratorian Canon (cp. CANON, p. 513), are witnesses whose evidence cannot be disputed and whose authority cannot be gainsaid. But the fact of this wide-spread testimony carries with it the further fact of acceptance stretching back into the earlier decades of the century.

To trace the distinct lines of this earlier acceptance is not an easy task, inasmuch as the extant literature is on the one hand fragmentary, and on the other hand frequent reference or quotation does not fall within its scope. The argumentum ex silentio, precarious everywhere, is powerless here; and to ask for exact quotation, and nothing less than exact quotation, from writers who habitually quoted from memory or whose copies of the texts were imperfect or corrupt or not at hand, is to prejudice the question by demanding evidence which in the very nature of the case cannot exist. Going backwards from Irenaeus, our chief witnesses are the following:—

(a.) CELSUS (cf. Keim, Celsus' Wahres Wort; Aelteste Stritschrift, &c., Zürich, 1873).—The one work of Celsus, the Λόγος ἀληθῆς, is known only by the reply of Origen, Contra Celsum, and Origen was himself left wholly to conjecture as to the history of the author. The date is A.D. 176–180 (Keim, A.D. 177 or 178). Keim is at least not biased in favour of the Johannine authorship of the Gospel, but he is certain that the whole standpoint of Celsus is taken from St. John (Wahres Wort, &c., 229 sq.). So is his reviewer Harnack (Evang.-Luther-Kirchenzeitung, 1873, p. 657).

(b.) CHURCHES OF VIENNE AND LYONS (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 1, 15).—This letter was addressed to the churches of Asia and Phrygia, and gives an account of the suffering under Marcus Aurelius in A.D. 177. It is often assigned, and perhaps rightly, to Irenaeus. It mentions the Paraclete, and formally quotes with almost verbal accuracy John xvi. 2.

(c.) ATHENAGORAS (Supplicat. pro Christ. and De Resurr., ed. Otto, 1857) is not named by Eusebius or Jerome, Photius or Suidas, but there is no reason to doubt that the Apology and Treatise are both genuine, and that the date is c. A.D. 176–7. The tenth chapter of the Apology is based upon the Prologue of St. John, and implies a knowledge of cap. xvii. 21–23.

(d.) APOLINARIS (Chron. Paschal., ed. Dindorf 1832, i. p. 14; Routh, Rel. Sac. i. pp. 160, 161; and Lightfoot, Essays on Supernatural Religion, 1889, p. 237 sq.) was Bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia (A.D. 171). Of his writings (imperfect list in Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 27; cp. Theodoret. Haer. Fab. i. 21) only a few fragments remain. They contain the following passages:—(1) ὁθεν ἀσυμφωνῆς τε νόμου ἢ νόμοις αὐτῶν, καὶ στασιάζειν δοκεῖ κατ' αὐτοὺς τὰ εὐαγγέλια, which implies that St. John is to be included among the εὐαγγέλια: and (2) ὁ τὴν ἁγίαν πλευρὰν ἐκκεντηθεὶς ὁ ἐκχέας ἐκ τῆς πλευρᾶς αὐτοῦ τὰ δύο πάλιν καθόρτια δῶκεν καὶ αἷμα· λόγον καὶ πνεῦμα, which can only be explained by reference to John xix. 34.

(e.) MELITO of Sardis (c. A.D. 176, Otto, Corpus Apologetarum, 1872, pp. 374–511; Routh, Rel. Sac. i. 113–153; Bp. Lightfoot, Essays, ut supra, p. 223 sq.) is named by Polycrates (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii. 31, and v. 24), and his fragments are of special interest as containing the phrase τὰ τῆς παλαιᾶς διαθήκης βιβλία (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 26). For the present purpose the phrase . . . τὴν μὲν θεότητα αὐτοῦ διὰ τῶν σημείων ἐν τῇ τριετίᾳ τῆ μετὰ τὸ βάπτισμα (Otto, p. 416) is more important as testifying in word and matter to St. John. (Cp. Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. ii. 22.

(f.) POLYCRATES of Ephesus (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 24) designates St. John as ὁ ἐπὶ τὸ στήθος τοῦ Κυρίου ἀναπεσών, with obvious reference to capp. xiii. 25 and xxi. 20 of the Gospel. He was bishop of Ephesus in the last decade of the 2nd century.

(g.) ΤΑΤΙΑΝ, fl. 150–170 (Otto, Corpus Apolog. vi. 1851; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iv. 29).—The Λόγος πρὸς Ἕλληνας was written soon after the death of Justin (? 150). It does not perhaps contain any reference to the Synoptic Gospels, but the following passages taken as a whole seem clearly to imply a knowledge of St. John:—

Θεὸς ἦν ἐν ἀρχῇ, τὴν δὲ ἀρχὴν λόγον διόντων παρειλήφαμεν (Oratio ad Graecos, cap. 5; Otto, pp. 20, 22). Cp. John i. 1 and 12.

πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ καὶ χωρὶς αὐτοῦ γέγονον οὐδὲ ἐν (Ad Graec. cap. xix.; Otto, p. 88). Cp. John i. 3 in Westcott and Hort's text.

καὶ τοῦτο ἔστιν ἄρα τὸ εἰρημένον· ἡ σκοτία τὸ φῶς οὐ καταλαμβάνει (Ad Graec. cap. xiii.; Otto, p. 60). Cp. John i. 5.

On the romantic history of Tatian's Harmony of the Gospels or Diatessaron, it must suffice to refer to the Bampton Lectures for 1890, pp. 375–387, and the authorities there quoted. In the words of Dr. Adolf Harnack, no partial judge: "We learn from the Diatessaron that about 160 A.D. our four Gospels had already taken a place of prominence in the Church, and that no others had done so; that in particular the Fourth Gospel had taken a fixed place alongside of the three synoptics" (Encyc. Brit., 1888, xxiii. 81).

(h.) VALENTINUS AND HIS SCHOOL: PROLEMAEUS, HERACLEON, MARCUS, THEODOTUS (Irenaeus, Adv. Haeres. iii. 4, 3; Duncker et Schneidewin, Hippolyti Refutatio omnium Haeresium, 1859).—Valentinus came to Rome under Hyginus (? 135–141), and lived on in the time of Anicetus ("sub Aniceto invaluit" [? 154(6)–166(7)]). He was working in Alexandria before this, and his period may therefore be fixed at A.D. 130–160. Tertullian represents Valentinus in contrast to Marcion: ". . . Neque enim si Valentinus integro instrumento uti videtur, non callidior ingenio quam Marcion manus intulit veritati. Marcion enim exerte et palam machaera, non stilo usus est, quoniam ad materiam suam caedem scripturarum confecit: Valentinus autem pepercit, quoniam non ad materiam scripturas, sed materiam ad scripturas excogitavit" (De Praes. Haeret. xxxviii.). That in Tertullian's use videtur = constat, see Oehler's note in loco, and cp. especially Adv. Marc. iv. 2, "Lucam videtur Marcion elegisse quem caederet."

PTOLEMAEUS is the oldest of the disciples of Valentinus, and represents with Heracleon the Italian division of the school. He had himself become the centre of a party (of πρὸς Πτολεμαίων, Adv. Haer. i. Praef. 2), at the time when Irenaeus was beginning his work, and this necessarily leads far back into the decade A.D. 170–180, and probably indicates a date nearer to 160 than to 170. Of Ptolemy there is an extant Epistle to Flora preserved in Epiphanius, κατὰ Ἀλφεισίων, cap. xxxiii. 3–7, and it quotes John i. 3 with the formula Ἀέγι· . . . ὁ ἀπόστολος. In the account of the Valentinian system Irenaeus makes Ptolemy quote

St. John: cp. ἐν τῷ εἰρηκεῖναι· καὶ τί εἶπω οὐκ οἶδα (Adv. Haeres. i. ch. viii. 2) with John xii. 27; and name St. John as the writer of the Gospel . . . λέγει δε οὕτως· ἐν ἀρχῇ ἦν ὁ λόγος . . . (Adv. Haeres. i. ch. viii. 5). The Old Latin Version says at the close of this section: "et Ptolemaeus quidem ita."

HERACLEON (Hilgenfeld, Ketzergeschichte, 1884, pp. 60 sq., 288 sq., 464 sq.; and especially the Cambridge Texts and Studies, vol. i. No. 4) is coupled by Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. ii. ch. iv. 1) with Ptolemaeus, and is called by Clement "the most esteemed representative of the school of Valentinus" (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 9, 73). He wrote a Commentary on St. John, of which large extracts are preserved by Origen (cp. Stieren, Irenaeus, i. 938-971, where they are collected after Grabe and Massuet). These extracts give continuous comments on passages of considerable length. It cannot be doubted that the writer of the notes regarded the text as of Divine authority. Origen uses of Heracleon (Ioannem, tom. ii. 8) the phrase γνώριμον τῶν Οὐαλεντινίου, in the sense probably of a disciple or pupil.

MARCUS does not add to the quotations from St. John (Adv. Haeres. i. xiii.-xxi.), but this negative result is confirmatory of the abundant positive results from his associates. The way in which Irenaeus makes an elder of Asia Minor speak of him tends to throw back his date—and if his date, then the date of his older colleagues—towards the middle of the century.

THEODOTUS is known from the Excerpta Theodoti and Doctrina Orientalis, which is ascribed to Clement of Alexandria, and printed with his works (Opp. ed. Dindorf, iii. 424 sq.). The quotations from St. John are frequent. De Groot counts twenty-six (Basilides, 1868, p. 102).

The facts before us then fully establish that which Irenaeus asserts . . . "Hi autem qui a Valentino sunt, eo quod est secundum Johannem [Evangelio] plenissime utentes . . ." (Adv. Haeres. iii. 11, 7).

Of this plenissime utentes the account of the Thirty Aeon (Adv. Haeres. i. 1) is evidence. This may in form be Ptolemaean rather than Valentinian, but in substance the essential factors of the system are the master's, not the pupil's. Ptolemaeus is the exponent of Valentinus, and from this point of view one with him. If the complex is later than the simple, if development follows the germ, if the stream is lower down than the spring, the Aeon of the Valentinians necessarily assert at the date of Valentinus the pre-existence of the Gospel according to St. John.

The testimony of Hippolytus to the use of the Gospel by the Valentinians is also clear. Cp. φησί, . . . Πίστες οἱ πρὸ ἐμοῦ ἐληλυθότες κλέπτει καὶ ἀρσάει εἰς (Refut. omn. Haeres. vi. 35) with John x. 8, and see the distinctively Johannine δ' ἀρχῶν τοῦ κόσμου τούτου (John xii. 31, xiv. 30, xvi. 11) in the Refutatio (vi. 33, 34). The use of φησὶν in Hippolytus may not warrant the inference that he here makes Valentinus a direct witness to St. John, but he identifies the founder with his school; and the general result of the Valentinian testimony is not less than proof that this Order of Gnostics which flourished in the middle of the second century (A.D. 130-180) accepted the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel, and felt bound to harmonize their own systems with it.

(i.) BASILIDES, fl. in the reign of Hadrian, A.D. 117-138 (Euseb. H. E. iv. 7; Hippolytus, Refutatio, ut supra, vii. 20-27; Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. §§ 83 sq.; Exegetica printed by Stieren after Massuet and Grabe, Irenaeus, pp. 901-3; Hort, art. 'Basilides' in Dict. of Chr. Biog. i. 271; and an article by Dr. James Drummond in Journ. of Bibl. Lit. 1892).—Eusebius (l. c.) represents Agrippa Castor as stating that Basilides wrote "twenty-four books (βιβλία) on the Gospel (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον)," i.e. on probably the Book of the Gospels. These are almost certainly the Exegetica quoted by Clement (Strom. iv. 83 sq.); for there is no reason to believe that τὸ εὐαγγέλιον is here = ἡ τῶν ὑπερκόσμιων γνῶσις (Ref. Haer. vii. 27), and there is no other trace of a "Gospel by Basilides" (Origen, Hom. in Luc. i.—? another name for the Exegetica; Ambrose, Exp. in Luc. i.), nor any trace of his use of an apocryphal Gospel. There is every reason for believing further that these Exegetica form the foundation of the exposition of doctrine by Hippolytus (Ref. vii. 20-27 ut supra), and that Hippolytus in contrast with Irenaeus is quoting at first hand from Basilides. That Basilides is quoting from St. John will not be questioned. Cp. καὶ τοῦτο, φησὶν, ἔστι τὸ λεγόμενον ἐν τοῖς εὐαγγελίοις· Ἦν τὸ φῶς τὸ ἀληθινόν, ὃ φωτίζει πάντα ἄνθρωπον ἐρχόμενον εἰς τὸν κόσμον (Ref. ut supra, vii. 22) with John i. 9; and ταῖς δέ, φησὶν, ἑκαστον ἰδίου ἔχει καιροῦς, ἵκανός δ' σωτῆρ λέγων· Οὐκ ἦκει ἡ ὥρα μου (ibid. vii. 27) with John ii. 4. The doubt as to what stress can be laid upon φησὶν occurs here, as in the quotations from Valentinus (supra).

The second quotation is followed in the next sentence by ὁ κατ' αὐτοῦς νενοημένος, which may identify Basilides with his followers; but in the first instance he is singled out by name just before, and the sense of φησὶν is undoubted. "Basilides, therefore, about the year 125 of our era, had before him the Fourth Gospel." (Cp. Matthew Arnold, God and the Bible, ed. 1875, p. 268 sq.; Ezra Abbot, Authorship, &c. p. 86; Bampton Lectures, 1890, pp. 365 sqq.).

(j.) THE ORIENTAL GNOSTICS: THE OPHITES OR NAASENI; THE PERATICI; THE SETHIANS; THE GNOSTIC JUSTIN (Hippolytus, Refut. ut supra, v. 7-9, and 12, 16, 17).—Here the quotations from St. John are both numerous and undoubted, but it is not so certain that Hippolytus is describing the first representatives of these early Gnostic sects. Still the evidence is at least proof that, in the second half of the century, these Gnostic sects also made familiar use of St. John as of Divine authority. Here, again, the acceptance in the second half of the century necessarily leads back to acceptance at an earlier date.

(k.) THE CLEMENTINES (Lagarde, Clementina, 1865, and Recognitions, Syriace, 1861; Geisdorf, Recognitions, 1838).—These Ebionite writings, falsely ascribed to Clement of Rome, exist in two forms: the Homilies, extant in Greek, which has been assigned by modern writers to every decade of the second century; and the Recognitions, a composite, and probably later (?) work which exists only in the untrustworthy translation of Rufinus, and is for the present purpose therefore not available. The Syriac Version is made up of portions of the Recognitions and of portions of the Homilies (Lagarde, Preface, 6 and 7), and the older of the two extant codices is thus described: "A oblongus, M. Brit. add. 12150, scriptus Edessae a. 411;" i.e. it leads back to within one year of the death of Rufinus, and it is itself a copy of a yet older MS. Lagarde in his preface to the Clementina (p. 30) gives fifteen instances of quotation from or reference to St. John; to these may be added ἄνω ἐπιτομή (ὡς ἔστιν) (p. 4, l. 26; cp. p. 117, 11)—cp. John iv. 10; while some in the list should perhaps be omitted, except in so far as the definite quotations bring the slighter references also within the range of probability.

The uncertainty is not now as to the use of St. John by the Christian Judaizers, who assumed the name of Clement to give authority to their own hostility to St. Paul, but as to the date at which such use was made. A consensus of critical opinion assigns the Clementines to the middle of the second century; and this may perhaps be taken as the nearest approximation to the date which is attainable. The impression which the work leaves on my own mind is that in its present Roman form it belongs to the end rather than the middle of the century, and that it is based upon earlier Eastern forms, which cannot be later and are probably much earlier than the middle of the century.

(l.) MARCION is to be excepted from the direct witnesses to the Fourth Gospel. His ſtorit is not later than 138-142 A.D. Marcion's Gospel was a mutilated St. Luke, and he rejected the other Gospels (including the "anti-Jewish" St. John) on account of their Jewish prejudices (Iren. Haer. iii. 12, § 12). That he knew the Fourth Gospel and knew it to be apostolic may be inferred from Tertullian ("... connititur ad destruendum statum eorum evangeliorum quae propria et sub apostolorum nomine eduntur, vel etiam apostolicorum, ut scilicet fidem, quam illis admittit, suo conferat; " etsi reprehensus est Petrus et Johannes et Jacobus," Adv. Marc. iv. 3; "Si scripturas opinionii tuae resistentes non de industria alias rejecisses, alias corrupcisses, confudisset te in hac specie evangelium Joannis," De Carne Christi, iii.). Against the argument that St. John would have suited him better, and that if he had known it he would have used it, see Mangold in note to his edition of Bleek's Eimleitung, 1875, p. 158 ("It was simply impossible for Marcion to choose the fourth Gospel"), and refs. in Ezra Abbot, Authorship, &c. p. 82 sq. This is the only argument that can be based upon the silence of an avowedly eclectic writer.

Marcion is then in reality a witness for, not against, the Gospel; and the witness is from Rome, A.D. 140, and from Asia Minor for some earlier period.

(m.) MONTANUS appeared in Phrygia about A.D. 157. The terms παράκλητος, λόγος, which he adopted, place him as a witness to distinct Johannine phraseology, as then accepted in the Church.

(n.) JUSTIN MARTYR (Opera, ed. Otto, 1876-81; Apologiae, ed. Brauning, 1883).—The writings consist of two Apologies (the first A.D. 145 or 146; the second, if really a separate treatise, a year later), which were addressed to the Roman Emperor and Senate; and a Dialogue with Trypho, a Jew, about the same date as the Second Apology (Dial. c. 120; cf. Apol. i. c. 26). For the earlier date (138 or 139) for the First Apology there is, however, the high authority of Waddington (Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscr. et Belles Lettres, xvi. i. p. 264 sqq.), and Harnack (Theol. Literaturzeitung, 1876, No. 1, col. 14), who is able to support himself by the opinions of Caspari (Quellen z. Gesch. d. Taufsymbols, &c. Thl. iii. 1875), which he reviews.

In these writings Justin quotes certain "Memoirs" or "Recollections" (Ἀπομνημονεύματα) of the Apostles which he himself identifies with the Gospels (ἡ καλεῖται εὐαγγέλιον, Apol. i. 66). These Memoirs by the Apostles were read on the day called Sunday in the public Church meetings, with the same authority as—they are indeed named before—the writings of the Prophets (Apol. i. 67). That Justin includes among these Memoirs the Fourth Gospel and definitely quotes from it, may now be regarded as an established result of English criticism. See especially the full discussion by Ezra Abbot (Authorship, &c. pp. 20 sqq.), Drummond (Theological Review, xii. 471-488; xiv. 155, 323; and xvi. 365 sqq.), and Sanday (Gospels in the Second Century, 1876, p. 287). The crucial passage is in the Apology (i. 61, ed. Otto, i. 164-166): καὶ γὰρ ὁ Χριστὸς ἔειπεν ἅν μὴ ἀναγεννηθῆτε, οὐ μὴ εἰσελθῆτε εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν. ὅτι δὲ καὶ ἀδύνατον εἰς τὰς μητέρας τῶν τεκνοῦσάν τοὺς ἀπὰρ γεννημένους ἐμβῆναι, φανερὸν πάντι ἐστί. Cp. John iii. 3-5, 7, and Matt. xviii. 3. The connexion here between Justin and St. John is so obvious in word and thought, that men who cannot deny it and yet approach the question with the a priori conviction that Justin cannot quote St. John, are driven to the opinion that St. John is quoting Justin. This is happily a case in which every man can form his own opinion. Justin's remark, "that it is impossible for those who have once been born to enter into the wombs of those who brought them forth is manifest to all," is in itself, and in connexion with his context, absolutely meaningless. In St. John's context where Nicodemus prefers a reductio ad absurdum in order to lead the Rabbi to fuller explanation, the meaning is perfectly clear. There can be only one conclusion. Others lay stress on the differences in expression and on the fact that Justin's text is supported by the Clementine Homilies (xi. 26, ed. Lagarde, p. 117). The agreement between Justin and the Clementines is scarcely more exact than that between Justin and St. John. There is, moreover, every reason to think that the author of the Clementines made use of Justin; and his free quotation may have been in this way influenced. Both need no further explanation than the habit of quoting from memory, and the influence of Matt. xxviii. 19 and xviii. 3. The assumption of an apocryphal Gospel from which these quotations are made, is justified only when every other explanation fails. It cannot be verified; and if it could, and if Justin quotes from an X Gospel as the Gospel of the Hebrews, then X must here quote from St. John; i.e. St. John is on this assumption thrown back to a still earlier date. (On this text see especially.

Supernatural Religion, ed. 7, ii. 304 sqq.; Dr. Edwin Abbott, Encyc. Brit., art. "Gospels;" Dr. Ezra Abbot and Prof. Drummond ut supra).

This one passage may now be taken to be conclusive as to Justin's use of St. John, but other instances are not wanting; cp. of ἄνθρωποι ὑπελάμβανον αὐτὸν εἶναι τὸν Χριστὸν· πρὸς οὓς καὶ αὐτὸς ἐβόα· οὐκ εἰμὶ ὁ Χριστὸς, ἀλλὰ φωνὴ βοῶντος (Dial. c. Tryph. lxxxviii.) with John i. 20, 23, and iii. 28. Negative criticism is destructive not of its subject but of itself, when it asks us to believe that we have here not a reference to St. John but an expansion of Acts xiii. 25.

Cp. τοὺς ἐκ γενετῆς πηροὺς (Dial. c. Tryph. lxi. and Apol. i. 60, ? πηροὺς for πονηροὺς) with John ix. 1. The Constit. Apost. (ed. Lagarde, 1862) have ὁ ἐκ γενετῆς πηρός (v. 7, 17) in a context which makes the reference to St. John undoubted. So have the Clementines (περὶ τοῦ ἐκ γενετῆς πηροῦ, ut supra, ix. 22). The context in Justin shows that πηρός here = τυφλός, as it constantly does (Otto's note in loco) and ἐκ γενετῆς is distinctively Johannine. The Synoptists have no instance of congenital disease.

Cp. σάρκα καὶ αἷμα (Apol. i. 66) with John vi. 51-56.

Cp. ὁ ἀπὸ τοῦ πατρὸς αὐτοῦ λαβὼν ἔχει (Dial. c. Tryph. c.) with John x. 18 (ἔλαβον παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς μου).

Cp. Justin's quotation of Hosea (Apol. i. 52; cp. Dial. c. Tryph. xxxii, lxiv, cxviii.) and John xix. 37. Both have ἕθονα εἰς ἃν ἐξεκέντησαν, which is also the reading of Apoc. i. 7, for the LXX. ἐπιβλέπονται πρὸς με ἀνθ' ὧν κἀρχήσαντο. That this reading occurs in ten MSS. of the LXX., and that it is probably a correction made to establish the fulfilment of prophecy, does not take from the remarkable coincidence. These MSS. of the LXX. may have been themselves corrected from the text of St. John (cp. p. 1750).

Justin contains beyond doubt the doctrine of the LOGOS in a developed Johannine form. The incarnation of the Logos (the Divine Logos) and the historic person cannot have been derived from any other source; and yet σαρκωοιηθεὶς occurs in this sense frequently (Apol. i. cc. 32, 66 (bis); Dial. cc. 45, 84, 87, 100; cf. Dial. cc. 48, 76). In like manner we have ἄνθρωπος γενόμενος (Apol. i. cc. 5, 23 (bis), 32, 42, 50, 53, 63 (bis); Apol. ii. c. 13; Dial. c. Tryph. cc. 48, 57, 84, 67, 68 (bis), 76, 85, 100, 101, 125 (bis)).

See these references and the whole relation of Justin to St. John worked out by Drummond and Ezra Abbot ut supra.

(o.) EPISTLE TO DIOGNETUS (Otto, Epist. ad Diognetum, Gr. et Lat., ed. iii. 1879; Harnack, Patr. Apost. Opp. Fasc. ii., 1, 1878, p. 142 sqq.; Dräseke, Der Brief an Diognetos, 1881; Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, 1891, p. 484 sq.).—Our knowledge of the date of this fragment is too uncertain for us to lay great stress on its evidence. If we cannot with Bishop Westcott place it as early as the close of the reign of Trajan (A.D. 117; Canon, p. 79), everything points to a date not much later. A.D. 135 (Reuss and Bunsen) or A.D. 150 (Lightfoot) is certainly a wide margin. Its testimony to the Fourth Gospel is undoubted. Cp. e.g. the passage οὐκ εἰσὶ δὲ ἐκ τοῦ κόσμου (cap. vi.) with John xvii. 14, or cap. x.

with John iii. 16 and 1 John iv. 19, or cap. xi. with John i. 1. (See also Westcott, l. c.)

(p.) PAPIAS (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. iii. 39; Iren. Adv. Haeres. v. 33, 4; cp. Lightfoot, Essays on Supernatural Religion, 1889, pp. 142-216, and Apost. Fathers, 1891, p. 515 sq.) wrote an Exposition of Oracles of the Lord (Λογίων Κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις or ἐξηγήσεις) in five Books which are lost, and known only by some fragments, chiefly in Irenaeus and Eusebius. He is described as a "hearer of John and companion of Polycarp" (Ἰωάννου· μὲν ἀκουστής, Πολυκάρπου δὲ ἐταῖρος γεγονώς, Iren. l. c.). Bp. Lightfoot's remarkable investigation (Essays, ut supra) places the question of the date of Papias in an altogether new light; and if we assign the birth to the decade A.D. 60-70, and the work to the decade A.D. 130-140, as we may now with great probability, both assertions of Irenaeus are placed beyond the reach of criticism, and a writer who was himself a pupil of Polycarp may be accepted as a convincing witness. Irenaeus may well have met this "old-time man" (ἀρχαῖος ἄνθρωπος he calls him l. c.), and we get here, as in the case of Polycarp, a definite link between the age of St. John and that of Irenaeus.

Now Eusebius tells us that Papias used the First Epistle of John (κέρχηται δ' ὁ αὐτὸς μαρτυρίας ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰωάννου προτέρας ἐπιστολῆς, l. c.), and it is not seriously disputed that this Epistle is by the writer of the Gospel (p. 1765). This fragmentary notice rises therefore to evidence of the first class. Nor is other indirect testimony wanting. Papias gives a list of the disciples about whose sayings he inquired, "Andrew, Peter or Philip; Thomas, James, John, Matthew" (Euseb. l. c.). Andrew precedes Peter (John i. 44; cp. Mark i. 29); Philip and Thomas are prominent disciples only in St. John; the only plausible explanation of the connexion of St. John and St. Matthew is that both were known to be Evangelists.

(q.) THE PRESBYTERS (Lightfoot, Essays on Supernatural Religion, and Apost. Fathers, 1891, p. 590 sq.).—Irenaeus in a well-known passage introduces certain presbyters, and represents them as quoting John xiv. 2: Ὡς οἱ πρεσβύτεροι λέγουσι, τότε καὶ οἱ μὲν καταξιώθεντες τῆς ἐν οὐρανῷ διατριβῆς, ἐκείσε χωρήσουσιν . . . οἱ δὲ τὴν πόλιν κατοικήσουσιν· καὶ διὰ τοῦτο εἰρηκέναι τὸν Κύριον, ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου μόναις εἶναι πολλὰς (Adv. Haer. v. 36, 1, 2; cp. the context). This extract has been made familiar in late years by the attempt of the author of Supernatural Religion, in defiance alike of grammar and of context, to represent Irenaeus as giving only the "exegesis of his own day" (Sup. Rel. ii. 328). But it is beyond real question that the quotation from St. John is assigned to "the Presbyters," "the Fathers" as we should now say of the generation of Irenaeus, and that these are identified with the "disciples of the Apostles." Bishop Lightfoot has shown good reason for believing that the quotation of Irenaeus is here made from a book, and further that this book is the work of Papias (Essays, ut supra, pp. 4 sq., 196 sq.). The identification with Papias is accepted by scholars of different schools like Harnack and Salmon (Introd., ed. 2, p. 106). If it be so, we have another definite proof of the acceptance of the Fourth Gospel by Papias, and its cogency is strengthened by the indirect method by which it is traced; if it be not so, we have another of the school of St. John of the age of Papias produced as a witness, and the evidence is stronger still.

(c.) POLYCARP (cp. JOHN, FIRST EPISTLE OF).—The evidence for the First Epistle is indirect evidence for the Gospel.

(a.) MARTYRDOM OF POLYCARP (Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, 1889, Part ii. vol. i. 646 sq.; and vol. iii. 388.—Date, soon after martyrdom in A.D. 155 or -6). This Letter of the Church at Smyrna gives the martyr's final prayer, which contains in close contiguity the expressions eis ἀναστάσιν ζωῆς αἰωνίου and ἀληθινὸς θεός (cp. John v. 29 and xvii. 3; ut supra, vol. iii. p. 388).

(t.) HERMAS (Zahn, Der Hirt des Hermas; Gebhardt and Harnack, Patrum Apost. Op. Fasc. iii. 1877; Lightfoot, Philipp. p. 166 sq., and Apost. Fathers, 1891, p. 289 sq.; Salmon, Introd. ed. 2, p. 571 sq.).—The questions connected with the authority, text, and date of the Shepherd of Hermas are too intricate to be discussed here, and its influence on our present question is to be felt rather than stated. It cannot well be placed later than the middle of the second century, and the current of best opinion seems to be setting in favour of the first decade. The student who will compare the following passages—John iii. 5 and Sim. ix. 16, 2; John iii. 35 and S. ix. 15, 3; John iv. 34 (v. 36, xvii. 4) and S. v. 2, 4 sq. and ix. 11, 8; John iv. 38 and S. v. 6, 20; John v. 31 sq. and S. v. 2, 6; John viii. 34 and Vis. i. 1, 8; John x. 7, 9, and S. ix. 12, 1 sq.; John x. 12 and S. ix. 31, 5; John x. 18 (xii. 49 sq., xiv. 31, xv. 10) and S. v. 6, 3, 4; John xi. 25 (xiv. 6) and Vis. ii. 2, 8; John xii. 40 and Mand. xii. 4, 4; John xii. 49 sq. and S. v. 5, 3; John xv. i. sq. and S. xviii.; John xvii. 24 (xii. 36, xv. 3) and S. ix. 24, 4 (cp. Zahn, p. 467 sq., and note the refs. to the First Ep.)—will probably feel the cumulative strength of argument which compelled even Keim and Wittichen and Holtzmann (who is disposed to think, however, that Hermas comes first) to admit the necessary connexion between the Shepherd and St. John.*

(u.) IGNATIUS (Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, 1889, Part. ii. vol. ii.; Zahn, Ignatius von Antiochien, Gotha, 1873; Patr. Ap. Op. Fasc. ii. 1876).—The middle (Vossian) Recension may now be taken as established, and we have the following evidence of the acceptance of St. John in the opening years of the second century:—

Compare Ephes. v. and Rom. vii. with John vi. 27, 31, 33, 48, and indeed the whole passage John vi. 27-59; also iv. 10, 11, and if with Lightfoot we read ὡν ἀλλόθεν, John iv. 14; Ephes. vi. with John xiii. 20; Ephes. xvii. with John xii. 3 (vid. Zahn and Lightfoot); in the same chapter of Ephes. and passim, the phrase

* Since the above was in print, the evidence of Hermas has been carefully examined by Dr. Taylor in The Witness of Hermas to the Four Gospels, 1892. He comes to the conclusion that "the evidence adduced seems to justify the conclusion that the Gospel known to Hermas was (so to say) a Diatessaron, having for its elements the Four Gospels of to-day" (p. 146). Cp. also note in Journal of Philology, xxi. (1892), pp. 69, 70.

τοῦ ἐρχοῦτος τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου with John xii. 31, xiv. 30, xvi. 11; Magn. vii. Ὁσπερ εἶπεν ὁ Κύριος, κ. τ. λ., with John v. 19, 30, x. 30, xv. 4, xvi. 15 (Zahn and Lightfoot), also eis ἐκ βύρα with John i. 1, 18, xiii. 3, &c.; Magn. viii. ad fin. with John viii. 29; Rom. iii. ad fin. with John vii. 7, 8. Philad. vii.: ὁθεν γὰρ ἔββεν ἔρχεται καὶ τοῦ ἁδναῖ is a definite quotation from John iii. 8 (vid. Lightfoot ad loc.).

(v.) BARNABAS (Geb. and Harn. Patr. Ap. Op. Fasc. i. 2, 1878; Hilgenfeld, Barnabae Epistolae; Salmon, Introd. ed. 2, 557 sq.; Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, 1891, p. 240 sq.).—The date cannot be fixed accurately. "Itaque intra ann. 71-132 epistulam delegamus" (Geb. and Harn. l. c. p. lxviii.); "probably between A.D. 70-79" (Lightfoot, p. 241). It may then be earlier than St. John, and represent the area of thought from which the Fourth Gospel springs rather than the Gospel itself. All that concerns us here is that, if a witness at all, it is clearly a witness for the reception of St. John. This appears not so much from isolated passages as from the general doctrinal position. We cannot say with Wittichen, that the expressions are too characteristic to have any other root than that of the Gospel (Gesch. Character d. Ev. Joh. 1868, p. 104); but Keim's honest avowal—it is against his own position—that for this sphere of ideas there is no analogy in St. Paul, nor even in the Epistle to the Hebrews, but only in this Gospel (Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. 1876, i. 194 sq. with ref.; cp. Sanday, Gospels in Second Cent., pp. 270-272), is of great weight.

(w.) CLEMENT OF ROME (Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, Pt. i. 1891; Geb. and Harn. Pat. Ap. Op. Fasc. i. 1, 1876; Salmon, Introd. ed. 2, 564 sq.).—Probable date about A.D. 95 or 96 (Lightfoot, l. c., i. 27 and 346 sq.); "intra ann. 93-97" (cp. Consensus of Opinion, Geb. and Harn. pp. lix., lx.). This is a time at which the Fourth Gospel may not have been promulgated or may not have reached Rome. Some interesting parallels are noted in Geb. and Harn. Index, which however go to show rather that the writer is influenced by the Johannine circle of thought than that he is quoting from the Gospel in its final form.

(x.) THE TESTAMENT OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS (Sinker, Test. XII. Patriarch. 1869; Hilgenfeld, Novum Testamentum extra Canonem, 1866; Schürer, Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes, 1886, ii. pp. 662-669).—This work, which is probably from the hands of a Jewish Christian, is in the form of a legacy of pious counsels from each of the sons of Jacob. Its contents make it probable that it is earlier than the revolt of Bar-Kochba (A.D. 135). Sinker places it at the end of the first or the beginning of the second century.

The following passages will show its connexion with the phraseology of St. John:—τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας (John 20; cp. John xv. 26); τὸν θεὸν τῆς εἰρήνης (Dan. v.; cp. John xvi. 33); ἁμαρτίαν εἰς θάνατον (Is. vii.; cp. 1 John v. 16); δώσει τοῖς ἁγίοις φαγῆν ἐκ τοῦ ἔξλου τῆς σῆψ (Lev. xviii.; cp. Apoc. ii. 7).

(y.) THE DIDACHE (Bryennios, Διδάχη τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων, κ. τ. λ. Const. 1883; Harnack, Die Lehre der zwölf Apostel, 1884; Lightfoot, Apost. Fathers, 1891, p. 212 sq.; Hitchcock and Brown, Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, ed. 2, 1885; Taylor, The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, 1886).—The date is too uncertain to enable us to say whether it preceded or followed the Gospel. The limits assigned by most competent critics (80–110 A.D.) would allow either view to be held. We have no right therefore to expect definite quotation or reference, but the following and other resemblances will strike the thoughtful reader of the two writings. They are at least consistent with the belief that the Gospel belongs to the last decade of the first century. Those who place the Didache in the first years of the second century will regard them as strongly confirmatory of that belief.

Εὐχαριστοῦμέν σοι, πάτερ ἄγιε, ὑπὲρ τοῦ ἁγίου ὀνόματός σου, οὐ κατεσκήνωσας . . . (cap. x. 2; cp. John i. 14, xvii. 6, 11—which is the only place where πάτερ ἄγιε occurs in the New Test.).

Εὐχαριστοῦμέν σοι, πάτερ ἡμῶν, ὑπὲρ τῆς ἁγίας ἀμπέλου Δαυεῖδ . . . (cap. ix. 2; cp. John xv. 1.)

ἦς ἐγγνώρισας (Ibid., and cap. x. 2; cp. John xxv. 15 and xvii. 26).

Cp. also Didache x. 5 with 1 John ii. 5; Did. x. 6 with 1 John ii. 17; Did. xi. 11 with 1 John iv. 1; Did. xi. 2 with 2 John 10; Did. x. 3 (παντοκράτωρ) with the frequent usage of the word in the Apocalypse (nine times—once besides in N. T. and that from the LXX.).

B. The Silence of Sixteen Centuries.—From the close of the second century to the close of the eighteenth century, the Fourth Gospel has been received as the work of the Apostle St. John, with hardly a murmur to break the harmony of all men's assent. The so-called Alogi (Epiphanius, Haer. 51, 3, 4; Philaster, Haer. 60; cp. Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. iii. 11, 9) are indeed often quoted as early dissentients from the common belief, but their evidence in so far as it is of any real value is distinctly in favour of a first-century date, for they ascribe the Gospel and Apocalypse to Cerinthus, a contemporary of St. John (cp. Bampton Lectures, 1890, pp. 123 sqq.). Nor did the Fourth Gospel escape the attacks of the eighteenth-century English Deists, Collins (Discourse of Free-thinking, 1713) and Toland (Nazarenus, 1719); but these are characterized with hardly too much severity by Lampe (Comment. i. 146): "Illa enim adeo turbida, adeo ab omni ratione abhorrentia et stulta sunt, ut vel ex iis ipsis patescat, quanto veritatis odio mentes eorum sint excaecatae, qui telis ita stramineis inconcussam populi Dei arcem se debellare posse sibi persuadent." From the intervening centuries other objections of like weight and importance may be quoted; but these are as dust in the balance, and they do not sensibly affect the enormous weight of evidence on the other side. It is not denied by any one whose opinion is worthy of serious thought, that during the whole of sixteen centuries the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel was universally accepted.

C. The Criticism of the Present Century.—When Keim asserts that "our age has cancelled the judgment of centuries" (Jesus of Nazara, 1873, i. 142), it must be admitted that he asserts what is not indeed impossible, but what is a priori in the highest degree improbable, and can be accepted on nothing short of clear and rigid proof. The onus probandi lies entirely with "our age." This cannot be shifted by imputation of prejudice or of bias, and cannot be diminished by discounting the arguments of so-called "Apologists." The judgment of centuries can be cancelled only by new facts or new and proved results from old facts, and it will rightly hold the ground until it is in this way dislodged, and until a new judgment more in accord with all the known facts and more exactly satisfying all the known conditions is supplied in its place.^b

The main outlines of the modern criticism of the Fourth Gospel may be summarized as follows.

Evanson, Edward (1731–1805), The Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, &c. (Ipswich, 1792; ed. 2, 1805).—It has been customary to trace the development of the hostile criticism from this work, but it is little worthy of the notice which it has attracted (B. L. pp. 174–176).

Bretschneider, Karl Gottlieb (1776–1848), Probabilia de Evangelii et Epistolarum Joannis Apostoli indole et origine, &c. (Leipzig, 1820).—This is a work of a very different spirit and of very different merit. It proved the real foundation of subsequent criticism, though Bretschneider himself withdrew his objections (B. L. pp. 179–190).

Strauss, David Friedrich (1808–74), Das Leben Jesu, 1835–6; ed. 2, 1837; ed. 3, 1838–39; ed. 4, 1840; cp. Das Leben Jesu, für das deutsche Volk, 1864.—The criticism of Strauss on the Fourth Gospel is but part of his general Mythical Theory. The legends of the Old Testament which grew round the Messianic idea were interpreted of the personal Jesus, and the writers of the Gospels have pictured Him as they thus thought Him, not as He really was. The Messianic idea has itself sprung from centering in an individual that which is true of the race. The miraculous is impossible.

From these premises the conclusion as to the Gospels, and especially the Fourth Gospel, is obvious. But Strauss makes no important addition either of fact or of argument to the criticism. His weapons are chiefly those of Bretschneider, fitted into his own system, and wielded with his own peculiar force, though with many vacillations (B. L. pp. 191–219).

Baur, F. C. (1792–1860; Johannine criticism beginning with an art. in Zeller's Theol. Jahrb. 1844; Kritische Untersuchungen über die Kan. Evang. 1847, pp. 327–389).—It was with Baur that negative criticism may be said to have culminated. His fundamental idea was the Hegelian trichotomy of thesis, antithesis, and higher unity. The antagonisms of early Christianity he found fully developed in the pseudo-Clementines. Working back from these, he distributed the Books of the New Testament over three periods: (1) to the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70, the documents being 1 and 2 Cor., Gal., Rom. (the only genuine Pauline Epistles), and Apocalypse, which is the work of St. John, and represents an original Ebionite Christianity in opposition to Paulinism. (2) A.D. 70-140. The documents are the Gospels of Matthew and Luke, which belong to the Jewish wars under Hadrian. Then come Acts and Mark, the Hebrews, and the pseudo-Pauline Epistles, and finally the Catholic Epistles. The characteristics of this period are the first steps on both sides towards moderating the antagonism. The Jewish Christians abandoned the requirement of circumcision: the Pauline party were interested in healing the breach, and the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians were therefore invented. (3) After A.D. 140 the Ebionitic and Gnostic extremes were abandoned. This is marked in practice by the Roman Church and their watchword "Peter and Paul," and in idea by the Fourth Gospel. The writings which date from this period are the Pastoral Letters and the Johannine Gospel and Epistles. The Fourth Gospel itself was nothing more than a Tendenzschrift belonging to somewhere about the year 170, and to Asia Minor or more probably Alexandria.

^b As some considerable reduction in this article had become necessary, and as the writer had had occasion quite recently to treat at length of this historical side of his subject, the sketch which follows has been unavoidably restricted to little more than a bare enumeration of names, reference being made for those who desire fuller details to the Bampton Lectures for 1890 (hereafter quoted as B. L.).—EDITORS.

The negative effect of Baur's theory of Tendancy was the deathblow of Strauss's theory of Myth. Myth and History, simplicity and forgery, ignorance and purpose, cannot be made to grow together, even by the exigencies of a theory.

The positive effect of Baur's theory, or rather of the attractive power of the author—and in this he stands in marked contrast to Strauss—was to draw to himself as centre a band of writers who took their name in part from the sphere of the great "Meister's" work, and became known as the Tübingen School.

Chief among these would be Schwegler (Nachapost. Zeitalt. 1846); Ritochl (Eyglm. Marcion's, 1846; Entstehung d. alt-Kath. Kirche, ed. 1, 1850: the author altered his standpoint considerably in ed. 2, 1857); Köstlin (Lehrbegriffs d. Evangeliums, 1843); Zeller, joint-editor with Baur of Theol. Jahrbücher from 1848; Hilgenfeld from 1849 onwards (editor of Zeitschr. f. wiss. Theol. from 1859, Einleitung, 1875); Volkmar (1852-1882). [On this group of writers and their works, see B. L. pp. 234-240.]

Never was theory more ably supported; never did theory more completely collapse, through its own inherent weakness. The pillars of the theory itself proved unstable: the date of the Clementines is found to be much too late; the date of the Fourth Gospel is by the confession of its foes much too early for the requirements of Baur's development. Fresh and exact study of history has shown that there was no such chasm between Ebionitism and Paulinism as Baur imagined [ACTS OF THE APOSTLES], and with the chasm the theory disappears. At the time of Baur's death (1860) he had one faithful disciple, Holsten, and Holsten's position is really different (Die drei ursprüngl. Evang. 1883; Die synopt. Evang. 1885; B. L. p. 243).

THE PARTITION THEORIES.—From the earliest days of the negative criticism of the Fourth Gospel to the present time, a line of writers has existed, more or less connected with each other, and more or less holding that portions of the Gospel are authoritative, but that it is not as a whole the work of St. John.

Weisse, C. H. (Evangelische Geschichte, 1838; Die Evangelienfrage, 1856), first gave prominence to this line of criticism. He held that the discourses of Jesus and of John Baptist are studies from the Apostle's hand, and that after the writer's death the disciples combined these studies with connecting historic matter and oral teaching into the present Gospel.

Schenkel, D., began (Stud. u. Krit. 1840) by developing the main ideas of Weisse, but ended (Charakterbild Jesu, ed. 4, 1873) by giving up the Johannine authorship altogether, and placing the Gospel in the middle of the second century.

Schweizer, A. (Evangel. Johannes, 1841), endeavoured to show that the events which have Galilee as their scene (capp. ii. 1-12, iv. 44-54, vi. 1-26), and also cap. xxi., and some smaller insertions (capp. i. 21 sq., xvi. 30, xviii. 9, xix. 35-37), are in their present form by a later hand. The Johannine ministry of Jesus was limited to Judaea, but this portion is of true historical character, and the discourses are authoritative. The additions were later than John's death, but before the Gospel was first published.

Tubler, J. R. (1867 and other dates), thought that some portions of the Gospel came from the Apostle himself in Aramaic, but that these portions were added to and worked up by Apollos (B. L. pp. 246-250). The place is Ephesus, and the time the first century.

Ewald, Heinrich (1803-1875: Johannesev. Schrift 1861, i. 1-59; Geschichte d. Volkes Israel, 1868, vii. 237 sq.; cp. B. L. p. 250 sq.), held with characteristic freedom and characteristic strength his own views of the historic value of the discourses and the narratives of the miracles in the Fourth Gospel; but this does not weaken the force of his position as to the authorship. The Apostle somewhere about the year 80 composed his Gospel, availing himself of the hand of trusted friends, who ten years later, but still before the Apostle's death, added cap. xxi. Here (vv. 24, 25) another hand appears more freely than in the Gospel itself, though it was not wholly absent even there (cap. xix. v. 35). Ewald's views as to the authenticity of the Gospel were expressed with clear emphasis (Göttng. Gel. Anz., Aug. 1863, review of Renan; Gratry, Jesus-Christ, p. 119; Liddon, B. L. 1866, ed. 13, 1889, p. 220; Westcott, Introduction to the Gospels, ed. 3, p. x.).

Hase, K. A. von (1800-1889: Geschichte Jesu, 1876, i.e. an enlargement of the Leben Jesu, ed. 1-5, 1829-65; Die Tübinger Schule—Sachschreiben an Baur, 1855), had been known to successive generations for more than half a century not only as a learned Church historian, but as a defender of the Fourth Gospel in the method of Schleiermacher (cp. infra, p. 1748), differing from his master chiefly in that he ascribed the Apocalypse also to the Apostle. But in the Geschichte (pp. 50, 51) he advances, not without hesitation, the opinion of his old age, that the Gospel is not the immediate work of the Apostle. After the death of John, perhaps a decade or more, the Johannine tradition was written down by a gifted disciple of the Apostle. The disciple has lived in the thoughts of his illustrious master, and has only written as he would himself have written. Thus arose a "Gospel according to John," which in the next generation became a "Gospel of John" (B. L. p. 252).

Reuss, Édouard (1804–1891: Ideen zur Einleitung in das Evangelium Johannes [Denkschrift d. theol. Gesellsch. zu Strassburg, 1840]; —Die Geschichte der Heiligen Schriften, Neues Testament, ed. 1, 1842; ed. 2, 1853; ed. 5, 1874 [Eng. tr. 1884]; ed. 6, 1887; —Histoire de la théologie chrétienne au siècle apostolique, 1852 [Eng. tr. 1872]; Théologie Johannique in La Bible, Nouveau Test. vi^e partie, 1879). In the earlier works he accepts the Johannine authorship, but thinks that the speeches are to be largely traced, not with Baur to metaphysical conceptions, but to religious mysticism. In the later editions of the Geschichte he admits the "double element," and in the Théologie Johannique (pp. 40 sqq.) he no longer holds the direct Johannine authorship. The author distinguishes himself from St. John in more than one passage, but derives his materials immediately from him (B. L. p. 253 sq.).

Renan, Ernest (1823 seq.: Vie de Jésus, 1863; ed. 17, 1882), draws a sharp distinction between the authentic and the unauthentic portions of the Gospel, but his principle of division is exactly opposed to that of those who preceded him. It is not the historical setting, but the discourses, which are now questioned. The history indeed is to be preferred to that of the Synoptists, but the discourses are "tirades prétentieuses, lourdes, mal écrites." Renan's view in ed. 13 and afterwards is, "The Fourth Gospel is not the work of the Apostle John. It was attributed to him by one of his disciples about the year 100. The discourses are almost wholly fictitious; but the narrative portions contain valuable traditions, which go back in part to the Apostle John" (ed. 13, pp. x. xi.; cp. ed. 17, 1882, pp. lviii. sqq., 477 sqq.).

Sabatier, L. A. (1839 seq.: Essai sur les Sources de la Vie de Jésus, les trois premiers Évangiles et le quatrième, 1866). This little work, which is largely devoted to the Fourth Gospel, was intended to support the Johannine authorship. But in a later article in the Encyclopédie des Sciences religieuses (1880, vii. 181–193) M. Sabatier gives up the immediate authorship, and thinks the writer to be one of John's disciples who has edited the Gospel history after the form known in Asia Minor. The Apocalypse was the work of the author himself: the Gospel is a spiritualized apocalypse written by a disciple (B. L. p. 256).

Weizsäcker, K. H. von (1822 seq.), after several essays in the Jahrb. für deutsche Theol., of which he was editor (1857, pp. 154 sqq.; 1859, pp. 685 sqq.; 1862, pp. 619 sqq.), published in 1864 the able Untersuchungen über die evang. Geschichte. John is the indirect, a trusted disciple of the Apostle is the direct, author; or it might have been composed by disciples after the Apostle's oral teaching or notes. The whole Gospel has a double character. At every point it is an historical report of the sayings and deeds of Christ, but it is also an ideal composition, and every detail of the representation has a double sense. In his latest work (Das Apostolische Zeitalter, 1886, ed. 2, 1890) Weizsäcker takes the age of the Apostles properly so-called to end at the year 70. The following thirty years are the Johannine period. There was a Johannine school in Ephesus. The two principal works which bear the name of John probably came from the school of the Apostle, but neither is the work of John (pp. 504 sqq.). At the time the Gospel was written the Apostle was dead, but his death had not long taken place (p. 536; B. L. p. 257).

Wendt, H. H. (1853 seq.), Professor in Heidelberg (Die Lehre Jesu, 1886, i. 215 sqq.), has in part renewed and carried to fresh issues the theories of Weisse and Schenkel. He thinks that there is a genuine historical document issuing from John which corresponds to the Logia used by St. Matthew, but that it relates to only the last days of Jesus. He finds traces of Hebrew origin in the part which has this original document for a basis, and thinks that the writer was an Ephesian disciple of John. (Cp. review by Holtzmann in Theolog. Lit. Ztg. 1886, pp. 197 sqq.; B. L. p. 258.)

RECENT NEGATIVE CRITICISM. — Considerations of space compel the reduction of this and the following section to the skeleton of a bibliography. The writers are all more or less lineal descendants of the Tübingen School, but treat the works of their predecessors with freedom. They fall into three main divisions—German, Dutch, and English (B. L. p. 258 sqq.).

The German Negative School.—Keim, Theodor (1825–1878: Geschichte Jesu von Nazara, 1867–71, i. 103–172; Dritte Bearb. 1875, pp. 38 sqq., 377 sqq.: cp. Hausrath, Neutestamentl. Zeitgeschichte, 1873, iii. 565–625; 1877, iv. 376 sqq.: cp. B. L. p. 259).

(1832 seq.), now Professor in Strassburg [in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexikon, 1869–1871, art. Evangelium nach Johannes (ii. 221 sqq.) and art. Johannes der Apostel (iii. 328 sqq.); Lehrbuch der Einleitung in das Neue Testament, ed. 2, 1886, pp. 438–488; Die Gnosis und das Johann. Evang. 1877: cp. Zeitschrift f. wissenschaftl. Theol. 1869, pp. 62 sqq., 155 sqq., 446 sqq.; 1871, pp. 336 sqq.; 1877, pp. 40 sqq.; 1877, pp. 187 sqq.: cp. B. L. p. 260].

Mangold, D. W. (1825–1890), late Professor at Bonn, in foot-notes appended to the later editions of Bleek's Einleitung in das Neue Testament, ed. 4, 1886 (cp. B. L. p. 262).

The Dutch Negative School.—The modern Dutch School, which has of late years taken a prominent place in advanced criticism and subjective theories, may for the present purpose be represented by Scholten, the late Emeritus Professor of Leyden.

Scholten, J. H. (1811-1885: Historisch-kritische Inleiding in de Schriften des Nieuwen Testaments, 1853, ed. 2, and in German, 1856; Schriften von den Apostel Johannes in Bijbelsch woordenboek, Amsterdam, 1855—he here takes the Gospel to be Johannine; Het Evangelie naar Johannes, 1864-66—German by Lang, 1867—French by Réville, in Revue de Théologie, Strasbourg, 1864-68; De oudste getuigenissen, and in German, Die ältesten Zeugnisse (by Manhot), 1867; Het Apostel Johannes in Klein-Asië, 1871, and in German (Spiegel), 1872: cp. B. L. p. 263 sqq.).

The English Negative School.—The chief results of foreign negative criticism have been adopted and presented to English readers by several writers, of whom the most prominent are:—Tayler, Rev. J. J. (An Attempt to ascertain the Character of the Fourth Gospel, especially in its Relation to the Three First, London, 1867; ed. 2, 1870;—Theological Review, vol. v. pp. 373-401, July 1868—review of the work next mentioned: cp. B. L. p. 266 sq.). Davidson, Dr. Samuel (An Introduction to the Study of the New Testament, 2 vols. 1868; ed. 2, 1882: these works should be compared with the earlier Introduction to the New Testament by the same author, 3 vols. 1848-51, in which the opposite view was maintained: cp. B. L. pp. 272-285). Supernatural Religion, an anonymous work (2 vols. 1874; ed. 7, 3 vols. 1879: cp. B. L. pp. 267-270). Abbott, Dr. Edwin A. (art. 'Gospels' in Encycl. Britann. ed. 9, 1879; 'Justin's Use of the Fourth Gospel' in Modern Review, 1882, pp. 559-588, 716-756: cp. B. L. pp. 270-272). Martineau, Dr. James (The Seat of Authority in Religion, 1890, pp. 189-243: cp. B. L. pp. 286-292).

THE POSITIVE CRITICISM OF THIS CENTURY.—A still longer succession of thinkers have been led by the attack upon the Fourth Gospel to examine the position of their opponents and to re-examine the grounds of their own conviction, and as a result of this testing process have maintained and strengthened their belief in the Johannine authorship. The immediate results of the work of Evanson and Bretschneider have already been referred to (v. supra, p. 1745); and the following names will sufficiently serve to indicate the course of thought.

Schleiermacher, F. D. E. (1768-1834: Reden über die Religion, ed. 3, 1821, ed. Schwarz, 1868, pp. 227-243; Einleitung ins Neue Testament, 1845, pp. 315-344; Leben Jesu, 1832, ed. Ritenik, 1864: cp. B. L. p. 299-304).

De Wette, W. M. L. (1780-1849: Lehrbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in die kanonischen Bücher des Neuen Testaments, ed. 1, 1826; ed. 5, 1848;—Kurzgefasstes Exeg. Handbuch zum Neuen Testament: Johannes, ed. 1, 1837; ed. 3, 1846: cp. B. L. pp. 307-310).

Lücke, G. C. F. (1781-1855: Commentar über die Schriften des Evangelisten Johannes, 1820; ed. 2, 1833; ed. 3, part i., 1840: cp. B. L. pp. 310-313), speaks of Schleiermacher as his "spiritual father" (ed. 3, p. viii.).

Bleek, Friedrich (1795-1859), also a pupil of Schleiermacher, published in 1846 Beiträge zur

Evangelien-Kritik. After Bleek's death his Lectures on Introduction to the New Testament were edited by his son T. F. Bleek (Einleitung in das Neue Testament, ed. 1, 1860; ed. 2, 1866). The later editions (ed. 4, 1886) have been edited by Mangold (v. supra, p. 1747: cp. B. L. pp. 313-315).

Ebrard, J. H. (1818-1888), may be taken to represent the school of Erlangen, where he was born and where (as well as at Zürich) he was Professor. His works on this subject are Wissenschaftliche Kritik der evangelischen Geschichte (1842; ed. 3, 1868; Eng. tr. 1863); Das Evangelium Johannis und die neueste Hypothese über seine Entstehung, 1845; Die Offenbarung Johannis (1853); Die Briefe Johannis (1859; Eng. tr. 1860: cp. B. L. p. 317 sq.).

W., of Berlia (1808-1869: Das Evangelium des heiligen Johannes, 3 vols. 1863; ed. 2, 1867; Eng. tr., 1865: cp. B. L. p. 318 sq.).

Weiss, Bernhard, Professor at Berlin (1827 seq.: Der Johanneische Lehrbegriff, 1862; Lehrbuch der biblischen Theologie des Neuen Testaments, ed. 1, 1868; ed. 4, 1884; Eng. tr. 3 vols. 1885, esp. vol. ii. pp. 311-416;—Das Leben Jesu, 2 vols. 1882; ed. 2, 1884; Eng. tr. 3 vols. 1883-4, esp. vol. i. pp. 90-210;—*Handbuch d. Luthardt, C. E., Professor at Leipzig (1823 seq.: De Compositione Evangelii Joannes, 1852; Das Johanneische Evangelium, 1852-3, 2 vols.; ed. 2, 1875-6; Eng. tr. 1878, 3 vols.;—Der Johanneische Ursprung des vierten Evangeliums, 1874; Eng. tr., with valuable bibliographical appendix by Gregory, 1875;—Evangelium nach Johannes in Strack und Zöckler's Kurzgefasstes Kommentar, 1886. Editor of the Theolog. Literaturblatt, the Evang. luth. Kirchenzeitung, and the Zeitschrift für kirchl. Wissenschaft u. Leben. Cp. B. L. p. 326 sq.).

Godet, Frédéric, Professor at Neuchâtel (1812 seq.), published his Commentaire sur l'Évangile de Saint Jean in 1863-65, 2 vols.; ed. 2, "complètement refondu," in 1876-7, 3 vols.; ed. 3, "complètement revue," 1881-85. It has been translated into English (1877, and from ed. 3, New York, 1886), German (several editions), Dutch and Spanish (cp. B. L. p. 328 sq.).

As above in the case of the English advocates of the negative position, so now in that of the upholders of the positive view, space can be here found for reference only. But the results of the investigations which followed, especially from the publication of the work entitled Supernatural Religion, will be fresh in the mind of all theological readers. See Bishop Lightfoot (Contemporary Review, Jan., Aug., Oct. 1875, republished in Essays on Supernatural Religion, 1889; arts. in Expositor, 1890, pp. 1-21, 81-92, 176-188); Bishop Westcott (The Gospe same volume (Lect. vii. pp. 357–409) an account is also given of a number of recent accessions to knowledge, the general tendency of which is decidedly to strengthen the evidence for the Gospel.

The result of this necessarily brief examina-tion of the external evidence and criticism of the Fourth Gospel is that the negative criticism by constant opposition weakens and destroys itself, having no consistent and well-ascertained results; that it is powerless when it attempts the task of construction; and that on every hand the evidence for connecting the Fourth Gospel with the immediate circle of St. John is accumulating. (But cp. B. L. 1890, pp. 409 sqq.)

(ii.) Self-evidence of the Gospel.

The writing itself furnishes to some extent direct evidence and to a large extent materials for indirect induction, as to its authorship.

A. The direct evidence is contained in three passages: chs. i. 14, xix. 35, xxi. 24.

(a.) Ch. i. 14 (compared with 1 John i. 1), θεωσαυεβα. The usus loquendi, the tenses, the context, the parallels, alike confirm the natural impression that the writer is here placing him-self among the immediate disciples of the Lord.

(b.) Ch. xix. 35. These words assert (1) that the evidence is that of an eye-witness, (2) that the witness answers to the idea of what true witness should be, and (3) that the eye-witness knows the facts to be as they are stated to be. (See on this whole subject Bleek-Mangold, Einleitung, §§ 92 and 107.) The force of εκεινος is discussed fully by Steitz and A. Butt-mann (Stud. u. Krit. 1859, pp. 497 sqq., 1860, pp. 505 sqq., 1861, pp. 267 sqq.; and in Hil-genfeld's Zeitschr. für wissenschaft. Theol. 1862, pp. 204 sqq.). Steitz is said to have abandoned his published opinions (Grimm's Wilke's Clavis, ed. Thayer, p. 195); but even Buttman admits that a writer who in direct speech speaks of himself in the third person may use εκεινος.

(c.) Ch. xxi. 24 clearly assigns the authorship of the Gospel to "the beloved disciple" of v. 21, and that with regard to its form as well as to its material contents. He is the writer as well as the witness. A comparison of this passage with ch. xix. 35 shows that, while that is the statement of the writer, this is the evidence of others who of their personal knowledge bear testimony that the witness is true. From the first then this writing bore in its own substance the twofold assertion of autoptic testimony, both on the part of the writer and on that of those who published it.

B. The indirect inference furnished by the writing.

1. The Nationality of the Author.—In a work which looks backward so constantly to the Old Testament, and of which the subject-matter is so fully Jewish, it ought not to be difficult to say whether the writer is dealing with it from an intimate personal knowledge of Judaism past and present, or from the acquired knowledge of a stranger. And yet the Gospel must be studied chapter by chapter and verse by verse by the student who wishes to obtain a fresh impression of the facts. The result of such study will, it is believed, be the conviction that no one who was not trained from childhood in the Jewish Scriptures, customs, life, hopes, could have written the Fourth Gospel. The following heads of subjects are given, not as in themselves full proofs, but as centres of thought around which the facts which are observed in study may be grouped:—

i. The Citations of the Old Testament.—The student will find as he reads the Gospel that the Old Testament is formally quoted sixteen times. These quotations are not confined to any part of the Gospel, nor to any persons. Some are in the discourses of the Lord (vii. 38, viii. 17, x. 34, xiii. 18, xv. 25); one is by John Baptist (i. 23); one is by Galileans (vi. 31); some are by the writer himself (ii. 17, xii. 14–15, 38, 40, xix. 24, 36, 37).

For the most part they are taken from the LXX. Some are quite free or reminiscences of the text (i. 23, vi. 31, vii. 38, 42); some occur in the Synoptic Gospels or elsewhere (i. 23, viii. 17, xii. 14–15, 38, 40, xix. 24, 37), and indicate a common use among the Christian brotherhood. It is moreover to be borne in mind that quotation from the Greek is natural in a Greek writing which is intended for Greek readers; but there are three instances in which competent judges find good reason for thinking that the writer shows a critical knowledge of the original:

Ch. vi. 45. The LXX. (Is. liv. 13) connects the words with the preceding verse. The quotation takes them as complete in themselves; following in this the Hebrew text.

Ch. xiii. 18. Cp. Ps. xli. (xl.), 9 (10). The LXX. reading is $\delta \epsilon \sigma \theta \lambda \omega \nu \alpha \rho \tau \omega \nu \mu \omicron \upsilon \epsilon \mu \epsilon \gamma \alpha \lambda \omega \nu \epsilon \nu \epsilon \mu \epsilon \pi \tau \epsilon \rho \iota \sigma \mu \acute{\omicron} \nu$. That of Aquil., Symm., and Theodot. is $\kappa \alpha \tau \epsilon \mu \epsilon \gamma \alpha \lambda \acute{\omicron} \nu \theta \eta \mu \omicron \upsilon$. The Hebrew text is $\text{וּכְלָל לְחַיִּי הַגְּדִיל עָלַי עַקֵּב}$. The quotation has in accordance with the Hebrew $\alpha \rho \tau \omega \nu$ (sing.) where the LXX. has $\alpha \rho \tau \omega \nu$ (plur.), translates עַקֵּב by the ordinary $\pi \acute{\epsilon} \tau \rho \alpha$ instead of the exceptional $\pi \epsilon \rho \iota \sigma \mu \acute{\omicron} \nu$, and וּכְלָל by the quite unusual $\epsilon \kappa \text{-}\alpha \iota \rho \omega$, which is the LXX. word for כָּל or כָּל־וְכָל instead of $\mu \epsilon \gamma \alpha \lambda \acute{\omicron} \nu \omega$, which is the ordinary word for וּכְלָל , and is here found in all the Greek Versions. The English translation of the Psalm (A. V., and R. V. more fully, for it omits the marginal note) follows the reading of the Gospel. The Prayer Book Version follows the LXX. (through the Vulgate, magnificavit super me supplantationem) in its rendering, "hath laid great wait for me." What is more remarkable, though it seems to have escaped notice, is that our Lord is made to use the almost technical $\tau \rho \acute{\alpha} \gamma \omega \nu$ (cp. Matt. xxiv. 38, John vi. 54–58—all in our Lord's discourses; nowhere else in N. T.) instead of the LXX. $\epsilon \sigma \theta \lambda \omega \nu$.

Ch. xix. 37. Zech. xii. 10. The LXX. reads $\epsilon \pi \iota \beta \lambda \acute{\epsilon} \psi \omicron \nu \tau \alpha \iota \pi \acute{\rho} \omicron \varsigma \mu \epsilon \alpha \nu \theta \acute{\omicron} \delta \omega \nu \kappa \alpha \tau \omega \chi \rho \acute{\eta} \sigma \alpha \rho \tau \omicron$, "they shall look upon me because they have mocked me." The Hebrew is $\text{וְהִבִּיטוּ וְהִרְגִּירוּ אֶת־שֵׁרֵשׁ אֲנִי$. The quotation here and in Rev. i. 7 ($\alpha \upsilon \tau \omicron \nu \epsilon \xi \epsilon \kappa \acute{\epsilon} \nu \tau \eta \sigma \alpha \nu$) follows against all Greek Versions a reading וְהִבִּיטוּ or וְהִרְגִּירוּ , which latter was afterwards supposed to be an anti-Messianic invention of the Jews (cp. Pusey, Minor Prophets in loc.; and De Rossi, Variae Lectiones, iii. 217 sqq.). It also translates with Rev. i. 7 וְהִרְגִּירוּ correctly; but this with Theodot., $\epsilon \iota \varsigma \delta \nu \epsilon \xi \epsilon \kappa \acute{\epsilon} \nu \tau \eta \sigma \alpha \nu$; Aquil. and Symm., $\epsilon \xi \epsilon \kappa \acute{\epsilon} \nu \tau \eta \sigma \alpha \nu$, $\epsilon \pi \epsilon \xi \epsilon \kappa \acute{\epsilon} \nu \tau \eta \sigma \alpha \nu$. The rendering of the LXX. is probably a mistake arising from the interchange of η and λ . One of Kennicott's MSS. (355) does read וְהִרְגִּירוּ . Jerome notes the difference, and the fact that the quotation is made direct from the Hebrew by one who is Hobracus ex Helraeis (in loc. and Ep. lci. ad Pammach.).

It is in more than one way remarkable how this rendering of St. John became the recognized method of quotation in the post-Apostolic age. Thus Ignatius, Trall. x., Smyra iii.; Barnabas, vii. 9; Justin, Apol. i. 53, Trypho 32; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. iv. 33, 11; Tertullian, Adv. Marc. iii. 7.

The result of this examination of the citations from the Old Testament seems to be that, while it does not support all the statements which have been based upon them, it gives full support to the belief that the writer was a Jew, and furnishes, at least to some extent, reason for believing, and no shadow of reason for not believing, that the writer was a Palestinian.

ii. The Formulae of Citation.—The formulae with which the writer introduces his quotations furnish more distinct evidence of his relation to the Old Testament Scriptures than the quotations themselves. They may be classified as follows:—

$\kappa \alpha \theta \acute{\omega \varsigma} \epsilon \sigma \tau \iota \nu \gamma \epsilon \gamma \rho \alpha \mu \mu \acute{\epsilon} \nu \omicron \nu$ twice.

$\gamma \epsilon \gamma \rho \alpha \mu \mu \acute{\epsilon} \nu \omicron \nu \epsilon \sigma \tau \iota \nu$ or $\epsilon \sigma \tau \iota \nu \gamma \epsilon \gamma \rho \alpha \mu \mu \acute{\epsilon} \nu \omicron \nu$ with $\epsilon \nu \tau \omicron \iota \varsigma \pi \rho \omicron \phi \eta \tau \alpha \iota$ or with $\epsilon \nu \tau \acute{\omicron} \nu \acute{\omicron} \mu \omicron \upsilon$, three (four) times.

These forms are peculiar to St. John, but are linked by the $\epsilon \nu \tau \acute{\omicron} \nu \acute{\omicron} \mu \omicron \upsilon$ $\gamma \acute{\epsilon} \gamma \rho \alpha \tau \alpha \iota$ with the regular Pauline $\kappa \alpha \theta \acute{\omega \varsigma} \gamma \acute{\epsilon} \gamma \rho \alpha \tau \alpha \iota$, and represent the Rabbinic כִּי תִכְתֵּב .

$\kappa \alpha \theta \acute{\omega \varsigma} \epsilon \lambda \epsilon \nu \eta \gamma \rho \alpha \phi \acute{\eta}$, $\eta \gamma \rho \alpha \phi \acute{\eta} \epsilon \lambda \epsilon \nu$ (cp. v. 42), which is parallel to the $\gamma \rho \alpha \phi \acute{\eta} \lambda \acute{\epsilon} \gamma \epsilon \iota$, which is used also by St. Paul and represents the Rabbinic כִּי תִכְתֵּב .

The use of $\text{ἵνα πληρωθῆ} \eta$ with $\eta \gamma \rho \alpha \phi \acute{\eta}$ c. r. l. may be compared with the regular formulae of St. Matthew, $\text{ἵνα} (\delta \eta \omega \varsigma) \text{πληρωθῆ} \tau \omicron \delta \beta \eta \theta \acute{\epsilon} \iota \varsigma$ c. r. l. and St. James.

Isaiah is quoted as "the Prophet." Cp. Matt. frequently of Isaiah, and also of Jeremiah, Daniel, Jonah: so Peter of Joel (Acts ii. 16); so Acts viii. 28, 30; so Paul of Samuel (Acts xiii. 20) and of Isaiah (Acts xxviii. 25).

The people quote with the phrase $\eta \mu \epsilon \iota \varsigma \eta \sigma \acute{\omicron} \sigma \alpha \mu \epsilon \nu \epsilon \kappa \tau \omicron \upsilon \nu \acute{\omicron} \mu \omicron \upsilon$ (ch. xii. 34), using the term "Law" for the Old Test. generally, as in ch. x. 34, and suggest by their words that they were speaking from memory of the Synagogue lessons. Just in the same way our Lord says, $\text{Ἡκούσατε ὅτι ἐρρήθη} \dots$ (Matt. v. 2).

iii. Other instances of minute knowledge of the Old Testament Scriptures.—More striking than the instances of direct quotation are the light and undesigned touches which occur at every point in the Gospel, and give reminiscences of almost every Book in the Old Testament. Of Genesis and the other Books of Moses, of Samuel and of Kings, of Psalms and of Proverbs, of Isaiah in both parts, special knowledge will be expected and will be found; of Jeremiah, of Ezekiel, and of David; of Hosea, Joel, Micah, Zephaniah, Zechariah, and Malachi. The touches are of persons—Abraham, Moses, Jacob, David; of history, as of the manna, the circumcision, the brazen serpent, the well and the flocks at Sychar; of similes, as the Bridegroom, the living Water, the Shepherd, the Vine; of doctrines, as Life, Light, Truth, Righteousness, Peace.

* Dr. Hatch's opinion (Essays in Biblical Greek, p. 213) that the common source was an older translation, and that the Jews substituted $\kappa \alpha \tau \omega \chi \rho \acute{\eta} \sigma \alpha \rho \tau \omicron$ in the LXX. for the original $\epsilon \xi \epsilon \kappa \acute{\epsilon} \nu \tau \eta \sigma \alpha \nu$, as advanced by Mr. J. A. Cross in The Classical Review, iv. 453 sqq., is characterised by Prof. T. K. Abbott as "utterly preposterous." See his reasons in The Classical Review, v. 11, and Mr. Cross's Reply, ibid. p. 142.

iv. The Relation of the great doctrinal positions of the Gospel to the Old Testament, and to the earlier Teaching of the New Testament.—An exhaustive examination of the ideas of the Fourth Gospel, and a comparison of them with the ideas of the Old Testament, of the Synoptic Gospels, of St. Paul, St. Peter, St. James, ought to tell without much room for doubt whether the writer is a Jew or a Gentile. While such an examination would be in this place impossible, it is specially satisfactory to be able to refer to it as already done. The able treatises of Weiss (Biblical Theology of the New Testament, 1885, esp. vol. ii. pp. 311–416) and Lechler (Apostolic and post-Apostolic Times, ed. 3, 1886, esp. vol. ii. 163 sqq., 250 sqq.) are now easily accessible. The works of Franke (Das alte Testament bei Johannes, 1885) and Oscar Holtzmann (Das Johannesevangelium untersucht und erklärt, 1887) are from opposite standpoints of great value, though Franke is perhaps rather too much of an advocate. Two English works on this part of the subject also afford valuable guidance: Lias (Doctrinal System of St. John, 1875), and the remarkable Introduction by Dr. Reynolds in the Pulpit Commentary, Gospel of St. John (1888, see esp. pp. cxxviii.–cl.).

But two characteristic doctrinal positions demand a brief exposition, both from their own importance and as examples of the evidence which is to be furnished by this method. One of them, The Doctrine of the Logos,⁴ will find its more fit place of treatment in a separate article [LOGOS]. The other is the Messianic Idea. The development of this doctrine is stated by the writer to be the purpose of the Gospel, ἵνα πιστεύητε ὅτι Ἰησοῦς ἐστὶν ὁ Χριστὸς ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ (ch. xx. 31). Accordingly, as Weizsäcker notes, the Messianic question is of all Jewish questions which are bound up with the life of Jesus the one which is most fully dealt with in the Fourth Gospel (Untersuchungen, 1864, p. 260). It is moreover of all Jewish questions just that one which forms the best test of nationality and date. The destruction of Jerusalem changed the whole aspect of Messianic hope. If the Fourth Gospel is by St. John, the Messianic Idea ought to be treated with the intimate knowledge of a born Jew; and yet the Jewish hope of a Messianic kingdom must have ceased to exist for him when Jesus Christ was crucified two generations ago, and the national idea must have ceased to exist when Jerusalem itself ceased to exist as the centre of national life, and he who for a whole generation had lived in a new region of life must, in the blending of Judaism with Hellenism, have passed far away from the streets of Jerusalem or the shores of Galilee, and have found that the true Messiah is indeed of the Jews but for the world. This is what is à priori to be expected. The following passages may be taken as samples of what is actually to be found (cp. Franke, Das alte Testament, &c., pp. 166 sqq.):

Ch. i. 19–28. Note the Messianic movement and expectation among the Jerusalem Jews at this period. John Baptist's answer, "I am not the Messiah" (v. 20), shows what the unuttered question really was. "The prophet" (v. 21, cp. Deut. xviii. 15; Matt. xvi. 14, and ch. vii. 41, where in the same way "the prophet" is distinguished from the Messiah) shows a knowledge which is natural and exact. If acquired, it must have been more prominent and explained for those who had acquired it. The Pharisees know (v. 25) that Baptism is connected with the Messianic work (cp. Ezek. xxxvi. 25; Zech. xiii. 1; Heb. x. 11).

Ch. i. 41 represents Andrew as telling his brother that they had found—and they had therefore previously sought together—the Messiah. The term itself in its Hebrew (Aramaic) form (Messias or Mesias = מָשִׁיחַ, stat. emph. of מָשַׁח) is found only here and in ch. iv. 25 in the New Testament.

Ch. i. 45 implies that these disciples had talked together of the coming Messiah (cp. Deut. xviii. 18).

Ch. i. 49. Nathanael represents national hopes, as do the people in ch. xii. 13, which had no place after the destruction of Jerusalem; but their formula "King of Israel" exactly represents the Rabbinic מלך ישראל and the Targumic מלכא משיחא.

Ch. i. 51 gives in sharp contrast to Nathanael's "Son of God: King of Israel," as though at once to protest against the merely national view of the Messianic reign, the title which was commonly used (more than seventy times) by Jesus of himself, "the Son of Man."

Ch. vi. 14, 15. The sign, the Prophet that cometh (cp. i. 21, 25; vii. 40, only in St. John), the desire to make Him a king (cp. i. 49), His withdrawal from those who had this desire as contrasted with His statement to the woman in ch. iv. 26, all is in complete harmony with the current Messianic expectation.

Ch. vii. 25–31. Note the distinction between Jerusalemites and provincials. Their question shows how fully the expectation of the Messiah had taken hold of their minds. This man does not seem to them to be the Christ; but why do the rulers who have plotted to kill Him, allow Him this freedom? Have the rulers, whose duty it is to decide, seen any reason to recognize him?

⁴ Cp. Westcott's St. John, pp. 14–18; Soulier, La Doctrine du Logos, 1876; Slegfried, Philo v. Alex., 1875; Ederhelm, art. PHILO in Dict. of Christ. Biog.; Klassen, Die alltest. Weisheit u. d. Logos, 1879; Réville, La Doctrine du Logos, 1881; Drummond, Philo Judaeus, 1888 (specially); Excursus A in Ellcott's New Testament Commentary, i. 552–554, and Bampton Lectures, 1890, p. 431.

But not they themselves knew about this man, and one of the Messianic signs was a sudden appearance (cp. Heb. vii. 3, ἀγγελολόγητος, and the Rabbinic מְרַמְזֵם מְרַמְזֵם; Dan. vii. 13; Mal. iii. 1; Sanh. 97 a; Mid. on Cantic. ii. 9; Justin, c. Tryph. p. 226 B; Lightfoot, Hor. Il. b.; and the Commentaries ad loc.).

Note also the conviction of the multitude (not, or at least not chiefly, the Jerusalemites), some of whom had seen more of the signs which He had wrought. Are the signs which they have a right to expect as a proof of Messiah's advent (cp. the answer to John Baptist in Matt. xi. 4, 5) greater than these?

V. 40-42. The vague feeling of the people about the Prophet and the Messiah (cp. vi. 14, 15), while the Jerusalem officials distinguish carefully the Messiah, the Prophet, and Elias (ch. i. 20-25). They knew that the Messiah should be born in Bethlehem (cp. Mic. v. 2; Is. xi. 1; Jer. xxiii. 5), but are unaware of the fact that Jesus was born there, and the writer records the mistake as they made it.

Ch. xii. 13. Cp. ch. i. 49 and the parallels in the Synoptists. St. Mark's is the fullest form of the acclamation. St. John alone has the characteristic "King of Israel."

V. 34. Cp. ch. x. 34 and Is. ix. 7; Ps. cx. 4, lxxxix. 4 sq.; Ezek. xxxvii. 25. A statement which is quite natural from a Jew, but almost inexplicable on any other theory.

Ch. xix. 14-21. The examination before Pilate turns wholly on the Kingship; and the answer of the chief priests, "We have no king but Caesar," is the surrender of the Messianic hope.

The evidence then comes from every quarter, and in its entirety—which can only be suggested here—attains a strength which can hardly be resisted, that whoever wrote the Fourth Gospel wrote with a complete and full knowledge which would be impossible for anyone who was not a born Jew. And the more this evidence is examined, the more fruitful in conviction does it become. Heinrich Holtzmann does not believe that the writing is by St. John, but he sees no reason why it should not be as easily the work of a born Jew of the Dispersion as the Book of Wisdom or the Epistle to the Hebrews. So even Keim and Thoma, against Baur, Hilgenfeld, Strauss, Scholten, Schenkel (Einleitung, ed. 2, 1886, p. 468). Oscar Holtzmann thinks that the writing is later than St. John, but he is convinced that the writer is a Christian Jew of the Dispersion (Das Johannesevangelium, 1887, p. 74), and, what is much more important, his reviewer Schürer thinks this opinion to be in the highest degree probable (Theolog. Litzg. 1887, No. 14).

In the face of these growing admissions, it has come to be unnecessary to meet at any length the old stock objections to the Jewish authorship. They will be found set forth in Davidson (Introduction, 1868, vol. ii. pp. 427 sqq.). In so far as they have any force they oppose the Palestinian or First Century—not the Jewish—authorship (cp. infra, p. 1754).

2. Home and local surroundings of the Writer.—The Gospel contains a considerable number of references to places in Palestine, and an examination of these should furnish evidence on the question whether the writer is dealing with these with the natural ease of the familiar knowledge of childhood, or is writing from the acquired knowledge of distance in both place and time. The evidence should be the more decisive, as the time of Ordinance surveys and geographical societies had not yet come, and any minute acquaintance with the subject would suggest with strong probability that the writer had direct knowledge. Once again the evidence is cumulative, and is furnished throughout the Gospel. The writer knows that Bethany is "beyond Jordan" (ch. i. 28), and a distinct place from the Bethany which is "about fifteen furlongs" from Jerusalem (ch. xi. 18). Philip is of Bethsaida, and this is the city of Andrew and Peter (ch. i. 44); Cana is "of Galilee" (chs. ii. 1, 11, iv. 46, xxi. 2; nowhere else named in the Bible); Capernaum on the shores of the lake is "down" from the higher land of Cana (ch. ii. 12); Aenon is known (but known to this writer only, for it is nowhere else mentioned) to be "near to Salim" (cp. Palest. Explor. Fund Report, 1874, pp. 141 sq.; Picturesq. Palest. vol. ii. p. 237, and article AENON in this Dictionary), and is known, as its name implies, to have "much water" (ch. iii. 23); Sychar ('Ashkar') is near to the well-known "parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph" (ch. iv. 5), and there is no confusion with Shechem by the writer, though there is by some of his critics (Palest. Explor. Fund Report, 1877, pp. 149 sq., 1876, p. 197; Ellicott's New Test. Commentary: St. John, ad loc.). He knows too that "Jacob's well was there" (v. 6) and that it was "deep" (v. 11), and that Mount Gerizim could be indicated ("this mountain," v. 20) by pointing to it. He alone of the New Testament writers knows the Sea of Galilee by its classical name of Tiberias (λίμνη Τιβεριάδα, Pausanias, v. 7, 4), and he gives both names in ch. v. 1 (cp. v. 23), but the later name only in ch. xxi. 1. No name was after the destruction of Jerusalem more sacred to a Jew.

The minute knowledge of Jerusalem and the Temple—a Jerusalem and a Temple, be it remembered, which the Roman armies destroyed in A.D. 70—is more striking even than that of the geography of Palestine. Examples of this occur in the scenes in ch. ii. 13-22, which imply topographical details; in ch. v. 2, where the present tense indicates reminiscence of the place, and the gate, the pool, the five porches, the Hebrew name, all tell of personal knowledge; in chs. vii. and viiii., in technical knowledge of the ritual of the Temple and of the Treasury, where Jesus was teaching (v. 20, vide Commentaries ad loc.); in ch. ix. 7, the "Pool of Siloam" and the interpretation "Sent;" in ch. x. 22, 23, where both time and place are told ("winter," "Solomon's cloister"); in ch. xi. 18, where the distance of Bethany from Jerusalem is given as the rough estimate of a man who knows the places ("nigh unto Jerusalem—about 'fifteen furlongs off"); in ch. xviii. 1 and 2, where the "brook Kidron," frequent in the Old Testament, occurs alone in the New; in ch. xix. 13, where "Gabbatha" is given in the Aramaic form (ܢܗܝܘܨ ܕܨܝܢ), and v. 41, where the "garden" (κῆπος, cp. ch. xviii. 1) is peculiar to St. John.

Nor are these more than examples of details which constantly occur. The impression which they leave deepens with every renewal of their study, until there is no room for doubting that the writer of this work was a Jew of Palestine, and that he was intimately acquainted with Galilee, Judaea, and Jerusalem before the occupation by the Roman armies under Titus.

3. The Writer's relation to the events which he narrates.—The Fourth Gospel is the presentation of a series of events in which a number of persons, and many details of time and place and circumstances, occur. It should therefore furnish evidence on the question whether the writer is describing that which he saw and heard, or with which he was in close contact, or is writing at a distance and giving impressions which he had received from others. The realism of an eye-witness, or one who is writing from direct reports, cannot be counterfeited, and the attempt always betrays itself. Here, too, the evidence is cumulative, and can only be estimated as a whole. The following examples are meant to suggest lines of study:—

Ch. i. 35–51. Note (a) The marks of time: “on the morrow” (v. 35, 43); “about the tenth hour” (v. 39).

(b) Personal attitude: “was standing” (v. 35), “looked upon . . . as He walked” (v. 36), “heard him speak and . . . followed” (v. 37), “turned and beheld them following, and saith” (v. 38), “brought him unto Jesus. Jesus looked upon him and said” (v. 42), “was minded” (v. 43), “saw Nathanael coming” (v. 47), “Before Philip called thee, when thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee” (v. 48).

(γ) The actors in the scene. “John . . . and two of his disciples” (v. 35). He is not “John Baptist,” but the John of this Gospel. “One of the two . . . Andrew, Simon Peter’s brother” (v. 40), the other being the anonymous writer; “Simon the son of John . . . Cephas . . . Peter” (v. 42); “Philip . . . from Bethsaida, of the city of Andrew and Peter” (v. 44); “Nathanael” (vv. 45–51, cp. ch. xxi. 2), the Bartholomew of the Synoptists. All these are living and moving characters in the incident. They are all known to the writer, and by him made known to us.

Ch. ix. The man born blind. Note these touches of realism: “as Jesus passed by” (v. 1); the disciples’ question in strict accord with Jewish belief, “this man or his parents” (v. 2); the details, “spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and anointed his eyes with the clay . . . and came seeing” (vv. 6 and 7). The chatter of the neighbours and the assertion of the man (vv. 8–13); the appeal to the Pharisees, the Sabbath, the division among them and their question to the man (vv. 13–17); the appeal to the parents, their difficulty and hesitancy, the reason for it (vv. 18–24); the appeal to the man, his blunt frankness, which is too much for their subtlety, the exclusion from the synagogue (vv. 25–34): it is impossible to read all this without feeling that the account is necessarily that of one who saw and heard.

Ch. xxi. The appearance in Galilee. Note the group of the disciples: Nathanael quite incidentally called “of Cana in Galilee,” explaining his position in chs. i. 45 and ii. 1; the “sons of Zebedee,” occupying a position which it is difficult to explain except on the supposition that one of them is the writer (v. 2); the very words of Peter, “I go a fishing,” and the reply (v. 3); the touch of time, “when day was now breaking” (γινόμενης); the standing on the beach; the ignorance of the disciples (v. 4); the direct question and answer (v. 5); the “right side” (v. 6); the “disciple whom Jesus loved” and Peter (v. 7); the draught of fishes, “two hundred cubits” (v. 8); the “fire of charcoal” (again only in ch. xviii. 9), “and a fish laid thereon, and a loaf” (v. 9); the “great fishes, a hundred and fifty and three” (v. 11); the feeling of reverence (v. 12); the threefold commission to Peter, ἀγάπησ-φιλεις, ἀρλια-προβάτια, ποιμανε-βόσκε (vv. 15–17); the prophecy of Peter’s future (vv. 18, 19); of that of the beloved disciple (vv. 20–22); the mistake and the correction of it (v. 23).

Here again the whole scene is pictured with all the detail and life and movement which belong to a contemporary record.

These three examples are taken from different parts of the writing; but the whole of the historical portion is written with this life-like power and fulness of detail, which carries its own evidence. Compare other instances in ch. ii. 1–13 (the marriage at Cana), and vv. 14–16 (cleansing of the Temple); ch. vi. 5–14 (feeding of the five thousand); ch. xi. (raising of Lazarus); ch. xii. 20–23 (the Greeks); ch. xiii. 4, 5, 12 (the feet washing); ch. xviii. 1–13 (the betrayal); chs. xviii. and xix. (details of the Passion); ch. xx. 3–8 (the visit to the sepulchre).

Note further the exact knowledge of the time at which events took place. The knowledge of the feasts and the greater divisions of time is in itself much more full than in the Synoptists, and this is an important consideration; but as testifying to a personal witness, the smaller trifling notes of time which are not worth knowing, and yet, if known, are strong evidence of actual memory of the events, are much more important. Such are “the next day” (ch. i. 29, 35, 43), “the third day” (ch. ii. 1), “after two days” (ch. iv. 43), “the day following” (ch. vi. 22), “two days,” “four days” (ch. xi. 6, 17), “six days before,” “the next day” (ch. xii. 1, 12), “the first day of the week,” “the same day at evening” (ch. xx. 1, 19), “about the tenth hour” (ch. i. 39), “by night” (ch. iii. 2), “about the sixth hour,” “at the seventh hour” (ch. iv. 6, 52), “when even was now come” (ch. vi. 16), “and it was night” (ch. xiii. 30), “and it was early” (ch. xviii. 28), “early, when it was yet dark” (ch. xx. 1), “when the day was now breaking” (ch. xxi. 4).

The same kind of knowledge furnishing the same kind of evidence occurs with regard to numbers of persons or objects. In some cases they are known exactly, as “two disciples” (ch. i. 35), “six water-pots” (ch. ii. 6), “five husbands” (ch. iv. 18), “thirty and eight years” (ch. v. 5), “five loaves and two small fishes” (ch. vi. 9; also in Synoptists), “four soldiers” (ch. xix. 23), “two hundred cubits” (ch. xxi. 8), “hundred and fifty and three fishes” (ch. xxi. 11).

Sometimes an approximation or rough estimate is given, and this is in the present connexion more important than the exact statement.

It is the man who knows the circumstances who can make the guess. The water-pots contain "two or three firkins apiece" (ch. ii. 6); the disciples had rowed "about five and twenty or thirty furlongs" (ch. vi. 19); Bethany is "about fifteen furlongs off" (ch. xi. 18); the mixture of myrrh and aloes is "about a hundred pound weight" (ch. xix. 39); the disciples are not far from land, "about two hundred furlongs" (ch. xxi. 8).

The result of this examination, if we cannot deduce from it that the writer was necessarily an eye-witness, is to bring him at least into immediate contact with those who were. The argument has sometimes been overstated (cf. Westminster Review, 1890, pp. 172-182). But Bishop Lightfoot's final opinion, which records a review of eighteen years, is: "Additional study has only strengthened my conviction that this narrative of St. John could not have been written by any one but an eye-witness" (Expositor, January 1890, p. 2).

The writer moves, moreover, and that with the ease of familiar knowledge, in the inner circle of "the disciples" life and thought. The following examples will illustrate this:—

Ch. ii. 11 ("believed on Him"), v. 22 ("... when therefore He was risen from the dead, His disciples remembered that He had said this unto them..."); ch. iii. 22 sqq. (knowledge of what passed between John and his disciples); ch. iv. 2 (correction of mistake in report: "although... but His disciples"), v. 33 (what the disciples said "one to another"); ch. v. 6 (the spring of action: "when Jesus saw him lying, and knew..."); ch. vi. 5-9 (Jesus, Andrew, and Philip), vv. 22-24 (intricate movement of the boats), vv. 70, 71 ("... one of you is a devil? He spake of Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon..."); ch. vii. 3 (what "His brethren" said unto Jesus); ch. ix. 2 ("His disciples asked Him... Jesus answered"); ch. xi. 7, 8 ("... saith He to His disciples... His disciples say unto Him..."), v. 16 ("Thomas therefore, who is called Didymus, said unto his fellow-disciples..."); ch. xii. 16 ("These things understood not the disciples at the first..."), vv. 20-22 (the Greeks and Philip); ch. xiii. 6-11 (Simon Peter and the feet-washing), v. 22 ("looked... doubting of whom He spake"), v. 28 ("no man at the table knew... Some thought..."); ch. xiv. 5-14 (Jesus, Thomas, Philip, the Way, and the Father); ch. xvi. 17 ("What is this that He saith unto us...?"); ch. xviii. 2 ("for Jesus ofttimes resorted thither..."); ch. xx. 9 ("For as yet they knew not the Scriptures"), v. 19 ("when the doors were shut where the disciples were for fear of the Jews, Jesus came"), v. 25 (Thomas Didymus: "The other disciples therefore said unto him... But he said unto them"); ch. xxi., especially vv. 3-5 (the appearance on the beach).

The writer is acquainted also with the feelings, thoughts, and springs of action of Jesus Himself. See in proof of this:—

Ch. ii. 24, 25 ("Jesus did not trust himself... for He himself knew what was in man"); ch. iv. 1 ("When therefore the Lord knew..."); ch. v. 6 (Bethesda: "When Jesus saw him lying, and knew..."); ch. vi. 6 (Philip: "This He said to prove him, for He himself knew what He would do"), v. 15 ("Jesus therefore, perceiving that..."), v. 61 ("But Jesus knowing in himself"), v. 64 ("For Jesus knew from the beginning..."); ch. vii. 1 ("for He would not walk in Judaea, because..."), v. 6 ("Jesus therefore saith unto them"), v. 14 ("not publicly, but as it were in secret"); ch. xi. 33 ("groaned in the spirit, and was troubled"), v. 54 ("Jesus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews"); ch. xiii. 1 ("Jesus knowing that His hour was come... loved them to the uttermost"), v. 3 ("knowing that the Father had given all things into His hands..."), v. 11 ("For He knew him that should betray Him; therefore said He..."), v. 21 ("... He was troubled in the spirit"); ch. xvi. 19 ("Jesus perceived that they were desirous to ask Him..."); ch. xviii. 4 ("Jesus therefore, knowing all the things that were coming upon Him..."); ch. xix. 28 ("Jesus knowing that all things were now accomplished...").

By a series of inductions then, each one being separately based upon a series of individual instances—and these, be it again noted, are but examples of instances which are to be found throughout the whole writing—the following results are arrived at:—

(1) The writer was a Jew; (2) he was a Jew acquainted with the Hebrew language; (3) he was personally acquainted with the topography of Palestine, and with minute details of the city and temple of Jerusalem, and his knowledge was therefore acquired before A.D. 70; (4) he was intimately acquainted with the life of the inner circle of the Apostles, and was therefore one of them; (5) he had special knowledge of the work and inner life of John Baptist; (6) he had special knowledge of the work and inner life of Jesus.

This is one set of conditions which is asserted of the writer by the writing itself.

There is another set of conditions which is not less positively asserted by the writing itself, and the problem of authorship requires that both sets of conditions shall be satisfied.

(a) If the author is a Jew, with a full minute knowledge of Judaism, he is also a Jew to whom that Judaism is a thing of the far-off past, from which he has himself advanced into a new region of life and thought.

See as examples of this ch. ii. 6 ("after the manner of the purifying of the Jews"); ch. iv. 9 ("The Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans"); ch. v. 2 ("which is called in the Hebrew tongue Bethesda"); ch. xix. 41 ("the manner of the Jews to bury").

"The Jews" (οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι) are not only spoken of throughout as a body from whom the writer is distinct, but they are represented as the opponents of the Lord. It was "the Jews" who said unto Him, "What sign shewest Thou unto us?" (ch. ii. 18); who "said unto Him that was cured, It is the Sabbath day," and did "persecute Jesus and sought to slay Him, because He had done these things on the Sabbath day" (ch. v. 10, 16); who "murmured at Him because He said, I am the bread which came down from heaven" (ch. vi. 41); who ask, "Will He kill himself? because He saith, Whither I go ye cannot come" (ch. viii. 21); who upon two occasions "took up stones to stone Him" (ch.

viii. 59, x. 31); who "said unto Him, Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan and hast a devil" (ch. viii. 48, 52, 57); who in the case of the man who was born blind "did not believe concerning him that he had been blind," and had agreed about Jesus, "that if any man did confess that He was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue" (ch. ix. 18, 22). Joseph of Arimathea was "a disciple of Jesus, but secretly for fear of the Jews" (ch. xix. 28), and "the doors were shut when the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews" (ch. xx. 19).

The writer thinks also of "the Passover of the Jews" (chs. ii. 13, xi. 55); of the "feast of the Jews" (chs. v. 1, vi. 4, vii. 2); of a "ruler of the Jews" (ch. iii. 1); of "the Jews' preparation day" (παρασκευή, ch. xix. 42).

It is not surprising that many critics have felt the force of this distinctness and distance from Judaism so fully, that they have come to the conclusion that the writer could not have been himself a Jew; but these thoughts and words are to be considered in connexion with those which have been adduced above (p. 1749 sq.), and also with such references as the following (cp. Oscar Holtzmann, Das Johannesevangelium, pp. 193-4):—

The woman of Samaria asks Jesus, "How is it that thou being a Jew . . . ?" and Jesus tells her, "Ye worship ye know not what; we know what we worship, for salvation is of the Jews" (ch. iv. 9, 22).

Moses is recognized as the true lawgiver (chs. i. 17, vii. 19), and God spake unto him (ch. ix. 29). Jesus says to the Jews, "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day" (ch. viii. 56). Isaiah "saw His glory and spake of Him" (ch. xii. 41).

Nathanael is "an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile"; and he uses the terms "Son of God" and "King of Israel" as titles which coalesce in the person of Jesus (ch. i. 47; cp. ch. xix. 15, 21).

(8) An exact study of the thoughts and words of the Gospel makes it necessary to believe that the writer was largely influenced by the teaching of St. Paul—unless indeed it is admitted that St. Paul was acquainted with the Johannine tradition—and in particular that he was placed in philosophical and theological circles identical with or closely allied to those of the Epistle to the Colossians, and to those of the encyclical Asiatic letter which is known to us as the Epistle to the Ephesians. The full proof of this is to be found only in a complete list of parallel passages and in a Greek concordance; and if we bear in mind the difference of subject-matter between the Gospel and these letters, it is not less than full proof. In this place space cannot be found for more than a general reference, and the student will not need more guidance than is furnished by his concordance and his commentaries. A specially valuable examination of the relation between the Epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians will be found in Heinrich Holtzmann's Kritik der Epheser- und Kolosserbriefe, 1872. The relations of both to

John are investigated in pp. 267-271, and parallels are shown to exist between the Gospel and the Colossian Epistle which must be more than accidental, while in the Ephesian Epistle they become even more striking. The following examples are sufficient to show how real the grounds of comparison are:—

Οὐδεὶς ἀναβίβηκεν εἰς τὸν οὐρανὸν εἰ μὴ ὁ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ καταβάς.
John iii. 13.

Τὸ ἀνθρώπινον τί ἐστὶν εἰ μὴ ὅτι κατέβη;
Ὁ καταβάς αὐτός ἐστιν καὶ ὁ ἀναβάς ὑπεράνω πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν.
Eph. iv. 9, 10.

Πᾶς γὰρ ὁ φάυλα πρῶστων μισοῖ τὸ φῶς καὶ οὐκ ἔρχεται πρὸς τὸ φῶς ἵνα μὴ ἐλεγχθῇ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ.
Ὁ δὲ ποιῶν τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἔρχεται πρὸς τὸ φῶς ἵνα φανερωθῇ αὐτοῦ τὰ ἔργα.
John iii. 20, 21.

Περικατεῖτε ὡς τὸ φῶς ἔχετε.
John xii. 35.

Ὅτι τέκνα φωτός περιπατεῖτε.
Eph. v. 8.

See especially Oscar Holtzmann, op. cit. pp. 174-5, who thinks it certain that the Colossian Epistle stands between St. Paul (!) and the Fourth Gospel.

(9) A careful comparison of the Gospel with the First Epistle of Peter brings out also points of resemblance which are sufficiently striking to warrant the deduction that the writings are in some way connected with each other:—

Οἱ οὐκ ἐξ αἱμάτων οὐδὲ ἐκ θελήματος σαρκὸς οὐδὲ ἐκ θελήματος ἀνδρῶν ἀλλ' ἐκ θεοῦ ἐγεννήθησαν.
John i. 13.

Ἐὰν μὴ τις γεννηθῇ ἄνωθεν.
John iii. 3.
(See the context.)

Ὁ κατὰ τὸ πολὺ αὐτοῦ ἔλεος ἀναγεννήσας ἡμᾶς.
1 Pet. i. 3.

(The word occurs here only in the New Testament. Cp. Justin Martyr, Apology, i. 61.)

Ἰδὲ ὁ ἀμνὸς τοῦ θεοῦ.
John i. 29, 36.

Ὅς ἀμνοῦ ἀμώμου.
1 Pet. i. 19.
(Elsewhere in New Testament only in Acts viii. 32, in quotation from Is. liii. 7.)

Πρόβατα, ποιμὴν, ποιμαίνετε τὰ πρόβατά μου.
John x. 2-16; xxi. 16, 17.

Ἦτε γὰρ ὡς πρόβατα πλανώμενοι, ἀλλὰ ἐπιστρέψατε νῦν ἐπὶ τὸν ποιμένα καὶ ἐπίσκοπον τῶν ψυχῶν ὑμῶν.

*Ὅτι οὐκ ἰδόντες ἀγαπήσατε,

(8) If a like process of comparison is applied to the Fourth Gospel and the Epistle of James, it furnishes results which, when the ethical nature of the Epistle is borne in mind, are scarcely less striking:—

Cp. James i. 18 with John iii. 3 and 13; James iv. 5 with John iii. 5; James ii. 12 and i. 25 with John viii. 31; James ii. 1 with John v. 44; James v. 14 with John xv. 16, xvi. 23; James v. 19 with John v. 24: and see especially the examination of these passages in Dr. Paul Ewald's Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage (1890). Cp. also Zeller on the literary dependence of St. James upon the Apocalypse in the Zeitschrift wiss. Theol., 1863, pp. 93-96; Hilgenfeld, Einleitung, 1875, p. 540; and Holtzmann, Einleitung, 1886, p. 510.

(e) It seems further to be clear from a study of the thoughts and words of the Gospel, that it is closely connected with the circles of thought which had Asia Minor, and especially Ephesus, for a centre. We have seen above its connexion with the Asiatic Epistles of St. Paul; and if we regard not so much individual expressions as the tone of the whole, we should say that the Gospel was more like the Epistle to the Hebrews than any other writing in the New Testament. Tobler (cp. supra, p. 1746) has founded upon this general tone of the Gospel an ingenious argument that it was the work of Apollos, and the general position of critics who do not accept the Johannine authorship is that there are so many traces of the language and thought which is associated with Philo and Alexandria, that it is impossible to believe that the author was not a pupil of the Alexandrian school. Nor is it any matter of surprise that men who have directed their attention chiefly to this one aspect of the question should have come to this conclusion. The matter of surprise is that the influence of Philo should have been denied. The natural impression on reading of Λόγος, ἄρχων, μονογενῆς, πρωτότοκος, ζωῆ, ἀλήθεια, φῶς, παράκλητος, πλήρωμα, is that we are in contact with the περὶ χερουβιμ and περὶ κοσμοποίας. The error here, as so often, is to press part of the truth until it becomes entire error; but it is also entire error to deny part of the truth. Both extremes are false. The truth remains as one, but as only one, of the factors of our problem, that the authorship of the Fourth Gospel is to be sought upon Ephesian ground.

We have now surveyed, very cursorily indeed, but with such fulness as our present scope and space permit, the conditions of authorship which are required by the writing before us. A more complete statement of them may be sought in the chief works upon the Gospel to which reference is made in this article. But taking only the main points as they here present themselves, we have a problem which is sufficiently complex. The writer must have been a disciple of John Baptist; an eye-witness or in contact with those who were; one of the inner group of the disciples of Jesus; a Jew by birth and training; a Greek by culture and surroundings at the time he wrote; a Jew with a foot on each side of the great chasm which was caused by the destruction of Jerusalem; a Palestinian; an Ephesian; in contact with St. Peter and St. James, the brother of our Lord; a follower of St. Paul. These are some of the wards of the lock which we are asked to turn. History gives its key in the person of John, the son of Zebedee (cp. article JOHN, THE APOSTLE), whose life fulfils every condition, and turns the lock. Theory has tried in vain to prove that this is not the key, and has tried in vain to find another.

II. DATE OF THE GOSPEL.

If the Gospel was written by John, the son of Zebedee, the question of its date is reduced to comparatively narrow limits. Irenaeus tells us (Adv. Haer. ii. ch. xxii. 5; iii. ch. iii. 4) that St. John lived to the "time of Trajan" (A.D. 98-117. Cp. article JOHN, THE APOSTLE). This means that his death is to be placed early in the reign of Trajan, and that the close of the first century is a terminus ad quem. To fix, on the other hand, a terminus a quo, is a more difficult task. If the last chapter is regarded as an appendix, and there seems to be every reason for supposing that it is so, though an appendix which was absent from no published copy of the Gospel, and is to be traced to the same source (cp. 24 and 25 are to be regarded from another point of view), it follows that the Gospel is to be placed at an interval of perhaps some years before the close of the Apostle's life. The general opinion of the early Church pointed to A.D. 85 or 86. Without fixing limits so narrow, it may be said with great probability that the date is subsequent to A.D. 80, and not much if any earlier than A.D. 90.

Irenaeus asserts that "he put forth his Gospel while he abode in Ephesus in Asia" (Adv. Haer. iii. 1; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. v. 8), and there is no sufficient reason to question this statement (cp. Ellicott's New Test. Commentary, i. pp. 376-7 and 551).

III. MATTER AND CHARACTERISTICS.

A. Purpose and Scheme.—The earliest external statement of the origin of this Gospel which is now known is probably that of the Muratorian Fragment. It represents the author as being entreated by his fellow-disciples and bishops, and consenting, after fasting and a revelation to Andrew that John should relate all things with the recognition of them all (cp. Tregelles, Canon Muratorianus, 1867, pp. 1-21 and 32-35). The statement of Irenaeus that the purpose was to meet the error of Cerinthus and the Nicolaitans (Adv. Haer. iii. ch. xi.) is not inconsistent with the statement of the Fragment, and is of special interest from the writer's immediate connexion with the school of St. John. It meets us again (but with the Ebionites substituted for the Nicolaitans) in Tertullian (De Praesc. adv. Haer. xxxiii.), Epiphanius (Haer. li. 12), and Jerome (De Vir. Ill. ix.). Eusebius represents Clement of Alexandria as stating that John perceived that what had reference to the body was sufficiently told, and that, encouraged by his friends and urged by the Spirit, he wrote a spiritual Gospel (Hist. Écoles. vi. 15); and he himself expands this statement into a more definite expression of the complementary nature of the work (op. cit. iii. 24). From the first, then, the distinct but not opposed elements of dogmatic teaching, polemical removal of error, and historical addition to previously existing records, are recognized in the purpose of the Gospel. Modern writers have too frequently pressed one of these elements to the exclusion of others, and have sometimes with little reason found more limited objects, as the answer to the errors of Docetism (see esp. Schneckemburger, Beiträge zur Einleitung in N. T., 1832, pp. 60 sqq.), or to the disciples of John Baptist (cp. art. Johannesjünger, Schenkel's Bibel-Lexicon, vol. iii. pp. 324 sqq.).

The traditional view of the purpose is not opposed to that which is expressed in the writing itself, but it is singular that attention has been so seldom directed to the definite terms in which the object is declared by the author, and in which his method of selection is declared both by himself and his amanuensis or editor. Some only of the many signs which Jesus did are written in this book—"if all the things which He did should be written, the world itself would not contain the books"—and these are written to establish faith in the Messiahship, to prove that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (chs. xx. 30, 31, and xxi. 25).

The work then is a series of chronicles rather than a history, and the related events and discourses are chosen with an express dogmatic purpose which is throughout the ruling idea. The life of Jesus is a revelation, accepted and understood by faith, denied and rejected by unbelief. The great facts of this revelation, and the conflict of these opposing principles, are the subjects of the writing; Ephesus, its theology, philosophy, language, form necessarily the framework in which these subjects are set (cp. Bampton Lectures, 1890, pp. 427 sqq.).

B. Relation to the Apocalypse. (Cp. art. REVELATION.)—The relation of the Fourth Gospel to the Apocalypse presents a problem of greater difficulty. The difference in style; the Hebraic cast of thought and phrase; the halting Greek; the absence or infrequent use of characteristic Johannine words, such as φῶς, σκοτία, κόσμος, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, and of favourite Johannine particles, as καθώς, μέν, μέντοι, πάντοτε, πίστετε; the presence of expressions such as οἰκουμένη, ὑπομένη, κρατεῖν τὸ ὄνομα, παντοκράτωρ, ἀρχὸν; the changed use or form of the same word (as οὐδ, illative only; ἀμήν, not doubled; ἰδοὺ, not ἴδε; Ἱεροσολαίμ, never Ἱεροσόλυμα), at once strike the thoughtful reader, and have formed one of the commonplaces of criticism from the days of Dionysius of Alexandria downwards. Dionysius was not indeed wholly free from interest in seeing the differences between the two writings, and in excluding the Apocalypse from the circle of Johannine writings, because it differed so widely from the Fourth Gospel and the Epistle, inasmuch as it also differed from his own position in the Chiliastic controversy (Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vii. 24, 25). The writings are different; the Fourth Gospel and the Epistle are by John, the son of Zebedee; therefore the Apocalypse, though it is the work of some holy and inspired man, is not by John. Such is the argument of the third century. The writings are different; no conclusion of modern criticism is more certain than this; John cannot be the author of Gospel and Epistle on the one hand, and of the Apocalypse on the other; the Apocalypse is the best attested writing of the New Testament; therefore the Fourth Gospel and the Epistle are not by John. Such has sometimes been the argument of the nineteenth century. As a matter of fact, though the evidence for the authorship of the Apocalypse is strong, it cannot be compared with that which exists for the Gospel, and is not equal to that which exists for the Epistle; much less is it equal to that which results from the combined and mutually supporting testimony which exists for the Fourth Gospel and the Epistle considered in their established unity. If we are placed in this dilemma, there can be no question as to which alternative we must choose. We must accept the criticism of the third century, and not that of the nineteenth.

But does the dilemma really exist? Granted what we may, for the sake of brevity, call the distinctly Hebraic colouring of the Apocalypse and the distinctly Greek colouring of the Gospel, is it not possible that these colours might have been, and as a matter of fact were, blended in the life of one man? We have seen above (p. 1750) that the Fourth Gospel itself necessarily requires as a condition of authorship a Hebrew or Hebrews, though it requires also that this Hebraism should have been in the far past, and that Judaism should, in the author's conception of the Christ, have developed into a religion of humanity. The probable chronology of the life and writings of the Apostle John would place the Apocalypse some thirty years earlier than the Gospel, the one at the close of the Hebrew, the other at the close of the Greek, period of his life: the one when his thoughts were wholly Hebrew, though for Greek readers he endeavoured to express them in Greek; the other when his thoughts and language had been for a generation Greek, though he can never lose the Shibboleths of his earlier life.

A theory of the composition of the Apocalypse which has lately attracted a good deal of attention, chiefly perhaps because it has won the adhesion of Dr. Adolf Harnack, is based upon the view that the author has worked over an earlier Hebrew Apocalypse. Without entering here upon a discussion which does not fall within our present subject, it may be useful to refer to Harnack and Von Gebhardt's Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur, Bd. ii., Heft 3; Die Offenbarung Johannis, eine Jüdische Apokalypse in christlicher Bearbeitung von E. Vischer, mit einem Nachwort von Adolph Harnack, 1886, and to the criticism of Schoen in his Origine de l'Apocalypse, 1887, which also contains a useful account of the literature of the subject. The theological reviews have naturally discussed this question from both sides, and articles of special interest by MM. Ménégos, Boyon, and Brunton have appeared in the Revue de Théologie de Lausanne, 1888.

Without regarding Vischer's theory as established, the existence of a wide field of Hebrew Apocalyptic literature, which cannot be questioned, may more than explain, if any explanation is needed, the strong Jewish colouring of the New Testament Apocalypse. But, as a matter of fact, the diversity of style between the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse has by many critics been made unduly prominent, and the similarity of style and matter has been unduly kept in the background. Here, again, the eye has seen that which it looked for. Let it look at the Apocalypse with the view of noting the resemblance between it and the Gospel:—

(1) It will be found, on careful examination, that the composition of the works as a whole is, with all their many differences, on the same general plan. It has often been urged that the Apocalypse is arranged on a careful plan, in which the numbers ten, seven, three recur, and the Gospel is an even unarranged flow of narrative. We have seen, in the analysis of the Gospel (p. 175), that it is also constructed on an elaborate plan, which in its leading features closely resembles that of the Apocalypse. It has been often argued, indeed, that the Gospel cannot be strictly historical, just because its materials take the shape of an ideal composition.

(2) The doctrinal positions are at root the same, though from the very different nature of the two writings this is not always apparent upon the surface. This is an axiom even of the Tübingen School, for it is necessary to the position that the writer of the Gospel sought to use the authority of John, the author of the Apocalypse, and therefore placed himself in the position of the seer (cp. Baur, Christenthum der drei ersten Jahrhunderte, p. 132; Die kanonischen Evangelien, p. 380[†]). And it has been abundantly established by more than one of the writers on the Theology of St. John to whom reference has been already made. The question is one which can be dealt with only in a treatise. It will be sufficient to quote here the results of a full examination which has been made by Von Gebhardt in his Doctrine of the Apocalypse. He deduces from a lengthy investigation the following result:—"If, therefore, the relation discovered by us to exist between the doctrine of the two is not to remain an insoluble enigma, we must acknowledge that the author of the Apocalypse is also the author of the Gospel and the Epistles; and indeed, since the origin of the former with the Apostle John is not inconsistent, either with external or internal evidence, . . . that the author is the Apostle John; a result which agrees with tradition, and is confirmed by it, as also on its own side it confirms the tradition" (Eng. Tr. p. 413).

(3) The lexical and grammatical forms, in the midst of variety which has been in part exaggerated and in part admits of natural explanation, present a substantial agreement which at least suggests common authorship. Dr. Weiss (Einkleitung, 2nd ed., 1889, pp. 466-7) gives the following list of terms, apart from merely insignificant words, which are common to the Apocalypse and the Gospel:—

ἡ ἄνεμος, ἄνεμος μέγας, ἀρνίον, δαιμόνιον (not δαίμων), θηνάριον, βόβα (δ. τ. θεοῦ, δόξαν δίδου), ἐξουσία (c. inf. ἐξ. ἔχειν), ἡ ἡμέρα (ἐκείνη), θερισμός, θλίψις (θλ. ἔχειν), θρίξ (τριχες), θύρα (metaph.), κλάμας, καταβολή

The following words are found alike in the Apocalypse and the Epistle:—

The following words are common to all the Johannine writings:—

C. Relation to the Johannine Epistles.—The general questions connected with these Epistles are dealt with in separate articles [JOHN, EPISTLES OF; JOHN, FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF], in which good reason is shown for believing that all of them, and very strong reason is shown for believing that the First Epistle in particular, are to be traced to St. John.

But this seems to be the right place to inquire what relation exists between the Gospel and the Epistles, especially the First.

† "So dass die Kritik sich hier in dem eigenen Falle befindet, zwei scheinbar ganz widersprechende Behauptungen aufstellen zu müssen, dass der Evangelist unmöglich der Apokalyptiker seyn kann, und dass der Evangelist selbst nichts anders seyn will als der Apokalyptiker . . . zwischen dem Evangelium und der Apokalypse auch wieder eine gewisse Analogie und Verwandtschaft stattfindet . . ."

It can hardly be maintained seriously, though efforts have been made to do so in the interests of the negative criticism of the Gospel, that this writing does not bear unmistakable marks of unity of authorship with the Fourth Gospel. Most of the Commentaries and Introductions contain lists of words and phrases which, if they are treated not as lists but compared with the parallel passages and context, leave no room for doubt. One of the best is that in De Wette's Einführung (§ 177 a), which is itself based upon the earlier lists of Eichhorn and Schultze.

Whatever, then, is the relation of time or interdependence of these writings; whether the Epistle is to be regarded as a pastoral letter, or as being prior to, or as a postscript to the Gospel—and this question, perhaps, does not admit of decision, because the matter of the Gospel must have been largely in oral circulation before it was reduced to its present written form—the two writings come from the same hand. For our present purpose the importance of this lies in the fact that the external evidence for the First Epistle, especially the decisive evidence of Papias and Polycarp (cp. p. 1743), becomes evidence for the Fourth Gospel also.

The Second and Third Epistles (cp. p. 1766) have not been universally received into the Canon, but their character will account for this, and there is no sufficient reason to doubt that they are also writings of the Apostle. They do not, however, contribute important additional evidence, as the First does, in the questions which concern the Gospel, and they need not therefore be further dealt with here.

D. Relation to the Synoptic Gospels.—The problems connected with the origin and sources of the Gospels are treated as a whole in an earlier article [GOSPELS]; but it belongs to this place to deal with some details which specially concern the Fourth Gospel. The reader is at once conscious as he passes from the common record which is supplied by the earlier Gospels to that which bears the name of St. John, that he enters upon a region which in part at least is new. The scene, the time, the thoughts, the expressions, the persons are to a considerable extent different. The divergence, when he comes to examine it carefully, is not indeed quite so great as appears at first sight, nor is the harmony of the three quite so complete: but when it is remembered, for instance, that in the Fourth Gospel there is no mention of scribes or publicans, of lepers or demoniacs, and that there is no mention in the Synoptics of Nathanael or Nicodemus or Lazarus, and only a bare mention of Andrew, Philip, Thomas, and Judas (not Iscariot); or how the earlier narratives all circle round the Sea of Galilee, while the later has its centre in Jerusalem; or how frequently the discourses in the Synoptics take the form of parables, while St. John gives no clear instance of this form of teaching, we are justified in thinking of the three earlier Gospels as presenting together one picture of the life of Jesus Christ, and of the Fourth Gospel as presenting a second—a distinct if not a different—picture, which is to be compared with it.

If the Gospel belongs in time to the close of the first century and in place to Ephesus (cp. supra, p. 1756), and if its purpose and scheme is that which has been traced above (ibid.), this general difference of thought, language, and tone is at once natural and necessary. (Cp. Bampton Lectures, 1890, Lecture viii.) This general difference is moreover, so far from being an argument against the authenticity, strong evidence in its favour. A forger would not have dared to publish a work of such striking independence. The limits of the present article necessarily exclude any full discussion of the general differences or of particular discrepancies, real or imaginary. Both are examined in detail in the best modern Commentaries and Introductions. The following points about which special difficulty has not unfrequently been felt, demand however brief notice:—

(1.) The duration of our Lord's ministry.—The alleged discrepancy is based upon the assumption, for which there is no foundation in fact, that the Synoptists represent the ministry of our Lord as extending over one year only, while St. John names at least three Passovers (chs. ii. 13; vi. 4; xi. 55). A careful study of the chronological limits furnished by the Synoptists will show that the only necessary terminus a quo is A.D. 28, "the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar" (Luke iii. 1), and the only necessary terminus ad quem is the recall of Pontius Pilate in A.D. 37. Any chronology of the Life of Jesus which does not extend the ministerial activity beyond the decennium A.D. 28–37 is therefore permitted by the Synoptists, but it is significant that they give no assistance in forming one. The three Passovers of the Fourth Gospel imply that the ministry extended over more than two years, but without any hint as to how much more. Biographical details were not within the scope of the Evangelists, nor consistent with the method by which the Gospels were committed to writing.

It is not easy, however, to resist the impression that the events and teaching recorded by the Evangelists imply a period not less than, perhaps much more than, the minimum indicated in the Fourth Gospel; and attention has been too seldom directed to the statement of Irenæus that our Lord's work as a Teacher extended over his fortieth year—a statement which he traces through the witness of all the elders who were connected with John, the disciple of the Lord, in Asia to John himself (Adv. Hæc. ii. ch. xiii. 3, ed. Harvey, i. 330–332). This would make the period of the ministry extend over ten years (Luke iii. 23).

The not uncommon patristic opinion, based upon an unwarranted interpretation of Isaiah lvi. 2, was that the ministry extended for only one year (Euseb. H. E. iii. 24; Clem. Alex. Stron. i.; Origen, Princ. 4, 5). But cp. article JESUS CHRIST, supra, p. 1675; Farrar, Life of Christ, vol. ii. Excursus viii.; and Browne, Ordo Sacrorum, 1844, pp. 53–94.

(2.) The scene of our Lord's ministerial work.—The work and teaching of our Lord as recorded by the Synoptists has its centre in Galilee, while St. John places it in Jerusalem. This can create a difficulty only in the minds of those who do not realize the fact that Jerusalem was the centre of the life of John himself for a considerable period (cp. supra, p. 1732 sq.), and do not realize the fragmentary nature of all the evangelic records. As the difficulty is commonly stated, two series of facts are moreover forgotten:

(a) The Synoptic Gospels record and imply a ministry in Judæa before the final Passover: cp. Luke iv. 44, eis τὰς συναγωγὰς τῆς Ἰουδαίας; Luke x. 38-41 (Martha and Mary); Matt. xxiii. 37, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem . . . how often would I have gathered thy children together" (cp. Luke xiii. 31-34); Matt. xxi. 2 and xxvi. 18, both as involving previous minute acquaintance with individuals and localities.

(b) The Fourth Gospel records and implies a ministry in Galilee: cp. chs. i. 43; iv. 3 (noting Ἰδαίω, which is omitted by good authorities, but is with strong probability to be regarded as part of the text); iv. 43-54; v. 1 ("Jesus went up to Jerusalem"); vi. (esp. v. 4, indicating a passover which Jesus spent in Galilee); vii. 1-13 (esp. v. 1, "Jesus walked in Galilee; for He would not walk in Jewry, because the Jews sought to kill Him"); x. 22 (implying a return to Jerusalem); x. 40 ("beyond Jordan into the place where John at first baptized," i.e. probably to Tellanikhe, to the N. of the Sea of Galilee on the E. of Jordan); xi. 7, 8; xxi.

A study of the Gospels as a combined narrative (cp. e.g. the arrangement in Tischendorf's Synopsis Evangelica, or Wieseler's Chronologische Synopse) shows, with even our present imperfect knowledge of these fragments, that they are parts of a great whole. We lack the materials for a complete restoration; there is sufficient to show that the materials which we have are the complements of each other.

(3.) The Discourses of our Lord.—"Si Jésus parlait comme le veut Matthieu, il n'a pu parler comme le veut Jean." In these words M. Renan (Vie de Jésus, 1863, p. xxix.) gives a concise statement of a difficulty which has been often expressed and has been felt to be a very real one. The student who reads the Sermon on the Mount side by side with the Capernaum sermon of the sixth chapter of St. John, or compares the parables of the Synoptists with the farewell of the sixteenth and seventeenth chapters of the Fourth Gospel, naturally feels that there is a wide difference, and that some explanation of this difference is needed. The difficulty is apparently increased also by the further fact that the style of our Lord's discourses in the Fourth Gospel, while it differs from the style of the teaching in the Synoptists, agrees largely with that of the narratives by St. John, that of other speakers in the Gospel, and that of the Johannine Epistles. But the student who will carefully examine the facts will find that the difficulty has been too strongly stated, and that in even the small portion of our Lord's teaching which we possess there is much which is common to the Synoptists and the Fourth Gospel.

Full lists of parallel passages are given by Godet, Commentaire sur l'Évangile de S. Jean, ed. 3, vol. i. pp. 197 sqq., and Luthardt, Das johanneische Evangelium, 1875, pt. i. pp. 243 sqq. Some of these passages taken singly may not prove much; but as a whole they go far to remove the difficulty. Three of the passages in the Synoptists present the striking characteristics of the Johannine discourses:—

"At that time Jesus answered and said, I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in Thy sight. All things are delivered unto Me of My Father; and no man knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal Him" (Matt. xi. 25-27; cp. John iii. 35 and vi. 46).

"Every plant, which My heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up" (Matt. xv. 13; cp. John xv. 2).

"All things are delivered to Me of My Father; and no man knoweth who the Son is, but the Father; and who the Father is but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal Him" (Luke x. 22).

It will be found also that a very considerable proportion of the words used in the discourses of our Lord, as recorded by St. John, is not found in the other portions of the Johannine writings. The Commentary by Dr. Reynolds, to which reference has been more than once made in this article, contains a fresh investigation of this subject made for the author by the Rev. W. H. Beckett, from which it appears, among other important results, that "more than a hundred and forty-five words are put by the Evangelist into the lips of our Lord, but never used by himself; of which thirty-eight are found in the Synoptic records of our Lord's words, and of which fourteen are peculiar to the Johannine writings," and that there are "nearly five hundred words (a not inconsiderable vocabulary) which are used by the writer when pursuing his narrative or recording the words of others, not our Lord's, or developing in hortatory form his own personal conceptions of doctrine or duty" (op. cit. p. cxliii).

But when all overstatements of the case are cancelled, and the residuum of facts according to our present knowledge is alone left, there remains a large element in the Johannine presentation of the discourses which is widely different from that of the Synoptists. The following facts seem sufficient to explain it:—

(i.) The presentation in each case is a linguistic translation. That our Lord spoke in Aramaic is in a very high degree probable; that there was an original Aramaic written record is far from improbable (cp. Expositor, 1891, January, et sqq.).

(ii.) The Johannine presentation is a linguistic translation into the Ephesian Greek of the last decade of the first century. It is therefore necessarily different (cp. Bampton Lectures, 1890, Lecture viii.).

(iii.) The Johannine presentation is of discourses spoken in Jerusalem or in the presence of Jews of the educated classes. (The discourse of ch. vi. is not an exception. Cp. v. 47.)

(iv.) The whole of the discourses of our Lord, as now preserved, can form but a small portion of His teaching. They are selections from the treasures of the apostolic Church. They bear necessarily the impress of the individual Church and the individual writer, the divinely ordered channels through which they have been handed down.

(v.) St. John stood in a closeness of relation to our Lord—spiritual as well as natural—after the completion of the ministry (ch. xix. 27), as well as before its commencement, which no other Evangelist shared.

(vi.) St. John himself records the promise of the Paraclete "to teach all things, and to bring all things to remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you," and "to guide into all the truth" (cp. Excursus D in Ellicott's New Testament Commentary, i. 557).

(4.) The Day of our Lord's Death.—The discussion of this question belongs to the article PASSOVER (q. v.). In so far as it relates to a comparison of the Fourth Gospel with the Synoptists, it is sufficient to remark here:

(a) That in the opinion of many scholars of candour and eminence who have devoted special attention to the question, there is no discrepancy. To take one example: C. E. Caspari, after a careful examination of the statements in each Gospel, and of the Jewish and Christian tradition, asserts, "The earliest Christian tradition consequently taught that Jesus held the supper on the 14th Nisan on the night of the Thursday; that on the same Jewish night-day (but, according to Western reckoning, on the Friday), at the time of slaying the Paschal lamb, He was crucified; and that on the following day (Saturday) was the great Paschal festival. The Christian tradition, rightly understood, teaches thus—as all the Gospels, and as Jewish tradition—that Jesus was crucified on the 14th Nisan, a Friday. If afterwards, in the angry Paschal controversy which ensued, another opinion prevailed, this does not concern us" (Chronological and Geographical Introduction to the Life of Christ, pp. 216, 217). It is impossible to urge, in the presence of the solutions which have been arrived at, that the question is insoluble.

(b) That our present knowledge of the Passover ritual, and of the exceptions to it at the time of this Passover, is too uncertain to warrant any such deduction as that the Fourth Gospel is in this respect opposed to the Synoptists.

(c) That if it were necessary to hold the position that the statements are opposed, it would be on every ground necessary also to accept the Johannine statement. It is moreover supported by St. Paul (1 Cor. v. 7 and xi. 23).

(d) That if it were necessary to hold the position that the statements were opposed, the fact of a conflicting statement would of itself furnish a strong argument in favour of apostolic authorship. Who but an eye-witness would venture upon such a point to correct the current tradition?

[IV. THE TEXT.]

Generally speaking, it may be said that the same authorities are available for the text of the Fourth Gospel as for that of the other Gospels. At their head stand the great codices: Sinaiticus (8, saec. iv.); Alexandrinus (A, saec. v.), wanting vi. 50-viii. 52; Vaticanus (B, saec. iv.); Ephraemi (C, saec. v.), important fragments; Besae (D, saec. vi.), the whole except i. 16-iii. 26, a later hand supplying (perhaps from the original text) xviii. 13-xx. 13. The Gospel is also contained in another leading MS., Cod. Regius Parisiensis (L, saec. viii.). The Fourth Gospel is one of two preserved in Tischendorf's MS. now in the Bodleian (A, saec. ix.); but no portion of it is contained in the recently discovered Codd. purpurei, Rossanensis (Z, saec. vi.) and Beratinus (Φ, saec. vi.), or in the valuable fragments designated RZE. The Gospel is complete in EKMSUV and Ω (two Athos MSS. not yet collated, both ascribed to saec. viii.-ix.), and nearly complete in FGHΔΠ.

The following fragmentary MSS. contain portions of St. John's Gospel only: I^a and I^b (both saec. v.), O (saec. ix.), T^a (a Graeco-Thebaic MS. attributed very doubtfully to saec. v.), W^a (saec. ix.). Fragments of this as well as of other Gospels are found in F^a (saec. vii. in.), N (saec. vi. ex.), P (saec. vi.), Q (saec. v.), T^a (attributed to saec. vi.), and T^b (attributed to saec. vii.); also in T^{ms}, which is similar to, though not, as was at one time thought, a part of the same MS. as T^a, X (saec. ix. ex.), Y (saec. viii.). Of these the most important are those which come under the designations I P Q T X Y, especially T, and in a lower measure X, which is extant on a larger scale and in this Gospel not unfrequently sides with the better authorities.

Minuscule, or as they are commonly called, cursive MSS., contain as a rule the full Tetraevangelium, and maintain the same character throughout. The writer of this is not aware of a case in which the text of St. John's Gospel stands out so distinctly as that of St. Mark in the cursive which is variously numbered 2^{ms} by Muralt, its collator, 81 by Westcott and Hort, 473 by Scrivener, and 565 by Gregory (compare the equally distinctive text of Δ in the same Gospel). It is a peculiarity of the group 13-69-124-346-788-826 (possibly also of the allied MS. 543,^b though this is not expressly stated: see Gregory, Prolegomena on the MSS. in question) to place the section "of the Adulteress" immediately after Luke xxi. 38. Most, if not all, of these MSS. appear to have been written in Calabria. Other MSS., such as 1^{ms} 135, 237, 259, 301, 565, but at a more recent date and with an evident consciousness of its questionable character, place the section at the end of the Gospel.

For the Ante-Hieronymian or Old-Latin Version the leading MSS. (abdef) are extant, though with lacunae. In the second line would come the MSS. designated m (extracts contained in the so-called Speculum Augustini, the text of

C nearest representative of the text current in Africa the type which is common and the fragment p are distributed there seems to be more mixture of types than in the MSS. of Jerome's Venetian numbers. Special mention made only of the beautiful MS. (=S in Bishop Westcott's edition). This MS. contains only St. John was found in the coffin of St. John the Baptist, who died A.D. 687 (facts in Pal. Soc. wood, Pal. Sac. Pict. pl. 11).

Of the Egyptian Version (Bahric) is complete; it has as yet been published in fragments, but materials sufficient to make up a complete text are already known to exist in European libraries (especially at Paris), and their publication is but a question of time. The third Egyptian Version, called Bashmuric, is only a dialectical variation of the Thebaic: as yet St. John iv. 28-53 is all that has been published of the Gospels.

Of the Syriac Versions, the critic has access to the Peshitto and Harclean, the latter revised from the older Philoxenian (508 A.D.) by Thomas of Harkel in 616 A.D. For nearly the whole of the N. T. the Philoxenian has been lost, but Bernstein thought that he had come across the traces of it in a single MS. at Rome, collations of which for a few chapters of St. John are given in his work De Charclensi N. T. transl. Syriac. Comment. (Breslau, 1837). The Curetonian Syriac, which is considered by many scholars to represent the oldest form of the Syriac Version, is extant for St. John i. 1-43; iii. 5-viii. 19 (omitting vii. 53-viii. 11); xiv. 10-12, 16-19, 21-29. These portions have been turned back into Greek in a trustworthy manner by Baethgen, Evangelienfragmente (Leipzig, 1885), pp. 39-53.

The Aethiopic and Armenian Versions of St. John's Gospel are complete, but the printed texts need revision from a wider collation of MSS. The Gothic is extant for St. John i. 29; iii. 3-32; v. 21-23; 35-38; 45-xii. 49; xiii. 11-xix. 13.

The patristic evidence supplies not only numerous quotations, but considerable commentaries. Earliest of these is the Commentary of the Gnostic Heracleon, the fragments of which have been carefully re-edited by Mr. A. E. Brooke in the Cambridge Texts and Studies (1891). These fragments are preserved in Origen's great work on St. John, of which large remains have come down to us. For an account of this Commentary, which was written in part at least at Alexandria, and before the year 228 A.D., see especially Dict. of Chr. Biog. iv. 113 sq. The Commentary of Cyril of Alexandria († 444 A.D.) is almost complete, and has been edited as critically as the scanty MS. materials admit by the late P. E. Pusey (Oxford, 1872). From the Antiochene school we have a series of Homilies by St. Chrysostom, written before 398, and also considerable fragments of a Commentary by Theodore of Mopsuestia († 428 A.D.). The Latin Church contributes the Homilies of St. Augustine (c. 416 A.D.). Other works are too late to be of much importance for textual criticism, unless it is perhaps the Catenae edited by Corderius (Antwerp, 1628) and Cramer (Oxford, 1844).

The most conspicuous feature in the earlier textual history of St. John's Gospel is the group of readings belonging to what is commonly known as the "Western Text." The authorities for these readings are frequently headed by \aleph , and include MSS. of the Old-Latin and the Curetonian Syriac, where it is extant. The Western element in \aleph is more marked in this Gospel than elsewhere. Characteristic readings of the broader Western type would be e.g. St. John i. 4 ἐστίν, ii. 3 ὄλον οὐκ εἶχον, ὅτι συνετελέσθη ὁ ὄλος τοῦ γάμου, iii. 25 Ἰουδαίων, 31 ἐλθὼν πᾶρων ἐστίν, iv. 9 οὐ γὰρ συγχωρῶνται Ἰουδαῖοι Σαμαρείταις. Sometimes the Western group of authorities is broken up, and a reading is found in one section of it but not in another. Thus the famous pericope adulterae (St. John vii. 53-viii. 11) is found in \aleph , and it was originally contained in δ , but it is wanting in a Syr.-Cur. It seems not unlikely that this section was transferred to the Canonical Gospel from the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 16).

In like manner the interpolation in v. 3 (ἐνδεχομένων τὴν τοῦ ὕδατος κίνησιν) was introduced before the larger interpolation in the next verse (ἔργεος γὰρ . . . νοσήματι). The addition at the end of iii. 6 was also introduced at two stages, quoniam (quoniam) deus spiritus est (1) and ex (de) deo natus est (2). Some of these readings which were originally Western found their way into the later ecclesiastical text, and thence into the copies which possessed the field after the invention of printing: so the two larger interpolations just mentioned, and the reading (δ) μονογενὴς υἱὸς in i. 18, which there can be little doubt should, in spite of its great antiquity, yield to μονογενὴς θεός. (On this reading see especially Dr. Hort, Two Dissertations, Camb. and Lond. 1876, with which may be compared on the other side Dr. Ezra Abbot, Critical Essays, Boston, 1888, pp. 241-285. On the text of St. John generally, besides the critical editions, Dr. Westcott's Commentary deserves to be specially consulted, also the critical notes by Weiss in the sixth or later editions of Meyer's Commentary. Meyer himself and Godet are not trustworthy guides in textual criticism. In respect to the materials of criticism, the best authorities are Scrivener, Introduction, ed. 3, Cambridge, 1883, and Gregory, Prolegomena to Tischendorf, part i. 1884, part ii. 1890. Dr. Gregory's notation, which unfortunately differs somewhat from Scrivener's, for the more recently added cursives, has been followed in this article.)

V. LITERATURE.

The full references which have been given in the course of this article make it unnecessary to refer at any length to the literature of the subject. To do so would indeed be in any case to travel over beaten paths, for the Literature of the Fourth Gospel has been exhaustively treated by experts. Lampe (Commentarius analytico-cresceticus, 3 vols. 4^o, Basiliæ, 1725-27) gives a full account of the works down to his own time. Lücke (cp. p. 1748) adds a short but valuable literary sketch of the discussions on the authenticity (ed. 3, 1840, pp. 89 sqq.). Dr. C. R. Gregory, the translator of Luthardt's St. John the Author of the Fourth Gospel, 1875, has enriched that work by an enlarged and almost complete conspectus of Literature from 1792-1875. Dr. Ezra Abbot (†1884) contributed not only to the early literature of the subject in his Authorship of the Fourth Gospel (1880), but also contributed from his minute knowledge of the subject to Dr. Gregory's list which has just been mentioned, and to the American edition of this Dictionary.

The most recent literature is very fully given in the Introductions, and specially in Bleek-Mangold, Einleitung in das Neue Test., ed. 2, 1886; Weiss (Bernhard), Lehrbuch der Einleitung in das Neue Test., ed. 2, 1889 (Eng. tr. of ed. 1, 1887-8); Holtzmann (H. J.), Lehrbuch d. Hist. krit. Einleitung in das Neue Test., ed. 2, 1886; cp. also Hand-Commentar zum Neuen Test. vol. iv. 1890, p. 20.

On the present position of the "Johannine Question," reference should be made to a paper by Dr. Schürer (Ueber den gegenwärtigen Stand d. Johannischen Frage, Giessen, 1889), and especially to a series of articles by Dr. Sanday in the Expositor, 1891, Nov., Dec.; 1892, Jan., March, April, and May.

Of special Commentaries, Luthardt's (ed. 2, 1875-76), Godet's (ed. 3, 1881-85), and Westcott's reprinted from The Speaker's Commentary in 1881, have obtained an acknowledged and well-known position. Of the smaller Commentaries, that by Holtzmann referred to above and that by Dr. Plummer in the Cambridge Greek Testament for Schools may be specially named, though written from different points of view. A recent work which forms part of The Pulpit Commentary—The Gospel of St. John, Introduction and Exposition, by Dr. Reynolds, 1888—is the result of much independent thought and work, as well as of full knowledge of the work of others. It is a very valuable contribution to the study of St. John's Gospel and the many connected questions, and it is much to be desired that the introduction and critical notes should be re-edited and published in a more convenient form.

To these and many other works the writer of the present article has been under constant obligation. One special obligation he must not leave unnoticed. When his task was completed, the space occupied, which seemed but too small for the extent of the subject, was larger than could be afforded for a single article. Dr. Sanday generously undertook the tedious task of compression. The reader will not need to be assured that compression is far from being the only gain which is derived from Dr. Sanday's care and knowledge. He has also written the section on the text in substitution for a longer one. [H. W. W.]

JOHN, ST. THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF. I. Title.—In the Alexandrine and Vatican MSS. the heading of the Epistle is only 'Ἰωάννου (or 'Ἰωάνου) ἀ, that is, "John's First;" in the Sinaitic MS. the word ἐπιστολή is added, "John's First Epistle." In later MSS. the epithet καθολικῆ is prefixed to ἐπιστολή, and the designation of τοῦ ἁγίου ἀποστόλου or τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ καὶ ἀποστόλου precedes or follows 'Ἰωάννου, making the full title to be "The Catholic Epistle of John the holy Apostle," or "of John the Evangelist and Apostle." For the force of the word "Catholic" in this connexion, see JAMES, EPISTLE OF, p. 1520. Origen is the first writer who applies the term Catholic to St. John's First Epistle. Whether it is an Epistle in the proper sense of the word, has been questioned. It does not begin or end in the epistolary style. It may best be regarded as a Pastoral Letter. In one late Latin MS. the title is Epistola ad Sparthos, which has been regarded as a misreading either for Epistola ad Sparos, meaning the Diaspora or Dispersion, or Epistola ad Parthos. St. Augustine (Quæstionum Evangeliorum, ii. 39) quotes 1 John iii. 2 as "dictum a Joanne in Epistola ad Parthos;" and his treatises on the Epistle are headed "in Epistola Joannis ad Parthos" (tom. iii. p. 1976, ed. Migne). It is probable that this title came from a misunderstanding of the title of some Greek MS. 'Ἐπιστολή 'Ἰωάννου τοῦ παρθένου, the name παρθένος being sometimes given to St. John. And yet this explanation cannot be the right one, if it be true, as Bede reports (Prolog. super vii. Canon. Epist.), that Athanasius regarded it as addressed to the Parthians. But of this we have no evidence beyond Bede's statement.

II. Author and authenticity.—The external evidence is of the most satisfactory nature. Eusebius places it in the list of ὁμολογούμενα or "acknowledged" books (Hist. Eccl. iii. 25), and we have ample proof that it was received as the production of the Apostle John in the writings of Polycarp (Ep. ad Philipp. c. vii.); Papias, as quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iii. 39); Irenæus (adv. Hæres. iii. 18); Origen (apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 25); Clement of Alexandria (Strom. lib. ii.); Tertullian (adv. Prax. c. xv.); Cyprian (Ep. xviii.); and there is no voice in antiquity raised to the contrary. The Muratonian Canon speaks only of two Epistles of John, but this probably means our Epistle, and the Second and Third Epistles reckoned together as one. The Peshitto Version contains the First Epistle.

On the ground of internal evidence the authenticity of the Epistle has been questioned by Lange (Die Schriften des Johann. übersetzt und erklärt, vol. iii.); Bretschneider (Probabilia de Erang. et Epist. Joan. Ap. indole et origine); Zeller (Theologische Jahrbücher for 1845). The objections made by these critics are too slight to be worth mentioning. On the other hand, the internal evidence for its being the work of St. John from its similarity in style, language, and doctrine to the Gospel, is overwhelming. Macknight (Preface to First Epistle of John) has drawn out a list of nineteen passages in the Epistle which are so similar to an equal number of passages in the Gospel that we cannot but conclude that the two writings emanated from the same mind, or that one author was a strangely successful copyist both of the words and of the sentiments of the other. Westcott, in like manner, has made a list of twenty characteristic words found both in the Gospel and in the Epistle, and nineteen sentences in which verbal coincidences occur. The hypothesis of conscious imitation by a copyist is, in Dr. Westcott's judgment, excluded by the subtlety of the coincidences, joined with differences discoverable in the parallel passages of the Gospel and the Epistle, the similarity of which consists not only in their diction but in their thoughts (Introduction to the First Epistle of St. John). Sinclair presents us with twenty-three parallel passages (Ellicott's Commentary, iii. 468). Ewald says that "no one can fail to perceive that the self-same author and Apostle must have composed both writings" (Die Johann. Schriften, i. 431). The allusion of the writer to himself is such as would suit St. John the Apostle, and very few but St. John (1 Ep. i. 1).

Thus we see that the high probability of the authorship is established both by the internal evidence and by the external evidence taken apart. Unite them, and this probability rises to a moral certainty.

III. Date and place.—There is considerable diversity of opinion as to the time at which the Epistle was written. Grotius, Hammond, Whitby, Benson, Macknight, fix a date previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, understanding (but probably not correctly) the expression "It is the last time" (ii. 18) to refer to the Jewish Church and nation. Lardner, Whiston, Lampe, Mill, Le Clerc, Basnage, Beausobre, Dupin, Davidson, Sinclair, Westcott, assign it to the close of the first century. This is the more probable date. There are several indications of the Epistle being posterior to the Gospel. "The Epistles," says Westcott, "give later growths of common and characteristic ideas" (Introduction). Like the Gospel, it was probably written from Ephesus. Grotius fixes Patmos as the place at which it was written; Macknight, Judæa. But a late date would involve the conclusion that it was Ephesus. And this conclusion is strengthened by iv. 3, which condemns the heresy of Cerinthus, whose headquarters were Asia Minor.

IV. The persons addressed.—However the error as to the Parthians, above related, arose, we may take it as certain that the Epistle was not addressed to them. There is however a somewhat widely spread Latin tradition to that effect, resting on the authority of St. Augustine, Vigilius of Thapsus, Cassiodorus, and Bede; and it is defended by Estius. The Greek Church knew no such report. Lardner is clearly right when he says that the Epistle was primarily meant for the Churches of Asia under St. John's inspection, to whom he had already orally delivered his doctrine (i. 3, ii. 7).

V. Contents and character.—It is a mistake to regard the Epistle as primarily controversial. Its main object was not to oppose the errors of the Docetæ (Schmidt, Bertholdt, Niemeyer), nor of the Gnostics (Kleuker), nor of the Nicolaitans (Macknight), nor of the Cerinthians (Michaelis), nor of all of them together (Townsend), nor of the Sabians (Barkey, Storr, Keil), nor of Judaizers (Loeffler, Semler), nor of apostates to Judrism (Lange, Eichhorn, Hämlein): the leading purpose of the Apostle appears to be rather constructive than polemical. St. John is remarkable both in his history and in his writings for his abhorrence of false doctrine, but he does not attack error as a controversialist. He states the deep truth and lays down the deep moral teaching of Christianity, and in this way rather than directly condemns heresy. In the introduction (i. 1-4) the Apostle states the purpose of his Epistle. It is to declare the Word of life to those whom he is addressing, in order that he and they might be united in true communion with each other, and with God the Father, and His Son Jesus Christ. He at once begins to explain the nature and conditions of communion with God, and, being led on from this point into other topics, he twice brings himself back to the same subject. The first part of the Epistle may be considered to end at ii. 28. The Apostle begins afresh with the doctrine of sonship or communion at ii. 29, and returns to the same theme at iv. 7. His lesson throughout is, that the means of union with God are, on the part of Christ, His atoning Blood (i. 7, ii. 2, iii. 5, iv. 10, 14, v. 6) and advocacy (ii. 1)—on the part of man, holiness (i. 6), obedience (ii. 3), purity (iii. 3), faith (iii. 23, iv. 3, v. 5), and above all love (ii. 7, iii. 14, iv. 7, v. 1). St. John is designated the Apostle of Love, and rightly; but it should be ever remembered that his doctrine of "Love" does not exclude or ignore, but embraces both faith and obedience as constituent parts of love. Indeed, St. Paul's "Faith that worketh by Love," and St. James's "Works that are the fruit of Faith," and St. John's "Love which springs from Faith and produces Obedience," are all one and the same state of mind described according to the first, third, or second stage, into which we are able to analyse the complex whole.

There are two doubtful passages in this Epistle: ii. 23, "but he that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also;" and v. 7, "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one." The question of their authenticity is argued at length by Mill (note at the end of 1 John v.) and Horne (Introduction to H. S. iv. p. 448, Lond. 1834). The first of these passages is genuine. It is found in all the better MSS. and was omitted by a not uncommon error, the scribe's eye passing on from the first clause to the second, and confounding them together, owing to their ending with the same three words, τὸν πατέρα ἔχει. The second is spurious. It is contained in four only of the 180 MSS. of the Epistle: the Code: Guelpherbytanus of the seventeenth century, the Codex Ravianus of the sixteenth century, both of which are merely copies from the printed text, and therefore no authorities at all; the Codex Britannicus or Monfortianus of the fifteenth or sixteenth century; and the Codex Ottobonianus of the fifteenth century. It is not found, except by modern insertion, in the Syriac Versions, in the Coptic, the Sahidic, the Ethiopic, the Armenian, the Arabic, the Slavonic, nor in any ancient Version except the Latin; and the best editions of even the Latin Versions omit it. It was not quoted by one Greek Father or writer previous to the fourteenth century. It was not inserted in Erasmus's editions of the Greek Testament, published in 1516 and 1519, nor in that of Aldus, 1518; nor in that of Gerbelius, 1521; nor of Cephalæus, 1524; nor of Colinaeus, 1534; nor in Luther's version of 1546. It originated as a gloss or mystical interpretation of the meaning of the "three that bear witness,"—"the Spirit" being supposed to represent the Father, "the water" the Holy Ghost, and "the blood" the Son. Cyprian (De Unitate Ecclesiae, v.), Facundus (Pro def. tr. Cap. i. 3), Augustine (cont. Mar. ii. 22; De Civ. Dei, v. 11) seem to have known and accepted this interpretation. The first person who represents the gloss as making part of the text is Vigilius of Thapsus, who lived at the end of the fifth century. In the sixth century it is quoted by Fulgentius as belonging to the text, and its position there is defended by a prologue falsely attributed to St. Jerome. Hence in the seventh century it was introduced by a scribe into a copy of the Old Latin text that he was making, and in the ninth century it found its way in like manner into the text of two Codices of the Vulgate. Next it was translated into Greek, first apparently in 1215, as making part of the Greek version of the Acts of the Council of the Lateran, and at length for the first time it found its place, as stated above, in the fifteenth century, in a Greek Codex—the Ottonianus, which however is as much Latin as Greek, having both the Latin and the Greek text in parallel columns. It never made good its entrance into more than one other Greek Codex, the Montfortianus, which is not above suspicion. Erasmus, attacked by Stunica for omitting the passage in the first two editions of his Greek Testament, promised to introduce it, if one Greek MS. containing it could be shown him. A "Codex Britannicus," which has been identified with the Codex Montfortianus, was brought to his notice; and in accordance with his promise he inserted the words in his edition of 1522, but without any belief in their being genuine. Against such an amount of external testimony no internal evidence, however weighty, could be of avail.

For the exposition of the passage as containing the words in question, see (as quoted by Horne) Bp. Horsley's Sermons (i. p. 193). For the same passage interpreted without the disputed words, see Sir Isaac Newton's Hist. of Two Texts (Works, v. p. 528, Lond. 1779). See also Emlin's Enquiry, &c., Lond. 1717. JOHN, ST. THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF. I. Title.—One late cursive MS. (62) entitles the Second Epistle Ἰωάννου β' πρὸς Πάρθους, and the Adumbrations of Clement of Alexandria describe it as "scripta ad virgines," in continuation of the mistake already pointed out. Their proper title is simply Ἰωάννου β', Ἰωάννου γ'.

II. Author and authenticity.—The two Epistles are placed by Eusebius in the class of ἀρριθεύμενα, and he appears himself to be doubtful whether they were written by the Evangelist, or by some other John (Hist. Eccl. iii. 25). The evidence of antiquity in their favour is not very strong, but yet it is considerable. Irenæus quotes from the Second Epistle and attributes it to "John, the Lord's disciple" (Adv. Hær. i. 16). Clement of Alexandria speaks of the First Epistle as the larger (Strom. lib. ii.); and if the Adumbrations be his, he bears direct testimony to the Second Epistle (Adumbr. p. 1011, ed. Potter). Origen appears to have had the same doubts as Eusebius (apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 25). Dionysius (apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 25) attributes them to St. John, but not without hesitation. Aurelius quoted them in the Council of Carthage, A.D. 256, as St. John's writing (Cyprian, Op. ii. p. 120, ed. Oberthür). Alexander of Alexandria (apud Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 6), A.D. 321, attributes the Second Epistle to "the Blessed John." Ephrem Syrus recognises them as canonical in the fourth century, though they are not in the Peshito Syriac Version. In the fifth century they are almost universally received. A homily, wrongly attributed to St. Chrysostom, declares them uncanonical.

If the external testimony is not perfectly decisive, the internal evidence is peculiarly strong. Mill has pointed out that of the 13 verses which compose the Second Epistle, 8 are to be found in the First Epistle. Either then the Second Epistle proceeded from the same author as the First, or from a conscious fabricator who desired to pass off something of his own as the production of the Apostle. But if the latter alternative had been true, the fabricator in question would assuredly have assumed the title of John the Apostle, instead of merely designating himself as John the elder, and he would have introduced some doctrine which it would have been his object to make popular. The title and contents of the Epistle are strong arguments against a fabricator, whereas they would account for its non-universal reception in early times. And if not the work of a fabricator, it must from style, diction, and tone of thought, be the work of the author of the First Epistle, and, we may add, of the Gospel.

The reason why St. John designates himself as πρεσβύτερος rather than ἀπόστολος (2 Ep. 1; 3 Ep. 1), is no doubt the same as that which made St. Peter designate himself by the same title (1 Pet. v. 1), and which caused St. James and St. Jude to give themselves no other title than "the servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (James i. 1); "the servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James" (Jude 1). St. Paul had a special object in declaring himself an Apostle. Those who belonged to the original Twelve had no such necessity imposed upon them. With them it was a matter of indifference whether they employed the name of Apostle like St. Peter (1 Pet. i. 1; 2 Pet. i. 1), or adopted an appellation which they shared with others, like St. John and St. James and St. Jude. Westcott supposes the title to describe an official position in the Church of Asia Minor.

III. Date and place.—The two shorter Epistles were probably written about the same time and from the same place as the First Epistle, that is, from Ephesus, near the end of the first century.

IV. Persons addressed.—The Second Epistle is addressed ἐκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ. This expression cannot mean the Church (Jerome; Salmon), nor a particular Church (Cassiodorus), nor the elect Church which comes together on Sundays (Michaelis), nor the Church of Philadelphia (Whiston), nor the Church of Jerusalem (Whitby). An individual woman who had children and a sister and nieces, is clearly indicated. Whether her name is given, and if so, what it is, has been doubted. According to one interpretation, she is "the Lady Electa;" to another, "the elect Kyria;" to a third, "the elect Lady." The first interpretation is that of Clement of Alexandria (see Dict. of Christ. Biog. i. 564), Wetstein, Grotius, Middleton. The second is that of Benson, Carpzov, Schleusner, Heumann, Bengel, Rosenmüller, De Wette, Lücke, Neander, Davidson. The third is the rendering of the A. and R. VV., Mill, Wall, Wolf, Le Clerc, Lardner, Beza, Eichhorn, Newcome, Wakefield, Macknight. For the rendering "the Lady Electa" to be right, the word κυρίᾳ must have preceded (as in modern Greek) the word ἐκλεκτῇ, not followed it; and further, the last verse of the Epistle in which her sister is also spoken of as ἐκλεκτῇ is fatal to the hypothesis. The rendering "the elect Kyria" is probably wrong, because there is no article before the adjective ἐκλεκτῇ. It remains that the rendering of the A. and R. VV. is probably right, though here too we should have expected the article. Westcott considers the problem of the address insoluble with our present knowledge.

The Third Epistle is addressed to Gaius or Caius. We have no reason for identifying him with Caius of Macedonia (Acts xix. 29), or with Caius of Derbe (Acts xx. 4), or with Caius of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 14), or with Caius bishop of Ephesus, or with Caius bishop of Thessalonica, or with Caius bishop of Pergamos. He was probably a convert of St. John (3 Ep. v. 4), and a layman of wealth and distinction (3 Ep. v. 5) in some city near Ephesus.

V. Contents and character.—The object of St. John in writing the Second Epistle was to warn the lady, to whom he wrote, against abetting the teaching known as that of Basilides and his followers, by perhaps an undue kindness displayed by her towards the preachers of the false doctrine. After the introductory salutation, the Apostle at once urges on his correspondent the great principle of Love, which with him (as we have before seen) means right affection springing from right faith and issuing in right conduct. The immediate consequence of the possession of this Love is the abhorrence of heretical misbelief, because the latter, being incompatible with right faith, is destructive of the producing cause of Love, and therefore of Love itself. This is the secret of St. John's strong denunciation of the "deceiver" whom he designates as "anti-Christ." Love is with him the essence of Christianity; but Love can spring only from right faith. Wrong belief therefore destroys Love and with it Christianity. Therefore says he, "If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed, for he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds" (2 Ep. 10, 11).

The Third Epistle was written for the purpose of commending to the kindness and hospitality of Caius some Christians who were strangers in the place where he lived. It is probable that these Christians carried this letter with them to Caius as their introduction. It would appear that the object of the travellers was to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles without money and without price (3 Ep. v. 7). St. John had already written to the ecclesiastical authorities of the place (ἔγραψα, v. 9, not "scripsissam," Vulg.); but they, at the instigation of Diotrephes, had refused to receive the missionary brethren, and therefore the Apostle now commends them to the care of a layman. It is probable that Diotrephes was a leading presbyter who held Judaizing views, and would not give assistance to men who were going about with the purpose of preaching solely to the Gentiles. Whether Demetrius (v. 12) was a tolerant presbyter of the same community, whose example St. John holds up as worthy of commendation in contradistinction to that of Diotrephes, or whether he was one of the strangers who bore the letter, we are now unable to determine. The latter supposition is the more probable.

The contents of this Epistle have light thrown upon them in a singularly interesting manner by The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, published by Bryennius at Constantinople in 1883. In substance this document is little later than St. John's Epistle, and we see in it a system already working, according to which "apostles and prophets" were in the habit of moving from place to place, staying one or two days, during which they were supported by the charity of the brethren, and then moving on. The following passages illustrate the condition of the Church at the time of St. John's Epistle with surprising vividness:—"Whoever then shall come and teach you all the foregoing, receive him; but if the teacher turn and teach you another doctrine, so as to overthrow this, you must not listen to him; but if his object is to teach righteousness and knowledge of the Lord, receive him as the Lord. . . . Let every apostle who comes to you be received as the Lord; but he shall not abide more than one day, and if he be not, one more; but if he remain three days, he is a false prophet. Let the apostle who comes out receive nothing but bread to last him until he reach his destination; but if he asks for money, he is a false prophet. . . . If he who comes is a wayfarer, help him as much as you can, but he shall not remain with you more than three or four days, if need require; and if he wishes to settle with you, if he is a workman let him labour, and so let him eat. . . . But every true prophet who wishes to remain with you is worthy of his meat: so too a true teacher, like the labourer, is also worthy of his meat" (chaps. xi. xii. xiii.). It seems evident that the "brethren and strangers withal" in whose behalf St. John writes, were "apostles or prophets," or as we should now say evangelists, and we may conjecture that Diotrefes excused his haughty rejection of them on the ground that they were unworthy or "false prophets."

Both these Epistles apply to individual cases of conduct the principles which had been laid down in their fulness in the First Epistle. The title Catholic does not properly belong to them. It became attached to them, although addressed to individuals, because they were of too little importance to be classed by themselves, and, so far as doctrine went, were regarded as appendices to the First Epistle.

VI. Bibliography.—The best English edition of the Three Epistles is Westcott's Epistles of St. John, the Greek text with notes and essays (Lond. 1883). This volume, supplemented by the Greek Testaments of Alford, Wordsworth, and Ellicott, will give the English reader all that he can require for the elucidation of the text. In T. & T. Clark's series will be found translations of Lücke's Commentar über die Briefe des Evangelisten Johannes (Edinb. 1837); Ebrard's Die Briefe Johannes (Edinb. 1860); Braune's Commentary in Lange's series, and Huther's in Mayer's. JOI'ADA (יְהוֹיָדָה = יהוידע = Jehovah hath known; B. 'Iwādā, A. 'Iwādā; Joiada), high-priest after his father Eliashib, but whether in the lifetime of Nehemiah is not clear, as it is doubtful whether the title in Neh. xiii. 28 applies to him or his father. One of his sons married a daughter of Sanballat the Horonite. He was succeeded in the high-priesthood by his son Jonathan, or Johanan (Neh. xii. 11, 22). Josephus calls this Jehoiada, Judas. [A. C. H.]

JOI'AKIM (יְהוֹיָכִים = יהויקים; BA. 'Iwakelmu; Jocain), a high-priest, son of the renowned Jeshua, who was joint leader with Zerubbabel of the first return from Babylon. His son and successor was ELIASHIB (Neh. xii. 10). In Neh. xii. 12-26 is preserved a catalogue of the heads of the various families of priests and Levites during the high-priesthood of Joiakim.

The name is a contracted form of JEHOIAKIM.

JOI'ARIB (יְהוֹיָרִיב = יהויריב; A. 'Iwapelmu; Joiarib). 1. ('Iwapelmu, B. 'Apēβ, A. 'Iwapelmu; Joiarib.) A layman who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 16).

2. (Neh. xi. 10, 'Iwapelβ, B. 'Iwapelβ, A. 'Iwapelβ, N. 'Iwapelmu; in xii. 6, 19, B. omits, N.A. 'Iwapelβ; Joiarib, Joiarib.) The founder of one of the courses of priests, elsewhere called in full JEHOIARIB. His descendants after the Captivity are given in Neh. xii. 6, 19, and also in xi. 10; though it is possible that in this passage another person is intended.

3. ('Iwapelβ, B. 'Iwapelβ, A. 'Iwapiβ; Joiarib.) A Shilonite—i.e. probably a descendant of SHELAH the son of Judah—named in the genealogy of Maaseiah, the then head of the family (Ncf. xi. 5).

JOK'DE-AM (דְּמֵאִי = firebrand of the people (?); 'Apidamu, B. 'Iapeidamu, A. 'Ierbaia; Jawadaam), a city of Judah, in the mountains (Josh. xv. 56), named in the same group with Maon, Carmel, and Ziph, and therefore apparently to be looked for south of Hebron, where they are situated. It has not, however, been yet met with, nor was it known to Eusebius and Jerome. [G.] [W.]

JO'KIM (דְּמֵאִי = Jehovah establishes; 'Iwakelmu, BA. 'Iwakelmu; qui stare fecit solem), one of the sons of Shelah (the third according to Berrington) the son of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 22), of whom nothing further is known. It would be difficult to say what gave rise to the rendering of the Vulgate or the Targum on the verse. The latter translates, "and the prophets and scribes were came forth from the seed of Joshua." The reading which they had was evidently דְּמֵאִי, which some Rabbinical tradition applied to Joshua, and at the same time identified Josab and Saraph, mentioned in the same verse, with Mahlon and Chilion. Jerome quotes a Hebrew legend that Jokim was Elimelech the husband of Naomi, in whose days the sun stood still on account of the transgressor of the Law (Quæst. Heb. in Paral.).

JOK'ME-AM (דְּמֵאִי = may the people rise (?); in 1 K., B. Aoukdu; A., united with preceding word, Μεμυραβελ & Madu; in 1 Ch. η 'Iekmuu. B. 'Ikadu; Jecmuau, Jecmaau), a city of Ephraim, given with its suburbs to the Kohathite Levites (1 Ch. vi. 68). The catalogue of the towns of Ephraim in the Book of Joshua is unfortunately very imperfect (see xvi.), but in the parallel list of Levitical cities in Josh. xii. KIBZAIM occupies the place of Jokmeam (c. 22). The situation of Jokmeam is to a certain extent indicated in 1 K. iv. 12, where it is named with places which we know to have been in the Jordan valley at the extreme east boundary of the tribe. (Here the A. V. has, probably by a printer's error, JOKNEAM.) This position is further supported by that of the other Levitical cities of this tribe—Shechem in the north, Beth-horon in the south, and Gezer in the extreme west, leaving Jokmeam to take the opposite place in the east (see, however, the contrary opinion of Robinson, iii. 115, note). With regard to the substitution of Kibzaim—which is not found again—for Jokmeam, we would only draw attention to the fact of the similarity in appearance of the two names, דְּמֵאִי and דְּמֵאִי. Conder, adopting the view that Jokmeam is Kibzaim, identifies it with Tell el-Kobis, near Bethel (Hbk. p. 417). [G.] [W.]

JOK'NE-AM (דְּמֵאִי) [cp. Olshausen, Hbk. § 277, k, 3]: 'Iekdu; 'Iekduu, η Madu; A. 'Iekoddu, 'Iekduu, η 'Ekdnu; Juchaman, Jecnam, Jecnam), a city of the tribe of Zebulun, allotted with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 34), but entirely omitted in the catalogue of 1 Ch. vi. (cp. v. 77). It is doubtless the same place as that which is incidentally named in connexion with the boundaries of the tribe—"the torrent which faces Jokneam" (xii. 11), and as the Canaanite town, whose king was killed by Joshua—"Jokneam of Carmel" (xii.

22). The requirements of these passages are sufficiently met by the modern site Tell Keimûn, an eminence which stands just below the eastern termination of Carmel, with the Kishon at its feet about a mile off. Dr. Robinson has shown (B. R. iii. 115, note) that the modern name is legitimately descended from the ancient: the CYAMON* of Judith vii. 3 being a step in the pedigree (see also Van de Velde, i. 331, and Memoir, p. 326; Guérin, Samarie, ii. 241 sq.; Sepp, Heil. Land, ii. 551). Jokneam is found in the A. V. of 1 K. iv. 12, but this is unwarranted by either Hebrew text, LXX. A. or Vulgate (both of which have the reading Jokmeam; the LXX. B. is quite corrupt), and also by the requirements of the passage, as stated under JOKMEAM. [G.] [W.]

JOK-SHAN (יֶקְטָן), trapper; יֶקְטָן; Jec-san, a son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2, 3, J; 1 Ch. i. 32), and Father of the benê Yokshân, whose main stocks were Sheba and Dedan; that is, the more northern branches of these two great Arabian peoples. Although Keturite Arabs find no place in the lists of the later Arab genealogists, yet mention is made of a tribe Ḳaṭūrā (قطورا), which lived along with the kindred tribe of G'urhum [JOKTAN] in the neighbourhood of Mecca (Ibn Coteiba, ed. Wüstenfeld, 14; Ritter, xii. 19; Knobel). The reason why some of the tribes which traced their descent from Keturah can no longer be verified, is doubtless, as Dillmann suggests, that they early became extinct, or were absorbed into other tribal combinations. So far as their names have been identified, they appear to have dwelt on the western side of the Arabian peninsula [ZIMRAN; MEDAN; MIDIAN; SHEBA; DEDAN]. Jokshan, which looks like a dialectical variant of Joktan,² is connected by the Arab genealogists with the tribe of Yāqīsh (ياقش) in Yemen (ZDMG. x. 31), perhaps on account of his relation to Sheba (see Dillm. Die Genesis, x. 7, xxv. 1-4). [E. S. P.] [C. J. B.]

JOK-TAN (יֶקְטָן), Yoktân, incola; cp. قطن, incoluit: יֶקְטָן; Jectân; יֶקְטָן, Jos. Ant. i. 6, § 4), son of Eber, and "Father" of thirteen*

* For the legend connecting Cyamon, Tell Keimûn, with Cain, see PEF. Mem. ii. 48, and Sepp, ii. 551.
² The change of letters in Yokshân and Yoktân reminds one of Shâ'âl and Jâlâl (i.e. Saul).

The sons of Ḳaṭtân were fourteen, according to a tradition preserved by Hishâm ibn Muḥammad 'al-Kalbî. The same writer traces قطان بن عبر

Ḳaṭtân ibn 'Abîr, that is, Joktan ben 'Eber, back to Noah, through Shelah, Arphaxad, and Shem, after Gen. x. 21-25. This is followed by a list of tribal names, of which only Sabâ (Sheba) can be recognised in the Biblical catalogue of the Benê Joktan. The glosses appended to some of the names—سبأ

وهو عامر. "Sabâ; and he is 'Amîr,"—show that peoples, whose seats lay in the south-west and south of Arabia (Gen. x. 25; 1 Ch. i. 19). Saadiah's Arabic Version of the O. T. gives Ḳaṭtân (قطان) for Joktan; and the Arab genealogists, partly, no doubt, on the ground of the Biblical data, reckon Ḳaṭtan-Joktan as the tribal ancestor of the pure Arabian stocks, as distinguished from the Ishmaelite peoples of the north (Gen. xxv. 12-16), and the extinct aboriginal tribes of 'Ad, Thamûd, and the rest. The name survives as that of a small district north of Nag'rân, and as a tribal designation. Niebuhr mentions also Ḳoḥtan, a town in Ḥadhramaut. In antiquity, doubtless, it had a much wider scope.

The benê Yoktân are enumerated in Gen. i. c. as follows: Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Sheba, Ophir, Havilah, Jobab. The first, which has the Arabic article 'al prefixed, has been compared with Amdudâ or Mâdudî, a township of Ḥadhramaut (Wellsted; K. Niebuhr). Dillmann mentions also a personal name Mawaddâ, occurring in the Himyarite inscriptions (ZDMG. xix. n. 20, 4). In Jakût's Mu'g'am iii. 119, we find the important statement that المودان ('al-Maudâd) and سالف (Sâlif) were two sons of Yukṭân, who were both included under the designation of سلف (Sulaf or Salif). As-the same tribes were known by different designations (Hishâm ibn Muḥammad 'al-Kalbî, G'amaarat ul-nasab, B.M. MSS. add. 22376).

Another account assigned only two sons to Ḳaṭtân, viz. Ya'rûb and G'urhum. From Ya'rûb's grandson Sabâ, i.e. Sheba, sprang the tribes of Yaman; from G'urhum, those of the Hig'âz: see the references, op. Gesenius, Thez. p. 1212. According to Ahmad ibn 'Abd-'Allâh 'al-Kalkashandî, again, Ḳaṭtân had four sons, G'urhum, 'as-Sulaf, Ya'rûb, and Ḥadhramaut.

Ibn Khaldûn writes as follows [with express reference to the Biblical account]: "In the Torah it is stated that Eber begat two children, Peleg and Joktan. And, according to the most trustworthy of the genealogists, Joktan is Ḳaṭtân, the Arabs arabizing him thus. And from Peleg are descended Abraham and his branches. . . . And from Joktan are derived many branches. In the Torah thirteen of his children are mentioned, viz. Almodad (the arabization of which is مضاض who is G'urhum; and Iram, who is حضرور [like Hadoram]; and Sheleph, who is the people of as-Sifan; and Sabâ, who is the people of Yemen of Himyar, the Tubba's and Kahlân; and Hazarmaveth, who is Ḥadhramaut. These are five. And there are eight others, whose names we will give. These, however, being Hebrew, we have not stopped to give any interpretation of them; nor is it known from what stocks they are. They are Jerah, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Ophir, Havilah, and Jobab. And according to the genealogists G'urhum is of the children of Joktan, but I know not from which of them. And Hishâm al-Kalbî says, al-Hind and al-Sind [India] are of Ophir, the son of Joktan. But God knows best." (Targumân al-'ibar, Bulak ed. ii. 1, pp. 7, 8. Communicated by A. G. Ellis.) Upon the whole, two things are clear: (1) that there is no uniform and independent Arab tradition about the original Arabian stocks; (2) that the Biblical account supplies a credible relation of the names and situation of the principal Arabian peoples contemporaneous with the writer.

Salif or as-Sulaf is the name of a tribe in Yaman (Z.D.G. xi. 153 sqq.): cp. also Salfiyah (سلفية), a district S.W. of Sanaa (صنعاء); K.

Niebuhr, Knobel). Hazarmaveth is Hadhramaut, the southern coastland, E. of Yaman; Yerah has not been identified. *Hadoram*⁴ we would equate with the G'urhum (جرهم) of the Arab genealogies. G'urhum may represent an original Joram (יורם = יורח, 2 Sam. viii. 10; 1 Ch. xviii. 10); and the phonetic changes involved in the transition from Joram to G'urhum may be paralleled by Jetur—G'eidur, and Abram—Abraham. The tribes of Hadoram would thus belong to the Hij'uz, and their seats would be in the neighbourhood of Mecca, about the middle of the W. coast of Arabia.

Uzal was long since recognised in 'Azāl, the old name of Sanaa, the capital of Yaman (Gen. Theol.; Assemani, BO. i. 360). Diklah means "palm," Arab. دقلة; and, as a tribal designation, may be compared with Banū dhi nakhlat, "Sons of the owner of palm-trees," the name of a tribe derived from Subā (Sheba), but of uncertain filiation ('al-Kalkashandi). Obal, who is called Ebal (עבול) in Ch., and in Sam. Vulg. of Gen., and by Josephus, appears as Γεμιάδ in LXX. of Ch., i.e. possibly יבאל. He may be the same as 'Amilah (عاملة), a son of Sabā, in 'al-Kalkashandi's genealogy.* Abimael, or as it may have been originally written Abumael, i.e. 'Abū-Mā'il, "father of Mā'il," a thoroughly Arabic appellation, may be the original of the Wā'il (وائل), son of Himyar, son of Sabā, in the same list. In a genealogy of Hadhramaut we find also Wā'il ibn Ḳaṭan, where Ḳaṭan is clearly a double of Jokṭan. Sheba is, of course, the well-known district of Sabā in Yaman. Ophir has perhaps been the subject of more dispute than any other name in the entire list. Yet, like his brethren, Ophir must certainly represent a people of southern, and probably south-eastern, Arabia (so Dillmann). With the name of OPHIR we would compare that of Wā'il's (Abi-mael's) brother 'Abīr (أبیر); 'ābir?), son of Himyar, son of Sabā, in 'al-Kalkashandi's genealogy of Ḳaṭān. The names differ but slightly; and 'Abīr descends from Sabā in the Arabic list, as 'Ophīr (old 'Afīr, and possibly 'Abīr) follows Shēbā in the Biblical one. This identification shows that the Arabian genealogists knew at least that Ophir—'Abīr, like the other sons of Joktan—Ḳaṭān, must be sought in Arabia itself, and not in Africa (Sofālah), much less India (Abhīrā). As to HAVILAH, Dillmann

* The LXX. form of the name resembles عمان, 'Omān, the district E. of Hadhramaut, on the Persian Gulf.

has observed that, while there must have been a place so named in N. Arabia on the Persian Gulf (Gen. xxv. 18; 1 Sam. xv. 7; cp. Gen. ii. 11), which might answer to Strabo's Kaukrotai (xvi. 4. 2), and Niebuhr's Husūālah in Bahrein: this wide-spread stock may also have left traces in the Haulān of Yaman (Niebuhr; Sprenger): cp. Ptolemy's Talāa (vi. 7. 41) in South Yaman (Bochart). Lastly, JOBAB is a doubtful name, as is indicated by the fluctuation of the LXX. between Jobab, Jobad, and Oram. We may, however, be assured that his settlements were not remote from those of his brother-tribes.⁵

Having thus gained an approximate idea of the locality of the Joktanite peoples, we proceed to consider the obscure statement of their bounds, Gen. x. 30: "And their seat was from Mēshā to Sēphār, (and?) the hill-country of the East." A Hebrew writer would naturally state the limits from the better known west to the less known east; and this order the language itself clearly implies. Mešah must, therefore, have been some well-known place in the western coast-land; possibly Bisāh or Baishah in Northern Yaman, which Edrisi calls Baishat Yaḳṭān (so Knobel; Sprenger), hardy Musa (Ptol. vi. 8) or Muza (Arrian, Pliny).

that is, موزع Mūza', or موسج Mausif.

which lie too far south. Sephar, the eastern limit, may perhaps be Zafār (ظفار), on the east coast of Hadhramaut, although there is a difficulty about the letters of the Arabic name, which would imply a Hebrew שפא, while the Heb. שפד would rather imply سفار. Gesenius and others make "the hill-country of the East" to be the highlands of Nag'd in Central Arabia. But even if the bounds of Joktan were stated from east to west, as they assume, a line drawn from Maisān (ميسان), at the head of the Persian Gulf, to Nag'd, does not seem a very precise demarcation of tribes that inhabited the western and southern coastlands of Arabia. The region of the "Frankincense Mountains," between Hadhramaut and Mahrah (Ritter, xii. 264), suits better, as Knobel and others have suggested. [C. J. B.]

The settlements of the sons of Joktan are specially examined in the separate articles bearing their names, and generally in ARABIA. They colonised the whole of the south of the peninsula, the old "Arabia Felix," or the Yemen (for this appellation had a very wide significance in early times), stretching, according to the Arabs (and there is in this case no ground for doubting their general correctness), to Mecca, on the north-west, and along nearly the whole of the southern coast eastwards, and far inland. At Mecca, tradition connects the two great races of Joktan and Ishmael, by the marriage of a daughter of G'urhum the Joktanite with Ishmael. It is necessary in mentioning this G'urhum, who is called a "son" of Joktan (Kahtān), to observe that "son" in these cases must be regarded as signifying "descendant" (cp. CHRONOLOGY), and that many generations (though how many, or in what order, is not known) are missing from the existing list, between Kahtān (embracing the most important time of the Joktanites) and the establishment of the comparatively-modern Himyarite kingdom. From this latter date, stated by Caussin, Essai, i. 63, at B.C. cir. 100, the succession of the Tubba's is apparently preserved to us.* At Mecca, the tribe of G'urhum long held the office of guardians of the Caaba, or temple, and the sacred enclosure, until they were expelled by the Ishmaelites (Kutb'ad-Din, Hist. of Mecca, ed. Wüstenfeld, pp. 35 and 39 seqq.; and Caussin, Essai, i. 194). But it was at Sabā, the Biblical Sheba, that the kingdom of Joktan attained its greatness. In the south-western angle of the peninsula, San'ā (Uzal), Sabā (Sheba), and Hadhramaut (Hazarmaveth), all closely neighbouring, formed together the principal known settlements of the Joktanites. Here arose the kingdom of Sheba. The dominant tribe from remote ages was that of Sabā (the Sabaei of the Greeks): while the family of Himyar (Homeritae) held the first place in the tribe. The kingdom called that of Himyar we believe to have been merely a late phase of the old Sheba, dating, both in its rise and its name, only shortly before our era.

Next in importance to the tribe of Sabā was that of Hadhramaut, which, till the fall of the Himyarite power, maintained a position of independence and a direct line of rulers from Kahtān (Caussin, i. 135-6). Joktanite tribes also passed northwards, to Hīrah, in El-'Irāk, and to the Haurān, near Damascus. The emigration of these and other tribes took place on the occasion of the rupture of a great dyke (the Dyke of El-'Arim), above the metropolis of Sabā; a catastrophe that appears, from the concurrent testimony of Arab writers, to have devastated a great extent of country, and destroyed the city Ma'rib, the Maryab of the inscriptions, or Sabā. This event forms the commencement of an era, the dates of which exist in the inscriptions on the Dyke and elsewhere. (See the extracts from El-Mas'ūdī and other authorities, edited by Schultens; Caussin, i. 84 seqq.; D. H. Müller, Burgen, ii. 981; ZDMG. xxxi. 61 sqq.; and ARABIA.)

The position which the Joktanites hold (in native traditions) among the successive races who are said to have inhabited the peninsula has been fully stated in art. ARABIA; to which the reader is referred for a sketch of the inhabitants generally, their descent, history, religion, and language. There are some existing places named after Joktan and Kahtān ('Al-'Idrisi, ed. Jaubert; Niebuhr, Descr. 238); but there seems to be no safe ground for attaching to them any special importance, or for supposing that the name is always ancient when we remember that the whole country is full of the traditions of Joktan.

JOK'THE-EL (Ἰακθελ). 1. (Ἰακαρεηλ, B. Ἰακαρεηλ, A. Ἰεχθαήλ; Jecthel), a city in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 38), named next to Lachish—now Tell el-Hesy, on the road between Beit Jibrin and Gaza. The name does not appear to have been yet discovered.

2. (Ἰεθοήλ, B. Καθοήλ, A. Ἰεκθοήλ; Jecthel) "God-subdued," the title given by Amaziah to the cliff (Ἰβη, A. V. Selah)—the stronghold of the Edomites—after he had captured it from them (2 K. xiv. 7). The parallel narrative of 2 Ch. xv. 11-13 supplies fuller details. From it we learn that, having beaten the Edomite army with a great slaughter in the "Valley of Salt," Amaziah took those who were not slain to the cliff, and threw them headlong over it. This cliff is asserted by Eusebius (s. v. πέτρα, *OS.*² p. 279, 71) to be "a city of Edom, also called by the Assyrians (Syrians) Rekem," by which there is no doubt that he intends Petra (*OS.*² p. 280, 94, s. v. Πεκέμ, and the quotations in Stanley's S. & P. p. 94, note). The title thus bestowed is said to have continued "unto this day." This, Keil remarks, is a proof that the history was nearly contemporary with the event, because Amaziah's conquest was lost again by Ahaz less than a century afterwards (2 Ch. xxviii. 17). [G.] [W.]

JO'NA (Ἰωάνης [Westcott and Hort]; Jona), the father of the Apostle St. Peter (John i. 42), who is hence addressed as Simon Bar-jona in Matt. xvi. 17. In the A. V. of John xxi. 15-17 he is called JONAS, though the Greek is Ἰωάνης, and the Vulg. Johannes throughout. (The R. V. rendering is "son of John.") The name in either form would be the equivalent of the Hebrew Johanan.

JON'ADAB. 1. (יְהוֹנָדָב, and once יְהוֹנָדָב, i.e. Jehonadab = Jehovah hath impelled; Ἰωνάδδ; Jonadab), son of Shimeah and nephew of David. He is described as "very subtil" (σοφὸς σφόδρα; the word is that usually translated "wise," as in the case of Solomon, 2 Sam. xiii. 3). He seems to have been one of those characters who, in the midst of great or royal families, pride themselves, and are renowned, for being acquainted with the secrets of the whole circle in which they move. His age naturally made him the friend of his cousin Amnon, heir to the throne (2 Sam. xiii. 3). He perceived from the prince's altered appearance that there was some unknown grief—"Why art thou, the king's son, so lean?"—and, when he had wormed it out, he gave him the fatal advice for ensnaring his sister Tamar (vs. 5, 6).

Again, when, in a later stage of the same tragedy, Amnon was murdered by Absalom, and the exaggerated report reached David that all the princes were slaughtered, Jonadab was already aware of the real state of the case. He was with the king, and was able at once to reassure him (2 Sam. xiii. 32, 33).

2. Jer. xxxv. 6, 8, 10, 14, 16, 18, 19, in which

* It is curious that the Greeks first mention the Himyarites in the expedition of Aelius Gallus, towards the close of the 1st century B.C., although Himyar himself lived long before; agreeing with our belief that his family was important before the establishment of the so-called kingdom. See Caussin, l. c.

it represents sometimes the long, sometimes the short Heb. form of the name. [JEHONADAB.]

JONAH, BOOK OF. This small book presents no special difficulties in respect of its vocabulary or grammar; as regards its contents, it differs from other Books in the collection of the twelve Minor Prophets, in being a narrative of events connected with the delivery of a prophecy, the substance of which is given briefly and in general terms. The contents of the Book are too well known to require recapitulation. As to its character, and the object with which it was written, very great diversity of opinion exists. The bibliographical notice at the end of this article shows the extent of the literature connected with the subject, and will enable the reader to trace this diversity of opinion in detail.

According to the traditional view, held with very few exceptions by all writers until the beginning of last century, the Book is regarded as historical, and composed either (1) by the Prophet himself or (2) a later author.

Neither the name of the work, nor the use of the third person with reference to Jonah, affords evidence as between (1) and (2). The portraiture of Jonah, who appears in an unfavourable light, seems best explained by supposing that the Prophet relates his own shortcomings, thereby testifying his repentance. The nobler side of a mixed character is thus exhibited.

The chief considerations urged in support of the historical character of the Book are:—

a. There is no indication that the Book should be regarded in any other light. It contains a circumstantial narrative, mentioning known persons and places.

b. The relations of Israel to the surrounding nations before and during the time of the Prophet. Ruth the Moabitess; the sojourn of David's parents in Moab; his friendly relations with foreigners,—Achish, Ithai, Hiram; similar examples in the case of Solomon and later kings; the connexion of Elijah and Elisha with Syria; the residence of the latter in Damascus; the utterances of Amos against foreign nations, are evidences not only of friendly intercourse with, but also of religious influence exerted by the prophetic order on their heathen neighbours. Such friendly relations belong to the earlier history of the nation, before the days of Assyrian supremacy and oppression; and subsequent misfortunes developed a feeling of mistrust and illwill towards foreigners which made such relations no longer possible. Although the mission of Jonah and its results are without exact parallel in the O. T. Scriptures, the facts noted above, and the consideration that their occurrence is limited to a period which closes not long after the time of Jonah, may be urged in favour of its probability.

c. The mission was fitted to enforce on Israel the teaching found in the prophets of Jeroboam's reign. They set forth God as the righteous Judge of all nations, Who would make use of the heathen for the discipline of Israel, that Israel's iniquity was great, and the punishment thereof was impending. What more appropriate enforcement of these truths than to exhibit, as a model of repentance, a heathen nation which was their counterpart in iniquity? The men of Nineveh would give form to the warnings which the Prophets had expressed in words. They would rescue or rise in judgment against that generation, as against a later one.

d. The typical character of the narrative. This must be considered in estimating its probability. If under the Old Dispensation the words and deeds of God's servants point out the Christ of the Gospels, we should expect to find some indication of the central truth of the Resurrection, and it is difficult to conceive how such indication could be made, except by introducing events of a most unusual and startling character. In the N. T., the events of Jonah's life are treated as having more than a mere historical interest, and the most remarkable incident in it as foreshadowing that death and resurrection which is the foundation of the Christian faith (St. Matt. xii. 39–41; St. Luke xi. 29, 30, 32). For discussion of these passages, cf. Speaker's Commentary, vol. vi. pp. 577–8, Introd. to Jonah; Wordsworth on St. Matt. xii. 40; Meyer, Comment. u. d. N. T. (1864), l. i. p. 296 sq.

We proceed to notice some of the objections raised against the historical character of the Book.

(a.) The lack of detail in the narrative,—e.g. the place where Jonah was cast up, his journey to Nineveh, return, the name of the king; while minute details are added where they seem to point the moral of the story,—e.g. the conduct of the sailors and of the Ninevites contrasted with the behaviour of the Prophet.

(b.) The improbability of such a mission with such results. The Assyrians, from their own records as from Scripture, appear as idolaters, trusting in their own gods, and despising those of other nations. Their reception of the Prophet is scarcely in harmony with their character.

(c.) Of this movement, so unusual in its character and affecting all classes, no trace appears either in the O. T. or other history. No prophet enforces on Israel the lesson which repentant Nineveh is designed to teach, and those who denounce the incurable wound of the bloody city pass over in silence what would increase the certainty of vengeance, that though a prophet had been among them, they had turned back to their evil way.

(d.) The prominence of the miraculous element, and especially the deliverance of the Prophet by help of the great fish.

The reader will note that the paragraphs a, b, c, d, and (a), (b), (c), (d), are in great measure opposing opinions on the points at issue.

Aim and object of the work.—All commentators admit the didactic aim of the writer, and many consider that the actions described have a symbolical meaning. The questions—what does the Book teach? what does it symbolise?—are to a great extent independent of the controversy as to its historical character.

The concluding verses iv. 10, 11, point out the greatness of the city, the ignorance and helplessness of those within it, as reasons for the mercy shown, as recorded in iii. 10. The Prophet himself acknowledges that the Divine action is in accordance with His revelation of Himself, and that it had prompted him to disobedience at the first (iv. 2). God, slow to anger and of great kindness, and repenting of the evil if man will turn from his wickedness, is the lesson set forth in the Book itself. The Prophets, especially Jeremiah and Ezekiel, speak in a similar strain (cp. Jer. xviii. 7, 8; xxvi. 3; Ezek. xviii. and xxxiii.), and present such close parallels of thought and diction that some assign the Book to this period, and its authorship to one of these prophets or a contemporary.

Further, the Book shows that God's mercy is not confined to His own people,—a lesson which the Jews were slow to learn, and which required enforcement by means of vision, even under the Christian dispensation.

In the Gospels (see passages quoted above), the heathen nation repenting at the preaching of Jonas is held up as a warning to non-repentant Israel. A contrast is implied which is not pointed out in the Book, and in respect of one special sin, that of impenitence. A double contrast may be noted (is it too much to say that it is implied?) between the conduct of Jonah and (1) the sailors, (2) the Ninevites. Are we warranted in expanding the contrast in detail, and considering the conduct of the Prophet as an illustration of the failings of Israel? Disobedient at first, angry afterwards, at the mercy extended to the repentant city, the Prophet is regarded by many as the representative of the Hebrew people, at one time evading compliance with the Divine commands, at another jealous and displeased because of favour showed to other nations.

And since the Prophet, in respect of the most remarkable circumstance recorded of him, is regarded as a type of Christ, may not other details of the narrative be viewed in the same light? The various attempts to interpret the Book typically and allegorically suggest how this portion of Scripture may be "profitable for instruction," if we cannot say that it was designed to teach all that commentators have put forward. Here we can only give a brief sketch of each method.

J. Tarnovius (in Prophetam Jonam Commentarius, 1622) pursues the typical treatment of the narrative into the fullest detail: Jonah, in his name and that of his father, in being sent to the heathen as well as being a Prophet of Israel, in giving himself up to secure the safety of his fellow-voyagers, &c., may serve to remind us of One greater than Jonah (cp. among moderns Kaulen, Librum J. Proph. exposuit, Mogunt. 1862).

The allegorical treatment of the narrative may be illustrated by Kleinert's view. He sees in Jonah the nation with a prophetic call, in whom all families of the earth shall be blessed. Nineveh represents the heathen world in its greatness and ignorance, the object of Divine compassion. Israel seeks to evade its mission, and devotes itself to worldly pursuits (Jonah flees to Tarshish); but God punishes the nation by adversity (the storm) and by a captivity which threatens its very existence (Jonah swallowed up by the great fish). When they cry unto the Lord, He delivers them (Jonah's prayer and rescue), but their mission, still unaccomplished, remains the same. Repentant Nineveh shows how the Lord is found of them that sought Him not, while He stretches out His hands to a rebellious people.

The symbolical use of expressions similar to those in the Book of Jonah, by other writers of the O. T., may be noted, in support of this method of interpretation. Action closely resembling that of the Prophet is described in Ps. lv. 6-8, "Oh that I had wings like a dove!" (the name Jonah signifies "dove"); cp. Ps. cxxix. 7-10. The word "dove" is also applied to Ephraim (Hos. vii. 11, xi. 11). The storm and overflowing waters are common symbols of God's visitations, in the midst of which He pours out upon His people the spirit of deep sleep (Is. xxix. 10; the same root being used as in Jonah i. 5, "was fast asleep"). The monsters of the deep—leviathan the swift serpent, leviathan the crooked serpent, the dragon that is in the sea (Is. xxvii. 1; Ps. lxxiv. 13)—are the great powers that oppress Israel.* Their action is described as "devouring" (Jer. l. 17); and in the expressions "he hath swallowed^b me up like a dragon" (Jer. li. 34), "I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed^b up" (Is. 44), words used with reference to the most remarkable incidents recorded of Jonah, are used symbolically with reference to Babylon.

If this allegorical treatment of the first part of the Book be accepted, it follows that the latter part must also be interpreted with reference to the Babylonian kingdom. The greatness of Nineveh, on which emphasis is laid (i. 2; iii. 2, 3; iv. 11), must then be taken as indicating that city which was the scene of the Captivity—the great Babylon (Dan. iv. 27). Its fall had been predicted: but the returned exiles wondered when she would be made to drink the cup of God's fury; in their day of small things they longed for the day of vengeance upon the great nations. The Prophets encouraged them in their hopes (Hag. ii. 7, 22; Zech. i. 15, 21), but it was necessary to point out the conditional character of all prophecy,—how man may make even God's Prophet seem a deceiver if he will take hold of the promises held out to the penitent. This is the situation described in the latter part of the Book. But here the incident of the gourd corresponds in some degree to the deliverance of the Prophet in the earlier section. Is this also to receive an allegorical interpretation? Dr. Wright (the second of whose Biblical Essays is an exegetical study of the Book of Jonah) suggests that the Prophet, exceeding glad of the gourd (iv. 6), represents the spirit in which the returned Jews welcomed the restoration of the Davidic house in the person of Zerubbabel. The figure had been applied to his predecessor—"under his shadow we shall live among the heathen" (Lam. iv. 20). But David's throne awaited David's Lord,—the prince of the royal line soon passed away—the gourd withered as in a night. This additional exposition subjects the whole narrative to a uniform treatment, by filling up a gap left by former interpreters of this school.

Language.—Certain words which occur only in later Books are found in this Book:—

תִּשְׁבֵּן (Is. lxxv.), a "decked" vessel. The common word תִּשְׁבֵּן, "ship," is also used.

* See, however, the notes in Cheyne's Isaiah, vol. i. p. 161.

^b The same Heb. verb as in Jonah i. 17 (ll. 1, Heb.).

סָלוֹ, "sailor," and in Ezek. xxvii. 9, 27, 29 only. The late Prof. Wright (Comp. Gr. of Semitic Languages, p. 50) says that this word has nothing to do with סָלוֹ, "salt."

רֵב הַחֹבֵל, "chief of the sailors;" רֵב in plural in Ezek. xxvii. 8, 27, 28, 29 only.

These are all nautical terms, and the Hebrew vocabulary is not rich in these, nor is there much, if any, opportunity for their use in earlier Books.

תַּעֲשֶׂה. The root occurs Jer. v. 28 (verb); Cant. v. 14; Ezek. xxvii. 19; Job xii. 5; Ps. cxlvi. 4; and in one form of the numeral xi. (עֶשְׂרִי עֶשֶׂר (עֶשְׂרִי)). For its meanings, see Lex. s. v.

רָבוּ, Hos. viii. 12 (כְּתִיב) and later books, and Chald.

טָעַם, "decree." טָעַם, Ezra and Daniel; also the usage of סָנַה (appoint), קָרָא (cry or preach), and the form טָ compounded with other words, for the relative.

With our slight knowledge of the historical development of the Hebrew language and of its dialectic variations, it is difficult to draw any inferences from these slender data. For a fuller discussion, cf. Pusey's Introd. pp. 249-251, and (on the other side) Friedrichsen's Excursus, p. 179 sq.

The hymn (ch. ii.) contains many expressions similar to those in the Psalms, e.g. Ps. xviii. 4-6, xxxi. 6, 7, 22, cxlii. 3, cxli. 7, cxx. 1; Lam. iii. 54. If we consider all these to be borrowed, a late date must be assigned to it, but many (and among them critics who reject the historical view) consider it to be an old hymn, "a genuine hymn of the Prophet Jonah." We have here no sure ground for drawing inferences as to date. For fuller discussion, cp. Friedrichsen's Excursus, and Introd. to Jonah in Speaker's Comm.

Between this Book and the account of the prophet Elijah contained in 1 K. xvii.-xix., many points of resemblance have been noted. In both a prophet is impatient, and God's power over His creation is employed to instruct him. The verbal coincidences are also close; the expression וַיִּשְׁאַל אֹהֶן נִמְשׁוֹ לְמוֹת is common to both. Cp. 1 K. xvii. 4, 9, xix. 6, 11, with Jonah i. 4, 17, ii. 10, iv. 6, 7, 8; and 1 K. xix. 4, with Jonah iii. 4, iv. 3, 5, 8; 1 K. xix. 5, 7, 8, with Jonah i. 2, 3, iii. 2, 3.

Jonah, like Elijah, was a Prophet of the northern kingdom. Are these sufficient grounds for suggesting a community of origin?

Commentators of all shades of opinion have, with such few exceptions, pronounced in favour of the unity of the Book, that it seems hardly necessary to adduce any evidence under this head. The following passages may be compared—i. 2 and iii. 2; i. 3 and iii. 3; i. 10, 16, and iv. 1; i. 2 and iv. 2—as showing similarity of expression. We leave it to the reader to note references in chs. iii. iv. to ch. i., and to draw an inference from comparing i. 10, 16, with iv. 5.

For a general view of the literature connected with this Book, the reader may consult:—A series of articles in The O. T. Student, Chicago, 1883-4, "Is the Book of Jonah historical?"

which contain references to the principal authors. Kalisch, Bible Studies, pt. ii., with alphabetical and chronological lists of authors referred to. P. Friedrichsen, Kritische Uebersicht der verschiedenen Ansichten von dem Buche Jonas, &c. Leipzig, 1841 (2nd ed.). The first defends, the other two reject, the historical view. Prof. Driver's Introd. to the O. T. should also be consulted.

An interesting list of works is contained in Jonah propheticus liber expos. lit. et Exeg. illustr. a J. Bircherodio, Hafniae, 1686; and a list in Rosenmüller, Sch. in V. T. (carried up to 1826).

The following list is arranged according to the standpoint of the different authors.

I. Supporters of the historical view:—

1. As regards the whole Book. J. Hooper (Bp.), Sermons upon the Prophet Jonas, London, 1550; P. Baronius Prælec. 39 in Jonam, Lond. 1579; Lectures on Jonah, by J. King, Lond. 1594-1618; G. Abbott (Arch. of Cant.), Commentary upon Jonah, Lond. 1600, reprinted Lond. 1845 (Homiletical); Rob. Abbott (Bp. of Salisbury) on Jonah, 1609; Newcome, 1785; Beard (People's Dict. of B.); Drake, Notes on Jonah and Hosea, 1853; Pusey, Minor Prophets; Huxtable (Speaker's Comm.); Hävernick, Evalütung i. d. A. T.; Juh. Tarnoczi in prop. J. Comm., Rostoch. 1622 (the typical character of the Book drawn out); Delitzsch, Baumgarten, Küper, Niebuhr; Redford, Studies in the Book of Jonah, 1883.

2. With modifications. (i.) Less, Göttingen, 1782 (a vessel bearing the name or sign of a fish rescued Jonah); Anton in Paulus, Repertorium, Jena, 1791 (a fish approached Jonah, by help of which he was brought to land). (ii.) The miraculous portion an addition to the original story: Ammon, Erlangen, 1794; Thaddäus, Bonn, 1786. (iii.) A vision or dream is described: Grimm, Düsseldorf, 1789; Sonnenmayer, in Augusti's Theol. Monatschrift, 1802.

The above are attempts to remove the miraculous element. They either deal arbitrarily with the narrative, or assign unusual meanings to certain Hebrew words. For discussion of these views, cp. Friedrichsen, pp. 27-33, 60-68.

A modification of iii. is suggested in an article in the Journal of Sacred Lit., vol. viii. 1866, p. 110 sqq. The events related in i. 6-ii. 10 were seen by Jonah in a dream. Being brought to land in an unconscious state, he considered them as a reality experienced by him, and so related them. The same article contains a careful discussion as to how far the references to the narrative in the N. T. necessarily imply its historical reality.

II. Those who reject the historical view (those who allow a small residuum of fact not recoverable with certainty are here included) maintain that the Book is—

1. A didactic narrative, containing a moral lesson.

2. An allegory, in which the events are symbolical, signifying a connected series of truths.

3. Based on a foreign myth.

1. (i.) Müller, Jona eine moralische Erzählung (in Paulus, Memorabilien, Leipzig, 1794): mercy shown to the penitent. So Kalisch, Bible Studies; Bergmann, Jonah (e. alt. test. Parabel) übers. u. erk. Strassburg, 1885.

(ii.) Relations of Jew and Gentile: Semler ("deum etiam alius gentibus prospicere adjuvamenta melioris et salubris cognitionis non tantum Judaeos curare"). Similarly Pareau, ascribing the Book to Jonah, a parable based on real events (might be classed with I. 2). Eichhorn; Michaelis (against Jewish pride and contempt of other nations). Similarly Böhme, Bruno Bauer. Nachtigal divides the Book into three, drawing a lesson compounded of the two preceding views. Bleek (Introd. O. T.) considers its aim similar to i. and ii.

(iii.) Special reference to the prophetic office. Herder (the Prophets and their failings): so Köster and (partly) Niemeyer, who giving as the moral, God's thoughts higher than man's thoughts, thinks the chief reference is to the Prophets. Hezel (a warning to Prophets, but with other subsidiary teaching). Hitzig (apologetic with reference to unfulfilled prophecy). Paulus, Mem., 1794 (similar, combined with i.). Jäger (Ueber den... Endzweck des Buch's Jonah, Tüb. 1840, reprinted from Tüb. Zeitsch.), with reference to Babylon.

2. (i.) Jonah a symbol of Jewish nation. Meyer (with much similarity to Müller, drawing same lesson). Stäudlin (the Prophet's actions symbolical, as in Jer. xiii. 1-11, with the lesson of i.).

(ii.) The whole narrative treated as an allegory. Keil; Kleinert in Lange's Bibelwerk, trans. (with additions), in T. and T. Clark's Commentary, without rejecting the historical character (see above for detail); J. S. Bloch, Stud. z. Geschichte der Samml. d. alt. heb. Literatur, Leipzig, 1875; Jonah, A Study in Jewish Folklore and Religion, by T. K.; (Prof.) Cheyne in Theol. Rev. vol. xiv. 1877, p. 211; Biblical Essays, by C. H. H. Wright, D.D., T. and T. Clark, 1886.

(iii.) The characters are intended to represent the contemporaries of the author. H. v. der Hardt, a picture of the times in which Jonah lived, and the coming downfall of the northern kingdom; but in a later work he considers the times of Manasseh and Josiah are described (1719-23). Krahmer: the conduct of the Jews towards the Samaritans after the return from captivity is reproved by this Book. A moral lesson, like 1 i. and ii., and some of the details borrowed from myth.

3. The influence of myth is urged by Rosenmüller; Gesenius, Hallsche Literaturz., 1813; Bertholdt, Krahmer, Forbiger, and Friedrichsen, who refer to the legends of Hesione and Andromeda; and by F. C. Bauer, Der Proph. Jonas, ein Assyr. Babyl. Symbol, in Ilgen's Zeitsch., 1837, the Babylonian myth of Oannes and ceremonies connected with the cult of Adonis are appealed to. Some account of these and similar myths may be found in Tylor, Primitive Culture, i. 306, and Early History of Mankind, p. 337, who points out the similarity of parts of these myths to the rescue of Jonah by the fish. But the common element seems limited to a sea-monster and the neighbourhood of Joppa; and for some details the myths may be indebted to the Hebrew.

In addition to these works, we may note Jonas Illustratus, by J. Leusden, Trajecti ad Rhenam, 1656, which contains the commentaries of Rashi, Aben Ezra, and Kimchi, with translations and notes; a useful help towards acquiring some knowledge of Rabbinic Hebrew.

[A. T. C.]

JONAH (יֹנָתָן); יֹנָתָן, LXX. and Matt. xii. 39), a prophet, son of Amittai, of Gath-hepher. His name is associated (2 K. xiv. 25) with that of Jeroboam, and it is probable, though not certain, that he lived during the reign of that king.

The passages in 2 K. x. 32, 33; xiii. 3-7, 22-25; xiv. 25-27, with a few references in the prophetic writings, contain all the information afforded in Scripture concerning the relations of the kingdom of Israel with their eastern neighbours during the century of the house of Jehu. From these brief notices we learn that the Syrians (and the Ammonites) had in Jehu's reign ravaged the eastern frontier of the Israelite kingdom with merciless severity (2 K. x. 32; Amos i. 3, 13). Under his successor Jehoahaz the kingdom continued in subjection. The next king (Joash), encouraged and at the same time admonished by the prophet Elisha (2 K. xiii. 14-19), recovered some of the cities which had fallen into the enemy's hand (v. 25), but the complete restoration of the kingdom was effected during the brilliant reign of Jeroboam II., who "restored the coast of Israel from the entering of Hamath unto the sea of the plain, according to the word of the Lord God of Israel, which He spake by the hand of His servant Jonah."

The promise of returning prosperity may have been delivered by Jonah at any time between the defeat of Jehu and the victories of Jeroboam, and the writer of the narrative in 2 K. xiv. 25-27 may combine a prophecy of an earlier period with the record of its fulfilment.

A modern critic* is of opinion that a further portion of Jonah's message is preserved in "the burden of Moab (Is. xv. xvi.), which embodies the substance of an earlier prophecy."† For the discussion of the hypothesis, cp. Hitzig, Der Proph. J. Orakel ü. Moab, Heidelb. 1831; Der Proph. Jesaja, 1833; and Cheyne's Isaiah.

[A. T. C.]

JONAN (יֹנָתָן; Jona), son of Eliakim, in the genealogy of Christ, in the 7th generation after David, i.e. about the time of king Jehoram (Luke iii. 30). The name is probably only another form of Johanan, which occurs so frequently in this genealogy. The sequence of names, Jonan, Joseph, Juda, Simeon, Levi, Matthat, is singularly like that in v. 26, 27, Joanna, Judah, Joseph, Semei, Mattathias.

[A. C. H.]

JONAS. 1. (B. יֹנָתָן, A. יֹנָתָן; Elionas.) This name occupies the same position in 1 Esd. ix. 23 as Eliezer in the corresponding list in Ezra x. 23. Perhaps the corruption originated in reading אֱלִיעֶזֶר for אֱלִיָּעָזָר, as appears to have been the case in 1 Esd. ix. 32 (cp. Ezra x. 31). The former would have caught the compiler's eye from Ezra x. 22, and the original form Elionas, as it appears in the Vulg., could easily have become Jonas.

* Hitzig.

† xvi. 13: "This is the word which the Lord hath spoken concerning Moab since that time." The R. V. has "in time past."

2. (Ἰωνᾶς; Jonas). The prophet Jonah (2 Esd. i. 39; Tob. xiv. 4, 8; Matt. xii. 39, 40, 41; xvi. 4).

3. (Ἰωάννης; Johannes), John xxi. 15-17. [JONA.]

JON'ATHAN (יְחֹנָתָן, i.e. Jehonathan, and יְחֹנָתָן; the two forms are used almost alternately: Ἰωνάθαρ, Jos. Ἰωνάθης: Jonathan). 1. The eldest son of king Saul. The name (the gift of Jehovah, corresponding to Theodorus in Greek) seems to have been common at that period; possibly from the example of Saul's son (see JONATHAN, the nephew of David, JONATHAN, the son of Abiathar, JONATHAN, the son of Shage, and NATHAN the prophet).

He first appears some time after his father's accession (1 Sam. xiii. 2). If his younger brother Ishbosheth was 40 at the time of Saul's death (2 Sam. ii. 8), Jonathan must have been at least 30 when he is first mentioned. Of his own family we know nothing, except the birth of one son, five years before his death (2 Sam. iv. 4). He was regarded in his father's lifetime as heir to the throne. Like Saul, he was a man of great strength and activity (2 Sam. i. 23), of which the exploit at Michmash was a proof. He was also famous for the peculiar martial exercises in which his tribe excelled—archery and slinging (1 Ch. xii. 2). His bow was to him what the spear was to his father: "the bow of Jonathan turned not back" (2 Sam. i. 22). It was always with him (1 Sam. xviii. 4; xx. 35). It is through his relation with David that he is chiefly known to us, probably as related by his descendants at David's court. But there is a background, not so clearly given, of his relation with his father. From the time that he first appears he is Saul's constant companion. He was always present at his father's meals. As Abner and David seem to have occupied the places afterwards called the captaincies of "the host" and "of the guard;" so he seems to have been (as Hushai afterwards) "the friend" (cp. 1 Sam. xx. 25; 2 Sam. xv. 37). The whole story implies, without expressing, the deep attachment of the father and son. Jonathan can only go on his dangerous expedition (1 Sam. xiv. 1) by concealing it from Saul. Saul's vow is confirmed, and its tragic effect deepened, by his feeling for his son, "though it be Jonathan my son" (ib. xiv. 39). "Tell me what thou hast done" (ib. xiv. 43). Jonathan cannot bear to believe his father's enmity to David, "My father will do nothing great or small, but that he will show it to me: and why should my father hide this thing from me? it is not so" (1 Sam. xx. 2). To him, if to any one, the wild frenzy of the king was amenable—"Saul hearkened unto the voice of Jonathan" (1 Sam. xix. 6). Their mutual affection was indeed interrupted by the growth of Saul's insanity. Twice the father would have sacrificed the son: once in consequence of his vow (1 Sam. xiv.); the second time, more deliberately, on the discovery of David's flight: and on this last occasion a momentary glimpse is given of some darker history. Were the phrases "son of a perverse rebellious woman," "shame on thy mother's nakedness" (1 Sam. xx. 30, 31), mere frantic invectives? or was there something in the story of Ahinoam or Rizpah which we do not know? "In fierce anger" Jonathan left the royal presence (ib. 34). But he cast his lot with his father's decline, not with his friend's rise, and "in death they were not divided" (2 Sam. i. 23; 1 Sam. xxiii. 16).

His life may be divided into two main parts. 1. The war with the Philistines; commonly called, from its locality, "the war of Michmash" (1 Sam. xiii. 22, LXX.), as the last years of the Peloponnesian war were called for a similar reason "the war of Decelea." In the previous war with the Ammonites (1 Sam. xi. 4-15) there is no mention of him; and his abrupt appearance, without explanation, in xiii. 2, may seem to imply that some part of the narrative has been lost.

He is already of great importance in the state. Of the 3000 men of whom Saul's standing army was formed (xiii. 2; xxiv. 2; xxvi. 1, 2), 1000 were under the command of Jonathan at Gibeah. The Philistines were still in the general command of the country; an officer was stationed at Geba, either the same as Jonathan's position or close to it. In a sudden act of youthful daring, as when Tell rose against Gesler, or as in sacred history Moses rose against the Egyptian, Jonathan slew this officer,* and thus gave the signal for a general revolt. Saul took advantage of it, and the whole population rose. But it was a premature attempt. The Philistines poured in from the plain, and the tyrants became more deeply rooted than ever. [SAUL.] Saul and Jonathan (with their immediate attendants) alone had arms, amidst the general weakness and disarming of the people (1 Sam. xiii. 22). They were encamped at Gibeah, with a small body of 600 men; and as they looked down from that height on the misfortunes of their country, and of their native tribe especially, they wept aloud (ἐκλαύον, LXX.; 1 Sam. xiii. 16).

From this oppression, as Jonathan by his former act had been the first to provoke it, so now he was the first to deliver his people. On the former occasion Saul had been equally with himself involved in the responsibility of the deed. Saul "blew the trumpet;" Saul had "smitten the officer of the Philistines" (xiii. 3, 4). But now it would seem that Jonathan was resolved to undertake the whole risk himself. "The day," the day fixed by him (γίγνεται ἡ ἡμέρα, LXX.; 1 Sam. xiv. 1), approached; and without communicating his project to any one, except the young man whom, like all the chiefs of that age, he retained as his armour-bearer, he sallied forth from Gibeah to attack the garrison of the Philistines stationed on the other side of the steep defile of Michmash (xix. 1). His words are short, but they breathe exactly the ancient and peculiar spirit of the Israelite warrior. "Come, and let us go over unto the garrison of these uncircumcised; it may be that Jehovah will work for us: for there is no restraint to Jehovah to save by many or by few." The answer is no less characteristic of the close friendship of the two young men: already like to that which afterwards sprang up between Jonathan and David. "Do all that is in thine heart; . . . behold, I am with thee: as thy heart is my heart" (LXX.; 1 Sam. xiv. 7). After the manner of the time (and the more, probably, from having taken no counsel of the high-priest or any prophet before his departure), Jonathan proposed to draw an omen for their course from the conduct of the enemy. If the garrison, on seeing them, gave intimations of descending upon them, they would remain in the valley: if, on the other hand, they raised a challenge to advance, they were to accept it. The latter turned out to be the case. The first appearance of the two warriors from behind the rocks was taken by the Philistines as a furtive apparition of "the Hebrews coming forth out of the holes where they had hid themselves;" and they were welcomed with a scoffing invitation (such as the Jebusites afterwards offered to David), "Come up, and we will show you a thing" (xiv. 4-12). Jonathan immediately took them at their word. Strong and active as he was, "strong as a lion, and swift as an eagle" (2 Sam. i. 23), he was fully equal to the adventure of climbing on his hands and feet up the face of the cliff. When he came directly in view of them, with his armour-bearer behind him, they both, after the manner of their tribe (1 Ch. xii. 2), discharged a flight of arrows, stones, and pebbles^b from their bows, crossbows, and slings, with such effect that twenty men fell at the first onset [ARMS, pp. 239, 240]. A panic seized the garrison, thence spread to the camp, and thence to the surrounding hordes of marauders; an earthquake combined with the terror of the moment; the confusion increased; the Israelites who had been taken slaves by the Philistines during the last three days (LXX.) rose in mutiny: the Israelites who lay hid in the numerous caverns and deep holes in which the rocks of the neighbourhood abound, sprang out of their subterranean dwellings. Saul and his little band had watched in astonishment the wild retreat from the heights of Gibeah—he now joined in the pursuit, which led him headlong after the fugitives, over the rugged plateau of Bethel, and down the pass of Beth-horon to Ajalon (xiv. 15-31). [GIBEAH.] The father and son had not met on that day. Saul only conjectured his son's absence from not finding him when he numbered the people. Jonathan had not heard of the rash curse (xiv. 24) which Saul invoked on any one who ate before the evening. In the darkness and darkness (Hebrew, 1 Sam. xiv. 27) that came on after his desperate exertions, he put forth the staff which apparently had (with his sling and bow) been his chief weapon, and tasted the honey which lay on the ground as they passed through the forest. The pursuers in general were restrained even from this slight indulgence by fear of the royal curse; but the moment that the day, with its enforced fast, was over, they flew, like Muslims at sunset during the fast of Ramadan, on the captured cattle; and devoured them, even to the brutal neglect of the Law which forbade the dismemberment of the fresh carcasses with the blood. This violation of the Law Saul endeavoured to prevent and to expiate by erecting a large stone, which served both as a rude table and as an altar; the first altar that was raised under the monarchy. It was in the dead of night after this wild revel was over that he proposed that the pursuit should be continued till dawn; and then, when the silence of the oracle of the high-priest indicated that something had occurred to intercept the Divine favour, the lot was tried, and Jonathan appeared as the culprit. Jephthah's dreadful sacrifice would have been repeated; but the people interposed in behalf of the hero of that great day; and Jonathan was saved^d (xiv. 24-46).

* (A. V. and R. V. "garrison") τὸν Ναοὺς, LXX.; 1 Sam. xiii. 3, 4. See Ewald, ii. 476. Versions and commentators are divided as to the meaning to be assigned to נָצַף. See Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the B. of Samuel, on 1 Sam. x. 5.—He prefers with Klosterman the sense of pillar.

2. This is the only great exploit of Jonathan's life. But the chief interest of his career is derived from the friendship with David, which began on the day of David's return from the victory over the champion of Gath, and continued till his death. It is the first Biblical instance of a romantic friendship, such as was common afterwards in Greece, and has been since in Christendom; and is remarkable both as giving its sanction to these, and as filled with a pathos of its own, which has been imitated, but never surpassed, in modern works of fiction. "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul" — "Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women" (1 Sam. xviii. 1; 2 Sam. i. 26). Each found in each the affection that he found not in his own family: no jealousy of rivalry between the two, as claimants for the same throne, ever interposed: "Thou shalt be king in Israel, and I shall be next unto thee" (1 Sam. xxiii. 17). The friendship was confirmed, after the manner of the time, by a solemn compact often repeated. The first was immediately on their first acquaintance. Jonathan gave David as a pledge his royal mantle, his sword, his girdle, and his famous bow (xviii. 4). His fidelity was soon called into action by the insane rage of his father against David. He interceded for his life, at first with success (1 Sam. xix. 1-7). Then the madness returned and David fled. It was in a secret interview during this flight, by the stone of Ezel, that the second covenant was made between the two friends, of a still more binding kind, extending to their mutual posterity—Jonathan laying such emphasis on this portion of the compact, as almost to suggest the belief

^b We have taken the LXX. version of xiv. 13, 14, ἐπέβρασαν, κατὰ πρόσωπον Ἰωνάθαν, καὶ ἐπάταξεν αὐτούς . . . ἐν βάλισσι [καὶ ἐν περροβάλοις, om. in BNA.] καὶ κόχλασιν τοῦ πεδίου, for "they fell before Jonathan . . . within as it were a half acre of ground, which a yoke of oxen might plough." The alteration of the Hebrew necessary to produce this reading of the LXX., is given by Kennicott (Dissert. on 1 Chron. xi. p. 453; cp. Driver, in loco, who questions the rendering "pebbles"). Ewald (ii. 480) makes this last to be, "Jonathan and his friend were as a yoke of oxen ploughing, and resisting the sharp ploughshares."

^c In xiv. 23, 31, the LXX. reads "Bamoth" for "Beth-aven," and omits "Ajalon."

BIBLE DICTIONARY.—VOL. I.

^d Josephus (Ant. vi. 6, § 5) puts into Jonathan's mouth a speech of patriotic self-devotion, after the manner of a Greek or Roman. Ewald (ii. 483) supposes that a substitute was killed in his place. There is no trace of either of these in the sacred narrative.

of a slight misgiving on his part of David's future conduct in this respect. It is this interview which brings out the character of Jonathan in the liveliest colours—his little artifices—his love for both his father and his friend—his bitter disappointment at his father's unmanageable fury—his familiar sport of archery. With passionate embraces and tears the two friends parted, to meet only once more (1 Sam. xx.). That one more meeting was far away in the forest of Ziph, during Saul's pursuit of David. Jonathan's alarm for his friend's life is now changed into a confidence that he will escape: "He strengthened his hand in God." Finally, and for the third time, they renewed the covenant, and then parted for ever (1 Sam. xxiii. 16-18).

From this time forth we hear no more till the battle of Gilboa. In that battle he fell, with his two brothers and his father, and his corpse shared their fate (1 Sam. xxxi. 2, 8). [SAUL.] His ashes were buried first at Jabesh-Gilead (do. v. 13), but afterwards removed with those of his father to Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 12). The news of his death occasioned the celebrated elegy of David, in which he, as the friend, naturally occupies the chief place (2 Sam. i. 22, 23, 25, 26), and which seems to have been sung in the education of the archers of Judah, in commemoration of the one great archer, Jonathan: "He bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow" (2 Sam. i. 17, 18. See Driver, Notes, &c., in loco).

He left one son, aged five years old at the time of his death (2 Sam. iv. 4), to whom he had probably given his original name of Meribbaal, afterwards changed for Mephibosheth (cp. 1 Ch. viii. 34, ix. 40). [MEPHIBOSHETH.] Through him the line of descendants was continued down to the time of Ezra (1 Ch. ix. 40), and even then their great ancestor's archery was practised amongst them. [SAUL.]

2. (יְהוֹנָתָן.) Son of Shimeah, brother of Jonadab, and nephew of David (2 Sam. xxi. 21; 1 Ch. xx. 7). He inherited the union of civil and military gifts so conspicuous in his uncle. Like David, he engaged in a single combat and slew a gigantic Philistine of Gath, who was remarkable for an additional finger and toe on each hand and foot (2 Sam. xxi. 21). If we may identify the Jonathan of 1 Ch. xxvii. 32 with the Jonathan of this passage, where the word translated "uncle" may be "nephew," he was (like his brother Jonadab) "wise"—and, as such, was David's counsellor and secretary. Jerome (Quæst. Heb. on 1 Sam. xvii. 12) conjectures that this was Nathan the prophet, thus making up the eighth son, not named in 1 Ch. ii. 13-15. But this is not probable.

3. The son of Abiathar, the high-priest. He is the last descendant of Eli, of whom we hear anything. He appears on two occasions. 1. On the day of David's flight from Absalom, having first accompanied his father Abiathar as far as Olivet (2 Sam. xv. 36), he returned with him to Jerusalem, and was there, with Ahimaaz the son of Zadok, employed as a messenger to carry back the news of Hushai's plans to David (xvii. 15-21). 2. On the day of Solomon's inauguration, he suddenly broke in upon the banquet of Adonijah, to announce the success of the rival prince (1 K. i. 42, 43). It may be inferred from Adonijah's expression ("Thou art a valiant man, and bringest good tidings"), that he had followed the policy of his father Abiathar in Adonijah's support.

On both occasions, it may be remarked that he appears as the swift and trusty messenger.

4. The son of Shammah the Hararite (1 Ch. xi. 34; 2 Sam. xxiii. 32; see Driver, Notes on Heb. Text of BB. of Sam. in loco). He was one of David's heroes (gibborim). The LXX. makes his father's name Sola (Σολά), and applies the epithet "Hararite" (ὁ Ἀραρίτης) to Jonathan himself. "Harar" is not mentioned elsewhere as a place; but it is a poetical word for "Har" (mountain), and, as such, may possibly signify in this passage "the mountaineer." Another officer (Ahiam) is mentioned with Jonathan, as bearing the same designation (1 Ch. xi. 35).

[A. P. S.]

5. (יְהוֹנָתָן.) The son, or descendant, of Gershon the son of Moses, whose name in the Masoretic copies is changed to Manasseh, in order to screen the memory of the great lawyer from the disgrace which attached to the apostasy of one so closely connected with him (Judg. xviii. 30). While wandering through the country in search of a home, the young Levite of Bethlehem-Judah came to the house of Micah, the rich Ephraimite, and was by him appointed to be a kind of private chaplain, and to minister in the house of gods, or sanctuary, which Micah had made in imitation of that at Shiloh. He was recognised by the five Danite spies appointed by their tribe to search the land for an inheritance, and who lodged in the house of Micah on their way northwards. The favourable answer which he gave when consulted with regard to the issue of their expedition probably induced them, on their march to Laish with the warriors of their tribe, to turn aside again to the house of Micah, and carry off the ephod and teraphim, superstitiously hoping thus to make success certain. Jonathan, to whose ambition they appealed, accompanied them, in spite of the remonstrances of his patron; he was present at the massacre of the defenceless inhabitants of Laish, and in the new city which rose from its ashes he was constituted priest of the graven image, an office which became hereditary in his family till the Captivity. The Targum of R. Joseph, on 1 Ch. xxiii. 16, identifies him with Shebuel, the son of Gershom, who is there said to have repented (שִׁבְעוּל בֶּן גֵּרְשׁוֹן) in his old age, and to have been appointed by David as chief over his treasures. All this arises from a play upon the name Shebuel, from which this meaning is extracted in accordance with a favourite practice of the Targumist.

6. (יְהוֹנָתָן.) One of the sons of Adin (Ezra viii. 6), whose representative Ebed returned with Ezra at the head of fifty males, a number which is increased to two hundred and fifty in 1 Esd. viii. 32, where Jonathan is written יְהוֹנָתָן.

7. A priest, the son of Asahel, one of the four who assisted Ezra in investigating the marriages with foreign women, which had been contracted by the people who returned from Babylon (Ezra v. 15; 1 Esd. ix. 14).

8. A priest, and one of the chiefs of the fathers in the days of Joiakim, son of Jeshua. He was the representative of the family of Melic (Neh. xii. 14).

9. One of the sons of Kareah, and brother of Johanan (Jer. xl. 8). The LXX. in this passage omits his name altogether, and in this they are supported by two of Kennicott's MSS., and the parallel passage of 2 K. xv. 23. In three others of Kennicott's it was erased, and was originally omitted in three of De Rossi's. He was one of the captains of the army who had escaped from Jerusalem in the final assault by the Chaldeans, and, after the capture of Zedekiah at Jericho, had crossed the Jordan, and remained in the open country of the Ammonites till the victorious army had retired with their spoils and captives. He accompanied his brother Johanan and the other captains, who resorted to Gedaliah at Mizpah, and from that time we hear nothing more of him. Hitzig decides against the LXX. and the MSS. which omit the name (Der Proph. Jeremias), on the ground that the very similarity between Jonathan and Johanan favours the belief that they were brothers. [W. A. W.]

10. (יְנָתָן); 'Iordāvar. Son of Joiada, and his successor in the high-priesthood. The only fact connected with his pontificate recorded in Scripture, is that the genealogical records of the priests and Levites were kept in his day (Neh. xii. 11, 22), and that the chronicles of the state were continued to his time (ib. 23). Jonathan (or, as he is called in Neh. xii. 22, 23, John) lived, of course, long after the death of Nehemiah, and in the reign of Artaxerxes Mne-mon. Josephus, who also calls him John, as do Eusebius* and Nicephorus likewise, relates that he murdered his own brother Jesus in the Temple, because Jesus was endeavouring to get the high-priesthood from him through the influence of Bagoeses the Persian general. He adds that John by this misdeed brought two great judgments upon the Jews: the one, that Bagoeses entered into the Temple and polluted it; the other, that he imposed a heavy tax of fifty shekels upon every lamb offered in sacrifice, to punish them for this horrible crime (A. J. xi. vii. § 1). Jonathan, or John, was high-priest for thirty-two years, according to Eusebius and the Alexandr. Chron. (Sedd. de Success. in P. E. cap. vi. vii.). Milman speaks of the murder of Jesus as "the only memorable transaction in the annals of Judaea from the death of Nehemiah to the time of Alexander the Great" (Hist. of Jews, ii. 29).

11. Father of Zechariah, a priest who blew the trumpet at the dedication of the wall (Neh. xii. 35). He seems to have been of the course of Shemaiah. The words "son of" seem to be improperly inserted before the following name, Mattaniah, as appears by comparing xi. 17.

[A. C. H.]

12. (Iordāvar). 1 Esd. viii. 32. [See No. 6.]

13. A son of Mattathias, and leader of the Jews in their war of independence after the death of his brother Judas Maccabaeus, B.C. 161 (1 Macc. ix. 19 sq.). [MACCABEES.]

14. A son of Absalom (1 Macc. xiii. 11), sent by Simon with a force to occupy Joppa, which was already in the hands of the Jews (1 Macc. xii. 33), though probably held only by a weak garrison. Jonathan expelled the inhabitants (rods étras éy abríj; cp. Jos. Ant. xiii. 6, § 3) and secured the city. Jonathan was probably a brother of Mattathias (2) (1 Macc. xi. 70).

15. A priest who is said to have offered up a solemn prayer on the occasion of the sacrifice made by Nehemiah after the recovery of the sacred fire (2 Macc. i. 23 sq.: cp. Ewald, Gesch. d. V. Isr. iv. 184 sq.). The narrative is interesting, as it presents a singular example of the combination of public prayer with sacrifice (Grimm, ad 2 Macc. l. c.). [B. F. W.]

JON'ATHAS (BA. 'Iathá, N. Nathá [v. 14]; Vulg. om., Old Lat. Jonathus, al. Nathan), the Latin form of the common name Jonathan, which is preserved in the E. V. of Tobit v. 13.

[B. F. W.]

JONATH ELEM RECHOKIM, or, more correctly, Yonath Elem Rechōqim, occurs only once in the Bible, where it forms in Hebrew part of the first, or introductory, verse of Ps. lvi. It would be impossible to collect more nonsense written on three whole Psalms than what has been written on these three words alone. The Septuagint and Targumist agree on the whole, and apply these three words to Israel absent from the Temple and the Holy Land. The incorrectness of this explanation is, however, proved not merely from the contents of the Psalm, which is evidently an expression of David as an individual, but also from the other half of the very superscription itself. Rashi, who rightly applies this Psalm to David, explains Yonath Elem Rechōqim as a dumb dove far away from its country. This explanation, though not exactly ungrammatical, is inelegant, if not awkward. Ibn 'Ezra, as usual, takes these three words to be "the commencement of a poem which along with its tune was, in ancient times, well known." He does not, however, explain these three difficult words themselves. His theory has been shown in the articles AJJELETH SHAHAR, ALAMOTH, ALTASHITH, &c., to be both anachronistic and otherwise illogical. Qimchi half agrees with the Septuagint and Targum and half with Rashi, without, however, giving a satisfactory grammatical account of the three words in question. The truth is, Yonath Elem Rechōqim represented the music-band which played on the most loudly-sounding instruments, both of wind and percussion, then in existence: trumpets, cymbals, castanets, kettle-drums, &c. The players on these powerful instruments were then, as now and ever, for harmony's sake, placed at some distance from the other players. Now, Yonath (root יָנָת, "to press hard") is the feminine active participle in the construct state, whilst Elem (עֵלֶם, "power"), the genitive of that construct state, is, as usual, used adjectively. These words, together with Rechōqim ("distant places"; cf. Ps. lxxv. 6 [5]), give us the construction of this peculiar, but by no means incorrect or even inelegant, superscription. The whole of the first five words in Hebrew signifies "To the director of the band which produces the most powerfully sounding music from distant places."

We may remark that the nature of the music played by that band fully harmonises with the contents of the Psalm which it was to accompany. As in that kind of music sounds overpower sounds, but yet those apparently destructive notes produce the right harmony, so in this Psalm sentiments (vv. 4, 5, 8-12; E.V. 3, 4, 7-11) overpower sentiments (vv. 2, 3, 6, 7; E.V. 1, 2, 5, 6), not to destroy, but to make the whole into a more perfect harmony.

* Chron. Con. lib. poster. p. 340. But in the Demost. Evang. lib. viii., Jonathan.

[S. M. S.-S.]

JOPPA (Ἰόππα, i.e. Yāfō, "beauty;" the A. V. follows the Greek form, except once, Ἰάφρο: 'Ἰόππα, LXX., N. T.; Vulg. Joppa; 'Ἰόππα, Joseph.—at least in the most recent editions—Strabo, and others: now Yāfa or Jaffa), a town on the S.W. coast of Palestine, the port of Jerusalem in the days of Solomon, as it has been ever since. Its etymology is variously explained; some deriving it from "Japhet," others from "Iopa," daughter of Aeolus and wife of Cepheus, Andromeda's father, its reputed founder; others interpreting it "the watch-tower of joy," or "beauty," and so forth (Reland, Palest. p. 864). The fact is, that from its being a seaport, it had a profane as well as a sacred history. Pliny, following Mela (De situ Orb. i. 12), says that it was of antediluvian antiquity (N. H. v. 14); and even Sir John Maundeville, in the 14th century, bears witness—though it must be confessed a clumsy one—to that tradition (E. T. p. 142). According to Josephus, it originally belonged to the Phoenicians (Ant. xiii. 15, § 4). Here, writes Strabo, some say Andromeda was exposed to the whale (Geog. xvii. p. 759; cp. Müller's Hist. Græc. Fragm. vol. iv. p. 325, and his Geog. Græc. Mm. vol. i. p. 79), and he appeals to its elevated position in behalf of those who laid the scene there; though, in order to do so consistently, he had already shown that it would be necessary to transport Aethiopia into Phœnicia (Strab. i. p. 43). However, in Pliny's age—and Josephus had just before affirmed the same (B. J. iii. 9, § 3)—they still showed the chains by which Andromeda was bound; and not only so, but M. Scæurus the younger, the same that was so much employed in Judæa by Pompey (B. J. i. 6, § 2 et seq.), had the bones of the monster transported to Rome from Joppa—where till then they had been exhibited (Mela, ibid.)—and displayed them there, during his ædileship, to the public amongst other prodigies. Nor would they have been uninteresting to the modern geologist, if his report be correct. For they measured forty feet in length; the span of the ribs exceeding that of the Indian elephant; and the thickness of the spine or vertebra being one foot and a half ("sesquipedalis," i.e. in circumference—when Solinus says "semipedalis," he means in diameter; see Plin. N. H. ix. 5 and the note, Delphin ed.). Reland would trace the adventures of Jonah in this legendary guise (see above); but it is far more probable that it symbolises the first interchange of commerce between the Greeks, personified in their errant hero Perseus, and the Phœnicians, whose lovely—but till then unexplored—climate may be well shadowed forth in the fair virgin Andromeda. Perseus, in the tale, is said to have plunged his dagger into the right shoulder of the monster. Possibly he may have discovered or improved the harbour, the roar from whose foaming reefs on the north could scarcely have been surpassed by the barkings of Scylla or Charybdis. Even the chains shown there may have been those by which his ship was attached to the shore. Kings used by the Romans for mooring their vessels are still to be seen near Terracina, in the S. æge of the ancient port.

Returning to the province of history, we find that Japho or Joppa was situated in the port of Dan (Josh. xix. 46) on the coast towards the south; and on a hill so high, says Strabo, that people affirmed (but incorrectly) that Jerusalem was visible from its summit. Having a harbour attached to it—though always, as still, a dangerous one—it became the port of Jerusalem, when Jerusalem became the metropolis of the kingdom of the house of David, and certainly never did port and metropolis more strikingly resemble each other in difficulty of approach both by sea and land. Hence, except in journeys to and from Jerusalem, it was not much used. In St. Paul's travels, for instance, the starting points by water are, Antioch (Act. xv. 39, viâ Seleucia, it is presumed—xviii. 22, 23, was probably a land journey throughout), Caesarea (ix. 30, and xvii. 2), and once Seleucia (xiii. 4, namely that at the mouth of the Orontes). Also once Antioch (xiv. 25) and once Tyre, as a landing place (xxi. 3). The same preference for the more northern ports is observable in the early pilgrims, beginning with that of Bordeaux.

But Joppa was the place fixed upon for the cedar and pine wood, from Mount Lebanon, to be landed by the servants of Hiram king of Tyre; thence to be conveyed to Jerusalem, by the servants of Solomon—for the erection of the first "house of habitation" ever made with hands for the invisible Jehovah. It was by way of Joppa similarly that like materials were conveyed from the same locality, by permission of Cyrus, for the rebuilding of the second Temple under Zerubbabel (1 K. v. 9; 2 Ch. ii. 16; Ezra. iii. 7; 1 Esd. v. 55). Here Jonah, whenever and wherever he may have lived (2 K. xv. 25 certainly does not clear up the first of these points), "took ship to flee from the Presence of his Maker," and accomplished that singular history, which our Lord has appropriated as a type of one of the principal scenes in the great Drama of His own (Jon. i. 3; Matt. xii. 40). Here, lastly, on the house-top of Simon the tanner, "by the sea-side" (Acts. x. 5, 6, 8, 33; xi. 13)—with the view therefore circumscribed on the E. by the high ground on which the tower stood, but commanding a boundless prospect over the western waters—St. Peter had his "vision of tolerance" (Acts. x, xi), as it has been happily designated, and went forth like a second Perseus, but from the East, to emancipate from still worse thralldom, the virgin daughter of the West. The Christian poet Arator has not failed to discover a mystical connexion between the raising to life of the aged Tabitha—the occasion of St. Peter's visit to Joppa (Acts. ix. 36-43)—and the baptism of the first Gentile household (De Act. Apost. l. 840, op. Migne. Patrol. Cours. Compl. lxxviii. 164).

These are the great Biblical events of which Joppa has been the scene. In the interval that elapsed between the Old and New Dispensations it experienced many vicissitudes. It was visited by Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. iv. 31). It had sided with Apollonius, and was attacked and captured by Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Macc. x. 75, 76; cp. Joseph. Ant. xiii. 4, § 4). It witnessed the meeting between the latter and Ptolemy (1 Macc. xi. 6). Simon had his suspicions of its inhabitants, and set a garrison there (xii. 33, 34), which he afterwards strengthened considerably (xiii. 11). But when peace was restored, he re-established it once more as a haven (xiv. 5). He likewise rebuilt the fortifications (v. 34). This occupation of Joppa was one of the grounds of complaint urged by Antiochus, son of Demetrius, against Simon; but the latter alleged in excuse the mischief which had been done by its inhabitants to his fellow-citizens (xv. 28, 35). It would appear that Judas Maccabaeus had burnt their haven some time back for a gross act of barbarity (2 Macc. xii. 3, 6, 7). Tribute was subsequently exacted for its possession from Hyrcanus by Antiochus Sidetes (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 8, § 3). By Pompey it was rebuilt, made a free city, and placed under the jurisdiction of Syria (Ant. xiv. 4, § 4); but by Caesar it was not only restored to the Jews, but its revenues—whether from land or from export-duties—were bestowed upon the second Hyrcanus and his heirs (xiv. 10, § 6). When Herod the Great commenced operations, it was seized by him, lest he should leave a hostile stronghold in his rear, when he marched upon Jerusalem (xiv. 15, § 1), and Augustus confirmed him in its possession (xv. 7, § 3). It was afterwards assigned to Archelaus, when constituted ethnarch (xvii. 11, § 4), and passed with Syria under Cyrenius, when Archelaus had been deposed (xvii. 13, § 5). At the commencement of the Jewish war it was plundered and burnt by Cestius, and the inhabitants slaughtered (B. J. ii. 18, § 10); but such a nest of pirates had it become, when Vespasian arrived in those parts, that it underwent a second and entire destruction—together with the adjacent villages—at his hands (iii. 9, §§ 3, 4). Thus it appears that this port had already begun to be the den of robbers and outcasts which it was in Strabo's time (Geog. xvi. p. 759); while the district around it was so populous, that from Jamnia, a neighbouring town, and its vicinity, 40,000 armed men could be collected (ibid.). There was a vast plain near it, as we learn from Josephus (Ant. xiii. 4, § 4); it lay between Jamnia and Caesarea—the latter of which may be reached "on the morrow" from it (Acts x. 9 and 24)—and not far from Lydda (Acts ix. 38). It gave its name to the portion of the Mediterranean near it, "Sea of Joppa" (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 15, § 1). The people of Joppa worshipped Ceto, or Derceto, a goddess, half woman, half fish, who was also worshipped at Ascalon under the name Atargatis.

When Joppa first became the seat of a Christian bishop, is unknown; but the subscriptions of its prelates are preserved in the acts of various synods of the 5th and 6th centuries (Le Quien, Oriens Christianus. iii. 629). In the 7th century Arculfus sailed from Joppa to Alexandria, the very route usually taken now by those who visit Jerusalem; but he notices nothing at the former place (E. T. p. 10). Saewulf, the next who set sail from Joppa, A.D. 1103, is not more explicit (ibid. p. 47). Meanwhile Joppa had been taken possession of by the forces of Godfrey de Bouillon previously to the capture of Jerusalem. The town had been deserted and was allowed to fall into ruin; the Crusaders contenting themselves with possession of the citadel (William of Tyre, Hist. viii. 9); and it was in part assigned subsequently for the support of the Church of the Resurrection (ibid. ix. 16); though there seem to have been Bishops of Joppa (perhaps only titular after all) between A.D. 1253 and 1363 (Le Quien, 1291; cp. p. 1241). Saladin, in A.D. 1188, destroyed its fortifications (Sanut. Secret. Fid. Crucis, lib. iii. part. x. c. 5); but Richard of England, who was confined here by sickness, rebuilt them (ibid., and Richard of Devizes in Bohn's Ant. Lib. p. 61). Its last occupation by Christians was that of St. Louis, A.D. 1253; and when he came, it was still a city and governed by a count. "Of the immense sums," says Joinville, "which it cost the king to enclose Jaffa, it does not become me to speak; for they were countless. He enclosed the town from one side of the sea to the other; and there were twenty-four towers, including small and great. The ditches were well scoured, and kept clean, both within and without. There were three gates" . . . (Chron. of Crus. p. 495, Bohn). So restored it fell into the hands of the Sultans of Egypt, together with the rest of Palestine, by whom it was once more laid in ruins, A.D. 1297. So much so, that Bertrand de la Brocquiere, visiting it about the middle of the 15th century, states that it then only consisted of a few tents covered with reeds; having been a strong place under the Christians. Guides, accredited by the Sultan, here met the pilgrims and received the customary tribute from them; and here the papal indulgences offered to pilgrims commenced (E. T. p. 286). Finally, Jaffa fell under the Turks, in whose hands it still is, exhibiting the usual decrepitude of the cities possessed by them, and depending on Christian commerce for its feeble existence. During the period of their rule it has been three times sacked—by the Arabs in 1722; by the Mamelukes in 1775; and lastly by Napoleon I. in 1799, upon the glories of whose early career "the massacre of Jaffa" leaves a stain that can never be washed out (v. Moroni, Dissert. Eccl. s. v.; Murray's Hdbk.; Guérin, Judee, i. 1-2; Sepp, Jer. und d. h. L. i. 1-21; Baedeker-Socin. Hdbk.).

Yafa stands on a high round hill, close to the sea. The town rises in terraces from the water, and is surrounded on all sides by rapidly decaying fortifications. The port is very bad. The bazaars are amongst the best in Palestine. The population is about 8,000. The supposed house of Simon the tanner is still shown.

The gardens of Yafa, surrounded by stone walls and cactus hedges, stretch inland about one and a half miles, and are over two miles in extent north and south. Palma, oranges, lemons, pomegranates, figs, bananas, &c., grow in profusion, water being found beneath the sand which overlies a rich soil. The gardens are skirted on the south by vineyards.

The ancient cemetery, on the N.W. side of the town, was discovered in 1874 by M. Clermont-Ganneau, and numerous Greek inscriptions with Jewish emblems have been found in it (PEP. Mem. ii. 254-258, 275-278; Ganneau, Mission en Pal. et en Phénicie). [E. S. Ff.] [W.]

JOPPA, SEA OF (Ezra iii. 7). R. V. translates "to the sea, unto Joppa." [Joppa.]

JOPPE (Ἰόππη; Joppo), 1 Esd. v. 35; 1 Macc. x. 75, 76, xi. 6, xii. 33, xiii. 11, iv. 5, 34, xv. 28, 35; 2 Macc. iv. 21, xii. 3, 7. [JOPPA.]

JORAH (יֹרָח; Yorah), the ancestor of a family of 112 who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra ii. 18). In Neh. vii. 24 he appears under the name HARIPEH, or more correctly the same family are represented as the Bene-Hariph, the variation of name originating probably in a very slight confusion of the letters which compose it. In Ezra two of De Rossi's MSS., and originally one of Kennicott's had יֹרָח, i.e. Jodah, which is the reading of the Syr. and Arab. Versions. One of Kennicott's MSS. had the original reading in Ezra altered to יֹרָם, i.e. Joram; and two in Neh. read יֹרָם, i.e. Harim, which corresponds with 'Apeha of the A. MS., and Hurom of the Syriac. In any case the change or confusion of letters which might have caused the variation of the name is so slight, that it is difficult to pronounce which is the true form, the corruption of Jorah into Hariph being as easily conceivable as the reverse. Burrington (Geneal. ii. 75) decides in favour of the latter, but from a comparison of both passages with Ezra x. 31 we should be inclined to regard Harim (חרים) as the true reading in all cases. But on any supposition it is difficult to account for the form Azephurith, or more properly Ἀρσιφουρίθ, in 1 Esd. v. 16, which Burrington considers as having originated in a corruption of the two readings in Ezra and Nehemiah, the second syllable arising from an error of the transcriber in mistaking the uncial E for Z. [W. A. W.]

JORAI (יֹרַי) = יֹרַיָהּ = Jehovah teaches [M.V.1]; B. Ἰωραΐ, A. Ἰωραΐ; (Jorai). One of the Gadites dwelling in Gilead in Bashan, whose genealogies were recorded in the reign of Jotham king of Judah (1 Ch. v. 13). Four of Kennicott's MSS., and the printed copy used by Luther, read יֹרַי, i.e. Jodai.

JORAM (יֹרָם), apparently indiscriminately; Ἰωράμ; (Joram). 1. Son of Ahab; king of Israel (2 K. viii. 16, 25, 28, 29; ix. 14, 17, 21-23, 29). [JEHORAM, 1.]

2. Son of Jehoshaphat; king of Judah (2 K. viii. 21, 23, 24; 1 Ch. iii. 11; 2 Ch. xxii. 5, 7; Matt. i. 8). [JEHORAM, 2.]

3. A priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat, one of those employed by him to teach the Law of Moses through the cities of Judah (2 Ch. xvii. 8).

4. (יֹרָם) A Levite, ancestor of Shelomith in the time of David (1 Ch. xxvi. 25).

5. (BA. Ἰεθδουράμ, as if reading Hadoram with 1 Ch. xviii. 10.) Son of Toi, king of Hamath, sent by his father to congratulate David on his victories over Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 10). [HADORAM.]

JORDAN (יַרְדֵּן), i.e. Yarden, always with the definite article, יַרְדֵּן הַיָּרְדֵּן = the Descender, except Pa. xlii. 6 and Job xl. 23, from יַרְדַּן, Yarad, "to descend"; Ἰορδάνης; (Jordanis), Ἰορδανός (Pausan. v. 7, § 3); in the earlier Arab chronicles it is always given the name el-Urdunn,^a after the time of the Crusades it began to be called esh-Sheri'ah, "the watering place," with the addition sometimes of el-Kebir, "the great," the name by which it is known to the Bedawin of the present day. It is never called "the river," or "the brook," or any other name than its own, "the Jordan," in the Bible; and Josephus only once, in describing the borders of Issachar (Ant. v. 1, § 22), calls it ῥοβ̄ ἰορδανός, without any distinctive name. Jerome (*OS*² p. 114, 26, s. v. Dan) derives the name from Jor, which he states is equivalent to πεῖθρον, fluvius, and Dan, the city, where one of its principal sources was situated; and he says (Comm. in Matt. xvi. 13), "Jordanes oritur ad radices Libani; et habet duos fontes, unum nomine Jor, et alterum Dan; qui simul mixti Jordanis nomen efficiunt." This etymology was adopted by the earlier commentators and pilgrims (Corn. à Lap. in Deut. xxxiii. 22; Ant. Mart. vii.; Arculfus, ii. 17; Wm. of Tyre, xiii. 18; John of Würzburg, xx., &c.), and is current amongst the native Christians of to-day. The Hebrew יַרְדֵּן, Yarden, has however no relation whatever to the name Dan, and the river was called Jordan in the days of Abraham, at least five centuries before the name Dan was given to the city at its source.

The Jordan is not only the most important river in Palestine, but one of the most remarkable rivers of the world. It flows from N. to S. in a deep trough, parallel to the western shore of the Mediterranean, and, for more than two-thirds of its course, lies below the level of the sea in the deepest depression on the globe. Its name is used in the Book of Job (xl. 23) as the synonym of a perennial stream. But in contrast to the rivers of other countries, "the Jordan, from its leaving the Sea of Galilee to its end, adds hardly a single element of civilisation to the long tract through which it rushes" (S. & P. p. 286). It has never been navigable; it has never boasted of a single town of eminence upon its banks; and it flows into a sea that has never known a port—has never been a highway to more hospitable coasts—has never possessed a fishery. Its fall from the great fountain at Tell el-Kady, Dan, to the Dead Sea, a distance of 104 miles, is 1797 feet, and from this rapid descent it probably derived its name, "the Descender." It is, and must always have been, "the great watering-place" of the nomad tribes, but it is the river of a desert. Excepting a few oases, produced by its tributary streams, and the rank mass of vegetation within the narrow range of its own bed (the "pride," of Jordan, Zech. xi. 3; Jer. xii. 5, xlix. 19, l. 44), the valley through which it finds its way, in innumerable windings, is a naked desert in which, for ten months of the year, every particle of verdure is withered up by the intense heat. Dean Stanley well observes that, "as a separation of Israel from the surrounding country, as a boundary between the two main divisions of the tribes, as an image of water in a dry and thirsty soil, it played an important part; but not as the scene of great events, or the seat of great cities" (S. & P., p. 287).

The earliest allusion to the Jordan in the Bible is not so much to the river itself as to the "plain," or "circle," ciccar, at the north end of the Dead Sea, through which it ran, and in which "the cities of the ciccar" stood before their destruction. "Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain (ciccar) of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere . . . even as the garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt. . . . Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east" (Gen. xiii. 10, 11); that is, from the spot, between Bethel and Ai, where he and Abram were then sojourning (v. 3). Abram had just left Egypt (v. 1), and therefore the comparison between the fertilising properties of the Jordan and the Nile is very apposite. How far the plain extended in length or breadth is not said, but the same oasis is evidently referred to in Gen. xiii. 12, xix. 17, 25, 28, 29; and Deut. xxxiv. 3, "the plain of the valley of Jericho. . . unto Zoar." In 2 Sam. xviii. 23 the word ciccar, "plain," apparently means the floor of the Jordan valley,⁴ and it has the same meaning in 1 K. vii. 46, 2 Ch. iv. 17, where the clay ground between Succoth and Zarthan, in which Solomon established his brass foundries, is said to have been in the Banks of the Jordan near Jericho.

"plain" of Jordan.⁴ Other words used in reference to parts of the Jordan valley are: geliloth, the "borders of," or "region about,"

Jordan (Josh. xxii. 10, 11; cp. Ezek. xlvi. 8): bi'ah, "the plain" of the valley of Jericho (Deut. xxxiv. 3); ah'demoth, "the fields" of

‘Gomorrah (Deut. xxxii. 32); arboth, “the plains” of Moab (Num. xxii. 1, xxvi. 3, 63, xxxi. 12, xxxiii. 48–50, xxxv. 1, xxxvi. 13; Deut. xxxiv. 1, 8; Josh. xiii. 32), and of Jericho (Josh. iv. 13, v. 10; 2 K. xxv. 5; Jer. xxxix. 5, lii. 8). The expression “all the region round about Jordan” (Matt. iii. 5; Luke iii. 3) appears to include the wilderness of Judaea (cp. Matt. iii. 1). That portion of the Jordan valley which lies between the Sea of Gennesareth and the Dead Sea is always called in the O. T. ha-Arabah, “the desert,” A. V. “the plain.” [ARABAH.]

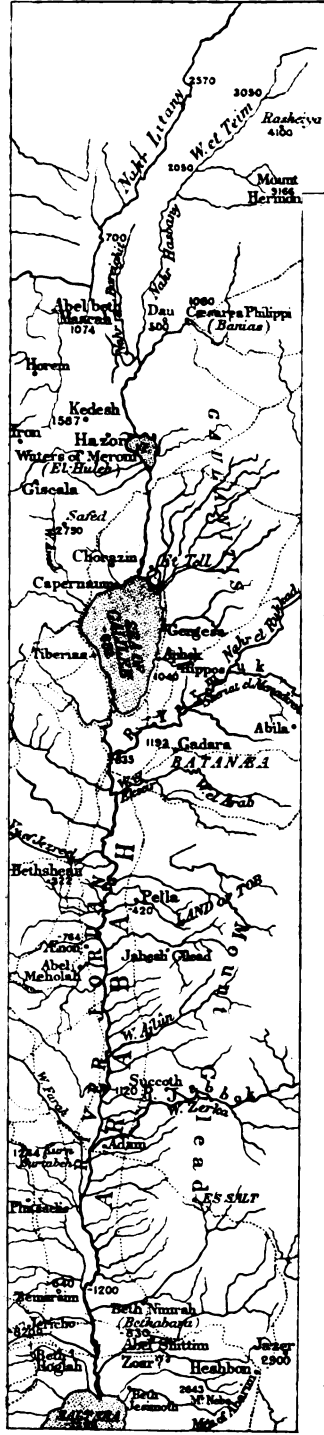

The Jordan, when not in flood, can be forded at more than fifty places between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. In flood-time it is impassable, and at other times, excepting where it is fordable, it is, and always must have been, an obstacle to the passage of large bodies of men (1 Macc. ix. 34–48). The main lines of communication between Eastern and Western Palestine naturally crossed by the easiest fords, and the seizure of these by friend or foe, during the progress of hostilities, was considered of great importance. There were fords over against Jericho, to which point the men of Jericho pursued the spies (Josh. ii. 7); the same probably as those “toward Moab,”* which the Israelites seized after the assassination of Eglon, and at which they slaughtered the Moabites (Judg. iii. 23). These fords are apparently those now known as the Mukhâdet Ghôrâniyeh, immediately opposite Tell es-Sultân, Jericho, and perhaps also the M. Hajlah, where pilgrims bathe in Jordan. Higher up the river, either at the M. ed-Dâmieh or the M. ez-Zakkâmeh, were the fords, A. V. “passages,” of Jordan (Judg. xii. 5, 6), at which the Ephraimites, who could not pronounce the word Shibboleth, were slaughtered by Jephthah and the men of Gilead. Higher up again were the “waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan” (R. V. “as far as Beth-barah, even Jordan”), which the Ephraimites seized before the flying Midianites, and where they seem to have captured Oreb and Zeeb (Judg. vii. 24, 25). As the Midianites fled by Abel-meholah, Ain el-Helweh, these “waters” must have been at the S. end of the plain of Bethshean, and they are possibly the streams running to the river below M. esh-Sherâr. [BETH-BARAH.] Higher still were the fords by which the roads approaching the plain of Bethshean, from the east, crossed the river. It was by one of these that Judas and his followers, having crossed by one of the southern fords (1 Macc. v. 24), passed over Jordan, when they were retracing their steps from the land of Galaad to Jerusalem (1 Macc. v. 52; Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 5); and one of them, M. ‘Abârâh, is supposed by Major Conder to be Bethabara (PEF. Mem. ii. 89). The questions connected with the position of Bethabara are discussed elsewhere [BETH-ABARA]; it need only be observed here that if identical with Beth-barah it must have been near the S. and not the N. end of the plain of Bethshean. Nearer to the Sea of Galilee were other fords, of which the most frequented was that on the road from Accho to the cities of Decapolis.

The first passage of the Jordan, recorded in the O. T., is that of Jacob: “With my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands” (Gen. xxxii. 10). There is no indication of position, but the Patriarch perhaps crossed by the same ford, M. ed-Dâmieh, by which he seems to have entered the land of Canaan after his parting with Esau (Gen. xxxiii. 16–18). David, in his campaign against the Syrians (2 Sam. x. 17), crossed by one of the northern fords; but subsequently, when a fugitive himself, on his way to Mahanaim (xvii. 22), he probably gained the eastern bank by the M. Ghôrâniyeh. Here, “at the fords (A. V. plain) of the wilderness” (xv. 28, xvii. 16), David tarried until he received Zadok’s message from Jerusalem; and hither Judah came to reconduct him home (xix. 15). On this last occasion he passed at or on the “Abara” (v. 18), which the LXX. translates didβαρις (as if it were a moving raft), Josephus (Ant. vii. 11, § 2) γέφυρα (as if it were a bridge), A. V. and R. V. “a ferry boat;” and on reaching the western bank he was met by Shimei (1 K. ii. 8). Somewhere in these parts Elijah must have smitten the waters with his mantle, “so that they divided hither and thither” (2 K. ii. 8), for he had just left Jericho (v. 4), and by the same route that he went did Elisha probably return (r. 14). Naaman, on the other hand, may be supposed to have performed his ablutions (v. 14) at one of the upper fords, for Elisha was then in Samaria (v. 3), and it was by these fords, doubtless, that the Syrians fled when miraculously discomfited through his instrumentality (vii. 15).

One of the earliest facts mentioned in connexion with the Jordan is its periodical overflow during the season of barley harvest. In the language of the author of the Book of Joshua (iii. 15), “Jordan overflowed all his banks all the time of harvest:” a “swelling” which, according to the 1st Book of Chronicles (xii. 15), commenced “in the first month” (i. e. about the latter end of our March), drove the lion from his lair in the days of Jeremiah (xii. 5, xlix. 19, l. 44), and had become a proverb for abundance in the days of Jesus the son of Sirach (Ecclus. xxiv. 26). The context of the first of these passages may suffice to determine the extent of this exuberance. The meaning is clearly that the channel or bed of the river became brimfull, so that the level of the water and of the banks was then the same. The ancient rise of the river has been greatly exaggerated, so much so as to have been compared to that of the Nile (Reland, Palest. xl. 111). Evidently, too, there is nothing extraordinary in this occurrence. All rivers that are fed by melting snows are fuller between March and September than between September and March; but the exact time of their increase varies with the time when the snows melt. The Po and Adige are equally full during their harvest-time with the Jordan; but the snows on Lebanon melt earlier than on the Alps, and harvest begins later in Italy than in the Holy Land. Possibly “the basins of Hûleh and Tiberias” may so far act as “regulators” upon the Jordan as to delay its swelling till they have been replenished. On the other hand, the snows on Lebanon are certainly melting fast in April.

The last feature which remains to be noticed in the Scriptural account of the Jordan is its frequent mention as a boundary (Gen. i. 10; Num. xii. 29, xxxii. 5; Deut. ii. 29, iv. 21; Josh. iii. 1-17, iv. 1-23, xiii. 27; 1 Sam. xiii. 7; 2 Sam. ii. 29; Is. ix. 1; Judith i. 9; Matt. iv. 15, 25, xix. 1; Mark iii. 8, x. 1; John i. 28, iii. 26, x. 40): "over Jordan," "this" and "the other side," or "beyond Jordan," were expressions as familiar to the Israelites as "across the water," "this" and "the other side of the Channel," are to English ears. In one sense indeed—that is, in so far as it was the eastern boundary of the land of Canaan—it was the eastern boundary of the Promised Land (Num. xxiv. 12; cp. xiii. 29). In reality, it was the long serpentine vine, trailing over the ground from N. to S., round which the whole family of the twelve tribes were clustered. Four-fifths of their number—nine tribes and a half—dwelt on the W. of it, and one-fifth, or two tribes and a half, on the E. of it, with the Levites in their cities equally distributed amongst both, and it was theirs from its then reputed fountain-head to its exit into the Dead Sea. Those who lived on the E. of it had been allowed to do so on condition of assisting their brethren in their conquests on the W. (Num. xxxii. 20-33); and those who lived on the W. "went out as one man" when their countrymen on the E. were threatened (1 Sam. xi. 6-11). The great altar built by the children of Reuben, of Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, on the banks of the Jordan, was designed as a witness of this intercommunion and mutual interest (Josh. xxii. 10-29). In fact, unequal as the two sections were, they were nevertheless regarded as integral parts of the whole land; and thus there were three cities of refuge for the manslayer appointed on the E. of the Jordan; and there were three cities, and no more, on the W.—in both cases moreover equidistant one from the other (Num. xxxv. 9-15; Josh. xx. 7-9; Lewis, Heb. Republ. ii. 13). When these territorial divisions had been broken up in the captivities of Israel and Judah, some of the "coasts beyond Jordan" seem to have been retained under Judaea (Matt. xix. 1). [JUDAEA.]

Map of Jordan.

The contact of the Jordan with the history of the people "is exceptional, not ordinary, confined to rare and remote occasions, the more remarkable for their very rarity" (S. and P. p. 287). The earliest instance is that in which Abram and Lot looked down, from the heights between Bethel and Ai, upon the deeply-sunk valley beneath them, and Lot chose for himself the fertile "circle" of Jordan (Gen. xiii. 10, 11) where the Canaanites had established their earliest settlements on the east of Palestine (x. 19). It was apparently in the same rich district, in "the vale of Siddim," that the five allied kings were defeated by Chedorlaomer, king of Elam (xiv. 8-12); and it was at the Sidonian Laish, afterwards the Israelite Dan, by one of the sources of Jordan, that "Abram the Hebrew" defeated the invaders and rescued his nephew Lot (vv. 14-16). A few years later the catastrophe occurred which overwhelmed the five cities of the "circle" [GOMORRAH] and destroyed one of the most flourishing oases of the Jordan valley (xix. 1-29).

The most important events in sacred history connected with the Jordan are the passage of the children of Israel and the Baptism of Christ. The Israelites, on descending from the eastern plateau, encamped, in the first place, "in the plains of Moab, by Jordan," from Beth-Jesimoth, Am Susseimoth, to Abel-Shittim, Keserein (Num. xxxiii. 48, 49); and it was only three days before the passage that they moved down from the upper terraces of the valley to the banks of the river (Josh. iii. 1, 2). They probably crossed the river in several columns at or near the ford Gheraniyeh, opposite Jericho, but the exact spot is unknown. The passage took place at the time of barley harvest, corresponding to our April or May, when Jordan is in a state of flood, "overflowing all his banks"; and the operation must have been one of great magnitude, for—of the children of Reuben and of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh only—"about forty thousand prepared for war passed over before the Lord unto battle" (Josh. iv. 12, 13). The ceremonial of the crossing is too well known to need recapitulation. It may be observed, however, that, unlike the passage of the Red Sea, where the intermediate agency of a strong east wind is freely admitted (Ex. xiv. 21), it is here said, in terms equally explicit, that as soon as "the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brink of the water, . . . the waters which came down from above stood, and rose up in one heap, a great way off, at (or from) Adam . . . and those which went down toward the Sea of the Arabah, even the Salt Sea, were wholly cut off" (Josh. iii. 15, 16, R. V.; cp. Ps. cxiv. 5). As a memorial of the passage twelve stones were set up in the midst of Jordan, and twelve at GILGAL, where the Israelites encamped after they "came up out of" the deep channel of the river. In A.D. 1257, whilst the bridge, Jisr Dâmieh, was being repaired, a somewhat similar stoppage of the waters of the Jordan is said to have occurred. Upon this occasion, a landslip, in the narrow part of the valley, some miles above Jisr Dâmieh (Adam), dammed up the Jordan for several hours, and the bed of the river below was left dry by the running off of the water to the Dead Sea.^f

The place of our Lord's Baptism is uncertain. John, who was a native of a city in the hill-country of Judah (Luke i. 39), commenced preaching in the wilderness of Judaea (Matt. iii. 1; Mark i. 3; Luke iii. 2), and in "all the region round about Jordan" (Luke iii. 3). His preaching drew persons from Galilee, as far off as Nazareth (Mark i. 9) and Bethsaida (John i. 35, 40, 44), as well as from Jerusalem, Judaea, and "all the region round Jordan" (Matt. iii. 5; Mark i. 5); and the preaching was followed by baptism. These baptisms were apparently administered at more places than one. There was the place beyond Jordan, within easy reach of Bethany, "where John was at the first baptizing" (John x. 40), possibly the same as the place "in the wilderness" (Mark i. 4), and as "Bethabara (or Bethany) beyond Jordan," where the Baptist, having previously baptized our Lord—whether there or elsewhere—bears record to the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Him which ensued (John i. 28-34). There was the place on the lower Jordan where all "Jerusalem and Judaea" went out to be baptized of John (Matt. iii. 6; Mark i. 5). There was AENON, near to Salem, where John was baptizing upon another occasion, "because there was much water there" (John iii. 23); and there was some place "in the land of Judaea" where our Lord, or rather His disciples, baptized about the same time (v. 22).

Jesus came from Galilee to be baptized, and His Baptism apparently followed that of the multitude from Jerusalem and Judaea (Matt. iii. 6, 13; Mark i. 5, 9), and was distinct from it (Luke iii. 21). According to St. Matthew (iii. 13; iv. 1), St. Mark (i. 9, 12), and St. Luke (iv. 1), He was baptized in Jordan, and immediately afterwards was "led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil"; John (i. 32-34) only alludes to the Baptism as having already taken place. The inference from the Bible narrative is that Jesus was baptized at the same place as the multitude, and that that spot was not far removed from the wilderness of Judaea, and within easy reach of Jerusalem and all Judaea. This view is supported by tradition, which, from the 4th century onwards, has consistently maintained that Jesus was baptized in Jordan at a point nearly opposite the Roman Jericho. The Bordeaux Pilgrim, A.D. 333, places it, on the east bank of the river, 5 miles from the Dead Sea, and connects it with the little hill whence Elijah was caught up to heaven (Itin. Hieros.). Jerome alludes to the same place (Per. S. Paulae, xv.), and connects it with the spot where the priests that bare the Ark stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan (Josh. iii. 17), and where Elijah and Elisha passed over Jordan on dry ground (2 K. ii. 3). See also Theodosius (xvii., xviii.), Antoninus (ix.-xii.), Arculfus (ii. 14), Willibald (Hod. xvi.), &c. This tradition refers to a place near Kusr el-Yehûd (Monastery of St. John); and as it agrees generally with the indications of the narrative, there seems little reason to doubt its accuracy.^f Bethabara was possibly the same place as BETH-NIMRAH. But if it was a ford, it must have been either M. Ghôrânîyeh, where the Israelites crossed, and where there appears to have been a ferry in David's time (Bethany, "the house of a ship"), or at the S. end of the plain of Bethshean.

II. The Bible contains no information respecting the sources of the Jordan. What Josephus and others say about the Jordan may be briefly told. Panium, says Josephus (i.e. the sanctuary of Pan), appears to be the source of the Jordan; but in reality it has a secret passage hither under ground from Phiala, as it is called, about 120 stadia distant from Caesarea, on the road to Trachonitis, and on the right-hand side of and not far from the road. Being a wheel-shaped pool, it is rightly called Phiala from its roundness (σφαιροειδής); yet the water always remains there up to the brim, neither subsiding nor overflowing. That this is the true source of the Jordan was first discovered by Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis; for by his orders chaff was cast into the water at Phiala, and it was taken up at Panium. Panium was always a lovely spot; but the embellishments of Agrippa, which were sumptuous, added greatly to its natural charms (from B. J. i. 21, § 3, and Ant. xv. 10, § 3, it appears that the temple there was due to Herod the Great). It is from this cave at all events that the Jordan commences its ostensible course above ground; traversing the marshes and fens of Semechonitis ("the waters of Merom," Bahiret el-Hûleh), and then, after a course of 120 stadia, passing by the town Julius and intersecting the lake of Genesareth, winds its way through a considerable wilderness (τολλὰν ἐρημίας) till it finds its exit in the lake Asphaltites (B. J. iii. 10, § 7). Elsewhere Josephus somewhat modifies his assertion respecting the nature of the great plain [JERICHO]; while on the physical beauties of Genesareth, the palms and figs, olives and grapes, that flourished round it, and the fish for which its waters were famed, he is still more eloquent (B. J. iii. 10, § 8). In the first chapter of the next book (iv. 1, § 1) he notices more fountains, at a place called Daphne,^b which supplied water to the little Jordan, under the temple of the golden calf, and ran into the great Jordan (cp. Ant. i. 10, § 1; v. 3, § 1; and viii. 8, § 4). While Josephus dilates upon its sources, Pausanias, who had visited the Jordan, dilates upon its extraordinary disappearance. He cannot get over its losing itself in the Dead Sea; and compares it to the submarine course of the Alpheus from Greece to Sicily (lib. v. 7, 4, ed. Dindorf). Pliny goes so far as to say that the Jordan instinctively shrinks from entering that dread lake, by which it is swallowed up. On the other hand, Pliny attributes its rise to the fountain of Paneas, from which he adds Caesarea was surnamed (H. N. v. 15). Lastly, Strabo speaks of the aromatic reeds and rushes, and even balsam, that grew on the shores and marshes round Genesareth; but can he be believed when he asserts that the Arabians and others were in the habit of sailing up Jordan with cargo? (xvi. 2, 16.) It will be remembered that he wrote during the first days of the empire, when there were boats in abundance upon Genesareth (John vi. 22-24).

^f A notice of this historical stoppage of the Jordan has been found, in the history of Sultan Bibars, by M. Clermont-Ganneau, who has communicated the above particulars to the writer.

^f Possibly the place of Baptism was a little higher up the river, at the Ghôrânîyeh ford, and in this case the same spot witnessed the Baptism of Christ and the passage of the Israelites.

In the Middle Ages the Jordan was supposed to have two sources, Jor and Dan, which issued from the foot of Libanus, and united at the base of the mountains of Gilboa. Jor was the river running down the valley from Bániás, and Dan was identified with the Yarmuk, and supposed to run underground to a place called Medan, apparently el-Mezeirib in the Haurán (John of Würzburg, xxv.; Theoderich, xlv.). The first attempt to explore the Jordan, in modern times, was made in 1835, by Mr. Costigan, who descended the river in a boat from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea and died on his return to Jerusalem. In 1846 Lieut. Molyneux, R.N., made the descent, and wrote a short account of his voyage, but died soon after rejoining his ship (Journ. R. Geog. Soc. xviii. pp. 104-130, 1848); in 1848 Lieut. Lynch, U.S.N., under the authority of the United States Government, made a complete survey of the river and the Dead Sea (Narrative and Official Report); and in 1872-78 the course of the river from Bániás to the Dead Sea and the valley lying to the west of it were surveyed by Lieuts. Conder and Kitchener, R.E., for the Palestine Exploration Fund (PEF. Memoirs).

III. The Jordan flows from north to south in the deep trough, or fissure, parallel to the Mediterranean, which extends from the foot of the Taurus mountains to the Red Sea, and divides, as if by a fosse, the maritime highlands from those further east. In the northern and higher portion of the trough are the rivers Orontes and Leontes; in the central and more depressed is the Jordan, which pours its waters into the Dead Sea, 1292 feet below the Mediterranean, and lies for more than three-fourths of its course, including lakes Háleh and Tiberias, below the level of the sea; and in the southern are the W. el-'Arabah and W. el-'Akabah, the Gulf of 'Akabah, and the Red Sea. The entire fissure from the Sea of Galilee to the Gulf of 'Akabah is called in the Bible "the Arabah" (A. V. "the plain"); but at present that portion only which lies S. of the Dead Sea is called the 'Arabah. The valley to the N., a broad depressed plain, shut in between two ranges of mountains,—the Aulon (Αὐλὼν) of the Greeks,—is known amongst the Arabs by the name of el-Ghor.

The Jordan, after the junction of its head streams, expands into the Baheiret el-Háleh. Then, "after rushing down a rocky chasm for several miles, it again spreads out into the Lake of Tiberias." From this lake, until it enters the Dead Sea, the Jordan "flows in its own well-defined and still deeper valley, winding through the plain of the Ghór. Along and within this deeper valley (called by the Arabs the Zór), the channel of the river winds exceedingly, and is in most parts fringed by a narrow tract of verdure on each side, made up of trees, bushes, reeds, and luxuriant herbage" (Robinson, Phys. Geog. of the H. L. p. 131).

The theory that the Jordan at one time ran to the Gulf of 'Akabah, and that the depression of its valley and the interruption of its flow were due to intense volcanic activity, has been entirely disproved by recent investigation. The deep depression is the direct result of a fault or "fissure" of the earth's crust, accompanied by a displacement of the strata, to the extent in some cases of several thousand feet. "I am disposed to think," Prof. Hull writes, "that the fracture of the Jordan-Arabah valley and the elevation of the table-land of Edom and Moab on the east were all the outcome of simultaneous operations and due to similar causes, namely, the tangential pressure of the earth's crust due to contraction,—the contraction being in its turn due to the secular cooling of the crust." The fracture is supposed to have taken place at the close of the Eocene period. "As the land area was gradually rising out of the sea, the table-lands of Judaea and of Arabia were more and more elevated, while the crust fell in along the western side of the Jordan-Arabah fault; and this seems to have been accompanied by much crumpling and fissuring of the strata" (PEF. Mem., Geology, p. 108 sq.). From the time of this great fracture the basin of the Dead Sea must have been a salt lake dependent on evaporation to remove the waters poured into it by the Jordan and other streams. The level of its waters must, however, have varied greatly at different times, for a succession of terraces of Dead Sea deposits extends around the basin of the sea and far up the Jordan valley (Dawson, Egypt and Syria, pp. 106, 107; see also Lartet, Géologie de la Palestine, and Hull, l. c.). The waters of the Dead Sea are supposed to have reached their present level at the close of the Miocene or commencement of the Pliocene period (Hull, Geology, p. 112), so that there cannot have been any material change in the course and character of the Jordan during historic times.

The Upper Jordan is formed by the junction of three perennial streams having their origin in three large springs, near Hábsiyá, at Tell el- Kâdy, and at Bâniâs. The streams are fed by numberless springs and rivulets that gush forth from the slopes of Anti-Lebanon, but none of these are of sufficient importance to be regarded as permanent sources of the Jordan. The stream from the spring near Hâsbeiya (1700 feet), which, though not mentioned by any ancient writer, is the remotest source, runs down through the ravine of W. el-Teim, and is known as the Nahr Hâsbâny. About 6 miles below Hâsbeiya, the Hâsbâny is joined by a fine stream from 'Ain Seraiyib, a large fountain at the foot of Hermon; and, after a rapid descent, it enters the Hûleh plain, running in a deep channel that it has worn for itself in the basalt. After receiving the waters of the Nahr Bareighit, it joins the united streams from Bâniâs and Tell el-Kâdy. The road from Damascus, through Bâniâs, to the west crosses the river by a bridge below Ghujar.

At Tell el-Kâdy, DAN, one of the largest springs in Palestine, bursts forth from the ground (altitude 505 feet); and its waters rush off a full-grown river, the Nahr Leddân, to join the stream from Bâniâs and form the Jordan. This is clearly the Daphne of Josephus (B. J. iv. 1, § 1), who also calls the spring Dan (Ant. i. 10, § 1), and the stream $\delta \mu\kappa\rho\varsigma \tau\omicron\rho\delta\alpha\rho\upsilon\varsigma$ (viii. 8, § 4).

The spring at Bâniâs is the most picturesque and celebrated of all the sources of Jordan [CAESAREA PHILIPPI]. It is a copious fountain (altitude 1080 feet) springing out from the earth, in numberless rills, at the foot of a mass of loose stones and rubbish, in front of a cave formerly dedicated to Pan—the place called Panium by Josephus. The spring, apparently, once issued from the cave, which is now dry; but not at all in the manner described by Josephus, who speaks of a yawning chasm in the cave itself, and an unfathomable depth of still water of which there is no trace at present (Ant. xv. 10, § 3; B. J. i. 21, § 3). The little lake Phiala, which according to Josephus was the true source of the fountain at Bâniâs, is now called Birket er-Râm. It lies at the bottom of a cup-shaped basin, is supplied by the surface drainage of a small area, and has no outlet. The water is stagnant and impure, and, if it had a subterranean outlet, would be exhausted in a few hours. The topographical features also forbid any connexion with the spring at Bâniâs. The stream from the spring is joined by another, coming down W. Za'âreh, at the N.W. corner of Bâniâs, and the united waters flow off as the Nahr Bâniâs to the Hûleh plain. In the first four miles of its course the stream descends at the rate of 200 feet a mile, and its volume is nearly equal to that of the Nahr Leddân, which it joins about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Tell el-Kâdy; half a mile lower down the river is joined by the Nahr Hâsbâny.

The Hûleh plain through which the Jordan runs is covered by a very intricate system of streams, some running in their natural channels, others in artificial aqueducts, used for irrigating the very fertile but malarious plain. A short distance below the junction of the Hâsbâny the river enters a dense impenetrable mass of papyrus, which extends for 6 miles and is from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 miles wide. Below the papyrus marsh are the "Waters of Merom," Baheiret el-Hûleh

(alt. 7 feet), bordered by the great plain of Arâ el-Kheit. On issuing from the lake, the Jordan flows through a narrow cultivated plain, but about 2 miles below its exit it commences a rapid descent, of about 60 feet a mile, over a rocky bed to the Sea of Galilee. The direct distance between the two lakes is 10 miles, and the fall 689 feet. Not quite 2 miles below Lake Hûleh there is a bridge called Jisr Benat Y'akûb, by which the great caravan route from 'Akka to Damascus crosses the river. Below et-Tell the Jordan runs in a tortuous course through the western half of the plain el-Batthah, and at its mouth there is a bar where it can be forded. Its turbid waters can be traced running far out into the lake, and this has, perhaps, given rise to the fable that the Jordan passed through the Sea of Galilee without mingling its waters. That the waters of the river do not condescend to mingle in any sense with those of the lake, is as true as that the Rhone and the Lake of Geneva never embrace. [GENNESARET, SEA OF.] The river leaves the lake, a clear gently-flowing stream, close to the site of Tarichææ.

The two principal features of Jordan are its descent and its sinuosity. From its fountain-heads to the point where it is lost in the acrid waters of the Dead Sea, it rushes down one continuous inclined plane, only broken by a series of rapids or precipitous falls. Between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, Lieut. Lynch passed down 27 rapids which he calls threatening, besides a great many more of lesser magnitude. According to the most recent surveys the distance between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, in a direct line, is 65 miles; the depression of the former below the level of the Mediterranean is 682 feet, and that of the latter 1292 feet. The difference of level between the two lakes is thus 610 feet, and there is a fall of 9.3 feet per mile. The sinuosity of the Jordan is not so remarkable in the upper part of its course, but, in the space of 65 miles between the two lakes, it "traverses at least 200 miles" (Lynch, Narr. p. 265). "It curved and twisted north, south, east, and west, turning, in the short space of half an hour, to every quarter of the compass" (p. 211). During the whole passage of $8\frac{1}{2}$ days, the time which it took Lynch's boats to reach the Dead Sea from Gennesaret, only one straight reach of any length, about midway between them, is noticed. The rate of stream seems to have varied with its relative width and depth. The greatest width mentioned was 180 yards, the point where it enters the Dead Sea. Here it was only 3 feet deep. On the 6th day the width in one place was 80 yards, and the depth only 2 feet, while the current on the whole varied from 2 to 8 knots. On the 5th day the width was 70 yards, with a current of 2 knots, or 30 yards with a current of 6 knots.

The principal tributaries of Jordan between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea are: (1) From the East. The Sher'at el-Mandhûr, Yarmûk, or Hieromax, which enters the Jordan about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles below the lake. There is no allusion to this river in the Bible, but it is mentioned in the Mishna (Parah, viii. 9) and by Pliny (H. N. v. 16). It is formed by the confluence of a large number of streams which rise in Jebel Haurân and the eastern plateau, and amongst these is doubtless the "brook by Raphon" (1 Macc. v. 37, 39, 40, 42). About 2½ miles before it reaches the Jordan Valley the Yarmūk receives the waters of the celebrated hot springs of Amatha. [GADARA.] The Nahr ez-Zerka, Jabbok, which rises in the plateau E. of Gilead, and enters the Jordan a short distance above Jisr Dâmieh. [ADAM; JABOK.] The Wady Nimrin and the W. Hesbân. (2.) From the West. The Nahr el-Jâlid, which flows down the valley of Jezreel, and, past Bethshean, to the Ghôr. The beautiful W. Fârâh, which rises on the eastern slopes of Ebal and enters the Jordan 4½ miles below Jisr Dâmieh. The streams in W. Fusûl and W. el-Kelt do not reach the Jordan in summer.

The bridges over the Jordan mark the points at which the Roman roads crossed the river. Most, if not all of them, appear to have been constructed during the Roman occupation, and to have been afterwards rebuilt or repaired by the Arabs. They are all on important lines of communication, and not far from frequented fords. The bridges of el-Ghujar and Bemat Y'akûb above the Sea of Galilee have already been noticed. At Tarichææ, where the river leaves the lake, there are the ruins of a bridge, and, a little lower down, there are the remains of two others, one called Jisr es-Sidd, over which passed the roads connecting Tiberias, and 'Akka with Gadara and the Decapolis. The next bridge, nearly 6 miles below the lake, is Jisr Mujâm'a, which is still passable. It marks the point at which the great caravan-route from Nâblus and Beisân to Damascus crosses the river—a route following the line of one of the most important Roman roads in Palestine. The only other bridge is the Jisr Dâmieh, nearly opposite the mouth of W. Fârâh, which, from a change in the course of the river, has been left dry on the east bank. At this point the great road from Neapolis and the West, to Gilead and Bashan, crossed the river; and at the present day there is a road by the ed-Dâmieh ford, from Nâblus to es-Salt and J. 'Ajlûn.

Much information respecting the fords of Jordan was obtained during the survey of Western Palestine. It would appear (PEF. Mem. ii. 79, 225, 385; iii. 170) that there are fifty fords in the 42 miles above Jisr Dâmieh, and only five in the 23 miles below. No less than twenty-six of the fords are between W. el-Jâlid and W. el-Mâleh, which mark the north and south limits of the plain of Bethshean; and this serves to explain the ease with which the nomads east of Jordan made their frequent incursions into the valley of Jezreel and the plain of Esdraelon. The principal fords and their possible identification with those mentioned in the Bible have already been noticed. At M. el-Hajlah, opposite Roman Jericho, the annual bathing of the Oriental pilgrims takes place, of which Dean Stanley has given a lively description (S. & P. pp. 314–16).

The Jordan Valley varies considerably in width. About 7 miles above Jisr Dâmieh, its narrowest point, it is only some 3 miles wide; whilst its greatest breadth, 12 miles, is at Jericho. The Zôr, or depressed bed, in which the river winds, is in most parts a quarter of a mile wide, but above the Dead Sea it opens out to nearly 2 miles. It lies between "cliffs of soft marl," from 50 ft. to 100 ft. high,¹ and is frequently flooded during the rainy season. The plain of the Ghôr falls pretty evenly towards the river; it is much cut up by the torrents that find their way across it from the mountains on either side.

The sites of the cities situated in the Ghôr are discussed under their respective names, and the physical features of the Jordan Valley will be treated more at large under the general head of Palestine. The climate on the shores of the Sea of Galilee is sub-tropical, and the temperature increases until the maximum is reached on the shores of the Dead Sea. Here frost is unknown; in the depth of winter the thermometer ranges from 60° to 80°, and a night temperature of 49° is quite exceptional. In April the thermometer often registers 105° in the shade; and in summer the heat is intense. In this tropical climate the corn is ripe in March, and melons ripen in winter. The natural products of the Jordan Valley, "a tropical oasis sunk in the temperate zone, and overhung by the Alpine Hermon," are unique. The course of the river, in this most unlike the Nile, hardly fertilises anything beyond its immediate banks. But, "from its extraordinary depression, whatever vegetation there is, is called into almost unnatural vigour by the life-giving touch of its waters" (Tristram, Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 11). In the Hûleh marshes the papyrus reaches a height of 16 ft. and flourishes luxuriantly, and on the borders of the Hûleh lake large crops of wheat, barley, maize, sesame, and rice are obtained. Corn-fields wave on the plain of Gennesaret; the palm and vine, fig and pomegranate, are still to be seen here and there; and here is also found the thorny muk (Zizyphus spina-Christi), a tropical tree, the characteristic of the whole of the lower course of the river. Below the Sea of Galilee indigo is grown; pink oleanders, and a rose-coloured species of hollyhock in great profusion, wait upon every approach to a rill or spring; and tamarisks of peculiar species crowd the banks of Jordan. As the Dead Sea is approached "the zukkum or false balm of Gilead, the ocher tree of Nubia and Abyssinia, the henna or camphire, the Salvadora persica, and many other products of the torrid zone, abound" (p. 12). The jungle of the Zôr is the same throughout, consisting principally of tamariska, scacia, willow, gigantic thistles 10 to 15 ft. high, and reeds; whilst cane, frequently impenetrable, is ever at the water's edge. "Here and there," Lynch writes, "were spots of solemn beauty. . . . The willow branches were spread upon the stream-like tresses, and creeping mosses and clambering weeds, with a multitude of white and silvery little flowers, looked out from among them. . . . Many islands, some fairy-like and covered with a luxuriant vegetation, others mere sandbars and sedimentary deposits, intercepted the course of the river, but were beautiful features in the general monotony of the shores. The regular and almost unvaried scene of high banks of alluvial deposit and sand-hills on the one hand, and the low swamp-like shore covered to the water's edge with the tamarisk, the willow, and the thick, high cane, would have been fatiguing without the frequent occurrence of sand-banks and verdant islands" (Narr. pp. 211-215). This thick jungle was formerly a covert for wild beasts, from which they were dislodged by the periodical overflow of the river, and the lion coming up from the "pride of Jordan" is a familiar figure in the Prophet Jeremiah (xlix. 19; l. 44). The lion, though mentioned by Phocas (xxiii.) and by Felix Fabri (ii. p. 27, Eng. trans.), has probably long been extinct. The leopard, however, still exists, and it was apparently two of these animals that Molyneux mistook for tigers. The fishes of the Jordan and its feeders do not differ from those of the Sea of Galilee. They are chiefly barbel and bream, and in every permanent stream abound in amazing numbers. The Jordan itself is alive with fish to its very exit. The flora and fauna of the Jordan Valley, and the large infusion of Ethiopian types that they present, have been described by Canon Tristram (P.E.F. Mem. Flora and Fauna of Pal.), who considers that "the unique tropical outlier of the Dead Sea basin is analogous, both in its origin and in the present isolation of its various assemblages of life, to the boreal outliers of our mountain-tops, and our deep-sea bottoms." JORIBUS (Ἰορίβος; Joribus) = JARIB (1 Est. ix. 19; cp. Ezra x. 18).

JORIM (Ἰορίμ), son of Matthat, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 29), in the 13th generation from David inclusive; about contemporary, therefore, with Ahaz. The form of the name is anomalous, and should probably be either Joram or Jojarim. [A. C. H.]

JORKOAM (Ἰορκάμ); B. Ἰακλάν and Ἰεκλάν; A. Ἰερκαδύ; Jercam, either a descendant of Caleb the son of Hexron, through Hebron, or, as Jarchi says, the name of a place in the tribe of Judah, of which Raham was prince (1 Ch. ii. 44). It was probably in the neighbourhood of Hebron. Jerome gives it in the form Jercaam (Quaest. Hebr. in Paral.).

JOSABAD. 1. (Ἰοσαβὰδ); B. Ἰωσαβὰδ; A. Ἰωσαβὰδ; Jozabad. Properly JOZABAD, the Gederathite, one of the hardy warriors of Benjamin who left Saul to follow the fortunes of David during his residence among the Philistines at Ziklag (1 Ch. xii. 4).

2. (B. Ἰωσαβέας, A. Ἰωσαβδός; Josadus) = Jozabad, son of Jeshua the Levite (1 Est. viii. 63; cp. Ezra viii. 33, BA. Ἰωσαβὰδ).

3. (B. Ζάββος, A. Ὠζάβδος; Zabdius), one of the sons of Bebai (1 Est. ix. 29). [ZABBAI.]

JOSEDEC (Ἰωσεδέκ; Josedec, Josedech), 1 Est. v. 5, 48, 56, vi. 2, ix. 19; Eccclus. xlix.

12 = JEHOZADAK or JOZADAK, the father of Jeshua, whose name also appears as JOSEDECH (Hag. i. 1).

JOSEDECH (Ἰωσεδέκ; Jehovah is righteous; Ἰωσεδέκ; Josedec). JEHOZADAK the son of Seraiah (Hag. i. 12, 14, ii. 2, 4; Zech. vi. 11).

JOSEPH (Ἰωσήφ; Joseph). 1. Son of Jacob and Rachel. The meaning of the name Joseph, according to Gen. xxx. 23, 24, is connected with his family history.^a Joseph became the favourite son of his father, being the youngest of all the sons of Israel born in Mesopotamia, the gift late in life from the wife whom Jacob loved the best. "Son of his old age" and "favourite son" were names given also to Benjamin after the loss of Joseph. Joseph was not only "a child of sorrow," but he became finally the deliverer and the pride of his whole family, and one of the most important personages in the history of Israel; because it was through him that the Hebrews went down into Egypt, where it was decreed that they should become "a great nation."

It is easy to grasp the deeper meaning underlying the story, which teaches plainly how God leads those whom He has ordained to higher spheres through trouble and humiliation, that He may raise them so much the higher afterwards. In Christian times Joseph has been regarded as a type of our Saviour, or as one whose character is in many respects related to His, so that the one has been compared with the other. Luther says, "As it was with Joseph and his brethren, so it was with Christ and the Jews."

The history of Joseph in the Book of Genesis was compiled from two different documents, now indicated by Biblical scholars as J and E. They are classified in the art. GENESIS, p. 1155.

The story (Gen. xxx. 22-24) of the birth of Joseph, as well as that of his life and death (Gen. xxxvii.-l.), is known to everyone. It became a favourite subject in Eastern poetry. Allah himself (Koran, ch. 12) is said to relate the history of Joseph to the prophet Mohammed as the "most beautiful of all stories." The story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife (Zuleikha) has particularly excited the imitation of Eastern poets. The poem of Yusuf and Zuleikha is the last song of the Persian epic poet Firdusi, and the figure of Joseph is surrounded here with so much mysterious splendour that many have supposed that Zuleikha's love for the pure youth Yusuf (Joseph), the poet wished to represent the longing of the soul for God. Though, as a whole, the history of Joseph is easily understood, yet it may be interesting to show how faithfully it represents the circumstances of time and place in which it occurred. We shall establish this in detail, but we must first point out at what period the entrance of Jacob's family into Egypt took place. Ex. xii. 40 gives 430 years as the time of sojourn of the Hebrews in Egypt. This compels us to place the Exodus in the reign of Menephtah I., the son of Rameses II., at the close of the 14th century B.C. If we then reckon back 430 years, it brings us to the end of the Hyksos government over Egypt; that is, if we may trust to the time given on the monuments as to the length of the different reigns. If, with Lepsius, we place the Exodus in 1314 B.C., the entrance of the Hebrews into Goshen will be in 1744 B.C., which year belongs to the close of the Hyksos government, and we reach the same conclusion if we take the figures lately arrived at by Malher's astronomical calculations, which place the reign of Thothmes III. from March 20th, 1503, to Feb. 14th, 1449.

^a A double etymology is suggested in this passage. According to E (v. 23) the name is from Ἰωσῆ, asaph, "to take away"; according to J (v. 24), it is from Ἰωσῆ, ydsaph, "to add." The name has been compared with Manetho's Osear-sif, as though Jo, Jeho-, i.e. Jehovah, had been substituted for Osear, i.e. Oesira. I-s-p-a-l occurs in the Karnak lists, and has been supposed equivalent to Joseph-el (Ἰωσῆ-Ἰωσῆ). It is the name of an old Canaanite town taken by Tutmes III. Cp. the similar Joseph-iah, Ezra viii. 10.—[C. J. B.]

Dr. Brugsch (Egypt under the Pharaohs, i. 302, 2nd ed., P. Smith) endeavours to make the famine mentioned in the tomb of a dignitary named Baba, at El Kab, coincide with the one which Joseph so effectually opposed, and the time of Baba's life actually concurs with that of the dominion of the later Hyksos kings over Lower Egypt, while the native kings who had been forced back into Upper Egypt were making preparations to drive the Hyksos out of the country. The coincidence is not impossible, yet a similar "time of distress" is also mentioned at Beni Hasan in the tomb of Ameni, who lived before the time of the Hyksos (12th dynasty), and we know from the later history of the country that inundations either too low or too high have often occasioned want and distress in Egypt. It is true that the famine mentioned in the tomb of Baba lasted "many years," and such a long period of distress occurs only in the history of Joseph and in this inscription; it is therefore tempting to consider them identical, but investigators must be careful not to speak of that as certain, which is only possible or probable. It is not certain which Hyksos king was ruling in the Valley of the Nile at the time of the famine mentioned in the tomb of Baba. According to most chronographers, it was Apophis (Josephus), Aphobis (Jul. Africanus), Apophis (Eusebius), and in hieroglyphics, Apepa—the same under whom began the expulsion of the Hyksos, according to a fabulous story contained in the Papyrus Sallier I., which says that this Apophis was in alliance with the native governor of Upper Egypt, Rasekenen or Sekenen-Ra; and the dignitary Baba, in whose tomb is the inscription mentioning the famine of many years, lived in the time of a Rasekenen, and, indeed, the third with the additional name Ta'a. The Byzantine chronographer who is known under the name of Syncellus (he held the office of Syncellus in his monastery) calls the Pharaoh of Joseph Apophis, while the Arab tradition, in which little or no reliance can be placed, calls him an Amalekite of the name of Raian Ibn el-Walid. We should not have mentioned him at all if Naville, under the auspices of the Egypt Exploration Fund, had not found in his excavations at Bubastis a block with the name of Apophis, and near it the lower part of a black granite statue with the name Ian-Ra, or Raian, in hieroglyphics. Dr. Rieu and Mr. Cope Whitehouse, relying on the certainly very surprising discovery of this name, maintain that the Arab tradition was founded on a fact. The monument with the name of Raian is now in the Ghizeh Museum. We must therefore leave it uncertain whether Joseph came down into Egypt in the reign of Apophis, or in that of the hitherto unknown Raian.

Let us now inquire where the son of Jacob met with Pharaoh. The answer seems to be at Zoan (Tanis), at Bubastis, or at Memphis. The first of these three towns [ZOAN] is situated in the north-east of the Delta, and is very old, as is proved by Petrie's excavations and the words of the Bible (Num. xiii. 22), where it is said to have been built seven years later than Hebron. Tanis was a residence of the Hyksos kings, and here Mariette found the monuments called the "Hyksos sphinxes." Like those placed by the native Egyptian kings in avenues before the temples, these sphinxes are formed of the human head, symbolic of intelligence, and the lion's body, symbolic of strength. While, however, the sphinxes of other Pharaohs possess heads of true Egyptian cast, those of the Hyksos sphinxes appear to be portraits of a foreign race. The faces are wider and have higher cheek-bones; the noses, which in profile seem to be slightly curved, are flatter, and the corners of the mouth are turned a little downwards. The face seems to disappear in a head-dress resembling a mane; the expression of the features, taken as a whole, is much rougher and more brutal than that of the true Egyptian face, which meets the eyes of the spectator with a quiet peaceful dignity, and often with a smile. Even these unfamiliar with Egyptian art can see at a glance that we have here striking likenesses of foreigners; and the same is true of other monuments which have been found belonging to the Hyksos period. These have been found only in the Delta, and isolated instances in the oasis of the Fayam, which stretches into the desert in a westerly direction from Memphis. Most come from Tanis, though latterly many have been found by Naville at Bubastis, the Pibeseth of the Bible. Tanis is the Zoan of the Bible, the Egyptian ῥα or ῥα, called Tanis by the Greeks and Romans. This splendid residence of the Hyksos and of other dynasties of Egyptian kings, the city called "great" by Strabo and Stephanus of Byzantium, is now a fishing village, and nothing remains of its early glory except fragments of obelisks, statues and great temple buildings, and the name, which has become amongst the Arabs San, or San el-Hagr. Tanis was in the fourteenth nome of Lower Egypt, on the branch of the river called by the same name, which in early times was wide enough near its mouth for naval battles to be fought on its waters, as seems to be proved by the inscription in the tomb of the naval commander Ahmes at El Kab. The plain now is only intersected by a narrow little stream, called by the Arabs the Muzk canal. Tanis, which was formerly a harbour for ships, is now separated from the sea by a large deposit of land, and little is to be seen of the wonderful fertility for which the neighbourhood was famous in old times. The Hyksos kings as well as the Pharaohs who preceded and followed them provided for the irrigation of the province of Zoan, and the officers who were stationed at Tanis under the Pharaoh of the Exodus (19th dynasty) speak in their letters of the life there as "sweet," and praise the neighbourhood for its fertility and for the abundance of food it produced. Whether the fortified camp of the Hyksos, called Avaris by the Greeks, was at Tanis or at Pelusium, we cannot here determine. Anyhow, Zoan (Tanis) was one of the residences of the Hyksos kings, and may have been the town which gave a friendly reception to Joseph. The same may be said of Bubastis and of Memphis, for On (Heliopolis), which lay close to the latter town, certainly belonged to the Hyksos; and as a daughter of a priest of On was chosen by Pharaoh to be Joseph's wife, we can easily imagine that he was residing at Memphis at the time, close to the home of this daughter of the priests, instead of at Tanis, which was divided from On (Heliopolis) by a wide stretch of country. Yet it is curious that the pyramids, so characteristic of Memphis, are never once mentioned in the story of Joseph.

The Biblical history of Joseph gives us the conditions of court and state life in Egypt. It seems true that this was very much the same under the Hyksos kings as under the native Pharaohs. Joseph could only have come into Egypt during the latter part of the rule of the foreigners, after they had lived some centuries in the country and conformed to the Egyptian life in every respect. To which nation the intruders belonged is discussed under EGYPT, p. 885, where it is shown that they probably came from Mesopotamia. At first their rule in Egypt must have been very severe, though they may not have been guilty of the devastations with which the hatred of the Egyptians charged them in later times; for in many towns where they ruled, we find that the monuments of their predecessors have been spared,—a considerable number from Tanis, Bubastis, Memphis, Heliopolis, &c., having come down to us. Later the conquerors assimilated themselves so entirely with the conquered Egyptians that they erected monuments of pure Egyptian style, and allowed the priestly scholars to go on with their studies. The handbook of Egyptian mathematics called the Rhind Papyrus (British Museum) was written under a Hyksos king, and the monuments prove that Egyptian civilisation was very little influenced by the Hyksos; for those erected shortly before their time (12th–13th dynasties) correspond in every way with those erected soon after their expulsion in the beginning of the 18th dynasty, the pure Hyksos being the 15th and 16th dynasties. The Hyksos also used the hieroglyphic writing without alteration; and as they retained everything in the higher intellectual spheres, it is probable that they did the same in the lower domains of material life. There were native kings in Upper Egypt at the same time, and it would have been strange if their courts and household arrangements had been essentially different in arrangement. The foreigners were obliged to allow the native officials free scope and to learn much from them, specially with regard to the irrigation of the Nile, without which the fertile valley would have become a wilderness. Joseph therefore found everything arranged in the Egyptian manner at the court of the Hyksos king, whose favour he had won.

We now pass to the details which need explanation in the history of Joseph. In Gen. xxxvii. we have, as some think, two stories woven together, relating how Jacob preferred Joseph above his brothers, and so excited the envy of the latter.^b Ch. xxxvii. 5, &c., shows how their dislike changed to hatred on account of Joseph's dreams, and how, after their father had sent the "dreamer" after them, they resolved to murder him, but on Reuben's advice (xxxvii. 22) they only took the coloured coat off him, and threw him into a pit. This coat was, according to Josephus (Ant. vii. 8, § 1), one with sleeves worn only by distinguished and elderly persons. We can see what is here meant by a picture with the colours well preserved in Khnum-hotep's tomb at Beni Hasan, of the 12th dynasty (before the Hyksos' time); it represents the coming of thirty-seven Amu (Shemites) into Egypt. The less important people in this procession wear only white sleeveless coats, like shirts, which reach just over the knee; or when the upper part of the body is bare, a coloured apron like a short petticoat, fastened above the hips and only covering the thighs. The dress of Joseph's brothers was probably of this kind. The chief in this picture, the earliest representation of a Semitic family, walks in front of his own people; he is called Abouha (or Abousa) and wears a coat made of brightly-coloured stuff (blue, white, and red) which entirely covers the upper part of his body, and reaches to his knees. The right arm is bare, but the left is covered by a wide sleeve as far as the elbow. Joseph's coloured coat probably resembled the dress of this chief.^c The pit into which the brothers threw Joseph was situated near Dothain or Dothan (double well). The position of this place is described under DOTHAN. It must have been peculiarly interesting for Dr. E. D. Clarke (Travels, ed. 1812, Pt. ii. § 1, p. 509) just at this spot to meet a caravan of Ishmaelitic spice merchants, who would willingly have bought another Joseph and carried him with them into Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 28). These Ishmaelites are here more specifically Midianites.^d That they were in alliance with ^b From Jacob's expression "thy mother" (xxxvii. 10) it might be inferred that Rachel was living (and therefore Benjamin unborn) about the time that Joseph was sold. If she was dead, as the continuity of the narrative would suggest (xxxv. 19), "mother" would be used in a laxer sense, meaning mother of the house, Jacob's wife Leah, and this may be the best way of understanding the passage (cp. Speaker's Comm. on xxxvii. 10).—EDITORS.

^c Another opinion given by Dr. Poole in the first edition is that this coat was a long tunic with sleeves worn by youths and maidens of the richer class. Its name (כִּתְיֹתָא בְּרִיָּתָא) seems to signify "a tunic reaching to the extremities." The dress of David's daughter Tamar, and of "the king's daughters that were virgins," bears the same name in the Hebrew, rendered in A. V. "garment of divers colours" (2 Sam. xiii. 18, 19). There seems no reason for the LXX. rendering χιτων ποικίλος, or the Vulgate polymita, except that it is very likely that such a tunic would be ornamented with coloured stripes or embroidered. Of the dress described in the text there is an engraving in Brugsch's Histoire d'Égypte des premiers temps, ed. 1859, p. 63. For authorities on the nature of the dress, see Speaker's Comm. on Gen. xxxvii. 3, where the view given in the text is preferred.—EDITORS.

^d That the two names are used interchangeably seems clear from this passage; it must therefore be supposed

Egypt at the time of the Hyksos (having been previously at war) is proved by the inscriptions lately discovered by Glaser in Arabia, and by Hömel's interpretation of those which relate to Egypt.

The chief articles of trade which the Ishmaelitic and Midianitic merchants brought to Egypt in the time of the Pharaohs, were spices of different kinds, metal work, glass beads, certain woven stuffs, chariots, semi-precious stones such as lapis-lazuli and malachite, and above all slaves. Throughout the whole time of the Khalifs slaves were the chief article of trade with the caravans that came from Asia, and down to the present time many white slave-girls are brought to Egypt by Syrian traders. We learn from several texts that slaves were brought from Asia under the 12th dynasty (before the arrival of the Hyksos). A very high price was always paid for fine youths. For certain particularly noble and well-formed Circassian boys under the Mamluk Sultans, much more was paid than for a fine horse. The Midianitic traders, into whose hands Joseph fell when he was seventeen years of age, would be able to make great profit out of him, for the twenty shekels of silver (SHEKEL) which they paid for him was a very low price even at that time. Slaves were needed in all great houses; and the names of a few which have come down to us from the time of the Pharaoh of the Exodus, prove certainly their Semitic origin. Besides these, the monuments mention slaves from Syria (Charu), from Canaan, and from many places in Western Asia, such as Karka, Tarbasana, &c. Several of these rose to high dignity at court. The usual words for slave and servant are hon-u and bak-u. Their value is well proved by the trouble people took to catch those who escaped. A Leyden papyrus tells of six who escaped from Prince Atef-amen and of the search for them.

Joseph would be sold in the slave market at Zoan (Tanis), Bubastis, or more probably Memphis; he was sold to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the guard, an Egyptian (Gen. xxxix. 1). Potiphar is called "an Egyptian," and his name is a truly Egyptian as his office. The name Potiphar is rightly rendered Πετεφρη (Petephre) by the Coptic translator of Genesis; it must be the Hebrew form of the hieroglyphic Pe-du-pa-Ra or Pe-du-Ra, which means the gift of the sun-god, and corresponds with the Greek Ἡλιόδωρος. Analogous forms occur with the names of other gods: e.g. Pe-du-Amen = gift of Amen, Pe-du-hor = gift of Horus, Pe-du-Net = gift of Neith.* It is grammatically right to put the masculine article pu before the name of the god in Potiphar. The Hebrew Version gives it as pha, and this proves that the writer of Genesis heard the word from a native of Lower Egypt, where the dialect would change Pa-Ra into Pha-Ra or Phra, by aspirating the initial p.

that one of them is generic; and since the caravan was from Gilead, it is reasonable to infer that the merchants were more strictly Midianites, and called Ishmaelites by a kind of generic use of that name.—Errors.

* Brugsch explains this name as Pe-du-per=the gift of him who appeared. This is founded on no analogy and is refuted by the Coptic translation above cited.

The word rendered "officer" in the A. V. and R. V. is literally "eunuch," and the LXX. Vulg., and Coptic so translate it here (οὐδῶν. eunuchus, CIOYΦ). We need not be surprisat finding eunuchs at the Egyptian court: for though in Egypt monogamy was the rule for private people, the Pharaoh was allowed to have many concubines, besides his lawful queen, and these formed a harem, just like those of the Eastern courts of the present time.

With regard to the second title of Potiphar, he was a ΠΥΡΡΑΥΤΗΣ. The Septuagint renders this ἀρχιμαγειρος; the Coptic ΔΡΥΧΡΩΔΕΥΡΟΣ, which means "chief confectioner." According to the Syrian translation of the Bible, the word means "captain of the body-guard." The first part of the word, ΔΡΥΧΡΩ, is, in the Egyptian language, sar, "captain" or "prince," and the second part may be translated "body-guard." Pharaoh, like other Eastern kings, possessed a body-guard. Under the peaceful rule of the old Empire, the Egyptian army was small, and its organisation was simple. The body-guard consisted then of the shes-u, or followers. [POTIPHAR.]

Gen. xxxix. 1-12. Joseph rises so high in the house of his master, that Potiphar makes him his servant, and sets him over his house. Servant here means a free functionary, not a slave. Even now in the East a slave who distinguishes himself by his good behaviour may receive his freedom and remain in his master's house as an upper and confidential servant. The mer-per or house-master is often mentioned on the monuments.

As an introduction to what follows, we end with these words: "And Joseph was a goodly person and well favoured." The treat of the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, which under the name of Zuleikha is a favourite subject for Oriental poetry. This story awakens peculiar interest from the fact that there exists another, with true Egyptian colouring, agreeing in its principal details with the Biblical narrative. It forms the beginning of the "Story of the Two Brothers," which was written in hieratic at Thebes, about the time of the Exodus. The MS. which contains it is in the British Museum: it is called the Papyrus d'Orbiney, after the name of the lady who brought it into Europe. The whole story has much in common with the German tale of the "Juniper Tree." We will give a short précis of the beginning of the Papyrus d'Orbiney, which corresponds very nearly with the story of Joseph and Potiphar's wife, though the latter takes place in the house of a distinguished Egyptian officer, and the former amongst simple Egyptian peasants.

"There were once two brothers, who lived together in the country. The elder was called

* Several accurate translations have been produced since E. de Rougé made known the substance of the story. The original text was published by S. Birch in his Select Papyri, II., pp. ix.-xix., 1860. The best English translation is by Le Page Renouf, in Birch and Sayce's Records of the Past, vol. II., pp. 137.-147. The best French translation is by Maspero; while other translations have been published in German by E. Brugsch and G. Ebers (1868).

Anubis, the younger Batan; the former was married, and his brother lived with him and undertook all the work with the cattle and in the fields for him. This was done so excellently that there was not his equal in Egypt. So they all three lived together in perfect union. One day, however, when the inundation had gone down so that the time for ploughing had come, both brothers worked busily with the oxen until the seed-corn was finished; the elder brother then sent the younger home to fetch some more. The latter found his sister-in-law plaiting her hair; and when he asked her for the corn, she told him to go to the granary and take as much as he needed. Batan laded himself with a very heavy load of wheat and durra corn; but as he came back with it on his shoulder, his brother's wife changed her voice, forgot her duty to her husband, and tried to seduce him." Then he was very angry, and repulsed her in words very similar to those with which Joseph admonished his master's wife to remember her duty. We will place the two refusals side by side that they may be compared.

GEN. xxxix. 8, 9.

Behold, my master woteth not what is with me in the house, and he hath committed all that he hath to my hand. There is none greater in this house than I, neither hath he kept back anything from me, but thee, because thou art his wife: how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?

TALE OF TWO BROTHERS:
PAPYRUS D'ORBIENET.

And hast not thou been as a mother to me, and thy husband as a father? and he who is my elder brother, he it is who provides for my living. Alas! what thou sayest to me is shameful. Say it not to me again. But I will tell it to no one; I will not betray it to a single person.

"Therefore Batan went back to the field; but the wife of the elder brother was afraid, because of the request she had made to him: she therefore disfigured herself, so that when her husband returned he should believe that some one had done violence to her. Towards evening he came home, and when he found his wife in such a sad state, he asked her what had happened. She then accused Batan of having requested her to do wrong, and, when she refused, of having beaten her, adding that if her husband allowed his younger brother to live, he would kill her as soon as he found out that she had betrayed his evil intentions." How Anubis then attempted to kill his younger brother, and how the latter called upon the sun-god to prove his innocence, &c., does not belong here.

This so much resembles our Bible narrative, that many have supposed that the one was borrowed from the other. E. Meyer and others think that the Egyptian tale is the foundation of our story, but it is much more probable that the contrary is the case, or that the two are entirely independent. The fact that rejected love begets hatred is an experience repeated amongst all nations in all circles of life, as in the Greek legend of Phædra and Hippolytus.

The picture at Beni Hasan, mentioned above, explains also how Joseph could leave his coat behind with his tempter; this garment being only fastened round the neck and by one sleeve. In Gen. xxxix. 17 Potiphar's wife assures her husband that the Hebrew servant, whom he had brought into the house, came in to mock her:

which may be an allusion to the unmanly employment of her husband, who was a eunuch.

Vt. 20-23. Potiphar puts Joseph into prison, but through the Lord's "mercy" the keeper of the prison loves Joseph, and places so much confidence in him, that he lets him go free in the prison, with authority over the other prisoners. In this "keeper of the prison," we have not, as some maintain, Potiphar, but a new character introduced into the story. In Egypt, where every department had its superintendent, Potiphar, the overseer of the harem, could not at the same time be governor of the prison. Joseph's lovable and excellent character won for him esteem and respect everywhere, even here also, and for this reason, "because the Lord was with him."

Chapter xl. follows with the interpretation of the dreams by Joseph. Pharaoh's "chief of the butlers" and "chief of the bakers" were his fellow-prisoners. They had roused the anger of the king, and the young Hebrew was destined to be of service to them. We have information on the monuments about both these officials. The "butler" had not only to present the wine, but also to mix it before the banquets. This was done during the meal, probably with the help of syphons, as we see depicted on a monument at Thebes (Wilkinson, ii. 314 [8vo ed.]). The monuments teach us that the Egyptians were good vine-growers, and the classical writers mention their good vintages. The cup-bearer belonged to the class of the abu-u, whose duty it was to seal the vessels as a safeguard against poison and pollution. They are represented bringing in jars of wine to the king. Some of these men held high offices in the State, at the same time performing their court duties, which brought them into close intercourse with the Pharaoh. Amongst them we find the overseer of the abu-u dep-u arp-u, who tasted the wines, and corresponds certainly with our chief cup-bearer.* Even amongst the Greeks the Egyptians were celebrated for their cookery, and so many different dishes are mentioned on the monuments that the cooks in the Pharaonic time must have been extraordinarily clever. The baker was called chent, but we know of a number of these craftsmen who, as specialists, were concerned only with the preparation of particular kinds of pastry:—thus the baker of cakes (baker of the pastry), the preparer of cakes (which Maspero translates "biscuits durs"), the maker of the persa-u ("pastry"), and finally the maker of a kind of cake, l'air or l'airoiro (according to Maspero, galettes communes).

Each of Joseph's companions dreamed a dream connected with his calling. The cup-bearer pressed three bunches of grapes into Pharaoh's cup, and gave it into his hand. This may appear a surprising custom in a country where wine was made in exactly the same manner as now in the districts given up to vine cultivation. The monuments show us how they picked the grapes, trod them with their feet, caused the juice to run into great barrels, from which the wine vessels were filled. [EGYPT, p. 866.] We have already mentioned its intoxicating power; but at the same time the Egyptians used the juice of grapes squeezed into water as a sort of lemonade at certain feasts. The description of the life of the gods corresponds with that of the king and his courtiers; and in the Horus text of Edfu (Pl. xiii. l. 3), edited by Naville, we find that after Horus had killed the companions of Set (Typhon), he was embraced by his father Ra; the younger god then commands that the juice of grapes should be squeezed into water, that this drink may gladden the heart of the goddess (Hathor or Astarte). We read literally: "Squeeze grapes into water; what comes out of them (the juice) will refresh the heart of the goddess." From this we may take it for granted that this drink was also used at court, specially after great exertions. All that is necessary has already been said about the "bake-meats" which the baker carried on his head, and of which the birds ate.

* This title, as well as others, are found in the Hood Papyrus (Brit. Mus.), lately edited by Maspero. In this MS. people are arranged according to their various offices and occupations; and though it belongs to a later date, yet most of those mentioned are also found in earlier times.

To the cup-bearer Joseph explained that his dream signified that Pharaoh would be gracious to him, and give him back his office; but on the other hand he was obliged to tell the baker that Pharaoh would turn his face from him, and cause him to be hanged. It was on Pharaoh's birthday that there was a feast to all the servants (xl. 20-23). The cup-bearer was reinstated in his office and the baker hanged. In Egypt the birthday of the king was kept with great rejoicings, and down to Ptolemaic times it was usually the occasion for acts of mercy of various kinds. On the Rosetta Stone (l. 10) we read of the hru nes netr nefr, the birthday of the good god. The Septuagint rightly translates our passage ἡμέρα γενέσεως, and the Coptic is ΠΕΘΟΥΤ ΕΕ ΕΙΣΙ

ΕΕΦΑΡΕΩ (dies natalis Pharaonis). Even at the birth of a royal child there were great festivities. In the Papyrus d'Orbiney we read that when the "favourite" presented a son to the king, the whole country rejoiced, and his majesty solemnised a holy day. According to the bilingual text of the Rosetta Stone, an assembly of priests was called together in the temple of Memphis on the king's birthday, an amnesty was decreed for those criminals who were in prison, and freedom was given to some who, in spite of some misdemeanour, had long been considered by the judges as deserving of pardon. In the decree of Canopus (the second bilingual text found by Lepsius), we read of a similar assembly of priests called together for this purpose on the birthday of Ptolemy III. (Euergetes I.). On the stele of Kuban, of the time of Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression, we read, nehm-m-pet-u hru-n nest-f: "There was rejoicing in heaven on the day of his (the king's) birth." We may be sure there were also rejoicings on earth. The baker was hanged. The monuments tell us that this was the usual punishment of criminals condemned to death. Beheading was not usual; but in the lawsuit against the robbers of the royal tombs, a few culprits were condemned to be impaled.

Gen. xli. 1, &c. Here we read of Pharaoh's dreams, and how, when no one could interpret them, the chief cup-bearer, who had forgotten Joseph (xl. 23), was reminded of his own dream and of the young Hebrew. Joseph, disclaiming all ability in himself and attributing that to God, intimating also that the dream is a revelation by God of His purposes in regard to Egypt (xli. 16, 28, 32), declares the interpretation gives good counsel at the same time, and is raised to high honour. The learned men were always called together when the king needed advice or an interpretation; they were generally called the rech-u chet-u, i.e. those who have knowledge of things. [MAGIC.] Many of the monuments, e.g. the stele of the Great Sphinx and the so-called dream-stele, show how much importance was attached to dreams in Pharaonic times, and under the Ptolemies there are several papyri of the time of Ptolemy Philometor, which show that hermits lived alone in the Serapeum and devoted their lives to the explanation of dreams. The dreams are well known. In the first, the fat and lean cattle come up out of the Nile: several pictures represent this, and when the first were found, it was thought that they were representations of Pharaoh's dreams: but this was not the case, for from the earliest times, long before the Hyksos or the Hebrews came into Egypt, rich landed proprietors had representations of their herds in the interior of their tombs, to show their descendants how great were the possessions of their ancestors.

The Nile is called in Hebrew נַיִל, i.e. the river par excellence, corresponding with the hieroglyphic aur, in old texts iur, from which comes the Coptic ΙΑΡΟ = fluvius. [EGYPT, p. 864.] The bank is called in Hebrew, as in Egyptian, "the lips of the river." The number seven is very Egyptian, seven being a sacred, comprehensive number, often used on similar occasions. Many attempts have of late been made to explain the importance of seven amongst symbolic numbers. Three is said to stand for the divinity, four for the cosmos, $3 + 4 = 7$ for the union of God with the world. The seven planets and the seven Hathors are well known in Egyptian mythology. The Hathors may be cow-headed, or they may appear in the form of cows, those animals being sacred to them, and this explains why cows should appear to Pharaoh in a dream.

In hieroglyphics the number seven is often denoted by a head, on account of its seven openings. In one copy of the Book of the Dead, the deceased are seen cutting 2×7 ears of corn in the Elysian fields. The medicinal and magical writings of ancient Egypt prove also the significance of the number seven. In the Ebers Papyrus, when several drugs are prescribed, seven is the number preferred, and never six, eight, or nine. In Pap. Ebers (71. 20-7) we find seven tmnt, little fish; (70. 81) seven plants of utu, herbs; (74, 14), seven apnet (snakes or worms), seven aff (flies), seven abs of the earth (moles?), &c. are to be taken; (54. 19) seven heated stones must be used to turn water into steam, which the sick person has to inhale through a reed.^a

^a In the symbolic numbers of Pythagoras, seven was also the number signifying health. Till a late date seven was used by preference in the magical writings.

Vr. 28-32. Joseph's interpretation.

Vr. 33-36. His advice to Pharaoh. He should choose a judicious wise man to be over the land of Egypt. Further, "let him appoint overseers (R. V.) over the land, and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the seven plenteous years: and let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities. And that food shall be for store to the land against the seven years of famine which shall be in the land of Egypt; that the land perish not through the famine." We mentioned above that this famine may be identical with that famine of many years mentioned in the grave of Baba at El Kab. Even before the Hyksos' time, a low inundation was often the cause of want and distress, and the governors of the nomes gloried in helping their subjects and saving them from distress; e.g. Ameni, in his tomb at Beni Hasan, extols himself in the following words:—"There were none in distress in my time, and none starving as long I lived. And when the years of famine came, I ploughed all the fields of the nome Mah, from the Southern to the Northern boundary. I nourished the inhabitants, by preparing bread for it (the nome). No starving ones were to be found in it, for I gave to the widow, as to the lady of a husband, and never did I prefer the great to the small in all that I bestowed."

Thus acted Ameni, prince of the nome, in accordance with the old law and custom, still preserved in many texts, to feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, and to clothe the naked.

V. 37. These words pleased Pharaoh and his servants.

V. 38. The king acknowledges that the Spirit of God is in Joseph, and in v. 40 he says to the wise interpreter, "Thou shalt be over my house, and according to thy word shall all my people be ruled; only in the throne will I be greater than thou."

V. 42. "And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, e.g. in a Græco-Egyptian papyrus, a twig of laurel, which was needed for some magical purpose, had to have seven leaves, &c.

["The perfectly Egyptian colour of all this part of the narrative is very noticeable, and nowhere more so than in the particulars of the first dream. The cattle coming up from the river and feeding on the bank may be seen even now, though among them the lean kine predominate; and the use of one Egyptian word, if not of two, in the narrative probably shows that the writer knew the Egyptian language. The corn with many ears on one stalk must be wheat, one kind of which now grown in Egypt has this peculiarity. Another point to be remarked is that Joseph shaved before he went into Pharaoh's presence, and we find from the monuments that the Egyptians, except when engaged in war, shaved both the head and face, the small beard that was worn on the chin being probably artificial."—R. On the west and east were the Libyan desert and the Arabian mountains; therefore no boundary-stones were needed.

and put a gold chain about his neck. And he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, 'Abrek' (see below; A. V. and R. V. "Bow the knee"). This is entirely in accordance with Egyptian customs of the time of the Hebrews (after the importation of horses) and later. Rings were worn by men and women from the earliest times. Most of those which have come down to us are seal rings, often engraved with the name of the reigning king on the flat underside of a scarabæus.² Most of the rings we have were taken from the fingers of mummies. Some of them show very artistic work; some are of pure gold; some have scarabæi, others movable plates of semi-precious stones, on which the seal was engraved. A few are richly ornamented, e.g. one in the Louvre with two golden horses, beautifully cut. On the king's ring was his cartouche, , framing his name, and underneath his usual title: "King of Lower and Upper Egypt." In Egypt, as in all Eastern countries, the seal was the confirmation or endorsement of a person's will; and when he delivered up his ring to any one, he gave him (to use a modern expression) the power to act for him with legal authority. Decrees and letters were sealed; animals and bricks were stamped with the name of the owner or builder. Even the most sacred things in the temples were sealed, and part of the ritual was the breaking of the seal on the entrance of the king or high-priest. Thus the "keeper of the seal" was the deputy of the king, the adon, and his office is called on the monuments adonnu mer chetam, that of the king's deputy and keeper of the seal.

The garment given to Joseph (vr. 41, 42) is called shesh; it means fine white Egyptian cotton, and the material into which it is made. It therefore signifies a garment of fine white texture. Although it stands for flax, there were cotton as well as linen stuffs in Egypt, and there was a special name for byssus, pek, pek-t. The opinion expressed in the last edition of Gesenius' Heb.-Chald. Dict. is correct with regard to Egyptian also: "The words for flax and cotton flow into each other." It is very possible that the Hebrew shesh is derived from the Egyptian shesh = "the white." In the Ebers Papyrus, a queen of the 1st dynasty is called shesh = "the white." The hieroglyphic reading shes signifies, according to Brugsch, a woven stuff of peculiar fineness: this is translated "byssus" by the bilingual texts; it was of a light colour, and Brugsch considers this shes the Egyptian form of the Hebrew שֵׁשׁ. The word may also be connected with the Old Egyptian shendi-t, shenti, the apron-garment. At the time of our history, Pharaoh could not have presented a greater mark of favour to any one than the royal apron-garment, the shendi-t. Erman was the first to teach us to distinguish the different fashions of dress of the men and women of Old Egypt. Before the Hyksos' time a certain dress was authoritative for foreigners, and Joseph could hardly (as has been till now asserted) have been honoured with that long shirt-like garment, such as was worn by great men under the New Empire; it is far more probable that the royal apron is here meant, which under the Old Empire was a sign of royalty, and which later might only be worn by men in high office, and by the confidential advisers of the Pharaoh. The title "wearer of the shendi-t" is found in the tombs of the Old Empire, and betokens a particular honour. In the time of Joseph, the costume of the highest officers of state consisted of a thick under-apron, over which was worn the shendi-t. The latter was made of fine transparent byssus, and reached from the hips to the middle of the leg, covering the lower part of the body. It probably consisted of a long piece of byssus wound round the body. The end was drawn through the girdle, which was ornamented with gold clasps. Long garments covering the whole body were almost unknown at this time, though we find one prince of a nome under the 12th dynasty represented in one of them. The white linen or cotton material of which the shendi-t was made (probably the sheesh of the Bible) was so thin, that though in folds it was probably transparent, and therefore the under-apron became a necessity. Under the Pharaohs, after the expulsion of the Hyksos, the heads of all the Government departments were allowed to wear the shendi-t on public occasions; later it gradually lost its significance and honour.

The golden chain was such a common ornament at the Egyptian court, that in hieroglyphics a golden necklace signifies "gold." It is written nub, = "gold." In the pyramid time the necklace was part of the dress of royal personages, and was worn over the otherwise bare upper part of the body.

"Pharaoh made Joseph to ride in the second carriage which he had." No horses are represented on the monuments before the time of the Hyksos, nor do we ever see the king in a carriage, though later he seems to have generally used one on leaving his palace. We therefore conclude that horses and carriages were introduced into the Nile valley by the Hyksos. During the time of their subjection, the native princes also learnt to make use of vehicles drawn by horses, both in war and peace, for the monuments show us the king penetrating far into the interior of Asia with his chariots of war, and also going for a quiet drive with his family. At Tell-el-Amarna Amenophis IV. (Khunaten) drives out with his daughters, and in the D'Orbiney Papyrus Pharaoh and his favourite wife take a drive for pleasure. The king, with wreaths of flowers round his neck, first leaves the palace in a carriage of silver-gilt (electron). The favourite is in the next carriage, of which the description is not given. That of the governor was inlaid with precious metals: the "second" carriage, which Joseph was to use, would naturally be less beautiful and costly. For an account of the Egyptian chariots, see CHARIOT; and for the horses, see HORSE.

V. 43. "They cried before him אֲבְרָם (Abrek), and he (Pharaoh) set him over all the land of Egypt." Abrek is an old Egypto-Hebrew word, and Brugsch is right when he makes it correspond with the hieroglyphic word brok or brek, and considers א (abk) to represent the Egyptian exclamation calling the people to obedience. Abrok is therefore to be translated "Bow the knee," or better, "Up, bow the knee," and expresses an act of deep submission. In an instance borrowed from Dümichen's historical inscriptions, it is construed with n, i.e. "before," and means, "We bow the knee before (brok-n) thy double crown." We have not yet met with brok in any older text; still it certainly belongs to the Old Egyptian language.

V. 44. Pharaoh said unto Joseph that without him should no man lift up hand or foot in all the land of Egypt; and in v. 45 he called Joseph's name Zaphenat-Pa'neach, and gave him Asenath, the daughter of Potipherah, the priest of On, for his wife." The name which Pharaoh gave to Joseph has been generally read Zaphnath-paaneah, and its explanation has caused great difficulty. Dr. G. Steindorff¹ paraphrases this group of words, Zaphenat-Pa'neach, and shows that there is doubtless an Egyptian form written Ze-pnute-ef-anch, corresponding to the Coptic Ζε-πνοϋτε-εϕ-ωνϗ. The meaning of this name is, "God speaks and he lives." Many texts give analogous names: "The god Khons speaks and he lives;" "The god Ptah speaks and he lives;" "The goddess Nut speaks and he lives;" "The goddess Isis speaks and he lives." Brugsch translates Zaphnath-paaneah, "Governor of the Sethroitic name;" but his theory is refuted by the above explanation of Steindorff's, which will certainly meet with universal acceptance.

Joseph received this name because the simple name under which he had come as a slave to Egypt was no longer befitting for him. He needed a more distinguished name, more pleasing to Egyptian ears, and as with him so it was with many Shemites who came to Pharaoh's court. We need only mention the herald (literally, a speaker) Ben Mat'ana, son of Iupa-a, a Shemite, who was obliged to allow himself to be called at Pharaoh's court "Rameses in the Temple of Ra." Change of name was also usual with parvenus whom the king wished to honour. The fact that names with the meaning "God speaks and he lives" only began to be commonly used in the time of the 22nd dynasty, caused Steindorff to place at that period the last redaction of the Hebrew story to which our passage belongs. The names which follow (Asenath and Potipherah) also belong to this epoch, and it may be that the later Hebrew writer added them to the original text. If the Hyksos king whom Joseph served lived at Tanis, it would be difficult to explain how he could choose a wife for Joseph, whose father lived so far away, and was a priest of the sun-god Ra for the king and his family served no god but Set. If Memphis and the conditions of court life under the 20th dynasty were in the mind of the Hebrew writer at the conclusion of the passage, then each statement is in exact agreement, for the name Asenath is a regular change of form of the Egyptian female name Nesmet, meaning "belonging to the goddess Net" (Neti).

Analogous names with nes = "belonging to," are very numerous; and names like Nes-Hor, Nes-Hathor, Nes-Khons, Nes-Isis, appear earlier, but are particularly numerous in the second division of the New Empire."

The father of Joseph's wife was called in the Hebrew Potipherah, according to the Septuagint Πετεφρή. This Greek translation, as well as the Coptic, reads Πετεφρη, and compels us to recognise in this name, as in that of Joseph's first master, the Egyptian Pe-du-pa-Ra = "the gift of the surt-god Ra." He was a priest of On, the Greek Heliopolis, the very ancient town of the sun, lying a few miles north of Cairo, on the east bank of the Nile, and throughout the history of ancient Egypt the centre of the sun-worship. The high-priest of the highest solar deity was called the Urma; he was also chief prophet of the god, and under him were priests of various orders, to which, under the Hyksos kings, the doctors also belonged.

One of the chief tribunals of Egypt sat at Heliopolis, and the "faculty of medicine" in the "great halls" of this town was the most ancient and most famous in the land. To which order of priests in this temple and college Joseph's father-in-law belonged, we know not. The great sanctuary of Ra, described so fully by Strabo, has disappeared: nothing remains but a sacred obelisk still standing out against the sky, erected by User-tesen I. (12th dynasty), before the coming of the Hyksos, who spared it as well as the whole temple, for we are told in a MS. on leather in the Berlin Museum that the temple, which was rebuilt magnificently under the 12th dynasty, was still standing in the Ptolemaic time. The beautiful ruins are described by Arabian writers, who visited them even after the conquest of Egypt by Islam.

v. 46 states that "Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh, king of Egypt."

The end of chap. xli. relates how Joseph travelled through the whole country (carrying out his measures), and how everything he had prophesied came to pass. First the seven years of plenty, in which Joseph stored up the corn as "the sand of the sea." This is a favourite simile in Old Egyptian: we have noted a number of sentences similar to the following:—"The provision is more in quantity than the sand of the sea-shore" (Dümichen, Temple Inscr. 86, 5). In the years of plenty two sons were born to Joseph by Asenath. v. 50, and he named the first-born Manasseh [MANASSEH], and the second Ephraim [EPHRAIM]. Then came the years of famine, and "the dearth was in all lands, but in all the land of Egypt there was bread" (v. 54). This famine is spoken of as one that is "over all the face of the earth" (v. 56);

"The n" in names composed with nes disappears in the language of other nations. The Greek Ζημις corresponds with the Egyptian Nes-Min. To facilitate pronunciation an s is often introduced before the double consonant at the beginning: thus Ζημις becomes Ἐγμῖσις. This s is rendered (N)s-net in the Hebrew translation. We cannot accept Brugsch's theory that Asenath is the old female name Snat. On the other hand, the laws of phonetic change are in favour of our theory.

it therefore was not due entirely to the misfortune of the low Nile. At any rate it extended over Palestine, for Jacob (chap. xlii. 1, &c.) sent his sons to Egypt to buy corn there. The expression "the face of the earth" often meant but a small sphere; here probably Egypt and Western Asia are spoken of, and one can easily imagine climatic conditions which would be injurious to the corn in those parts of the world.

The position of Joseph is one we often meet with on the monuments of all ages. The prosperity of Egypt always depended on the produce of her fields; and even in the time of the pyramids the superintendent of the granaries was one of the highest officers of state. One inscription says, "He had the superintendence of the stewards in all domains of Pharaoh, from the miserable country of Cush (Ethiopia) to the borders of Mesopotamia (Naharins)." Under the 18th dynasty we find, that when there were good harvest returns, these officials were honoured by the golden necklace and other rewards. Men both of the highest priestly and secular rank held also this office. They were generally called "superintendents of the granaries of the South and of the North," and a certain Ramen-cheper-seneb called himself "the royal scribe of the granaries of the North and of the South" (Ledrain's Catalogue, 1314). We know the appearance of the granaries, for Naville has cleared out the remains of some at Tell-el-Maskhutah (Pithom Succoth), and they are also often represented on the monuments. They were large rectangular long buildings, with no decoration, built of bricks of Nile mud, with slightly inclining walls and a row of windows high up, to admit air. A staircase led to the roof, for the openings into the rooms were at the top, and the corn was shaken into them from above. Near the granaries were offices for the scribes and the weighing-rooms, and every sack of corn which was brought in was registered by the clerks, who squatted on the roof. Joseph's position was more than simple overseer of the granaries, as we have already seen; he was "keeper of the seal," and this office was often connected with that of t'at or governor, the chief justice who superintended the whole administration of the country, and, like Joseph, was called the second after the king (De Rougé, Hier. Ins. 303). Even those of high rank had to obey him, and he was supreme at court.

The sons of Israel then came to Egypt (xlii.): Benjamin only, Jacob's favourite, the last-born of Rachel, was left behind—for fear that mischief should befall him. Joseph, the governor of the land, also sold the corn, and his "brethren came and bowed down themselves before him with their faces to the earth" (c. 6). This sign of submission was required from all who came to Egypt with a petition to the king. Absaha, the Semitic captain represented with his followers at Beni Hasan, is only bowing low when he meets the prince of the nome Mah, but he comes with gifts, not with a petition. Other pictures show us Egyptian and Asiatic suppliants in a position corresponding exactly with the words "bowed down themselves before him with their faces to the earth," for they throw themselves down before him from whom they hope for favours, so that their nose or mouth would touch the ground. This custom was called contemptuously by the Greeks ῥοσ-κυστῆς, and by the Egyptians sentā—"to smell or kiss the earth.") Under the Old Empire a royal prince, high-priest at Memphis (Ptah-shepses), counted it the highest honour to kiss the king's foot, and the stele of Entef (12th dynasty) teaches us that even the great people of Upper Egypt threw themselves down on the ground before the ʿat, the highest officer in Egypt. In later times, people of rank, if native Egyptians, were spared this humiliation, but those of lower rank and conquered princes and foreigners were always compelled to "smell the earth" before Pharaoh and his highest dignitaries, as e.g. the conquered rebel kings before Pianchi, the Ethiopian Pharaoh.

The brothers did not recognise the youth now grown to manhood; he however knew at once who they were, and "spoke roughly to them," and accused them of having come as spies "to see the nakedness of the land" (v. 12). By this is surely meant the only way by which Egypt could be entered by enemies from the east, i.e. by the Isthmus of Suez. At this point fortresses had been erected under the Old Empire (12th dynasty), which in the time of Seti I. and Rameses II. (19th dynasty) were extended into a regular line of forts, called the chetam, or the key, corresponding to the word Etham in the Bible.^o The various forts followed almost the same direction as the present Suez Canal. The most important strong points were chetam en ʿAr, "the fortress of the North," probably the Pelusium of the Greeks (called rightly by Suidas the key of Egypt, ἡ κλεις τῆς Αἰγύπτου), and to the South the later Hero, Heroopolis.^p The latter was called by the Egyptians by the sacred name of Pithom (house of the god Tum), and Thekut (Heb. Succoth), as Naville has shown by the Egypt Exploration Fund excavations. It touched the western extremity of the Red Sea, which must therefore have extended much further north than it does now. Here was a fortified storehouse, and in Roman times a castrum, which may have been close to an Egyptian entrenched camp. As the lakes of Timsah and Balah were a protection from invaders on this side, it was only necessary to erect a few forts. One, as we find from the sculptures of Seti I. on the north wall of Karnak, was called Makhol, Heb. Migdol, the strong castle, or fortified tower; another, more to the west, is mentioned by Jer. ii. 16, xlvi. 14, xliii. 7, xlv. 1, and by Ezek. xxx. 18. It was called in Hebrew Tahpahnes [ΤΑΡΠΑΗΝΕΣ], and in the Septuagint Taphne, Taphnai. The Egyptian name was Thabne, and its position has lately been approximately determined. Thus in later times the eastern boundary of Egypt was well protected. Under the Hyksos, however, there only existed the town fortified by them, called by the Greeks Avaris, and a row of forts on the isthmus, spoken of in the Travels of Seneha as "obstructions" (12th dynasty). The eastern nations, if intending to conquer Egypt, had, above all, to discover the weak points in this line of fortifications; or, as the Bible expresses it, "to spy out the nakedness of the land."

The brothers defended themselves (v. 13), and began: "Thy servants are twelve brethren." The phrase "thy servants" is quite Egyptian. For, as Borchardt has lately shown, bet an is to be understood as a courteous formula for "I," or "I thy servant;" so Joseph's brothers, instead of saying "we," said, "thy servants." This expression is used most frequently in the time of the 12th dynasty, therefore before the time of the Hyksos. Also the oath "by the life of Pharaoh," introduced by Joseph in his reply, is genuinely Egyptian; even the Pharaohs swore by their own names: e.g. the Pharaoh Pianchi, on the stele named after him, uses the expression anch-a mer-a Ra, "by my life," "by my love to Ra."

V. 15, &c. Joseph explained to the brothers that he intended to keep them prisoners while one fetched the youngest brother. They then talked to each other, and reminded each other sorrowfully of the wrong they had done to Joseph. They talked in their own language, and did not know that the prime minister of the king understood them, "for he spake unto them by an interpreter." This shows us that Egyptian was spoken at the Hyksos court, a fact we have already assumed from other circumstances (see p. 1793). Interpreters were found in Egypt at all times; and, indeed, under the founder of the 26th dynasty (middle of 7th century B.C.), when the king Psammetichus relied on Greek soldiers, and when numerous Greeks settled in Egypt, the interpreters, according to Herodotus (ii. 154, 164), formed a distinct class. In Roman times, Roman travellers conversed with the Egyptians through interpreters, whose profession fell into bad repute for want of truthfulness.

V. 24, &c., show us how Joseph, in spite of his emotion, caused Simeon to be bound; the others were sent away with corn and provisions, while the money which they had paid was put back into their sacks. The custom of using coined tokens began much later than the date of this story, so that money such as we use is not meant here, but metal paid in the form of balls or small bars, weighed in balances with two scales. [WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.] That this weighed metal is meant, we see from xliii. 21, "our money in full weight." The brothers laden their asses with the corn. Asses were much used in Egypt as beasts of burden; the camel was introduced much later, probably not before the time of the Ptolemies, as Barth has proved. The monuments do not give us a single example of the camel, though the papyri of the New Empire show us that people knew of them, but did not consider them suitable for use in Egypt, and the Egyptians were afraid of travelling in foreign countries.

Ch. xlii. 27. One of the brothers opened his sack in the inn and found his money. There must have been inns in very early times in those countries where numbers of people of all classes flocked together to certain places of pilgrimage, and remained there for several days. Thousands of people assembled at Babastis for the feast of Sekhet (Pasht), or at Abydos, where was the tomb of Osiris. Here, as well as at Tanis and Memphis, the destination of so many caravans, there must have been inns, probably much like the Oriental khanas of the present day.

^o See Ebers, Egypt and the Books of Moses, p. 78, &c.

^p Herr M. Müller places shur before ʿar and makes it coincide with the Biblical Shur.

The rest of the story of Joseph and his brethren contains but a few points further which need explanation. On the return of the brothers with Benjamin, with presents from their father, and with the money which had been put into their sacks, Joseph ordered the "ruler of his house" (xl. 16) to "slay and make ready, for these men shall dine with me at noon." Every great man had (as is said above) an overseer for his house. The monuments often show us pictures of the slaying of animals. Every temple had its slaughter-court, and the animals killed were generally oxen and a sort of large antelope, which was domesticated in old times. The animal was bound and its throat cut with a flint knife, no other knife being used for this purpose. The blood was carefully saved, and the body cut into pieces, the legs being considered the best part. In private houses, oxen, calves, and tame antelopes were preferred to any other kind of meat. Geese and ducks were preferred to all other birds. The Egyptian feasts, of which many are represented in the tombs, were not like ours; the guests sat on chairs in long rows opposite the richly-laden sideboard, which, like the tables of offerings, was always decorated with flowers. Servants, with serviettes in their hands, waited on the guests with dishes also decked with flowers. At ordinary meals a small table with a tray of food and drink was placed near each person: this is also customary in the East now. Under the Old Empire, the guests often squatted on the ground; in later times, however, four-legged chairs were used, which were often upholstered and had comfortable backs. Near these were placed jugs, from which, as is now the custom in the East, water was poured over the hands of those who ate: the use of knives and forks was unknown. The Egyptians never reclined on sofas at meals, like the Greeks and Romans. There was always a special dining-hall in the houses of the great. In the middle stood a large table, probably of stone or brick, on which dishes were placed as upon our sideboards.

Ch. xliii. 21. When the brothers defended themselves to the ruler of Joseph's house because of the money they had found in their sacks, he encouraged them with an expression used as much in Egyptian as in Hebrew; for in many hieroglyphic texts we find a friendly conversation beginning with the greeting net her ten = "Peace be to you," or "Peace to you." In Joseph's house the steward brought water for the brothers to wash their feet; for this Eastern custom existed also in ancient Egypt, as we might expect with a nation where everything, even their religion, inculcated cleanliness of body. According to Herod. ii. 37, the priests always had to bathe twice a day and to wear sandals, while people of high rank often preferred to go barefoot, and had shoe-bearers to carry their sandals. Unwashed feet would have soiled the plaster floor of the cleanly-kept rooms, and that they were much afraid of doing this is proved by the fact that many mummies have the soles of their feet removed that they should not soil the floor of the hall of judgment in the underworld.

V. 26, &c. Joseph received his brothers, asked for news of his father, and at the sight of Benjamin, his mother's son, was so moved that he was obliged to withdraw into the inner chamber, in order to weep. Representations and ground-plans of Egyptian houses show us that this "inner chamber" would probably be the sleeping room, and could only be reached by passing through the court, the verandah, a reception-room, the dining-hall, and a sitting-room. It was usually at the back of the house, and (according to the representation of Merira's house) from the dining-hall Joseph would pass through the sitting-room on the right, which occupied one-third of the space behind the dining-hall, and enter the sleeping chamber which opened into it.

When at last they sat down to table, v. 32, "They set on for him by himself, and for them [his brothers] by themselves, and for the Egyptians, which did eat with him, by themselves: because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is an abomination unto the Egyptians." This passage shows us how completely Egyptian the court of the Hyksos kings had become, for the Hebrews, who were really their blood relations, were considered as unclean as all other foreigners. To a patriotic Egyptian it was always an abomination to eat at the same table with a foreigner, or to cut bread with the same knife, and this abhorrence still survived (according to the classical writers) long after Egypt had been opened out to foreigners under Psammetichus I. (26th dynasty), and after the Pharaohs had for centuries married foreign princesses. From the Pianchi stele (end of 9th century B.C.) we learn that the conquered rebel kings might not enter the king's palace, "because (ll. 150, 151) they were unclean (ama-u) and they ate fish." "Unclean" means, as we see by the determinative, uncircumcised, and "they ate fish" means every kind of fish, not those only that were allowed to the Egyptians for food. It seems to have been a cause of special abhorrence to the Egyptians that foreigners did not keep the laws which regarded cleanliness of the body and food. Besides this, foreign lands and their inhabitants belonged to Set (Typhon), and everything belonging to him was despised and unclean, even red-haired people, red being his colour; the word for "red" therefore signified also "wicked and bad." We know nothing more of the dishes of honour (v. 34) which Joseph caused to be served, except that Benjamin's share was five times as much as that of any of the others. At the end of the meal "they drank and were merry with him." The scenes of the Egyptian tombs show that it was usual to drink freely, men and women being represented as overpowered with wine, probably as an evidence of the liberality of the entertainer.

Ch. xli. Joseph continued his rough treatment of his brothers, and brought them under suspicion of having stolen his own particular "silver cup." Various forms of goblets are represented on the monuments, some certainly made of precious metals, gold, silver, or electrum. The cup was found in Benjamin's sack, and Joseph immediately pronounced the sentence of punishment that the boy should be left behind as his slave. Then Judah, mindful of the oath he had sworn to Jacob, stepped forward and offered himself as a slave in the place of Benjamin, that he might not see the evil that should come upon his father.

Ch. xiv. Joseph's heart was overcome by these words, and he made himself known to his brethren. Then follows the beautiful passage (v. 3, &c.) in which he quiets the troubled men, by declaring that all has happened under God's guidance.

V. 8. "So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God." Then he sent them back to fetch his father, and promised that they and their flocks and herds should settle near him in the land of Goshen. There he would take care of them, for there were yet "five years of famine." Goshen is praised as a land of great fertility. [GOSHEN.]

V. 16, &c. Pharaoh and his servants were pleased at the arrival of Joseph's brothers, and the king assured his favourite minister that both they and their father were welcome to the land of Egypt. "I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye shall eat the fat of the land." So Joseph, as Pharaoh had commanded, gave them wagons to fetch their father, their wives and children, and presented them with rich presents for themselves and their father, in all of which Benjamin had the preference. Here one point only needs notice: Jacob and his family were to be brought into Egypt in Egyptian wagons. Therefore in the time of the Pharaohs there were roads by which people could travel from Palestine to Egypt. In the present day, since the Roman roads have fallen into decay, this journey can only be made riding or on foot, and even to drive through the Delta is impossible. In Old Egypt the Egyptian war-chariots went as far as the north of Syria, and we see from this passage that private conveyances could be driven over this district. Under Rameses III. we find Asiatic tribes invading Egypt, and amongst their camp-followers are ox-carts for the conveyance of the wives and children. These carts are really only boxes on four wheels, while the baggage-wagons of the Egyptians, instances of which are represented in the camp of Rameses II., and the chariots for war or for pleasure, were two-wheeled. For the baggage, box-like tops were added to the conveyance. They were drawn, not by horses but by oxen, as is now the case in Ethiopia. We cannot decide which sort of wagon was sent to meet Jacob.

Ch. xlv. 1, &c. Jacob and his family went down into Egypt, and the Lord promised him there (v. 3) to make of him "a great nation." Then follow the names of the sons and grandchildren of Jacob who came with him into Egypt. "All the souls of the house of Jacob which came into Egypt were three score and ten" (v. 27).

V. 28, &c. Judah was sent on before to Joseph, who caused his chariot to be made ready and went up to meet his father in Goshen. This helps us to settle the position of Goshen, which must have been between the eastern boundary of the Delta, and one of the king's residences, Tanis, Bubastis, or Memphis. See GOSHEN.

V. 29, 30. Joseph went up in his chariot and met his father.

V. 31-34. Joseph advised his brethren to make themselves known to Pharaoh as shepherd and herdsmen, so that he might allow them to remain in the land of Goshen; for (v. 34) "every shepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians." Herodotus, a good authority on all he saw himself and a most careful observer when in Egypt, tells us (ii. 47) of the great contempt in which all swineherds were held. This is not surprising, for swine were held in as much abhorrence by the Egyptians as by the Jews and Mahomedans, and were kept but rarely (for certain sacrifices, e.g. in Nechebt, i.e. el-Kab). That shepherds were also hated, it is difficult to understand, for the ram was sacred in Egypt, and some Egyptians possessed large flocks of sheep. But though rams and bullocks are very often represented, the sheep appears very rarely, and the reason for this was probably religious, the sheep perhaps not being wholly a clean animal, and much inferior to the bullock, the favourite of the Egyptian landowner. Everything concerning the sheep was undertaken (as with swine) by the shepherds. On the other hand, it was the pride of the great man to enumerate on the walls of his tomb the number of each kind of bullock^a which he possessed. Bullocks were treated with loving care; they were adorned with gay cloths and tassels. Their keeper is on friendly terms with them, and in the Papyrus d'Orbiney the cows are supposed to talk with the shepherd: they tell him where the best pasture is to be found, and the leading cow warns him that he is pursued.

The bullocks also were treated with medicine when they were ill, and were specially cared for at breeding time. The chief breed in Egypt was the old African zebra breed with the hump: the horns grew in the form of a lyre to a magnificent length: while another breed was kept artificially with short horns, or with no horns at all. Foreign bulls were brought into the country to improve the breed, some being imported under the New Empire from the Kheta country; that is, North Syria. Though the overseers, the stewards, the governors, and the scribes of the herds were illustrious civil servants, the shepherds and herdsmen were despised. Their business forced them to wander about, and they could not always keep out of contact with unclean things; they were, therefore, abhorrent to the Egyptians, with whom a settled life and cleanliness were held in the highest estimation. They were called sechti-u or marsh-men, and at certain seasons they had to take their cattle into the marshy districts, just as shepherds in the mountains at the present day take them up to "the Alm." In the marshes of the Delta, where birds were snared and wild animals trapped, they would probably come across strangers. Instead of houses they had huts, something like tents, quickly put up and taken down; and of all Egyptians (as we see by their pictures), they took the least pains with their appearance. They wore a rough apron of plaited grass, and shaved neither their heads nor their beards. Though people avoided coming in contact with the herdsmen, they considered them very intelligent, just as we ascribe a power of sharp observation to our shepherds, who live in close intercourse with nature. Joseph made use of the prejudice against shepherds to settle his relatives on good pasture-land beyond the cultivated and thickly populated lands of the native Egyptians.

^a A certain Sabu had 405 of one breed, 1237 of another, 1300 of another; besides 1200 calves of one breed, and 1138 of another; in addition 1308 antelopes, 1135 gazelles, and 1244 head of a kind of antelope-goat. A relation also of king Khafra Anch, whose grave is at Gizeh, possessed 835 long-horned cattle, 220 without horns, 974 sheep, 2235 goats, and 760 asses.

Pharaoh willingly agreed (v. 3-6), and told Joseph that if there were capable men amongst them to place them as overseers over his own herds. The mer or overseer is often mentioned on the monuments. One was called "overseer of the horn, of the leg with the cloven hoof, and of the feather." He was therefore over all the cattle, the bullocks, the smaller animals, and the feathered flocks. The king must have possessed large herds of cattle; the royal domains were not much less than those belonging to the temples, and the latter owed most of their possessions to the gifts of the great landowners.²

Ch. xlvii. 7, &c. Jacob, who was 130 years old, blessed Pharaoh, and this need not surprise us when we remember the reverence the Egyptians paid to old age.

V. 13, &c. The wise financier Joseph gathered into the treasury of Pharaoh all the money of the Egyptians and of the inhabitants of Canaan by means of his accumulated stores of food. V. 14: "And Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house." By this house is meant the treasury, which, together with the officials attached to it, appears countless times on the monuments. It is usually called per-het = "the house of silver," and the head-treasurer was a high officer of state.³ His office was often connected with that of the t'at (see p. 1800), and he had many men under him, called "the stewards or clerks of the house of silver." The title of head-treasurer was given, even under the Old Empire, as an honorary title to the highest officers and to the royal relatives. Thus, in an inscription of the 6th dynasty, there is a list of the high officers of state; the princes precede every one, and next come the head-treasurers (the word used is in the plural, though one man discharged the duties of the office). There are many pictures of the treasure-house, with its scales on which a large number of clerks weighed and kept the register of the rings and bars. Each temple also had its treasure-chambers, e.g. those of Medinet Haboo of Rameses III. On the walls are represented the treasures it contained, metals of all kinds, as well as precious metals, precious stones, vessels of gold and silver, &c.⁴

The Bible tells us how the Egyptians gave all their money to save themselves from starvation, and how they were at last obliged to pledge their cattle and their land.

V. 20, &c.: "And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; for the Egyptians sold every man his field, because the famine prevailed over them: so the land became Pharaoh's. . . Only the land of the priests bought he not; for the priests had a portion assigned them of Pharaoh, and did eat their portion which Pharaoh gave them: wherefore they sold not their lands." Then he gave the people seed for their fields, and required them in return to give Pharaoh the fifth part of the produce, the other four parts being their own, for seed of the field, and for their food. V. 26, "And Joseph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day, that Pharaoh should have the fifth part, except the land of the priests only, which became not Pharaoh's."⁵

We have here a true picture of the agrarian relations in the valley of the Nile after the expulsion of the Hyksos. Under the Old Empire, as is related in the graves of that period, the nobility and princes of the nomes possessed large freehold estates, and in times of famine had to take care of their people. Under the New Empire, till long after the time of the Exodus, it was quite different; and if we review in chronological order the agrarian relations of Egypt, referred to on the monuments, we find that the reversion to the Crown of the landed property of the nobility must have occurred in the period just before the expulsion of the Hyksos. In Lower Egypt, also, the native Egyptian Pharaohs, from the time of Rasekenen I. to that of Ahmes, seem to have confiscated the large estates, and the story of Joseph gives an interesting account of this proceeding. It is certain that under the 18th dynasty (that following the Hyksos) all the land, with the exception of the priests' fields, belonged to Pharaoh, and that those in possession had to pay 20 per cent. of the produce (the fifth part) to the king, while under the Old Empire there is no trace of such a regulation; the statutum or fixed income of the priests (mentioned xlvii. 22) is also found in later times. Under the Old Empire the princes of the nomes presided over the colleges of the priests in their small feudal states, and received a fixed amount of the revenues (bread, meat, and beer). This was all changed later, for under the 19th and 20th dynasties the priests, instead of paying out part of their revenues, were continually begging, and so many gifts were added to the old emoluments that after the time of Rameses III. the priesthood had very large endowments (see Pap. Harris, I., Brit. Mus.), and became richer and more powerful than the king himself, so that under the 21st dynasty they deposed the old family of Pharaohs and usurped the throne.

Under the Persians, 454 B.C., Herodotus observes (ii. 168) that the priests were exempt from taxes as well as the soldiers. The revenue brought in by a certain allotment of the taxes agrees with the fixed income (πν) in our history, and consisted daily of 5 minae of bread (between 4 and 5 lbs.), 2 minae of beef (not quite 2 lbs.), and 4 bowls of wine: money, of course, is not mentioned. The account of the changes which by the wisdom of Joseph were so much to the advantage of the Crown property, causes us to place our story towards the end of the Hyksos period; for from that time to the time of the Exodus, there are no historical indications of a similar revolution in the agricultural laws.

V. 27-31. We see how Joseph's family took firm root in the land, and multiplied quickly; and how Jacob, in his 147th year, feeling his end approaching, made Joseph swear to him that he would not bury him in Egypt, but in the burying-place of his fathers at Hebron.

Ch. xlviii. 1, &c., contains the last farewell of Jacob to Joseph, and the adoption of Ephraim and Manasseh, the sons of Joseph, by Jacob, who received them into the number of his sons, so that "as Reuben and Simeon they shall be mine." Joseph was lost to Jacob because he had become an Egyptian, but by the adoption of the two sons of Rachel's firstborn the gap in the brotherhood to whom God had promised the land of Canaan was filled up. In spite of the fact that Manasseh was the elder son, Israel placed his right hand on the head of Ephraim, thus giving him the privileges of the first-born.

V. 21. Jacob promised Joseph that the Lord should bring his descendants back into the land of his fathers.

Chap. xlix. gives the blessing of Jacob to his sons [JACOB], and the repetition of his wish that he should be buried in the cave of Machpelah, by the side of Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, and his own wife Leah [MACHPELAH]. V. 33. Jacob "gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people."

Ch. l. 1, &c. Joseph mourned for his father, and commanded his servants the physicians to embalm him: "And forty days were fulfilled for him; for so are fulfilled the days of those which are embalmed: and the Egyptians mourned for him threescore and ten days" (v. 3). This statement corresponds with the length of time required for embalment, according to the accounts given by the classical writers and by the monuments. Herodotus (ii. 86) and Diodorus (i. 91) give us many details about embalming. [EMBALMING.]

The body of the father of Joseph, the most distinguished man in Egypt, could only have been embalmed in the most costly method. An account of what was to be done with the body of a distinguished person is found in the Rhind Papyrus (Brit. Mus.). In this account the various substances are enumerated which are used in embalming, and seventy days are spoken of as the appointed time for the embalment of a body. This is most interesting to us, as in our passage the time of mourning takes exactly the same length of time. In the Rhind Papyrus thirty-six days are given for the first process, instead of which we find (Gen. l. 3) the round number of forty. Pharaoh willingly granted that Joseph should fulfil his father's wish and take the body to the family burial-place. The funeral procession was as splendid as if Jacob had been of royal birth, for (l. 7) there followed all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt.

V. 9. "And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen: and it was a very great company." Such great funeral processions are often represented in the tombs of Abd-el-Kurna at Thebes; the horsemen alone are wanting, and some maintain that the Egyptians never used the horse for riding. This opinion, however, is not correct; for though horses with chariots are more often represented than riding horses, yet there are several pictures of Egyptians riding, and the hieroglyphic texts sometimes speak of horse-soldiers, e.g. an inscription at Karnak, where we find "soldiers riding on war-horses," and further on we read that they pursue the enemy. The finest picture of a man riding a horse without a saddle is one in the Museo Civico at Bologna. A man on horseback is also found carved in open work on a battle-axe of the time of the expulsion of the Hyksos. Joseph naturally accompanied the mortal remains of his father (on the place of burial, see JACOB). When he returned, his brothers (l. 15) feared that he would hate them, because of the evil they had done to him, and, throwing themselves at his feet, they begged him to forgive them for their father's sake. Then again we see the good and noble character of Joseph, who calms them with the beautiful, oft-repeated words (v. 19 and 20): "Fear not: for am I in the place of God? Ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good."

Joseph continued to live in peace with his family in Egypt, and his earthly happiness was great in seeing Ephraim's descendants to the third generation, that is, his great-great-grandchildren; also his great-grandchildren, the grandchildren of Manasseh, the children of Machir. Joseph also wished to rest in the land of his fathers (l. 25). This wish was fulfilled, though much later, for we read (Ex. xiii. 19) that Moses took the bones of Joseph with him; and in Josh. xiv. 32 we are told that the bones of Joseph, which the children of Israel had brought with them out of the land of Egypt, were buried in Shechem, in the field which Jacob bought from the sons of Hamor, the father of Shechem, for one hundred pieces of silver.

V. 26 tells us that Joseph was 110 years old. We often find that the Egyptians prayed that they might reach their 110th year, for to live 110 years was the last wish to be fulfilled for a happy life. In the most ancient MS. we possess, the Papyrus Priese, a life of 110 years is declared to be the best, and in the Papyrus Anastasi IV. (T. 4, l. 4) we read: "Fulfil 110 years on the earth, whilst thy limbs are vigorous." On a granite statue at Vienna, there is a prayer to the goddess Isis that she should grant life, health, happiness, and a good old age in this world, and also a splendid and excellent burial at Heliopolis, after 110 years on earth. It is written of the prophet Roma (19th dynasty) that when he had lived 110 years on earth, he had attained the most perfect age of mortal men. "God," as he says himself, "granted me 110 years of life." Many similar passages speak of 110 years as the most perfect age to be desired, and therefore by the number 110 is inferred an especially blessed and prosperous life.* This number 110 is certainly worthy of attention, for it proves that the author of this passage was perfectly conversant with Egyptian matters, and that the story of Joseph's life, as it has come down to us, has in part, at least, obtained its local colouring on Egyptian soil.

[G. E.]

Joseph's character.—We have as full an account of Joseph as of Abraham and Jacob, a fuller one than of Isaac; and if we compare their histories, Joseph's character is the least marked by wrong or indecision. His first quality seems to have been, the greatest resolution. He not only believed faithfully, but could endure patiently, and could command equally his good and evil passions. Hence his strong sense of duty, his zealous work, his strict justice, his clear discrimination of good and evil. Like all men of vigorous character, he loved power; but when he had gained it, he used it with the greatest generosity. He seems to have striven to get men unconditionally in his power that he might confer benefits upon them. Generosity in conferring benefits as well as in forgiving injuries is one of his distinguishing characteristics. With this strength was united the deepest tenderness. He was easily moved to tears, even weeping at the first sight of his brethren after they had sold him. His love for his father and Benjamin was not enfeebled by years of separation, nor by his great station. The wise man was still the same as the true youth. These great qualities explain his power of governing and administering, and his extraordinary flexibility, which enabled him to suit himself to each new position in life. The last characteristic to make up this great character was modesty, the natural result of the others.

Joseph's place in history.—In the history of the chosen race Joseph occupies a very high place as an instrument of Providence. He was "sent before" his people, as he himself knew, to preserve them in the terrible famine, and to settle them where they could multiply and prosper in the interval before the iniquity of the Canaanites was full.

Joseph as a type.—In the N. T. Joseph is only mentioned (Heb. xi. 21, 22). Yet the striking particulars of the persecution and sale by his brethren, his resisting temptation, his degradation and yet greater exaltation, the saving of his people by his hand, and the confounding of his enemies, seem to indicate that he was a type of our Lord.

2. Father of Igal, who represented the tribe of Issachar among the spies (Num. xiii. 7).

3. A lay Israelite of the family of Bani who was compelled by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 42). In 1 Esd. it is given as JOSEPHUS.

4. Representative of the priestly family of Shebaniah, in the next generation after the Return from Captivity (Neh. xiii. 14).

5. (Ἰωσήφορ.) A Jewish officer defeated by Gorgias c. 164 B.C. (1 Macc. v. 8, 56, 60).

6. In 2 Macc. viii. 22, x. 19, Joseph is named among the brethren of Judas Maccabaeus apparently in place of John (Ewald, Gesch. iv. 384, note; Grimm, ad 2 Macc. viii. 22). The confusion of Ἰωδάρης, Ἰωσήφ, Ἰωσήφ is well seen in the various readings in Matt. xiii. 55.

7. An ancestor of Judith (Jud. viii. 1).

[B. F. W.]

8. One of the ancestors of Christ (Luke iii. 30), son of Jonan, and the eighth generation from David inclusive, about contemporary therefore with king Abaziah.

9. Another ancestor of Christ, son of Judah or Abiud, and grandson of Joanna or Hananiah the son of Zerubbabel (Luke iii. 26). Alford, Westcott and Hort, &c., adopt the reading Josek, a mistake which seems to originate with the common confusion in Heb. MSS. between ῥ and ῑ.

10. Another, son of Mattathias, in the seventh generation before Joseph the husband of the Virgin.

11. Son of Heli, and reputed father of Jesus Christ. The recurrence of this name in the three above instances, once before and twice after Zerubbabel, whereas it does not occur once in St. Matthew's genealogy, is a strong evidence of the paternal descent of Joseph the son of Heli, as traced by St. Luke to Nathan the son of David.

All that is told us of Joseph in the N. T. may be summed up in a few words. He was a just man, and of the house and lineage of David, and was known as such by his contemporaries, who called Jesus the son of David, and were disposed to own Him as Messiah, as being Joseph's son. The public registers also contained his name under the reckoning of the house of David (John i. 45; Luke iii. 23; Matt. i. 20; Luke ii. 4). He lived at Nazareth in Galilee, and it is probable that his family had been settled there for at least two preceding generations, possibly from the time of Matthat, the common grandfather of Joseph and Mary, since Mary lived there too (Luke i. 26, 27). He espoused Mary, the daughter and heir of his uncle Jacob, and before he took her home as his wife received the angelic communication recorded in Matt. i. 20. It must have been within a very short time of his taking her to his home, that the decree went forth from Augustus Caesar which obliged him to leave Nazareth with his wife and go to Bethlehem. He was there with Mary and her first-born, when the shepherds came to see the babe in the manger, and he went with them to the Temple to present the infant according to the Law, and there heard the prophetic words of Simeon, as he held him in his arms. When the wise men from the East came to Bethlehem to worship Christ, Joseph was there; and he went down to Egypt with the Mother and the Child by night, when warned by an Angel of the danger which threatened them; and on a second message he returned with them to the land of Israel, intending to reside at Bethlehem, the city of

* It is not without design that the Papyrus Ebers ends at the 110th page, and Aulus Gellius knew something of the significance of this number, for in his Noctes Atticæ he explains (x. 10) that the Egyptians only lived 110 years, because the heart loses each year seven drachms up to the age of fifty years, and then two drachms yearly till the hundredth year.

David; but being afraid of Archelaus he took up his abode, as before his marriage, at Nazareth, where he carried on his trade as a carpenter. When Jesus was twelve years old, Joseph and Mary took Him with them to keep the Passover at Jerusalem, and when they returned to Nazareth he continued to act as a father to the child Jesus, and was reputed to be so indeed. But here our knowledge of Joseph ends. That he died before our Lord's crucifixion, is indeed tolerably certain, by what is related in John xix. 27; and perhaps Mark vi. 3 may imply that he was then dead. But where, when, or how he died, we know not. What was his age when he married, what children he had, and who was their mother, are questions on which tradition has been very busy and very contradictory, and on which it affords no reliable information whatever. In fact, the different accounts given are not traditions, but the attempts of different ages of the early Church to reconcile the narrative of the Gospels with their own opinions, and to give support, as they thought, to the miraculous conception. It is not necessary to detail or examine these accounts here, as they throw light rather upon the history of those opinions during four or five centuries, than upon the history of Joseph. But it may be well to add that the origin of all the earliest stories and assertions of the Fathers concerning Joseph—as, e.g., his extreme old age, his having sons by a former wife, his having the custody of Mary given to him by lot, and so on—is to be found in the apocryphal Gospels, of which the earliest is the Protevangelium of St. James, apparently the work of a Christian Jew of the second century, quoted by Origen, and referred to by Clement of Alexandria and Justin Martyr (Tischendorf, Proleg. xiii.). The same stories are repeated in the other apocryphal Gospels (see Smith and Wace, Dict. of Christian Biography, s. v. "Gospels, Apocryphal"). The monophysite Coptic Christians are said to have first assigned a festival of St. Joseph in the Calendar, viz. on the 20th July, which is thus inscribed in a Coptic almanack:—"Requies sancti senis justi Josephi fabri lignarii, Deiparæ Virginis Mariæ sponsi, qui pater Christi vocari promeruit." The apocryphal Historia Josephi fabri lignarii (see "Gospels, Apocryphal," p. 706), which now exists in Arabic, is thought by Tischendorf to have been originally written in Coptic, and the festival of Joseph is supposed to have been transferred to the Western Churches from the East as late as the year 1399.* The above-named history is acknowledged to be quite fabulous, though it belongs probably to the 4th century. It professes to be an account given by our Lord Himself to the Apostles on the Mount of Olives, and placed by them in the library of Jerusalem. It ascribes 111 years to Joseph's life, and makes him old and the father of four sons and two daughters before he espoused Mary. It is headed with this sentence: "Benedictiones ejus et preces servant nos omnes, o fratres. Amen." The reader who wishes to know the opinion of the ancients on the obscure subject of Joseph's marriage may consult Jerome's acrimonious tract Contra Helvidium. He will see that Jerome highly disapproves the common opinion (derived from the apocryphal Gospels) of Joseph being twice married, and that he claims the authority of Ignatius, Polycarp, Irenæus, Justin Martyr, and "many other apostolical men," in favour of his own view, that our Lord's brethren were his cousins only, or at all events against the opinion of Helvidius, which had been held by Ebion, Theodotus of Byzantium, and Valentine, that they were the children of Joseph and Mary. Those who held this opinion were called Antidicomarianitæ, as enemies of the Virgin. (Epiphanius, Adv. Hæres. lib. iii. t. ii.; Hæres. lxxviii., also Hæres. li. See also Pearson on the Creed, art. Virgin Mary; Mill, on the Brethren of the Lord; Calmet, de S. Joseph. S. Mar. Virg. conjuge; and for an able statement of the opposite view, Alford's note on Matt. xiii. 55; Winer, RWB. s. vv. Jesus and Joseph; and the article in this Dictionary, "The Brethren of the Lord.") [A. C. H.]

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHAEA (Ἰωσήφ ὁ ἀπὸ Ἀριμαθίας), a rich and pious Israelite who had the privilege of performing the last offices of duty and affection to the Body of our Lord. He is distinguished from other persons of the same name by the addition of his birth-place ARIMATHAEA, the Ramah of 1 Sam. i. 1, 19.

Joseph is denominated by St. Mark (xv. 43) an honourable counsellor, by which we are probably to understand that he was a member of the Great Council, or Sanhedrin. He is further characterised as "a good man and a just" (Luke xxiii. 50), one of those who, bearing in their hearts the words of their old Prophets, was waiting for the kingdom of God (Mark xv. 43; Luke ii. 25, 38, xxiii. 51). We are expressly told that he did not "consent to the counsel and deed" of his colleagues in conspiring to bring about the death of Jesus; but he seems to have lacked the courage to protest against their judgment. At all events we know that he shrank, through fear of his countrymen, from professing himself openly a disciple of our Lord.

The awful event, however, which crushed the hopes while it excited the fears of the chosen disciples, had the effect of inspiring him with a boldness and confidence to which he had before been a stranger. The Crucifixion seems to have wrought in him the same clear conviction that it wrought in the Centurion who stood by the Cross; for on the very evening of that dreadful day, when the triumph of the chief priests and rulers seemed complete, Joseph "went in boldly unto Pilate and craved the body of Jesus." The fact is mentioned by all four Evangelists. Pilate, having assured himself that the Divine Sufferer was dead, consented to the request of Joseph, who was thus rewarded for his faith and courage by the blessed privilege of consigning to his own new tomb the Body of his crucified Lord. In this sacred office he was assisted by Nicodemus, who, like himself, had hitherto been afraid to make open profession of his faith, but now dismissing his fears brought an abundant store of myrrh and aloes for the embalming of the Body of his Lord according to the Jewish custom.

* Calmet, however, places the admission of Joseph into the calendar of the Western Church as early as before the year 900. See Tischendorf, ut sup.

These two masters in Israel then, having enfolded the sacred Body in the linen shroud which Joseph had bought, consigned it to a tomb hewn in a rock—a tomb where no human corpse had ever yet been laid.

It is specially recorded that the tomb was in a garden belonging to Joseph, and close to the place of Crucifixion.

The minuteness of the narrative seems purposely designed to take away all ground or pretext for any rumour that might be spread, after the Resurrection, that it was some other, not Jesus Himself, that had risen from the grave. But the burial of Jesus in the new private sepulchre of the rich man of Arimathæa must also be regarded as the fulfilment of the prophecy of Isaiah (liiii. 9): according to the literal rendering of Bishop Lowth, "with the rich man was His tomb" (cp. Delitzsch⁴ in loco. The passage is much disputed; cp. Dillmann⁴ in loco). Nothing but of the merest legendary character is recorded of Joseph, beyond what we read in Scripture. There is a tradition, surely a very improbable one, that he was of the number of the seventy disciples. Another (cp. Fabric. Cod. Apoc. N. T. i. 270), whether authentic or not, deserves to be mentioned as generally current; namely, that Joseph being sent to Great Britain by the Apostle St. Philip, about the year 63, settled with his brother disciples at Glastonbury, in Somersetshire; and there erected of wicker-twigs the first Christian oratory in England, the parent of the majestic abbey which was afterwards founded on the same site. The local guides to this day show the miraculous thorn (said to bud and blossom every Christmas-day) that sprung from the staff which Joseph stuck in the ground as he stopped to rest himself on the hill-top (see Dugdale's Monasticon, i. 1; and Hearne, Hist. and Ant. of Glastonbury; Asseman, Bibl. Orient. iii. 319).

JOSEPH, called BAR'SABAS, and surnamed Justus; one of the two persons chosen by the assembled Church (Acts i. 23) as worthy to fill the place in the apostolic company from which Judas had fallen. He, therefore, had been a companion of the disciples all the time that they followed Jesus, from His Baptism to His Ascension.

Papias (ap. Euseb. H. E. iii. 39) calls him Justus Barsabas, and relates that having drunk some deadly poison he, through the grace of the Lord, sustained no harm. Eusebius (H. E. i. 12) states that he was one of the seventy disciples. He is to be distinguished from Josès Barnabas (Acts iv. 36) and from Judas Barsabas (Acts xv. 22). The signification of Barsabas is quite uncertain. Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. Acts i. 23) gives five possible interpretations of it, viz. the son of conversion, of quiet, of an oath, of wisdom, of the old man. He prefers the last two; and suggests that Joseph Barsabas may be the same as Josès the son of Alphaeus, and that Judas Barsabas may be his brother the Apostle.

JOSEPHUS (Ἰωσήφος), 1 Esd. ix. 34. [JOSEPH, 3.]

JOSE-S (Ἰωσῆς, Ἰησοῦς, Alfred; Ἰωσῆ is the genitive case). 1. Son of Eliezer, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 29), 15th generation from David, i.e. about the reign of Manasseh.

2. One of the Lord's brethren (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3). His name connects him with the preceding. See the BROTHERS OF THE LORD and JAMES. All that appears with certainty from Scripture is that his mother's name was Mary, and his brother's James (Matt. xxvii. 56).

3. JOSÈS BARNABAS (Acts iv. 36). [BARNABAS.] [A. C. H.]

JO'SHAH (יֹשָׁה); B. Ἰωσείδ, Bp. Ἰωσία, A. Ἰωσίας; Josa), a prince of the house of Simeon, son of Amaziah, and connected with the more prosperous branch of the tribe, who, in the days of Hezekiah, headed a marauding expedition against the peaceable Hamite shepherds dwelling in Gedor, exterminated them, and occupied their pasturage (1 Ch. iv. 34, 38–41).

JO'SHAPHAT (יֹשָׁפָט = יְהוֹשָׁפָט = Jehovah hath judged; Ἰωσάφατ, N*. Ἰωσάφατ; Josaphat), the Mithnite, one of David's guard, apparently selected from among the warriors from the east of Jordan (1 Ch. xi. 43). Buxtorf (Lex. Talm. p. 1284) gives Mathnan as the Chaldee equivalent of Bashan, by which the latter is always represented in the Targ. Onk.; and if this were the place which gave Josphat his surname, he was probably a Gadite. In the Syriac, Josphat and Uzziah (v. 44) are interchanged, and the latter appears as "Azi of Anathoth."

JOSHAVIAH (יֹשָׁבִי'אֵה), of uncertain etymology; Bk. Ἰωσείδ; A. Ἰωσία; Josafat), the son of Elnaam, and one of David's guards (1 Ch. xi. 46). The LXX. make him the son of Jeribai, by reading יְרִבַּי for יֹשָׁבִי. The name appears in eight, and probably nine, different forms in the MSS. collated by Kennicott.

JOSHEKA'SHAH (יֹשֶׁבֶקָאֵה): in v. 4, B. Ἰεῖβασακά; A. Σεβα καράν; in v. 24, B. Βακαρά, A. Ἰεσβακαράν; Jeshaccassa, the head of the 16th course of musicians. [JESHARELAH.] He belonged to the house of Heman (1 Ch. xxv. 4, 24). [A. C. H.]

JOSHUA (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ); Ἰησοῦς; Josua; i.e. "whose help is Jehovah," Gesen., or rather "Jah is Salvation"; cp. Pearson, On the Creed, Art. II., p. 89, ed. 1843: on the import of his name, and the change of it from Oshea or Hoshea, Num. xiii. 16 = "welfare" or "salvation," see Pearson, l. c.; it appears in the various forms of HOSHEA, OSHEA, JEHOSHUA, JESHUA, and JESUS. 1. The son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim* (1 Ch. vii. 27). The future captain of invading hosts grew up a slave in the brick-fields of Egypt. Born about the time when Moses fled into Midian, he was a man of nearly forty years when he saw the ten plagues, and shared in the hurried triumph of the Exodus. The keen eye of the aged Lawgiver soon discerned in Hoshea those qualities which might be required in a colleague or successor to himself. He is mentioned first in connexion with the fight against Amalek at Rephidim, when he was chosen (Ex. xvii. 9) by Moses to lead the Israelites. When Moses ascended Mount Sinai to receive for the first time (cp. Ex. xxiv. 13 and xxxiii. 11) the two Tables, Joshua, who is called his minister or servant, accompanied him part of the way, and was the first to accost him in his descent (Ex. xxxii. 17). Soon afterwards he was one of the twelve chiefs who were sent (Num. xiii. 17) to explore the land of Canaan, and one of the two (xiv. 6) who gave an encouraging report of their journey. The forty years of wandering were almost passed, and Joshua was one of the few survivors, when Moses, shortly before his death, was directed (Num. xxvii. 18) to invest Joshua solemnly and publicly with definite authority in connexion with Eleazar the priest, over the people. And after this was done, God Himself gave Joshua a charge by the mouth of the dying Lawgiver (Deut. xxxi. 14, 23).

* The attempts to make Joshua an unbiographical personage or a tribal-captain magnified into a leader of Israel, have signally failed. These attempts are sufficiently examined and refuted by Kittel, Geschichte d. Hebräer, i. pp. 247 sq., 264 sq.—[F.]

Under the direction of God, again renewed (Josh. i. 1), Joshua, now in his eighty-fifth year (Joseph. Ant. v. 1, § 29), assumed the command of the people at Shittim, sent spies into Jericho, crossed the Jordan, fortified a camp at Gilgal, circumcised the people, kept the Passover, and was visited by the Captain^b of the Lord's Host. A miracle made the fall of Jericho more terrible to the Canaanites. A repulse, due to the trespass of Achan, in the first assault on Ai impressed upon the invaders the warning that they were the instruments of a holy and jealous God. Ai fell: and the Law was inscribed on Mount Ebal, and read by their leader in the presence of all Israel.

The treaty which the fear-stricken Gibeonites obtained deceitfully was generously respected by Joshua. It stimulated and brought to a point the hostile movements of the five confederate chiefs of the Amorites. Joshua, aided by an unprecedented hailstorm, and a miraculous prolongation of the day, obtained a decisive victory over them at Makkedah, and proceeded at once to subjugate the south country as far as Kadesh-barnea and Gaza. He returned to the camp at Gilgal, a star of half of Palestine.

In another campaign he marched to the waters of Merom, where he met and overthrew a confederacy of the Canaanitish chiefs in the north, under Jabin king of Hazor; and in the course of a protracted war he led his victorious soldiers to the gates of Zidon and into the valley of Lebanon under Hermon. In six years, six nations with thirty-one kings swelled the roll of his conquests; amongst others the Anakim—the old terror of Israel—are specially ^b It has been questioned whether the Captain of the Lord's Host was a created being or not. Dr. W. H. Mill discusses this point at full length and with great learning, and decides in favour of the former alternative (On the Historical Character of St. Luke's First Chapter, Camb., 1841, p. 92. Cp. Dillmann² on Josh. v. 13, = an Angel, comparing Gen. xxxii. 2 and 1 K. xxii. 19). But J. G. Abicht (De Duce Exercitus, &c., ap. Nov. Thes. Theologicophilolog. i. 503) is of opinion that He was the uncreated Angel, the Son of God—"God manifested in the Person of His Word" (Espin in Speaker's Comm., in loco).

recorded as destroyed everywhere except in Philistia. It must be borne in mind that the extensive conquests of Joshua were not intended to achieve and did not achieve the complete extirpation of the Canaanites, many of whom continued to occupy isolated strongholds throughout the land.

Joshua, now stricken in years, proceeded in conjunction with Eleazar and the heads of the tribes to complete the division of the conquered land; and when all was allotted, Timnath-serah in Mount Ephraim was assigned by the people as Joshua's peculiar inheritance. The Tabernacle of the congregation was established at Shiloh, six cities of refuge were appointed, forty-eight cities assigned to the Levites, and the warriors of the trans-Jordanic tribes dismissed in peace to their homes.

After an interval of rest, Joshua convoked an assembly from all Israel. He delivered two solemn addresses reminding them of the marvellous fulfilment of God's promises to their fathers, and warning them of the conditions on which their prosperity depended; and lastly, he caused them to renew their covenant with God at Shechem, a place already famous in connexion with Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 4) and Joseph (Josh. xxiv. 32). Respecting these two closing addresses of Joshua, see also JOSHUA, BOOK OF, pp. 1810 b, 1811 a.

He died at the age of 110 years, and was buried in his own city, Timnath-serah.

Joshua's life has been noted as one of the very few which are recorded in history with some fulness of detail, yet without any stain upon them. In his character have been traced, under an Oriental garb, such features as chiefly kindled the imagination of Western chroniclers and poets in the Middle Ages: the character of a devout warrior, blameless and fearless, who has been taught by serving as a youth how to command as a man; who earns by manly vigour a quiet honoured old age; who combines strength with gentleness, ever looking up for and obeying the Divine impulse with the simplicity of a child, while he wields great power and directs it calmly, and without swerving, to the accomplishment of a high unselfish purpose.

All that part of the Book of Joshua which relates his personal history seems to be written with the unconscious, vivid power of an eyewitness. We are not merely taught to look with a distant reverence upon the first man who bears the Name which is above every name. We stand by the side of one who is admitted to hear the words of God, and see the vision of the Almighty. The image of the armed warrior is before us when in the sight of the two armies he lifted up his spear over unguarded Ai. We see the majestic presence which inspired all Israel (iv. 14) with awe; the mild father who remonstrated with Achan; the calm, dignified judge who pronounced his sentence; the devout worshipper prostrating himself before the Captain of the Lord's Host. We see the lonely man in the height of his power, separate from these about him, the last survivor, save one, of a famous generation; the honoured old man of many deeds and many sufferings, gathering his dying energy for an attempt to bind his people more closely to the service of God, whom he had so long served and worshipped, and whom he was ever learning to know more and more.

The great work of Joshua's life was more exciting but less hopeful than that of Moses. He gathered the first-fruits of the autumn harvest where his predecessor had sown the seed in spring. It was a high and hopeful task to watch beside the cradle of a mighty nation, and to train its early footsteps in laws which should last for centuries. And it was a fit end to a life of expectation to gaze with longing eyes from Pisgah upon the Land of Promise. But no such brightness gleamed upon the calm close of Joshua's life. Solemn words, and dark with foreboding, fell from him as he sat "under the oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord in Shechem." The excitement of his battles was past; and there had grown up in the mind of the pious leader a consciousness that it was the tendency of prosperity and success to make a people wanton and worldly-minded, idolaters in spirit if not in act, and to alienate them from God.

Holy Scripture itself suggests (Heb. iv. 8) the consideration of Joshua as a type of Christ. Many of the Christian Fathers have enlarged upon this view; and Bishop Pearson, who has collected their opinions (On the Creed, Art. II. pp. 87-90 and 94-96, ed. 1843), points out the following and many other typical resemblances:—(1.) The name common to both: (2.) Joshua brings the people of God into the Land of Promise, and divides the land among the tribes; Jesus brings His people into the Presence of God, and assigns to them their mansions: (3.) as Joshua succeeded Moses and completed his work, so the Gospel of Christ, succeeding the Law, announced One by Whom all that believe are justified from all things from which we could not be justified by the Law of Moses (Acts xiii. 39): (4.) as Joshua the minister of Moses renewed the rite of circumcision, so Jesus, the Minister of the circumcision, brought in the circumcision of the heart (Rom. ii. 29, xv. 8).

The treatment of the Canaanites by their Jewish conquerors is fully discussed by Dean Graves, On the Pentateuch, Pt. 3, Lect. i. He concludes that the extermination of the Canaanites was justified by their crimes, and that the employment of the Jews in such extermination was quite consistent with God's method of governing the world. Prof. Fairbairn (Typology of Scripture, bk. iii. ch. 4, § 1, ed. 1854) argues with great force and candour in favour of the complete agreement of the principles on which the war was carried on by Joshua with the principles of the Christian dispensation. Cp. also Mozley, Lectures on the Old Testament; Lect. iv., "Exterminating Wars."

Among the occurrences in the life of Joshua, none has led to so much discussion as the alleged prolongation of the day of the battle of Makkedah (x. 12-14). Was it an astronomical miracle by which the motion of the heavenly bodies was for some hours suspended? Or, was the motion of the earth on its axis temporarily suspended? Or, was the miracle an optical illusion? Such solutions have been accepted by many (cp. Winer, HWB. and the 1st edition of this work); but in the present day they seem to be surrendered in favour of the view—that the passage (vv. 12b, 13a) taken from a poetical book with a prose reflection upon it (vv. 13b, 14a) is a fragment interpolated into the text, which does not commit the Book of Joshua to upholding that the marvel in the heavens actually took place (cp. Espin in Speaker's Comm., Add. note on Josh. x. 12-15, and Dillmann² in loco, who give references to the enormous literature on the subject).

Procopius, who flourished in the 6th century, relates (Vandal. ii. 10) that an inscription existed at Tingis in Mauritania, set up by Phœnician refugees from Canaan, and declaring in the Phœnician language, "We are they who fled from the face of Joshua the robber, the son of Nun." Ewald (Gesch. Isr. ii. 297, 298) gives sound reasons for forbearing to use this story as authentic history (cp. also Kittel, Geschichte d. Hebräer, i. p. 264, n. 1). It is, however, accepted by Rawlinson (Bampton Lectures for 1859, iii. 91).

Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. in Matt. i. 5, and Chorogr. Lucæ præmis. iv. § 3) quotes Jewish traditions to the effect that Rahab became a proelyte and the wife of Joshua, and the ancestress of nine prophets and priests; also that the sepulchre of Joshua was adorned with an image of the sun in memory of the miracle of Ajalon. The LXX. and the Arab. Vers. add to Josh. xxiv. 30 the statement that in his sepulchre were deposited the flint-knives which were used for the circumcision at Gilgal (Josh. v. 2). In Heb. iv. 8, the A. V. "Jesus" (see marg.) is correctly replaced by "Joshua" in the R. V. and Versions preceding the A. V. in order to avoid confusion.

The principal occurrences in the life of Joshua are reviewed by Bishop Hall in his Contemplations on the O. T., bks 7, 8, and 9.

2. (B. Ὠσῆε, A. Ἰησοῦ; Josue.) An inhabitant of Bethshemesh, in whose land was the stone at which the milch-kine stopped, when they drew the Ark of God with the offerings of the Philistines from Ekron to Bethshemesh (1 Sam. vi. 14, 18).

3. (Ἰησοῦς; Josue.) A governor of the city who gave his name to a gate of Jerusalem (2 K. xxiii. 8).

4. (Ἰεσοῦς; Jesue.) Called Jeshua in Ezra and Nehemiah; a high-priest, who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel. For details see JESUIA, No. 4. [W. T. B.] [F.]

JOSH'UA, THE BOOK OF, so called from the name of the leader, with whose public life it is principally concerned, the sixth Book of the O. T. Canon. Among the Jews, the Book of Joshua was placed in a different category from the Pentateuch (the "Law"), and forms the first of the group of writings called by them the "Earlier Prophets" (i.e. Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings): but this distinction is an artificial one, depending on the fact that the Book could not be regarded, like the Pentateuch, as containing an authoritative rule of life. Its contents, and still more (as will be seen) its structure, show that it is intimately connected with the Pentateuch, and describes the final stage in the history of the Origines of the Hebrew nation [GENESIS, § 1]. It forms, in fact, the concluding part of a whole, which, consisting as it does of six Books, has been conveniently termed by modern writers the Hexateuch.

§ 1. Contents.—The Book of Joshua falls naturally into two parts, the first (ch. i.—xii.) narrating the passage of Jordan and the conquest—so far as it was completed at the time—of Canaan; the second (ch. xiii.—xxiv.) describing the allotment of the conquered territory among the Israelites, and ending with the death of Joshua and of Aaron's son Eleazar.

I. Ch. i. Joshua is encouraged by God for the task imposed upon him, and receives, according to the stipulation (Num. xiii. 6–33), the promise of assistance from the two-and-a-half tribes whose territory had been already allotted to them on the E. of Jordan. Ch. ii. The mission of the spies to Jericho, and the compact with Rahab. Ch. iii.—iv. The passage of the Jordan, and the erection of two monuments in commemoration of the event, consisting of two cairns of stones, one set up in the bed of the river itself, the other at the first camping-place on the W. side, Gilgal. Gilgal, probably Tell Djeldjul, in the plain midway between the Jordan and Jericho, becomes henceforth the head-quarters of the Israelites, till the conquest is completed. Ch. v. 1–12. Joshua circumcises the people at Gilgal: after this the Passover is kept there with cakes made of the produce of Canaan, and the manna ceases. Ch. v. 13–vi. Joshua receives instructions with reference to the conquest of Jericho; the city is taken and “devoted” (according to Deut. vii. 2, 25 sq.), Rahab and her household being spared according to the agreement made with the spies. Joshua utters a curse upon any one who should attempt to rebuild Jericho. Ch. vii. 1–viii. 29. The Israelites advance against Ai, in the heart of the land near Bethel: they are at first unsuccessful in consequence of Achan's sin, in having appropriated part of the spoil “devoted” at Jericho: but afterwards, Achan's offence having been discovered and punished, they obtain possession of Ai by means of a stratagem. Ch. viii. 30–35. Joshua builds an altar on Ebal, above Shechem, and fulfils the injunctions, Deut. xvii. 2–8. Ch. ix. The Gibeonites, by a stratagem which disarms the suspicions of the Israelites, secure immunity for their lives, and are permitted to retain rights as dependents, on condition of their performing certain menial offices for the Sanctuary. Ch. x. The conquest of South Canaan: the defeat of the kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon at Beth-horon, and the subsequent conquest of Makkedah, Libnah, Lachish, Gezer, Eglon, Hebron, and Debir: further particulars are not given, but Joshua's successes in this quarter of Palestine are generalized in vv. 40–43. Ch. xi. The conquest of Northern Canaan: the defeat of Jabin king of Hazor and his allies at the waters of Merom, followed by the capture of the towns belonging to them (vv. 1–15): with a review (vv. 16–23) of the entire series of Joshua's successes in the South as well as in the North of Canaan. Ch. xii. A supplementary list of the kings smitten by the Israelites—Sihon and Og (with an account of the territory belonging to them) on the east of Jordan, and thirty-one kings slain by them under Joshua on the west of Jordan (of these sixteen have not been before mentioned in the Book: see § 3, note 11). II. Ch. xiii.—xxiv.—Ch. xiii. (a) vv. 1–14. Joshua is commanded to proceed with the distribution of the conquered territory among the nine-and-a-half tribes, vv. 1, 7 (vv. 2–6 contain a parenthetic notice of certain districts not yet conquered): vv. 8–12 define anew the borders of the Israelitish territory E. of Jordan; v. 13 states particulars respecting tribes not dispossessed by the Israelites. (b) vv. 15–33. The borders and cities of the three trans-Jordanic tribes, Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh. Ch. xiv. Preparations for the division of the land by lot, by Joshua and Eleazar (vv. 1–5). Caleb receives from Joshua his portion at Hebron, in accordance with the promise, Deut. i. 36 (vv. 6–15). Ch. xv. The borders of the tribe of Judah, vv. 1–12, followed by a notice of Caleb's exploit against Hebron, and Othniel's conquest of Kirjath-sepher, vv. 13–19 (vv. 14–19 almost verbally = Judg. i. 10–15), and by a list of the cities of Judah, arranged by districts, vv. 20–63. Ch. xvi.—xvii. The lot of the children of Joseph, i. e. Ephraim and the western half of Manasseh. The description is much less complete than in the case of Judah, and also less clearly arranged. Ch. xvi. 1–3 describes the S. border (but only this) of the two tribes, regarded as a whole: ch. xvi. 5–10 describes the borders of Ephraim, with a notice (v. 9) of certain cities belonging to Ephraim, but situated in the territory of Manasseh, and (v. 10) of the fact that Gezer continued to be inhabited by Canaanites (v. 10 = Judg. i. 29: see also 1 K. ix. 16, 20, 21). Ch. xvii. describes the borders of Manasseh, with a notice of the cities belonging to it in Issachar and Asher (vv. 1–13), concluding (vv. 14–18) with an account of the complaint of insufficient territory made by the joint tribes and of the permission given to them by Joshua to extend their territory for themselves. Ch. xviii. The Israelites assemble at Shiloh, and set up the Tabernacle there. At Joshua's direction, a survey (“describe” lit. “write”) of the land yet undivided is made, and its distribution by lot to the seven remaining tribes is proceeded with at Shiloh, vv. 1–10. An account of the borders (vv. 11–20) and cities (vv. 21–28) of Benjamin occupies the rest of the chapter. Ch. xix. The cities belonging to Simeon, vv. 1–9; the borders of Zebulun, vv. 10–16 (the list of cities is incomplete); the cities and border (partly) of Issachar, vv. 17–23; the borders of Asher, vv. 24–31 (list of cities incomplete); the border and cities of Naphtali, vv. 32–39; the cities belonging to Dan, vv. 40–48; the assignment of Timnath-serah, in Ephraim, to Joshua, v. 49 sq. Ch. xx. Appointment of the cities of refuge (in accordance with Num. xxxv. 9 sq. and Deut. xix.; Deut. iv. 41–3 being disregarded). Ch. xxi. List of the forty-eight cities, assigned in the different tribes, to the tribe of Levi (in accordance with Num. xxxv. 1–8). Ch. xxii. Joshua dismisses the two-and-a-half tribes to their homes on the east of Jordan, vv. 1–8. The remonstrance addressed to them by the other tribes on account of the altar erected by them at the point where they crossed the Jordan, and their reply to it, vv. 9–34. Ch. xxiii. The first of Joshua's two closing addresses to the people, in which he exhorts the Israelites to adhere faithfully to the principles of the Deuteronomic law, and in particular to refrain from all intercourse with the native inhabitants of Canaan. Ch. xxiv. 1–25. The second of Joshua's closing addresses, delivered at Shechem. This discourse differs in scope from that in

ch. xiii.: it comprises a review of the mercies shown by God to His people from the patriarchal days, upon which is based the duty of discarding all false gods and serving Him alone. The people, responding to Joshua's example, pledge themselves solemnly to obey; and a stone, in attestation of their act, is erected in the sanctuary at Shechem, vv. 16-28 (with vv. 14, 26 cp. Gen. xxxv. 2-4). The Book closes with notices of the death of Joshua, and his burial at Timnath-serah, c. 29 sq.; of the burial of Joseph's bones (in accordance with Gen. i. 25; Ex. xiii. 19) at Shechem, c. 32; and of the death and burial of Joshua's companion, Eleazar, c. 33 (vv. 28-31 recur, with slight variations, in Judg. ii. 6, 8, 9, 7). Chronological notes in the Book are rare (iv. 19, v. 10; and incidentally, xiv. 10); and the period of time embraced by it can only be determined approximately. From a comparison of xiv. 10 with Deut. ii. 14, it would seem that, in the view of the writer of the section, xiv. 6-15, the war of conquest occupied about seven years.

§ 2. Composition and Authorship.—The composite structure of the Book of Joshua discloses itself unmistakably as soon as it is studied with attention. Groups of passages occur in it, distinguished from one another partly by material differences, partly by differences of style and expression, which mark them as the work of different authors. Thus, one group of such passages has the characteristics of the Pentateuchal source known as P (see GENESIS): while another has strong affinities with Deuteronomy, esp. with ch. xxix.-xxxi.* In ch. i.-xii. the main narrative consists of a work, itself in its turn composite, which is regarded by critics as the continuation of "JE" (see ibid.), though whether its component parts are definitely J and E, or whether it is rather the work of the writer who combined J and E into a whole, and in this Book, perhaps, permitted himself the use of other independent sources, may be an open question. In ch. xiii.-xxiv., especially in the topographical descriptions, the work of P predominates, and his disposition of material seems mostly to have been retained unaltered. The process by which the Book appears to have reached its present form may be indicated in outline as follows. The composite work JE, just alluded to, being taken as a basis, was amplified by a writer strongly imbued with the spirit of Deuteronomy, who may be accordingly termed the Deuteronomic Editor, and denoted by the abbreviation D². The parts due to the hand of D² are in most cases readily recognizable by their strongly marked style. The chief characteristic of the Deut. additions is that they exhibit Joshua as the fulfiller of Mosaic ordinances, especially of the injunction to show no quarter to the native population of Canaan, and explain how accordingly success accompanied him, and the people under his guidance took triumphant possession of Canaan: see i. 1-9; iii. 7, 10; iv. 14; v. 1; vi. 2; viii. 1, 29 (Deut. xxi. 23), 30-35; and esp. x. 40-42; xi. 12, 14, 15, 16-23; xxi. 43-45 (Heb. 41-43); xxiii. 3, 9, 14 b; xxiv. 13, and the addition in v. 11. In point of fact, as other passages of the Book, and especially Judg. i., show (see § 6), the conquest was by no means effected with the rapidity and completeness here represented: but the writer, as it seems, generalizes with a free hand. Another characteristic of the Deut. additions is the frequent reference to the occupation of the trans-Jordanic territory by the two-and-a-half tribes—not merely in i. 12 sq. and xxii. 1-6, but also ii. 10, ix. 10, xii. 2-6, xiii. 8-12, xviii. 7 b. The work which left D²'s hands was afterwards combined, by an independent compiler, with the source P; and, with the exception possibly of a few notes which may have been added subsequently, the Book of Joshua was thus produced.^b The accompanying tables, followed by short explanatory notes, exhibit the analysis of sources.^c

² The Deut. style of these two verses—and of these alone in the entire chapter—is evident: see Deut. xxxi. 4; i. 28; and esp. iv. 39: also Josh. iv. 23, v. 1, vii. 5b (all D²). V. 9 contains reminiscences from the Song in Ex. xv. (28, 15). The verses afford an excellent illustration of the practice of the Hebrew historians to represent historical characters as employing words and phrases familiar to themselves. (So, for instance, David in 1 K. ii.

^b Dillmann (less probably) holds that P was united with JE before it passed into D²'s hands. The difference does not affect the analysis of sources, but only the manner in which they are supposed to have been combined.

^c To avoid complication, subordinate details are not introduced into the tables.

3-4 uses the phraseology of the compiler of Kings: throughout 1 Ch. xxix. he expresses himself in the phraseology of the author of Chronicles.) Shittim in li. 1 as Num. xxv. 1 (JE).

³ The narrative in ch. iii.-iv. is intricate, and it is very possible that the true analysis is more complicated than is allowed for in the tables. Though some of the details are, consequently, uncertain, two things, however, are clear: (1) that the narrative is composite, (2) that it has been amplified in parts by a Deuteronomic hand. (1) a. While iii. 17 states that the passage of Jordan is already completed, iv. 4, 5, 10b implies that the people have not yet crossed: thus, if followed carefully, it will be seen that the narrative at iv. 11 is at precisely the same point that was reached at iii. 17. b. iv. 8 and iv. 9 describe two different ceremonies—the location of stones, taken from Jordan, at Gilgal, and the erection of stones in the bed of the river itself: v. 8 however manifestly continues the narrative of v. 3, while v. 9 is the sequel of vv. 4-7, which on the other hand interrupt the connexion of v. 3 with v. 8. c. iii. 12 is not needed, if it and iv. 2 belong to the same narrative; it is however required for iv. 4. The verses assigned to a form a continuous narrative, relating to the stones deposited at Gilgal: the narrative b has not been preserved in its integrity, parts having been omitted when it was combined with a. (2) The combined narrative a b has been amplified by D² (as the style shows) in iii. 7, iv. 14, 21-24, and probably in one or two places besides, e.g. iii. 3, "the priests the Levites" (cp. DEUTERONOMY, § 16), iii. 10b (cp. below, § 8, l.). (The letters a and b have been used because it seems doubtful whether the two narratives belong to J and E respectively.)

⁵ With probably a few phrases added by D² (cp. e.g. v. 26b with Deut. xiii. 17 [Heb. 18]).

⁷ With regard to this passage, a difficulty arises on account of the position which it occupies in the Book. Ebal is situated considerably to the north of Ai; and while the intervening territory remained unconquered, it is difficult to understand how the Israelites could have advanced as far. One suggestion is that the verses are misplaced, and should follow xi. 23: more probably the narrative of JE has not been preserved in its integrity, and the account which—to judge from the analogy of ch. x. and of ch. xi.—it must once have contained respecting the conquest of Central Palestine has been omitted by the compiler of the Book. On the analysis of the verses, cp. Kuenen, Theologische Tijdschr. 1878, pp. 315-322. viii. 30-32 agrees with Deut. xxvii. 1-8; v. 33 also agrees tolerably with Deut. xi. 29, xxvii. 11-13, but not completely, there being no mention of the curse. The reading of the Law, v. 34 sq., is not enjoined in Deuteronomy. In v. 34 the words "the blessing and the curse," which, though they seem to be explanatory of "all the words of the law," evidently cannot be so in reality, are perhaps a later insertion, made for the purpose of rectifying the apparent omission in v. 33. In v. 33 notice the Deuteronomic phrase, "the priests the Levites" (DEUTERONOMY, § 16); and with v. 35b cp. Deut. xxix. 11 [Heb. 10].

⁸ In v. 27 the words "for the congregation, and" are derived, in all probability, from the narrative of P. (v. 27b, cp. DEUTERONOMY, § 38, No. 2.)

¹¹ Another generalizing review by D², vv. 1-6 being a retrospective survey of the conquests made under Moses on the E. of Jordan (based, as Hollenberg, p. 499 sq. [see § 7], shows, not on Num. xxi., &c., but on Deut. iii. 9-12, 14-17), vv. 7-24 containing a list of the kings defeated by Joshua in Canaan itself. Of the thirty-one (or, if v. 18 be corrected after the LXX. [see QPB], 30) places named, sixteen (fifteen) are not mentioned elsewhere among the conquests under Joshua, viz., Geder, Adullam, Beth-el, Tappuah, Hopher, Aphek of the Sharon (LXX.), Taanach, Megiddo, Kedesh, Jokneam, Dor, the nations of (LXX.) Gallee, Tirsah (on Hormah and Arad, cp. Judg. i. 17, Num. xxi. 1-3). It is probable, therefore, either that omissions have been made in the narrative of JE (cp. n. 7) in the process of incorporation by D², or that this list has been derived from an independent source.

* Except v. 3, "(and) unawares."

† to "judgment."

² This introduction to the account of the division of W. Palestine is taken (as appears both from the style and from its dependence on Num. xxxiv. 13-17, xxxv. 1-8) from P. It is possible that Welh., Kuen., and Dillm. are right in supposing that xviii. 1 stood originally before xiv. 1: the mention of the assembly at Shiloh, and the notice that the land "was subdued before them," are more significant as preparatory to the allotment of the entire land than to that of the territory of seven tribes only. Throughout this and the following chapters the co-operation of Eleazar, it may be noticed, is mentioned only in P (xiv. 1, xvii. 4, xix. 51, xxi. 1); in JE Joshua always acts alone (xiv. 6, xvii. 14, xviii. 3, 8, 10, xxiv. 1).

but in certain parts—viz., v. 3, "(and) unawares" (בְּבִלְי דַעְתָּ); see Deut. iv. 42, xiv. 4; * v. 4-5; v. 6, from "(and) until" to "whence he fled"; v. 8, the words "at Jericho eastward"—it exhibits points of contact with Deut. It is remarkable, now, that just these passages are omitted in the LXX. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that the original text of P has been amplified by insertions from the law of homicide in Deut. (ch. xix.), which had either not been made at the date of the LXX. translation, or, if made, had not yet been introduced into all MSS. of the Hebrew.

§ 5. The close affinities subsisting between the sections which have been styled Deuteronomic and Deuteronomy may be illustrated in two ways: (i.) by reference to the passages identical verbally, or nearly so, with passages in Deut.; (ii.) by reference to the turns and expressions characteristic of Deut., which here recur. Let the reader who would fully estimate these affinities, underline the passages and expressions referred to, supplementing them, where necessary, from his own observation.

(i.) Ch. i. is constructed almost wholly of phrases borrowed from Deut. Thus, cp. vv. 3-5a and Deut. xi. 24, 25a; 5b, 6a and Deut. xxxi. 23 end, 6, 7, 8 (also i. 38, iii. 28); 7b and Deut. v. 32 (Heb. 29), xxix. 9 (Heb. 8); 8 ("this book of the law") and Deut. xxix. 21, xxx. 10,^d xxxii. 26; 8b and Deut. xxviii. 29; 9 and Deut. xxxi. 6; also i. 29, vii. 21, x. 3 (the uncommon וָשׁוּ; 11b and Deut. xi. 31; 13b-15 and Deut. iii. 18-20; 17b as v. 5; 18b as v. 6a. The parallels with ii. 10, 11, as well as with some other of the shorter insertions, have been noticed above. In ch. iii. cp. v. 7 ("this day will I begin") and Deut. ii. 25; v. 7b as ch. i. 5; v. 10, with "the Girgashite," as xxiv. 11, Deut. vii. 1 only; with iv. 24 cp. Deut. iii. 24, &c. ("mighty hand"), xiv. 23b, xxviii. 10. In ch. xxii. the Deut. phrases are evident in vv. 1-6; in vv. 9-34 they are conspicuously absent, in spite of the abundant opportunity for their use, had the author been the same as before. Ch. xxiii. shows throughout the hand of P² (cp. ch. i.), its object apparently being to supplement the negative exhortations to discard strange gods, which D² found in E and incorporated in ch. xxiv., with a definite positive injunction to carry out faithfully the principles of the Deut. law, and a special warning to hold no manner of intercourse with the Canaanite populations. Thus cp. v. 1 (so i. 13) and Deut. xii. 10 b, xxv. 19 a; v. 2 (so viii. 34) and Deut. xxix. 10; v. 3 and Deut. xxix. 2; v. 4 (cut off) and Deut. xii. 29, xix. 1; v. 4 b as i. 4; v. 4 b and Deut. vi. 19, ix. 4 (הָרָה, so used only in these passages); v. 5, 13, "drive out from before you" (cp. xiii. 6), and Deut. ix. 4, 5, xi. 23; v. 6 and Deut. xxx. 10, ch. i. 7; v. 7 to serve and bow down in parallelism, as often in Deut.; v. 8 ("cleave") and Deut. xxx. 20 al.; v. 9 a and Deut. iv. 38; v. 9 b and Deut. vii. 24, xi. 25 (in Josh. עֲמַד, as x. 8, xxi. 44, varied from the synon. עֲמִידָה of Deut.); v. 10 a and Deut. xxxii. 30 (the Song); v. 10 b, "that fighteth for you" (cp. below, ii. No. 3); v. 11 a and Deut. iv. 15; v. 11 b, "love," the keynote of Deut., e.g. xxx. 6, 16, 20, in a similar context; v. 12 and Deut. vii. 3; v. 13 b ("until ye perish," &c.) and Deut. xxviii. 20; v. 14 b, as xxi. 45; v. 15 and Deut. xxviii. 63, xxix. 27; v. 16 b and Deut. xxix. 26, 27, xl. 17. Even where the expressions used are not identical, the style and spirit of this discourse are still emphatically those of Deuteronomy.*

(ii.) Recurring phrases or expressions. Several passages in Joshua where these occur have been quoted under DEUTERONOMY, §§ 34, 36, a reference to which will make it still further apparent, how completely the style of D² was moulded upon that of Deut. To the examples there given may be added:

1. עֶבֶר יְהוָה, the servant of Jehovah, of Moses: Deut. xxxiv. 5;—Josh. i. 1, 13, 15; viii. 31, 33; xi. 12; xii. 6 bis; xiii. 8; xiv. 7; xviii. 7; xxi. 2, 4, 5 [of Joshua, xxiv. 29]. So my servant, i. 2, 7 [cp. Num. xii. 7, 8]; his servant, ix. 24, xi. 15 [cp. Ex. xiv. 31].

2. אֱלֹהֵיכֶם (יְיָ אֱלֹהֵיכֶם), Jehovah your (thy) God, peculiarly frequent [some 200 times] in Deut.;—Josh. i. 9, 11, 13, 15, 17; ii. 11; iii. 3, 9; iv. 5, 23 bis, 24; viii. 7; ix. 9, 24; x. 19; xxii. 3, 4, 5; and 13 times in ch. xxiii. Though not confined to Deut. sections, the expression greatly preponderates in them.

3. יִי הַנְּחַלְתֶּם (יִלְחָם לְיִשְׂרָאֵל), Jehovah [is he that] fighteth [will fight] for [Israel, you, &c.]: Deut. i. 30; iii. 22 (from Ex. xiv. 14, 25); cp. xx. 4;—Josh. x. 14 b, 42; xxiii. 3, 10.

4. הַנִּיחַ לְ, to give rest to (sometimes with the addition of from your enemies round about): Deut. iii. 20, xii. 10, xxv. 19;—Josh. i. 13, 15; xxii. 4; xxiii. 1.

5. רְאֵה, see! calling attention to something about to be said: Deut. i. 8, "See, I have given the land before you;" 21; ii. 24, "See, I have given into thy hand Sihon;" 31; iv. 5; xi. 26; xxx. 15;—Josh. vi. 2, "See, I have given into thy hand Jericho;" viii. 1, "See, I have given into thy hand the king of Ai:" cp. the pl. אֲנִי viii. 4, 8; xxiii. 4. Occasionally elsewhere; but not with the same comparative frequency.

6. הַשְׂמִיד, to destroy (a favourite term in Deut., 28 times in the discourses);—Josh. ix. 24; xi. 14, 20; xxiii. 15; xxiv. 8 b [cp. Deut. ii. 12, 21, 22; xxxi. 3. This clause may, however, belong to E; cp. the seeming allusion in Amos ii. 9].

7. הַמְנַשֵּׂה [with the article] in the phrase "the half tribe of (the) Manasseh": Deut. iii. 13;—Josh. i. 12; iv. 12; xii. 6; xiii. 7; xviii. 7; xxii. 7, 9, 10, 11, 21. Not elsewhere.

8. הַרְחִים, to ban or devote: Deut. ii. 34; iii. 6, and especially in the injunctions for the future, vii. 2, xiii. 16, xv. 17;—frequently in the summaries or retrospects of D², Josh. ii. 10: x. 1, 28, 35, 37, 39, 40; xi. 11, 12, 20, 21. Is vi. 18, 21, viii. 26, the term belongs no doubt to the original source: cp. Ex. xxii. 20 [Heb. 19], Num. xxi. 2, 3—both belonging to JE; and note also the sub. הָרַם ch. vi. 17, 18, vii. 11–13.

9. עַד בְּלֹתִי (לֹא) הַשְׂאִיר שְׂרִיד, (until) left none remaining: Deut. iii. 3, cp. ii. 34 [Num. xxi. 35];—Josh. viii. 22; x. 28, 30, 33, 37, 39, 40; xi. 8. [2 K. x. 11.] Not elsewhere.

10. There was not a . . . which . . . (form of sentence): Deut. ii. 36; iii. 4;—Josh. viii. 35; xi. 19.

11. נָמַס, to melt, of the heart: Deut. xx. 8;—Josh. ii. 11; v. 1; vii. 5. (On Josh. xiv. 8, based upon Deut. i. 28, cp. above § 4, note *.)

12. נִשְׁמָחָה, כָּל (הַ) גֵּוִיכֶם, all that breathed (lit. all breath): Deut. xx. 16;—Josh. x. 40; xi. 11, 14 [1 K. xv. 29; Pa. cl. 6.] Not elsewhere.

(iii.) Noticeable words and phrases not occurring before.

1. נְבָרִי הַחַיִּל, mighty men of valour: i. 14 [in Deut. iii. 18, לְבָנֵי חַיִּל]; vi. 2; viii. 3; x. 7. [2 K. xv. 20; xxiv. 14.]

2. . . . הוֹרִישׁ מִפְּנֵי, to dry up from before . . . : ii. 10; iv. 23 bis; v. 1.

3. עִם הַמְּלַחְמָה, the people of war: viii. 1, 3, 11 (חֶמֶם, with the art., 'strangely'); x. 7; xi. 7. Not elsewhere, except 1 Sam. xiii. 15, LXX.

The usual expression הַמְּלַחְמָה אֲנַשֵּׁי: Deut. ii. 14, 16; Josh. v. 4, 6, vi. 3, x. 24; 1 Sam. xviii. 5, &c.

4. מַמְלְכוֹת, kingdom: xiii. 12, 21, 27, 30, 31. A peculiar form, possibly only an error of transmission for מְמַלְכֻת; elsewhere only 1 Sam. xv. 28; 2 Sam. xvi. 3; Jer. xxvi. 1; Hos. i. 4.

5. מְחֻלְקָת, division, in the expression כְּמֻחְלָקָתָם: xi. 23; xii. 7; xviii. 10. Not again, except in the n. pr. 1 Sam. xxiii. 28, tit.

Ezek. xlvi. 29: often in Chron., but in a special application, of the courses of the priests and Levites.

6. הַנָּחִי, the nation, of Israel: iii. 17, iv. 1, v. 6, 8; יוֹ, x. 13 (without the article), is pretty clearly derived from the poem quoted. "This nation," applied to Israel, is found occasionally elsewhere; "the nation" is very unusual, and is never met with besides in prose.

7. . . . לֹא עָמַד (עֹמֵד) אִישׁ בְּפָנָי, a man stood not (shall not stand) in the face of. . . : x. 8, xxi. 44 (Heb. 42), xxiii. 9, varied from . . . לֹא יִתְיַצֵּב אִישׁ בְּפָנָי, Deut. v. 24, xi. 25; Josh. i. 5 (here with לְפָנָי, before). In vii. 12, 13, the expression is a different one: קוּם לְפָנָי, to rise up, subsist, endure, before (not elsewhere).

8. הָכֵל בָּא (בָּאוּ), all came to pass: xxi. 45 (Heb. 43), xxiii. 14.

In x. 30, 32, 33, 37 bis, 39, there occurs an inelegant construction, וַאֲחַת כָּל אֲשֶׁר יִיָּכֵחַ וַיִּיָּכֵחַ (וַיִּיָּכֵחַ וַאֲחַת כָּל אֲשֶׁר בָּה), of which, however, there are two examples in Deut., viz. xi. 6 (contrast Num. xvi. 32); xv. 16 (about six times besides in the O. T.): see the writer's Notes on Samuel, on 1 Sam. v. 10.

The attentive reader will not omit to notice how frequently the expressions noted in this section are found aggregated in the passages attributed above to D².

§ 6. Thus the Book of Joshua as a whole assumed its present form by a series of stages. It follows that if the earliest form of the traditions respecting the conquest of Palestine is to be recovered, the stratum of narrative containing it must be disengaged by critical processes from those that have been superposed upon it. The Deuteronomic elements contain but little of direct historical import: in the main, they either give prominence to the motives and considerations by which Joshua is conceived to have been actuated, or they generalize and magnify the successes attributed to him. These being disregarded, it appears that in the first half of the Book, containing details of the conquest of Palestine, the source mainly followed is JE; in the second half, containing particulars of its topographical distribution among the tribes, it is P. The notices of the conquest belonging to P are brief and fragmentary. One group of the passages assigned to JE deserves special notice, on account of their affinity with the 1st chapter of Judges. This chapter, describing how certain of the tribes conquered, or failed to conquer, the territory allotted to them, is now generally regarded by critics as having formed originally part of a narrative, or survey, of the conquest of Palestine in the time of Joshua; the opening words, "after the death of Joshua," being an addition due to the compiler, who placed the section where it now stands, as an introduction to the Book of Judges.^k The notices in the chapter relate in many cases, it is evident, to events synchronous with those recorded in the Book of Joshua, rather than to what took place subsequently. In some cases the same notices recur, with but slight verbal variations, in both Books; in other cases, notices cast in a similar form are met with in both equally. In all probability, Judg. i. is an extract from what was once a complete summary of the conquest of Canaan, of which other excerpts have been preserved in the verses of Joshua referred to. The notices from the two Books may be combined together somewhat as follows:—a. (Judah) Judg. i. 1 b (from "and the children of Israel asked"), 2-7, 19, Josh. xv. 63 (nearly = Judg. i. 21); Judg. i. 20, Josh. xv. 14-19 (nearly = Judg. i. 10-15; cp. also Josh. xiv. 13, 15); Judg. i. 16-18, 36.¹ b. (Joseph) Judg. i. 22-26, Josh. xvii. 14-18. c. (the ill success of different tribes) Josh. xiii. 13, Judg. i. 27-28 (nearly = Josh. xvii. 12, 13 [the names of the towns are not stated here in v. 12, having been given just before in v. 11]), 29 (Josh. xvi. 10), 30-33, 34¹, Josh. xix. 47,^m Judg. i. 35.ⁿ Here we have in succession particulars respecting the conquests of Judah and Simeon, Caleb and Othniel, the "house of Joseph," Manasseh, Ephraim, Zebulun, Asher, Naphtali, Dan. Phraseological points of contact between the passages quoted are: the "House of Joseph" (Josh. xvii. 17, xviii. 5; Judg. i. 22, 23, 35: not common elsewhere); "daughters" for dependent towns, Josh. xvii. 11, 16, Judg. i. 27; "would dwell" (peculiar), Josh. xvii. 12, Judg. i. 27 b, 35; "became tributary,"^o Josh. xvi. 10, Judg. i. 30, 33, 35; the form of the sentence, Josh. xiii. 13, xv. 63, Judg. i. 29, 30, 31, &c.; observe also the allusion to the "chariots of iron," Josh. xvii. 16, Judg. i. 19. The representation is, moreover, throughout similar: the joint action of the tribes up to a certain point is presupposed, followed first by the assignment to each tribe of its lot of territory, and then the conquest by the tribe of the lot thus assigned to it, or, in some cases, its failure to conquer it. The narrative, as we possess it, is evidently incomplete. Enough of it, however, remains to show how imperfectly the native inhabitants had in fact been expelled, notwithstanding the generalizing summaries of D² (e.g. i. 40, xi. 16-20, xxi. 43-5). Lastly, the notice of the conquest of the land in the retrospect in ch. xxiv. (E) should be alluded to (v. 11-12). This does

(see the references on pp. 84-9), or more briefly Kittel, Gesch. der Hebräer, l. p. 239 sqq. Naturally, no stress is to be laid on the precise order in which the passages are combined; Budde arranges them somewhat differently, l. c. pp. 84-9 (prefixing also Num. xxxii. 39, 41, 42 to Josh. xlii. 13: cp. not perfectly agree with the picture in the earlier part of JĒ. Nothing is there said of the "citizens of Jericho" who "fought against" the Israelites; nor is any express mention made of "twelve" (LXX. v. 12: § 4, note^p) "kings of the Amorites" put to flight before Israel,^p "not with thy sword, nor with thy bow:" on the other hand, the retrospect here is silent as to the series of independent efforts by which the Jehovistic tradition represents the Israelites as slowly and toilsomely effecting the conquest, and appears (v. 18 a) to treat the expulsion of the native population as more complete than was really the case. As ch. xxiv. is admitted to belong to E, this divergence of representation may be taken as an indication that the source of the group of notices just referred to is J; the representation of E, on the other hand, approximates to that of D².

The description of the territories of the different tribes, in the second part of the Book, the "Domesday book of Palestine," derived mainly from P, though invaluable on account of the topographical data contained in it, refers, no doubt, to a later period than that of Joshua. This may be inferred from the fact that the country is represented as completely in the possession of the Israelites. The partition of the land being conceived as ideally effected by Joshua, its complete distribution and occupation by the tribes is here treated as his work, and as accomplished in his lifetime.

The text of Joshua, though not so faulty as that of Samuel or Ezekiel, is nevertheless less pure than that of the Pentateuch appears generally to be: the corruptions can in some cases be emended by help of the ancient Versions; see the study of Hollenberg mentioned in § 7, and Dillmann, p. 689 sq.

JOSIAH (יְהוֹשִׁיָּאֵה = Jehovah heals [MV.¹¹]; Ἰωσίας; Josias).¹ I. The son of Amon and Jedidah, succeeded his father B.C. 641 [al. 640], in the eighth year of his age, and reigned thirty-one years. His history is contained in 2 K. xxii.–xxiv. 30; 2 Ch. xxxiv., xxiv.; and the first twelve chapters of Jeremiah throw much light upon the general character of the Jews in his days.

He began in the eighth year of his reign to seek the Lord; and in his twelfth year, and for six years afterwards, in a personal progress throughout all the land of Judah and Israel, he destroyed everywhere high places, groves, images, and all outward signs and relics of idolatry. Those which Solomon and Ahaz had built, and even Hezekiah had spared, and those which Manasseh had set up more recently, now ceased to pollute the land of Judah; and in Israel the purification began with Jeroboam's chapel at Bethel, in accordance with the remarkable prediction of the disobedient prophet, by whom Josiah was called by name three centuries before his birth (1 K. xiii. 2). The Temple was restored under a special commission; and in the course of the repairs Hilkiah the priest found that book of the Law of the Lord which quickened so remarkably the ardent zeal of the king [see under HILKIAH]. The special commission sent forth by Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xvii. 7) is a proof that even under such kings as Aa and his son, the Levites were insufficient for the religious instruction of the people. What then must have been the amount of information accessible to a generation which had grown up in the reigns of Manasseh and Amon? We do not know that the Law was read as a stated part of any ordinary public service in the Temple of Solomon (unless the injunction Deut. xxxi. 10 was obeyed once in seven years), though God was worshipped there with daily sacrifice, psalmody, and prayer. The son of Amon began when he was sixteen years old to seek in earnest the God of David, and for ten years he devoted all his active energies to destroying the gross external memorials of idolatry throughout his dominions, and to strengthening and multiplying the visible signs of true religion. It is not surprising that in the twenty-sixth year of his age he should find the most awful words in which God denounces sin come home to his heart on a particular occasion with a new and strange power, and that he should send to a prophetess to inquire in what degree of closeness those words were to be applied to himself and his generation. That he had never read the words is probable. But his conduct is no sufficient proof that he had never heard them before, or that he was not aware of the existence of a "book of the Law of the Lord."

The great day of Josiah's life was that on which he and his people, in the eighteenth year of his reign, entered into a special covenant to keep the Law of the Lord, and celebrated the Feast of the Passover at Jerusalem with more magnificent offerings, better arranged services, and a larger concourse of worshippers than had been seen on any previous occasion.

After this, his endeavours to abolish every trace of idolatry and superstition were still carried on. But the time drew near which had been indicated by Huldah (2 K. xxii. 20). When Pharaoh-Necho went from Egypt to Carchemish to carry on his war against Assyria (cp. Herodotus, ii. 159), Josiah, possibly in a spirit of loyalty to the Assyrian king, to whom he may have been bound,* opposed his march along the sea-coast. Necho reluctantly paused and gave him battle in the valley of Eadraelon: and the last good king of Judah was carried wounded from Hadad-rimmon, to die before he could arrive at Jerusalem.

^p Though Aibers, p. 149, thinks the twelve kings intended to be those of Jericho, Ai, Bethel (according to the isolated notice in viii. 17), the five kings of the South (x. 3), and the four kings of the North (xi. 1).

He was buried with extraordinary honours; and a funeral dirge, in part composed by Jeremiah, which the affection of his subjects sought to perpetuate as an annual solemnity, was chanted probably at Hadad-rimmon (cp. the narrative in 2 Ch. xxxv. 25 with the allusions in Jer. xxiii. 10, 18, and Zech. xii. 11, and Jackson, On the Creed, bk. viii. ch. 23, p. 878). The prediction of Huldah, that he should "be gathered into the grave in peace," must be interpreted in accordance with the explanation of that phrase given in Jer. xxxiv. 5 (cp. Jackson, On the Creed, bk. xi. ch. 36, p. 664). Josiah's reformation and death are commented on by Bishop Hall, Contemplations on the O. T., bk. xx.

It was in the reign of Josiah that a nomadic horde of Scythians overran Asia (Herodotus, i. 104-106). A detachment of them went towards Egypt by the way of Philistia: somewhere southward of Ascalon they were met by messengers from Psammitichus and induced to turn back. They are not mentioned in the historical accounts of Josiah's reign. But Ewald (Die Psalmen, p. 165) conjectures that the 59th Psalm was composed by king Josiah during a siege of Jerusalem by these Scythians. The town BETHSHAN is said to derive its Greek name, Scythopolis (Reland, Pal. p. 992; Lightfoot, Chor. Marc. vii. § 2), from these invaders. The facility with which Josiah appears to have extended his authority in the land of Israel is adduced as an indication that the Assyrian conquerors of that land were themselves at this time under the restraining fear of some enemy. The prophecy of Zephaniah is considered to have been written amid the terror caused by their approach. The same people are described at a later period by Ezekiel (xxviii.). See Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii. 689. Abarbanel (ap. Eisenmenger, Ent. Jud. i. 858) records an oral tradition of the Jews to the effect that the Ark of the Covenant, which Solomon deposited in the Temple (1 K. vi. 19), was removed and hidden by Josiah, in expectation of the destruction of the Temple; and that it will not be brought again to light until the coming of Messiah.

[W. T. B.] [F.]

* Such is at least the conjecture of Prideaux (Connexion, anno 610), and of Milman (History of the Jews, i. 313). But the Bible ascribes no such chivalrous motive to Josiah: and it does not occur to Josephus, who attributes (Ant. x. 5, § 1) Josiah's resistance merely to Fate urging him to destruction; nor to the author of 1 Esd. i. 28, who describes him as acting willfully against Jeremiah's advice; nor to Ewald, who (Gesch. Isr. iii. 707) conjectures that it may have been the constant aim of Josiah to restore not only the ritual, but also the kingdom of David in its full extent and independence, and that he attacked Necho as an invader of what he considered as his northern dominions. This conjecture, if equally probable with the former, is equally without adequate support in the Bible, and is somewhat derogatory to the character of Josiah. Opinions still differ on this point (cp. Kautzsch in Herzog's R.E. s.n. "Josia").

2. The son of Zephaniah, at whose house the prophet Zechariah was commanded to assemble the chief men of the Captivity, to witness the solemn and symbolical crowning of Joshua the high-priest (Zech. vi. 9). It has been conjectured that Josiah was either a goldsmith, or treasurer of the Temple, or one of the keepers of the Temple, who received the money offered by the worshippers, but nothing is known of him. Possibly he was a descendant of Zephaniah, the priest mentioned in Jer. xxi. 1, xxxvii. 3: and if Hen in Zech. vi. 15 be a proper name, which is doubtful, it probably refers to the same person, elsewhere called Josiah. [W. A. W.]

JOSIAS. 1. (Ἰωσίας; Josias.) Josiah, king of Judah (1 Esd. i. 1, 7, 18, 21-23, 25, 28, 29, 32-34; Ecclus. xlix. 1, 4; Bar. i. 8; Matt. i. 10, 11).

2. (B. 'Eosias; A. 'Ieosias; Maasias.) Jeshaiiah, the son of Athaliah (1 Esd. viii. 33; cp. Ezra viii. 7).

JOSIBIAH (יְהוֹשִׁיָּבָה, i.e. Joshibyah = Jehovah makes a dwelling [MV.¹¹]; BA. Ἰωσάβια; Josabias), the father of Jehu, a Simeonite, descended from that branch of the tribe of which Shimei was the founder, and which afterwards became most numerous (1 Ch. iv. 35).

JOSIPHI'AH (יְהוֹשִׁפָּא, i.e. Jehovah adds; B. Ἰωσφάτα, A. -φία; Josphias), the father or ancestor of Shelomith, who returned with Ezra (Ezra viii. 10). A word is evidently omitted in the first part of the verse, and is supplied both by the LXX. (A.) and the Syr., as well as by the compiler of 1 Esd. viii. 36. The LXX. (A.) supplies Βααβί, i.e. בָּבִי, which, from its resemblance to the preceding word יְהוֹשִׁיָּבָה, might easily have been omitted by a transcriber. The verse would then read, "of the sons of Bani, Shelomith the son of Josiphiah" (cp. *QPB.*²). In the Syriac Shelomith is repeated, but this is not likely to have been correct. Josiphiah is called in Esdras JOSAPHIAS.

JOTAPATA. [JIPHTAH-EL.]

JOT-BAH (יְטָבָה = goodness [MV.¹¹]; B. Ἰεσβεβιά, A. Ἰεραχά; Jos. Ἰαβδρη; Jeteba), the native place of Meshullemeth, the queen of Manasseh, and mother of Amon king of Judah (2 K. xxi. 19). The place is not elsewhere named as a town of Palestine, and is generally identified with Jobath, or Jobathah, mentioned below. This there is nothing either to prove or disprove. [G.] [W.]

JOT-BATH, or JOT-BA-THAH (יְטָבָתָה; Deut. x. 7, B. Ταββα, A. Ἰερεββα, F. Ἰερε; Num. xxxiii. 33; B. Ζερεββα, B²F. Ἰερεββα, A. Ἰερεββα), a desert station of the Israelites: it is described as "a land of torrents of waters:" there are several confluences of Wādys on the W. of the Arabah, any one of which might in the rainy season answer the description, and would agree with the general locality (see Dillmann² on Num. l. c.). [H. H.]

JO'THAM (יֹחָזָבָב; Ἰωθάμ; Joatham). 1. The youngest son of Gideon (Judg. ix. 5), who escaped when his brethren, to the number of sixty-nine persons, were slain at Ophrah by their half-brother Abimelech. When this bloody act of Abimelech had secured his election as king, Jotham, ascending Mount Gerizim, boldly uttered, in the hearing of the men of Shechem, his well-known warning parable of the reign of the bramble. The historical character of the narrative, impugned by Budde (Die BB. Richter und Samuel, p. 118) and others, is defended by Kittel (Gesch. d. Hebräer, ii. 76). Nothing is known of Jotham afterwards, except that he dwelt at Beer.

2. The son of king Uziah or Azariah and Jerushah. After administering the kingdom for some years during his father's leprosy, he succeeded to the throne B.C. 758 [al. 750]. The Biblical and Assyrian chronologies of this reign have not yet been reconciled; see p. 592, when he was twenty-five years old, and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem. He was contemporary with Pekah and with the Prophet Isaiah. His history is contained in 2 K. xv. 32-38 and 2 Ch. xxvii., and much light is thrown upon the character and events of his time by such passages as Is. ii. 5-iii. 11, vi. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and his reign was prosperous, although the high-places were not removed. He built the high gate of the Temple, made some additions to the wall of Jerusalem, and raised fortifications in various parts of Judah. After a war with the Ammonites, he compelled them to pay him the tribute they had been accustomed to pay to his father. Towards the end of his reign Rezin king of Damascus, and Pekah, began to assume a threatening attitude towards Judah (see the article "Jotham" in Herzog, RE., and in Riehm, HWB.). [W. T. B.] [F.]

3. A descendant of Judah, son of Jahdai (1 Ch. ii. 47).

JO'ZA-BAD = Jehovah hath given. 1. (יְזַבְדִּי; B. יֹזַבְבֵּד, A. יֹזַבְבֵּד; Jozabad.) A captain of the thousands of Manasseh, who deserted to David before the battle of Gilboa, and assisted him in his pursuit of the marauding band of Amalekites (1 Ch. xii. 20). One of Kennicott's MSS. reads יְזַבְדִּי, i.e. Jochabar.

2. (B. יֹזַבְבֵּד, N. -בֵּד, A. יֹזַבְבֵּד.) A hero of Manasseh, like the preceding (1 Ch. xii. 20).

3. (B. יֹזַבְבֵּד, A. יֹזַבְבֵּד, in 2 Ch. xxxi. 13.) A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah, who was one of the overseers of offerings and dedicated things in the Temple, under Cononiah and Shimei, after the restoration of the true worship.

4. (BA. יֹזַבְבֵּד; Josabad.) One of the princes of the Levites, who held the same office as the preceding, and took part in the great Passover kept at Jerusalem in the reign of Josiah (2 Ch. xxxv. 9).

5. (BA. יֹזַבְבֵּד.) A Levite, son of Jeshua, who assisted Meremoth and Eleazar in registering the number and weight of the vessels of gold and silver belonging to the Temple, which they brought with them from Babylon (Ezra viii. 33). He is called JOSABAD in the parallel narrative of 1 Esd. viii. 63 (E. 62, B. יֹזַבְבֵּד, A. -סַבְבֵּד), and is probably identical with 7.

6. (BA. יֹזַבְבֵּד in Ezra; B. Ἰωζαβὰδ, A. Ἰωζαβὰδ, in 1 Esd. ix. 23; Jozabed.) A priest of the sons of Pashur, who had married a foreigner on the return from the Captivity (Ezra x. 22). He appears as OCIDELUS in the A. V. of 1 Esd.

7. (יֹזַבְבֵּד, Jorabedus, in 1 Esd. ix. 23; יֹזַבְבֵּד, Jozabed, in Ezra x. 22.) A Levite among those who returned with Ezra and had married foreign wives. He is probably identical with Jozabad the Levite, who assisted when the Law was read by Ezra (Neh. viii. 7); and with Jozabad, one of the heads of the Levites who presided over the outer work of the Temple (Neh. xi. 16). [W. A. W.]

JO'ZA-CHAR (יְזַחַר = Jehovah hath remembered; יֶזְעָרָא, A. יֹזַחַר; Josachar), the son of Shimeath the Ammonitess, and one of the murderers of Joash king of Judah (2 K. xii. 21). The writer of the Chronicles (2 Ch. xxiv. 26) calls him Zabab, a clerical error for Jozachar; the first syllable being omitted in consequence of the final letters of the preceding word יֶזְעָרָא. In eighteen MSS. of Kennicott's collation the name in the Kings is יְזַחַר, i.e. Jozabad, and the same is the reading of thirty-two MSS. collated by De Rossi. Another MS. in De Rossi's possession had יְזַחַר, i.e. Jozachad, and one collated by Kennicott יְזַחַר, or Jozabar, which is the reading of the Peshitto-Syriac. It is uncertain whether their conspiracy was prompted by a personal feeling of revenge for the death of Zechariah, as Josephus intimates (Ant. ix. 8, § 4), or whether they were urged to it by the family of Jehoiada. The care of the Chronicler to show that they were of foreign descent seems almost intended to disarm a suspicion that the king's assassination was an act of priestly vengeance. But it is more likely that the conspiracy had a different origin altogether, and that the king's murder was regarded by the Chronicler as an instance of Divine retribution. On the accession of Amaziah the conspirators were executed. [W. A. W.]

JO'ZA-DAK (יְזַדָּק; יֹזַדֵּק; Josedec), Ezra viii. 2, 8, v. 2, x. 18; Neh. xii. 26. The name is a contraction of JEHOZADAK.

JU'BAL (יְבֻל; יֹבְבָל; Jubal), a son of Lamech by Adah, and the inventor of the "harp and organ" (Gen. iv. 21; R. V. "harp and pipe"). His name appears to be connected with this subject, springing from the same root as yobel, "jubilee" (cp. Delitzsch [1887], Dillmann⁴ in loco). That the inventor of musical instruments should be the brother of him who introduced the nomad life, is strictly in accordance with the experience of the world. The connexion between music and the pastoral life is indicated in the traditions of the Greeks, which ascribed the invention of the pipe to Pan and of the lyre to Apollo, each of them being also devoted to pastoral pursuits. [W. L. B.]

and simply יְבֻלָּה; ἔτος τῆς ἀφέσεως, ἀφέσεως σημασία, and ἀφεσις; annus jubilaei, and jubilaeus; R. V. "jubile", the fiftieth year after the succession of seven Sabbatical years (Lev. xiv. 10; Ideler, Hub. d. Chronik, i. 505), in which all the land which had been alienated returned to the families of those to whom it had been allotted in the original distribution, and all bondmen of Hebrew blood were liberated. The relation in which it stood to the Sabbatical year and the general directions for its observance are given in Lev. xxv. 8-16 and 23-55.^a Its bearing on lands dedicated to Jehovah is stated in Lev. xxvii. 16-25. There is no mention of the Jubilee in the Book of Deuteronomy, and the only other reference to it in the Pentateuch is in the appeal of the tribe of Manasseh, on account of the daughters of Zelophehad (Num. xxxvi. 4).

II. The year was inaugurated on the Day of Atonement^b with the blowing of trumpets^c throughout the land, and by a proclamation of universal liberty.

1. The soil was kept under the same condition of rest as had existed during the preceding Sabbatical year. There was to be neither ploughing, sowing, nor reaping; but the chance produce was to be left for the use of all comers. [SABBATICAL YEAR.]

2. Every Israelite returned to "his possession and to his family;" that is, he recovered his right in the land originally allotted to the family of which he was a member, if he, or his ancestor, had parted with it.

(a) A strict rule to prevent fraud and injustice in such transactions is laid down:—if a Hebrew, urged by poverty,^d had to dispose of a field, the price was determined according to the time of the sale in reference to the approach of the next Jubilee. The transfer was thus, not of the land itself, but of the usufruct for a limited time. Deduction was systematically made on account of the number of Sabbatical years, which would deprive the purchaser of certain crops within that period.^e

(b) The possession of the field could, at any time, be recovered by the original proprietor, if his circumstances improved, or by his next of kin^f (כֹּהֵן, i. e. one who redeems). The price to be paid for its redemption was to be fixed according to the same equitable rule as the price at which it had been purchased (v. 16).

(c) Houses in walled cities^g were not subject to the law of Jubilee, but a man who sold his house could redeem it at any time within a full year of the time of its sale. After that year, it became the absolute property of the purchaser.

(d) Houses and buildings in villages, or in the country, being regarded as essentially connected with the cultivation of the land, were not excepted, but returned in the Jubilee with the land on which they stood.

(e) The Levitical cities were not, in respect to this law, reckoned with walled towns. If a Levite sold the use of his house, it reverted to him in the Jubilee, and he might redeem it at any previous time. The lands in the suburbs of the Levites' cities could not be parted with under any condition, and were not therefore affected by the law of Jubilee (v. 34).

(f) If a man had sanctified a field of his patrimony unto the Lord, it could be redeemed at any time before the next year of Jubilee, on his paying one-fifth in addition to the worth of

^a Ewald observes that vv. 17-22 in this chapter should be read immediately after v. 7, since they carry on the account of the Sabbatical year, and have no reference to the year of Jubilee.

^b It does not seem likely that the rites of solemn humiliation which marked the great fast of the year were disturbed. The joyful sound probably burst forth in the afternoon, when the high-priest had brought the services of Atonement to a conclusion. The contrast between the quiet of the day and the loud blast of the trumpets at its close, must have rendered deeply impressive the hallowing of the year of release from poverty and bondage.

^c The trumpets used in the proclamation of the Jubilee appear to have been curved horns, not the long straight trumpets represented on the Arch of Titus, and such as are represented in Egyptian sculptures and paintings (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. l. 104 [1878]). The straight trumpet was called הַצִּפּוֹרֶת, the other שֹׁפָר and כֶּרֶן. The jubilee horns used in the siege of Jericho are called שֹׁפְרוֹת הַיּוֹבֵלִים (Josh. vi. 4); and, collectively, in the following verse, כֶּרֶן הַיּוֹבֵל. (See Keil on Josh. vi. 4.) It is not quite certain whether they were the horns of oxen or formed of metal (Kranold, p. 50), but the latter seems by far more probable. Connected with the mistake as to the origin of the word יוֹבֵל (which will be noticed below), was the notion that they were rams' horns. R. Jehuda, in the Mishna, says that the horns of rams (זְבָרִים) were used at the Feast of Trumpets, and those of wild goats (עֵלִיִּם) at the Jubilee. But Maimonides and Bartenora say that rams' horns were used on both occasions (Rosh Hashkana, p. 342, edit. Suren.). Bochart and others have justly objected that the horns of rams, or those of wild goats, would form but sorry trumpets. [CORNET.]

It is probable that on this, as on other occasions of public proclamation, the trumpets were blown by the priests, in accordance with Num. x. 8 (see Kranold, Comment. de Jubilæo, p. 50; with whom agree Ewald, Bähr, and most modern writers). Bähr supposes that, at the proclamation of the Jubilee, the trumpets were blown in all the priests' cities and wherever a priest might be living; while, on the Feast of Trumpets, they were blown only in the Temple. Maimonides says that every Hebrew at the Jubilee blew nine blasts, so as to make the trumpet literally "sound throughout the land" (Lev. xxv. 9). Such a usage may have existed, as a mere popular expression of rejoicing, but it could have been no essential part of the ceremony.

^d It would seem that the Israelites never parted with their land except from the pressure of poverty. The objection of Naboth to accept the offer of Ahab (1 K. xxi. 1) appears to exemplify the sturdy feeling of a substantial Hebrew, who would have felt it to be a shame and a sin to give up any part of his patrimony—"The Lord forbid it me that I should give the inheritance of my fathers to thee." For another view of the conduct of Naboth, see a dissertation by S. Andreas, in the Critici Sacri, vol. xiii. p. 603.

^e This must be the meaning of the price being calculated on "the years of fruits," שְׁנֵי-תְבוּאָתָא (Lev. xxv. 16), the years of tillage, exclusive of the years of rest (see Knobel-Dillmann in loco).

^f Kranold observes (p. 54) that there is no record of the goel ever exercising his right till after the death of him who had sold the field. But the inference that the goel could not previously exercise his power seems to be hardly warranted, and is opposed to what is perhaps the simplest interpretation of Ruth iv. 3, 4. See note =, § V.

^g A Jewish tradition, preserved by Maimonides and others, states that no cities were thus reckoned, as regards the Jubilee, but such as were walled in the time of Joshua. According to this, Jerusalem was excluded.

the crops, rated at a stated valuation (Lev. xvii. 19). If not so redeemed, it became, at the Jubilee, devoted for ever. If the man had previously sold the usufruct of the field to another, he lost all right to redeem it (cv. 20, 21).

(g) If he who had purchased the usufruct of a field sanctified it, he could redeem it till the next Jubilee, that is, as long as his claim lasted; but it then, as justice required, returned to the original proprietor (cv. 22-24).

3. All Israelites who had become bondmen, either to their countrymen, or to resident foreigners, were set free in the Jubilee (Lev. xxv. 40, 41), when it happened to occur before their seventh year of servitude, in which they became free by the operation of another law (Ex. xxi. 2). Those who were bound to resident foreigners might redeem themselves, if they obtained the means, at any time; or they might be redeemed by a relation. Even the bondman who had submitted to the ceremony of having his ears bored (Ex. xxi. 6) had his freedom at the Jubilee.¹

Such was the law of the year of Jubilee, as it is given in the Pentateuch. It was, of course, like the law of the Sabbatical year, and that of those rites of the great Festivals which pertain to agriculture, delivered proleptically. The same formula is used—"When ye be come into the land which I give unto you"—both in Lev. xxv. 2 and Lev. xxiii. 10.

III. Josephus (Ant. iii. 12, § 3) states that all debts were remitted in the year of Jubilee, but the Scripture speaks of the remission of debts only in connexion with the Sabbatical year (Deut. xv. 1, 2). [SABBATICAL YEAR.] He also describes the terms on which the holder of a piece of land resigned it in the Jubilee to the original proprietor. The former (he says) produced a statement of the value of the crops, and of the money which he had laid out in tillage. If the expenses proved to be more than the worth of the produce, the balance was paid by the proprietor before the field was restored. But if the balance was on the other side, the proprietor simply took back the field, and allowed him who had held it to retain the profit.

Philo (De Septenario, chs. 13, 14, vol. v. 37, edit. Tauch.) gives an account of the Jubilee agreeing with that in Leviticus, and says nothing of the remission of debts.¹

IV. Origin of the word Jubilee.—The doubt on this point appears to be a very old one. The Hebrew word is treated by the LXX. in different modes. They have retained it untranslated in Josh. vi. 8, 13 (where we find κερατίνας τοῦ ἰαβήλ, and σάλπιγγε τοῦ ἰαβήλ). In Lev. xxv. they generally render it by ἄφεσις, or ἀφέσεως σημάσια; but where the context suits it, by φώνη σάλπιγγος. In Ex. xix. 13 they have αἱ φωναὶ καὶ αἱ σάλπιγγες. The ¹ Maimonides says that the interval between the Feast of Trumpets and the Day of Atonement, in the year of Jubilee, was a time of riotous rejoicing to all servants. If there is any truth in the tradition that he records (which is in itself probable enough), the eight days must have been a sort of Saturnalia.

Vulgate retains the original word in Lev. xxv., as well as in Josh. vi. ("buccinae quarum usus est in Jubileo"), and by buccina in Ex. xix. 13. It seems, therefore, beyond doubt that uncertainty respecting the word must have been felt when the most ancient Versions of the O. T. were made.

Nearly all of the many conjectures which have been hazarded on the subject are directed to explain the word exclusively in its bearing on the year of Jubilee. This course has been taken by Josephus—ἐλευθερίαν δὲ σημαίνει τὸ ὄνομα; and by St. Jerome—Jobel est demittens aut mittens. Many modern writers have exercised their ingenuity in the same track. Now in all such attempts at explanation there must be an anachronism, as the word is used in Ex. xix. 13, before the institution of the Law, where it can have nothing to do with the Year of Jubilee, or its observances. The expression there used is יְבִילֵהוּ הַיּוֹבֵל; similar to that in Josh. vi.

5, יְבִילֵהוּ בְּקוֹן הַיּוֹבֵל. The question seems to be, can יְבִילֵהוּ here mean a peculiar sound, a long-drawn-out sound (Riehm), or the instrument for producing the sound? Ewald favours the latter notion, and so does Gesenius (Thes. sub יְבִילֵהוּ, and *MV.*¹¹), following the old Versions (with which the A. V. agrees), though under יְבִילֵהוּ he explains יְבִילֵהוּ as clangor. De Wette inclines the same way, rendering the words in Ex. xix. 13—beim Blazen des Jubelhorns. Luther translates the same words—sonus es uirid aber lange tönen (though he is not consistent with himself in his rendering of Josh. vi. 5); Bähr renders them, cum trahetur sonus, and recent critics agree with him. It would follow from this view that what is meant in Joshua, when the trumpet is expressly mentioned, is, "When the sound called Jubilee (whatever that may be) is prolonged on the horn."

As regards the derivation of the word, it is by some ascribed to the root יְבִילֵהוּ, undavit, copiose et cum quodam impetu fluxit. Hence Kranold explains יְבִילֵהוּ, id quod magno strepitu fluxit; and he adds, "duplex igitur in ea radice vis distinguuntur, fluendi et sonandi altera in יְבִילֵהוּ (diluvium), Gen. vi. 17, altera in יְבִילֵהוּ (artis musicae inventor), Gen. iv. 21, conspicua." The meaning of Jubilee would thus seem to be, a rushing, penetrating sound.² But in the

The notion that יְבִילֵהוּ signifies a ram has some interest, from its being held by the Jews so generally and by the Chaldee Paraphrast; and from its having influenced the A. V. and R. V. in Josh. vi. to call the horns on which the Jubilee was sounded, trumpets of uncertainty which, it must be allowed, exists, the A. V. and R. V. have taken a safer course by retaining the original word in Lev. xxv. and xxvii., than that which was taken by Luther, who has rendered it by Halljahr.

V. Maimonides, and the Jewish writers in general, consider that the Jubilee was observed till the destruction of the first Temple. But there is no direct historical notice of its observance on any one occasion, either in the Books of the O. T., or in any other records. Passages in the Prophets which can be regarded with much confidence, as referring to the Jubilee in any way, are Is. v. 7-10, xxxii. 7, lxi. 1, 2; Ezek. vii. 12, 13, xlvi. 16-18. After the Exile the special laws of the Jubilee fell into desuetude, if in matters of detail they still influenced social life (cp. Herzfeld, Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, ii. 464). Some have doubted whether the law of Jubilee ever came into actual operation (Michaelis, Laws of Moses, art. lxxvi. and Winer, sub voce), others have confidently denied it (Kranold, p. 80; Hupfeld, pt. iii. p. 20). But Ewald and Riehm contend that the institution is eminently practical in the character of its details, and that the accidental circumstance of no particular instance of its observance having been recorded in the Jewish history proves nothing. Besides the passages to which reference has been made, Ewald applies several others to the Jubilee. He conceives that "the year of visitation" mentioned in Jer. xi. 23, xxiii. 12, xlvi. 44 denotes the punishment of those who, in the Jubilee, withheld by tyranny or fraud the possessions or the liberty of the poor.¹ From Jer. xxxii. 6-12 he infers that the law was restored to operation in the reign of Josiah^m (Alterthümer, p. 424, note 1).

rams' horns. It appears to come from the rabbinical view respecting the ram which was sacrificed in the place of Isaac. They said (R. Bechai in Ex. xix. ap. Kranold) that after the ram was burnt, God miraculously restored the body. His muscles were deposited in the golden altar; from his viscera were made the strings of David's harp; his skin became the mantle of Elijah; his left horn was the trumpet of Sinai; and his right horn was to sound when Messiah comes (Is. xxvii. 13). R. Akiba, connecting this with the Jubilee, affirms that שָׁבֻעֵי יָמֵינוּ is the Arabic for a ram, and the word שָׁבֻעֵי appears to have that signification in Phœnician (Ewald and Stade) and in Assyrian (M.V.¹¹). Dillmann on Exod. xix. 13 accepts this signification.

^m Is there not a difficulty in considering this passage to have any bearing on the Jubilee, from its relating, apparently, to a priest's field? (See § II. 2 (c).) At all events, the transaction was merely the transfer of land from one member of a family to another, with a recognition of a preference allowed to a near relation to purchase. The case mentioned in Ruth iv. 3 sq. appears to go further in illustrating the Jubilee principle. Naomi is about to sell a field of Elimelech's property. Boaz proposes to the next of kin to purchase it of her, in order to prevent it from going out of the family, and, on his refusal, takes it himself, as having the next right.

VI. The Jubilee is to be regarded as the outer circle of that great Sabbatical system which comprises within it the Sabbatical year, the Sabbatical month, and the Sabbath day. [FEASTS.] The rest and restoration of each member of the state, in his spiritual relation, belongs to the weekly Sabbath and the Sabbatical month, while the land had its rest and relief in the Sabbatical year. But the Jubilee is more immediately connected with the body politic; and it was only as a member of the state that each person concerned could participate in its provisions. It has less of a formally religious aspect than either of the other Sabbatical institutions, and its details were of a more immediately practical character. It was not distinguished by any prescribed religious observance peculiar to itself, like the rites of the Sabbath day and of the Sabbatical month; nor even by anything like the reading of the Law in the Sabbatical year. But in the Hebrew state, polity and religion were never separated, nor was their essential connexion ever dropped out of sight. Hence the year was hallowed, in the strict sense of the word, by the solemn blast of the Jubilee trumpets, on the same day on which the sins of the people had been acknowledged in the general fast, and in which they had been symbolically expiated by the entrance of the high-priest into the Holy of Holies with the blood of the appointed victims. Hence also the deeper ground of the provisions of the institution is stated with marked emphasis in the Law itself. The land was to be restored to the families to which it had been at first allotted by Divine direction (Josh. xiv. 2), because it was the Lord's. "The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is Mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with Me" (Lev. xxv. 23). "I am the Lord your God which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, to give you the land of Canaan, and to be your God" (v. 38). The Hebrew bondman was to have the privilege of claiming his liberty as a right, because he could never become the property of any one but Jehovah. "For they are My servants which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt; they shall not be sold as bondmen" (v. 42). "For unto Me the children of Israel are servants, whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt"ⁿ (v. 55).

If regarded from an ordinary point of view, the Jubilee was calculated to meet and remedy those incidents which are inevitable in the course of human society; to prevent the accumulation of inordinate wealth in the hands of a few; and to relieve those whom misfortune or fault had reduced to poverty. As far as ⁿ The foundation of the law of Jubilee appears to be so essentially connected with the children of Israel, that it seems strange that Michaelis should have confidently affirmed its Egyptian origin, while yet he acknowledges that he can produce no specific evidence on the subject (Mos. Law, art. 73). The only well-proved instance of anything like it in other nations appears to be that of the Dalmatians, mentioned by Strabo, lib. vii. (p. 315, edit. Casaub.). He says that they redistributed their land every eight years. Ewald, following the statement of Plutarch, refers to the institution of Lycurgus; but Mr. Grote has given another view of the matter (Hist. of Greece, ii. 530).

legislation could go, its provisions tended to restore that equality in outward circumstances which was instituted in the first settlement of the land by Joshua.* But if we look upon it in its more special character, as a part of the Divine Law appointed for the chosen people, its practical bearing was to vindicate the right of each Israelite to his part in the covenant which Jehovah had made with his fathers respecting the land of promise. The loud notes of the Jubilee horns symbolised the voice of the Lord proclaiming the restoration of political order, as (according to Jewish tradition) the blast in the Feast of Trumpets had, ten days before, commemorated the creation of the world and the completion of the material kosmos.

In the incurable uncertainty respecting the fact of the observance of the Jubilee, it is important that we should keep in mind that the record of the law, whether it was obeyed or not, was, and is, a constant witness for the truth of those great social principles on which the theocracy was established.† Moreover, from the allusions which are made to it by the Prophets, it must have become a standing prophecy in the hearts of the devout Hebrews. They who waited in faith for the salvation of Israel were kept in mind of that spiritual Jubilee which was to come (Luke iv. 19), in which every one of the spiritual seed of Abraham was to have, in the sight of God, an equality which no accident could ever disturb; and a glorious freedom, in that liberty with which He that was to come was to make him free, and which no force or fraud could ever take from him.

The older monographs on the Jubilee are mentioned in Winer, RWB. s. n. "Jubeljahr," in Kranold, Commentatio de anno Hebraeorum Jubileo, Göttingen, 1837, and in Bähr (Symbolik, vol. ii. p. 572 sq.). References to Ewald, Saalschütz, Hupfeld, Wellhausen, and others are given by Zöckler-Orelli in Herzog, RE.² s. n. Sabbathjahr. Consult also Knobeldillmann on Exod.—Lev. l. c.; Riehlm, HWB. s. v. "Jobeljahr;" Hamburger, RE.³ s. v. "Sabbathjahr." In these two last writers difficulties now obsolete (cp. also 1st ed. of this work) are discussed. [S. C.] [F.]

* A collateral result of the working of the Jubilee must have been the preservation of the genealogical tables, and the maintenance of the distinction of the tribes. Ewald and Michaelis suppose that the tables were systematically corrected and filled up at each Jubilee. This seems reasonable enough, in order that the fresh names might be filled in, that irregularities arising from the dying out of families might be rectified, and that disputed claims might be, as far as possible, authoritatively met.

† Its effect in maintaining the distinction of the tribes is illustrated in the appeal made by the tribe of Manasseh in regard to the daughters of Zelophehad (Num. xxxvi. 4).

As regards the reason of the exception of houses in towns from the law of Jubilee, Bähr has observed that, as they were chiefly inhabited by artificers and tradesmen, whose wealth did not consist in land, it was reasonable that they should retain them in absolute possession. It has been conjectured that many of these tradesmen were foreign proselytes, who could not hold property in the land which was subject to the law of Jubilee.

JU'CAL (יִּזְחָל; Ἰσάχαλ; Juchal), son of Shelemiah (Jer. xxxviii. 1). Elsewhere called JEUICAL.

JU'DA (Ἰούδας, i. e. Judas; Ἰούδα being only the genitive case).

1. Son of Joseph in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 30), in the ninth generation from David about the time of king Joash.

2. Son of Joanna, or Hananiah [HANANIAH, 8] (Luke iii. 26). He seems to be certainly the same person as Abiud in Matt. i. 13. His name, יִזְחָל, is identical with that of יִזְחָל, only that יִזְחָל is prefixed; and when Rhessa is discarded from Luke's line, and allowance is made for St. Matthew's omission of generations in his genealogy, their times will agree perfectly. Both may be the same as Hodaiah of 1 Ch. iii. 24. See Hervey's Genealogies, p. 118 sqq.

3. One of the Lord's brethren, enumerated in Mark vi. 3. [JOSES; JOSEPH.] On the question of his identity with Jude the brother of James, one of the twelve Apostles (Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13), and with the author of the general Epistle, see p. 1836. In Matt. xiii. 55 his name is given in the A. V. as JUDAS.

4. The patriarch JUDAH (Sus. v. 56; Luke iii. 33; Heb. vii. 14; Rev. v. 5, vii. 5).

[A. C. H.]

JUDA, A CITY OF (Luke i. 39), i. e. a city belonging to that tribe; al. see JUTTAH.

JUDAEA or JUDEA (Ἰουδαία). The southern province of Western Palestine, named from the returning exiles of the tribe of Judah, but extending beyond the old north border of the tribal possessions to include all the territory of Dan, Benjamin, and the southern part of Ephraim, which districts were also recolonised by the exiles at the same time (Neh. xi. 25-36). The A. V. in one case (Extra v. 8) renders the Aramaic יִזְחָל by Judaea, in other cases by Judah (Dan. ii. 25, vi. 13) or Jewry (Dan. v. 13); the term meaning generally that part of the country in which the exiles had settled round Jerusalem. At this time the whole of Syria and Palestine formed a single province (see Ezra v. 8; Neh. xi. 3) under a satrap, and is counted by Herodotus (iii. 91) as the fifth out of the twenty which formed the Persian Empire. Classic authors, in the time of the Roman rule in Syria, use the term Judaea loosely in the same manner. Strabo (xvi.) includes all Palestine proper, south of the Lebanon—the Jews in this period having spread over the whole country. The unexplained notice of Judah on Jordan (Josh. xix. 34) and the reading (found in A.) "Judaea beyond Jordan" (Matt. xix. 1) tempted Reland and others to extend the application of the term to the regions east of the river; but the translation of the first of these passages, and the text, are alike perhaps doubtful; while in the second case other MSS. (N, B, C) read "and beyond Jordan," agreeing better with the parallel passage in Mark (x. 1). Josephus defines Judaea (Wars, iii. 3-5) as extending from the Jordan to Joppa, and from Anath and Borecos on the north, to Iarda (Ἰαρδάν) on the south. The sites of the former towns are now marked by the ruins of 'Aina and Berkit (see Conder's Handbook to the Bible, p. 306), 15 Roman miles south of Shechem, or in the situation in which the Onomasticon (s. v. 'Ανωά) places Anua. The Iarda of Josephus is apparently the ancient Arad (Tell 'Arād), on the border of the Beersheba deserts. The boundary between Judaea and Idumaea was, however, not very distinctly drawn [see EDOM], since the latter province was also included within the limits of the Holy Land as defined in early Rabbinical works. The Talmud gives other indications which serve to fix the boundary between Judaea and Samaria very clearly. It ran along the deep gorge of Wādī Deir Ballūt, from Antipatris to Anuath, and thence N.E., including the Acrabatene toparchy (Wars, iii. 3, 4) in Judaea. Antipatris was the border town on the Judaean side of the frontier (Tal. Bab. Gittin, 76a) on the west (Tal. Bab. Sanhed, 94b). Beth Rima (now Beit Rīma), Beth Laban (Lubben), and Keruthim (Corea, now Kerūt) were also near the border, but within Judaea (Mishnah Menakhoth, ix. 7), and lay immediately south of the boundary gorge. Shiloh and Patris (probably the modern Budrus) were also in Judaea (Tosiphta Demai, 1); and since the beacon station of Sartaba (the present Kurn Sartabah) was clearly in Judaea (Mishnah Eosh hash-Shanah, ii. 3), it follows that the line must be carried east of Shechem, to the important valley which runs down to join the Jordan just north of that mountain.

Three natural divisions of Judaea are mentioned in the Mishnah (Shebiith, ix. 2); namely, "the mountain" or "King's Mountain" (הַר הַמֶּלֶךְ), the Shephelah or "low hills" (שְׁפֵלָה), and Daroma or "the south" (דְּרֹמָי). To these a fourth must be added on the east; namely, the Wilderness of Judaea (Matt. iii. 1), which included all the non-arable deserts west of the Dead Sea. This region is called the Midbur of Judah in the Old Testament (Josh. xix. 61; Judg. i. 16; 1 Sam. xxiii. 14, 25); and in it were the towns of Engedi, Ziph, Maon, and the "city of Salt," probably the present Tell el-Mūh, or "Hill of Salt," west of Arad. This is still the most desolate region in Western Palestine, inhabited only by small nomadic tribes, at intervals along the plateau above the Dead Sea cliffs. The term in the N. T. may perhaps include the barren regions further north, where the wilderness of Bethaven is mentioned in the O. T., below Bethel on the east (Josh. xviii. 12), since these desert slopes, west of the Jordan valley, were also within the limits of Judaea.

The subdivision of Judaea into Toparchies is noticed by Josephus (Wars, iii. 3-5) and by Pliny (H. N. v. 14); and there were eleven of these districts with capitals at Acrabatta ('Akrabeh), Thamna (Tibneh), Gophna (Jufna), Lydda (Lud), Joppa (Yāfa), Emmaus Nicopolis ('Amuās), Jericho (Rīha), Herodium (Jebel Fursidīs), and Engedi ('Ain Jidy), while the two last regions were Idumaea and Bethleptephah (perhaps Tuffūh, near Hebron): this enumeration shows that no region beyond Jordan was included.

Other regions included in Judaea are mentioned in both the Talmud and the Onomasticon, in addition to the natural regions already noted. Daroma or the "dry" region, which stands for the Hebrew Negeb in the Targum (Onkelos, Deut. xxxiv. 8), was subdivided into the upper and the lower (Tosiphta Sanhed. 2, and Jer. and Bab. Talmuds on the same Mishnah). The town of Caphar Dhikrin (now Dhikrin in the north of Philistia) was in Upper Daroma as well as Lydda (Midrash Ekka, ii. 2), so that the plains south of Jaffa are evidently intended; and the region between Ekron and Jamnia still bears the name of Deirān. Lower Daroma appears to have been the Negeb proper or plateau of Idumaea. The plains round Gerar (Umm Jerār) were however known to these writers as Geraritica (Tal. Jer. Shebiith, vi. 1); while the southern part of Sharon, north of Jaffa, was also a region in Judaea. Josephus indeed speaks of all the towns (as far north as Accho) in the Sharon plain as belonging to Judaea (Wars, iii. 3-5); but from the Talmudic notices it would seem that north of Antipatris the maritime plain was regarded as no part of the Holy Land until the border of Galilee was reached (Tal. Jer. Demai, ii. 2): there was certainly a mixed Jewish and Samaritan population in this region, and Caesarea appears not to be included in Judaea in the New Testament (Acts xii. 19, xxi. 10). The Roman Procurator of Judaea, however, resided during part at least of the year at this maritime capital instead of at Jerusalem (Antiq. xvii. 13, § 5; xviii. 1, § 1; 2, § 1; 3, § 1) after the deposition of Archelaus in 6 A.D. Judaea under the Procurators was attached to Syria, and ruled by the legate. The conquest of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. by Titus was commemorated by silver and brass coins (see Madden, Coins of the Jews, pp. 207-229), many of which bear the legend IVDAEA CAPTA. In later Roman times Judaea was approximately the Palestina Prima of the Greek ecclesiastical organisation, with bishops under the Patriarch of Jerusalem. The Talmudic references in this article are mainly taken from Neubauer's Géographie du Talmud, 1868; but when that valuable work was written, the sites of many important places, such as Anuath, Borceos, &c., had not been discovered.

JU'DAH (יְהוּדָה), i.e. Yehūdā: Ἰουδαίαν in Gen. xxix. 35; Ἰ. Ἰούδα; elsewhere Ἰούδας in both MSS. and in N. T.; and so also Josephus: Juda). The fourth son of Jacob and the fourth of Leah, the last before the temporary cessation in the births of her children. His whole-brothers were Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, elder than himself—Issachar and Zebulun younger (see xxxv. 23). The name is explained as having originated in Leah's exclamation of "praise" at this fresh gift of Jehovah—"She said, Now will I praise (יְהוָה, ōdeh) Jehovah, and she called his name Yehudah" (Gen. xxix. 35). The same play is preserved in the blessing of Jacob—"Judah, thou whom thy brethren shall praise!" (xlix. 8). The name is not of frequent occurrence in the O. T. In the Apocrypha, however, it appears in the great hero Judas Maccabaeus; in the N. T. in Jude, Judas Iscariot, and others. [JUDA; JUDAS.]

Of the individual Judah more traits are preserved than of any other of the patriarchs with the exception of Joseph. In the matter of the sale of Joseph, he and Reuben stand out in favourable contrast to the rest of the brothers.

But for their interference he, who was "their brother and their flesh," would have been certainly put to death. Though not the firstborn, he "prevailed above his brethren" (1 Ch. v. 2), and we find him subsequently taking a decided lead in all the affairs of the family. When a second visit to Egypt for corn had become inevitable, it was Judah who, as the mouthpiece of the rest, healed the remonstrance against the detention of Benjamin by Jacob, and finally undertook to be responsible for the safety of the lad (xliiii. 3-10). And when, through Joseph's artifice, the brothers were brought back to the palace, he is again the leader and spokesman of the band. In that thoroughly Oriental scene it is Judah who unhesitatingly acknowledges the guilt which had never been committed, throws himself on the mercy of the supposed Egyptian prince, offers himself as a slave, and makes that wonderful appeal to the feelings of their disguised brother which renders it impossible for Joseph any longer to conceal his secret (xliv. 14, 16-34). So, too, it is Judah who is sent before Jacob to smooth the way for him in the land of Goshen (xlv. 28). This ascendancy over his brethren is reflected in the last words addressed to him by his father—"Thou whom thy brethren shall praise! thy father's sons shall bow down before thee! unto him shall be the gathering of the people" (Gen. xlix. 8-10).^a In the interesting traditions of the Koran and the Midrash his figure stands out in the same prominence. Before Joseph his wrath is mightier and his recognition heartier than the rest. It is he who hastens in advance to bear to Jacob the fragrant robe of Joseph (Weil's Biblical Legends, pp. 88-90).

His sons were five. Of these three were by his Canaanite wife Bath-shua; they are all insignificant; two died early, and the third, SHELAH, does not come prominently forward, either in his person or his family. The other two, PHAREZ and ZERAH—twins—were illegitimate sons by the widow of Er, the eldest of the former family (Gen. xxxviii.). As is not unfrequently the case, the illegitimate sons surpassed the legitimate, and from Pharez, the elder, were descended the royal and other illustrious families of Judah. These sons were born to Judah while he was living in the same district of Palestine, which, centuries after, was repossessed by his descendants—amongst villages which retain their names unaltered in the catalogues of the time of the conquest. The three sons went with their father into Egypt at the time of the final removal thither (Gen. xlv. 12; Ex. i. 2).

When we again meet with the families of Judah, they occupy a position among the tribes similar to that which their progenitor had taken amongst the patriarchs. The numbers of the tribe at the census at Sinai were 74,600 (Num. i. 26, 27), considerably in advance of any of the others, the largest of which—Dan—numbered 62,700. On the borders of the Promised Land they were 76,500 (xxvi. 22), Dan being still the nearest. The chief of the tribe at the former census was NAHSHON, the son of Amminadab (Num. i. 7, ii. 3, vii. 12, x. 14), an ancestor of David (Ruth iv. 20). Its representative amongst the spies, and also among those appointed to partition the land, was the great Caleb the son of Jephunneh (Num. xiii. 6; xxxiv. 19). During the march through the desert Judah's place was in the van of the host, on the east side of the Tabernacle, with his kinsmen Issachar and Zebulun (ii. 3-9; x. 14). The traditional standard of the tribe was a lion's whelp, with the words, "Rise up, Lord, and let Thine enemies be scattered!" (Targ. Pseudojon. on Num. ii. 3).

During the conquest of the country the only incidents specially affecting the tribe of Judah are—(1) the misbehaviour of Achan, who was of the great house of Zerah (Josh. vii. 1, 16-18); and (2) the conquest of the mountain-district of Hebron by Caleb, and of the strong city Debir, in the same locality, by his nephew and son-in-law Othniel (Josh. xiv. 6-15, xv. 13-19). It is the only instance given of a portion of the country being expressly reserved for the person or persons who conquered it. In general the conquest seems to have been made by the whole community, and the territory allotted afterwards, without reference to the original conquerors of each locality. In this case the high character and position of Caleb, and perhaps a claim established by him at the time of the visit of the spies to "the land whereon his feet had trodden" (Josh. xiv. 9; cp. Num. xiv. 24), may have led to the exception.

The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are narrated at great length, and with greater minuteness than the others, in Josh. xv. 1-12, 20-63. This may be due either to the fact that the lists were reduced to their present form at a later period, when the monarchy resided with Judah, and when more care would naturally be bestowed on them than on those of any other tribe; or to the fact that the territory was more important and more thickly covered with towns and villages than any other part of Palestine. The greater prominence given to the genealogies of Judah in 1 Ch. ii., iii., iv. no doubt arises from the former reason. However this may be, we have in the records of Joshua a very full and systematic description of the allotment to this tribe. The north boundary—for the most part coincident with the south boundary of Benjamin—began at the embouchure of the Jordan, entered the hills apparently at or about the present road from Jericho, ran westward to En-shemesh—probably the present 'Ain Haud, below Bethany—thence over the Mount of Olives to Enrogel, the Fountain of the Virgin, in the Kedron valley; went along the ravine of Hinnom, under the precipices of the city; climbed the hill at the north end of the Vale of Rephaim, and thence by the waters of Nephtoh (probably the springs near Solomon's Pools above Etam^b), Kirjath-Jearim (probably Kh. 'Erma), Beth-shemesh ('Ain Shems), Timnath, and Ekron to Jabneel on the sea-coast. On the east the Dead Sea, and on the west the Mediterranean, formed the boundaries. The southern line is hard to determine, since it is denoted by places many of which have not been identified. It left the Dead Sea at its extreme south end, and joined the Mediterranean at the Wady el-Arish; but between these two points it passed through Maaleh Acrabbin, the Wilderness of Zin, Hezron, Adar (R. V. Addar), Karkaa (R. V. Karka), and Azmon; the Wilderness of Zin the extreme south of all (Josh. xv. 1-12). This territory—in average length about 45 miles, and in average breadth about 50—was from a very early date divided into four main regions.

(1.) THE SOUTH—the undulating pasture country, which intervened between the hills, the proper possession of the tribe, and the deserts which encompass the lower part of Palestine (Josh. xv. 21; Stanley, S. & P.; Palmer, Desert of the Exodus). It is this which is designated as the wilderness (midbar) of Judah (Judg. i. 16). It contained thirty-seven cities, with their dependent villages (Josh. xv. 20-32), of which eighteen of those farthest south were ceded to Simeon (xix. 1-9). Amongst these southern cities the most familiar name is Beer-sheba.

^a The obscure and much-disputed passage in v. 10 will be best examined under the head SHELOH.

^b According to another view, Nephtoh is Lifta, and Kirjath-Jearim is Kuryet el-'Enab. [BERNARDI.]

(2.) THE LOWLAND (xv. 33; A. V. "valley")—or, to give it its own proper and constant appellation, THE SHEFELAH—the broad belt or strip, of low hills and undulating ground, lying between the central highlands—"the mountain"—and the Mediterranean Sea; the lower portion of that maritime plain, which extends through the whole of the seaboard of Palestine, from Sidon in the north to Rhinocolura at the south. This tract was the garden and the granary of the tribe. In it, long before the conquest of the country by Israel, the Philistines had settled themselves, never to be completely dislodged (Neh. xiii. 23, 24). There, planted at equal intervals along the level coast, were their five chief cities, each with its circle of smaller dependents, overlooking, from the natural undulations of the ground, the "standing corn," "shocks," "vineyards and olives," which excited the ingenuity of Samson, and are still remarked by modern travellers. "They are all remarkable for the beauty and profusion of the gardens which surround them—the scarlet blossoms of the pomegranates, the enormous oranges which gild the green foliage of their famous groves" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 257). From the edge of the sandy tract, which fringes the immediate shore right up to the very wall of the hills of Judah, stretches the immense plain of corn-fields. In those rich harvests lies the explanation of the constant contests between Israel and the Philistines (S. & P. p. 258). From them were gathered the enormous cargoes of wheat, which were transmitted to Phœnicia by Solomon in exchange for the arts of Hiram, and which in the time of the Herods still "nourished" the country of Tyre and Sidon (Acts xii. 20). There were the olive-trees, the sycamore trees, and the treasures of oil, the care of which was sufficient to task the energies of two of David's special officers (1 Ch. xvii. 28). The nature of this locality would seem to be reflected in the names of many of its towns if interpreted as Hebrew words:—DILEAN=cucumbers; GEDERAH, GEDEROTH, GEDEROTHAIM, sheepfolds; ZOREAH, wasps; EN-GANNIM, spring of gardens, &c. &c. But we have yet to learn how far these names are Hebrew; and whether at best they are but mere Hebrew accommodations of earlier originals, and therefore not to be depended on for their significations. The number of cities in this district, without counting the smaller villages connected with them, was forty-two. Of these, however, many which belonged to the Philistines can only have been allotted to the tribe, and if taken possession of by Judah were only held for a time.

What were the exact boundaries of the Shefelah we do not know. We are at present ignorant of the principles on which the ancient Jews drew their boundaries between one territory and another. One thing only is certain, that cities close to the sea-coast, and others, whose modern representatives are found on the western slopes of the central highlands, at altitudes of more than 1000 ft., are enumerated as in the "lowland."

(3.) The third region of the tribe—THE MOUNTAIN, the "hill-country of Judah"—though not the richest, was at once the largest and the most important of the four. Beginning a few miles below Hebron, where it attains its highest level, it stretches eastward to the Dead Sea and westward to the Shefelah, and forms an elevated district or plateau, which, though thrown into considerable undulations, yet preserves a general level in both directions. It is the southern portion of that elevated hilly district of Palestine which stretches north until intersected by the plain of Esdraelon, and on which Hebron, Jerusalem, and Shechem are the chief spots. The surface of this region, which is of limestone, is monotonous enough,—round swelling hills and hollows, of somewhat bolder proportions than those immediately north of Jerusalem, which, though in early times probably covered with forests [HARETH], have now, where not cultivated, no growth larger than a brushwood of dwarf-oak, arbutus, and other bushes. In many places there is a good soft turf, discoverable even in the autumn, and in spring the hills are covered with flowers. The number of towns enumerated (Josh. xv. 48-60) as belonging to this district is 38; but, if we may judge from the ruins which meet the eye on every side, this must have been very far below the real number: hardly a hill which is not crowned by some fragments of stone buildings, more or less considerable,—those which are still inhabited surrounded by groves of olive-trees, and enclosures of stone walls protecting the vineyards. Streams there are none, but wells and springs are frequent—in the neighbourhood of "Solomon's Pools" at Urtâs most abundant.

(4.) The fourth district is THE WILDERNESS (Midbar), which here appears to signify the sunken district adjoining the Dead Sea, and the Jeshimon, or desert tract to the west,—the "wilderness of Judah" (Judg. i. 16). It contained only six cities, which must have been either, like Engedi, on the slopes of the cliffs overhanging the sea, or else on the lower level of the shore. The "city of Salt" may have been on the salt plains, between the sea and the cliffs which form the southern termination to the Ghôr, or more probably at Tell el-Mûh, east of Beer-sheba.

Nine of the cities of Judah were allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi. 9-19). The Levites had no cities* in the tribe, and the priests had none out of it.

In the partition of the territory by Joshua and Eleazar (Josh. xix. 51), Judah had the first allotment (xv. 1). Joshua had on his first entrance into the country overrun the Shefelah, destroyed some of the principal towns and killed the kings (x. 28-35), and had even penetrated thence into the mountains as far as Hebron and Debir (vv. 36-39); but the task of really subjugating the interior was yet to be done. After his death it was undertaken by Judah and Simeon (Judg. i. 20). In the artificial contrivances of war they were surpassed by the Canaanites; and in some places,⁴ where the ground admitted of their iron chariots being employed, the latter remained masters of the field. But wherever force and vigour were in question there the Israelites succeeded, and they obtained entire possession of the mountain district and the great corn-growing tract of Philistia (Judg. i. 18, 19). The latter was constantly changing hands as one or the other side got stronger (1 Sam. iv., v., vii. 14, &c.); but in the natural fortresses of the mountains Judah dwelt undisturbed throughout the troubled period of the Judges. OTHNIEL was partly a member of the tribe (Judg. iii. 9), and the Bethlehem of which IBZAN was a native (xii. 8, 9) may have been Bethlehem-Judah. But even if these two judges belonged to Judah, the tribe itself was not molested; and with the one exception mentioned in Judg. ix. 19, when they were called by the Divine oracle to make the attack on Gibeah, they had nothing to do during the whole of that period but settle themselves in their home. Not only did they take no part against Sisera, but they are not even rebuked for it by Deborah.

Nor were they disturbed by the incursions of the Philistines during the rule of Samuel and of Wilderness of Judah.

Saul, which were made through the territory of Dan and of Benjamin; or if we place the valley of ELAH at the Wady es-Sunt, only on the outskirts of the mountains of Judah. On the last-named occasion, however, we know that at least one town of Judah—Bethlehem—furnished men to Saul's host. The incidents of David's flight from Saul will be found examined under the heads of DAVID, SAUL, MAON, HACHILAH, &c.

The main inference deducible from these considerations is the determined manner in which the tribe keeps aloof from the rest—neither offering its aid nor asking that of others. The same independent mode of action characterises the foundation of the monarchy after the death of Saul. There was no attempt to set up a rival power to Ishbosheth. The tribe had had full experience of the man who had been driven from the court to take shelter in the caves, woods, and fastnesses of their wild hills; and when the opportunity offered, "the men of Judah came and anointed David king over the house of Judah in Hebron" (2 Sam. ii. 4, 11).

The further step by which David was invested with the sovereignty of the whole nation was taken by the other tribes; Judah having no special part therein; and though willing enough, if occasion rendered it necessary, to act with others, their conduct later, when brought into collision with Ephraim on the matter of the restoration of David, shows that the men of Judah had preserved their independent mode of action. The king was near of kin to them; and therefore they, and they alone, set about bringing him back. It had been their own affair, to be accomplished by themselves alone, and they had gone about it in that independent manner which looked like "despising" those who believed their share in David to be a far larger one (2 Sam. xix. 41-43).

The same independent temper will be found to characterise the tribe throughout its existence as a kingdom, which is considered in the article JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.

2. A Levite whose descendants, Kadmiel and his sons, were very active in the work of rebuilding the Temple after the return from captivity (Ezra iii. 9). Lord Hervey has shown cause for believing (Genealogies, &c., p. 119) that the name is the same as HODAVIAH and HODEVAH. In 1 Esd. v. 58, it appears to be given as JODA.

3. (In Ezra, 'Ιούδας, B. 'Ιούδα, N. 'Ιεδμ; in Neh. xii. 8, N^aA. 'Ιωδα, N^aB. 'Ιούδα; in xii. 36, BA. omit: Juda, Judas.) A Levite who was obliged by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 23). Probably the same person is intended in Neh. xii. 8, 36. In 1 Esd. his name is given as JUDAS.

4. (N. 'Ιούδα, BA. 'Ιούδας; Judas.) A Benjaminite, son of Senuah (Neh. xi. 9). It is worth notice, in connexion with the suggestion of Lord Hervey mentioned above, that in the lists of 1 Ch. ix., in many points so curiously parallel to those of this chapter, a Benjaminite, Hodaviah, son of Hassenuah, is given (v. 7; R. V.). [G.] [W.]

JUDAH UPON [R. V. AT] JORDAN, the eastern termination of the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34). Von Raumer (Pal. pp. 405-410) makes an elaborate attempt to show that the villages of Jair are intended. Keil adopts this view (Bib. Com. in loco), and says that the district of Havoth-Jair is considered to be Judah's, or in Judah, because Jair was descended on the father's side from Judah through Hezron (1 Ch. ii. 5, 21 sq.). The view that the Havoth-Jair were largely colonised "by Judahites," especially perhaps that portion of them nearest the Jordan, and that that part of the river and its valley adjacent to these settlements was spoken of as "Judah upon Jordan," or more literally "Judah of the Jordan," is suggested in the Speaker's Comm. (in loco). In connexion with this suggestion it should be mentioned that near Baniás there is a Seiyid Húda ún Y'akúb, which Thomson (Land and the Book, p. 254) identifies with Judah upon Jordan. But the difficulty—maximus atque ins lubilis nodus, qui plurimos interpretes torsit—has defied every attempt; and the suggestion of Ewald (Gesch. ii. 380, note) is the most feasible—that the passage is corrupt, and that Cinneroth or some other word originally occupied the place of "to Judah." [W.]

JUDAH, KINGDOM OF. 1. When the disruption of Solomon's kingdom took place at Shechem, only the tribe of Judah followed the house of David. But almost immediately afterwards, when Rehoboam conceived the design of establishing his authority over Israel by force of arms, the tribe of Benjamin also is recorded as obeying his summons, and contributing its warriors to make up his army. Jerusalem, situate within the borders of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28, &c.), yet won from the heathen by a prince of Judah, connected the frontiers of the two tribes by an indissoluble political bond. By the occupation of the city of David, Benjamin's former adherence to Israel (2 Sam. ii. 9) was cancelled; though at least two Benjamite towns, Bethel and Jericho, were included in the northern kingdom. A part, if not all, of the territory of Simeon (1 Sam. xxvii. 6; 1 K. xix. 3; cp. Josh. xix. 1) and of Dan (2 Ch. xi. 10; cp. Josh. xii. 41, 42) was recognised as belonging to Judah; and in the reigns of Abijah and Asa, the southern kingdom was enlarged by some additions taken out of the territory of Ephraim (2 Ch. xiii. 19, xv. 8, xvii. 2). After the conquest and deportation of Israel by Assyria, the influence, and perhaps the delegated jurisdiction, of the king of Judah sometimes extended over the territory which formerly belonged to Israel.

2. In Edom an independent king probably retained some fidelity to the son of Solomon, and guarded for Jewish enterprise the road to the maritime trade with Ophir. Philistia maintained for the most part a quiet independence. Syria, in the height of her brief power, pushed her conquests along the northern and eastern frontiers of Judah and threatened Jerusalem; but the interposition of the territory of Israel generally relieved Judah from any immediate contact with that dangerous neighbour. The southern border of Judah, resting on the uninhabited Desert, was not agitated by any turbulent stream of commercial activity like that which flowed by the rear of Israel, from Damascus to Tyre. And though some of the Egyptian kings were ambitious, that ancient kingdom was far less aggressive as a neighbour to Judah than Assyria was to Israel.

3. Some would find a gauge of the growth of the kingdom of Judah in the progressive augmentation of the army under successive kings. In David's time (2 Sam. xxiv. 9 and 1 Ch. xxi. 5) the warriors of Judah are said to have numbered at least 500,000. But Rehoboam brought into the field (1 K. xii. 21) only 180,000 men: Abijah, eighteen years afterwards, 400,000 (2 Ch. xiii. 3): Asa (2 Ch. xiv. 8), his successor, 580,000, exactly equal to the sum of the armies of his two predecessors: Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xvii. 14-19), the next king, numbered his warriors in five armies, the aggregate of which is 1,160,000, exactly double the army of his father, and exactly equal to the sum of the armies of his three predecessors. After four inglorious reigns the energetic Amaziah could muster only 300,000 men when he set out to recover Edom. His son Uzziah had a standing (2 Ch. xxvi. 11) force of 307,500 fighting men. Unhappily, but little accuracy can be assigned to these numbers; though the deduction is drawn that the population subject to each king was about four times the number of the fighting men in his dominions. [ISRAEL.]

4. Judah had other means beside pasture and tillage of acquiring wealth; such as her maritime commerce from the Red Sea and possibly Phœnician ports, or by keeping up and developing the old trade (1 K. x. 28) with Egypt. Hence her ability to accumulate wealth, which supplied the Temple treasury with sufficient store to invite so frequently the hand of the spoiler. Egypt, Damascus, Samaria, Nineveh, and Babylon, had each in succession a share of the pillage. The treasury was emptied by Shishak (1 K. xiv. 26), again by Asa (1 K. xv. 18), by Jehoash of Judah (2 K. xii. 18), by Jehoash of Israel (2 K. xiv. 14), by Ahaz (2 K. xvi. 8), by Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 15), and by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K. xxiv. 13).

5. The smaller kingdom of Judah possessed many advantages which secured for it a longer continuance than that of Israel. A frontier less exposed to powerful enemies, a soil less fertile, a population hardier and more united, the possession in Jerusalem and in the Temple of a fixed and venerated centre of administration and religion, an hereditary aristocracy in the sacerdotal caste, an army always subordinate, a stable dynasty and a succession of kings which no revolution interrupted, many of them being wise and good; men who strove successfully to promote the moral and spiritual as well as the material prosperity of their people; still more than these, the devotion of the people to the One True God, which if not always a pure and elevated sentiment, but disfigured by worship at "high places" and altars to foreign deities and by a mischievous commingling of heathen and purer rites (Riehm, HWB., s.n.), was yet in much a contrast to devotion inspired by the worship of the calves or of Baal; and lastly the popular reverence for and obedience to the Divine Law, so far as they had learned it from their teachers:—to these and other secondary causes is to be attributed the fact that Judah survived her more populous and more powerful sister kingdom by 135 years, and lasted from B.C. 975 to B.C. 586. Cp. Kittel, Gesch. der Hebräer, ii. § 64, whose opinion is preferable to that of Wellhausen, Stade, and similar works referred to by him; Edersheim, Bible History, vols. iii. and iv.

6. The chronological succession of the kings of Judah is given at the end of the article ISRAEL. A detailed history of each king will be found under his name.

Judah acted upon three different lines of policy in succession. First, animosity against Israel: secondly, resistance, generally in alliance with Israel, to Damascus: thirdly, deference and vassalage to Assyrian and Chaldaean kings.

(a.) The first three kings of Judah seem to have cherished the hope of re-establishing their authority over the Ten Tribes; for sixty years there was war between them and the kings of Israel. Neither the disbanding of Rehoboam's forces by the authority of Shemaiah, nor the pillage of Jerusalem by the irresistible Shishak, served to put an end to the fraternal hostility. The victory achieved by the daring Abijah brought to Judah a temporary accession of territory. Asa appears to have enlarged it still farther; and to have given so powerful a stimulus to the migration of religious Israelites to Jerusalem, that Baasha was induced to fortify Ramah with the view of checking the movement. Asa provided for the safety of his subjects from invaders by building, like Rehoboam, several fenced cities; he repelled an alarming irruption of an Ethiopian horde; he hired the armed intervention of Benhadad, king of Damascus, against Baasha; and he discouraged idolatry and enforced the worship of the true God by severe penal laws.

(b.) Hanani's remonstrance (2 Ch. xvi. 7) prepares us for the reversal by Jehoshaphat of the policy which Asa pursued towards Israel and Damascus. A close alliance sprang up with strange rapidity between Judah and Israel. For eighty years, till the time of Amaziah, there was no open war between them, and Damascus appears as their chief and common enemy; though it rose afterwards from its overthrow to become under Rezin the ally of Pekah against Ahaz. Jehoshaphat, active and prosperous, repelled nomad invaders from the desert, curbed the aggressive spirit of his nearer neighbours, and made his influence felt even among the Philistines and Arabians. A still more lasting benefit was conferred on his kingdom by his persevering efforts for the religious instruction of the people, and the regular administration of justice. The reign of Jehoram, the husband of Athaliah—a time of bloodshed, idolatry, and disaster—was cut short by disease. Ahaziah was slain by Jehu. Athaliah, the granddaughter of a Tyrian king, usurped the blood-stained throne of David, till the followers of the ancient religion put her to death, and crowned Jehoash the surviving scion of the royal house. His preserver, the high-priest, acquired prominent personal influence for a time; but the king fell into idolatry, and, failing to withstand the power of Syria, was murdered by his own officers. The vigorous Amaziah, flushed with the recovery of Edom, provoked a war with his more powerful contemporary Jehoash, the conqueror of the Syrians; and Jerusalem was entered and plundered by the Israelites. But their energies were sufficiently occupied in the task of completing the subjugation of Damascus. Under Uzziah and Jotham, Judah long enjoyed political and religious prosperity till the wanton Ahaz, surrounded by united enemies, with whom he was unable to cope, became in an evil hour the tributary and vassal of Tiglath-pileser.

(c.) Already in the fatal grasp of Assyria, Judah was yet spared for a chequered existence of almost another century and a half after the termination of the kingdom of Israel. The effect of the repulse of Sennacherib and of the final overthrow of the Assyrian empire, of the signal religious revivals under Hezekiah and Josiah respectively, was apparently done away by the ignominious reign and religious reaction of Manasseh, and by the lingering decay of the whole people under the four feeble descendants of Josiah. Provoked by their treachery and imbecility, their Chaldaean masters drained in successive deportations all the strength of the kingdom. The consummation of the ruin came upon them in the destruction of the Temple by the hand of Nebuzaradan, amid the wailings of prophets, and the taunts of heathen tribes released at length from the yoke of David (cp. Kittel, §§ 70–74).

7. The national life of the Hebrews seemed now extinct; but there was still, as there had been all along, a spiritual life hidden within the body.

It was a time of hopeless darkness to all but those Jews who had strong faith in God, with a clear and steady insight into the ways of Providence as interpreted by prophecy. The time of the division of the kingdoms was the golden age of prophecy. In each kingdom the prophetic office was subject to peculiar modifications which were required in Judah by the circumstances of the priesthood, in Israel by the existence of the house of Baal and the altar in Bethel. If, under the shadow of the Temple, there was a depth and a grasp elsewhere unequalled, in the views of Isaiah and the Prophets of Judah; if their writings touched and elevated the hearts of thinking men in studious retirement in the silent night-watches—there was also, in the few burning words and energetic deeds of the Prophets of Israel, a power to tame a lawless multitude and to check the high-handed tyranny and idolatry of kings. The organization and moral influence of the priesthood were matured in the time of David; from about that time to the building of the second Temple, the influence of the Prophets rose and became predominant. Some historians have suspected that after the reign of Athaliah the priesthood gradually acquired and retained excessive and unconstitutional power in Judah. The recorded facts scarcely sustain the conjecture. Had it been so, the effort of such power would have been manifest in the exorbitant wealth and luxury of the priests, and in the constant and cruel enforcement of penal laws, like those of Asa, against irreligion. But the peculiar offences of the priesthood, as witnessed in the prophetic writings, were of another kind. Ignorance of God's word, neglect of the instruction of the laity, untruthfulness, and partial judgments are the offences specially imputed to them, just such as might be looked for where the priesthood is an hereditary caste and irresponsible, but neither ambitious nor powerful. When the priest either, as was the case in Israel, abandoned the land, or, as in Judah, ceased to be really a teacher, ceased from spiritual communion with God, ceased from living sympathy with man, and became the mere image of an intercessor, a mechanical performer of ceremonial duties little understood or heeded by himself, then the Prophet was raised up to supply some of his deficiencies, and to exercise his functions so far as was necessary. Whilst the priests sink into obscurity and almost disappear, except from the genealogical tables, the Prophets come forward appealing everywhere to the conscience of individuals, in Israel as wonder-workers, calling together God's chosen few out of an idolatrous nation, and in Judah as teachers and seers, supporting and purifying all that remained of ancient piety, explaining each mysterious dispensation of God as it was unfolded, and promulgating His gracious spiritual promises in all their extent. The part which Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other Prophets also took in preparing the Jews for their captivity, requires, in order to be fully appreciated, to be supplemented by a review of the succeeding efforts of Ezekiel and Daniel. The influence which they exercised on the national mind was undoubtedly, and too important to be overlooked in a sketch, however brief, of the history of the kingdom of Judah, even though that influence has been understood differently by writers who have appreciated it otherwise than as here sketched (cp. Kittel, §§ 65-74, Robertson, The Early Religion of Israel, pp. 70 sq., 153 sq., on the one side; Wellhausen, "Israel," § 8, in Encycl. Brit., Stade, Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, ixtes Buch, "Die Prophetie u. d. Untergang d. Staates," Robertson-Smith, *The O. T. in the Jewish Church*², Lect. X., on the other). [W. T. B.] [F.]

JU'DAS (Ἰούδας), the Greek form of the Hebrew name JUDAH, occurring in the LXX. and N. T. [JUDAH.]

1. 1 Esd. ix. 23. [JUDAH, 3.]
2. The third son of Mattathias, "called Maccabaeus" (1 Macc. ii. 4). [MACCABEES.]
3. The son of Calphai (Alphaeus), a Jewish general under Jonathan (1 Macc. xi. 70).
4. A Jew occupying a conspicuous position at Jerusalem at the time of the mission to Aristobulus [ARISTOBULUS] and the Egyptian Jews (2 Macc. i. 10). He has been identified with an Essene conspicuous for his prophetic gifts (Jos. Ant. xiii. 11, 2; B. J. i. 3, 5) and with Judas Maccabaeus (Grimm, ad loc.). Some again suppose that he is a person otherwise unknown.
5. A son of Simon, and brother of Joannes Hyrcanus (1 Macc. xvi. 2), murdered by Ptolemaeus the usurper, either at the same time (c. 135 B.C.) with his father (1 Macc. xvi. 15 sq.) or shortly afterwards (Jos. Ant. xiii. 8, 1; cp. Grimm, ad Macc. i. c.).
6. The patriarch JUDAH (Matt. i. 2, 3). [B. F. W.]

7. A man residing at Damascus, in "the street which is called Straight," in whose house Saul of Tarsus lodged after his miraculous conversion (Acts ix. 11). The "Straight Street" may be with little question identified with the "Street of Bazaars," a long, wide thoroughfare, penetrating from the southern gate into the heart of the city, which, as in all the Syro-Greek and Syro-Roman towns, it intersects in a straight line. The so-called "House of Judas" is still shown in an open space called "the Sheykh's Place," a few steps out of the "Street of Bazaars:" it contains a square room with a stone floor, partly walled off for a tomb, shown to Maundrell (Early Trav. Bohn, p. 494) as the "tomb of Ananias." The house is an object of religious respect to Mussulman as well as Christian (Stanley, S. & P. p. 412; Conybeare and Howson, i. 102; Maundrell, l. c.; Pococke, ii. 119). [R. V.]

JU'DAS, surnamed BARSABAS (Ἰούδας ὁ ἐπικαλούμενος Βαρσαβᾶς: Judas qui cognominabatur Barsabas), a leading member of the apostolic Church at Jerusalem (ἀνὴρ ἠγούμενος ἐν τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς), Acts xv. 22, and "perhaps a member of the Presbytery" (Neander, Pl. & Tr. i. 123), endued with the gift of prophecy (v. 32), chosen with Silas to accompany St. Paul and St. Barnabas as delegates to the Church at Antioch, to communicate the decree concerning the terms of admission of the Gentile converts, and to accredit their commission and character by personal intercourse (v. 27). After employing their prophetic gifts for the confirmation of the Syrian Christians in the faith, Judas went back to Jerusalem, while Silas either remained at Antioch (for the reading Acts xv. 34 is uncertain; and while some MSS., followed by the Vulgate, add μόνος Ἰούδας δὲ ἐπέσπεύθη, the best omit the verse altogether) or speedily returned thither. Nothing further is recorded of Judas.

The form of the name Barsabas = Son of Sabas, has led to several conjectures: Wolf and Grotius probably enough suppose him to have been a brother of Joseph Barsabas (Acts i. 23); while Schott (Isagog. § 103, p. 431), taking Sabas or Zabas to be an abbreviated form of Zebedee, regards Judas as an elder brother of James and John, and attributes to him the "Epistle of Jude." He must not be identified, as he has been by some, with the Apostle Judas Thaddeus (see p. 1837 a). [E. V.] [F.]

JUDAS OF GALILEE (Ἰούδας ὁ Γαλιλαῖος; Judas Galilaeus), the leader of a popular revolt "in the days of the taxing" (i.e. the census, under the prefecture of P. Sulp. Quirinus, A.D. 6, A.U.C. 759), referred to by Gamaliel in his speech before the Sanhedrin (Acts v. 37). According to Josephus (Ant. xviii. 1, § 1), Judas was a Gaulonite of the city of Gamala, a city reckoned in Galilee, and hence his name of Galilaean. His insurrection took its rise in Judaea, and was of a theocratic character, the watchword of which was "We have no Lord nor master but God." He boldly denounced the payment of tribute to Caesar, and all acknowledgment of any foreign authority, as treason against the principles of the Mosaic constitution, and signifying nothing short of downright slavery. His fiery eloquence and the popularity of his doctrines drew vast numbers to his standard, by many of whom he was regarded as the Messiah (Orig. Homil. in Luc. xxv.), and the country was for a time entirely given over to the lawless depredations of the fierce and licentious throng who had joined themselves to him. But the might of Rome proved irresistible: Judas himself perished, and his followers were "dispersed," though not entirely destroyed till the final overthrow of the city and nation.

With his fellow-insurgent Sadoc, a Pharisee, Judas is represented by Josephus as the founder of a fourth sect, in addition to the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes (Ant. xviii. 1, §§ 1, 6; B. J. ii. 8, § 1). The point which appears to have distinguished his followers from the Pharisees was their greater fanaticism and stubborn love of freedom, leading them to despise torments, or death for themselves or their friends, rather than call any man master.

The Gaulonites, as his followers were called, may be regarded as the religious ancestors of the Zealots (cp. the Assumptio Moysis, x. 8) and Sicarii of later days, and to the influence of his tenets Josephus attributes all subsequent insurrections of the Jews, and the final destruction of the City and the Temple. James and John, the sons of Judas, headed an unsuccessful insurrection in the procuratorship of Tiberius Alexander, A.D. 47, by whom they were taken prisoners and crucified. Twenty years later, A.D. 66, their younger brother Menahem, following his father's example, took the lead of a band of desperadoes, who, after pillaging the armoury of Herod in the fortress of Masada, near the "gardens of Engaddi," marched to Jerusalem, occupied the city, and after a desperate siege took the palace, where he immediately assumed the state of a king, and committed great enormities. As he was going up to the Temple to worship, with great pomp, Menahem was taken by the partisans of Eleazar the high-priest, by whom he was tortured and put to death Aug. 15, A.D. 66 (Milman, Hist. of Jews, ii. 152, 231; Joseph. l. c.; Orig. in Matt. xvii. § 25). References to the literature on this subject are given in Schürer, Gesch. d. Jüdischen Volken im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, i. pp. 406-7. [E. V.] [F.]

JUDAS ISCARIOT (Ἰούδας Ἰσκαριώτης; Judas Iscariotes). He is sometimes called "the son of Simon" (John vi. 71, xiii. 2, 26), but more commonly (the three Synoptic Gospels give no other name) Iscariotes (Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 19; Luke vi. 16 et al.). In the three lists of the Twelve there is added in each case the fact that he was the betrayer.

The name Iscariot has received many interpretations, more or less conjectural (see the 1st ed. of this work), but it is now universally agreed that it is to be derived from Keriioth (Josh. xv. 25), in the tribe of Judah, the Heb. קְרִיּוֹת אִישׁ, 'ISH KERIYÖTH, passing into Ἰσκαριώτης in the same way as אִישׁ טוֹב—'ish Tob, a man of Tob—appears in Josephus (Ant. vii. 6, § 1) as Ἰσκαριώτης (Winer, RWB. s. v.). In connexion with this explanation may be noticed the reading in John vi. 71 received by Lachmann and Tischendorf, Westcott and Hort, Ἰσκαριώτου, which makes the name of Iscariot belong to Simon, as well as to Judas. On this hypothesis his position among the Twelve, the rest of whom belonged to Galilee (Acts ii. 7), would be exceptional.

Of the life of Judas, before the appearance of his name in the lists of the Apostles, we know absolutely nothing. It must be left to the sad vision of a poet (Keble, Lyra Innocentium, ii. 13) or the fantastic fables of an apocryphal Gospel (Thilo, Cod. Apoc. N. T. Evang. Infant. c. 35) to portray the infancy and youth of the traitor. What that appearance implies, however, is that he had previously declared himself a disciple. He was drawn, as the others were, by the preaching of the Baptist, or his own Messianic hopes, or the "gracious words" of the new teacher, to leave his former life, and to obey the call of the Prophet of Nazareth. What baser and more selfish motives may have mingled even then with his faith and zeal, we can only judge by reasoning backward from the sequel. Gifts of some kind there must have been, rendering the choice of such a man not strange to others, not unfit in itself, and the function which he exercised afterwards among the Twelve may indicate what they were. The position of his name, uniformly the last in the lists of the Apostles in the Synoptic Gospels, is due, it may be imagined, to the infamy which afterwards rested on his name; but, prior to that guilt, it would seem that he took his place in the group of four which always stand last in order, as if possessing neither the love, nor the faith, nor the devotion which marked the sons of Zebedee and the son of Jonah.

The choice was not made, we must remember, without a provision of its issue. "Jesus knew from the beginning . . . who should betray Him" (John vi. 64); and the distinctness with which that Evangelist records the successive stages of the guilt of Judas, and his Master's discernment of it (John xii. 4; xiii. 2, 27), leaves with us the impression that he too shrank instinctively (Bengel describes it as "singularis antipathia," Gnomon N. T. on John vi. 64) from a nature so opposite to his own. We can hardly expect to solve the question why such a man was chosen for such an office. Either we must assume absolute foreknowledge, and then content ourselves with saying with Calvin that the judgments of God are as a great deep, and with Ullmann (Sündlosigk. Jesu, p. 97) that he was chosen that the Divine purpose might be accomplished through him; or else with Neander (Leben Jesu, § 77) that there was a discernment of the latent germs of evil, such as belonged to the Son of Man, in His insight into the hearts of men (John ii. 25; Matt. ix. 4; Mark xii. 15), yet not such as to exclude emotions of sudden sorrow or anger (Mark iii. 5), or astonishment (Mark vi. 6; Luke vii. 9), admitting the thought "with men this is impossible, but not with God." Did He in the depth of that insight, and in the fulness of His compassion, seek to overcome the evil which, if not conquered, would be so fatal to His follower? It gives, at any rate, a new meaning and force to many parts of our Lord's teaching to remember that they must have been spoken in the hearing of Judas, and may have been designed to make him conscious of his danger. The warnings as to the impossibility of a service divided between God and Mammon (Matt. vi. 19-34), and the destructive power of the "cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches" (Matt. xiii. 22, 23), the pointed words that spoke of the guilt of unfaithfulness in the "unrighteous Mammon" (Luke xvi. 11), the proverb of the camel passing through the needle's eye (Mark x. 25) must have fallen on his heart as meant specially for him. He was among those who asked the question, Who then can be saved? (Mark x. 26). Of him, too, we may say, that, when he sinned, he was "kicking against the pricks," letting slip his "calling and election," frustrating the purpose of his Master in giving him so high a work and educating him for it (cp. Chrysost. Hom. on Matt. xvi. xxvii., John vi.).

The germs (see Stier's Words of Jesus, infra) of the evil, in all likelihood, unfolded themselves gradually. The rules to which the Twelve were subject in their first journey (Matt. x. 9, 10) sheltered him from the temptation that would have been most dangerous to him. The new form of life, of which we find the first traces in Luke viii. 3, brought that temptation with it. As soon as the Twelve were recognised as a body, travelling hither and thither with their Master, receiving money and other offerings, and redistributing what they received to the poor, it became necessary that some one should act as the steward and almoner of the small society, and this fell to Judas (John xii. 6, xiii. 29), either as having the gifts that qualified him for it, or, as we may conjecture, from his character, because he sought it, or, as some have imagined, in rotation from time to time. The Galilaean or Judean peasant (we have no reason for thinking that his station differed from that of the other Apostles) found himself entrusted with larger sums of money than before (the three hundred denarii of John xii. 5 are spoken of as a sum which he might reasonably have expected), and with this there came covetousness, unfaithfulness, embezzlement. It was impossible after this that he could feel at ease with One Who asserted so clearly and sharply the laws of faithfulness, duty, unselfishness; and the words of Jesus, "Have I not chosen you Twelve, and one of you is a devil?"* (John vi. 70), indicate that even then, though the greed of immediate or the hope of larger gain kept him from "going back," as others did (John vi. 66), hatred was taking the place of love, and leading him on to a fiendish malignity.

In what way that evil was rebuked, what discipline was applied to counteract it, has been hinted at above. The scene at Bethany (John xii. 1-9; Matt. xxvi. 6-13; Mark xiv. 3-9) showed how deeply the canker had eaten into his soul. That warm outpouring of love called forth no sympathy. He himself uttered, and suggested to others, the complaint that it was a waste. Under the plea of caring for the poor he covered his own miserable theft.

The narrative of Matt. xxvi., Mark xiv. places this history in close connexion (apparently in order of time) with the fact of the betrayal. It leaves the motives of the betrayer open to conjecture (cp. Neander, Leben Jesu, § 264). The mere love of money may have been strong enough to make him clutch at the bribe offered him. He came, it may be, expecting more (Matt. xxvii. 15); he will take that. He had lost the chance of dealing with the three hundred denarii; it will be something to get the thirty shekels as his own. It may have been that he felt that his Master saw through his hidden guilt, and that he hastened on a crisis to avoid the shame of open detection. Mingled with this there may have been some feeling of vindictiveness,—a vague, confused desire to show that he had power to stop the career of the Teacher Who had reproved him. Had the words that spoke of "the burial" of Jesus, and the lukewarmness of the people, and the conspiracies of the priests led him at last to see that the Messianic kingdom was not as the kingdoms of this world, and that his dream of power and wealth to be enjoyed in it was a delusion? (Ewald, Gesch. Israels, v. 441-446.) There may have been the thought that, after all, the betrayal could do no harm, that his Master would prove His innocence, or by some supernatural manifestation effect His escape (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. p. 886, in Winer, and Whitby on Matt. xxvii. 4). Another motive has been suggested (cp. Neander, Leben Jesu, l. c.; and Whately, Essays on Dangers to Christian Faith, Discourse iii.) of an entirely different kind, altering altogether the character of the act. Not the love of money, nor revenge, nor fear, nor disappointment, but policy, a subtle plan to force on the hour of the triumph of the Messianic kingdom, the belief that for this service he would receive as high a place as Peter, or James, or John: this it was that made him the traitor. If he could place his Master in a position from which retreat would be impossible, where He would be compelled to throw Himself on the people, and be raised by them to the throne of His father David, then he might look forward to being foremost and highest in that kingdom, with all his desires for wealth and power gratified to the full. Ingenious as this hypothesis is, it fails for that very reason.^b It attributes to the Galilaean peasant a subtlety in forecasting political combinations, and planning stratagems accordingly, which is hardly compatible with his character and learning, hardly consistent either with the pettiness of the faults into which he had hitherto fallen. Of the other motives that have been assigned we need not care to fix on any one, as that which singly led him on. Crime is for the most part the result of a hundred motives rushing with bewildering fury through the mind of the criminal.

During the days that intervened between the supper at Bethany and the Paschal or quasi-Paschal gathering, he appeared to have concealed his treachery. He went with the other disciples to and fro from Bethany to Jerusalem, and looked on the acted parable of the barren and condemned tree (Mark xi. 20-24), and shared the vigils in Gethsemane (John xviii. 2). At the Last Supper he is present, looking forward to the consummation of his guilt as drawing nearer every hour. All is at first as if he were still faithful. He is admitted to the feast. His feet are washed, and for him there are the fearful words, "Ye are clean, but not all." He, it may be, receives the bread and the wine which were the pledges of the new covenant.^c Then come the sorrowful words which showed him that his design was known. "One of you shall betray Me." Others ask, in their sorrow and confusion, "Is it I?" He too must ask the same question, lest he should seem guilty (Matt. xxvi. 25). He alone hears the answer. St. John only, and through him St. Peter, and the traitor himself, understand the meaning of the act which pointed out that he was the guilty one (John xiii. 26).^d After this there comes on him that paroxysm and insanity of guilt as of one whose human soul was possessed by the Spirit of Evil—"Satan entered into him" (John xiii. 27). The words "What thou doest, do quickly," come as a spur to drive him on. The other disciples see in them only a command which they interpret as connected with the work he had hitherto undertaken. Then he completes the sin from which even those words might have drawn him back. He knows that garden in which his Master and his companions had so often rested after the weary work of the day. He comes, accompanied by a band of officers and servants (John xviii. 3), with the kiss which was probably the usual salutation of the disciples. The words of Jesus, calm and gentle as they were, showed that this was what embittered the treachery, and made the suffering it inflicted more acute (Luke xxii. 48).

What followed in the confusion of that night the Gospels do not record. Not many students of the N. T. will follow Heumann and Archbishop Whately (Essays on Danvers, l. c.) in the hypothesis that Judas was "the other disciple" that was known to the high-priest, and brought Peter in (cp. Meyer on John xviii. 15). It is probable enough, indeed, that he who had gone out with the high-priest's officers should return with them to wait the issue of the trial. Then, when it was over, came the reaction. The fever of the crime passed away. There came back on him the recollection of the sinless righteousness of the Master he had wronged (Matt. xxvii. 3). He repented, and his guilt and all that had tempted him to it became hateful.^e He will get rid of the accursed thing, will transfer it back again to those who with it had lured him on to destruction. They mock and sneer at the tool whom they have used, and then there comes over him the horror of great darkness that precedes self-murder. He has owned his sin with "an exceeding bitter cry," but he dares not turn, with any hope of pardon, to the Master Whom he has betrayed. He hurls the money, which the priests refused to take, into the sanctuary (*vab*s) where they were assembled. For him there is no longer sacrifice or propitiation.^f He is "the son of perdition" (John xvii. 12). "He departed and went and hanged himself" (Matt. xxvii. 5). He went "unto his own place"^g (Acts i. 25).

^b Cp. the remarks on this hypothesis, in which Whately followed (unconsciously perhaps) in the footsteps of Paulus, in Ersch. u. Gruber's Allgem. Encycl. art. "Judas." See Speaker's Comm. on St. John, Addit. note to xlii. 18.

^c The question whether Judas was a partaker of the Lord's Supper is encompassed with many difficulties, both dogmatic and harmonistic. The general consensus of patristic commentators gives an affirmative, that of modern critics a negative answer (cp. Meyer, Comm. on John xiii. 36). Bp. Westcott is of opinion that Judas "was present at the distribution of the Sacramental Bread, and not present at the distribution of the Sacramental Cup" (Speaker's Comm. on St. John, Introd. note to ch. xlii.).

^d The combination of the narratives of the four Gospels is not without grave difficulties, for which harmonists and commentators may be consulted. We have given that which seems the most probable result.

^e This passage has often been appealed to, as illustrating the difference between μεταμέλεια and μετανοία. It is questionable, however, how far the N. T. writers recognise that distinction (cp. Grolius in loco). Still more questionable is the notion above referred to, that St. Matthew describes his disappointment at a result so different from that on which he had reckoned.

^f It is characteristic of the wide, far-reaching sympathy of Origen, that he suggests another motive for the suicide of Judas. Despairing of pardon in this life, he would rush on into the world of the dead, and there (γυμνήν τῇ ψυχῇ) meet his Lord, and confess his guilt and ask for pardon (Tract. in Matt. xxxv. : cp. also Theophanes, Hom. xxvii., in Salzer, Thes. s. v. ἰουδας).

^g The words ἰδὼς τόπος in St. Peter's speech convey to our minds the impression of some dark region in Gehenna; or may be considered a euphemism for the condition of the soul of Judas. Lightfoot and Gill (in loco) quote passages from Rabbinical writers who find that meaning

We have in Acts i. another account of the circumstances of his death, which it is not easy to harmonise with that given by St. Matthew. There, in words which may have been spoken by St. Peter (Meyer, following the general consensus of interpreters), or may have been a parenthetical notice inserted by St. Luke (Calvin, Olshausen, and others), it is stated—

(1) That, instead of throwing the money into the Temple, he bought (ἐκτίσασθαι) a field with it.

(2) That, instead of hanging himself, "falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out."

(3) That for this reason, and not because the priests had bought it with the price of blood, the field was called Aceldama.

It is, of course, easy to cut the knot, as Strauss and De Wette have done, by assuming one or both accounts to be spurious and legendary. Receiving both as authentic, we are yet led to the conclusion that the explanation is to be found in some unknown series of facts, of which we have but two fragmentary narratives (cp. Bayschlag in Riehm's HWB. s. n.). The solutions that have been suggested by commentators and harmonists are nothing more than exercises of ingenuity seeking to dovetail into each other portions of a dissected map which, for want of missing pieces, do not fit. Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 573, finds no real divergence between the accounts.

The life of Judas has been represented here in the only light in which it is possible for us to look on it, as a human life, and therefore as one of temptation, struggle, freedom, responsibility. If another mode of speaking of it appears in the N. T.; if words are used which imply that all happened as it had been decreed; that the guilt and the misery were parts of a Divine plan (John vi. 64, xiii. 18; Acts i. 16), we must yet remember that this is no single, exceptional instance. All human actions are dealt with in the same way. They appear at one moment separate, free, uncontrolled; at another they are links in a long chain of causes and effects, the beginning and the end of which are in the "thick darkness where God is," or determined by an inexorable necessity. No adherence to a philosophical system frees men altogether from inconsistency in their language. In proportion as their minds are religious, and not philosophical, the transitions from one to the other will be frequent, abrupt, and startling.

With the exception of the stories already mentioned, there are but few traditions that gather round the name of Judas. It appears, however, in a strange, hardly intelligible way, in the history of the wilder heresies of the second century. The sect of Cainites, consistent in their inversion of all that Christians in general believed, was reported to have honoured him as the only Apostle that was in possession of the true Gnosis, to have made him the object of their worship, and to have had a Gospel bearing his name (cp. Neander, Church History, ii. 153, Eng. Tr.; Iren. adv. Hæc. i. 35; Tertull. de Praesc. c. 47). For the general literature connected with this subject, especially for monographs on the motive of Judas and the manner of his death, see Winer, RWB. For a full treatment of the questions of the relation in which his guilt stood to the life of Christ, cp. Stier's Words of the Lord Jesus, on the passages where Judas is mentioned, and in particular vii. 40-67, Eng. Tr.; Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 471-475; Farrar, The Life of Christ, pop. ed., Index, s. n. [E. H. P.] [F.]

JUDAS, or JUDE, or THADDAEUS, or possibly LEBBAEUS (Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου, Luke vi. 16, Acts i. 13; Θαδδαῖος, with v. l. Λεββαῖος, Matt. x. 3, Mark ii. 18), one of the Twelve. In all four lists of the Apostles he appears in the last group with James of Alphaeus and Simon the Zealot or the Cananean; the fourth member of the group in the Gospels being Judas Iscariot, whose place is vacant in the Acts. In John xiv. 22 he is specially distinguished from Iscariot. The usual identification of the Thaddaeus (Lebbaeus) in Matt. and Mark with the Judas of James in Luke and Acts may be accepted without serious hesitation. It is unlikely that four lists of the Twelve should agree in all other cases and have a serious discrepancy here: and there is nothing improbable in one of the Twelve having even three names (trinomius, as Jerome calls him in Comm. on Matt. x. 3); although, like Simon Peter and perhaps Bartholomew, Judas of James probably had only two names—Judas and Thaddaeus. This traditional identification is ancient; it solves a difficulty in a simple manner; and the only objection to it is the lack of direct evidence; for Syrian legends, which distinguish Jude from Thaddaeus, the Apostle of Edessa, are not worthy of much credit. Those who reject it either resort to the far more violent hypothesis that Thaddaeus died, or left the apostolic company, and that Judas of James took his place (e.g. Schleiermacher and Ewald),—an hypothesis not easy to reconcile with Luke vi. 16; or else suppose that primitive tradition as to the names of the Twelve fluctuated (Strauss).

That the most natural translation of Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου is "Judas son of James" cannot be doubted. It is true that the genitive does not invariably denote the filial relationship (Moulton's Winer, p. 237; Winer, Bibl. Realw. ii. 57): but the obvious and usual translation ought not to be surrendered without clear evidence that some other relationship must be meant. Among the earliest Versions, the Old Latin and the Memphitic reproduce the vagueness of the Greek, Judas Jacobi; while the Peshitto and the Thebaic give the natural rendering, "Judas the son of James." None suggest the exceptional rendering, "the brother of James." Moreover, if St. Luke had meant this, why did he not bracket the two brothers as he does St. Peter and St. Andrew, St. James and St. John? He might easily have made the matter clear by writing "James of Alphaeus and Judas his brother," or "James and Judas the sons of Alphaeus." But in both lists he separates James and Judas by placing Simon the Zealot between them. The inference is that James and Judas were not related; for that James the father of Judas is identical with in the phrase, even in Gen. xxxi. 55, and Num. xxiv. 25. Some interpreters reject that explanation (cp. Meyer in loco), and the great Anglican divine (Hammond, Comment. on N. T. in loco) explained the sentence, that St. Matthias should undertake the Apostolic circuit which had been assigned to Judas.

James of Alphaeus is most improbable. No where is any such relationship suggested; and James was a very common name (Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 263, 6th ed.). Among English versions, Wiclif and the Rhemish follow the indefiniteness of the Vulgate, "Judas (Jude) of James"; while Tyndale, Coverdale, and Cranmer have "son": the highly improbable "brother" comes from Beza and the Genevan Version. Luther has Sohn. The fact that in the opening address of the Epistle of Jude ἀδελφός is expressed, tells against rather than for its being understood in Luke vi. 16 and Acts i. 13; for, if it had been meant, it would have been expressed here also.

The name Lebbaeus or Lebaeus is probably an early corruption of Thaddaeus. Neither name is found in N. T., excepting in Matt. x. 3 and Mark ii. 18; and "the clearly defined attestation is unfavourable to the genuineness of Λεββαῖος in either Gospel. This name is apparently due to an early attempt to bring Levi (Λεββί) the publican (Luke v. 27) within the Twelve, it being assumed that his call was to apostleship; just as in Mark ii. 14 Λεββί is changed in Western texts to Ἰάκωβος because τὸν τοῦ Ἀλφαίου follows, and it was assumed that the son of Alphaeus elsewhere named as one of the Twelve must be meant. The difference between the two forms of the name would be inconsiderable in Aramaic, Levi and Levi or Lebi and Lebbi; and Λεββαῖος might as easily represent Lebbi as Θαδδαῖος Thaddai" (Westcott and Hort, ii. Appendix, p. 11: cp. Origen c. Celsum, l. lxiii., where Levi appears as Lebes and is not identified with Matthew). If this is correct, discussions as to whether Λεββαῖος means "man of Lebba," which is supposed to have been a town of Galilee (Baumgarten-Crusius), or "young lion" (Schleusner), or "dear heart" (Jerome), are out of place. Winer, Siefert, and others would identify the meaning of Lebbaeus and Thaddaeus, interpreting the former as "heart" and the latter as "breast," and making both equivalent to "darling" (Herzenskind). There may be something in this, if the authors of the Western text were trying to express different varieties in the Aramaic. Λεββαῖος having been substituted for Θαδδαῖος in some early copies, the way was prepared for the conflate reading followed in all English versions previous to the R. V.,* Λεββαῖος δ ἐπικληθεὶς Θαδδαῖος (C.² L.), for which some cursives have Θαδδαῖος δ ἐπικληθεὶς Λεββαῖος, while some Old Latin texts read Judas Zelotes. This last perhaps comes from a wrong punctuation of Luke vi. 16; τὸν καλούμενον Ζηλωτὴν καὶ Ἰούδαν Ἰακώβου being taken together as meaning "him who was called Zelotes and Judas Jacobi." A similar reading appears in the Thebaic Version of John xiv. 22, where "Judas the Cananaean" is substituted for "Judas not Iscariot." Thus a fourth name is added to Thaddaeus, Lebbaeus, and Judas of James: and the confusion is made worse by the Curetonian Syriac, which has "Judas Thomas" or "Judas the Twin" for "Judas not Iscariot." Apparently the Syriac translator understood St. John to mean Thomas Didymus, and not Judas of James; for in the Syrian Church Thomas was commonly called Judas. Thus Eusebius says that ἀπόσειλεν αὐτῷ (to Abgarus) Ἰούδας δ καὶ Θωμᾶς Θαδδαῖον ἀπόστολον, ἕνα τῶν ἰβδομήκοντα (H. E. i. xiii. 10). In the Gnostic Acts of Thomas this Apostle is called Judas Thomas, as also in the Edessan Acts and in the Syriac Teaching of the Apostles; and he is made the twin brother of Jesus, and so like Him that one was sometimes mistaken for the other (Acta Thomas, § 31, p. 217 ed. Tischend., p. 23 ed. Bonnet).^b Thomas or "the Twin" looks like a surname, and it is not improbable that his first name was Judas. But it is not at all probable that St. John by "Judas not Iscariot" means the Apostle whom he everywhere else calls Thomas (xi. 16, xiv. 5, xx. 24–28, xxi. 2). All this confusion, however, admits of ready simplification without the employment of rash hypotheses. Judas and Thaddaeus are two names for one and the same Apostle, who was the son of an otherwise unknown James. "Lebbaeus" is probably a corrupt reading, the result of a mistaken identification of Thaddaeus with Levi or substitution of Levi for Thaddaeus. "Judas Zelotes" and "Judas the Cananaean" are certainly corrupt readings, perhaps produced by a misunderstanding of Luke vi. 16. "Judas Thomas" is equally certainly a corrupt reading in John xiv. 22, arising from the fact that Syrian Christians called Thomas the Apostle Judas. Thus all these substitutions or additions may be rejected, and the three well-established readings—"Thaddaeus," "Judas of James," and "Judas not Iscariot"—retained.

The Apostle who is thus designated is little more than a name to us in N. T., and traditions respecting him are untrustworthy. That he had some share in founding the Church of Edessa, is doubtful; and perhaps there is not even this element of truth in the Abgarus legend (Eus. H. E. i. xiii.). The Syrian Church believed that he went from Edessa to preach in Phoenicia, and there found a martyr's death. In Abdias the scene of his preaching and martyrdom is Persia. Nicephorus Callistus makes him preach in Palestine, Syria, and Arabia, and then die a natural death at Edessa (H. E. ii. xl.). In the Apostolical Constitutions, viii. 25, 26, the regulations about widows and exorcists are assigned to "Lebbaeus surnamed Thaddaeus"; and the two Vienna MSS. have a note stating that Thaddaeus or Lebbaeus "was surnamed Judas the Zealot" and preached in Mesopotamia. An apocryphal Gospel of Thaddaeus is mentioned in connexion with a synod at Rome in A.D. 494 in the time of Pope Gelasius: and we have some Acta Thaddaei, in which the letter of Abgarus differs somewhat from the one given by Eusebius (Tisch. Acta Apost. Apocr. p. 261; Lipsius, Apocr. Apostelg. iii. 154–200). JUDAS, THE LORD'S BROTHER. In Matt. xiii. 55 we read, "Is not this the carpenter's son? is not His mother called Mary? and His brethren, James, and Joseph, and Simon, and Judas?" The parallel passage in Mark vi. 3 runs, "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, and brother of James, and Joses, and Judas, and Simon?" That the four brethren of Christ mentioned by St. Matthew are identical with the four mentioned by St. Mark, is manifest. It is sometimes, however, assumed that "Mary the mother of James and Joses" (Matt. xxvii. 56), "Mary the mother of James the less and of Joses" (Mark. xv. 40), is the mother of the four brethren mentioned in the first pair of passages. But this is very precarious. The omission of two of the four, the silence respecting any relationship to the Lord, and the fact that both James and Joseph were very common names, are very much against the identification. Moreover, there is mention of the Lord's mother in close connexion with the four brethren in the one case, whereas in the other case another Mary is the mother of the two brothers. The further identification of two, or even three, of the four brethren with the Apostles of the same name is still more untenable. If James the Lord's brother is James the son of Alphaeus, and Simon the Lord's brother is Simon the Zealot, and Judas the Lord's brother is Judas not Iscariot, then St. John could never have written "even His brethren did not believe on Him" (vii. 5). Moreover this theory involves two sisters both bearing the name of Mary, with other improbabilities. In none of the four lists of the Apostles is there any hint that any one of them was a brother of the Lord; and in Acts i. 13, 14, and 1 Cor. ix. 5, the Lord's brethren are distinguished from the Apostles. We may safely conclude that the four brethren of the Lord and His sisters are either the children of His mother or else of some person whose name is not known. In the latter case their precise relationship to the Lord is uncertain. Of these four, Joses or Joseph and Simon are not to be identified with any other Joses and Simon; and we know nothing respecting them beyond their names and their relationship to Christ. Of the other two, James is one of the most prominent figures in the primitive Church, being overseer of the mother Church of Jerusalem and the writer of the Epistle which bears his name, while his brother Judas or Jude is probably the author of the Epistle of Jude (see next article).*

Jude, like his brethren, did not at first believe that Jesus was the Messiah (John vii. 5), but was convinced by the Resurrection (Acts i. 14). He was married (1 Cor. ix. 5), and Hegesippus tells an interesting story of two of his grandsons (Eus. H. E. III. xx. 1-8). These two men were taken before Domitian as of the royal family of David, and therefore dangerous to the Emperor. For Domitian, says Hegesippus, "was afraid of the appearance of the Christ, as was Herod." They admitted their royal descent, but stated that they were humble persons, living by manual labour; in evidence of which they showed their rough hands. When asked about Christ's kingdom, he said that it was a heavenly one, and that at the end of the world He would come to judge the living and the dead. Domitian dismissed them as too simple to be dangerous, and forbade any further persecution of the family of David. A fragment of Philip of Side (c. A. D. 425) states that Hegesippus gave Zocer and James as the names of these two grandsons of Jude (Texte und Untersuchungen, v. 2, p. 169). On their return to Palestine they were honoured both as confessors and as of the family of the Lord, and lived until the reign of Trajan (Eus. H. E. III. xxiii. 5, 6). We must suppose that, when they were taken before Domitian, their father and grandfather were dead, otherwise they would have been arrested also. This seems to show that St. Jude died before, or not long after, the accession of Domitian, A. D. 81. [A. P.]

JUDE, EPISTLE OF. (See JUDAS or JUDE.)

There is no valid reason for doubting that this Epistle was written by the person whose name it bears. Nor is there very much doubt as to who this Jude or Judas is. He styles himself "servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James." If he had been an Apostle, he would probably have said so. His object in mentioning his brother James must have been to win the attention and interest of his readers; and to have mentioned that he was one of the Twelve would have been a far better way of securing attention. It is true that an Apostle might have written, "Remember ye the words which have been spoken before by the Apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ" (c. 17; yet cp. Ephes. iii. 5 and Gal. i. 19): but such a charge comes much more naturally from one who is not himself one of the number. The author evidently wishes to speak with all possible authority, and we can conjecture no reason for his suppressing the fact of his being an Apostle, if he had been one. We cannot, therefore, identify this Jude with Judas not Iscariot (John xiv. 22; Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13). Nor can we identify his brother James with James of Alphaeus, or James the son of Zebedee. There is no reasonable doubt that the James of whom our Jude is the brother is the first president of the Church of Jerusalem, the brother of the Lord, and the writer of the Epistle of James. Jude, therefore, is also a brother of the Lord. But neither he nor James claim any authority in virtue of this relationship, and do not mention the relationship in their Epistles, for reasons which are indicated by Clement of Alexandria in the Adumbrationes: "Judas, who wrote the Catholic Epistle, brother of the sons of Joseph, a very religious man, though he knew of his relationship, did not call himself His brother. But what said he? 'Judas, the servant of Jesus Christ' as his Lord." That is, reverence kept him silent. Jude, however, does think that his close relationship to the revered James the Just will win for him interest and attention; and he therefore mentions the relationship. The brother of James would be specially acceptable to Jewish Christians, whom the writer has chiefly in mind as he writes.

* [On the much-disputed question who were "the brethren of the Lord," see further the different views advocated in BROTHER, p. 461, and JAMES, pp. 1512 seq. — EDITORS.]

AUTHENTICITY. — The Epistles of both brothers are classed by Eusebius among the "disputed" books (ἀντιλεγόμενα) of the N. T., which means that some Christians had misgivings respecting them, and therefore proves that these books were not admitted into the N. T. without careful scrutiny. For some time after these Epistles were written there were Churches in the West that had never heard of the Epistle of James, and Churches in the East that had never heard of that of Jude. Even where they were known, their claim to authority was open to doubt, because they did not appear to be written by Apostles. The shorter Epistle was open to a further objection. "Because in it Jude derives a testimony from the Book of Enoch, which is apocryphal, it is rejected by some" (Jerome, Cat. l. Scr. Eccl. iv.). The strongest evidence of objection to the Epistle of Jude, or of ignorance as to its existence, is afforded by its absence from the Peshitto, a fact which is of weight in determining the authorship. If the Apostle Judas Thaddaeus were the author, his connexion with Edessa would have secured the inclusion of his letter in the Syriac versions. Its omission is intelligible, if the author was not an Apostle. The silence of early writers proves very little, for the letter is too short to be often quoted. Even Chrysostom, who must have known it, does not quote it once in all his voluminous writings. Against the silence of many and the condemnation of some is to be set the general acceptance in the West which is shown by the Muratorian Canon: Epistola sane Iude et superscriptio Johannis duas in catholica habentur. Here superscriptio is a blunder for superscripti, "the John mentioned above," or for superscriptae [Johannis duae], "the two above-mentioned letters of John"; and almost certainly in catholica means "in the Catholic Church." But the evidence remains strong whatever be the right reading. Clement of Alexandria commented on it in his Hypotyposesis or Adumbrationes (Eus. H. E. vi. xiv. 1), and quotes it as Scripture (Paed. iii. viii. 280; Strom. iii. ii. 515); and his disciple Origen, although aware of doubts respecting it, yet accepted it himself and several times quotes it.^b In commenting on Matt. xiii. 55 he calls it "an epistle of few lines, yet full of the strong words of heavenly grace." And Didymus, yet another head of the Catechetical School at Alexandria, and the instructor of Jerome and Rufinus, condemns those who rejected the Epistle because of the passage about the body of Moses, much as Jerome seems to condemn those who rejected it because of the quotation from the Book of Enoch. The testimony from North Africa is also strong. Tertullian maintains that the Book of Enoch ought to be regarded as Scripture, among other reasons because it is quoted by "the Apostle Jude" (De Cult. Fem. i. iii.); and Augustine asks, "What of Enoch the seventh from Adam? Does not the canonical epistle of the Apostle Jude declare that he prophesied?" (De Civ. Dei, xviii. xxxviii. 1). But for the lack of testimony from the East, this amount of evidence in favour of so brief a document is surprising; and about the year A.D. 269 we get evidence from the East. Eusebius has preserved part of the letter of a synod at Antioch against Paul of Samosata, and the tone of the document suggests acquaintance with the Epistle of Jude; e.g. "denying his God [and Lord]" (cp. Jude c. 4) and "not guarding the faith which he once held" (cp. Jude c. 9). The quotations from Jude in Ephrem Syrus (A.D. 350-373) are found only in the Greek translations of his writings, and cannot be relied upon as original: but without them the Epistle is sufficiently attested as of the apostolic age. Renan places it as early as A.D. 54; but regards it as an attack on St. Paul, who is one of those who "defile the flesh, and set at nought dominion, and rail at dignities." In this idea he is probably alone. A forger covertly attacking St. Paul would have written in the name of some one possessing more authority than "Judas, brother of James." Harnack (Dis N. T. um d. Jahr. 200, p. 79) admits that Zahn (Gesch. d. N. T. Kanons, i. p. 321) exaggerates very little when he declares that about A.D. 200 the Epistle of Jude was accepted "in the Church of all lands round the Mediterranean Sea." Whatever misgivings existed in some quarters were exceptional, and before long passed away.

THE PERSONS ADDRESSED in the Epistle are "those that are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ"; i.e. all Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, wherever they may dwell. But it is probable that the writer has Jewish Christians of Palestine and Syria principally in his mind. Like that of St. James, the Epistle is Palestinian in origin and in tone, and the writer would think chiefly of the kind of Christians with whom he was most familiar.

THE OCCASION of the letter is plainly stated. St. Jude had been intending to write an Epistle "about our common salvation" (v. 3), when the invasion of the Church by ungodly men produced a crisis which constrained him to write at once an Epistle of a different character, in order to denounce the authors of this trouble and put others on their guard respecting them. These invaders had "crept in privily," and had turned Christian liberty into the anarchy of heathen licence. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. ii. p. 515) thinks that St. Jude denounces prophetically the licentious doctrine and practice of Carpocrates. Some moderns suggest that the writer was contemporary with Carpocrates, and therefore cannot be Judas the brother of James. The date of Carpocrates is uncertain, and St. Jude may have known him: but there is no reason for supposing that he refers to him or any Antinomian teacher. These "ungodly men" were not propagandists, but libertines. They "denied our only Master and Lord," not by anti-Christian doctrines, but by unchristian lives. They maintained that Christians

^a A plerisque rejicitur. The meaning of plerisque is uncertain. The classical meaning of plerique was extinct, for even in Tacitus it means not "most" but "very many" (e.g. Hist. iv. 84). Later on it came to mean no more than "some." Thus Jerome, writing to Dardanus (Ep. cxxix.), says of the Epistle to the Hebrews, licet plerique eam vel Barnabae vel Clementis arbitrentur, where plerique = the ruvci of Origen and Eusebius (H. E. vi. xx. 3; xxv. 1).

might indulge in gross sensuality; and, when rebuked, they reviled those who were set over them.

The CONTENTS of the Epistle exhibit a careful plan. Introduction (1-4): Warning and Denunciation: Three instances of God's vengeance (5-7) and application to the libertines (8-10); Three examples of similar wickedness (11), and threefold description corresponding to them (12-15, 16-18, 19): Exhortation (20-23): Doxology (24, 25). The writer's fondness for triplets is remarkable. We can trace a dozen, most of which can hardly be accidental. (1) Judas, a servant . . . and brother. (2) Called, beloved, . . . and kept. (3) Mercy and peace and love. (4) Ungodly, turning . . . and denying. (5) Israelites, angels, cities of the plain. (6) Defile . . . set, at nought . . . and rail. (7) Cain, Balaam, Korah. (8) These are . . . These are . . . These are. (9) Who make separations, sensual, having not the Spirit. (10) Building up . . . praying . . . looking for mercy. (11) Have mercy . . . save . . . have mercy with fear. (12) Before all time, and now, and for evermore.

The Epistle presents some special difficulties. a. From v. 4 to v. 18 the resemblance to the central portion of 2 Peter is such that it is universally admitted that one writer must have borrowed from the other. That both have borrowed from a third is a possible, but much less probable, alternative, and it lacks supporters. Of late years the balance of opinion has been in favour of the priority of this Epistle, Spitta being a notable exception. The main arguments on each side are these. For the priority of Jude. (1) It is more probable that most of a short document should be inserted in a much longer one, than that a fraction of a longer document should be made the main portion of a short one. (2) It is more probable that things that seemed objectionable or difficult should be omitted in 2 Peter, than that they should be inserted in Jude: e.g. "wells without water" (2 Pet. ii. 17) looks like a correction of the self-contradictory "clouds without water" (Jude v. 12); and without Jude v. 9 the less decided statement in 2 Pet. ii. 11 is scarcely intelligible, as if the writer disliked the apocryphal literature which Jude uses so freely. The statements in Jude vv. 6, 14, 15, 23 are either omitted in 2 Peter, or put in a way less likely to offend (ii. 4, 11). For the priority of 2 Peter. (1) If 2 Peter is genuine, it is less probable that the chief of the Apostles should borrow from one who was not an Apostle at all, than vice versa; and if 2 Peter is not genuine, it is unlikely that a plagiarist would discredit his forgery by incorporating what was already disliked for its use of apocryphal literature. (2) The troubles which 2 Peter speaks of as future (ii. 1) Jude speaks of as present (v. 4); and while 2 Peter says that "in the last days mockers shall come with mockery, walking after their own lusts" (iii. 3), Jude gives these very words as an apostolic prophecy (vv. 17, 18). The telling points in Jude which are not found in 2 Peter lead one to think that the writer of 2 Peter had not seen Jude; but these are balanced by telling points in 2 Peter which are not found in Jude. The triplets, so common in Jude, are not found in 2 Peter; and it seems to be more probable that the writer of 2 Peter has overlooked or ignored them, than that St. Jude has inserted them into borrowed material. The priority of Jude may be regarded as the more tenable hypothesis; but certainty is unattainable.

b. Another difficulty, noticed from very early times, is the use which St. Jude makes of apocryphal writings. He quotes the Book of Enoch as if it were inspired; and in other passages, without exactly quoting, he seems to be under its influence. Moreover he draws a portion of his material from the Assumption of Moses. The Book of Enoch is composite, and some of the central portion may be later than the Christian era. But chapters i.-xxxvi. and lxxii.-cv. are undoubtedly earlier; and it is in these that the quotation and the parallels are found. "Angels which kept not their own principality, but left their proper habitation, He hath kept in everlasting bonds under darkness unto the judgment of the great day" (Jude v. 6) is a condensation of Enoch vii.-xxi.: see especially x. 6-16; xiv. 2; xxi. 3, 6. The expressions "rail at dignities" (glories), "wandering stars, for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved for ever," and "the seventh from Adam" seem to have been suggested by the Book of Enoch (vi. 4; xxvi. 2; xviii. 6-16; xcii. 4). It is Origen who tells us that the contest between Michael and Satan for the body of Moses comes from the Ἀνάληψις or Ἀνάβασις of Moses (De Princip. III. ii. sub init.), a book known to Clement of Alexandria (Strom. VI. xv. p. 806), Didymus of Alexandria (Gallandi Biblioth. Patr. vi. 307), Augustine (Epist. clviii. 3), and others. From the eighth to the nineteenth century it disappeared. A portion of it has been found in a palimpsest in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, but the fragment ends before the death of Moses. That the Assumptio Moysis is earlier than the Epistle of Jude is almost universally admitted, the dates assigned to it varying from A.D. 4 to A.D. 70 (Schürer, The Jewish People in the time of Jesus Christ, Div. II. vol. iii. pp. 80-83; Herzog, Plitt and Hauck, Real-Encycl. vol. xii. p. 352); and we need not doubt the statements of Origen and Didymus that Jude v. 9 is based upon it. That St. Jude received a special revelation on the subject is a violent and untenable hypothesis. That a true tradition had survived for fifteen hundred years, without leaving any trace throughout the O. T., is not credible. The sober conclusion is that, in illustrating his denunciations, St. Jude has made use of legendary material; and this ought not to offend us. His spiritual teaching is not the less sound because he has mistaken legend for history. The Church, while profiting by his defence of truth and holiness, has never been misled by his lack of critical judgment. It has never been in doubt as to the true nature of the Assumption of Moses or the Book of Enoch. There is an able, but unconvincing, statement of the view that v. 9 comes from Zech. iii. 1-3, and not from the Assumptio Moysis, in Wright's Bampton Lectures, Hodder and Stoughton, 1879, pp. 53-57. The express statements of Origen and Didymus, who name the book, and of Apollinaris, who says that Jude here quotes from an apocryphal work, cannot lightly be set aside: * and the passage in Zechariah lacks the most striking features in Jude v. 9,—“Michael the Archangel,” and “the body of Moses.”

The STYLE of the Epistle is somewhat cumbersome and harsh, as of one who does not express himself with perfect ease; but it exhibits a rough originality, which is less conspicuous in 2 Pet. ii. St. Jude writes better Greek than we might have expected from a Jew of Palestine; but it is not so surprisingly good as that of his brother St. James. Both brothers must have had some special advantages in this respect.

The following expressions are peculiar in the N. T. to this Epistle, and some of them are rare in Greek literature: ἐπαγγελισθαι (v. 3), παρεῖδεν (v. 4), ἐκπορεύεις, δέγμα, ἰπέχειν (v. 7), φυσικῶς (v. 10), σιλάς, φθίνωνων (v. 12), ἀπαφρίξεν, πλανήτης (v. 13), γογγυστής, μεμψιμοίρος, ἀποδιόριξεν (v. 16), ἑταίριος (v. 24), πρὸ παντός τοῦ αἰῶνος (v. 25). The last two occur in the doxology, which from a literary point of view is the finest part of the Epistle and may possibly be influenced by Rom. xvi. 25-27.

Here and there the Epistle appears to be influenced by the language of the O. T., but there is not much that can with certainty be called quotation: cp. v. 9 with Dan. xii. 1 and Zech. iii. 2; v. 12 with Ezek. xxxiv. 8; v. 14 with Zech. xiv. 5 and Deut. xxiii. 2; v. 23 with Zech. iii. 2, 3.

There is little evidence respecting the PLACE in which the letter was composed, and not very much respecting the DATE. It is possible that Jude, the brother of the Lord, never travelled outside Palestine, and the use of the Book of Enoch and of the Assumption of Moses favours Palestine, for these are of Palestinian origin. It is not likely that he survived by very many years the destruction of Jerusalem, if he survived it at all. The testimony of Hegesippus tends to show that Jude died before the reign of Domitian.

That he would have mentioned the destruction of Jerusalem as a signal instance of God's judgments upon sinners (vv. 5-7), if it had already taken place, is by no means certain. Renan's date (circa A.D. 54) is probably too early; but if 2 Peter is genuine, and if the Apostle made use of Jude's letter, and not Jude of the Apostle's letter,—then our Epistle cannot be placed much later than A.D. 62. Nothing can be based upon the vague expression ἐν ἑσχατοῦ χρόνου (v. 18), which by no means proves that the writer is far removed from the apostolic age. St. Jude considers the appearance of these antichristian libertines a sign of the “last time,” as St. John considers the appearance of “many antichrists” a sign of the “last hour” (1 John ii. 18); and the Evangelist probably wrote considerably later than this brother of James. But v. 3 points to a late date, and v. 17 rather implies that these words of the Apostles were spoken long ago. Perhaps we may conjecture that Jude would not have written at all if his brother James was still alive. In this case A.D. 62 is the earliest date that we can assign to the Epistle.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—Considering that the Epistle consists of only twenty-five verses, the amount of literature respecting it is remarkable. In the following list of commentaries the works of those who have commented upon the whole of the N. T. are not included; but in many cases the writer named has taken the Epistle of Jude in conjunction with one or more of the Epistles of Peter and of James. JUDEA. [JUDAEA.]

JUDETH. [JUDITH, 2.]

JUDGES. The administration of justice in all early Eastern nations, as amongst the Arabs of the desert to this day, rests with the patriarchal seniors; * the judges being the heads of tribes, or of chief houses in a tribe. Such from their elevated position would have the requisite leisure, would be able to make their decisions respected, and through the wider intercourse of superior station would decide with fuller experience and riper reflection. Thus in the Book of Job (xxix. 7-9) the patriarchal magnate is represented as going forth "to the gate" amidst the respectful silence of elders, princes, and nobles (cp. xxxii. 9). The actual chiefs of individual tribes are mentioned on various occasions, one as late as the time of David, as preserving importance in the commonwealth (Num. vii. 2, 10, 11, xvii. 6, or 17 in Heb. text; xxxiv. 18; Josh. xxii. 14; so perhaps Num. xvi. 2, xxi. 18). Whether the princes of the tribes mentioned in 1 Ch. xxvii. 16, xxviii. 1, are patriarchal heads, or merely chief men appointed by the king to govern, is not strictly certain; but it would be foreign to all ancient Eastern analogy to suppose that they forfeited the judicial prerogative, until reduced and overshadowed by the monarchy, which in David's time is contrary to the tenor of history. During the oppression of Egypt the nascent people would necessarily have few questions at law to plead; and the Egyptian magistrate would take cognizance of theft, violence, and other matters of police. Yet the question put to Moses shows that "a prince" and "a judge" were connected even then in the popular idea (Ex. ii. 14; cp. Num. xvi. 13). When they emerged from this oppression into national existence, the want of a machinery of judicature began to press. The patriarchal seniors did not instantly assume the function, having probably been depressed by bondage till rendered unfit for it, not having become experienced in such matters, nor having secured the confidence of their tribesmen. Perhaps for these reasons Moses at first took the whole burden of judicature upon himself, then at the suggestion of Jethro (Ex. xviii. 14-24) instituted judges over numerically graduated sections of the people. These were chosen for their moral fitness, but from Deut. i. 15, 16, we may infer that they were taken from amongst those to whom primogeniture would have assigned it. Save in offences of public magnitude, criminal cases do not appear to have been distinguished from civil. The duty of teaching the people the knowledge of the Law which pertained to the Levites, doubtless included such instruction as would assist the judgment of those who were thus to decide according to it. The Levites were thus the ultimate sources of ordinary jurisprudence, and perhaps the "teaching" aforesaid may merely mean the expounding the Law as applicable to difficult cases arising in practice. Beyond this, it is not possible to indicate any division of the provinces of deciding on points of law as distinct from points of fact. The judges mentioned as standing before Joshua in the great assemblies of the people must be understood as the successors to those chosen by Moses, and had doubtless been elected with Joshua's sanction from among the same general class of patriarchal seniors (Josh. iv. 2, 4, xxii. 14, xxiv. 1).

* The expression יְשִׁיָא בֵּית־אָבִי (Num. xxv. 14) is remarkable, and seems to mean the patriarchal senior of a subdivision of the tribe (cp. 1 Ch. iv. 38; Judg. v. 3, 15).

* The passages will be found in full, with those from Clement of Alexandria and the letter of Evodius to Augustine (see above), in the Preface to Fritzsche's Libri Apocryphi Vet. Test. Graece, pp. xxxiv., xxxv.; and the extant fragments of the Assumptio Moyses will be found pp. 700-729.

The judge was reckoned a sacred person, and secured even from verbal injuries. Seeking a decision at law is called "inquiring of God" (Ex. xviii. 15). The term "gods" is actually applied to judges (Ex. xxi. 6; cp. Ps. lxxxii. 1, 6). The judge was told, "Thou shalt not be afraid of the face of men, for the judgment is God's;" and thus whilst human instrumentalities was indispensable, the source of justice was upheld as Divine, and the purity of its administration only sank with the decline of religious feeling. In this spirit speaks Ps. lxxxii.—a lofty charge addressed to all who judge; cp. the qualities regarded as essential at the institution of the office, Ex. xviii. 21, and the strict admonition of Deut. xvi. 18-20. But besides the sacred dignity thus given to the only royal function, which, under the Theocracy, lay in human hands, it was made popular by being vested in those who led public feeling, and its importance in the public eye appears from such passages as Ps. lxxix. 12 (cp. cxix. 23), lxxxii., cxlviii. 11; Prov. viii. 15, xxxi. 4, 5, 23. There could have been no considerable need for the legal studies and expositions of the Levites during the wanderings in the wilderness while Moses was alive to solve all questions, and while the Law which they were to expound was not wholly delivered. The Levites, too, had a charge of cattle to look after in that wilderness like the rest, and seem to have acted also, being Moses' own tribe, as supports to his executive authority. But then few of the greater entanglements of property could arise before the people were settled in their possession of Canaan. Thus they were disciplined in smaller matters, and, under Moses' own eye, for greater ones. When, however, the commandment, "judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates" (Deut. xvi. 18), came to be fulfilled in Canaan, there were the following sources from which those officials might be supplied:—1st, the ex-officio judges, or their successors, as chosen by Moses; 2ndly, any surplus left of patriarchal seniors when they were taken out (as has been shown from Deut. i. 15, 16) from that class; and 3rdly, the Levites. On what principle the non-Levitical judges were chosen after Divine superintendence was interrupted at Joshua's death is not clear. A simple way would have been for the existing judges in every town, &c., to choose their own colleagues, as vacancies fell, from among the limited number of persons who, being heads of families, were competent. Generally speaking, the reputation for superior wealth, as some guarantee against facilities of corruption, would determine the choice of a judge, and, taken in connexion with personal qualities, would tend to limit the choice to probably a very few persons in practice. The supposition that judicature will always be provided for is carried through all the Books of the Law (see Ex. xxi. 6, xxii. pass.; Lev. xix. 15; Num. xxxv. 24; Deut. i. 16, xvi. 18, xxv. 1). And all that we know of the facts of later history confirms the supposition. The Hebrews were sensitive as regards the administration of justice; nor is the free spirit of their early commonwealth in anything more manifest than in the resentment which followed the venal or partial judge. The fact that justice reposed on a popular basis of administration largely contributed to keep up this spirit of independence, which is the ultimate check on all perversions of the tribunal. The popular aristocracy^b of

^b This term is used for want of a better; and as regards privileges of race, the tribe of Levi and house of Aaron were the only aristocracy, and these, by their heads of tribes, sections of tribes, or families, is found to fall into two main orders of varying nomenclature, and rose from the capite censi, or mere citizens, upwards. The more common name for the higher order is "princes," and for the lower, "elders" (Judg. viii. 14; Ex. ii. 14; Job xxix. 7-9; Ezra x. 8). These orders were the popular element of judicature. On the other hand, the Levitical body was imbued with a keen sense of allegiance to God as the Author of Law, and to the Covenant as His embodiment of it, and soon gained whatever forensic experience and erudition those simple times could yield; hence they brought to the judicial task the legal acumen and sense of general principles which complemented the ruder lay element. Thus the Hebrews really enjoyed much of the virtue of a system which allots separate provinces to judge and jury, although we cannot trace any such line of separation in their functions, save in so far as has been indicated above. To return to the first or popular branch, there is reason to think, from the general concurrence of phraseology amidst much diversity, that in every city these two ranks of "princes" and "elders" had their analogies, and that a variable number of heads of families and groups of families, in two ranks, were popularly recognised, whether with or without any form of election, as charged with the duty of administering justice. Succoth^d (Judg. viii. 14) may be taken as an example. Evidently the ex-officio judges of Moses' choice would have left their successors when the tribe of Gad, to which Succoth pertained (Josh. xiii. 27), settled in its territory and towns: and what would be more simple privation as regards holding land, were an aristocracy very unlike what has usually gone by that name.

^a A number of words—e.g. אֲשֵׁרֵי, שָׂרֵי, וְנָתָן, and (especially in the Book of Job) שָׂרֵי—are sometimes rendered "prince" in the A. V.: the first most nearly uniformly so, which seems designative of the passive eminence of high birth or position; the next, שָׂרֵי, expresses active and official authority. Yet as the אֲשֵׁרֵי was most likely, nay, in the earlier annals, certain, to be the שָׂרֵי, we must be careful of excluding from the person called by the one title the qualities denoted by the other. Of the two remaining terms, וְנָתָן, expressing princely qualities, approaches most nearly to אֲשֵׁרֵי, and שָׂרֵי, expressing prominence of station, to שָׂרֵי.

^d The princes and elders here were together 77. The subordination in numbers, of which Ten is the base of Ex. xviii. and Deut. i. 16, strongly suggests that 70 + 7 were the actual components; although they are spoken of rather as regards functions of ruling generally than of judging specially, yet we need not separate the two, as is clear from Deut. i. 16. Such division of labour assuredly found little place in primitive times. No doubt these men presided "in the gate." The number of Jacob's family (with which Succoth was traditionally connected, Gen. xxxiii. 17) having been 70 on their coming down into Egypt (Gen. xli. 27), may have been the cause of this number being that of the "elders" of that place, besides the sacred character of the factor 7. See also Ex. xxiv. 9. On the other hand, at Ramah about 30 persons occupied a similar place in popular esteem (1 Sam. ix. 22: see also v. 13 and vii. 17.) than that the whole number of judges in that tribe should be allotted to its towns in proportion to their size? As such judges were mostly the headmen by genealogy, they would fall into their natural places, and symmetry would be preserved. The Levites also were apportioned on the whole equally among the tribes; and if they preserved their limits, there were probably few parts of Palestine beyond a day's journey from a Levitical city.

One great hold which the priesthood had, in their jurisdiction, upon men's ordinary life was the custody in the Sanctuary of the standard weights and measures, to which, in cases of dispute, reference was doubtless made. It is, however, reasonable to suppose that in most towns sufficiently exact models of them for all ordinary questions would be kept, since to refer to the Sanctuary at Shiloh, Jerusalem, &c., in every case of dispute between dealers, would be nugatory (Ex. xxx. 13; Num. iii. 47; Ezek. xiv. 12). Above all these, the high-priest in the ante-regal period was the resort in difficult cases (Deut. xvii. 12), as the chief jurist of the nation, and who would in case of need be perhaps oracularly directed; yet we hear of none acting as judge save Eli: nor is any judicial act recorded of him; though perhaps his not restraining his sons is meant to be noticed as a failure in his judicial duties. Now the judicial authority of any such supreme tribunal must have wholly lapsed at the time of the events recorded in Judg. xix.' It is also a fact of some weight, negatively, that none of the special deliverers called Judges was of priestly lineage, or even became as much noted as Deborah, a woman. This seems to show that any central action of the high-priest on national unity was null; and of this supremacy, had it existed in force, the judicial prerogative was the main element. Difficult cases would include cases of appeal, and we may presume that, save so far as the authority of those special deliverers made itself felt, there was no judge in the last resort from Joshua to Samuel. Indeed the current phrase of those deliverers that they "judged" Israel during their term, shows which branch of their authority was most in request, and the demand of the people for a king was, in the first instance, that he might "judge them," rather than that he might "fight their battles" (1 Sam. viii. 5, 20).

The special Judges enumerated are fifteen in number: 1. Othniel; 2. Ehud; 3. Shamgar; 4. Deborah and Barak; 5. Gideon; 6. Abimelech; 7. Tola; 8. Jair; 9. Jephthah; 10. Ibzan; 11. Elon; 12. Abdon; 13. Samson; 14. Eli; 15. Samuel. Their history is related under their separate names.

^e The remark in the margin of the A. V. on 1 Sam. iv. 18 seems improper. It is as follows: "He seems to have been a judge to do justice only, and that in South-west Israel." When it was inserted (1661), the function of the high-priest, as mentioned above, would seem to have been overlooked. That function was certainly designed to be general, not partial; though probably, as hinted above, its execution was inadequate.

^f It ought not to be forgotten that in some cases of "blood" the "congregation" themselves were to "judge" (Num. xxxv. 24), and that the appeal of Judg. xx. 4-7 was thus in the regular course of constitutional law.

[It is difficult to define accurately the station and office of these "special deliverers," chiefly because the intimations respecting their exploits and government are not always clear. There had not arisen a second legislator such as Moses, nor a second leader such as Joshua, to instruct and guide the people, and the period proper of the Judges presents rather a reversion to patriarchal and tribal government than a continuation of the form of constitution preceding it. In Judg. ii. 11, &c., the rationalis of their existence, their being raised up or appointment by the Lord in times of oppression, His Presence with them, their special commission to save His rebellious people time after time "out of the hand of them that spoiled them," is given in broad details, but is not applicable to all Judges without distinction (e.g. Eli and Samuel were not military Judges). In general, their appointment varied with the exigencies of the times, and was in conformity with the choice of the people, though the direct Divine appointments of Gideon and Samson were notable exceptions to the rule. Noble and magnanimous men whose patriotism was inspired by religious dependence upon God, however imperfect, and by a desire to help their fellow-countrymen rather than enrich themselves, they were not, and are not represented as, perfect men. They are the children of their age, and exhibit both its good and its bad points.

The chronology of their respective terms of office and of the period generally is beset with difficulties which are now recognised as insuperable. How are the blanks to be filled up? What value is to be attached to the frequent recurrence of round numbers (e.g. 40 years)? Were any of the Judges contemporaneous and ruling over separate districts? These are questions which have met with various answers, satisfactory only to those who must at all hazards find a solution. According to the chronology of the Book of Judges itself, the period of the Judges between Othniel and Samson was 410 years,—a total too high to be consistent with the period embraced in the 480 years of 1 K. vi. 1 or the 450 years of Acts xiii. 20. A table has been printed in Kitto's Encycl. of Bibl. Lit., s. n. "Judges," which gives the conjecture, and systems of Josephus, Eusebius, Usher, Jackson, Russell, &c.; but the conviction remains that "an exact chronology of the period is unattainable" (Driver, LOT, p. 152; cp. Budde, Die BB. Richter u. Samuel, p. 135, s. v.).—F.]

The judicial function of the priesthood, being, it may be presumed, in abeyance during the period of the Judges, seems to have been merged in the monarchy. The kingdom of Saul suffered too severely from external foes to allow civil matters much prominence. Hence of his only two recorded judicial acts, one (1 Sam. xi. 13) was the mere remission of a penalty popularly demanded; the other the pronouncing of a sentence (ib. xiv. 44, 45), which, if it was sincerely intended, was overruled in turn by the right sense of the people. In David's reign it was evidently the rule for the king to hear causes in person, and not merely be passively, or even by deputy (though this might also be included),² the

"fountain of justice" to his people. For this purpose perhaps it was prospectively ordained that the king should "write him a copy of the law," and "read therein all the days of his life" (Deut. xvii. 18, 19). The same class of cases which were reserved for Moses would probably fall to his lot; and the high-priest was of course ready to assist the monarch. This is further presumable from the fact that no officer analogous to a chief justice ever appears under the kings. It has been supposed that the subjection of all Israel to David's sway caused an influx of such cases, and that advantage was artfully taken of this by Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 1-4); but the rate at which cases were disposed of can hardly have been slower among the ten tribes after David had become their king, than it was during the previous anarchy. It is more probable that during David's uniformly successful wars wealth and population increased rapidly, and civil cases multiplied faster than the king, occupied with war, could attend to them, especially when the summary process customary in the East is considered. Perhaps the arrangements, mentioned in 1 Ch. xxiii. 4, xxvi. 29 (cp. v. 32, "rulers" probably including judges) of the 6000 Levites acting as "officers and judges," and amongst them especially "Chenaniah and his sons," with others for the trans-Jordanic tribes, may have been made to meet the need of suitors. In Solomon's character, whose reign of peace would surely be fertile in civil questions, the "wisdom to judge" was the fitting first quality (1 K. iii. 9; cp. Ps. lxxii. 1-4). As a judge Solomon shines "in all his glory" (1 K. iii. 16, &c.). No criminal was too powerful for his justice, as some had been for his father's (2 Sam. iii. 39; 1 K. ii. 5, 6, 33, 34). The examples of direct royal exercise of judicial authority are 2 Sam. i. 15, iv. 9-12, where sentence is summarily executed,³ and the supposed case of 2 Sam. xiv. 1-21. The denunciation of 2 Sam. xii. 5, 6, is, though not formally judicial, yet in the same spirit. Solomon similarly proceeded in the cases of Joab and Shimei (1 K. ii. 34, 46; cp. 2 K. xiv. 5, 6). It is likely that royalty in Israel was ultimately unfavourable to the local independence connected with the judicature of the "princes" and "elders" in the territory and cities of each tribe. The tendency of the monarchy was doubtless to centralise, and we read of large numbers of king's officers appointed to this and cognate duties (1 Ch. xxiii. 4, xxvi. 29-32). If the general machinery of justice had been, as is reasonable to think, deranged or retarded during a period of anarchy, the Levites afforded the fittest materials for its reconstitution.⁴ Being to some extent detached, both locally, and by special duties, exemptions, &c., from the mass of the population, they were more easily brought to the steady routine which justice requires. and, what is no less important, were, in case of neglect of duty, more at the mercy of the king (as shown in the case of the priests at Nob, 1 Sam. xxii. 17). Hence it is probable that the Levites generally superseded the local elders in the administration of justice. But subsequently, when the Levites withdrew from the kingdom of the ten tribes, judicial elders probably again filled the gap. Thus they conducted the mock trial of Naboth (1 K. xxi. 8-13). There is in 2 Ch. xix. 5, &c., a special notice of a reappointment of judges by Jehoshaphat and of a distinct court, of appeal perhaps, at Jerusalem, composed of Levitical and of lay elements. In the same place (as also in a previous one, 1 Ch. xxvi. 32) occurs a mention of "the king's matters" as a branch of jurisprudence. The rights of the prerogative having a constant tendency to encroach, and needing continual regulation, these may have grown probably into a department, somewhat like our Exchequer.

² The cases of Amnon and Absalom, in which no notice was taken of either crime, though set down by Michaelis (Lives of Moses, bk. i. art. x.) as instances of justice forborne through politic consideration of the criminal's power, seem rather to be examples of mere weakness, either of government or of personal character, in David. His own criminality with Bathsheba it is superfluous to argue, since the matter was by Divine interference removed from the cognizance of human law.

One more change is noticeable in the pre-Babylonian period. The "princes" constantly appear as a powerful political body, increasing in influence and privileges, and having a fixed centre of action at Jerusalem; till, in the reign of Zedekiah, they seem to exercise some of the duties of a privy council; and especially a collective jurisdiction (2 Ch. xxviii. 21; Jer. xxvi. 10, 16). These "princes" are probably the heads of great houses^k in Judah and Benjamin, whose fathers had once been the pillars of local jurisdiction; but who, through the attractions of a court, and probably also under the constant alarm of hostile invasion, became gradually residents in the capital, and formed an oligarchy, which drew to itself, amidst the growing weakness of the latter monarchy, whatever vigour was left in the state, and encroached on the sovereign attribute of justice. The employment in offices of trust and emolument would tend also in the same way, and such chief families would probably monopolise such employment. Hence the constant burden of the prophetic strain, denouncing the neglect, the perversion, the corruption, of judicial functionaries (Is. i. 17, 21, v. 7, x. 2, xxviii. 7, lvi. 1, lix. 4; Jer. ii. 8, v. 1, vii. 5, xxi. 12; Ezek. xxii. 27, xlv. 8, 9; Hos. v. 10, vii. 5, 7; Amos v. 7, 15, 24, vi. 12; Hab. i. 4, &c.). Still, although far changed from its broad and simple basis in the earlier period, the administration of justice had little resembling the set and rigid system of the Sanhedrin of later times.¹ [See SANHE-

DRIM.] This last change arose from the fact that the patriarchal seniority, degenerate and corrupted as it became before the Captivity, was by that event broken up, and a new basis of judicature had to be sought for.

With regard to the forms of procedure little more is known than may be gathered from the two examples, Ruth iv. 2, of a civil, and 1 K. xxi. 8-14, of a criminal character; to which, as a specimen of royal summary jurisdiction, may be added the well-known "judgment" of Solomon. Boaz apparently empanels as it were the first ten "elders" whom he meets "in the gate," the well-known site of the Oriental court, and cites the other party by "Ho, such an one;" and the people appear to be invoked as attesting the legality of the proceeding. The whole affair bears an extemporaneous aspect, which may, however, be merely the result of the terseness of the narrative. In Job ix. 19, we have a wish expressed that a "time to plead" might be "set" (cp. the phrase of Roman law, diem dicere). In the case of the involuntary homicide seeking the city of refuge, he was to make out his case to the satisfaction of its elders (Josh. xx. 4); and this failing, or the congregation deciding against his claim to sanctuary there (though how its sense was to be taken does not appear), he was not put to death by act of public justice, but left to the "avenger of blood" (Deut. xix. 12). The expressions between "blood and blood," between "plea and plea" (Deut. xvii. 8), indicate a presumption of legal intricacy arising, the latter expression seeming to imply something like what we call a "cross-suit." We may infer from the scantiness, or rather almost entire absence of direction as regards forms of procedure, that the legislator was content to leave them to be provided for as the necessity for them arose, it being impossible by any jurisprudential devices to anticipate chicanery. It is an interesting question how far judges were allowed to receive fees of suitors; Michaelis reasonably presumes that none were allowed or customary, and it seems, from the words of 1 Sam. xiii. 3, that such transactions would have been regarded as corrupt. There is another question how far advocates were usual. There is no reason to think that until the period of Greek influence, when we meet with words based on συνήγορος and παράκλητος, any professed class of pleaders existed. Yet passages abound in which the pleading of the cause of those who are unable to plead their own, is spoken of as, what it indeed was, a noble act of charity; and the expression has even (which shows the popularity of the practice) become a basis of figurative allusion (Job xvi. 21; Prov. xxii. 23, xxiii. 11, xxxi. 9; Is. i. 17; Jer. xxx. 13, l. 34, li. 36). The blessedness of such acts is forcibly dwelt upon in Job xxix. 12, 13.

There is no mention of any distinctive dress or badge as pertaining to the judicial officer. A staff or sceptre was the common badge of a and their office was to assist Moses in the duty of governing. But no influence of any such body is traceable in later times on any crisis of history. They seem in fact to have left no successors.

^m The example of Susannah and the elders is too suspicious an authority to be cited.

provision meant to favour their usefulness in deciding on points of law, since the maturity of a judge has hardly begun at that age, and before it they would have been junior to their lay coadjutors.

^k That some of the heads of such houses, however, retained their proper sphere, seems clear from Jer. xxvi. 17, where "elders of the land" address an "assembly of the people." Still, the occasion is not judicial.

ruler or prince, and this perhaps they bore (Is. xiv. 5; Amos i. 5, 8). They would perhaps, when officiating, be more than usually careful to comply with the regulations about dress laid down in Num. xv. 38, 39; Deut. xxii. 12. The use of the "white asses" (Judg. v. 10), by those who "sit in judgment," was perhaps a convenient distinctive mark for them when journeying where they would not usually be personally known. [H. JUDGES, BOOK OF (ΔΙΚΑΙΩΤΩΝ; Κριταί; Ἡ τῶν κριμάτων βίβλος, Philo, de Conf. Ling. 26, ed. Mang. i. 424; Liber Judicum).

I. CONTENTS.—The part of the history of Israel contained in this Book is of the highest importance. Following on the conquest of Canaan and the settlement of the tribes under Joshua, it describes a transition period, in which disorders, calamities, and want of union led to a growing desire for a new form of government promising greater unity and strength, which ended in the institution of the monarchy. And, apart from the lessons which it is intended to teach, the narrative possesses a deep interest. Owing to the character of the times, our attention is drawn to the part played by individual rulers, of whom the greater number are presented to us with a distinctness, vigour, and freshness not surpassed elsewhere in Scripture.

The Book derives its name from the Judges whose history forms the greater part of it. These were temporary leaders, neither inheriting their office nor transmitting it. In some cases—e.g. Jair, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon—they seem to have only exercised the peaceful office which their name implies. At least no delivrance of the people is attributed to them. And in this they were like Deborah, the prophetess, in the earlier part of her history (iv. 4), and Eli, and Samuel's sons (1 Sam. viii. 1). But the more prominent were leaders in war, retaining in the time of peace the authority they had earned. For this reason they are called Saviours (Neh. ix. 27: cp. Judg. ii. 9), who delivered, or rather saved, the children of Israel (ii. 16, 18; iii. 31; x. 1). This combination of offices had been seen in Moses and Joshua (cp. 2 K. xv. 5). The root of their Hebrew name, Shophet, is found in Assyrian [MV.¹¹] and Phœnician. The title of Suffetes, which the Carthaginians gave to their chief magistrates, is well known from the Latin writers (Festus—"Sufes quod velut consulare imperium apud eos est;" cp. Liv. xxviii. 37), and is often found in inscriptions. But there is no reason for thinking that the name any more than the thing was borrowed on either side. The history of six of these Judges is given at more or less length, viz. Othniel, Ehud, Deborah (with Barak), Gideon, Jephthah, and Samson. Six others—Shamgar, Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon—are noticed very briefly. It has been thought that this number has been purposely adopted. But the fact of their being twelve is not brought forward prominently, as we might expect, if an arbitrary number had been chosen for reasons of symmetry. Eli and Samuel judged Israel (1 Sam. iv. 18; vii. 6, 15, 17: cp. viii. 1-2), but their connexion with each other, and Samuel's relation to the kingdom of Israel, are enough to explain their not being included in this Book. Again Jael (v. 6) is often supposed to be distinct from the wife of Heber, and to have been a judge otherwise unknown to us, as well as Bedan (1 Sam. xii. 11). But it is at least possible that the two Jael's are the same person, and Bedan has been variously identified with Samson, Barak, and Abdon. If these or others have been omitted from this Book, the reason would seem to be a want of records relating to them.

The chief divisions are clearly marked: A, i.-iii. 6; B, iii. 7-xvi. [cf. A = i. 1-ii. 5; B = ii. 6-xvi.]; C, xvii.-xxi. This is true also of the minor ones.

A, i.-iii. 6. This is an introduction consisting of two parts, i.-ii. 5 and ii. 6-iii. 6. The first of these contains an account of the sequel of the conquest of Canaan in continuation of the Book of Joshua, the cases in which the people of the land retained their possessions, and the rebuke which Israel received from an Angel (or messenger) of the Lord who went up from Gilgal to Bochim. After the death of Joshua, in answer to the inquiry of the Israelites, Judah is directed by the Lord to go up first against the Canaanites. His victories, with the help of Simeon, including the special exploits of Caleb, are related in i. 3-20. But his failure in expelling the inhabitants of the valley (v. 19) is followed by the similar case of Benjamin in reference to the Jebusites of Jerusalem (v. 21). One conquest of the house of Joseph is then described, that of Bethel (v. 22-26), which is followed by the omissions of Manasseh, Ephraim, Zebulun, Asher, Naphtali, and Dan (v. 27-36). Thus Issachar alone is not mentioned in this group. Levi also is not named anywhere. The rebuke of the Angel and weeping of the people are found in ii. 1-5. In this part there is a close indirect connexion with the Book of Joshua, the statements of which are presupposed throughout.

There are some difficulties in this account. There is a repetition, with a difference, in i. 10, 20; and there are statements in which some inconsistency lies on the surface (cp. i. 8, 21; i. 18, 19, iii. 3). The explanation of it lies in the brevity of the narrative. And while all the events are placed after the death of Joshua (i. 1), some occur in earlier Books (cp. i. 17 with Num. xxi. 3, Josh. xii. 14, xix. 4; i. 20, 10-15 with Josh. xv. 13-19; i. 27-28 with Josh. xvii. 11-13; i. 29 with Josh. xvi. 10).

The second part of the Introduction (ii. 6-iii. 6) begins by going back as far as the last days of Joshua (ii. 6-10), being almost entirely a verbatim repetition of Josh. xxiv. 28-31. It forms a direct connexion of Judges with Joshua. But here, too, we must distinguish two parts (ii. 11-19 and 20-iii. 6). In the former of these we are told that Israel continued to serve the Lord all the days of Joshua and the elders which outlived him, but that the new generation forsook the Lord and followed other gods; that His anger was hot against them, and He delivered them into the hand of spoilers; nevertheless He raised up Judges which delivered them, for it repented Him because of their groanings; but when the Judge was dead, they corrupted themselves more than their fathers. Here we have a general view of the following history and the key to it. And this stands in close connexion with the so-called "framework," which unites the greater part of the separate histories of the Judges, and runs through the whole of that part of the Book which is devoted to them. Not only does the same mode of regarding the history occur in it, but the same language.

The rest of this section (ii. 20—iii. 6) dwells upon the effect of the presence of the remnant of the seven nations and the Philistines; repeats the determination of the Lord not to drive them out, already found in ii. 1-6; and adds other reasons—the purpose of proving Israel (ii. 22—iii. 1, 4), and of teaching them war (iii. 2). Thus the Introduction is double, the first part being chiefly historical, and the second didactic, but each in its own way making a fitting preparation for what follows.

B, iii. 7—xvi. contains the histories of the several Judges. The more important of these have the same form. They contain an account of the idolatry of Israel, its punishment by means of a foreign oppressor for a certain number of years, the deliverance by a Judge, and the length of time during which the land had rest. This is not the case with those of whom there is only a short notice. Besides the length of the time during which they exercised their office, little is recorded beyond what was of personal interest, including the place of their burial. Shamgar stands by himself for the scantiness of information.

The subdivisions are—(1) The oppression of Israel by Cushan Rishathaim, and the deliverance by Othniel, of the tribe of Judah (iii. 7—11). (2) The oppression by Eglon, king of Moab, and the deliverance by Ehud (Benjamin), iii. 12—30. (3) Shamgar's deliverance from the Philistines (iii. 31); his tribe is not stated. (4) The oppression by Jabin, king of Canaan, and the deliverance by Deborah (Ephraim?) and Barak (Naphthali), iv.; Deborah's Song, v. (5) The oppression by Midian and deliverance by Gideon (Manasseh), vi.—viii.; the history of Abimelech, ix. (6) Tola (Issachar), x. 1, 2. (7) Jair the Gileadite (Manasseh), x. 3—5. (8) The oppression by Ammon, and the deliverance by Jephthah the Gileadite (Manasseh), x. 6—xii. 7. (9) Ibzan (Zebulun, cp. Josh. xix. 15, or Judah), xii. 8—10. (10) Elon (Zebulun), xii. 11, 12. (11) Abdon (Ephraim), xii. 13—15. (12) The oppression by the Philistines, and the history of Samson (Dan), xiii.—xvi.

C, xvii.—xxi. This part is commonly called an Appendix. The time to which it belongs is marked as that of the Judges, though they are not mentioned in it, by being described as "the days when there was no king in Israel" (xvii. 6; xviii. 1; xix. 1; xxi. 25). It consists of two histories. The first of these (xvii.—xviii.) narrates the conquest of Laish by a part of the tribe of Dan, and the transference thither of the idolatrous worship of Jehovah, instituted in Mount Ephraim by Micah, under the charge of Jonathan, the grandson of Moses. The name of Manasseh, the same as that of the idolatrous king of Judah, has been introduced into the text to save the honour of Moses. But the memory of the substitution is preserved in many MSS. and editions by writing the letter which makes the change above the level of the rest—nun suspensum.

The second (xix.—xxi.) describes the almost total destruction of the tribe of Benjamin by the united people of Israel, in consequence of their supporting the cause of the wicked men of Gibeah, and the means adopted for preventing its completion. Both narratives belong to the early part of the period. The mention of the grandson of Moses in one case, and of Phinehas, Aaron's grandson, in the other, mark the date in some degree; as well as the unanimity still existing in the people, which was shown in the punishment of Gibeah. Josephus therefore gives the events a place at the beginning of his account of the Judges.

II. AUTHORSHIP.—The authorship of the Book is ascribed in the Talmud to Samuel ("Scriptit librum suum et Judices et Rutham," Baba Bathra, xiv. 2); but of this there is no proof. We can say for certain that the whole Book, as it stands, is later than the setting up of the kingdom (cp. xvii. 6, &c.); but we cannot go safely beyond this. Keil and Casel fix the time of its composition to the reign of Saul. Bleek ascribes it to the Jehovist in the reign of David, except ii. 6—23, which he thinks much later. Stade and Budde find more or less ample traces of J and E in the central portion of the Book; Kuenen and Kittel dissent. Ewald conceives that it forms the first part of an historical work reaching to the end of 2 Kings, and that the final arrangement of the whole must have been after the 37th year of Jehoiachin's captivity, or B.C. 562 (see 2 K. xxv. 27). This view is founded on the similarity of the way in which the history is regarded (cp. Judg. ii. 11—19 with 2 K. xvii. 7—23); but this is not conclusive. Bertheau brings it as late as Ezra, whom he is inclined to regard as the author; but this is not confirmed by any reference in it to the Babylonian Captivity, or any later event.

The inquiry as to the age of the separate parts is a distinct one. It undoubtedly contains some contemporary monuments, such as the Song of Deborah and Jotham's parable. But there are also many parts having so distinct a character in their language, containing many words not found elsewhere, and so peculiar in style, that there can be little doubt about their having been incorporated as they came to the author's hand. This point requires more particular notice. In the Introduction, ch. i. seems to be a document older than David. Verse 21 witnesses to the same state of things as xviii. 28, with which compare 2 Sam. v. 6—9. Nor is there any reason for referring i. 28, 30, 33, 35 to a time so late as Solomon's (cp. 1 K. ix. 21). The question arises, how are we to explain i. 20, 10—15, 21, 27—28, 29, which are found with some differences in Josh. xv. 13—19, 63, xvii. 11—12, xvi. 10? Some change the name of Joshua (i. 1) to that of Moses. But this makes ch. i. a history of the conquest of Canaan without any mention of Joshua. It seems more likely that the passages in Joshua are anticipatory, and borrowed at some time from Judges, or from a common source. That Judges has not taken them from Joshua seems to be shown by the fact that the list of the tribes which did not drive out the people of the land is more complete in the former than in the latter. The case is different with ii. 6—10 and Josh. xxiv.

28-31. The new history begins with a repetition of the ending of the old. The relation of Ezra i. 1-3 to 2 Ch. xxxvi. 22, 23 is analogous.

In the main portion of the Book (iii. 7-xvi.) the account of Ehud clearly comes from near the time of the events, both on account of the whole look of the narrative and the obscure words found in iii. 22, 23. The Song of Deborah is undoubtedly contemporary with the victory it celebrates. But ch. iv. is no mere echo of ch. v., and must have been associated with it in early times. While it passes over much which is found in the Song, it tells us of the relations between Sisera and Jabin, and Deborah and Barak, and explains how Sisera came to flee to Jael's tent. The history of Gideon again stands out distinctly as derived from early sources; and it reads as one whole, throughout which runs the modesty and distrust of self which was combined with his other high qualities, though it has been attempted to trace the union of the original narrative with another containing the miraculous elements. The reality of the main facts is guaranteed by Is. ix. 4, x. 26. The account of Abimelech in ch. ix. is an original and early document, marked by the uniform use of the name Jerubbaal instead of Gideon. In the same way the preservation of the facts of Jephthah's history cannot be doubted. But the genuineness of his negotiations with the Ammonites is questioned on grounds of probability and on account of the similarity of the passage to Num. xxi. Yet to mention nothing else, xi. 24, which seems at least to imply an acknowledgment of the existence of Chemosh, has not the look of an invention by a late writer. And of those who maintain the legendary exaggeration of the facts of Samson's life, some at least are unwilling to fix upon too late a time for the adoption of the present form. As to the brief histories of the Judges, we cannot be sure whether the author has abridged fuller accounts of them or not.

The suggestion of late origin attaches, then, chiefly to the second part of the Introduction, and to the kindred passages which connect the longer histories. One argument is that the writer speaks throughout as if Israel as a whole was oppressed and delivered, while the narratives show that only part of the people was affected. The writer was, of course, conscious of this, and designedly treated the unity of Israel as existing de jure. But that feeling, which was never totally absent during the disintegration of the nation, reappeared with strength as early as Samuel's time, and led to the establishment of the kingdom. It is said again that the language in these parts is Deuteronomic, and that the peculiar mode of regarding history, in which the fortunes of the nation depended on the purity of its service of God, did not arise till the 8th century. But, without entering on that subject, may we not say, that the conception of the Divine nature which Israel had at every time, and without which its history is unintelligible, contained in it a belief in His jealousy as well as His holiness, His power to punish and His willingness to forgive? The bond which unites the narratives may be of a later date than their own; but how much later cannot be fixed with certainty.

(xvii.-xxi.) have no direct connexion with each other, but they are united by the common reference to the times in which there was no king, they are wanting in any mention of the Judges, they both relate to the fortunes of a Levite in connexion with a tribe of Israel. Their style is unusually diffuse and minute. This, however, does not exclude an energetic brevity in places: see xix. 30, xx. 9, xxi. 17, and compare the asyndeton in xviii. 17 and xx. 43. The reality of the events recorded in chs. xix.-xxi. is confirmed by Hos. ix. 9, x. 9. But there is much repetition, and the account goes backwards and forwards, more after the manner of oral than of written narrative. It is suggested that this may be accounted for by the fusion of two separate descriptions of the same events, chiefly distinguished by the use of the terms "children of Israel" and "men of Israel" respectively. This is elaborately stated by Bertheau, and is not improbable. And the poetical expressions which occur, as well as rare words and forms, countenance the notion that one of these documents was a poem: see xix. 8, 9, 12; xx. 4, 6, 12, 34, 41, 38, 40, 43; xxi. 22, 24. This bears in some measure on the date, for a doubling of the tradition, it is urged, points to a high antiquity of the kernel. And there are reasons for connecting the Appendix with ch. i.: compare the prominence of Judah (i. 2, xviii. 20), and the use of peculiar expressions in i. 2, xviii. 10, 20, xx. 28; i. 27, 35, xvii. 11, xix. 6. Still the topographical notices in xx. 31, xxi. 19 (not necessarily xxi. 12), seem added comparatively late. And this perhaps is the best solution of the great difficulty connected with xviii. 30. The most natural explanation of "the captivity of the land" refers it to the time of the Assyrians (2 K. xv. 29, or xvii. 6). It is hard to suppose that the going into captivity of the land was involved in that of the Ark (1 Sam. iv. 11). And if at that time the Philistines overran the country and destroyed Shiloh, as is inferred from Ps. lxxviii. 60-64, still the people were not carried away. On the other hand, the difficulty of thinking that idolatry could have existed openly at Dan during the reign of the first three kings is very great. To read "ark" for "land," according to Houbigant's conjecture, requires the change of only two letters in the Hebrew, but it is unsupported. May it not be that the words were added at some time after the captivity of the ten tribes by some one who connected in spirit the later idolatry at Dan with the earlier?

These later chapters, by being placed together at the end, leave uninterrupted the central part of the Book, which is mainly taken up with the deliverance of Israel from foreign enemies. Theodoret rightly says (Quaest. in Judic. xxvii.) that this putting of the first events last was not accidental.

We may speak in this connexion of the Song of Deborah. The spirit which breathes throughout it fixes its date. It marks, too, its authorship not only by vv. 3, 7, 9, 13, 21 (to which v. 12 is no objection), but by vv. 24-30, which show the thought and feeling of a woman. The best division of it, following the guidance of the sense, seems the following:—1. Prelude, vv. 2-3. God's glorious help in former times, vv. 4-5. The misery of the recent days, vv. 6-7.

The change, vv. 8–11. II. Second Prelude, v. 12. The gathering of the Tribes, vv. 13–15c. The defaulters, vv. 15d–18. The battle and flight, vv. 19–22. III. The curse on Meroz, v. 23. The blessing on Jael, v. 24. Her deed, vv. 25–27. The triumph over the mother and wives of Sisera, vv. 28–30. Conclusion, v. 31. Another more artificial division is adopted by Ewald and Bertheau, consisting of a regular number of strophes and subdivisions; but this symmetry is gained with some sacrifice of the connexion of the thought. Cassel traces a highly developed and delicate alliteration. Böttcher distributes the several parts among a number of dramatis personae, and choruses of men and women. But even the simplest arrangement gives the impression of a cultivated state of poetry. The language confirms its antiquity. It contains a large number of words and senses not found elsewhere, besides several rare words and forms. Hence its meaning is difficult. The result of the modern study of it may be seen in the rendering of the Revised Version. But some uncertainty still remains. The embarrassment of the ancient Versions is evident. The Vulgate makes important omissions in vv. 2, 29, 30. The Targum of Jonathan, usually a faithful representation of the Hebrew, here forsakes the humbler task of translation, and seems impelled by enthusiasm into exaggeration and magnifying of the Law, curiously exhibiting the thought of a very different age. The following passages are samples: “Quando voluerunt filii Israel ad serviendum erroribus novis, qui de proximo facti sunt, quibus non studuerunt in illis patres eorum, venerunt super eos gentes, et expulerunt ex urbibus eorum; et cum redierunt ad faciendum legem, non praevaluerunt eis: donec fortificarentur et ascenderet contra eos Zizzara osor et tribulator in quadraginta millibus principum castrorum, in quinquaginta millibus tenentium gladios, in sexaginta millibus tenentium hastas, in septuaginta millibus tenentium clypeos, in octoginta millibus sagittarum jaculorum, praeter nongentos currus ferri qui fuerunt cum eo . . . Dixit Deborah in prophetia, Ego missa sum ad laudandos scribas Israel; qui quando fuit tribulatio illa, non cessarunt ab interpretanda lege . . . Benediceris a benedictione mulierum bonarum Jaghel uxor Hheber Salmæi: sicut una ex mulieribus quae ministrantes in domibus Scholarum benediceris. Aquas petivit ab ea Zizzara impius, lacte potavit eum, ad sciendum si cogitationes super eum, in phialis virorum attulit ante eum pinguedinem caseorum. Bona Jaghel uxor Hheber Salmæi, quae praestitit quod scriptum est in libro legis Moysi; Non erit armatura viri super mulierem, neque ornabitur vir ornamentis mulieris: sed manum suam ad clavum tetendit, et dexteram suam ad malleum.”

The historical testimony of the Song is very valuable. It witnesses to the display of God’s power at Sinai, and looks back to that time as a glorious one. The unity of Israel is strongly felt in spite of those who to their shame have forsaken the common cause; and the wars of Israel are those of the Lord. Dan appears as still in contact with the sea. There is no mention of the northern settlement of the tribe, which may not yet have taken place. The absence of any mention of Judah, Simeon, and Levi, shows the extent to which the separation of the tribes had gone.

III. CHRONOLOGY.—The chronology is a matter of disappointment. We find a number of dates given with particularity, which reckoned together amount to 410 years. With this the 450 years assigned to the period of the Judges in Acts xiii. 20 agrees only if the 40 years of Eli be added to the numbers in Judges. This passage, however, does not come into consideration, if the reading of the Textus Receptus is given up, as is now commonly done. But a difficulty is created by xi. 26, which speaks of the time from the conquests of Israel on the east of Jordan to the days of Jephthah as 300 years; and still more by 1 K. vi. 1, where the whole period from the Exodus to the building of the Temple in the fourth year of Solomon is reckoned as 480 years. Josephus holds to the 410 years in Judges, and arrives at the 592 years (Ant. viii. 3, 1; x. 8, 5), or 612 years (Ant. xx. 10), which he allows between the Exodus and the building of the Temple, in a general sense only; viz., by allowing 40 years for the sojourn in the wilderness, 25 for Joshua (Ant. v. 1, 29), 410 for the Judges, 40 for Eli, 12 for Samuel (Ant. vi. 13, 5), 40 for Saul (Ant. vi. 14, 9; cp. Acts xiii. 21), 40½ for David=607½ years. On the other hand, the genuineness of 1 K. vi. 1 is called in question by Kennicott (Diss. Gen. 80, 3) and others, but it is commonly accepted. In this case the sum of the numbers in Judges must be lessened. This introduces at once an element of uncertainty. And several of the minor periods up to the building of the Temple—such as the length of the time of Joshua, the interval between him and Cushan, the time of Samuel and Saul—are not fixed in the Old Testament, the ordinary computation being grounded on Josephus. Hence the different combinations are conjectural, which accounts for their number and variety. The length, however, commonly assigned to the time of the Judges varies from about 250 to 300 years. But the calculations of the Bishop of Bath and Wells (cp. ‘Intro. to the Book of Judges,’ § 4, in Speaker’s Comm.), based on several genealogies found in Scripture, diminish it to a duration of from 140 to 160 years. In all this uncertainty little help seems obtainable from a source from which it has been sought,—the inquiries into Egyptian and Assyrian chronology.

IV. CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE TIMES.—It does not belong to the present article to enlarge on the history of the Judges, nor on their separate lives and characters. But a few remarks upon points which readily suggest themselves may not be out of place. The whole period was one of degeneracy. The nation, united in the time of Moes and Joshua by a common faith and purpose, when the latter had been accomplished to some extent in the incomplete conquest of Canaan, fell asunder into disunion and the pursuit of separate interests. No constitution had been provided by Moes. The only bond which united them on the loss of their great leaders was that of religion. Under this influence all Israel acted together “as one man” in the early part of the period (chs. xix.–xxi.). But this is the only instance. Some of the tribes combined under the oppression of foreign enemies, but never the whole number. Both the Law and the worship of the sanctuary pass out of sight. Other recognised centres of worship appear, or are set up on private authority, as by Micah in an idolatrous form, and by Gideon. There is a free use of sacrifice when the occasion seems to require it. But there is a complete silence throughout iii. 6—xvi. about the Tabernacle, the priests, and the tribe of Levi. The authorised centre had fallen into neglect and powerlessness, no doubt in part by its own fault. But the worship of the Tabernacle continued, and at the latter part of the period reappeared in something of its old importance in the days of Eli and Samuel. To what this revival was due, and what part Eli had taken in it, we are not told; but he and Samuel prepared the way for the restoration and reforms of David's time.

The effacement of Judah and its comrade Simeon is a similar fact. In i. 2 and xx. 18 a certain prominence belongs to Judah. But there is no trace of this later. It supplied indeed the first judge, and possibly one more, xii. 8; but it is not named in the Song of Deborah nor elsewhere, except the passing mention x. 9, and the discreditable incident xv. 9–13. Perhaps the jealousy of Ephraim shut it off northwards, for it is characteristic of the time that that powerful tribe was not so ready for action on behalf of the others, as provoked by their courage which was its own reproach (viii. 1–3; xii. 1–6). But the time came when the tribes felt the danger of disunion. Here, too, the particular steps in the national revival are not strongly marked. But Israel is one again in the days of Samuel in the face of the Philistine oppression, and longs for a continuance of the union by having a king. This time the desire is granted. Two earlier attempts had failed: the first, through Gideon's loyalty to the tradition that the Lord was Israel's only king; the second, by the speedy disappointment of his son Abimelech's ambition. We must remember also that we have in this Book a history of wars and of a time of turbulence and calamity. The more peaceful periods are only indicated. But the Book of Ruth allows us a glance into daily life and domestic piety. It has a place now in the Hagiographa. But it is maintained that this is not its original position, and that it once formed part of the Book of Judges, or stood next to it, as it does in the LXX. and in our Bible. But this is not certain. Still in any case this is its natural place, as a third part of the Appendix to the Book of Judges.

In reference to the Judges themselves, we are struck by the contrast between what we expect of men "raised up" by God (ii. 18; iii. 9) and on whom "the Spirit of the Lord came" (iii. 10; vi. 34; xi. 29; xiii. 25; xiv. 6, 19), and parts of their conduct and moral judgment. Thus Ehud's assassination of Eglon, Deborah's approval of Jael's treachery, Gideon's sanctuary at Ophrah, the terrible nature of Jephthah's vow, as well as his early mode of life and his ambition, all detract from an ideal conception. This is seen most of all in Samson. He is unlike the other Judges in respect of his office. There is no trace of his administering justice, nor did he lead his countrymen in battle, in which Shamgar may have resembled him. He maintained single-handed the resistance to the Philistines. But there were other elements in his character in addition to his sense of the work assigned him before his birth and of which his Nazariteship was the symbol. He showed cunning as well as a light-heartedness that delighted in frolic and danger. There was a humour in his actions and in his speech, which at times contains a play upon words and rhyme (xiv. 14, 18; xv. 16). And all the occasions of his conflict with the Philistines arose originally out of his love for three women. But with all this a vein of irony runs throughout his history, making us feel that he is a victim of his own sport, which ends tragically in his blindness and death. Yet, such as he was, the space assigned him in the records must agree with the impression which he made on his own generation. He fulfilled his work, which was to "begin" the deliverance of Israel (xiii. 5), by keeping before men's minds that there was one Israelite unsubdued, and who employed all his resources in the service of that hostility to the enemies of God's people to which he was dedicated. A call to do God's work and the gift of His help in doing it do not imply now, any more than then, full enlightenment and perfection. He chooses His instruments out of each age, but they are men of that age, and show its characteristics.

V. MODERN CRITICISM.—We may now briefly notice the way in which some recent criticism affects this Book. It is in part connected with general views on the history of Israel and its faith, which this is not the place to discuss. They minimize the work of Moses, with whom it is assumed that trustworthy history begins, and regard almost the whole of the legislation found in the Pentateuch as having a later date than the Babylonian exile. The early history of Israel is looked on as that of the slow amalgamation into one nation of tribes more or less akin, the time of the Judges being mainly the formative period. Even the recognition of the absolute unity of God, and of Jehovah as God of all the earth as well as of Israel, is attributed to the work of the prophets of the 8th century. Taking Wellhausen as the chief exponent of these views, we will notice points in the history of the Judges which he presents under an unusual aspect. Ch. i. contains an account of the conquest of Canaan more correct than that which is found in the Book of Joshua. The first of the tribes to cross the Jordan were Judah, Simeon, and Levi. Their attack on the Canaanites was so unsuccessful that the two latter tribes were almost annihilated and disappear from history. Judah itself was so crippled that it did not recover during the period of the Judges, and was forced largely to incorporate the tribes of the wilderness, the Kenite and Kenezite. The fate of Simeon and Levi is the basis of Gen. xxxiv., xlix. 5–7. The next and happier attempt was made by Ephraim and the other tribes under the leading of Joshua, though the only particular event of their conquest recorded is the capture of Bethel (i. 22–25). It is obvious that this chapter supplies no ground for all this hypothesis. There is no mention in it of Levi. Success, not failure, is attributed to Judah and Simeon. The omission of any other conquest than that of Bethel is fatal. And why is Joshua not named? In ch. iii. the whole-history of Othniel is considered to be unhistorical. Ch. v. is genuine, and v. 8 supplies a correction of the high numbers assigned to the people of Israel in the Pentateuch; but Deborah is not the author,—the speaker throughout is the people of Israel: in v. 7 we should translate thus, “Until that Deborah arose.” Ch. iv. is not based on original sources, but is derived from ch. v. The account of Jabin, who does not appear in the Song, has arisen from confounding this effort of the Canaanite kings under Sisera with Josh. xi. 1-15; to bring this into union with the Song, Sisera is represented as captain of Jabin’s host. The circumstances too of Sisera’s death are misrepresented from not understanding v. 25-27. Sisera was standing and drinking when Jael struck him. She used only one hand and one weapon: the look of a second arises from the poetical parallelism. There are two separate sources of the history of Gideon. The first assigns him a Divine call and has a supernatural colouring (vi. 1-viii. 3); in the second (viii. 4-21) his real motive appears in the duty of becoming an avenger of blood. What is said of Jair is another form of Num. xxiii. 41-2. Jephthah’s history may be depended on, with the exception of xi. 12-28. Samson’s exploits are indeed unconnected with any solar myth, but the basis of fact is hard to distinguish. There are strong marks of reality in ch. xvii.-xviii. The absence of any provision for the Levites such as we find in the Pentateuch is seen in the poverty of the grandson of Moses. Chs. xix.-xxi. are a late fiction, ascribing a unity of feeling and action to the tribes which could not have existed at the time. Hosea ix. 9, x. 9 does not refer to these events, but to the appointment of Saul as king. The way in which these criticisms are supported is often acute, but also wilful and confident.

VI. TEXT, &c.—Some miscellaneous observations follow here. The most important of the readings of the Qeri or of MSS., as well as of the ancient Versions, are noticed in the margin of the Revised Version. We may remark further that some word must have dropped out of the text at the beginning of xvi. 2, though it is not necessary to supply anything with the Qeri in xx. 13. The soundness too of the text may be doubted in xx. 38; xxi. 22. The reading of the LXX. in x. 12 of Midian for Maon is easy, and supplies a name which we look for. But the Syriac reads Ammon, and the Vulgate Chanaan, which makes it likely that the reading of the text, which is found again in 2 Ch. xxvi. 7, is original. Of conjectural emendations without ancient support we may cite the proposal to read Moses for Joshua, already mentioned, in i. 1; Gilboa for Gilead, vii. 3; “in Arumah” for “in Tormah” (or “privily”), ix. 31. Ewald’s conjecture of Shegal, “queen” or “consort,” for Shalal, “spoil,” in v. 31 has met with great favour; and in v. 26, by reading Tshluchennah (“she put it forth,” i.e. her hand), a grammatical difficulty is removed.

Instances of playing on words as affecting the choice or form of them are found in x. 4; xvi. 16. The shortening of the relative to Shin praefixum, which is frequent in the later Books, occurs in v. 7, vi. 17, vii. 12, viii. 26, and is allowed to be no objection to the antiquity of the documents in which it is found. It has been thought to be a mark of the language of Northern Palestine. The same view has been taken of the use of the absolute form instead of the construct in Tsedah (vii. 8) and Ophrah (viii. 32). But the only certain trace of provincialism in the Old Testament is the habit of the Ephraimites of pronouncing Shin as Samech, as in the case of Shibboleth (xii. 6).

The part of Josephus parallel with the Book of Judges is Ant. v. 2-8. Among the curiosities of his account is the supplying of the name of Jephthah’s burial-place, Sebea (7, 12), and of Abimelech’s mother, Druma (7, 1). Can the latter have arisen in any way out of Arumah (ix. 41)? So, too, Samson’s mother is named Zeleponi in Jewish tradition from 1 Ch. iv. 2, 3.

The character of the patristic commentaries in general is that of Jerome’s often-quoted words (ad Paulinum, 12), “In Judicium libro quot principes populi, tot figuræ sunt.” Of the more modern German commentaries, Studer’s (2nd ed., Bern, 1842) led the way in the freer mode of treatment. He was followed by Bertheau, Leipzig, 1845, 2nd ed., 1883. Besides Ewald’s History of the People of Israel, the following works are important:—Th. Nöldeke, Die älteste Literatur, Leipzig, 1868, and his Untersuchungen zur Kritik des A. Test., Kiel, 1869; Wellhausen’s edition of Bleek’s Einleitung, Berlin, 1878, and his Prolegomena zur Gesch. Israel, 1883 (English translation, 1885, which includes a reprint of his article on Israel in the Encycl. Brit. xiii.); Reuss, Die Gesch. der heiligen Schriften A. Ts., Braunschweig, 1881; Riehm, HWB. s. n. “Richter”; Budde, Die BB. Richter u. Samuel, 1890; Kittel, Geschichte d. Hebräer, ii. §§ 30, 33-38. Commentaries of a conservative character are those of Keil, 2nd ed., Leipzig, 1872; Cassel, 1865; and Bachmann, as far as the end of ch. v., Berlin, 1868. The first two are translated into English. The more recent English ones are those of Bishop Wordsworth, the Bishop of Bath and Wells (Speaker’s Commentary), Dr. Farrar (Bishop Ellicott’s), and Mr. Lias in the Cambridge Series. See also Driver’s LOT,⁴ ch. ii. § 1. Dean Stanley gives a vivid account of “the mediæval history of the Jewish Church” in his Lectures, xiii.-xvi.

Ewald’s version of ch. v. is found in Dei Dichter des A. B., 2nd ed., 1866, i. p. 178 sqq.; Stanley’s is founded on Ewald’s first edition. See also Böttcher, Die ältesten Bühnendichtungen, der Debora-Gesang und das Hohe Lied, dramatisch hergestellt, Leipzig, 1850. On the character of Jael’s act, see Arnold’s Sermons on the Interpretation of Scripture, and Mozley’s Lectures on the Old Testament, vi.-vii.; who has also some interesting remarks on the way in which Jabin remains in the background and the prominence of Sisera, p. 145 sqq. A list of the literature on this chapter is given by Bertheau and Cassel., but most fully by Bachmann. [E. R. O.]

JUDGMENT-HALL. The word Prætorium (Ἰππαρίσιον) is so translated five times in the A. V. of the N. T.; and in those five passages it denotes two different places.

1. In John xviii. 28, 33, xix. 9, it is the residence which Pilate occupied when he visited Jerusalem; to which the Jews brought Jesus from the house of Caiaphas, and within which He was examined by Pilate, and scourged and mocked by the soldiers, while the Jews were waiting without in the neighbourhood of the judgment-seat (erected on the Pavement in front of the Praetorium), on which Pilate sat when he pronounced the final sentence. The Latin word praetorium originally signified (see Smith's Dict. of Gr. & Rom. Ant.) the general's tent in a Roman camp (Liv. xxviii. 27, &c.); and afterwards it had, among other significations, that of the palace in which a governor of a province lived and administered justice (Cic. Verr. ii. 4, § 28, &c.). The site of Pilate's praetorium in Jerusalem has given rise to much dispute, some supposing it to be the palace of king Herod, others the Tower of Antonia; but it has been shown elsewhere that the former was probably the Praetorium. [JERUSALEM, p. 1655.] Pilate certainly lived there at one time (Philo, Leg. in Caesum, 38, 39); and it is scarcely conceivable that the Roman Governor would have occupied any other palace than that which, with its three great towers, formed the citadel of the Upper City (Jos. B. J. ii. 3, § 2; v. 5, § 8). Herod, who, at the time of the trial of Christ, was at Jerusalem (Luke xxiii. 7), no doubt lived in the old palace of the Amoneans, which stood above the Xystus, on the E. side of the Upper City. [JERUSALEM, p. 1647.] It appears from a passage of Josephus (B. J. ii. 14, § 8) that Gessius Florus not only resided in the palace, but set up his judgment-seat in front of it. Winer conjectures, with great probability, that the procurator, when in Jerusalem, resided with a body-guard in the palace of Herod (Jos. B. J. ii. 15, § 5), while the Roman garrison occupied Antonia. Just in like manner, a former palace of Hiero became the praetorium, in which Verres lived in Syracuse (Cic. Verr. ii. 5, § 12).

2. In Acts xxiii. 35 Herod's judgment-hall or praetorium in Caesarea was doubtless a part of that magnificent range of buildings, the erection of which by king Herod is described in Josephus (Ant. xv. 9, § 6; see also B. J. i. 21, §§ 5-8).

3. The word "palace," or "Caesar's court," in the A. V. of Philip. i. 13, is a translation of the same word praetorium. The statement in a later part of the same Epistle (iv. 22) would seem to connect this praetorium with the imperial palace at Rome; but no classical authority is found for so designating the palace itself. The praetorian camp, outside the northern wall of Rome, was far from the palace, and therefore unlikely to be the praetorium here mentioned. The opinion advocated by Wieseler, by Conybeare and Howson (Life of St. Paul, ch. 26), and by Bp. Lightfoot (Comm. on Philip. in loco) is adopted by the R. V. text, and is to the effect that the praetorium here mentioned has a personal sense and was intended to describe that detachment of the Praetorian Guards which was in immediate attendance upon the emperor, and had barracks in Mount Palatine. It will be remembered that St. Paul, on his arrival at Rome (Acts xxviii. 16), was delivered by the centurion into the custody of the praetorian prefect.

4. The word praetorium occurs also in Matt. xxvii. 27, where it is translated "common hall" or "Governor's House" (marg.; R. V. "palace"), and in Mark xv. 16. In both places it denotes Pilate's residence in Jerusalem.

5. Christian tradition, without exception, places the Praetorium east of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The Bordeaux Pilgrim, proceeding from (modern) Sion to the Gate of Neapolis (Damascus Gate), had Calvary on his left hand, and, on his right, "below in the valley" the ruins of the "house or praetorium of Pontius Pilate." Cyril (Cat. xiii. 39) speaks of it as "a desert place." Antoninus and Theodosius identify it with a Church of S. Sophia, apparently on the site now occupied by the Dome of the Rock. At a later period it was placed at the Gate of Neapolis (Itin. i. § 2). According to current tradition, it was at the N.W. corner of the Haram esh-Sherif, where the Turkish barracks stand. [W. T. B.] [W.]

JUDGMENT-SEAT, the translation in various places of βήμα (e.g. Matt. xxvii. 19; John xix. 13; Acts xviii. 12, xxv. 6; Rom. xiv. 10; 1 Cor. v. 10) and κρησίνος (e.g. Jas. ii. 6). The R. V. marg. in 1 Cor. vi. 2, 4 gives to this latter word the rendering tribunal. In Matt. xxvii. 19, John xix. 13, the judgment-seat or tribunal on which Pilate sat, when he delivered our Lord to death, was outside the praetorium or judgment-hall (see preceding article). This judgment-seat, we are told by St. John (l. c.), stood on a place "called the Pavement, but in Hebrew Gabbatha." The subject is discussed under GABBATHA. [F.]

JUDITH. 1. (יָדִיִּת); 'Ioudith, 'Ioudēid, 'Ioudithō, "the daughter of Beeri the Hittite," and wife of Esau (Gen. xxvi. 34). [ABOLRAMAH.]

2. The heroine of the apocryphal book which bears her name, who appears as an ideal type of piety (Judith viii. 6), beauty (xi. 21), courage, and chastity (xvi. 22 sq.). Her supposed descent from Simeon (ix. 2), and the manner in which she refers to his cruel deed (Gen. xxxiv. 25 sq.), mark the conception of the character, which evidently belongs to a period of stern and perilous conflict. The most unscrupulous daring (xiii.) is combined with zealous ritualism (xii. 1 sq.), and faith is turned to action rather than to supplication (viii. 31 sq.). Clement of Rome (Ep. i. 55) assigns to Judith the epithet given to Jael ('Ioudith ē μακράτα); and Jerome sees in her exploit the image of the victory of the Church over the power of evil (Ep. lxxix. 11, p. 508: "Judith . . . in typo Ecclesiae diabolum capite truncavit;" cp. Ep. xxii. 21, p. 105). The name is properly the feminine form of יָדִיִּת, Judaicus (cp. Jer. xxxvi. 14, 21). In the passage of Genesis it is generally taken as the correlative of Judah, i.e. "praised." [B. F. W.]

JUDITH, THE BOOK OF, like that of Tobit, belongs to the earliest specimens of historical fiction. The narrative of the reign of "Nebuchadnezzar king of Nineveh" (i. 1), of the campaign of Holofernes, and the deliverance of Bethulia, through the stratagem and courage of the Jewish heroine, contains too many and too serious difficulties, both historical and geographical, to allow of the supposition that it is either literally true, or even carefully moulded on truth. The existence of a kingdom of Nineveh and the reign of a Nebuchadnezzar are in themselves inconsistent with a date after the Return; and an earlier date is excluded equally by internal evidence and by the impossibility of placing the events in harmonious connexion with the course of Jewish history. The latter fact is seen most clearly in the extreme varieties of opinion among those critics who have endeavoured to maintain the veracity of the story. Nebuchadnezzar has been identified with Cambyse, Xerxes, Esarhaddon, Sardanapalus, Kiniladan, Merodach Baladan, Artaxerxes Ochus, &c., without the slightest show of probability. But, apart from this, the text evidently alludes to the position of the Jews after the Exile when the Temple was rebuilt (v. 18, 19; iv. 3), and the hierarchical government established in place of the kingdom (xv. 8, ἡ γερουσία τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραὴλ: cp. iv. 4, Samaria; viii. 6, πρῶτος βασιλεὺς, προσημνητόν); and after the Return the course of authentic history absolutely excludes the possibility of the occurrence of such events as the book relates. This fundamental contradiction of facts, which underlies the whole narrative, renders it superfluous to examine in detail the other objections which may be urged against it (e.g. iv. 6, Joacim; cp. 1 Ch. vi.; Joseph. Ant. x. 8, § 6 [JOACIM]). These objections are summarised by Zöckler (in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Komm. "Die Apokryphen d. A. T."; Das B. Judith, Einl. § 2).

2. The value of the book is not, however, lessened by its fictitious character. On the contrary it becomes even more valuable as exhibiting an ideal type of heroism, which was outwardly embodied in the wars of independence. The self-sacrificing faith and unscrupulous bravery of Judith were the qualities by which the champions of Jewish freedom were then enabled to overcome the power of Syria, which seemed at the time scarcely less formidable than the imaginary hosts of Holofernes. The peculiar character of the book, which is exhibited in these traits, affords the best indication of its date; for it cannot be wrong to refer its origin to the latter portion of the Maccabaean period, which it reflects not only in its general spirit but even in smaller traits (see them collected in Zöckler, § 3). The impious design of Nebuchadnezzar finds a parallel in the prophetic description of Antiochus (Dan. xi. 31 sq.), and the triumphant issue of Judith's courage must be compared not with the immediate results of the invasion of Apollonius (as Bertholdt, Einl. p. 2553 sq.), but with the victory which the author pictured to himself as the reward of faith. But while it seems certain that the book is to be referred to the last two centuries B.C., the attempts which have been made to fix its date within narrower limits, either to the time of the war of Alexander Jannaeus, at the close of the reign of John Hyrcanus (105 B.C., Movers) or of Salome-Alexandra (B.C. 79-70, Ball), or of Demetrius II. (129 B.C., Ewald), rest on very conjectural data. It might seem more natural (as a mere conjecture) to refer it to an earlier time, c. 170 B.C., when Antiochus Epiphanes made his first assault upon the Temple.^a

3. In accordance with the view which has been given of the character and date of the book, it is probable that the several parts may have a distinct symbolic meaning. Some of the names can scarcely have been chosen without regard to their derivation (e.g. Achior = Brother of Light; Judith = Jewess; Bethulia = בְּתוּלִיָּה, the virgin of Jehorah), and the historical difficulties of the person of Nebuchadnezzar disappear, when he is regarded as the Scriptural type of worldly power. Luther looked upon the book as a kind of Messianic prophecy (see Zöckler, § 5). But it is, perhaps, a mere play of fancy to allegorise the whole narrative, as Grotius has done (Prol. in Jud.), who interprets Judith of the Jewish nation widowed of outward help, Bethulia (בֵּית־אֱלֹהֵי) of the Temple, Nebuchadnezzar of the Devil, and Holofernes (הַלְפָּר נַחֲשׁ, lictor serpentis) of Antiochus, his emissary; while Joacim, the high-priest, conveys, as he thinks, by his name the assurance that "God will rise up" to deliver His people. A similar attempt at allegorising by Scholz is examined by Zöckler (op. cit. § 2).

4. Two conflicting statements have been preserved as to the original language of the book. Origen speaks of it together with Tobit as "not existing in Hebrew even among the Apocrypha" in the Hebrew collection (Ep. ad Afric. § 13, οὐδὲ γὰρ ἔχουσιν αὐτὰ [οἱ Ἑβραῖοι] καὶ ἐν Ἀποκρύφους Ἑβραϊστί, ὡς ἀπ' αὐτῶν μαθόντες ἐγγράκαμεν), by which statement he seems to imply that the book was originally written in Greek. Jerome, on the other hand, says that "among the Hebrews, the book of Judith is read among the Hagiographa [Apocrypha] . . . and being written in the Chaldee language is reckoned among the histories" (Praef. ad Jud.). The words of Origen are, however, somewhat ambiguous. There is now little doubt that the book was written in Palestine in Hebrew, and that the Chaldee text used by St. Jerome did not represent the oldest form of the narrative, but was itself a free translation or adaptation of the Hebrew account, which in his day was no longer extant (Ball, i. 243). Some, however, like Jahn (Einl. ii. § 3) and Eichhorn (Einl. in d. Apokr. p. 327), have maintained the originality of the present Greek text, on the authority of some phrases which may be assigned very naturally to the translator or reviser.^b

5. The text exists at present in two distinct recensions, the Greek (followed by the Syriac and Old Latin Versions; cp. Ball, i. 242, n. 1) and the Latin. The former is evidently the truer representative of the original, and it seems certain that the Latin was derived, in the main, from the Greek by a series of successive alterations. Jerome confesses that his own translation was free ("magis sensum e sensu quam verbum e verbo transferens"); and peculiarities of the language (Fritzsche, p. 122) prove that he took the Old Latin as the basis of his work, though he compared it with the Chaldee text which was in his possession ("sola ea quae intelligentia integra in verbis Chaldaeis invenire potui Latinis expressi"). The Latin text contains many curious errors, which seem to have arisen in the first instance from false hearing (Bertholdt, Eind. p. 2574 sq.; e.g. x. 5, καὶ ἄρτων καθάρων. Vulg. et panes et caseum, i.e. καὶ τυροῦ; xvi. 2, ὅτι εἰς παρεμβολὰς αὐτοῦ. Vulg. qui posuit castra sua, i.e. ὁ θεὸς; xvi. 17, καὶ κλαύουσιν ἐν αἰσθήσει. Vulg. ut urantur et sentiant); and Jerome remarks that it had been variously corrupted and interpolated before his time. At present it is impossible to determine the authentic text. In many instances the Latin is more full than the Greek (iv. 8-15, v. 11-20, v. 22-24, vi. 15 sq., ix. 6 sq.), which however contains peculiar passages (i. 13-16, vi. 1, &c.). Even where the two texts do not differ in the details of the narrative, as is often the case (e.g. 1, 3 sq., iii. 9, v. 9, vi. 13, vii. 2 sq., x. 12 sq., xv. 11, xvi. 25), they yet differ in language (e.g. ch. xv., &c.) and in names (e.g. viii. 1) and numbers (e.g. i. 2); and these variations can only be explained by going back to some still more remote source (cp. Bertholdt, Eind. p. 2568 sq.), which was probably an earlier Greek copy.*

^a The theory of Volkmar (Das vierte Buch Esra, p. 6; Theol. Jahrb. 1866-7) that the book of Judith refers to the period of the Parthian war of Trajan, need only be noticed in passing, as it assumes the spuriousness of the first epistle of Clement of Rome (§ 6). Volkmar's theory is examined by Ball, Speaker's Comm. on the Apocrypha, i. p. 244 sq., notes.

6. The existence of these various recensions of the book is a proof of its popularity and wide circulation, but the external evidence of its use is very scanty. Josephus was not acquainted with it, or it is likely that he would have made some use of its contents, as he did of the apocryphal additions to Esther (Jos. Ant. xi. 6, § 1 sq.). The first reference to its contents occurs in Clem. Rom. (Ep. i. 55), and it is quoted with marked respect by Origen (Sel. in Jerem. 23; cp. Hom. ix. in Jud. i.), Hilary (in Psal. cxxv. 6), and Lucifer (De non parc. p. 955). Jerome speaks of it as "reckoned among the Sacred Scriptures by the Synod of Nice," by which he probably means that it was quoted in the records of the Council, unless the text be corrupt (see Ball, i. 242). It has been wrongly inserted in the catalogue at the close of the Apostolic Canons, against the best authority (cp. Hody, De Bibl. Text. 646 a), but it obtained a place in the Latin Canon at an early time (cp. Hilar. Prolog. in Ps. 15), which it commonly maintained afterwards. [CANON.]

7. The Commentaries of Fritzsche (Kurzgefasstes Exeg. Handbuch, Leipzig, 1853) and Ball (Apocrypha, edited by Dr. Wace, London, 1888) contain good critical apparatus and scholarlike notes. The literature is collected by Zöckler (§ 5) and Ball (p. 260). [B. F. W.] [F.]

JU-EL (Ἰουῆ; Johel). 1. 1 Esd. ix. 34. [UEL.] 2. 1 Esd. ix. 35 (B. Οὐῆλ, A. Ἰουῆλ; Jessei). [JOEL, 13.]

JU'LIA (Ἰουλία), a Christian woman at Rome, probably the wife, or perhaps the sister, of Philologus, in connexion with whom she is saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 15). Origen supposes that they were master and mistress of a Christian household which included the other persons mentioned in the same verse. Both names point to a connexion with "the household of Caesar" (see Speaker's Comm. on Romans, in loco). [W. T. B.] [F.]

JULIUS (Ἰούλιος), the courteous centurion of "Augustus' band," to whose charge St. Paul was delivered when he was sent prisoner from Caesarea to Rome (Acts xvii. 1, 3). Augustus' band has been identified by some commentators with the Italian band (Acts x. 1); by others, less probably, with the body of cavalry denominated Sebasteni by Josephus (Ant. xix. 9, § 2, &c.). It is more probable that the Augustan cohort was a detachment of the Praetorian Guards attached to the person of the Roman governor at Caesarea, and that this Julius may be the same as Julius Priscus (Tacit. Hist. ii. 92, iv. 11), sometime centurion, afterwards prefect of the Praetorians. [W. T. B.]

JUNIA (Ἰουλίαν, i.e. JUNIAN), a Christian at Rome, mentioned by St. Paul as one of his kinsfolk and fellow-prisoners, of note among the Apostles, and in Christ before St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 7). Origen conjectures that he was possibly one of the seventy disciples. Hammond also takes the name to be that of a man, Junias, which would be a contraction (as Winer observes) of Junilius or Junianus. Chrysostom, holding the more common, but perhaps less probable, hypothesis that the name is that of a woman, Junia, remarks on it, "How great is the devotion of this woman, that she should be counted worthy of the name of Apostle!" Nothing is known of the imprisonment to which St. Paul refers: Origen supposes that it is that bondage from which Christ makes Christians free. [W. T. B.]

JU'NIPER. The rendering in A. V. and R. V. (but R. V. margin broom) of the Hebrew יַנְיָפֶרֶת, röthem; βαβμίν, φυντόν; juniperus; Arab. رتم, ratam; or Moorish رتمة, ratamah.

whence the Spanish retama, applied to the Genista, or Broom. Röthem occurs but in four passages: 1 K. xix. 4, 5; Job xxx. 4; Ps. cxi. 4. There is no question as to identification of the Hebrew name with the ratam of the Arabs, as shown by Celsius (Hierob. ii. 195) and Forskål (Flor. Eg.-Arab. lvi.). It has nothing to do with the juniper, which is expressed by יַנְיָפֶרֶת 'ar'ur [see HEATH]. It is allied to the Genista (or Broom) genus of the family Leguminosae. Retama raetama Forsk. of botanists. It may be considered the characteristic shrub of the desert, as it is the largest, most conspicuous, and most beautiful. It is as common in the dry wadis or ravines as on the rocky plains, always on barren ground, and rarely at a high elevation. It is especially abundant in the neighbourhood of Sinai and in the ravines of Petra, in company with the caper or hyssop, and the savin juniper. It is frequent all round the Dead Sea, and in the ravines of the Jordan, and also on the barer slopes of the hills of Gilead and Moab. Its geographical range is from Arabia to Upper Egypt and North-east Africa. Westward, in the plateaux of Spain and Portugal, and in the Canary Islands, it is represented by allied species. Like many of its congeners, the Brooms, it puts forth its blossom in the early spring, before its leaves; and in the month of February, the shower of delicate white and purplish-pink blossoms which cover it, as with a gauzy mantle light as gossamer, renders it one of the most graceful and beautiful of shrubs. It attains a height of ten or twelve feet, and affords a grateful though not very impervious shade. It was under a röthem bush that Elijah lay down, when he fled into the wilderness, in the solitary passage which connects the desert of the wanderings with the subsequent history of Israel. "He came and sat down under a juniper tree (röthem) . . . and as he lay and slept under a juniper tree (röthem) an angel touched him" (1 K. xix. 45). Dean Stanley incidentally mentions (S. & P. p. 80) that, in the only storm of rain he ever encountered in his travels in the desert, he took shelter under a "Retem bush."

It is ruthlessly uprooted by the Arabs, who collect it wherever it is tolerably abundant, for the manufacture of charcoal, which is considered of the finest quality, and fetches a higher price in the Cairo market than any other kind. This explains the allusion in Pa. cxx. 4, "Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of röthem." The roots being of great thickness and solidity, very much larger than the stem, a single bush will supply no inconsiderable quantity of fuel. There is more difficulty in the passage in Job in which the word occurs, where the Patriarch describes outcasts from Edom driven into the wilderness, and in the last extremity of starvation "cutting up mallows by the bushes, and röthem roots for their meat" (ch. xxx. 4). The woody root is of course uneatable, and the bark of it is very bitter, but not poisonous; while the stems, leaves, and fruit are eagerly sought after by goats, and in extreme cases might, like many other leguminous plants, maintain human life for a time. Gesenius (p. 1317, ed. 1842) suggests that the root may be used here in a general sense, for the whole plant; and under רֹתֵם (p. 1484) adduces various arguments to show that the word shöresh is employed sometimes to express the whole product of a plant, what the root produces, and therefore its seeds or fruit, which might be edible. One of the stations during the forty years' wandering of the Exodus was named Rithmah, i.e. the place of Rothem (Num. xxxiii. 18). [H. B. T.]

JU'PITER (Zeús, LXX.). Among the chief measures which Antiochus Epiphanes took for the entire subversion of the Jewish faith was that of dedicating the Temple at Jerusalem to the service of Zeus Olympius (2 Macc. vi. 2), and at the same time the rival temple on Gerizim was dedicated to Zeus Xenius (Jupiter hospitalis, Vulg.). The choice of the first epithet is easily intelligible. The Olympian Zeus was the national god of the Hellenic race (Thucyd. iii. 14), as well as the supreme ruler of the heathen world, and as such formed the true opposite to Jehovah, Who had revealed Himself as the God of Abraham. The application of the second epithet, "the God of hospitality" (cp. Grimm on 2 Macc. i. c.), is more obscure. In 2 Macc. vi. 2 it is explained by the clause, "as was the character of those who dwelt in the place," which may, however, be an ironical comment of the writer (cp. Q. Curt. iv. 5, 8), and not a sincere eulogy of the hospitality of the Samaritans (as Ewald, Gesch. iv. 339 n.). Jupiter or Zeus is mentioned in one passage of the N. T., on the occasion of St. Paul's visit to Lystra (Acts xiv. 12, 13), where the expression "Jupiter, which was before their city," means that his temple was outside the city.

JU'SHAB-HE'SED (יֹשָׁבֵד - יְשָׁבֵד ; B. Ἀροβᾶ-σοῦκ, A. Ἀροβαῖσδ; Josabhesed), son of Zerubabel (1 Ch. iii. 20). It does not appear why the five children in this verse are separated from the three in v. 19. Bertheau and Oettli (in Strack u. Zückler's Kjff. Komm. in loco) suggest that they might be by a different mother, or possibly born in Judaea after the return, whereas the three others were born at Babylon. The name of Jushab-hesed = Loving-kindness is returned, taken in conjunction with that of his father and brothers, is a striking expression of the feelings of pious Jews at the return from Captivity, and at the same time a good illustration of the nature of Jewish names. [A. C. H.]

JUSTUS (Ἰουστος). Schoettgen (Hor. Hebr. in Act. Ap.) shows by quotations from Rabbinical writers that this name was not unusual among the Jews. 1. A surname of Joseph called Barsabas (Acts i. 23). [JOSEPH BARSABAS, p. 1807.]

2. A Jewish proselyte at Corinth, into whose house St. Paul (Acts xviii. 7) entered when he left the synagogue. Such a house might well be a meeting place for Hebrew and Greek (cp. Speker's Comm. in loco).

3. A surname of Jesus, a friend of St. Paul (Col. iv. 11). [JESUS, p. 1663.] [F.]

JUTTAH (Josh. xv. 55, plene יִטָּה , but xxi. 16, יִטָּה : Ἰτάν, A. Ἰετρά; Tavú, A. omits: Iota, Ieta), a city in the mountain region of Judah, in the neighbourhood of Maon and Carmel (Josh. xv. 55). It was allotted to the priests (xxi. 16), but in the catalogue of 1 Ch. vi. 57-59 the name has escaped. In the time of Eusebius it was a large village (κώμη μεγάλη), 18 M.P. southward of Eleutheropolis and in Daroma (*OS.*² p. 266, 49; p. 233, 10, s. v. Ἰετράν; Jetan). Reland (Pal. p. 870) conjectures that Juttah is the πόλις Ἰούδα (A. V. "a city of Juda") in the hill country, in which Zacharias, the father of John the Baptist, resided (Luke i. 39). But this, though feasible, is not at present confirmed by any positive evidence.

It is now Yutta, a large village 15½ miles from Beit-Jibrin, Eleutheropolis, and near Carmel, Kurmul, and Ziph, Tell ez-Zif. Rock-hewn tombs and wine-presses are found near the village. The present inhabitants are very rich in flocks (P.F.F. Mem. iii. 310; Robinson, B. R. 1st ed. ii. 195, 628). [G.] [W.]
