

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

ELZABAD

EL-ZA'BAD (עֶלְזָבָד) = God hath given. Cp. Theodore et sim.; B. 'Ελιαζβ, A. 'Ελεζαβδδ; Elzabad. 1. The ninth of the eleven Gadite heroes who came across the Jordan to David when he was in distress in the wilderness of Judah (1 Ch. xii. 12).

2. B. 'Εληζαβδδ, A. 'Ελζαβδδ. A Korhite Levite, son of Shemaiah and of the family of Obed-edom; one of the doorkeepers of the "house of Jehovah" (1 Ch. xxvi. 7). [G.] [F.]

EL-ZAPHAN (עֶלְזָפָן) = God hath protected.

Cp. Phoen. 𐤀𐤋𐤆𐤏𐤏 [MV. 11]; 'Ελισαφδν; Elsaphan, second son of Uzziel, who was the son of Kohath son of Levi (Ex. vi. 22). He was thus cousin to Moses and Aaron, as is distinctly stated. Elzaphan assisted his brother Mishael to carry the unhappy Nadab and Abihu in their priestly tunics out of the camp (Lev. x. 4). The name is a contracted form of the more frequent ELIZAPHAN. [G.] [F.]

EMBALMING, the process by which dead bodies are preserved from putrefaction and decay. The Hebrew word חָנַף (chánaf), employed to denote this process, is connected with the Arabic hina, which in conj. 1 signifies "to be red," as leather which has been tanned; and in conj. 2, "to preserve with spices." In the 1st and 4th conjugations it is applied to the ripening of fruit, and this meaning has been assigned to the Hebrew root in Cant. ii. 13. In the latter passage, however, it probably denotes the red colour of the ripening figs (see Delitzsch in loco). The word is found in the Chaldee and Syriac dialects, and in the latter חַנְתְּהוֹ (chüntethô) is the equivalent of μύγμα, the confection of myrrh and aloes brought by Nicodemus (John xix. 39).

The practice of embalming was most general among the Egyptians, and it is in connexion with this people that the two instances which we meet with in the O. T. are mentioned (Gen. l. 2, 26). Mummies exist which are to be dated just before and after this period (Ebers). Of the Egyptian method of embalming there remain two minute accounts, which have a general kind of agreement, though they differ in details.

Herodotus (ii. 86-88. Cp. Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 383, &c. [1878])—whose account is on the whole accurate—describes three modes, varying in completeness and expense, and practised by persons regularly trained to the profession, who were initiated into the mysteries of the art by their ancestors. The most costly mode, which is estimated by Diodorus Siculus (i. 91) at a talent of silver (about £250), was said by the Egyptian priests to belong to him whose name in such a matter it was not lawful to mention, viz. Osiris. The embalmers first removed part of the brain through the nostrils, by means of a crooked iron, and destroyed the rest by injecting caustic drugs. An incision was then made along the flank with a sharp Ethiopian stone, and the whole of the intestines removed. The cavity was rinsed out with palm-wine, and afterwards scoured with pounded perfumes. It was then filled with pure myrrh pounded, cassia, and other aromatics, except frankincense. This done, the body was sewn up and steeped in natron (subcarbonate of soda, Ebers) for seventy days (cp. the extract given by Ebers from the Setnan papyrus). When the seventy days were accomplished, the embalmers washed the corpse and swathed it in bandages of linen, cut in strips, and smeared with gum. They then gave it up to the relatives of the deceased, who provided for it a wooden case, made in the shape of a man, in which the dead was placed, and deposited in an erect position against the wall of the sepulchral chamber. Diodorus Siculus gives some particulars of the process which are omitted by Herodotus. When the body was laid out on the ground for the purpose of embalming, one of the operators, called the scribe (γραμματεὺς), marked out the part of the left flank where the incision was to be made. The dissector (ραπισχιστὴς) then, with a sharp Ethiopian stone (black flint, or Ethiopian agate, Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 141), hastily cut through as much flesh as the law enjoined, and fled, pursued by curses and volleys of stones from the spectators. When all the embalmers (ραπισχεται) were assembled, one of them extracted the intestines, with the exception of the heart and kidneys; another cleansed them one by one, and rinsed them in palm-wine and perfumes.* The body was then washed with oil of cedar, and other things worthy of notice, for more than thirty days (according to some MSS. forty), and afterwards sprinkled with myrrh, cinnamon, and other substances, which possess the property not only of preserving the body for a long period, but also of communicating to it an agreeable smell. This process was so effectual that the features of the dead could be recognised. It is remarkable that Diodorus omits all mention of the steeping in natron.

The second mode of embalming cost about 20 minae (about £60). In this case no incision was made in the body, nor were the intestines removed, but cedar-oil was injected into the stomach by the rectum. The oil was prevented from escaping, and the body was then steeped in natron for the appointed number of days. On the last day the oil was withdrawn, and carried off with it the stomach and intestines in a state of solution, while the flesh was consumed by the natron, and nothing was left but the skin and bones. The body in this state was returned to the relatives of the deceased.

The third mode, which was adopted by the poorer classes, and cost but little, consisted in rinsing out the intestines with syrmaca, an infusion of senna and casia (Pettigrew, p. 69), and steeping the body for the usual number of days in natron.

Porphyry (De Abst. iv. 10) supplies an omission of Herodotus, who neglects to mention what was done with the intestines after they were removed from the body. In the case of a person of respectable rank they were placed in a separate vessel and thrown into the river. This account is confirmed by Plutarch (Sept. Sap. Conr. c. 16).

Although the three modes of embalming are so precisely described by Herodotus, it has been found impossible to classify the mummies which have been discovered and examined under one or other of these three heads. Dr. Pettigrew, from his own observations, confirms the truth of Herodotus' statement that the brain was removed through the nostrils. But in many instances, in which the body was carefully preserved and elaborately ornamented, the brain had not been removed at all; while in some mummies the cavity was found to be filled with resinous and bituminous matter.

M. Rouyer, in his Notice sur les Embaumements des Anciens Égyptiens, quoted by Pettigrew, endeavoured to class the mummies which he examined under two principal divisions, which were again subdivided into others. These were—I. Mummies with the ventral incision, preserved (1) by balsamic matter, and (2) by natron. The first of these are filled with a mixture of resin and aromatics, and are of an olive colour—the skin dry, flexible, and adhering to the bones. Others are filled with bitumen or asphaltum, and are black, the skin hard and shining. Those prepared with natron are also filled with resinous substances and bitumen. II. Mummies without the ventral incision. This class is again subdivided, according as the bodies were (1) salted and filled with pisasphaltum, a compound of asphaltum and common pitch, or (2) salted only. The former are supposed to have been immersed in the pitch when in a liquid state.

The medicaments employed in embalming were various. From a chemical analysis of the substances found in mummies, M. Rouelle detected three modes of embalming—1, with asphaltum, or Jew's pitch, called also funeral gum, or gum of mummies; 2, with a mixture of asphaltum and cedria, the liquor distilled from the cedar; 3, with this mixture together with some resinous and aromatic ingredients. The powdered aromatics mentioned by Herodotus were not mixed with the bituminous matter, but sprinkled into the cavities of the body.

It does not appear that embalming, properly so called, was practised by the Hebrews. Asa was laid "in the bed which was filled with sweet odours and divers kind of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art" (2 Ch. xvi. 14); and by the tender care of Nicodemus the body of Jesus was wrapped in linen cloths, with spices, "a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight . . . as the manner of the Jews is to bury" (John xix. 32, 40).

The account given by Herodotus has been supposed to throw discredit upon the narrative in Genesis. He asserts that the body is steeped in natron for seventy days, while in Gen. i. 3 it is said that only forty days were occupied in the whole process of embalming, although the period of mourning extended over seventy days. Diodorus, on the contrary, omits altogether the steeping in natron as a part of the operation; and though the time which, according to him, is taken up in washing the body with cedar oil and other aromatics is more than thirty days, yet this is evidently only a portion of the whole time occupied in the complete process. Hengstenberg (Egypt and the Books of Moses, p. 69, Eng. tr.) would reconcile this discrepancy by supposing that the seventy days of Herodotus include the whole time of embalming, and not that of steeping in natron only; others, with more probability, explain any differences of detail and variations of practice by local or dynastic customs (cp. Dillmann, Genesis,* in loco). Ebers thinks that there are grounds for believing that the embalming the body of Jacob would have been after the manner of Memphis.

Their religious views suggested to the Egyptians the idea of embalming. They practised it in accordance with their doctrine of the transmigration of souls (see further, EGYPT, p. 872, col. 2). The actual process is said to have been derived from "their first merely burying in the sand, impregnated with natron and other salts, which dried and preserved the body" (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 142). Drugs and bitumen were of later introduction, the latter not being generally employed before the 18th dynasty. When the practice ceased entirely is uncertain (cp. Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 398 [1878]).

The subject of embalming is fully discussed, and the sources of practical information well-nigh exhausted, in Dr. Pettigrew's History of Egyptian Mummies. See also Ebers in Riehm's HWB. s. n. 'Eibalsamiren.' [W. A. W.] [F.]

EMBROIDERER. This term is given in the A. V. as the equivalent of rokem (רֹקֵם), the productions of the art being described as "needle-work" (שֵׁרָטָה). In Exodus the embroiderer is contrasted with the "cunning workman," chosheb (חֹשֶׁב): and the consideration of one of these terms involves that of the other. Various explanations have been offered as to the distinction between them, but most of these overlook the distinction marked in the Bible itself, viz. that the rokem wove simply a variegated texture, without gold thread or figures, and that the choshob interwove gold thread or figures into the variegated texture. We conceive that the use of the gold thread was for delineating figures, as is implied in the description of the corslet of Amasis (Her. iii. 47), and that the notices of gold thread in some instances and of figures in others were but different methods of describing the same thing. It follows, then, that the application of the term "embroiderer" to rokem is incorrect; if it belongs to either, it is to choshob, or the "cunning workman," who added the figures. But if "embroidery" be strictly confined to the work of the needle, we doubt whether it can be applied to either, for the simple addition of gold thread, or of a figure, does not involve the use of the needle. The patterns may have been worked into the stuff by the loom, as appears to have been the case in Egypt (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 81 [1878]; cp. Her. loc. cit.), where the Hebrews learned the art, and as is stated by Josephus (ἑσθη ἐνὶφανταί, Ant. iii. 7, § 2). The distinction, as given by the Talmudists, and which has been adopted by Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 1311) and Bähr (Symbolik, i. 266), is this—that was rikmah, or "needlework," where a pattern was attached to the stuff by being sewn on to it on one side; and that was the work of the choshob when the pattern was worked into the stuff by the loom, and so appeared on both sides. This view appears to be entirely inconsistent with the statements of the Bible, and with the sense of the word rikmah elsewhere. The absence of the figure or the gold thread in the one, and its presence in the other, constitutes the essence of the distinction. In support of this view we call attention to the passages in which the expressions are contrasted. Rikmah consisted of the following materials, "blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen" (Ex. xxvi. 36, xxvii. 16, xxxvi. 37, xxxviii. 18, xxxix. 29). The work of the choshob was either "fine twined linen, blue, purple, and scarlet, with cherubim" (Ex. xxvi. 1, 31; xxxvi. 8, 35), or "gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen" (xxviii. 6, 8, 15; xxxix. 2, 5, 8). Again, looking at the general sense of the words, we shall find that choshob involves the idea of invention, or designing patterns; rikmah the idea of texture as well as variegated colour. The former is applied to other arts which demanded the exercise of inventive genius, as in the construction of engines of war (2 Ch. xxvi. 15); the latter is applied to other substances, the texture of which is remarkable, as the human body (Ps. cxxxix. 15). Further than this, rikmah involves the idea of a regular disposition of colours, which demanded no inventive genius. Beyond the instances already adduced, it is applied to tessellated pavement (1 Ch. xxix. 2), to the eagle's plumage (Ezek. xvii. 3), and, in the Targums, to the leopard's spotted skin (Jer. xiii. 23). In the same sense it is applied to the coloured sails of the Egyptian vessels (Ezek. xxvii. 16), which were either chequered or worked according to a regularly recurring pattern (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i. 413 [1878]). Gesenius considers this passage as conclusive for his view of the distinction, but it is hardly conceivable that the patterns were on one side of the sail only, nor does there appear any ground to infer a departure from the usual custom of working the colours by the loom. The ancient Versions do not contribute much to the elucidation of the point. The LXX. varies between ποικιλῆς and ραφιδευτής, as representing rokem, and ποικιλῆς and ὀφαντῆς for choshob, combining the two terms in each case for the work itself, ἡ ποικιλία τοῦ ραφιδευτοῦ for the first, ἔργον ὀφαντῶν ποικιλῶν for the second. The distinction, so far as it is observed, consisted in the one being needle-work and the other loom-work. The Vulgate gives generally plumarius for the first, and polymitarius for the second; but in Ex. xvi. 1, 31, plumarius is used for the second. The first of these terms (plumarius) is well chosen to express rokem, but polymitarius, i.e. a weaver who works together threads of divers colours, is as applicable to one as to the other. The rendering in Ezek. xxvii. 16, scutulata, i.e. "chequered," correctly describes one of the productions of the rokem. We have lastly to notice the incorrect rendering of the word פְּרָשָׁה in the A. V.—"broider;" "embroider" (Ex. xxviii. 4, 39; R. V. "chequer-work"). It means stuff worked in a tessellated manner, i.e. with square cavities, such as stones might be set in (cp. r. 20). The art of embroidery by the loom was extensively practised among the nations of antiquity. The Babylonians were also celebrated for it, but embroidery in the proper sense of the term, i.e. with the needle, was a Phrygian invention of later date (Plin. viii. 48). [W. L. B.]

EMERALD (הַבִּינִי; LXX., ἀσπραξ; N. T. and Apoc., σμάραγδος), a precious stone, first in the second row on the breastplate of the high-priest (Ex. xxviii. 18, xxxix. 11), imported to Tyre from Syria (Ezek. xxvii. 16), used as a seal or signet (Ecclus. xxxii. 6), as an ornament of clothing and bedding (Ezek. xxviii. 13; Judith x. 21), and spoken of as one of the foundations of Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19; Tob. xiii. 16). The rainbow round the throne is compared to emerald in Rev. iv. 3, ὁμοίος ὁράσει σμαραγδίνην.

The etymology of הַבִּינִי is uncertain. Gesenius suggests a comparison with the word הַבִּינִי, a paint with which the Hebrew women stained their eyelashes. Kalisch on Exodus xxviii. follows the LXX., and translates it carbuncle, transferring the meaning emerald to יהלם in the same v. 18. The Targum Jer. on the same verse explains הַבִּינִי by כַּרְבֻנָא = carchedomius, carbuncle (so R. V. marg.). Riehm (HWB, "Edelsteine," No. 13) prefers "granat." [H. W. T.]

EMERODS (עֲפָלִים עֲפָלִים; טוֹחֵרִים עֲפָלִים; ἔδρα; anus, nates; Deut. xxviii. 27; 1 Sam. v. 6, 9, 12, vi. 4, 5, 11). The probabilities as to the nature of the disease are mainly dependent on the probable roots of these two Hebrew words; the former of which* evidently means "a swelling;" the latter, though less certain, is most probably from a Syriac verb, ܦܢܝܢ, meaning "anhelavit sub onere, enixus est in exonerando ventre" (Parkhurst and Gesenius); and the Syriac noun

ܦܢܝܢܐ from the same root denotes (1) such effort as the verb implies, and (2) the intestinum rectum. Also, whenever the former word occurs in the Hebrew Kethib,^b the Keri gives the latter, except in 1 Sam. vi. 11, where the latter stands in the Kethib. Now this last passage speaks of the images of the emerods after they were actually made, and placed in the Ark. It thus appears probable that the former word means the disease, and the latter the part affected, which must necessarily have been included in the actually existing image, and have struck the eye as the essential thing represented, to which the disease was an incident. As some morbid swelling, then, seems the most probable nature of the disease, so no more probable conjecture has been advanced than that haemorrhoidal tumours (R. V. Deut. marg. Or, tumours or plague boils; in 1 Sam. text "tumours," marg. or plague boils), or bleeding piles, known to the Romans as mariscus (Juv. ii. 13), are intended. These are very common in Syria at present; Oriental habits of want of exercise and improper food, producing derangement of the liver, constipation, &c., being such as to cause them. The sense of plague-boils, a disease found among the Druses, is preferred by others (see Dillmann² on Deut. l. c.). The words of 1 Sam. v. 12, "the men that died not were smitten with emerods," show that the disease was not necessarily fatal. It is clear from its parallelism with "botch" and other diseases in Deut. xxviii. 27, that ܦܢܝܢܐ is a disease, not a part of the body; but the translations of it by the most approved authorities are various and vague.^c Thus the LXX. and Vulg., as above, uniformly render the word as bearing the latter sense. The mention by Herodotus (i. 105) of the malady, called by him θήλεια νόσος, as afflicting the Scythians who robbed the temple (of the Syrian Venus) in Ascalon, has been deemed by some a proof that some legend containing a distortion of the Scriptural account was current in that country down to a late date. The Scholiast on Aristophanes (Acharn. 231) mentions a similar plague (followed by a similar subsequent propitiation to that mentioned in Scripture), as sent upon the Athenians by Bacchus.^d The opinion mentioned by Winer (s. v. Philister), as advanced by Lichtenstein, that the plague of emerods and that of mice are one and the same, the former being caused by an insect (solpuga) as large as a field-mouse, is hardly worth attention. [H. H.]

EM'MIM (עִמִּים; B. Ὀμμαίς, A. Ὀμοίς [v. 10], Ὀμοίς [v. 11], only twice mentioned,

^b Parkhurst, however, s. v. ܦܢܝܢܐ, thinks, on the authority of Dr. Kennicott's Codices, that ܦܢܝܢܐ is in all these passages a very ancient Hebrew varia lectio.

^c Josephus, Ant. vi. 1, § 1, δυσεντερία; Aquila, τὸ τῆς φαγεδαίης ἔλακος.

^d Pollux, Onom. iv. 25, thus describes what he calls βοῦβαν. αἰθμα μετὰ φλεγμονῆς αἰμοφόρου γίνεται κατὰ τὴν ἕδραν ἔντος, ἐστὶ δὲ ὁμοία μύρου ἰμοίς. Cp. Bochart, Hierosol. i. 381.

Gen. xiv. 5 [LXX. om.] and Deut. ii. 10, 11). As a Semitic word the name appears to mean "terrors," and is used of the idols of Chaldea, which "is a land of graven images, and they are mad upon their idols" (Jer. l. 38). It appears that the Emim were the aborigines of Moab: they "dwelt therein aforetime, a people great, and many, and tall as the Anakim" (R. V.). They may have been of the same race as the Rephaim in Bashan, the Zuzim in Ham, and the Horites in Mount Seir. It is not, however, at all certain that they were of Semitic race, although the word presents a Semitic plural. The Hittites are believed by scholars to have been non-Semitic, and the Emim may have belonged to the ancient Turanian people, who preceded the Semitic stock in Chaldea, as the Emim preceded the sons of Lot in Moab. If these aborigines were really what is called Turanian, the meaning of the word is to be sought in Turanian languages. In this case it would be comparable with the widely diffused word aima for a "horde" or "tribe" (Tunguse aiman, Buriat aimah, Mongol aimak, Livonian aim, "tribe"). The name of the Hittites occurs in the Bible with a Semitic plural attached. In the A. V (but not in the R. V.) the English plural has in like manner been added to the Hebrew—Emims being a case in point. [C. R. C.]

EM'MAUS (Ἐμμαούς), the village (κώμη) to which the two disciples were going when our Lord appeared to them on the way, on the day of His Resurrection (Luke xxiv. 13). The only indication of position is the distance from Jerusalem, which St. Luke gives as 60 stadia* (A. V. threescore furlongs) or about 6½ English miles. St. Mark (xvi. 12) simply says that the disciples were on their way into the country (εἰς ἀγρὸν). Josephus (B. J. vii. 6, § 6) mentions a place (χαρπύον) called Emmaus, which was the only portion of Judaea exempted from the general lot of being sold. It was given by Titus to 800 men discharged from the army, and the distance from Jerusalem is stated to have been 60, or, according to the Latin copies, 30 stadia. This last feature has led to the general supposition that it is the same place as the Emmaus of the N. T. Six sites have at various times been proposed for Emmaus.

1. Eusebius and Jerome (*OS*² p. 257, 21; p. 121, 6) identify it with the city of Emmaus, Ἀμῶα, afterwards called Nicopolis, which was 176 stadia, or about 20 English miles, from Jerusalem, and situated on the maritime plain, at the foot of the mountains of Judah. This view was held by all Christians down to the 12th century (Sozomen, H. E. v. 20; Abbot Daniel, lxii.), and has been maintained in modern times by Dr. Robinson (iii. 147 sq.), and by Guérin (Judée, i. 301 sq. Cp. Schiflers, Amwās, das Emmaus d. hl. Lucas, 160 Stad. v. Jerus. 1891). It necessitates a journey of 40 miles in one day, and is at variance with the circumstances of the narrative. The two disciples having journeyed from Jerusalem to Emmaus in part of a day (Luke xxiv. 28, 29), left the latter again after the evening meal, and reached Jerusalem before it was very late (vv. 33, 42, 43). Now, if we take into account the distance, 20 miles, and the nature of the road, leading up a steep and difficult mountain, we must admit that such a journey could not be accomplished in less than from six to seven hours, so that they could not have arrived in Jerusalem till long past midnight. The expressions used by St. Luke, "a village named Emmaus," and by St. Mark, "into the country," would hardly have been employed if the disciples had been going to the well-known fortress-city of Emmaus-Nicopolis (Reland, pp. 427, 758; Thomson, L. and B. p. 534).

* The Sinaitic MS., supported by I, K, and N, has 160 stadia; but the best MSS. are decisive in favour of 60 stadia (see Westcott and Hort). If the Sinaitic be one of the MSS. of the N. T. prepared by Eusebius, at the command of Constantine, it is possible that he altered the text to bring it into agreement with the distance of Emmaus-Nicopolis, Ἀμῶα, from Jerusalem.

2. Kuryet el-'Enab, about 66 stadia from Jerusalem, on the road to Jaffa, has been proposed by the Rev. G. Williams (Dict. of Gk. and Rom. Geog.) and Thomson (L. and B. p. 666). The arguments in its favour are, a not very ancient Greek tradition, the distance from Jerusalem, and proximity to Kustul (Castellum) and Kulónieh (Colonia). Kuryet, however, is an ancient name, Kirjath, and is not likely to have been also known as Emmaus.

3. Kulónieh, about 36 stadia from Jerusalem, on the road to Jaffa. In Josh. xviii. 26 mention is made of a town MOZAH, really ham-Motsah (מוצא), which is believed to be the same place as the Motsah mentioned in the Mishna (Succah, iv. § 5), which was also a Colonia. Ham-Motsah is in all probability the Ammaeus which, according to the Latin copies of Josephus, was 30 stadia from Jerusalem (PEFQy. Stat. 1881, p. 237). It is identified by Schwarz (D. heil. Land, p. 98) and Neubauer (Géog. ds Talmud, pp. 152, 153) with Kulónieh, but is more probably the ruin Beit Mizza, in the immediate vicinity. The arguments in favour of identifying Kulónieh with the Emmaus of St. Luke are very fully given by Sepp (Jer. u. d. heil. Land, i. 54-73), who identifies Kustul with the Castellum Emmaus of the Crusaders, and by Ewald (Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. vi. 675 sq.). See also Furrer in Schenkel, B. L. s. v. Kulónieh was, and still is, a place to which the inhabitants of Jerusalem went out for recreation.

4. The claims of el-Kubeibeh have been well set forth by Zschokke (Das N. T. Emmaus), and are maintained by Baedeker-Socin (Hüb. p. 141), the Franciscans, Schick, Riehm (HWB. s. v.), and others. It is about 63 stadia N.W. of Jerusalem, on an old Roman road leading through Beit Lika to Ludd, Lydda; and at the head of one branch of the valley in which Kulónieh lies. The tradition connecting E. with el-Kubeibeh does not appear to be earlier than the 14th century, and cannot be considered trustworthy. A monastery of Latin monks was established there in 1862 (PEF. Mem. iii. 17, 131).

5. Etam (אין אתאן) and Urtás, near "Solomon's Pools," have been proposed by Lightfoot (Chor. iv. § 3) and Mrs. Finn (PEFQy. Stat. 1883, pp. 53-64). The distance from Jerusalem is about 60 stadia; but the place is not likely to have been selected as the site of a Roman colony; and it may be inferred from Josephus (Antiq. viii. 7, § 3) that the name Etam had not been superseded by Emmaus.

6. Kh. el-Khamasa, 72 stadia in a direct line, and 86 by road, from Jerusalem, and close to one of the Roman roads leading to the plain near Beit Jibrin. The arguments in its favour, of which the principal is the name, are given by Conder (PEF. Mem. iii. 36) and Geikie (Holy Land and the Bible, ii. 142, 143). The distance from Jerusalem, however, is far too great, and all tradition points to a site further north.

The indication of position is so slight that no positive identification can be made: the choice seems to lie between Kulónieh, or Beit Mizza, and el-Kubeibeh. [W.]

EM'MAUS, or NICOPOLIS (Ἐμμαοῦς; Joseph. Ἐμμαοῦς and Ἀμμαοῦς), a town on the Maritime plain, at the foot of the mountains of Judaea, 22 Roman miles from Jerusalem, and 10 from Lydda (Itin. Hieros.; Reland, pp. 306, 427-430; Jerome, Com. ad Dam. ch. xii.). The name does not occur in the O. T.; but the town rose to importance during the later history of the Jews, and was a place of note in the wars of the Hasmonæans. In 164 B.C. Lysias, Governor-general of Syria, sent an army under Ptolemy, Nicanor, and Gorgias to invade Judaea. The army encamped on the plain near Emmaus (1 Macc. iii. 40); and in this position was attacked by Judas Maccabæus, who had moved down from Jerusalem and pitched his camp on the S. side of Emmaus (v. 57). The battle resulted in the complete defeat of the Syrians (1 Macc. iv. 3-25). Emmaus was fortified, with other towns, by Bacchides, the general of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. ix. 50; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 1, § 3). Under the Romans it was the chief town of a toparchy (Joseph. B. J. iii. 3, § 5; Plin. H. N. v. 14). It was reduced by Cassius to a state of slavery (Ant. xiv. 11, § 2; B. J. i. 11, § 2); and was afterwards (4 A.D.) burned by order of Varus (B. J. ii. 5, § 1), as a punishment for an attack made on a company of soldiers carrying corn and weapons to the Roman army (4, § 3). When the Jews divided the country into military districts, after the defeat of Cestius, Emmaus formed part of the district of John the Essene (B. J. ii. 20, § 4). Vespasian, during the Jewish war, established a fortified camp at Emmaus, and occupied the passes leading thence to Jerusalem (B. J. iv. 8, § 1); and, prior to the siege of Jerusalem, the 5th Legion marched up from Emmaus (B. J. v. 1, § 6), and joined Titus at Gabaath-Saul (2, § 3).

In 131 A.D. Emmaus was destroyed by an earthquake; and in the 3rd century, about 221 A.D., it was rebuilt, under the title Nicopolis, in consequence of the representations of a native of the place, Sextus Julius Africanus, the Christian historian, who went as an envoy to the Emperor Heliogabalus (Chron. Pas. ad A.C. 223; Jerome, De Vir. ill. lxiii.). According to Sozomen (v. 20) and Nicephorus (x. 21), Emmaus was called Nicopolis after the capture of Jerusalem, and to commemorate that event. To Eusebius and Jerome, Emmaus-Nicopolis was the Emmaus of Luke xxiv. 13 (Onom., and Jerome, Per. S. Paulæ, v.), and such was the general belief to the 14th century. Sozomen (v. 20) mentions a spring endowed with miraculous powers which it owed to the touch of Christ. This spring was closed by order of the Emperor Julian to suppress the Christian belief attached to it (Theophanes, Chron. 41); but it appears to have been open again in the 8th century (Ilin. S. Willibaldi, xiii.); and at a later period (Will. of Tyre, vii. 24).

It is now 'Amwās, a small village, near the foot of the mountains, to the left of the road from Jaffa to Jerusalem. There are the ruins of a Byzantine church, rock-hewn tombs, a spring, 'Ain Nimi, and a well, Bir et-Tāūn, "Well of the Plague," which probably derives its name from the plague of Emmaus which desolated the Moslem army after the conquest of Syria. The church was excavated by the French in 1881, and an account published in Les Missions Catholiques, 3rd March, 1882. For a description of the ruins, see PEF. Mem. iii. 14, 63; Sepp, Das heil. Land, i. 42; Guérin, Judée, i. 29 sq.; and Clermont-Ganneau in PEF. Stat. 1874, pp. 149, 160, 162; 1882, pp. 24-37.

The later Jewish legends are given by Neubauer (Geog. du Talmud, pp. 101, 102). Bishops of Emmaus attended the Council of Niceæ, the second Council of Constantinople, and the meeting at Jerusalem in 536 A.D.

The name Emmaus was also borne by a village of Galilee close to Tiberias; probably the ancient HAMMATH, i.e. hot springs. The springs are mentioned by Josephus, Ant. xviii. 2, § 3; B. J. iv. 1, § 3. [W.]

EMMER (B. 'Εμμήρ, A. 'Εμμήρ; Semmeri), 1 Esd. ix. 21. [EMMER.]

EMMOR ('Εμμώρ, Westcott and Hort; Emmor), the father of Sychem (Acts vii. 16). [HAMOR.]

ENA'JIM, more correctly as in R. V. ENAIM (עֵינַיִם), is the marginal reading of the A. V. for "an open place" (Gen. xxxviii. 14), and "openly" (v. 21). The LXX. have Aivāv. The Vulgate renders it by in bivio. The Talmudists considered it to be the name of a place (Tal. Bab. Sotah, 10 a), and identical with Enam in the neighbourhood of Adullam. In Pesik. rab. 23 mention is made of a Kefar Enaim. Philo and Eusebius also regard it as a place, and modern commentators consider it the same as ENAM (see Delitzsch and Dillmann⁶ in loco). [W.]

E'NAM (with the article, עֵינַיִם = the double spring, Ges. Thes. p. 1019 a; B. Maasai, A. 'Hvaēlu; Enaim), one of the cities of Judah in the Shefelah or lowland (Josh. xv. 34). From its mention with towns (Jarmuth and Eshtaol, for instance) which are known to have been near Timnath, this is very probably the place in the "gate" of which Tamar sat before her interview with her father-in-law (Gen. xxxviii. 14). In the A. V. the words Pathach enayim (עֵינַיִם פָּתַח) are not taken as a proper name, but are rendered "an open place" (see ENAJIM); but "the gate of Enaim" (or the double spring) is the translation adopted by the LXX. (ραῖς πύλαις Αἰβά), R. V., and now generally accepted. In Josh. xv. 34, for "Tappuah and Enam," the Peshitto has "Pathuch-Elam," which supports the identification suggested above. Müller (in Riehm, HWB. s. n.) suggests Beit 'Anān, but this place is far to the N. and not on the road from Adullam to Timnath. Schwarz (p. 73) identifies it with the village Beth Ani, perhaps

Beit 'Anān; Conder (Hdbk. to Bible, p. 410) more probably with Ka. Wādī 'Aln near 'Ain Shems, Bethshemesh. [AIN.] [G.] [W.]

E'NAN (עֵינַן; Aivāv; Enan). Ahira ben-Enan was "prince" of the tribe of Naphtali at the time of the numbering of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 15, ii. 29, vii. 78, 83, x. 27). [G.]

ENA'SIBUS (B. 'Εν᾿σείβος; Eliasib), 1 Esd. ix. 34. [ELLASHIB.]

ENCAMPMENT (חֲנֻכָּה, machāneh, in all places except 2 K. vi. 8, where חֲנֻכָּתִי, tachānōthi, is used). The word primarily denoted the resting-place of an army or company of travellers at night* (Ex. xvi. 13; Gen. xxxii. 21), and was hence applied to the army or caravan when on its march (Ex. xiv. 19; Josh. x. 5, xi. 4; Gen. xxxii. 7, 8). Among nomadic tribes war never attained to the dignity of a science, and their encampments were consequently devoid of all the appliances of more systematic warfare. The description of the camp of the Israelites, on their march from Egypt (Num. ii., iii.), supplies the greatest amount of information on the subject: whatever else may be gleaned is from scattered hints. The Tabernacle, corresponding to the chieftain's tent of an ordinary encampment, was placed in the centre; and around and facing it (Num. ii. 1),^b arranged in four grand divisions, corresponding to the four points of the compass, lay the host of Israel, according to their standards (Num. i. 52, ii. 2). On the east the post of honour was assigned to the tribe of Judah, and round its standard rallied the tribes of Issachar and Zebulun, descendants of the sons of Leah. On the south lay Reuben and Simeon, the representatives of Leah, and the children of Gad, the son of her handmaid. Rachel's descendants were encamped on the western side of the Tabernacle, the chief place being assigned to the tribe of Ephraim. To this position of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, allusions are made in Judg. v. 14 and Ps. lxxx. 2. On the north were the tribes of Dan and Naphtali, the children of Bilhah, and the tribe of Asher, Gad's younger brother. All these were encamped around their standards, each according to the ensign of the house of his fathers. In the centre round the Tabernacle, and with no standard but the cloudy or fiery pillar which rested over it, were the tents of the priests and Levites. The former, with Moses and Aaron at their head, were encamped on the eastern side. On the south were the Kohathites, who had charge of the Ark, the table of shewbread, the altars and vessels of the sanctuary. The Gershonites were on the west, and when on the march carried the Tabernacle and its lighter furniture; while the Merarites, who were encamped on the north, had charge of its heavier appurtenances. The order of encampment was preserved on the march (Num. ii. 17), the signal for which was given by a blast of the two silver trumpets (Num. x. 5). The details of this

* Whence חֲנֻכָּה חַיִּים (chānōth hayyim), "the camping-time of day," i.e. the evening, Judg. xix. 9.

^b The form of the encampment was probably circular, and not square, as it is generally represented.

account supply Prof. Blunt with some striking illustrations of the undesigned coincidences of the Books of Moses (Undes. Coincid. pp. 75-86).

In this description of the order of the encampment no mention is made of sentinels, who, it is reasonable to suppose, were placed at the gates (Ex. xxiii. 26, 27) in the four quarters of the camp. This was evidently the case in the camp of the Levites (cp. 1 Ch. ix. 18, 24; 2 Ch. xxiii. 2).

The sanitary regulations of the camp of the Israelites were enacted for the twofold purpose of preserving the health of the vast multitude and the purity of the camp as the dwelling-place of God (Num. v. 3; Deut. xxiii. 14). With this object the dead were buried without the camp (Lev. x. 4, 5); lepers were excluded till their leprosy departed from them (Lev. xiii. 46, xiv. 3; Num. xii. 14, 15), as were all who were visited with loathsome diseases (Lev. xv. 3). All who were defiled by contact with the dead, whether these were slain in battle or not, were kept without the camp for seven days (Num. xxxi. 19). Captives taken in war were compelled to remain for a while outside (Num. xxxi. 19; Josh. vi. 23). The ashes from the sacrifices were poured out without the camp at an appointed place, whither all uncleanness was removed (Deut. xxiii. 10, 12), and where the entrails, skins, horns, &c., and all that was not offered in sacrifice, were burnt (Lev. iv. 11, 12; vi. 11; viii. 17).

The execution of criminals took place without the camp (Lev. xxiv. 14; Num. xv. 35, 36; Josh. vii. 24), as did the burning of the young bullock for the sin-offering (Lev. iv. 12). These circumstances combined explain Heb. xiii. 12, and John xix. 17, 20.

The encampment of the Israelites in the desert left its traces in their subsequent history. The Temple, so late as the time of Hezekiah, was still "the camp of Jehovah" (2 Ch. xxxi. 2; cp. Ps. lxxviii. 28); and the multitudes who flocked to David were "a great camp, like the camp of God" (1 Ch. xii. 22; R. V. "host" [twice]).

High ground appears to have been uniformly selected for the position of a camp, whether it were on a hill or mountain side, or in an inaccessible pass (Judg. vii. 18). So, in Judg. x. 17, the Ammonites encamped in Gilead, while Israel pitched in Mizpeh. The very names are significant. The camps of Saul and the Philistines were alternately in Gibeath, the "height" of Benjamin, and the pass of Michmash (1 Sam. xiii. 2, 3, 16, 23). When Goliath defied the host of Israel, the contending armies were encamped on hills on either side of the valley of Elah (1 Sam. xvii. 3); and in the fatal battle of Gilboa Saul's position on the mountain was stormed by the Philistines who had pitched in Shunem (1 Sam. xxviii. 4), on the other side of the valley of Jezreel. The carelessness of the Midianites in encamping in the plain exposed them to the night surprise by Gideon, and resulted in their consequent discomfiture (Judg. vi. 33; vii. 8, 12).

Another important consideration in fixing upon a position for a camp was the propinquity of water: hence it is found that in most instances camps were pitched near a spring or well (Judg. vii. 3; 1 Macc. ix. 33). The Israelites at Mount Gilboa pitched by the fountain in Jezreel (1 Sam. xxix. 1), while the Philistines encamped at Aphek, the name of which indicates the existence of a stream of water in the neighbourhood, which rendered it a favourite place of encampment (1 Sam. iv. 1; 1 K. xx. 26; 2 K. xiii. 17). In his pursuit of the Amalekites, David halted his men by the brook Besor, and there left a detachment with the camp furniture (1 Sam. xxx. 9). One of Joshua's decisive engagements with the nations of Canaan was fought at the waters of Merom, where he surprised the confederate camp (Josh. xi. 5, 7; cp. Judg. v. 19, 21). Gideon, before attacking the Midianites, encamped beside the well of Harod (Judg. vii. 1), and it was to draw water from the well at Bethlehem that David's three mighty men cut their way through the host of the Philistines (2 Sam. xxiii. 16).

The camp was surrounded by the מַעֲרָבָה, ma'-gáláh (1 Sam. xvii. 20), or מַעֲרָלָה, ma'gáil (1 Sam. xxvi. 5, 7), which some, and Thenius among them, explain as an earthwork thrown up round the encampment, others as the barrier formed by the baggage-waggons. The etymology of the word points merely to the circular shape of the enclosure formed by the tents of the soldiers pitched around their chief, whose spear marked his resting-place (1 Sam. xxvi. 5, 7), and it might with propriety be used in either of the above senses, according as the camp was fixed or temporary. We know that, in the case of a siege, the attacking army, if possible, surrounded the place attacked (1 Macc. xiii. 43), and drew about it a line of circumvallation (דַּיְעָה, dáyék, 2 K. xxv. 1), which was marked by a breastwork of earth (מַסְלָה, m'silláh, Is. lxii. 10; סוּלְלָה, sof'láh, Ezek. xxi. 27 [22]; cp. Job xix. 12), for the double purpose of preventing the escape of the besieged and of protecting the besiegers from their sallies.* But there was not so much need of a formal entrenchment, as but few instances occur in which engagements were fought in the camps themselves, and these only when the attack was made at night. Gideon's expedition against the Midianites took place in the early morning (Judg. vii. 19), the time selected by Saul for his attack upon Nahash (1 Sam. xi. 11), and by David for surprising the Amalekites (1 Sam. xxx. 17; cp. Judg. ix. 33). To guard against these night attacks, sentinels (שׂוֹמְרִים, shóm'rim) were posted (Judg. vii. 20; 1 Macc. xii. 27) round the camp, and the neglect of this precaution by Zebah and Zalmunna probably led to their capture by Gideon and the ultimate defeat of their army (Judg. vii. 19).

The valley which separated the hostile camps was generally selected as the fighting ground (שָׂדֵחַ, sádch, "the battle-field," 1 Sam. iv. 2, xiv. 15; 2 Sam. xviii. 6), upon which the contest was decided, and hence the valleys of Palestine have played so conspicuous a part in its history (Josh. viii. 13; Judg. vi. 33; 2 Sam. v. 22, viii. 13, &c.). When the fighting men went forth to the place of marshalling (מַעֲרָבָה, ma'árácáh,

* The Chaldee renders מַעֲרָלָה (1 Sam. xvii. 20) and דַּיְעָה (2 K. xxv. 1) by the same word, בְּרִיקוּם, or בְּרִיקוּמָא, the Greek χαράκιωμα.

1 Sam. xvii. 20), a detachment was left to protect the camp and baggage (1 Sam. xvii. 22, xxx. 24). The beasts of burden were probably tethered to the tent pegs (2 K. vii. 10; Zech. xiv. 15).

The מַחֲנֶה, machneh, or movable encampment, is distinguished from the מַצֵּב, matstsab, or מצֵּבֵי, n'sib (2 Sam. xxiii. 14; 1 Ch. xi. 16), which appear to have been standing camps, like those which Jehoshaphat established throughout Judah (2 Ch. xvii. 2), or advanced posts in an enemy's country (1 Sam. xiii. 17; 2 Sam. viii. 6), from which skirmishing parties made their predatory excursions and ravaged the crops. It was in resisting one of these expeditions that Shammah won himself a name among David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 12). Machneh is still further distinguished from מִבְצָר, mitsar, "a fortress" or "walled town" (Num. xiii. 19).

Camp left behind them a memorial in the name of the place where they were situated, as among ourselves (cp. Chester, Grantchester, &c.). Mahaneh-Dan (Judg. xiii. 25) was so called from the encampment of the Danites mentioned in Judg. xviii. 12. [MAHANAIM.] The more important camps at Gilgal (Josh. v. 10, ix. 6) and Shiloh (Josh. xviii. 9; Judg. xxi. 12, 19) left no such impress; the military traditions of these places were eclipsed by the greater splendour of the religious associations which surrounded them. [W. A. W.]

λατῆ); secret arts, from לָטַף, to cover; though others incorrectly connect it with לְהַט, a flame, or the glittering blade of a sword, as though it implied a sort of dazzling cheironomy which deceives spectators. Several Versions render the word by "whisperings," insurrations; but it seems to be a more general word, and hence is used of the various means (some of them no doubt of a quasi-scientific character) by which the Egyptian Chartummim (R. V. "magicians") imposed on the credulity of Pharaoh.

2. מַשְׁפָּטִים; pharmakelai, φάρμακα, LXX. (2 K. ix. 22; Mic. vi. 12; Nah. iii. 4); veneficia, maleficia, Vulg.; "malefice artes," "præstigie," "muttered spells." Hence it is sometimes rendered by ἐπαοιδᾶ, as in Is. xvii. 9, 12. The belief in the power of certain formulæ was universal in the ancient world. Thus there were carmina to evoke the tutelary gods out of a city (Macrobius Saturn. iii. 9), others to devote hostile armies (Id.), others to raise the dead (Maimon. de Idol. xi. 15; Senec. Oedip. 547), or bind the gods (θεσμοὶ θεῶν) and men (Aesch. Fur. 331), and even influence the heavenly bodies (Ov. Met. vii. 207 sq., xii. 263; "Te quoque Luna traho," Virg. Ecl. viii., Aen. iv. 489; Hor. Epod. v. 45). They were a recognised part of ancient medicine, even among the Jews, who regarded certain sentences of the Law as efficacious for healing. The Greeks used them as one of the five chief resources of pharmacy (Pind. Pyth. iii. 8, 9; Soph. Aj. 582), especially in obstetrics (Plat. Theact. p. 145) and mental diseases (Galen, de Sanitat. tuendâ, i. 8). Homer mentions them as used to check the flow of blood (Od. ix. 456), and Cato even gives a charm to cure a disjoined limb (de Re Rust. 160; cp. Plin. H. N. xviii. 2). The belief in charms is still all but universal in uncivilised nations: see Lane's M.d. Egypt. i. 300, 306, &c., ii. 177, &c.; Beeckman's Voyage to Borneo, ch. ii.; Meroller's Congo (in Pinkerton's Voyages, xvii. pp. 221, 273); Huc's China, i. 223, ii. 326; Taylor's New Zealand, and Livingstone's Africa, passim, &c.; and hundreds of such remedies still exist, and are considered efficacious among the uneducated.

3. לְהַטִּים, Eccles. x. 11; ψιδυρισμός, LXX., from לְהַטִּים. This word is especially used of the charming of serpents, Jer. viii. 17 (cp. Ps. lviii. 5; Eccles. xii. 13, Eccles. x. 11, Luc. ix. 891—a parallel to "cantando rumpitur anguis," and "Viperæas rumpo verbis et carmine fauces," Ov. Met. l. c.). Maimonides (de Idol. xi. 2) expressly defines an enchanter as one "who uses strange and meaningless words, by which he imposes on the folly of the credulous. They say, for instance, that if one utter the words before a serpent or scorpion it will do no harm" (Carpzov, Annot. in Godwinum, iv. 11). An account of the Marsi who excelled in this art is given by Augustin (ad Gen. ix. 28), and of the Psylli by Arnobius (ad Nat. ii. 32); and they are alluded to by a host of other authorities (Plin. vii. 2, xxviii. 6; Aelian, H. A. i. 57; Virg. Aen. vii. 740; Sil. Ital. viii. 495. They were called Ὀφιοδιδάκτρα). The secret is still understood in the East (Lane, ii. 106).

4. The word הַטִּים is used of the enchantments sought by Balaam, Num. xxiv. 1. It properly alludes to ophiomancy, but in this place has a general meaning of endeavouring to gain omens (εις συνάρτησιν τοῖς οἰωνοῖς, LXX.).

5. הַבִּיר is used for magic, Is. lviii. 9, 12. It comes from הַבִּיר, to bind (cp. καταδέω, βασκαίνω, bannen), and means generally the process of acquiring power over some distant object or person; but this word seems also to have been sometimes used specifically of serpent charmers, for Rashi on Deut. xviii. 11 defines the הַבִּיר to be one "who congregates serpents and scorpions into one place."

Any resort to these methods of imposture was strictly forbidden in Scripture (Lev. xix. 26; Is. lvii. 9, &c.), but to eradicate the tendency is almost impossible (2 K. xvii. 17; 2 Ch. xxiii. 6), and we find it still flourishing at the Christian era (Acts xiii. 6, 8, viii. 9, 11, γοητεία; Gal. v. 20; Rev. ix. 21). All kinds of magic are frequently alluded to in the Talmudic writings (see Berachoth, f. 53. 1, f. 62. 1; Pesachim, f. 110. 1, 2; Sotâh, f. 48. 1; Baba Bathra, f. 58. 1, and multitudes of other passages collected by Mr. Hershon in his Talmudic Miscellany, pp. 230-235).

The chief sacramenta daemoniaca were supposed to be a rod, a magic circle, dragon's eggs, certain herbs, or "insane roots," like the henbane, &c. The fancy of poets both ancient and modern has been exerted in giving lists of them (Ovid and Hor. ll. cc.; Shakspeare's Macbeth, Act iv. 1; Southey's Curse of Kehama, Cant. iv. &c.). [WITCHCRAFTS; AMULETS; DIVINATION.] [F. W. F.]

EN-DOR (עֲדוֹר = spring of Dor; Endor), a place which with its "daughter-towns" (תַּיָּוִט) was in the territory of Issachar, and yet possessed by Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11; LXX. om.). This was the case with five other places which lay partly in Asher, partly in Issachar, and seem to have formed a kind of district of their own called "the three, or the triple, Nepheth."

Endor was long held in memory by the Jewish people as connected with the great victory over Sisera and Jabin. Taanach, Megiddo, and the torrent Kishon all witnessed the discomfiture of the huge host, but it was emphatically to Endor that the tradition of the death of the two chiefs attached itself (Ps. lxxiii. 9, 10). Possibly it was some recollection of this, some fame of sanctity or good omen in Endor, which drew the unhappy Saul thither on the eve of his last engagement with the Philistines (1 Sam. xxviii. 7; B. Ἀελδάρ, Α. Νηυδάρ). Endor is not again mentioned in the Scriptures; but it was known to Eusebius, who describes it as a large village 4 miles S. of Tabor. Here to the north of Jebel Lúdy (the "Little Hermon" of travellers), and at the foot of the volcanic Tell el-Ajjúl, the name still lingers, attached to a considerable but now deserted village. The rock of the mountain, on the slope of which Endúr stands, is hollowed into caves, one of which may well have been the scene of the incantation of the witch (Van de Velde, ii. 383; Rob. ii. 360; Stanley, p. 345). There are a few rock-hewn tombs, and from one of the caverns issues a small spring. From the slopes of Gilboa to Endor is 7 or 8 miles, partly over difficult ground. [G.] [W.]

ENEAS. [ÆNEAS.]

EN-EGLAIM (עֲגַלַּיִם = spring of two leifers; Ἐνωγάλλειμα; Enyallion), a place named only by Ezekiel (xlvi. 10), apparently as on the Dead Sea; but whether near to or far from Egedi, on the west or east side of the Sea, it is impossible to ascertain from the text. In his comment on the passage, Jerome locates it at the embouchure of the Jordan; but this is not supported by other evidence. By some (e.g. Gesenius, Theo. p. 1019) it is thought to be identical with EGLAIM, but the two words are different, En-eglaim containing the Ain, which is rarely changed for any other aspirate. The LXX. B. by reading Βαῦθαλαὰμ (Josh. xv. 6) seems to identify BETH-HOGLAH with En-eglaim.

Tristram (Bib. Places, p. 93) identifies it with Beth-hoglah, Ain Hajlah; Riehm (HWB.) with Ain Feshkhah, both near the N. end of the Dead Sea. There is an Ain 'Ajjúl, "calf's spring," near Lake Háleh, in the northern portion of the Jordan valley, but this would appear to be too far from the Dead Sea. [G.] [W.]

ENEMES'SAR (Ἐνεμεσσάρ, Ἐνεμεσσαρῶς) is the name by which the well-known king Shalmaneser (IV.) of Assyria is designated in the book of Tobit (i. 2, 15, &c.). This book is not of any historical authority, being simply a work of imagination composed probably by an Alexandrian Jew between the years 300 and 150 B.C. The author of Tobit represents Enemessar as the king who carried the children of Israel into captivity (i. 2, 10) to Nineveh (where Tobit became purveyor to Enemessar), having followed closely the narrative of the Book of Kings (2 K. xvii. 3-6, xviii. 9-11), where it is related that Hoshea rebelled against Shalmaneser, who besieged Samaria and "carried Israel away unto Assyria." [ASSYRIA; SHALMANESER.] He likewise mentions Sennacherib not only as the successor, but also as the son of Enemessar (Tobit i. 15), and in this he has evidently followed his own interpretation of the Book of Kings. As we know from the Assyrian inscriptions, Sennacherib was the son of Sargon, the first king of a new Assyrian dynasty, and probably, therefore, wholly unrelated to Shalmaneser IV., so that Sennacherib cannot by any means be regarded as being descended from him. The form Enemessar for Shalmaneser is a corruption, being apparently put for Senemessar (sh changed to s and then to the light breathing, as in Arkeanos [Ἀρκέανος] for Sargon), t being dropped, and the m and n transposed. The Hebrew Shalmaneser is itself a corruption or shortening of the Assyrian Šulman-ášarid or Salmanu-ášarid. [T. G. P.]

ENE'NIUS (B. Ἐνήνιος; Ennianius), one of the leaders who returned with Zorobabel from the Captivity (1 Esd. v. 8). There is no name corresponding to it in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah. [F.]

EN'GADDI (B. ἐν αἰγιαλοῖς, Ἐν-Ἐργαδοῖς; in Cades), Ecclus. xxiv. 14. [ENGEDI.]

EN-GAN'NIM (עֲנַנִּים = spring of gardens). 1. A city in the low country of Judah, named between Zanoah and Tappuah (Josh. xv. 34). The LXX. in this place is so different from the Hebrew that the name is not recognisable. Vulg. Aen-Gannim. It is now probably Umm Jina, 3 miles N.W. of Zánú'a, Zanoah (PEF. Mem. iii. 42).

2. A city on the border of Issachar (Josh. xii. 21; B. Ἰεὼν καὶ Τομύδαν, Α. Ἡγαννίμ; En-Gannim); allotted with its "suburbs" to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 29; Πηγὴ γραμμύδραν; En-Gannim). These notices contain no indication of the position of En-gannim with reference to any known place, but there is great probability in the conjecture of Robinson (ii. 315) that it is identical with the Ginaia of Josephus (Ant. xx. 6, § 1), which again, there can be little doubt, survives in the modern Jenin, the first village encountered on the ascent from the great plain of Esdraelon into the hills of the central country. Jenin is still surrounded by the "orchards" or "gardens" which interpret its ancient name, and the "spring" is to this day the characteristic object in the place (Rob. ii. 315; Stanley, p. 349, note; Van de Velde, p. 359; PEF. Mem. ii. 44; Guérin, Samarie, i. 327). The position of Jenin is also in striking agreement with the requirements of Beth-hag-Gan (A. V. "the garden-house"; Βαθγάδ), in the direction of which Ahaziah fled from Jehu (2 K. ix. 27). The rough road of the ascent was probably too much for his chariot, and keeping the more level ground he made for Megiddo, where he died (see Stanley, p. 349).

In the lists of Levitical cities in 1 Ch. vi. ANEM is substituted for En-gannim. Possibly it is merely a contraction. [G.] [W.]

EN'GEDI (עֲגֵדִי = spring of the kid.)

The Arabic عين جدي preserves the same meaning; 'Eyyaddi and 'Eyyadda), the present 'Ain Jidy on the western shore of the Dead Sea. The old name appears to have been עֲגֵדִי הַמֶּלֶךְ. Hazazon Tamar (see Gen. xiv. 7; 2 Ch. xx. 2) In the latter passage (c. 16) the "ascent of Ziz" (זִיז) is also mentioned as near Engedi (perhaps we should read עֲגֵדִי). The old name is usually rendered "palm prunings," and Engedi was once famous for its palms, but the root also gives the word עֲגֵדִי, "gravel," and north of Engedi there is still an important valley called Hasāsa, وادي حصاص, "the valley of gravel." When first mentioned, this place was held by the Amorites. It appears under its name Engedi as a town of Judah "in the wilderness" (Josh. xv. 62). Eusebius (Onom. s. v. Gadda) supposes Hazar Gaddah (Josh. xv. 27) to be perhaps the same, but this is clearly inadmissible. The Samaritan Version

(Gen. xiv. 71) renders Hazazon Tamar עֲגֵדִי כָדִי, "the ravine of Cadi," probably for עֲגֵדִי (i.e. Engedi). In Ezekiel (xlvii. 10) it is mentioned apparently as near the shores of the Dead Sea. In the Song of Solomon (i. 14) the vineyards of Engedi are mentioned, and in Ecclesiasticus (xxiv. 14) the palms of Engedi. Pliny, speaking of the Essene hermits, says that they lived at Engadda, and notices groves of palms (H. N. v. 17). In the Talmud (Tal. Bab. Sabb. 26 a) the balm which was gathered between Engedi and Ramatha (perhaps Rāmeḥ, in the Ghor es Seis-abān, east of the Jordan, opposite Jericho) is noticed. The name is also found in Ptolemy (quoted by Reland, Pal. p. 462), and in Josephus (Antiq. ix. 1, § 2), but these authors add little to our information as to the site. Josephus places it 300 stadia (37½ Roman miles) from Jerusalem, the true distance being about 25 English miles. In later ages the place seems to have been little known. Jerome gives no clear account of its position, though he represents St. Paula looking from Caphar Barucha (now Beni N'aim) towards the balm gardens and vines of Engedi (Epit. Paulae xii.). From the site in question, on a hill overlooking the desert of Judah, south of Hebron, the vicinity of Engedi can be seen.

The desert of Engedi was the hiding-place of David (1 Sam. xxiv. 1-4), and the "rocks of the wild goats" are the cliffs round this site where the ibex is still found. The Crusading chronicles do not mention the place, but according to Ludolph of Suchen (Rey Colonies Franques, p. 250) the best vineyards in Palestine were here found in the 12th century, and the Templars took thence slips which they planted in Cyprus at Baffo. These vineyards seem to have existed in the 15th century, and, according to Hasselquist, even as late as 1739, A.D. There are neither palms nor vines at Engedi now, but the local Arabs believe that the Christians once had vineyards in this desert, which is no doubt a tradition of Crusading cultivation. The place is mentioned by Mejr ed Din in 1495 A.D., and by Seetzen in 1806. It seems to have been first visited and recovered by Robinson in 1838, and two years later by Lynch, since which time several travellers have visited the spot.

The site of Engedi presents some of the finest wild scenery west of the Dead Sea. [See the drawing under SEA, THE SALT.] The great valley (Wādy el-Ghār) here forms a deep gorge with precipitous sides, called Wādy el-'Araijeh ("valley of ascent"). The cliffs north of the spring present a sheer wall of rock nearly 2,000 feet high, above which is a barren plateau 660 feet above the Mediterranean; and from it, a little further north, rises a solitary peak (Ras esh Shukf, 1227 feet above same level). A very narrow winding descent, partly cut in the face of the cliff, leads down 1340 feet to the bank or undercliff, where the spring issues from under a great boulder. The water is sweet, and has been found at various times to be from 81° to 95° F., or less than the air temperature. A jungle of canes marks the line of the brook or cascade which flows down a deep descent to the Dead Sea—600 feet beneath. The 'Oshir tree (Calotropis procera) or apple of Sodom grows beside the water, and the Solanum or egg plant. The Sidr or Zizyphus, and the tamarisks (T. tenuifolius), with alkali plants (Hubeihib) and other desert shrubs, are also found, but the surrounding cliffs and slopes are very barren. There is a fine view of the Dead Sea and of the western cliffs, and on the east side of the lake the castle of Kerak is well seen. The hopping thrushes, black grackle, bulbul, and other birds of the Jordan valley here haunt the spring. There are traces of ruined terraces just below it, perhaps remains of the former vineyards, and a curious sort of platform of large rudely-shaped stones, measuring 15 ft. square and 3 ft. high. To the south is a ruined tower (Kur el-'Araijeh), apparently not very ancient, but perhaps of Crusading date: it was supplied by an aqueduct from the spring, and resembles the ruined mediæval sugar mills near Jericho. In the gorge are ancient rock-cut tombs or chambers, perhaps the hermitages of the Essenes, or of later Christian Eremites. There is another spring in this gorge. The salt brought from Jebel Udsun is carried up by the ascent, and the path may be very ancient, as it would appear that by it the Idumeans and their allies reached the plateau of the Judean desert when advancing to attack Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xx.). [C. R. C.]

ENGINE, a term exclusively applied to military affairs in the Bible. The Hebrew עֲגֵדִי (2 Ch. xxvi. 15) is its counterpart in etymological meaning, each referring to the ingenium (engine, from ingenium) displayed in the contrivance. The engines to which the term is applied in 2 Ch. were designed to propel various missiles from the walls of a besieged town: one, like the balista, was for stones, consisting probably of a strong spring and a tube to give the right direction to the stone; another, like the catapulta, for arrows, an enormous stationary bow. The invention of these is assigned to Uzziah's time—a statement which is supported both by the absence of such contrivances in the representations of Egyptian and Assyrian warfare, and by the traditional belief that the balista was invented in Syria (Pliny, vii. 56). Luther gives Brustuehren, i.e. "parapets," as the meaning of the term. Another war-engine, with which the Hebrews were acquainted, was the battering-ram, described in

Ezek. xvi. 9 as מַדְרֵי קַרְלָן, lit. a beating of that which is in front, hence a ram for striking walls; and still more precisely in Ezek. iv. 2, xxi. 22, as רָמ, a ram. The use of this instrument was well known both to the Egyptians (Wilkinson, i. 387 [1878]) and the Assyrians. The references in Ezekiel are to that used by the latter people, consisting of a high and stoutly built framework on four wheels, covered in at the sides in order to protect the men moving it, and armed with one or two pointed weapons. Their appearance was very different from that of the Roman aries with which the Jews afterwards became acquainted (Joseph. B. J. iii. 7, § 19). No notice is taken of the testudo or the vinca (cp. Ezek. xxvi. 9, Vulg.); but it is not improbable that the Hebrews were acquainted with them (cp. Wilkinson, i. 387 [1878]). The A. V. marginal rendering engines of shot (Jer. vi. 6, xxxii. 24; Ezek. xvi. 8) is incorrect. [W. L. B.]

ENGRAVER. The term עֹרֵךְ, so translated in the A. V., applies broadly to any artificer, whether in wood, stone, or metal: to restrict it to the engraver in Ex. xxxv. 35, xxxviii. 23, is improper (R. V. marg. craftsman): a similar latitude must be given to the term חַרְטָן, which expresses the operation of the artificer: in Zech. iii. 9, ordinary stone-cutting is evidently intended. The specific description of an engraver was חַרְטָן עֹרֵךְ (Ex. xxviii. 11), and his chief business was cutting names or devices on rings and seals; the only notices of engraving are in connexion with the high-priest's dress—the two corn-stones, the twelve jewels, and the mitre-plate having inscriptions on them (Ex. xxviii. 11, 21, 36). The previous notices of signets (Gen. xxxviii. 18, xli. 42) imply engraving. The art was widely spread throughout the nations of antiquity, particularly among the Egyptians (Diod. i. 78; Wilkinson, ii. 337 [1878]), the Ethiopians (Her. vii. 69), and the Indians (Von Bohlen, Indien, ii. 122). [W. L. B.]

EN-HAD'DAH (עֵין הַדָּדָה) = sharp or swift (עֵין [Genes.]; B. Αἰματόκ, A. Hwad'dā; Enhad'da), one of the cities on the border of Issachar named next to En-gannim (Josh. xix. 21). Van de Velde (i. 315) would identify it with 'Ain Haud on the western side of Carmel, and about 2 miles only from the sea. But this is surely out of the limits of the tribe of Issachar, and rather in Asher or Manasseh. Conder, with more probability, has suggested (PEF. Mem. ii. 45) Kefr Adán, near Jenin, En-gannim. See other suggestions in Dillmann³ in loco. [G.] [W.]

EN-HAK-KORE, A. V. En-hakkore (עֵין הַקּוֹרֵה) = the spring of the crier; πηγή τοῦ ἐνυκαλουμένου; fons invocantis), the spring which burst out in answer to the "cry" of Samson after his exploit with the jawbone (Judg. xv. 19). The name involves a play on the word in v. 18, yikera (יָקַרְהוּ), A. V. "he called"). The word maktesh, which in the story denotes the "hollow place" (literally, the "mortar") in the jaw, and also that for the "jaw" itself, lechi, are both names of places. The spring was in LEHI, in the territory of Judah, and apparently at a higher level than the rock ETAM (Judg. xv. 9-19); but the position of neither of these places has yet been identified. Aquila and Symmachus translate Lehi by Σαγών, and Josephus knew the place by the same name (Ant. v. 8, §§ 8, 9). Glycas (Ann. ii. 164) states that, in his time, the spring was shown at Eleutheropolis under the name πηγή Σαγώνος. The spring is alluded to by Jerome (Ep. S. Paulae, 18), and it is mentioned as being at Eleutheropolis by Antoninus Martyr (p. 32). The spring intended by these writers is apparently the Btr Umni Jude'a, at Beit Jibrin, Eleutheropolis. Conder connects Κη. es-Siagh, E. of 'Ain Shems, with Σαγών, and En-hakkore with 'Ayun Kára, N.W. of Zoreah (Tent Work, i. 277). Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 343) endeavours to identify Lechi with Tell el-Lekiyeh, 4 miles N. of Beersheba, and En-hakkore with the large spring between the Tell and Khuweilfeh. But Samson's adventures appear to have been confined to a narrow circle, and there is no ground for extending them to a distance of some 30 miles from Gaza, which Lekiyeh is, even in a straight line. A more probable position is in the neighbourhood of Wady Úrtás, and 'Ain Atán, ETAM (2), near Bethlehem. [ETAM, THE ROCK.] [G.] [W.]

EN-HA'ZOR (עֵין הַצּוֹר) = spring of the village; πηγή Ἀσόρ; Enhasor), one of the "fenced cities" in the inheritance of Naphtali, distinct from Hazor, named between Edrei and Iron, and apparently not far from Kedesh (Josh. xix. 37). Renan, Mission de Phénicie, identifies it with Kh. Hazireh, where there is a remarkable tomb called Hazzár. Conder (PEF. Mem. i. 204, 223, 239) follows Renan. Guérin (Gallée, ii. 118) raises the objection that there is no spring at Hazireh, to represent the En of Enhasor, but does not suggest any other identification. [G.] [W.]

EN-MISHPAT (עֵין מִשְׁפָּט) = fountain of judgment; ἡ πηγή τῆς κρίσεως; fons Misphat), Gen. xiv. 7. [KADESH.]

ENOCH, and once HE'NOCH (הֵנוֹךְ = dedication: Philo, de Post. Caini, § 11, ἀρμυνησεν τὴν Ἐνὸχ χάρις σου; Ἐνὸχ; Joseph. Ἀνωχος: Henoch). 1. The eldest son of Cain (Gen. i. 17), who called the city which he built after his name (v. 18). Ewald (Gesch. i. 356, note) fancies that there is a reference to the Phrygian Iconium, in which city a legend of one Ἄννακος was preserved; but the legend is evidently derived from Biblical and Jewish accounts of the father of Methuselah (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἰκόνιον, Suid. s. v. Νάννακος), and owes much of its existence to the similarity of name (Riehm, HWB. s. n. "Henoch"). Other places have been identified with the site of Enoch, but with little probability; e.g. Anuchta in Susiana, the Heniochi in the Caucasus, &c. (see Dillmann, Delitzsch [1887] in loco).

2. The son of Jared (יָרֵד = a descent, cp. Jordna), and father of Methuselah (מֵתוּשֶׁלַח = a man of arms; Philo, l. c. § 12, Μαθουσαλεμ ἐξαποστολή θανάτου; Gen. v. 21 sq.; Luke iii. 28). In the Epistle of Jude (v. 14, cp. Enoch ix. 8) he is described as "the seventh from Adam;" and the number is probably noticed as conveying the idea of divine completion and rest (cp. August. c. Faust. xii. 14), while Enoch was himself a type of perfected humanity, "a man raised to heaven by pleasing God, while angels fell to earth by transgression" (Iren. iv. 16, 2). The other numbers connected with his history appear too symmetrical to be without meaning. He was born when Jared was 162 (9×6×3) years old, and after the birth of his eldest son in his 65th (5×6+7) year he lived 300 years. From the period of 365 years assigned to his life, Ewald (i. 356), with very little probability, regards him as "the god of the new year," but the number may have been not without influence on the later traditions which assigned to Enoch the discovery of the science of astronomy (ἄστρολογία, Eupolemus ap. Euseb. Præp. Ev. ix. 17, where he is identified with Atlas). After the birth of Methuselah it is said (Gen. v. 22-24) that Enoch "walked with God three hundred years . . . and he was not; for God took him" (מֵתוּשֶׁלַח, μετέθηκεν, LXX. [here only]; tulit, Vulg.). The phrase "walked with God"

(הֵנוֹךְ הָלַךְ אֵת יְהוָה) is elsewhere only used of Noah (Gen. vi. 9; cp. Gen. xvii. 1, &c.), and is to be explained of a prophetic life spent in immediate converse with the spiritual world (Enoch xii. 2, "All his action was with the holy ones, and with the watchers during his life"). There is no further mention of Enoch in the O. T., but in Ecclesiasticus (xlix. 14) he is brought forward as one of the peculiar glories (οὐδὲ εἰς ἐκτίσθη οἶος Ἐ.) of the Jews, for he was taken up (ἀνελήφθη, A. μετετέθη) from the earth. "He pleased the Lord and was translated [into Paradise, Vulg.], being a pattern of repentance" (Ecclus. xlv. 14). In the Epistle to the Hebrews the spring and issue of Enoch's life are clearly marked. "By faith Enoch was translated (μετετέθη, translatus est, Vulg.) that he should not see death . . . for before his translation (μεταθέσται) he hath had witness borne to him that he had been well-pleasing to God" (xi. 5, R. V.; cp. Riehm, l. c.). The contrast to this Divine judgment is found in the constrained words of Josephus: "Enoch departed to the Deity (ἀνεχώρησε πρὸς τὸ θεῖον), whence [the sacred writers] have not recorded his death" (Ant. i. 3, § 4). A further contrast is sometimes drawn between the translation of Enoch and the apotheosis of a Hercules, a Ganymede, &c. (see Riehm, l. c.). It is more interesting to refer to the Chaldaean tradition of the apotheosis of Xisuthros, the tenth of the antediluvian Patriarchs (see Smith's Chaldaean Genesis, pp. 42-6). The comparative sobriety of the Biblical narrative will be, in all these cases, apparent.

The Biblical notices of Enoch were a fruitful source of speculation in later times (for Talmudical views, see Hamburger, RE. "Henochsage"). Some theologians disputed with subtlety as to the place to which he was removed; whether it was to Paradise or to the immediate Presence of God (cp. Feuardentius ad Iren. v. 5), though others more wisely declined to discuss the question (Thilo, Cod. Apoc. N. T., p. 758). On other points there was greater unanimity. Both the Latin and Greek Fathers commonly coupled Enoch and Elijah as historic witnesses to the possibility of a resurrection of the body and of a true human existence in glory (Iren. iv. 5, 1; Tertull. de Resurr. Carn. 58; Hieron. c. Jcan. Hierosol. §§ 29, 32, pp. 437, 440); and the voice of early ecclesiastical tradition is almost unanimous in regarding them as "the two witnesses" (Rev. xi. 3 sq.) who should fall before "the beast," and afterwards be raised to heaven before the great judgment (Hippol. Frag. in Dan. xxii.; de Antichr. xliiii. Cosmas Indic. p. 75, ap. Thilo, κατὰ τὴν ἐκκλησιαστικὴν παράδοσιν; Tertull. de Anima, 29; Ambros. in Psalm. xlv. 4; Evang. Nicod. c. xxv. on which Thilo has almost exhausted the question: Cod. Apoc. N. T. pp. 765 sq.). This belief removed a serious difficulty which was supposed to attach to their translation; for thus it was made clear that they would at last discharge the common debt of a sinful humanity, from which they were not exempted by their glorious removal from the earth (Tertull. de Anima, l. c.; August. Op. imp. c. Jul. vi. 30).

In later times Enoch was celebrated as the inventor of writing, arithmetic, and astronomy (Euseb. Præp. Ev. ix. 17. Cp. Schürer, Gesch. d. Jüd. Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi,² ii. p. 627). He is said to have filled 300 books with the revelations which he received, and is commonly identified with Idris (i.e. the learned), who is commemorated in the Koran (ch. 19) as one "exalted [by God] to a high place" (cp. Sale, l. c.; Hottinger, Hist. Orient. pp. 30 sq.). But these traditions were probably due to the apocryphal book which bears his name (cp. Fabric. Cod. Pseudep. V. T. i. 215 sq.).

Some writers (e.g. Ewald), arguing from the meaning of the name ("dedicator" or "beginner") and the length of his life (365 years), have considered Enoch a sun-god, a good spirit to whom men would appeal to bless any fresh undertaking. Baethgen (Beiträge z. Semit. Religionsgeschichte, pp. 152-3) has well shown the untrustworthiness of such conjectures.

Some (Buttm. Mythol. i. 176 sq.; Ewald, l. c.) have found a trace of the history of Enoch in the Phrygian legend of Annaeus (Ἄννακος, Névaokos), who was distinguished for his piety, lived 300 years, and predicted the deluge of Deucalion. [ENOCH, 1.] In the A. V. of 1 Ch. i. 3, the name is given as HENOKH.

3. The third son of Midian, the son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 4, A. V. and R. V. Hanooh; 1 Ch. i. 33, A. V. Henoch, R. V. Hanoeh).

4. The eldest son of Reuben (A. V. and R. V. Hanooh; Gen. xlv. 9; Ex. vi. 14; 1 Ch. v. 3), from whom came "the family of the Hanochites" (Num. xxvi. 5).

5. In 2 Esd. vi. 49, 51, Enoch stands in the Latin (and Eng.) Version for Behemoth in the Aethiopic. [B. F. W.] [F.]

ENOCH, THE BOOK OF, is one of the most important remains of that early apocalyptic literature of which the Book of Daniel is the great prototype. From its vigorous style and wide range of speculation the book is well worthy of the attention which it received in the first ages, and recent investigations have still left many points for further inquiry.

1. History.—The history of the book is remarkable. The first trace of its existence is generally found in the Epistle of St. Jude (œ. 14, 15; cp. Enoch i. 9), but the words of the Apostle leave it uncertain whether he derived his quotation from tradition (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. 420) or from writing (ἔκροφίτρευον . . . Ἐνὸχ λέγων), though the wide spread of the book in the second century seems almost decisive in favour of the latter supposition. It appears to have been known to Justin (Apol. ii. 5), Irenæus (Adv. Hæc. iv. 16, 2), and Anatolius (Euseb. H. E. vii. 32). Clement of Alexandria (Eclor. p. 801) and Origen (yet cp. c. Cels. v. 52). The patristic references are collected by Schürer, ii. 628) both make use of it, and numerous references occur to the "writing," "books," and "words" of Enoch, the Book of Jubilees, and in the Testament of the XII. Patriarchs, which present more or less resemblance to passages in the present book (Fabr. Cod. Pseudep. V. T. i. 161 sq.; Gfrörer, Prop. Pseudep. 273 sq.; Schurer, ii. 627). Tertullian (De Cult. Fem. i. 3; cp. De Idol. 4) expressly quotes the book as one which was "not received by some, nor admitted into the Jewish canon" (in armarium Judaicum), but defends it on account of its reference to Christ (legimus omnia scripturam adificationi habilem divinitus inspirari). Augustine (De Civ. xv. 23, 4) and an anonymous writer whose work is printed with Jerome's (Brev. in Psalm. cxxxii. 2; cp. Hil. ad Psalm. l. c.) were both acquainted with it; but from their time till the revival of letters it was known in the Western Church only by the quotation in St. Jude (Dillmann, Eisd. lvi.). In the Eastern Church it was known some centuries later. Considerable fragments are preserved in the Chronographia (ed. Dindorf, i. 20-3, 42-7) of Georgius Syncellus (c. 792 A.D.), and these, with the scanty notices of earlier writers, constituted the sole remains of the book known in Europe till the close of the last century. Meanwhile, however, a report was current that the entire book was preserved in Abyssinia; and at length, in 1773, Bruce brought with him on his return from Egypt three MSS., containing the complete

Aethiopic translation. Notwithstanding the interest which the discovery excited, the first detailed notice of this translation was only given by Silvestre de Sacy in 1800, and it was not published till the edition of Archbishop Lawrence in 1838 (Libri Enoch versio Aethiopica . . . Oxon.). But in the interval Lawrence published an English translation, with an introduction and notes, which passed through three editions (The Book of Enoch, &c. by R. Lawrence. Oxford, 1821, 1833, 1838). The translation of Lawrence formed the basis of the German edition of Hofmann (Das Buch Henoch, Jena, 1833-38); and Gfrörer, in 1840, gave a Latin translation constructed from the translations of Lawrence and Hofmann (Prophetæ veteres Pseudepigraphi, Stuttgart, 1840). All these editions were superseded by those of Dillmann, who edited the Aethiopic text from five MSS. (Liber Henoch, Aethiopice, Lipsiae, 1851), and afterwards gave a German translation of the book, with a good introduction and commentary (Das Buch Henoch, . . . von Dr. A. Dillmann, Leipzig, 1853). The discovery of a small Greek fragment (ch. 89, 42-9) in the Vatican, published by Mai in facsimile (Patrum nova Biblioth. ii.), and deciphered by Gildemeister (ZDMG. for 1855, pp. 621-4), led to the hope that more might be found, but this hope has been disappointed (cp. Merx, Archiv, ii. 243). In 1882 an English translation from the original Ethiopic, with introduction and notes, was published by Dr. Schodde. The work of Dillmann gave a fresh impulse to the study of the book (cp. also his article on the subject in Herzog, *RE.*³). Among the essays which were called out by it, the most important were those of Ewald (Ueber des Aethiopischen Buches Henoch Entstehung, &c., Göttingen, 1856) and Hilgenfeld (D. Jüdische Apokalyptik, Jena, 1857). The older literature on the subject is reviewed by Fabricius (Cod. Pseudep. V. T. i. 199 sq.).

2. Original Language.—The Aethiopic translation was made from the Greek, and it was probably made about the same time as the translation of the Bible, with which it was afterwards connected, or, in other words, towards the middle or close of the fourth century. The general coincidence of the translation with the patristic quotations of corresponding passages shows satisfactorily that the text from which it was derived was the same as that current in the early Church, though one considerable passage quoted by Georg. Syncell. is wanting in the present book (Dillm. p. 85). But it is still uncertain whether the Greek text was the original (Volkmar in ZDMG. 1860, p. 131; Philippi, Das Buch Henoch, p. 126, 1868), or itself a translation. One of the earliest references to the book occurs in the Hebrew Book of Jubilees (Dillm. in Ewald's Jahrb. 1850, p. 90), and the names of the Angels and winds are derived from Aramaic roots (cp. Dillm. pp. 236 sq.). In addition to this a Hebrew book of Enoch was known and used by Jewish writers till the thirteenth century (Dillm. Eisd. lvii.), so that on these grounds, among others, many (J. Scaliger, Lawrence, Hoffmann, Dillmann, and Schürer, who refers especially to Halévy, Journ. Asiat. 1867, pp. 352-95) have considered it very probable that the book was first composed in Hebrew (Aramaean). In such a case no stress can be laid upon the Hebraizing style, which may be found as well in an author as in a translator; and in the absence of direct evidence it is difficult to weigh mere conjectures. On the one hand, if the book had been originally written in Hebrew, it might seem likely that it would have been more used by Rabbinical teachers; but, on the other hand, the writer certainly appears to have been a native of Palestine,* and therefore likely to have employed the popular dialect. If the hypothesis of a Hebrew original be accepted, which as a hypothesis seems to be the more plausible, the history of the original and the version finds a good parallel in that of the Wisdom of Sirach. [ECCLESIASTICUS.]

3. Contents.—In its present shape the book consists of a series of revelations supposed to have been given to Enoch and Noah, which extend to the most varied aspects of nature and life, and are designed to offer a comprehensive vindication of the action of Providence. [ENOCII.] It is divided into five parts. The first part (chs. 1-36, Dillm.), after a general introduction, contains an account of the fall of the angels (Gen. vi. 1) and of the judgment to come upon them and upon the giants, their offspring (chs. 6-16); and this is followed by the description of the journey of Enoch through the earth and lower heaven in company with an Angel, who showed to him many of the great mysteries of nature, the treasure-houses of the storms and winds, the fires of heaven, the prison of the fallen, and the land of the blessed (chs. 17-36). The second part (chs. 37-71) is styled "a vision of wisdom," and consists of three "parables," in which Enoch relates the revelations of the higher secrets of heaven and of the spiritual world which were given to him. The first parable (chs. 38-44) gives chiefly a picture of the future blessings and manifestation of the righteous, with further details as to the heavenly bodies: the second (chs. 45-57) describes in splendid imagery the coming of Messiah and the results which it should work among "the elect" and the gainsayers: the third (chs. 58-69) draws out at further length the blessedness of "the elect and holy," and the confusion and wretchedness of the sinful rulers of the world. The third part (chs. 72-82) is styled "the book of the course of the lights of heaven," and deals with the motions of the sun and moon, and the changes of the seasons; and with this the narrative of the journey of Enoch closes. The fourth part (chs. 83-91) is not distinguished by any special name, but contains the record of a dream which was granted to Enoch in his youth, in which he saw the history of the kingdoms of God and of the world up to the final establishment of the throne of Messiah. The fifth part (chs. 92-105) contains the last addresses of Enoch to his children, in which the teaching of the former chapters is made the groundwork of earnest exhortation. The signs which attended the birth of Noah are next noticed (chs. 106-7); and another short "writing of Enoch" (ch. 108), forms the close to the whole book (cp. Dillm. Einkl. i. sq.; Lücke, Versuch einer vollständ. Einl. &c., i. 93 sq.; Schodde, pp. 17-19; Schürer, ii. 617-9).

4. Integrity and Date.—If a certain general unity marks the book in its present form, yet internal coincidence shows clearly that different fragments are incorporated into the work, and some additions have been probably made afterwards. Different "books" are mentioned in early times, and variations in style and language are discernible in the present book. The belief, once prevalent, that the work is the work of one man written at one time, is entirely given up by modern critics (Schürer, ii. 620). To distinguish the original elements and later interpolations is the great problem which so many have set themselves to solve. Hofmann, Weisse, and Philippi place the composition of the whole work after the Christian era; the first and the last think that St. Jude could not have quoted an apocryphal book (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, i. 420 sq.), and Weisse seeks to detach Christianity altogether from a Jewish foundation (Weisse, Evangelienfrage, p. 214 sq.). It seems to be now generally acknowledged that the second part (chs. 37-71) was the work of one compiler, whose date is variously placed in Christian times (Hilgenfeld and Volkmar agreeing here with Hofmann, Weisse, and Philippi) or in pre-Christian (the date ranging from B.C. 144-64; see Schürer, ii. 621). The rest or groundwork of the whole (chs. 1-36, 72-108) is with great unanimity (Volkmar excepted) placed in the second century B.C. Thus Ewald places the composition of the groundwork of the book at various intervals between 144 B.C. and c. 120 B.C., and supposes that the whole assumed its present form in the first half of the century before Christ. Lücke (2nd ed.) distinguishes two great parts, an older part including chs. 1-36 and chs. 72-105, which he dates from the beginning of the Maccabaean struggle, and a later, chs. 37-71, which he assigns to the period of the rise of Herod the Great (B.C. 141). He supposes, however, that later interpolations were made without attempting to ascertain their date. Dillmann upholds more decidedly the unity of the book, and assigns the chief part of it to an Aramaean writer of the time of John Hyrcanus (c. 110 B.C.). To this, according to him, "historical" and "Noachian additions" were made, probably in Greek translation (Einkl. lii). Köstlin (quoted by Hilgenfeld, p. 96, &c.) assigns chs. 1-16, 21-36, 72-105, to about 110 B.C.; chs. 37-71 to c. B.C. 100-64; and the "Noachian additions" and ch. 108 to the time of Herod the Great. Hilgenfeld himself places the original book (chs. 1-16; 20-36; 72-90; 91, 1-19; 93; 94-105) about the beginning of the first century before Christ (a. a. O. p. 145, n.). This book he supposes to have passed through the hands of a Christian writer who lived between the times "of Saturninus and Marcion" (p. 181), who added the chief remaining portions, including the great Messianic section, chs. 37-71. In the face of these conflicting theories (see them and others collected in Schodde, pp. 20-6) it is evidently impossible to dogmatize, and the evidence is insufficient for conclusive reasoning. The interpretation of the Apocalyptic histories

* The astronomical calculations by which Lawrence endeavoured to fix the locality of the writer in the neighbourhood of the Caspian are inconclusive. Cp. Dillmann, p. 11.

(chs. 56, 57 ; 85-90), on which the chief stress is laid for fixing the date of the book, involves necessarily minute criticism of details, which belongs rather to a commentary than to a general introduction. Some inconsiderable interpolations have been made, and large fragments of a much earlier date were undoubtedly incorporated into the work ; but as a whole, a work thus gradually created may be regarded as describing an important phase of Jewish opinion shortly before the coming of Christ.^b

5. Doctrine.—In doctrine the book of Enoch exhibits a great advance of thought within the limits of revelation in each of the great divisions of knowledge. The teaching on nature is a curious attempt to reduce the scattered images of the O. T. to a physical system. The view of society and man, of the temporary triumph and final discomfiture of the oppressors of God's people, carries out into elaborate detail the pregnant images of Daniel. The figure of the Messiah is invested with majestic dignity as "the Son of God" (ch. 105, 2 only), "Whose Name was named before the sun was made" (ch. 48, 3), and Who existed "aforetime in the Presence of God" (ch. 62, 6 ; cp. Lawrence, Prel. Diss. li. f.). And at the same time His human attributes as "the son of man," "the son of woman" (ch. 62, 5 only), "the elect one," "the righteous one," "the anointed," are brought into conspicuous notice. The mysteries of the spiritual world, the connexion of Angels and men, the classes and ministries of the hosts of heaven, the power of Satan (ch. 40, 7 ; ch. 65, 6), and the legions of darkness, the doctrines of resurrection, retribution, and eternal punishment (ch. 22 ; cp. Dillm. p. xix.), are dwelt upon with growing earnestness as the horizon of speculation was extended by intercourse with Greece. But the message of the book is emphatically one of "faith and truth" (cp. Dillm. p. 32) ; and while the writer combines and repeats the thoughts of Scripture, he adds no new element to the teaching of the Prophets. His errors spring from an undisciplined attempt to explain their words, and from a proud exultation in present success. For the great characteristic by which the book is distinguished from the later apocalypse of Ezra [ESDRAS, 2ND BOOK] is the tone of triumphant expectation by which it is pervaded. It seems to repeat in every form the great principle that the world, natural, moral, and spiritual, is under the immediate government of God. Hence it follows that there is a terrible retribution reserved for sinners, and a glorious kingdom prepared for the righteous, and Messiah is regarded as the Divine Mediator of this double issue (chs. 50, 91). Nor is it without a striking fitness that a patriarch translated from earth, and admitted to look upon the Divine Majesty, is chosen as the "herald of wisdom, righteousness, and judgment to a people who, even in suffering, saw in their tyrants only the victims of a coming vengeance."

6. Reception.—Notwithstanding the quotation in St. Jude, and the wide circulation of the book itself, the apocalypse of Enoch was uniformly and distinctly separated from the canonical Scriptures. Tertullian alone maintained its authority (l. c.), while he admitted that it was not received by the Jews. Origen, on the other hand (c. Cels. v. p. 267, ed. Spenc.), and Augustine (de Civ. xv. 23, 4), definitively mark it as apocryphal, and it is reckoned among the apocryphal books in the Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 16), and in the catalogues of the Synopsis S. Scripturæ, Nicephorus (Credner, Zur Gesch. d. Kan. p. 145), and Montfaucon (Bibl. Coislin. p. 193).

7. Literature.—The literature of the subject is very voluminous. The English edition of Schodde places within the reach of the student the most important materials for the study of the book ; and notices of all the important works which have been published since the first edition of this Dictionary will be found in his book, in Schürer, ii. 629-30, and in Zäckler, in Strack u. Zäckler's Kgf. Komm. zu d. heil. Schriften A. u. N. T., 'Die Apokryphen des A. T.'s nebst einem Anhang üb. die Pseud-epigraphenliteratur,' p. 430. [B. F. W.] [F.]

ENON. [ÆNON.]

ENOS (עֲנוֹשׁ) = man as weak, not etymologically but in accordance with usage, see MV.¹¹ ; 'Ewós ; Enos, son of Seth the son of Adam (Gen. iv. 26). Kenan was his firstborn (Gen. v. 9). His length of life is given as 905 years. The R. V. gives the name under the form Enosh in the O. T. refl. (see also 1 Ch. i. 1), but reads Enos in Luke iii. 38. [F.]

ENOSH (A. V. and R. V. in 1 Ch. i. 1). [ENOS.]

EN-RIM'MON (עֵינַן רִמְמון) = fountain of pomegranates ; B. omits, A. ἐν Ρεμμών ; et in Rimmon, one of the places which the men of Judah re-inhabited after their return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 29). From the towns in company with which it is mentioned, it seems very probable that the name is the same which in the earlier Books is given in the Hebrew and A. V. in the separate form of "Ain and Rimmon" (Josh. xv. 32 ; see Dillmann in loco), "Ain, Remmon" (xix. 7 ; and see 1 Ch. iv. 32), but in the LXX. combined, as in Nehemiah [AIN, 2]. Van de Velde (Mem. p. 344) identifies it with Umm er-Rumámin between Beit Jibrin and Bir es-Sé'a. See also PEF. Mem. iii. 392, 398. [G.] [W.]

EN-ROGEL (עֵינַן רֹגֵל) = fountain of the fuller, πηγή Ρωγίλ ; Fons Rogel, a spring which formed one of the landmarks on the boundary-line between Judah (Josh. xv. 7) and Benjamin (xviii. 16). It was the point next to Jerusalem, and at a lower level, as is evident from the use of the words "ascended" and "descended" in these two passages. Here, apparently concealed

^b Schürer's examination of chs. 85-90, as the only passage which is helpful in fixing a date of composition, leads him to agree as to points of interpretation (e.g. the shepherds = Angels) and exposition of the numbers with Hofmann, Ewald, and Dillmann ; and he assigns as the date the third quarter of the second century B.C. Further, he concludes that chs. 37-71 are of Christian origin, the "Noachian sections" and chs. 104-5 being interpolations whose date cannot be fixed (ii. 671-7).

from the view of the city, Jonathan and Ahimaz remained, after the flight of David, awaiting intelligence from within the walls (2 Sam. xvii. 17), and here, "by the stone Zohemoth, which is close to (זוהמות) En-rogel," Adonijah held the feast, which was the first and last act of his attempt on the crown (1 K. i. 9). These are all the occurrences of the name in the Bible. By Josephus on the last incident (Ant. vii. 14, § 4) its situation is given as "without the city, in the royal garden," and it is without doubt referred to by him in the same connexion, in his description of the earthquake which accompanied the sacrifice of Uzziah (Ant. ix. 10, § 4), and which "at the place called Eroge" ^a shook down a part of the eastern hill, "so as to obstruct the roads, and the royal gardens."

In the Targum, and the Arabic and Syriac Versions, the name is commonly given as "the spring of the fuller" (קטר, קטר), and this is generally accepted as the signification of the Hebrew name—Rogel being derived from רגל in the sense of "to tread," in allusion to the practice of the Orientals in washing linen.

En-rogel has been identified with (a) the present "Fountain of the Virgin," 'Ain Umm ed-Deraj = spring of the mother of steps—the perennial source from which the Pool of Siloam is supplied; and (b) with Bir Eyûb, the "well of Job," 125 ft. deep, below the junction of the valleys of Kedron and Hinnom, and south of the Pool of Siloam. The arguments in favour of the "Fountain of the Virgin" are briefly as follows:—

1. The "Fountain of the Virgin" is the only real spring close to Jerusalem. Bir Eyûb is a well, not a spring (En); and, except after heavy rain, the water in it is generally 70 ft. or 80 ft. below the level of the ground. Thus, if the former be not En-rogel, the single spring of this locality has escaped mention in the Bible.

2. Exactly opposite the "Fountain of the Virgin," and only separated from it by the breadth of the valley, there is a rude flight of rock-hewn steps which leads, up the precipitous face of a ledge of rock, directly to the village of Siloam. This place, called by the villagers ez-Zehweileh, a name identical with Zohemoth, is supposed by M. Clermont-Ganneau (PEFQy. Stat. 1869-70, p. 253) to mark the position of "the stone Zohemoth which is close to En-rogel." [ZOELETH.]

3. The "Fountain of the Virgin" must always have been a well-known spring, and as such a suitable landmark on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin. The date of Bir Eyûb is unknown; it is very possibly later than the time of Joshua.

4. Bir Eyûb does not suit the requirements of 2 Sam. xvii. 17. It is too far off both from the city and from the direct road over Olivet to the Jordan; and is in full view of the city, which the other spot is not.

5. The martyrdom of St. James was effected by casting him down from the Temple wall into the valley of Kedron, where he was finally killed by a fuller with his washing-stick. The natural inference is that St. James fell near where the fullers were at work.^b Now Bir Eyûb is too far off from the site of the Temple to allow of this, but it might very well have happened at the Fountain of the Virgin (see Stanley's Sermons on the Apost. Age, pp. 333-4).

6. Deraj and Rogel are both from the same root, and therefore the modern name may be derived from the ancient one, even though at present it is taken to allude to the "steps" by which the reservoir of the Fountain is reached.

Add to these considerations (what will have more significance when the permanence of Eastern habits is recollected)—7. That the Fountain of the Virgin is still the great resort of the women of Jerusalem for washing and treading their clothes: and also—8. That the king's gardens must have been above Bir Eyûb and below the Fountain of the Virgin, which thus might be used without difficulty to irrigate them. A reminiscence of these gardens perhaps lingers in the name Wady Fer'aun, "Pharaoh's valley," equivalent to "valley of the king," which the fellahin of Siloam apply to the section of the Kedron valley between the S.E. angle of the Haram wall and the junction of the Kedron and Hinnom valleys.

The tradition that Bir Eyûb is En-rogel is apparently first recorded by Brocardus. In an early Jewish Itinerary (Uri of Biel in Hottinger's Cippi Hebraici) the name is given as "Well of Joab," as if retaining the memory of Joab's connexion with Adonijah—a name which it still retains in the traditions of the Greek Christians. The chief arguments in its favour are, that being below the junction of the two valleys its situation agrees better with the common boundary of Judah and Benjamin than the "Fountain of the Virgin," but see above (3); and that in the Arabic version of Josh. xv. 7, 'Ain Eyûb, or "Spring of Job," is given for En-rogel. Neither of these arguments is of much weight.

For descriptions of the "Fountain of the Virgin" and Bir Eyûb, see Robinson, i. 331-334; Williams, Holy City, ii. 489-495; Notes to O. S. of Jerusalem, p. 84; and PEF. Mem., "Jerusalem," pp. 365-375. [JERUSALEM.] [G.] [W.]

EN-SHE'MESH (עֵשֶׁת־שֶׁמֶשׁ) = spring of the sun; ἡ πηγή τοῦ ἡλίου, πηγή Βαυθαμαῦς; En-semes, id est, Fons Solis), a spring which formed one of the landmarks on the north boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 7) and the south boundary of Benjamin (xviii. 17). From these notices it appears to have been between the "ascent of Adummin"—the road leading up from the Jordan valley south of the Wady Kelt—and the spring of En-rogel, in the valley of Kedron. It was therefore east of Jerusalem and of the Mount of Olives. The only spring at present answering to this position is the 'Ain Haud—the "Well of the Apostles,"—about a mile below Bethany, the traveller's first halting-place on the road to Jericho. Accordingly this spring is generally identified with En-Shemesh (see

^b So Jerome, Quaest. Heb. on 2 Sam. xvii. 20: "Ancilla quasi, lavandi gratia, cum pannis ad fontem Rogel lerat."

Dillmann on Josh. xv. 7). The aspect of 'Ain Hand is such that the rays of the sun are on it the whole day. This is not inappropriate in a fountain dedicated to that luminary (PEF. Mem. iii. 42). [G.] [W.]

ENSIGN (D); in the A. V. generally "ensign," sometimes "standard;" עֲנִיָּן, "standard," with the exception of Cant. ii. 4, "banner;" עֲנִיָּן, "ensign"). The distinction between these three Hebrew terms is sufficiently marked by their respective uses: nes is a signal; degel a military standard for a large division of an army; and oth, the same for a small one. Neither of these latter words, however, expresses the idea which "standard" conveys to our minds, viz. a flag; the standards in use among the Hebrews probably resembled those of the Egyptians (see below). (1.) The notices of the nes or "en-inferred from Is. xxxiii. 23 and Ezek. xxvii. 7, that it was a flag; we do not observe a flag depicted either in Egyptian or Assyrian representations of vessels (cp. Wilkinson, ii. 127 [1878]; Bonomi, pp. 168, 167); but, in lieu of a flag, certain devices, such as the phoenix, flowers, &c., were embroidered on the sail; whence it appears that the device itself, and perhaps also the sail bearing the device, was the nes or "ensign." It may have been sometimes the name of a leader, as implied in the title which Moses gave to his altar, "Jehovah-nissi" (Ex. xvii. 15). It may also have been, as Michaelis (Suppl. p. 1648) suggests, a blazing torch. The important point, however, to be observed is, that the nes was an occasional signal, and not a military standard, and that elevation and conspicuity are implied in the use of the term: hence it is appropriately applied to the "pole" on which the brazen serpent hung (Num. xxi. 8), which was indeed an "ensign" of deliverance to the pious Israelite; and again to the censers of Korah and his company, which became a "sign" or beacon of warning to Israel (Num. xvi. 38). (2.) The term degel is used to describe the standards which were given to each of the four divisions of the Israelite army at the time of the Exodus (Num. i. 52, ii. 2 sq., x. 14 sq.). Some doubt indeed exists as to its meaning in these passages, the LXX. and Vulgate regarding it not as the standard itself, but as a certain military division annexed to a standard, just as vexillum is sometimes used for a body of soldiers (Tac. Hist. i. 70; Liv. viii. 8). The sense of compact and martial array does certainly seem to lurk in the word; for in Cant. vi. 4, 10, the brilliant glances of the bride's eyes are compared to the destructive advance of a well-arranged host, and a similar comparison is employed in reference to the bridegroom (Cant. v. 10); but on the other hand, in Cant. ii. 4, no other sense than that of a "banner" will suit, and we therefore think the rendering in the A. V. and R. V. correct. In Ps. xx. 5 most scholars accept the term "banners" (see Delitzsch, Perowne, and Schultz in loco). A standard implies, of course, a standard-bearer; but the supposed reference to that officer in Is. x. 18 (A. V. and R. V. text) is probably incorrect, the words meaning rather as when a sick man pineth away (R. V. marg. Cp. Delitzsch,⁴ Dillmann⁵ in loco); similarly, in a somewhat parallel passage (Is. lix. 19) the marg. translation of R. V., the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard, is not now so generally adopted as that of the text. The character of the Hebrew military standards is quite a matter of conjecture; they probably resembled the Egyptian, which consisted of a sacred emblem, such as an animal, a boat, or the king's name (Wilkinson, i. 342-3 [1878]). Rabbinical writers state the devices to have been as follows: for the tribe of Judah, a lion; for Reuben, a man; for Ephraim, an ox; and for Dan, an eagle (Carpzov. Crit. App. p. 667); but no reliance can be placed on this. As each of the four divisions, consisting of three tribes, had its standard, so had each tribe its "sign" (oth) or "ensign," probably in imitation of the Egyptians, among whom not only each battalion, but even each company, had its particular ensign (Wilkinson, l. c.). We know nothing of its nature. The word occurs figura-sign" are most frequent; it consisted of some well-understood signal which was exhibited on the top of a pole from a bare mountain top (Is. xiii. 2, xviii. 3)—the very emblem of conspicuous isolation (Is. xxx. 17). Around it the inhabitants mustered, whether for the purpose of meeting an enemy (Is. v. 26, xviii. 3, xxxi. 9), which was sometimes notified by the blast of a trumpet (Jer. iv. 21, li. 27); or as a token of rescue (Ps. lx. 4; Is. xi. 10; Jer. iv. 6); or for a public proclamation (Jer. l. 2); or simply as a gathering point (Is. xlix. 22, lrii. 10). What the nature of the signal was, we have no means of stating; it has been tively in Ps. lxxiv. 4, as some think in reference to the images of idol gods (but see Comm. in loco). [W. L. B.] [F.]

ENSUE (Fr. ensuire, Lat. inseguor) = to follow after (1 Pet. iii. 11, A. V. The R. V. has "pursue." Cp. Ps. xxxiv. 14, Prayer Book version). [F.]

EN-TANNIM. [DRAGON WELL.]

EN-TAP-PU'AH (תַּפּוּחַיִם = spring of apple or citron; B. πηγή Θαφθάθ, A. הַ גְּחַיִם תַּפּוּחַיִם, B^{ab}mg. Naḥṭh; Fons Taphuae). The boundary of Manasseh went from facing Shechem "to the inhabitants of En-tappuah" (Josh. xvii. 7). It is probably identical with Tappuah, the position of which will be elsewhere examined. [TAPPUAH.] Conder (Ib. to Bible, p. 263) identifies it, with some probability, with a spring near Yásuf, S. of Náblus, Shechem, and at the head of a branch of the "brook Kanah," Wady Kánah, which is the next point mentioned on the boundary. Guérin (Samarie, i. 259) would place it at Ain el-Faráh, N.E. of Náblus, but this is too far from W. Kánah. [G.] [W.]

ENTRANCE TO HAMATH. [HAMATH.]

EPÆNETUS (Ἐπαίνετος; Epaenetus, Vulg. Clem., but earlier spelling varies considerably), a name meaning "praiseworthy." He is mentioned immediately after Prisca and Aquila in Rom. xvi. 5. He is described (R. V.) as "the firstfruits of Asia unto Christ." The A. V. gives "Achaia" for "Asia." This is undoubtedly an error, as the reading "Asia" has much better documentary support, and the position of firstfruits of Achaia is elsewhere (1 Cor. xvi. 15) assigned to other persons; namely, the household of Stephanas. Asia is the province of which Ephesus was the capital (ASIA); and Epænetus was probably an Ephesian converted by Prisca and Aquila after they were left there by St. Paul (Acts xviii. 19). When they departed to Rome (implied in Rom. xvi. 3), Epænetus may very naturally have accompanied them. [E. R. B.]

EPAPHRAS (Ἐραφῆρας; Epaphras), a Colossian (Col. iv. 12), who was with St. Paul at the time of his writing his Epistle to that Church. He had probably been the principal instrument in the foundation of the Churches of the Lycus—viz., Colossae, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, which had not as yet seen St. Paul's face in the flesh (Col. ii. 1). Epaphras felt responsible for their spiritual welfare (Col. iv. 13), and it is probable that his uneasiness about the heresy which had shown itself in Colossae was the cause of his visit to St. Paul, and the occasion of the Epistle being written. St. Paul implicitly contrasts the teaching which the Colossians had originally received from Epaphras with the speculations now rife among them (Col. i. 7 and ii. 6, 7). The position of Epaphras is much cleared by the reading adopted in the R. V. (ἡμῶν for ὑμῶν). He is described by St. Paul as "a faithful minister of Christ on our behalf" (see Lightfoot on Col. i. 7, note). The Apostle regards him as his delegate in the ministry of Christ to the Colossians. As Epaphroditus represented the Philippians in his ministry to the Apostle's personal needs, so conversely Epaphras represented the Apostle in his ministry to the spiritual needs of the Colossians. As we find Epaphras sending greeting in Col. iv. 12, we may conclude that he did not return when the letter was despatched. The expression "my fellow-captive" applied to him in Phil. v. 23 may possibly give the reason for this; viz that he had in some way become involved in St. Paul's lot of imprisonment. But more probably he was voluntarily sharing it. The objection taken to this sense of the Greek word, συναϊχμάλωτος (Lightfoot on Col. iv. 10, note), may be met by regarding it as a continuation of the metaphor implied in "fellow-soldier" (συνστρατιώτης). They were engaged in warfare for Christ, and therefore their captivity was that of prisoners of war. [E. R. B.]

EPAPHRODITUS (Ἐπαφρόδιτος; Epa-phroditus). The name is a common one, and means "attractive" or "charming." He is described by St. Paul as "my brother and fellow-worker and fellow-soldier, and your messenger and minister to my need." He had come to St. Paul in his captivity at Rome as the bearer of gifts from the Philippians (Phil. iv. 18). He had remained with him, both to do him personal service and also to help him in "the work of Christ" (Phil. ii. 30). His exertions in both ways had led to or aggravated a dangerous illness. He had risked his life to do all that his brethren at Philippi would have desired to be done for St. Paul on their behalf. Now his affectionate nature was distressed on account of the anxiety which his friends at Philippi were feeling at the news of his illness. He desired to return, and St. Paul was desirous to send him. With his usual delicacy and sympathy, he represents the mission of Epaphroditus as being for his pleasure because it was for theirs ("that I may be the less sorrowful," Phil. ii. 28). On the title "messenger" (ἀπόστολος) applied to Epaphroditus, see art. APOSTLE. Epaphroditus was almost certainly the bearer of the Epistle to the Philippians (see Lightfoot² on Philippians, p. 36), and may possibly be intended by the expression "true yokefellow" (Phil. iv. 3). Although Epaphras is merely a shortened form of Epaphroditus, yet the longer form of the name is always used of the Philippian delegate and the shorter of the Colossian teacher. The identity of the two is most improbable (see Lightfoot² on Philip., p. 60, note). [E. R. B.]

EPENETUS (Rom. xvi. 5). [EPÆNETUS.]

EPHAH (עֵפָה; A. Γεφάρ, DE. Γαιφάρ [Gen.]; B. Γαφάρ, A. Γαιφάρ [1 Ch.]; Epha), placed first in order among the sons of Midian (Gen. xiv. 4; 1 Ch. i. 33), and connected by Isaiah (lx. 6, 7) with the Midianites, the Keturahite Sheba, and the Ishmaelites, both in the position of their settlements and in their wandering habits; but no satisfactory identification of the tribe has been discovered. The Arabic word عَفَافَة (Gheyyfeh), which has been supposed to be the same as Ephah, is the name of a village near Cairo; but this is far from the Midianite settlements, and the tradition that Ephah settled in Africa does not rest on sufficient authority. [MIDIAN; SHEBA.] Fried.

Delitzsch (Wo lag das Paradies? p. 304) and Schrader (*K.A.T.*² pp. 146 sq., 613) compare it with the cuneiform Hajapa, a North Arabian tribe, and Halévy believes that ΠΕΨΩ as a personal name is to be read in the Safa inscriptions (see Dillmann² on Gen. i. c.). [E. S. P.] [F.]

ΕΡΦΑΗ (ΠΕΨΩ; B. Γαφαήλ παλλακή, A. Γαφά ή παλλ.; Epha). I. Concubine of Caleb, in the line of Judah (1 Ch. ii. 46).

2. B.A. Γαφά. Son of Jahdai; also in the line of Judah (1 Ch. ii. 47).

EPHAIH. [MEASURES.]

ΕΡΦΑΙ (following the Acrit, ΨΩ; but the original text is ΨΩ = ΟΡΦΑΙ; and so LXX. B. Ἰσφιθε, Ν. ὀφέτ; Orph), a Netophathite, whose sons were among the "captains (ἡγεμόνες) of the forces" left in Judah after the deportation to Babylon (Jer. xl. 8). They submitted themselves to Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor, and were apparently massacred with him by Ishmael (xli. 3, cp. xl. 13). [W. A. W.] [F.]

ΕΡΦΕΡ (ἘΦΨ; Ἄφερ [Gen.], Ὀφέρ [1 Ch.]; Opher, Epher), named second in order among the sons of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4, 1 Ch. i. 33), but not mentioned in the Bible except in these genealogical passages. His settlements have not been identified with certainty. According to Gesenius, the name is equivalent to the Arabic Ghifr, ḡif, signifying "the young of the cow" [probably meaning the bovine antelope called the wild cow], and "a small beast or creeping thing or an insect" (Lane, Ar. Lex. s. v.). Two tribes bear a similar appellation, Ghifār

(ḡifār); but since one was a branch of the first Amalek, the other of the Ishmaelite Kināneh (cp. Caussin de Perceval, Essai sur l'Hist. des Arabes, i. 20, 297, 298; and Abuifeidae Hist. Antisiamica, ed. Fleischer, p. 196), we can only identify one of them with the Biblical Epher by assuming a confusion to have arisen in respect to these nearly related tribes. The first settled about Yethrib (Medīna); the second, in the neighbourhood of Mekka. Delitzsch [1887] and Dillmann² (on Gen. i. c.) adopt Wetzstein's view that the name corresponds with 'Ofir, a place between the Tihāma range and Abān, from which that district of Arabia acquired the name of the Nagd of 'Ofr. [E. S. P.] [F.]

ΕΡΦΕΡ (ἘΦΨ, a calf; B. Ἄφερ, A. Γαφάερ; Epher).

1. A son of Ezra, among the descendants of Judah; possibly, though this is not clear, of the family of the great Caleb (1 Ch. iv. 17).

2. Ὀφέρ. One of the heads of the families of Manasseh on the east of Jordan (1 Ch. v. 24). [G.] [W.]

ΕΡΦΕΣ-ΔΑΜΜΙΜ (ἘΦΨ ΔΑΜ; Ἐφερμέν, B. μμ, A. Ἀφροδομένην; in finibus Damim), a place between Socoh and Azekah, at which the Philistines were encamped before the affray in which Goliath was killed (1 Sam. xvii. 1). The meaning of the word is uncertain, but it is generally explained as the "end" or "boundary of blood," in that case probably derived from its being the scene of frequent sanguinary encounters between Israel and the Philistines. According to Neubauer, Géogr. du Talmud, p. 158, the term Maaleh Adumim is applied to Ephes-dammim in the Talmud. Under the shorter form of PAB-DAMMIM it occurs once again in a similar connexion (1 Ch. xi. 13). For the situation of the place, see ELAH, VALLEY OF. [G.] [W.]

EPHE'SIAN (Ἐφεσίος; Ephesius), an inhabitant of Ephesus. In the singular it is applied to TROPHIMUS (Acts xxi. 29), and in the plural to the people of Ephesus (Acts xix. 28, 34, 35). [F.]

§ 1. TITLE.

The title (with amplifications) πρὸς Ἐφεσίους is attested by all extant MSS. and Versions. But Marcion, and possibly others in his train ("haeretic," Tertull. c. Marc. v. 11), adopted the title "ad Laodiceos." Tertullian's statement to this effect is confirmed by Epiphanius (Haer. 42, vol. i. p. 811, Migne), who makes Marcion quote Ephes. iv. 5, 6, from his "Epistle to the Laodiceans." It is true that in a previous passage (p. 708), when enumerating the Epistles in Marcion's canon, he includes, as well as Ephesians, καὶ τῆς πρὸς Λαοδ. λεγομένης ἐπιστολῆς. But in the face of the quotation just mentioned, and of Tertullian's plain statement, this must be set down to a confusion on the part of Epiphanius similar to that noticed by Bp. Lightfoot (Col. p. 292) in the Muratorian Canon. To Marcion, then, the title was "ad Laodiceos." But there is no evidence (Bleek, Eintl. § 169, notwithstanding) that this was due to anything but a critical conjecture on Marcion's part. Tertullian's language, moreover, is positive proof that the usual title of our Epistle was given to it on grounds independent of the disputed reading. He accuses Marcion of tampering with the title, not with the words, of the Epistle, "titulum ei aliquando interpolare gestit, quasi et in isto diligentissimus explorator" (ibid. 17). The suggestion of Davidson, Alford, &c., that "titulus" may include the greeting of the Epistle, is linguistically admissible, but far from likely. Tertullian makes no allusion to the words in dispute, and therefore cannot have read them.

§ 2. CIRCUMSTANCES, PURPOSE, AND STRUCTURE.

(a.) For what readers?—The decision depends upon the following considerations, which call for a more extended discussion than is possible here. We state results only.

(a) The genuineness of ἐν Ἐφέσῳ (i. 1). The evidence (collected by Tischendorf) goes to show that from the first the Epistle was circulated both with these words and without them, but that in either case (supra, § 1) it was known as an Epistle to the Ephesians.

(B) The connexion of the Epistle with Ephesus may accordingly be regarded as certain, independently of the reading of ch. i. 1. The readers are moreover

(γ) Gentiles (i. 13; contrast v. 12; ii. 1, 11-13, 19; iii. 1; v. 8), and a definite group of persons (i. 15; vi. 21).

But (δ) the Epistle was not intended for Ephesus only. This follows from the fact that St. Paul is personally unknown to at any rate the mass of his readers (i. 15, cp. iv. 21, iii. 2, 3). Now the Apostle's labours at Ephesus, though fruitful of result outside the city (1 Cor. xvi. 9; Acts xix. 10, 26), had been carried on entirely in Ephesus itself (Acts xx. 18, τὸν πᾶντα χροῖον); he had not visited even the Lycus valley (Col. ii. 1).

(e) It is therefore as impossible to limit the range of the letter to Ephesus as it is to exclude Ephesus from it altogether. That the Epistle was primarily addressed to Laodicea (greeted through Colossae, Col. iv. 15), or that it was purely catholic in its destination (see supra, γ), cannot be maintained. That it was addressed merely to the Gentile element in the Asiatic churches (Milligan in Encycl. Brit.) is an approximation to the view regarded by the writer of this article as probable: but this view postulates an explanation of τοῖς ὄντιν in i. 1 which will not commend itself to all, and overlooks St. Paul's frequent custom of addressing a Church or Churches of mixed origin as if purely Gentile (Rom. i. 13, xi. 13 sqq., and contrast 1 Thess. i. 9 with Acts xvii. 3, 4).

(f) The Epistle then was probably (1) addressed to Ephesus, but intended by St. Paul* to circulate^b among "the churches of Asia," and (2) identical with the letter ἐκ Λαοδικίας of Col. iv. 16. The latter identification is based on the verse just cited, combined with the close relation of our Epistle to Colossians (see below), and the identity of the bearer, Tychicus. The identification of our Epistle with that "from Laodicea" is of course denied by those who

* The omission of ἐν Ἐφέσῳ would thus correspond in purpose to that of ἐν Ῥώμῃ (Rom. I. 7) in G, g (Cod. Börn.), an omission possibly (see article ROMANS, and Lightfoot in Journ. of Phil. 1870) indicative of a circulation of that Epistle (in a form abridged by the omission of xv., xvi.) as an encyclical letter.

^b The "circular" destination of the Epistle has been maintained, with numerous modifications and subsidiary hypotheses, by a host of scholars from Beza, Usher, and Bengel onwards, including Hug, Neander, Rückert, Credner, Harless, Anger, Olshausen, Klostermann, Sabatier, Reuss, Ellcock, Holtzmann ("for choice," Eint. p. 286), Weiss (Herzog, RE. Suppl. i. 481, &c.), Wold. Schmidt (in Herzog, RE. xi. 373, and in 6th ed. of Meyer). Schenkel (Christusbild der Apost. 1879, p. 88) was a convert to it, while Bishop Lightfoot, who had promised a full discussion of the two kindred questions in his long-looked-for Introduction to Ephesians, meanwhile expressed his belief that educated opinion is tending, however slowly, in this direction. (See also his remark, Ign. i. ii. p. 63, that the Ephesians were "the chief, though probably not the sole, recipients" of the Epistle.)

maintain its exclusively Ephesian destination (see supra, δ), and by those who reject its authenticity while maintaining the genuineness and integrity of the Epistle to the Colossians (Davidson; Renan, St. Paul, xii.; Ewald, S. S. p. 157; and Von Soden substantially). Others, however, rejecting Ephesians entirely and Colossians wholly or in part, see in Col. iv. 16 a reference to our Epistle (Baur, Paulus, ii. 47; Volkmar, Apoc. 67; Hitzig; Hausrath, Ap. Paulus; Holtzmann, Krit., passim, and Eint. p. 294). The great mass of those critics who accept both Epistles as genuine and regard Ephesians as in any sense a circular letter take the same view (Anger, Ueber den Laod.-brief, 1843; Reuss, Hist. N. T. §§ 119, 120, in Eng. tr.; and especially Lightfoot, Col. p. 274 sq., where the question is discussed in all its bearings and with full references to the literature of the subject). The objections (restated by Weiss, Eint. p. 262) turning on the difficulties as to the method of circulation and the movements of Tychicus are not generally regarded as very serious.

(b.) Place and Date of Composition.—The Epistle was written at the same time as those to Colossians and Philemon, and carried by Tychicus (vi. 21), who, with Onesimus the bearer of the letter to Philemon (Philem. r. 13), was also charged with the delivery of that to Colossae (Col. iv. 7). St. Paul was a prisoner at the time (Ephes. iii. 1, iv. 1, vi. 20; Philem. r. 10); this fixes us to the alternative^c of either his two years' imprisonment at Caesarea (Acts xxiii. 37, xxiv. 27), or his two years' imprisonment at Rome (Acts xxviii. 30). The former has been contended for by some modern scholars, but is certainly to be rejected^d [COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE]. The silence of St. Paul as to the earthquake which reduced Laodicea, as well as Hierapolis and Colossae according to Eusebius, to ruins in Nero's reign, is explained by the fact that the disaster had taken place at least two years previously (A.D. 60) if we follow Tacitus (Ann. xiv. 27), or else did not take place till at least a year later (A.D. 64, Eus. Chron.).

Taking Rome then as the place of writing, the date depends (1) on the date of St. Paul's arrival there [see FESTUS; PAUL]; (2) on the order of the Epistles written from Rome (see Lightfoot, Phil. Introd., and articles COLOSSIANS and PHILIPPIANS). Assuming St. Paul to have reached Rome in the beginning of A.D. 61, and the Philippians to be the first of his Roman Epistles, our group would come at the very end (Philem. v. 22) of the Œberla (Acts xxviii. 31), i.e. at the beginning of the year 63.

(c.) Occasion.—St. Paul when he wrote had reason to hope for a speedy release, and intended to visit Asia at once upon regaining his liberty (Philem. v. 22). But, in addition to the possibility of his former disappointment (Philip. ii. 24) being repeated, there were strong motives for his writing, and that without delay. (1) The rapid growth of Gentile Christianity in proconsular Asia and for some time been filling him with eager and increasing anxiety (Col. ii. 1 and Ephes. throughout) for the healthy growth, and settlement in the one true Israel of God (Gal. vi. 16; Ephes. ii. 12), of the converts from the un-circumcision. From Epaphras (Col. i. 7, iv. 12), who evidently entered into all that he felt, he heard of their love and faith, their difficulties with the Jewish element in the Church (Ephes. ii. 11, and iv. 3?), and longed to impart to them (as he had done to the original Gentile Church of Antioch years before, Acts xi. 26) the special χάρισμα (Rom. i. 11, 13 b) of his apostleship (Gal. ii. 7, 8; Rom. xi. 13). (2) An equally strong and even more urgently pressing motive was the state of things in the Lycus valley [see COLOSSIANS]. It would seem indeed almost probable that the (3) return of Onesimus to his master at this particular time was suggested by the opportunity of the mission of Tychicus, rather than the converse: the desirability of sending him with all possible promptitude (Philem. vv. 14, 15) would at any rate make the opportunity thus offered one to be seized. [PHILEMON.]

^c St. Paul's other imprisonments (2 Cor. vi. 5, xi. 23; cp. Acts xvi. 23) cannot have been of the duration implied in the language of these Epistles (Col. iv. 18). The "second" and final imprisonment is of course not to be thought of (contrast 2 Tim. iv. 6 with Philem. v. 22).

^d See Lightfoot, Coloss. p. 37 sq., and on the other side Weiss, Eint. p. 260; Reuss, Hist. N. T. Script., Eng. Tr. p. 106.

It would appear (see below, § 3 e) that St. Paul at first contemplated, in addition to the private letter to Philemon, a single letter to the Churches of Asia, embodying his anxiety for the spiritual growth of the Gentile Christians; for their progressive realisation of their position in the commonwealth of Christ's Body, of all that that position meant, and of its claims upon their practical life. But upon the arrival of Epaphras with the news from Colossae, it became impossible to meet the special requirements of that Church and neighbourhood with an epistle fitted for the widely-spread communities of proconsular Asia. The Epistle ultimately took shape in two forms: * a special letter for the Colossians, and a general letter which the Apostle finally addressed to Ephesus, the metropolis in the faith (Acts xix. 10, 26) of the entire province. The relative priority of the two Epistles is on this view unimportant: while it is psychologically more natural for the general idea to precede its special application, it is quite in harmony with this that, when the time for writing came, the more special letter was written first. The question cannot be decided, however, upon such a priori grounds: nor is the relation between the Epistles to the Galatians and Romans an exact parallel. Bp. Lightfoot, numbering Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, 1, 2, and 3 respectively in this group, evidently regards Ephesians as written last.

(d.) Main Purpose and leading Ideas.—The Epistle as finally drafted carries out the aim indicated above. Its object is accordingly "much more definite than it is often thought to be . . . These views [of Meyer, Schenkel, Alford, Harless, Gloag, Lightfoot] may be all partially correct, but they are not enough. In this very setting forth of the greatness of the Church, in this description of her life, in this presenting of her to us in all the ideal glory of her state as united to her Lord, the Apostle has a farther and immediately practical aim—to show us that this ideal glory contemplated from the first the union of both Jews and Gentiles in equal enjoyment of the privileges of God's covenant, and that to the completeness of the body of Christ the latter are as necessary as the former, and that it is only when both are together in Christ that His fulcra is realised and manifested" (Milligan, Encyc. Brit. p. 462; the whole section should be consulted). The Epistle is in fact the Gospel of the Gentiles, St. Paul's own Gospel in its positive expression. For his Apostleship of the Gentiles to be μη εἰς κενόν (Gal. ii. 2, and see Philip. ii. 16), it was not enough to have vindicated their rights against Judaising demands: they must realise and justify their position as fellow-citizens of the saints (Ephes. ii. 19), as living branches of the sacred olive-tree (Rom. xi. 17), of the ancient and renovated (Ephes. iv. 13, 24; v. 25, 26) congregation of God, into which, in consummation of God's eternal purpose (iii. 5, 11, &c.), they had been at length engrafted. This central purpose of the Epistle is (1) immediately suggested by its general character and by the Gentile origin of its readers (supra, § 2, a γ), and (2) brought out with irresistible clearness by an examination of its structure (infra, e).

Reserving for the present a general discussion of the theological contents of the Epistle and its relation to St. Paul's other writings (§ 3), we will now point out how its central purpose is worked out. St. Paul traces the calling of the Gentiles to the eternal (i. 4) counsel of God, now at last in the fulness of time made known to all His creatures (i. 9, 10; iii. 9–11), to sum up all things once again in Christ (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι, i. 10: so Bengel; Schenkel, Christusbild; Weiss, B. T.; the sense of ἀνα- is marked by Tertull. Monog. 5, "ad initium reciprocare;" Pesh., Vulg., Goth.). This again carries us back to the original cosmic mediation of the Son, a principle presupposed in all St. Paul's teaching (1 Cor. viii. 6: cp. Weiss, B. T. § 79, c; and Lightfoot, Col. p. 116), and brought out prominently in the companion Epistle (Col. i. 16), but in our Epistle tacitly taken for granted. The unity of all in Christ, involved both in His original relation to creation and in the corresponding eternal purpose of God to sum up again (cp. ἀποκαταλλάσσειν, Col. i. 20, 21) all things in Him, is as a matter of fact in abeyance. The reason of this, the great problem of the later Gnostics, St. Paul does not discuss: but sin is here, as in the earlier Epistles (Rom. i. 21; viii. 20), assumed as the cause (Ephes. ii. 1), while an original personal source of the cosmic discord (ii. 2, vi. 12) is pointed to. In relation to man, this severance or estrangement has come (1) between man and his Creator (v. 18; cp. Col. i. 21), involving the former in darkness (v. 8), death, and the wrath of God (ii. 3–5, iv. 22); and (2) between Jews and Gentiles, as a wall of division

* Baur, Ewald, Holtzmann, and others have pointed it out, but their perception of the truth has been embarrassed by assumptions as to date and authorship, and consequently the doctrinal perspective of the whole has been missed. Especially, too much has been made of the "conciliatory" (iv. 3) purpose of the letter, supposed to be exemplified in the language applied to the Jews (ii. 12, Baur), to the older Apostles (ἀγιοι, iii. 5), and to the author of the Apocalypse (ἀπόβηται, Holtzmann!), and even in the use made of 1 Peter (Weiss).

* So Weizsäcker. Ap. Zeitalter, p. 565 (rejecting both Epistles). "The two were probably composed, not successively but simultaneously."

(ii. 14) and a state of hostility (ib. 15, 16). In relation to this latter point, the case has a two-fold aspect, only to be understood in relation to the respective functions of Covenant and Law as laid down in St. Paul's older Epistles (cp. Gal. iii. 6-29; Rom. iii. 1, 2, 9, &c. The paradox is expressed Rom. xi. 28; cp. Rom. iii. 20). On the one hand, the "commonwealth of Israel" (Ephes. ii. 12) was founded by God (Gal. iii. 16; Rom. iv. 13) as a first step in the reconciliation of man to his Creator. Israel was united to God by a covenant, and enjoyed the privilege of hope, on the ground of Divine promises (Ephes. ii. 12). Moreover, this πολιτεία was to endure for ever (Rom. iii. 3, xi. 29). It was as Abraham's seed that the "many nations" (Rom. iv. 13, 17) were to be called: the Gentiles were in God's good time (Ephes. i. 10) to take their place within "the Israel of God" (Gal. vi. 16). The removal of the μερόστοιχοι τοῦ φαραμοῦ, visibly embodied in the ordinances (ii. 15; cp. v. 11) which sharply severed Jew from Gentile, was not to destroy the "household of God," but to bring within its bounds those who had previously been excluded. The continuity of the Church thus lies at the very root of St. Paul's conception of it (cp. Pfeleiderer, Paulinism, ii. 40 sq.). But, on the other hand, the Israelite stood in no less need of redemption than the Gentile: "We were by nature children of wrath as well as the rest" (ii. 3). The "ordinances" set an ἔχθρα not only between them and the rest of mankind, but between them and God (cp. Rom. iv. 15; Col. ii. 14). They that were "near," not less than they that were "afar off," needed "peace" and "access to the Father" (Ephes. ii. 17, 18). Both in being reunited to God were reunited to one another (cp. Rom. iii. 30) by the death of Christ (Ephes. i. 7; ii. 16). It follows from this that, great as were the privileges of the πολιτεία τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, they were provisional and prospective, awaiting completion with the fulfilment of the Promises. In other words, the restoration of the individual involves that of the Church. In Christ, she receives (i. 23) a Head, a new principle of life and organic unity (iv. 16); in Him she is redeemed, saved, cleansed (v. 23-27), she is His body; in Him she realises the highest and tenderest Old Testament ideal (Hos. ii. 16, 19; Is. liv. 5, &c.) of the relation of God to His People (Ephes. v. 25); in her His function in relation to the Universe finds its complete realisation (i. 23). Until the Church has grown into one

(iv. 13 sqq.; cp. Col. i. 28, iii. 11), until all exclusive distinctions are effaced within her, God's eternal purpose in Christ is unsatisfied (i. 10, &c.). It is this, then, that St. Paul "agonises" (Col. ii. 1) to impress upon the Gentile Christians of Asia, praying again and again (Ephes. i. 15; iii. 1, 14) that they may learn more and more to what they have been called, until they grow to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. The key-note to the Epistle is struck in the word ἐπιγνώσις (i. 17), progressive enlightenment, not merely intellectual, but of a kind that will be fully realised only hereafter (1 Cor. xiii. 12; on the word, see Lightfoot on Col. i. 9 and Phil. i. 9). With this growth in spiritual wisdom will come mutual toleration (iv. 2) and forgiveness, the fruit of Christ's redemptive grace (iv. 32; cp. ii. 15), and a life worthy of their calling.

(c.) Structure.—The analysis given below aims, not at following the sequence of ideas into every detail, which in the case of this Epistle would involve a commentary, but at bringing out the main flow of the thought. The Epistle is characterised by great simplicity in this respect, coupled with extraordinary complexity and length in its parenthetic matter. Its lack of argumentative sequence is compensated by the intense unity of purpose which runs through it, compelling the writer back to a thread which is constantly dropped, but never lost sight of from beginning to end. St. Paul, after blessing God for the privileges bestowed in Christ (i. 3), prays for the progress of his readers in knowledge of what these privileges imply (i. 15-18). This prayer, after a reminder of the great change from their past to their present condition (ii. 1, 5, 8, 11-13), he reiterates (iii. 1, 14) with deeper fervency and significance, the climax culminating in a doxology. He exhorts them to carry out their privileges to their normal practical issues, unity, renunciation of Gentile vices, fidelity to social and moral obligations, the armour of God, prayer. Such is the outline of the Epistle, the expression of St. Paul's burning anxiety that the Gentiles should understand, and justify, their fellow-citizenship with the saints and Israel of God. But the peculiar distinction of the Epistle is due to the fulness of substance which the simple theme draws up at every joint and turn from the underlying springs of the unsearchable riches of Christ. The following table will make this plain:—

I. 1-2. Apostolic salutation.

I. i. 3-14. Blessed be God for the blessings bestowed in Christ upon all Christians.

[These blessings involve—

4-6. God's eternal purpose of our adoption in Christ.

7-14. Our redemption and forgiveness through His Blood, by virtue of the riches of His grace, to which also we owe—

8-10. Knowledge of God's purpose to sum up all things in Christ.

[11. This purpose includes us all, both

12. Jews, τοῖς προλαβούσας (who had previously hoped in the Christ),

13, 14. You Gentiles also who accepted the good tidings and were accordingly sealed with the Spirit to the destiny in store for the Israelites (εἰς ἐν. τῆς δοξῆς αὐτοῦ repeated).]

II. i. 15-23. For this reason (God's calling of the Gentiles) I also (i.e. as corresponding to God's purpose) pray for your enlightenment by God, that you may grow in knowledge of Him.

[18, 19. This involves enlightenment concerning the hope and heritage to which you are called, and particularly concerning

20-23. The Power of God exerted in Christ, and shown in HI { Resurrection, Exaltation,

Consequent relation to the Church. }

- III. II. 1-10. You too, once dead in Gentile sins, or rather [since we Jews were in no better case] us (ἡμᾶς, vv. 4, 5, including ὑμᾶς, v. 1, and ἡμᾶς, v. 3). God raised to life in Christ.
 [7-10. Import of this (1) as demonstrating God's grace for all future ages, 7,
 (2) as the foundation of Christian ethics, 8-10.]
- 11-22. Bear in mind, then, this momentous change in your state; once aliens, now fellow-citizens of the saints (19).
 [13-18. This effected by the blood-shedding of Christ, which has removed the barrier (μασὸρ-τοῦ φρ.) and made both one.
 20-22. You are now being built into God's habitation, reared upon the Apostles and Prophets, and upon Christ as corner-stone.]
- IV. III. 1-19. To this end (your complete incorporation into the Edifice of the Church) I Paul, in virtue of my special charge over you Gentiles, of which my bonds (1) and tribulations (13) are the pledge.
 [2-6. This charge, of which you have heard, or may learn from what I have written, is a stewardship, or gift entrusted to me, namely the revelation of a secret, to be made known at last, of the inclusion of the Gentiles in the promise, 7-9. Which secret I am to proclaim to the Gentiles, 10-12. In order that to Powers unseen may be revealed God's manifold Wisdom, corresponding to His eternal purpose in Christ,] bow my knees to the one Father that He may inwardly confirm and enlighten you, to comprehend the love of Christ (18 b, 19 a), that you may be brought to Christian perfection.
 20, 21. Doxology: climax of the foregoing description of God's unlooked-for bounty, of which the Church is the eternal monument.
- V. IV. 1-vi. 9. Therefore, walk worthily of your calling,

 b. vi. 1-4. Children and parents.
 c. vi. 5-9. Slaves and masters.]
- VI. VI. 10-24. Conclusion.
 a. 10-20. Final Exhortation: (1) Be strong in the Lord.
 [The whole armour of God.]
 (2) Prayer, generally (18); specially for St. Paul (19, 20).
 β. 21-24. Epistolary matter.
 Tychicus and his mission.
 Final peace and benediction.

It will be observed, firstly, that with every desire to steer clear of exegetical assumptions on debated points in analysing the Epistle, it is impossible to do so entirely⁶; secondly, that the commonly made division into a "doctrinal" (i-iii.) and "practical" (iv.-vi.) portion is scarcely indicative of the main lines of cleavage (against Holtzm. Krit. pp. 191, 218). The Epistle contains no systematic exposition of doctrine: its doctrinal richness is subsidiary to and illustrative of the practical purpose which binds the entire Epistle into one (for instance, the cardinal doctrine of Christ as Head of the Church appears in i. 23, iv. 16, and not least in v. 24-32), while the practical precepts (iv.-vi.) come under the general head of ἀγάπη ἀπερπατήσας (iv. 1), and so fall into the main current of the Epistle. Full enlightenment, and a life worthy of their calling, were not to be thought of as separable; each was equally necessary on the part of the Gentile Church, if St. Paul was not to "have run in vain" (Philip. ii. 16).

⁶ e.g. the close connexion of III. 1 and III. 14 is assumed with many of the very best authorities, in the face of others (Chrysostom, Meyer, &c.), who make v. 1 into a self-contained clause by what must be called the arbitrary and ungainly insertion of a verb neither expressed nor implied in the Greek.

§ 3. AUTHENTICITY.

If the above view of the purpose of the Epistle be correct, it establishes a presumption in favour of its Pauline origin. It is difficult for us to put ourselves into St. Paul's position with reference to the admission of the Gentiles to the Divine kingdom. To us this admission is a truism. To him "this amazing Gospel was always fresh; there was a touch of strangeness in it to the last" (Dale, *Lect.*³ xii. p. 202). Nor is it easy to believe that anyone even in the generation which immediately succeeded St. Paul, and which entered upon his labours, could have felt the novelty of this revelation with its first freshness. To the writer of this Epistle, not indeed the existence, but the full naturalisation within the Churches of Gentile Christendom, is still on its trial; it is a great task, a matter demanding fervent prayer and full of anxiety, to show them their rightful place as heirs to God's promises and fellow-citizens of the saints. Now after the fall of Jerusalem the Church no longer had a Jewish metropolis; Jewish Christianity fell more and more into the background (cp. Lightfoot, *Gal.*³ pp. 300 sqq.; Harnack, *Dogmg.*¹ pp. 97, 215 sqq.; also Schenkel, Christusbild, p. vii. sqq.); after 70 A.D. the composition of such a letter as ours would be improbable; by 100 A.D. almost impossible. Such a presumption, however, might be outweighed by strong contrary evidence; and contrary evidence has in this case convinced critics of weighty authority.

(1.) External evidence. The apostolic authorship of the Epistle was fully recognised in the earlier decades of the 2nd century (Mangold in Bleek, *Eint.*⁴ p. 288; Holtzm. Krit. p. 278). Of writers who show reminiscences of its language may be mentioned CLEMENT OF ROME [see index of passages in Lightfoot or Gebhardt; no single instance is decisive, but taken all together they fairly imply a knowledge of the Epistle]; POLYCARP, Ep. ad Phil. i., cp. Ephes. ii. 8, 9, and xiii. [quotes Ephes. iv. 26 as from the "Scriptures"]; the chapter has with others been regarded as the work of an interpolator, on grounds which Lightfoot (Ign. i. 586) has shown to be arbitrary; there is, however, the possibility that Polycarp is directly quoting two separate "Scriptures" (Pa. iv. 5, Deut. xxiv. 13, 15), especially as he couples the two clauses by an et; but the combination would in that case be an extraordinary coincidence with Ephes. iv. 25 (yet the composite quotation might be from a common source; see Hatch, Essays in Bib. Greek, pp. 203 sqq.); HERMAS [Mand. x. 2 = Ephes. iv. 30, Sin. ix. 13 = Ephes. iv. 4]; Letter to DIOGNETUS [c. ii., cp. Ephes. iv. 21-24?]; JUSTIN [Dial. 39, 87 (from Ps. lxxviii. 18) = Ephes. iv. 8, Dial. 120 = Ephes. i. 21]. A direct reference to the Epistle is made by IGNATIUS, who, in writing to the Ephesians (§ 12), addresses them as Παύλου συμμύστα, ὅς ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ ἡ μνημονεύει ἡμῶν. Setting aside Meyer's arbitrary explanation of ἡμῶν as not referring to the Ephesians at all (but "to Pauline Christians as such"!), it is difficult not to see in συμμύστα a reference to the language of our Epistle (e.g. iii. 4, v. 32), especially as the Epistle of Ignatius bears other traces of its language; compare Ign. Ephes. i. with Ephes. i. 3-6, 9, 11, and cp. Ephes. v. 1, 2 (also other letters of Ign.: e.g. Polyc. 5, cp. Ephes. v. 25; Smyrn. 6, cp. Ephes. i. 21; Tral. 11, cp. Ephes. iv. 25, v. 30). Ignatius, then, regarded our Epistle as written by St. Paul. To this body of evidence we must add that of the Gnostic sectaries. From the Ophites downward, the quotations from their writings in Hippolytus show that our Epistle was known to them. It is not, indeed, always certain whether this or that individual heresiarch (Basilides, Valentinus; cp. Westcott, *Can.*⁴ pp. 291, 295 sq.), or merely his followers, are stated by Hippolytus to have used the language quoted, for he uses the words φασί, φησὶ convertibly, and that even when speaking of a sect as distinct from a person (see Salmon, *Introd.*¹ pp. 69, 73; Holtzm. *Eint.*³ p. 136, n.). But when we find the Epistle commonly acknowledged among these schools, it is unreasonable to exclude their founders, especially as the case of Marcion at least is beyond all doubt. The Valentinians (and, as Westcott, ubi supra, shows ground for believing, Valentinus himself) quoted Ephes. iii. 4-18 as γραφή (Hipp. Phil. vi. 34), and Heinrici (Die Val. Gnosis u. die h. Schrift, pp. 184, 192, Berl. 1871) has further shown grounds for believing that they actually commented upon it. By the close of the second century our Epistle was universally received as St. Paul's: Irenaeus, the Muratorian Canon, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, unite the testimony of widely separated Churches: it is unnecessary to do more than mention their names, or to refer to evidence later in date. Thus strongly attested by uncontradicted tradition, the Pauline authorship of the Epistle was unquestioned until the third decade of the present century.

(2.) Modern Enquiries—(a.) Negative criticism. Doubts as to the authenticity of the Epistle were first expressed by Usteri (Paul. Lehrbegriff, 1824), but purely on the ground of its relation to Colossians. He regarded the character of the Epistle as thoroughly Pauline, and uses it throughout his book as a standard for St. Paul's doctrine. He derived his doubts from Schleiermacher's lectures, which however, as published, merely express the opinion ("very improbable," Bleek) that Tychicus, the bearer of Colossians, was charged by St. Paul with the composition of this as a companion Epistle (pp. 165 sq., 194). De Wette (*Introduction*⁴ and Commentary, 1843) rejected the Epistle on internal grounds also, as un-Pauline in language and ideas, and a mere "verbose amplification"

xvii. 26, ἐν παντὶ προσέειπον τῆς γῆς (according to the correct reading), Arist. Eth. Nic. i. xiii. 7, καὶ πᾶν σῶμα, passages which can hardly be brought under the rebutting principle laid down by Lightfoot in loco. The great exaggeration involved in the former alternative almost vanishes with the adoption of the latter, as the Epistle to the Ephesians, in spite of its lack of local or personal references, is throughout closely addressed to the particular spiritual needs of its readers.

of Colossians. He ascribed the Epistle to a disciple of St. Paul and to the sub-Apostolic age, as also did Ewald (Sieben Sendschr. des N. B. pp. 153 sqq.; *Hist. of Isr.*³ viii. 190 sqq., E. Tr.), who dated it about A.D. 75. A similarly negative attitude toward the Epistle is taken up by Renan, Davidson, Hausrath (Apost. Paul. and Hist. of N. T. Times), Ritschl (*Rechtfert. u. Veröhh.*² ii. p. 244, &c.), Weizsäcker (Apost. Zeitalter, 1886, pp. 330, 561, &c.), and others, in addition to those to be mentioned presently. De Wette's objections were answered by Lünemann (de Ep. ad Eph. authentia, Gött. 1853), and among others who have defended the Epistle may be mentioned here Bleek (Lectures, and Introd. to N. T.), Schenkel (in the 1st ed. of Lange's N. T. and elsewhere), Klöpffer (de origine Epp. ad Eph. et Col., Greifsw., 1853), Meyer, W. Schmidt, Reuss, and Weiss.

(b.) Merely negative criticism was incomplete without some attempt to give a positive account of the origin of the Epistle. This attempt was first made by Schwegler (in the Theol. Jahrb. 1844) and Baur (Paulus,¹ 1845), who found in the Epistle traces of Gnostic and even Manichean language and ideas, and assigned it, along with that to the Colossians, to the middle of the 2nd century; the main theme and underlying idea of the "twin" letters being the reconciliation, in Christ as Head of the Universe and of the Church, of all opposing principles, and more especially of Judaism and Gentilism; the author a Pauline Christian writing in order to conciliate the Jewish element in the Church, and offering "as concessions" the recognition of the earlier prerogative of the Jews (Ephes. ii. 12), and of good works as on a par with faith (ii. 8 sqq.). This construction was adopted by the Tübingen School generally (Zeller, Volkmar, &c.), and is maintained in a modified form by Hilgenfeld and by Pfleiderer, who deny, however, the single authorship of the two letters; the former (Eini. pp. 666, 677) regarding the two as successive editions by distinct hands, at an interval of some twenty years, of a work designed by a gnosticising Pauline Christian to re-assert the diminished authority of St. Paul against the opposite extremes of Gnosticism and Jewish Christianity which had thrust it into the background in the Asiatic Churches (against this assumption cp. Lightfoot, Col. pp. 50-62); while Pfleiderer regards our Epistle as quite distinct in aim from that to the Colossians, and as the work of a Pauline Jewish Christian, aiming at the reconciliation of opposing parties in the Church, and as chiefly directed against a hyper-Pauline or rather Asiatic and Gnostic (Urchristentum, pp. 384 sq., 693) Antinomianism coupled with practical licence (Paulinism, ii. 162). Lastly, Weizsäcker (Ap. Zeitalter, 1886, p. 561) sees in the two Epistles the work of one hand, and an attempt to rehabilitate in Asia Minor the forgotten authority of St. Paul. It may fairly be said that the "tendency criticism" of the Tübingen School, whether in its original shape or in its later modifications, has failed to reach any consistent result as to the origin of the two Epistles.

(c.) More definite results were to be expected from the method of literary analysis, especially with regard to the mutual relations of Ephesians and Colossians. If the genuineness of either is called in question, their relative priority (together with their literary relation to other N.T. writings) becomes a vital problem. Mayerhoff (1838) had decided the question of priority in favour of Ephesians, while questioning the genuineness of either Epistle. But the majority of critics decided in favour of Colossians until a new departure was made by Hitzig (Zur Kritik paulin. Briefe, 1870), who suggested (following a hint of Weisse in his Philos. Dogmatik, 1855) the possibility of mutual priority, the wholly spurious Epistle to the Ephesians having been written in the time of Trajan, and then used by its composer in order to interpolate a genuine Epistle of St. Paul to the Colossians. This suggestion was followed up by Hönig, who however made the "Interpolator" a third person (Zeitschr. f. wiss. Theol. 1872), and by Holtzmann, whose elaborate essay (Kritik des Epheser- und Kolosserbriefe auf Grund einer Analyse ihrer Verwandtschaftsverhältnisse, 1872) presents the problem with a thoroughness which leaves nothing to be desired. (His theory will be discussed below: it is conveniently summarised in his Einleitung,² pp. 291 sq.; but for its thorough appreciation the original work is indispensable.) While Holtzmann's general idea has been endorsed, but with deviations in detail, by Haurath, Pfeiderer, Mangold (in Bleek, *Eini.*⁴) and others, no one critic has so far adopted the theory in its original and most consistent form. His most recent and able follower, Von Soden ("Colosserbrief," in Jahrb. Prot. Theol. 1885; "Epheserbrief," ibid. 1887), has reduced Holtzmann's theory almost to a vanishing point, by re-asserting the genuineness of Colossians with the exception of nine verses, and the spuriousness and dependence of Ephesians only. With a remarkable reservation as to the latter (to be noticed below), he thus brings back the question to the status quo ante, and leaves it where Weisse and Hitzig found it. His theory may be summarised as follows:—The Epistle to the Ephesians is un-Pauline in many of its ideas and in much of its language (cp. infra, (3) c), and is the work of an imitator thoroughly familiar with the writings of St. Paul (worked out by Von Soden in an elaborate criticism of "reminiscences," with little or no proof that the resemblances are due to anything but identity of authorship). The main interest of the writer is in the ultimate destiny of the Christian (p. 460) in relation to the glorified Christ, and in connexion with His cosmic function. In this cosmic redemptive process, of which the Church (p. 463) is the instrument, there are two stages: (1) Peace between Jews and Gentiles (formation of the Church); (2) perfect realisation of the Church as the ἁλήθεια of Christ, with whom the Church is thus quasi-identified, occupying the place which St. Paul himself assigns rather to the individual (1 Cor. xi. 3, 5; Gal. ii. 20). The letter accordingly is an attempt to further the fusion of Jewish and Gentile Christians after the fall of Jerusalem by an appeal as from St. Paul in view of the peculiar circumstances of the time, and is in fact (p. 495) much what St. Paul would have written had he lived till then.

The problem of the relation of Ephesians to Colossians is got rid of by the denial of any special relation between them (except in the §3 rejected verses of Colossians and the "practical portion" of Ephesians). Of this contention, to which Von Soden devotes several pages (109-121) of laboured proof, it is enough to say ταῖς φαινομένοις ἀμφισβητεῖ ἐναργῶς (e.g. he will not allow any marked parallelism between Ephes. iii. 2, 5-7, and Col. i. 25-27!). The discussion below [(3) e, a] will therefore take account of Holtzmann rather than of Von Soden.

(3) Is the Epistle genuine? The purely negative points will be considered first, then evidence supposed to point to some positive date later than St. Paul, lastly the literary relations of the Epistle to other New Testament books, especially to Colossians. The latter relation, however, enters into so many problems belonging to our Epistle that in discussing the authorship of the one it is seldom possible to exclude all reference to the other.

(a.) The historical situation.—The points urged are (1) absence of local or personal references; (2) absence of personal acquaintance¹ between St. Paul and his readers. These objections, pointedly summed up by Kamphausen in his verdict that the Epistle was "either not written by Paul or not written to the Ephesians," fall to the ground with the result of our discussion (§ 2, a) of the destination of the Epistle. (3) That it is unworthy of St. Paul to have copied himself, as he must have done if both Colossians and Ephesians are genuine (against this, see above, § 2, c, and below). It may be added here that the Epistle to PHILEMON, the genuineness of which has not been seriously questioned, lends a historical context and corroboration to its two companions, so much so that Baur, condemning the two latter, rejected Philemon on that ground alone; his highly fanciful explanation of its origin will be found in Paulus, ii. p. 93.¹ The remark of Holtzmann (Krit. p. 14; more smartly put by Von Soden, p. 473) that if the Epistle is genuine its traditional inscription is a standing puzzle (against this see above, § 2, a) suggests the reply that this is still more the case if it be spurious. If the imitator of St. Paul wrote ἐν Ἐφέσῳ (i. 1), he must have been singularly lacking in ingenuity to have avoided all reference to St. Paul's intercourse with the Ephesian Church. If he did not, how are we to explain such a daring deviation from his model? Holtzmann's answer to this question (p. 131) will scarcely satisfy anyone but himself. Von Soden's (p. 479) is ingenious, but does not meet the difficulty.

(h.) Absence of characteristic Pauline ideas.—It must be remembered in limine that it is one thing to take the Pauline "homologumena" (Galatians, Corinthians, Romans) as the standard of Pauline doctrine and language, but quite another thing to demand that St. Paul shall never be permitted to step beyond their special vocabulary or special mental horizon, never be supposed to be occupied with any problems or controversies other than those of the period of his life to which they belong, nor to give to conceptions developed in the conflicts of that critical epoch a more positive and final expression. The same caution applies in some measure to the attempt to compare such an Epistle as ours with the four earlier ones in concentration, power, and intensity. Such a psychological crisis as marks the period of those letters does not come twice in a man's life, nor does it last long² (see also the remarks in article on COLOSSIANS). It leaves its mark behind; but while it lasts, it must draw from depths of the spirit which less stirring conditions fail to sound. Since the last Epistle of the main group was written, nearly five years had passed, and much had happened. The Epistle to the Romans was St. Paul's last word on the question of principle between himself and the Judaisers. If the latter were still at work, St. Paul did not think it necessary to re-open against them a question which had been argued out (see Philip. i. 17, iii. 2). The Gentile Churches were growing, and new difficulties and dangers were threatening them.

The main Pauline characteristics missed by the critics of our Epistle are: (1) Polemic against Judaisers. This is met by what has been said. Our Epistle is probably at least a year later than Philippians, where no such doctrinal polemic is entered upon. The Asiatic Churches were now exposed to a new Judaising influence (Col. ii. 16, &c.), not to be met in the old way. (2) Justification by faith. It is certainly true that this Epistle, like that to Colossians, contains no mention of this doctrine. "The word 'justification' does not occur; the specific idea for which the word stands does not occur" (Dale). But "to St. Paul the doctrine of justification by faith was not a final statement of Christian truth:" the idea of justification had been the common ground between St. Paul and his Judaising opponents; he had met their insistence upon the authority of law by the doctrine of justification by faith, "a conception of the Christian redemption expressed in terms of law:" this particular expression of i belonged, then, to a controversy of which already in the Epistle to the Philippians (iii. 9) we catch merely the echo. "The Fact which his account of Justification by Faith represented in one form is represented here in another. His mind and heart are filled with the Divine Grace" (Dale, Lect. x., pp. 170-177). While πίστις, the human factor in salvation, is not lost sight of (ii. 8, iii. 17, vi. 23), it is overshadowed by the Divine and Creative (Ephes. ii. 10, iv. 22-24; 2 Cor. v. 17) factor χάρις, conceived in a manner admittedly Pauline (Holtzm. Krit. p. 213). Hence the "catholic synthesis of faith and works" (id.), a rock of offence to hostile critics, but here (ii. 10), as in the older Epistles (Rom. vi. 4, 14; viii. 3, 4), regarded as the work of the Spirit, resulting from union with God through and in Christ. (The transition to the Ephesian form of this doctrine is to be found in Philip. ii. 12, 13.) We may add that the psychological and anthropological assumptions of the older Epistles are also to be found here [e.g. the conception of σάρξ as the seat of lust and sin (ii. 3, Col. ii. 11), and the intermediate position of the νοῦς, needing, yet susceptible of, renewal (Col. ii. 18; Ephes. iv. 23; cp. Rom. vii. 23, 25). The use of πνεῦμα (iv. 23) is not more surprising than that in 2 Cor. vii. 1]. On the identity of the teaching of this Epistle with that of the main Epistles on the previous position of Jews and Gentiles, see above, § 2 d (and on this part of the subject generally, Weiss, Bibl. Theol. §§ 100, 101, the general validity of whose results is allowed by Holtzm. Krit. p. 205). So far, then, as ideas characteristic of the "homologoumena" are absent from our Epistle, there is nothing in the fact inconsistent with the genuineness of the latter. But there remains the more crucial inquiry, whether the Epistle contains ideas inconsistent with the known mind of St. Paul, or wholly foreign to it, or to anything in his historical environment, and whether its form betrays the work of another hand.

² Against the view (current in Germany) that the Epistle to the Galatians was written not less than three years before those to the Corinthians and Romans, see GALATIANS, and Lightfoot, Gal. Introd. iii. (especially on the close relation between Gal. and 2 Cor.).

(c) Definitely un-Pauline Features.—i. Vocabulary, Style, and Constructions. It is an easy method of impugning the genuineness of any book to ascribe divergencies of language to diversity of authorship, and coincidences to imitation. Holtzmann, in his elaborate verbal analysis (pp. 113-120, 131-148) of the Epistle, has not always kept clear of this method, although he is of course alive to its fallacy. His test (correspondence of idea) is satisfactory so far as it goes, but diversity of idea, even where the language is strikingly alike, does not demonstrate unintelligent imitation (compare e.g. the similar passages, Rom. iv. 15, v. 13, vii. 8, each distinct from the others in idea and connexion). Peculiar expressions there certainly are in our Epistle, such as vi. 11, μεθόδεα τοῦ διαβόλου (St. Paul always says σατανᾶς, not διάβολος, except in 1 and 2 Tim.); v. 5, ἵστε γινώσκοντες; iii. 21, εἰς πάσας τὰς γενεάς τοῦ αἰῶνος τῶν αἰώνων, and others; but none are objected to with no show of fairness: e.g. St. Paul may imply (Rom. vi. 21), but may not expressly state (Ephes. v. 11), that Gentile sins are ἔκαρα; he may combine (Rom. v. 21) ἡμαρτία and παράπτωμα in the singular, but not in the plural, at least not with καί (Ephes. ii. 1); he may give two lists of church officers (1 Cor.

xii. 28; Rom. xii. 5), but must not give a third (Ephes. iv. 11); he may speak of ἀγαπᾶν τὸν θεόν (Rom. viii. 28) and φιλεῖν τὸν Κύριον (1 Cor. xvi. 21), but on no account of ἀγαπᾶν τὸν Κύριον (Ephes. vi. 24); he may call his converts "beloved children" of his own (1 Cor. iv. 14, 17), but not "beloved children" of God (v. 1; Holtzmann, p. 102, singles out this as "a speaking example"). Diffuseness, tautology, catchwords and tricks of style (such as fondness for indirect questions after verbs of knowledge, φωτίσειν τί τὸ πλοῦτος and the like, i. 18, iii. 9), combination of cognate words (i. 6, ii. 4, iii. 6, strings of genitives (i. 6, 10, 18, 19, &c.), the use of πᾶς, especially to intensify abstract nouns, are more or less decided peculiarities of this Epistle and that to the Colossians, many of which, however, are found (with less frequency) elsewhere in St. Paul. But when we are told (Holtzm. Krit. p. 139) that the occurrence of a word (ἀνεξιχνίαστος) only in Rom. xi. 33 and Ephes. iii. 8 is a proof that one place borrows from the other, or that the writer of Ephes. iii. 14 can only have derived the idea of bowing his knees to God from the study of Rom. xi. 4 or xiv. 11, we realise the deceptiveness of verbal coincidences. The style of the Epistle is further objected to as lacking the syllogistic structure, the sharp dialectical spring, the nerve and spontaneity of the acknowledged writings of St. Paul. This criterion is to some extent subjective: so far as it rests on tangible data (such as the infrequency of γαρ, so characteristic of Rom., Gal., Cor.; ἔρα ὄν, once only Ephes. ii. 19, eight times in Rom., but only once in Gal., 1 Thess., not in Cor.; διδ, five times in our Epistle, quite as frequent as elsewhere), it is amply explained by the fact that St. Paul is not here engaged in argument. Nor is it reasonable to look for uniformity or equality of style in the letters of a man of action (see the interesting parallel case of Xenophon, in Salmon, Introd.,⁴ p. 419, note).

ii. Ideas.—(1) Christology. The relation of Christ's Redemptive Work to the Universe ("the mere presence of which shows the later point of view," Holtzm.) is certainly a prominent thought in our Epistle (i. 10; Col. i. 20), but it cannot surprise us in the writer of Rom. viii. 18-23. His original mediation in creation (Col. i. 18) is admitted to be already expressed in 1 Cor. viii. 6. From 1 Cor. xv. 27 the transition (through Philip ii. 9, 10, as Holtzmann admits in Zeitschr. wiss. Theol. 1881, p. 102, n.) to the doctrine of our Epistles is not great, nor in any way inconsistent with the final ὑποτάξις of the Son to the Father as expressed in 1 Cor. xv. 28 (see also COLOSSIANS). Von Soden has made a very remarkable discovery in this connexion (pp. 440 sqq.). After drawing out (most admirably) the way in which Christ pervades the Epistle from end to end, standing always as the Centre of Christian faith and hope, conduct and life, as the Bond of all Christian relations, as the Source of all Christian graces, he appeals to this leading characteristic of the letter, not indeed as decisive proof, but as a confirmation of the other proofs, of its un-Pauline authorship! To realise the contrast, he bids us read Colossians or Philippians, and note the difference of atmosphere. It is certainly a novel test of an un-

Pauline work—that it is too full of Christ! But Von Soden goes on to suggest (p. 443) that the author is reacting against a post-apostolic and faded grasp of Christ as the Centre of life and thought. The importance of this admission is to be carefully noted. Von Soden cannot refuse to see the gulf between our Epistle with its energetic grasp of a living Christ, and the whole group of Apostolic Fathers and apologists to which he supposes it to belong. Von Soden goes on to remark that the Christology of the Epistle is its most Pauline characteristic. (2) Angelology. The addition of θρόνοι (Col. i. 16) and κυριότητες (Ephes. i. 21) to the terms applied in the earlier Epistles (Rom. viii. 38; 1 Cor. xv. 24) to angelic beings (cp. Ephes. iii. 10) cannot reasonably be objected to: their mention in connexion with the exaltation of Christ (Ephes. i. 20) reminds us of Philip. ii. 10, which also supplies a point of contact for the ἐπουράνια of our Epistle, which term, however, is here used in a more definitely local sense (i. 3, 20; ii. 6; iii. 10; vi. 12). The demonology (Ephes. ii. 2; iv. 27; vi. 11, 12, 16) is paralleled by 1 Cor. x. 20, and elsewhere, save that ὁ διάβολος or ὁ πονηρός (Ephes. vi. 16) is here substituted for the older σατανᾶς. (3) The Church, and Christ as Head of the Church. It is objected that whereas St. Paul knows of local churches (e.g. xi. 16), we here for the first time find the idea of the Church (but see Gal. i. 3; 1 Cor. x. 32); and further, that whereas in the older Epistles the many members of Christ stand in organic relations with one another through Him (Rom. xii. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 13, 27), Christ being the vital principle uniting (1 Cor. vi. 17) and pervading the whole (1 Cor. xii. 12), in those to Ephesians and Colossians (Ephes. i. 23, iv. 15; Col. ii. 19, &c.) Christ is the "Head," i.e. a member of the organic whole, the Church as such being reduced to a trunk! (Holtzm. Krit. p. 240.) As this criticism has been gravely adopted by several German scholars (e.g. Von Soden, Col. p. 514, also Ephes. p. 467), it may not be superfluous to point out that although the former metaphor may be the more adequate, either metaphor is perfectly natural, and expressive of part of the truth (cp. 1 Cor. xi. 3), but that any metaphor may be pressed too far. It should be further remarked that as the head is incomplete without its body, so the Church is the πλήρωμα of Christ, its Head (i. 23), inasmuch as it is only in the Church that God's purpose in the κένωσις of his Son is completed (Ephes. i. 10; cp. Philip. ii. 7, 9, 10; Rom. viii. 21; 1 Cor. xv. 25). (4) Intellectualism. It is certainly true that ἐπίγνωσις and its cognate ideas (i. 17, iv. 13; cp. σύνεσις, iii. 4; φρόνησις, σοφία, i. 8, 17; ἀποκάλυψις, i. 17, iii. 3, 5, 10; γνωρίζειν, φωτίζειν, i. 18, iii. 9; see a more complete list in Holtzm. Krit. 217) play a very prominent part in our Epistle, the key-note to which (see above, § 2, d sub fin.) is the earnest desire of St. Paul for the increase in spiritual enlightenment of the Gentile Christians. It should be noted that here again the Epistle to the Philippians comes to our aid (Philip. i. 9, 10), opening in the same strain, and revealing the same desire on St. Paul's part on behalf of another Gentile community at a slightly earlier date (cp. also Philip. iii. 15, φρονεῖν, ἀποκαλύπτειν, and Philip. iv. 8, also 1 Cor. i. 5 sqq.). That St. Paul should recognise wisdom as a factor in Christian perfection (cp. 1 Cor. ii. 6, iii. 1 sqq., xiv. 20, &c.) is not surprising: to see a "theosophical" tinge in the enlightenment which he desires for his readers is purely arbitrary. The thought (of 1 Cor. ii. 6–16, &c.) that the revelation of Christ is the deepest wisdom satisfies even such passages as Col. i. 26, 27, ii. 2, 3; Ephes. iii. 3 sqq. The μυστήριον of these Epistles is no esoteric or abstruse doctrine, but St. Paul's "gospel" of the calling of the Gentiles (the use of the word in Ephes. v. 32 stands by itself. On the word μυστήριον in these Epistles, see Lightfoot on Col. i. 26, 28; on ἐπίγνωσις, see his note on Philip. i. 9). The prominence given to ἐπίγνωσις and its cognates in this Epistle is quite explicable, therefore, in view of the phenomena of Philippians on the one hand, and of St. Paul's earlier teaching on the other. For a more thorough discussion, see Weiss, B. T., § 102; also cp. Von Soden, p. 456 sq.

(d.) Indications of post-Apostolic date.—(1) General. To this head belongs the alleged "studied assumption of St. Paul's personality" (iii. 1–3, 7; iv. 1; vi. 20); the expressions ἔγω ἄποστολος, iii. 5; ἐλαχιστότερος, iii. 8 ("an extravagant imitation of 1 Cor. xv. 9"); the enumeration of church-officers, iv. 11 (ποιμένες καὶ διδάσκαλοι, "union of the two offices late: the gifts of miracles and tongues have ceased, as is shown by comparison with 1 Cor. xii. 28"); "the destruction of Jerusalem has taken place." (Holtzmann, Krit. p. 160, infers this from Col. iii. 1, 2; Ephes. ii. 6, comparing Heb. xii. 22, but why not Gal. iv. 26?) Lastly, the age is one of many sects (iv. 13, 14; Baur, Ewald, Holtzmann, &c., importing too much into the Greek). It is not necessary to examine at length all of the above and some other lesser objections, urged by almost every adverse critic of the Epistle; but those founded on the difficult passage iii. 3, 4, and on the phrase cited above from iii. 5, are not so easy to meet. Of the last no very satisfactory explanation has been given—see Meyer in loco and Schmidt—and taken alone it would certainly appear to reveal a writer who looked upon the Apostles and Prophets with the distant veneration of a later date rather than as one of their number. But it must be remarked that the epithet ἔγω stands in close connexion with the parallel passage in Colossians (i. 26), in which τοῖς ἁγίοις αὐτοῦ corresponds to the τοῖς ἁγίοις ἀποστόλοις αὐτοῦ καὶ προφήταις of our present passage. The ἔγω in general are the mediate or general (ἐφανερῶθη), the ἐπ. κ. προφ. the immediate or special (ἀνεκάλυφθη), recipients of the revelation. Is it not possible, then, that the word ἔγω was meant to have the same sense in our passage as it had in Col. i. 26, but that the words as they stand have in some way been dislocated? Reuss (Gesch. N. T. p. 186) suggests that this is due to a gloss. But even leaving the passage as it stands, this difficulty alone will only turn the scale if the other evidence is more nicely balanced than the writer of this article can regard it as being. The problem is not unlike that involved in Rev. xxi. 14, where the twelve Apostles seem to be looked at by the writer ab extra.

(2) Gnosticism.—Baur (Paulus, ii. pp. 10–25) regarded the two Epistles as belonging to the earlier stages of the Gnostic development, "at which the Gnostic ideas still passed as unobjectionable Christian speculation." (His arguments to prove that they also bear traces of early Montanist ideas—προφήται, progressive maturity of the Church, the Spirit, holiness of the Church, &c.—need no longer be examined: they break down in the face of Marcion's possession of our Epistle, and "would prove almost any Epistle of St. Paul to be Montanist," Holtz. Krit. p. 276.) His main arguments, in which he was followed by the Tübingen School generally, and in part by Holtzmann and others, are the use of the term πλήρωμα—but in these Epistles it is always, except Col. i. 19 (where the context suggests της θεου), a relative term, πλήρωμα τινος; whereas in the Gnostic systems it is used absolutely, as a term with a fixed denotation: see also Lightfoot's discussion (Coloss. p. 257 sq.)—the use of αἰῶνες ("personified as the vehicles of divine ideas," a conception wholly foreign to this Epistle), γενεαι (not "spiritual existences," but human generations; cp. Ephes. iii. 5), and, in connexion with this, the Christology and Angelology (on which see above), the "Szygia" of Christ and the Church—the descent into hades, Ephes. iv. 8 (not peculiar to Gnostics, cp. 1 Pet. iii. 18; but the reference is disputed)—the "intellectualism" of the Epistles (the antipodes of esoteric Gnosis: see above). Doubtless there are coincidences with Gnostic terminology, but they are most simply explained by Gnostic borrowings from St. Paul. Moreover, if it be contended that our Epistle, without betraying traces of any particular Gnostic system, yet anticipates Gnosticism in its glances into transcendent and mystical regions, this may be allowed, in the sense in which we can trace "a Gnostic element in Paulinism" itself (Holtz. Einl. p. 134). For a fuller discussion of the question, the article of Dr. Milligan (ut supra) may be consulted.

(3) Faded Paulinism.—The adequate discussion of this note of time would involve a discussion of current theories of the history of the sub-Apostolic age, and of the manner in which the various elements which the Church included from the first (Jewish, Gentile, Pauline, &c.) became assimilated. That this was on a basis common to all follows from the nature of the problem. That this again involved mutual approximation and the formation of a common or average presentment of doctrine, in which much of the individuality of such a teacher as St. Paul would be missed, is no more than may fairly be gathered from the character of (say) the Epistle of Clement. To show that the essential and moving faith of the Gospel was not involved in any such process would be possible in the proper place. But what concerns us here is the question whether we have before us a product of the peculiar mind of St. Paul (Paulinism in the strictest sense), or merely the reflex of his teaching in a mind other than his own, under the influence of later circumstances, and able to enter only into the general forms, not into the inmost personal spirit, of the Apostle of the Gentiles. What has been pointed out above (§ 2, d, and preliminary remarks to the present §; see also § 3, b) goes far, it is submitted, to decide for the former alternative. It may be admitted that the sharp outlines of the conflict which colours the earlier Epistles have faded in that to the Ephesians: but this was already the case in Philippians (see above, § 3, b). The general character of the post-Apostolic age is found (see e.g. Holtzmann, Einl. p. 106) in a "Christian legalism," a co-ordination of faith and works, a tendency to translate Pauline ideas into ethical generalities. Now, as far as our Epistle is concerned, the main example of this tendency is found in ii. 8-10, a passage wholly similar in idea to Philip. ii. 12, 13; nor can it be justly said that Christian ethics are in either passage placed on a foundation different from that of Rom. vi. 1 sqq. (see Weiss, Bib. Theol. § 101 b, and note 5; also Pfeiderer's admissions as to "successful harmonising," &c.; Paulinism, ii. p. 189). To take one more example, Pfeiderer (ib. p. 181) objects that the Epistle gives an ethical turn (i. 7, ii. 4, v. 25, but especially v. 2) to the Death of Christ, thus showing that the writer "was not familiar with the idea of an expiatory death." This, again, is a charge which might equally be brought against the Epistle to the Philippians (ii. 8, iii. 10); but is not the distinction between θυσια (Ephes. v. 2) and λασθηριον (Rom. iii. 27) rather a precarious support for so sweeping a conclusion? As a matter of fact, in speaking of the Death of Christ St. Paul goes back invariably to the ultimate moral ideas upon which the compound and symbolic idea of sacrifice rests: only in Ephes. v. 2 is the term προσφορά or θυσια expressly applied to it. (See Weiss, B. T. § 80 c, notes 8-10; on the relation of Christ's death to the reconciliation of Jews and Gentiles, a point also objected to by Pfeiderer, see above, § 2, d.)

We are unable, therefore, to regard as successful any attempt to identify the date of our Epistle with some definite period of the post-Apostolic age. But can we not, by an analysis of its relations to other N. T. writings, trace it definitely to an imitator of St. Paul?

(e.) Literary genesis of the Epistle.—a. Relation to Colossians. This is the touchstone of the entire question of authorship: it was the first ground that raised the question (supra, § 3. (2) a), and upon it depends almost every problem relating to the Epistle. It is necessary first to show the extent of the correspondence between the two Epistles. It may be said that with the exception of the Christological passages (Col. i. 15 sq.; ii. 3, 9, 10, 14, 15), the passages relating to the Colossian heresy, certain personal matter (Epaphras, Onesimus, &c.), and one or two lesser features (e.g. Col. i. 24; iii. 1-4; iv. 6), the whole of the Epistle to Colossians is more or less directly reproduced in that to the Ephesians. The table² of strictly parallel passages does not do full justice to the facts: many passages which at first appear peculiar to Colossians correspond, though not verbally, to passages of the sister Epistle. To take an example unpromising at first sight, compare Col. iii. 11 with Ephes. ii. 15, i. 23, iv. 13 (unity of Church in Christ, who is all in all, in context with the idea of the corporate new or perfect man, effacing pre-existing lines of division). To show it in detail would involve a comparative analysis of the two Epistles: but the converse might also be shown, that, excepting the topics of the relations of Jew and Gentile, the unity of the Church as including both, the marriage of the Church to Christ, the Spirit, the contrast of darkness and light, and the armour of God, there is little in our Epistle that is not also to be found in Colossians.

² The following list of parallels is fairly complete: for the convenience of the discussion in the text it is divided, in accordance with Holtzmann's hypotheses, into two classes. It is impossible to denote the exact degree of similarity in each place; it varies from entire paragraphs to single words or expressions. This also explains the fact that portions of the same verse in some cases appear in both classes of parallels. For other tables, see

Starting from the argument that literal simultaneity is impossible, Holtzmann lays stress on the cul de sac in which both critics and defenders of the Epistles find themselves, in face of the question which of the twin Epistles came first into the world. (In particular he poises the kal ðméis of Ephes. vi. 21—no kal in Col. iv. 7—against the kal ðméis of Col. iii. 8—no kal in Ephes. iv. 22—the kal in either case appearing to presuppose a similar message already penned for other readers.) Assuming that this holds good (against the view taken above, § 2, c), he proceeds to his first main step, the proof that neither Epistle can claim priority throughout (as had been assumed in earlier discussions). While in many passages Colossians shows indisputable originality, the same can be shown of Ephesians in other cases. He then propounds the explanation of a common original in the shape of a short Pauline Epistle to Colossians, used (with other genuine Epistles of St. Paul) by the composer of Ephesians. The latter Epistle is then used by its composer to fill out the original Epistle, which also receives Christological and polemical additions, directed against an early form of Gnosticism; the result being our present, "half-Pauline, half-Ephesian," Epistle to Colossians. The theory is then further corroborated (p. 130), first by the fact that the parallelisms which are due to the original Pauline letter occur in different order in the two Epistles, while those due to the "Autor ad Ephesios" proceed pari passu, owing to the systematic use of his own work made by the latter in his interpolations (a glance at the list given in note ^m will show that this is not everywhere the case): secondly, by a most minute analysis of the Epistles, with the aim of showing (1) the dependence of Ephesians throughout upon St. Paul's admitted Epistles, but especially upon the alleged original Epistle to Colossians; (2) that the latter is unmistakably Pauline and original, in addition to hanging better together than the existing Epistle to Colossians; (3) that the latter is marked by repetitions corresponding to the double use alleged to have been made of it ("doublets"), and that it has in every way a double look,—style, theology, the heresy combated, all in some respects like what we know of St. Paul, while in others they present features of a later date. Finally, after a glance at analogous cases of interpolation (successive forms of apocryphal acts, &c., Epistle of Polycarp, but especially Ignatian Epistles), and an examination of the doctrinal characteristics of the two Epistles, their relation to the rest of the N. T. literature is estimated, and the date, motives, and historical circumstances of their production hypothetically determined.

In order to estimate the force of this indictment against our Epistle, we must remember that Holtzmann relies throughout on the validity of the negative criticism (see above, a-d), Meyer, Introd. to this Ep.; Holtzm. Krit. p. 26, and (more complete) Krit. p. 291. The asterisks (*) denote passages about which Holtzmann appears now (Krit.?) to have changed his mind.

which he re-states with the greatest lucidity and incisiveness, and seeks to supplement by a positive account of the phenomena. If the negative criticism holds good, some theory of the kind is needed: if what has been alleged in reply has any weight, and if the account (supra, 2, c, d) of the Pauline origin of the Epistle is natural and probable, the hypothesis becomes unnecessary and artificial. Remembering this, we proceed to test it on its merits.

Holtzmann's hypothesis examined.—So far as the hypothesis depends on phenomena peculiar to the Colossian Epistle, we may refer to the article upon it, and to Lightfoot's commentary, where the essential homogeneity of that Epistle and the consistency of its ideas and notes of time (especially with reference to the heresy combated and the internal unity of the composition) are clearly shown. It may be added that many of the phenomena relied on by Holtzmann have been shown by Von Soden (see infra) to warrant no such inference as Holtzmann supposed. This latter fact also destroys what at first seems a strong recommendation of the hypothesis, viz. the coincidence in support of it of so many independent tests (Krit. pp. 99, 130). The facts in reality yield no such certain sound as is taken for granted: the hypothesis is ready before their investigation is begun, and all that they have to do is to fall, whether they will or no, into their assigned place. This stares us in the face, so soon as we examine Holtzmann's case in detail.

(i) Instances of priority.

Christ the Head of the Church.

Ephes. iv. 16.

ὅς ἐστιν ἡ κεφαλὴ, Χριστός,
ἐξ οὗ πᾶν τὸ σῶμα
συναρμολογούμενον καὶ συμβιβασόμενον διὰ πάσης ἀφῆς τῆς ἐπιχορηγίας κατ' ἐπίγνωσιν ἐν μέτρῳ ἑνὸς ἑκάστου μέρους τὴν αὐξησεν τοῦ σώματος τοῦτοιαι εἰς οἰκοδομὴν αὐτοῦ ἐν ἀγάπῃ.

Col. II. 19.

τὴν κεφαλὴν,
ἐξ οὗ πᾶν τὸ σῶμα
διὰ τῶν ἀφῶν καὶ συνδέσμων πιχορηγούμενον καὶ συμβιβασόμενον αὐτῆ τὴν αὐξησεν τοῦ Θεοῦ.

Here the passage in Colossians has the advantage in point of conciseness and perspicuity, gained however at the expense of the idea of mutual interdependence among the members, which the language in the Ephesian parallel labours to bring out. On this ground, coupled with the greater fitness of ἐξ οὗ after the masculine Χριστός, the naturalness of the passage in its Ephesian rather than in its Colossian context, the "un-Pauline" sense of ἐπιχορηγεῖν

(cp. Gal. iii. 5; 2 Cor. ix. 10), and of αὐξειν (αὐξάνειν only transitive in St. Paul), Holtzmann (Krit. pp. 51, 142, 158) regards the Ephesian passage as the original. The precariousness of every one of these numerous tests is sufficiently shown by the fact that, in spite of them all, he now regards the Colossian passage as original and genuine (*Eint.*² p. 296, line 25, so also Von Soden), while Pfeleider regards it as spurious, but as the original of the other (ii. pp. 100, 103).

Ephes. v. 19.

ἀλαλιότες ἑαυτοῖς ψαλμοῖς καὶ ὕμνοις καὶ ψαλμοῖς (πνευματικαῖς) ᾄδοντες καὶ ψάλλοντες τῇ καρδίᾳ ὑμῶν τῷ Κυρίῳ.

Hymns and Spiritual Songs.

Col. III. 16.

διδάσκοντες καὶ ψαλλοῦντες ἑαυτοῖς ψαλμοῖς ὕμνοις ψαλμοῖς πνευματικαῖς ἐν (τῇ) χάριτι ᾄδοντες ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν τῷ Θεῷ.

Here the Colossian passage is the more expanded of the two: the ἀλαλιότες of Ephesians is replaced by a more definite phrase: on these grounds and on that of the more obvious connection in Ephesians, the latter is regarded by Holtzmann as the original. But, in spite of the "un-Pauline" (Krit. p. 164) language of the passage, it is now (*Eint.*² ubi supra, and Von Soden, Col. p. 528) restored to the Apostle, and the priority previously inferred is inverted.

The Reconciliation wrought by Christ.

Col. I. 20-22.

καὶ ἡ αὐτοῦ ἀποκατά-λαψαι τὰ πάντα εἰς ἑαυτόν, εἰρηνοποιήσας διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ σταυροῦ αὐτοῦ, [ἡ αὐτοῦ] εἰς τὰ εἶ ταῦ γὰρ εἴτε τὰ ἐν τοῖς αἰμασίν· καὶ ἡμᾶς ποτὶ ὄντας ἐπιπορευμένους καὶ ἐχθροὺς τῇ ἰσχυρίᾳ ἐν τοῖς ἔργοις τοῖς πονηραῖς, οὗτοι δὲ ἀποκατήλαψεν ἐν τῷ σώματι τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ διὰ τοῦ θανάτου.

Ephes. II. 14-16.

αὐτὸς γὰρ ἐστὶν ἡ εἰρήνη ἡμῶν ὁ ποιήσας τὰ ἀμφότερα ἐν καὶ τὸ μεσότηοιχον τοῦ φραγμοῦ λύσας, τὴν ἐχθραν ἐν τῇ σαρκί αὐτοῦ, τὸν νόμον τῶν ἐντολῶν ἐν δόγμασι καταργήσας, ἵνα τοὺς δύο κτήσῃ ἐν αὐτῷ εἰς ἓνα κενὸν ἄνθρωπον, ποιῶν εἰρήνην, καὶ ἀποκατάλαξῃ τοὺς ἀμφοτέρους ἐν ἐπὶ σώματι τῷ Θεῷ διὰ τοῦ σταυροῦ, ἀποκατεῖνας τὴν ἐχθραν ἐν αὐτῷ.

Col. II. 14.

ἐξολείψας τὸ καθ' ἡμῶν χειρόγραφον τοῖς δόγμασι ὃ ἦν ὑπεναντίον ἡμῶν, καὶ αὐτὸ ἤρκεν ἐκ τοῦ μέσου προσηλώσας αὐτὸ τῷ σταυρῷ ἀπεκεδυμένους
... ἐν αὐτῷ.

The question of priority as between these three passages (see Holtzmann, Krit. pp. 63 sq., 92 sq., 137, 151; Pfeid. ii. p. 179 sq.) is highly complicated. The Ephesian passage is connected with Col. i. by the ideas of an enmity reconciled, peace being made, and that through the Cross, and by the phrases ἐν . . . σώματι and τῆς σαρκὸς (τῇ σαρκί)—with Col. ii. by the references to the abolition of δόγματα, to the removal of a μέσον, to the Cross, and by the supplementary statement as to something accomplished by the instrumentality of the latter (ἐν αὐτῷ following an aorist participle in both places). The Ephesian passage, thus closely connected with the others by its wording, yet embraces quite a distinct idea. Common to all three is the thought of the Cross as the instrument of man's reconciliation to God; but while in Col. i. this is deduced from the idea of its cosmic efficacy, and in Col. ii. is connected with that of cancelling a bond or indictment (and while in each of the two Colossian passages the process has reference also to superhuman beings), in Ephes. ii. the common reconciliation of Jew and Gentile to God (v. 16) is in close relation (supra, § 2, d, e) with the removal of the ancient barrier between the two; the ideas ἐχθρα, εἰρήνη, μέσον, δύγμα, are adapted to this specific reference; and lastly the Colossian phrase ἐν τῷ σώματι τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ assumes a new colour, the verbally parallel ἐν ἐνὶ σώματι (cp. Col. iii. 15) referring to the (mystical) body of Christ regarded as embracing all reconciled mankind without distinction, while ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ αὐτοῦ (v. 15) preserves the idea of the literal body of the Crucified, but with the secondary instrumental reference. The Ephesian passage is therefore regarded by both Holtzmann and Pfeiderer as, at least mainly, modelled upon its parallels, the writer having thrown his subject (the reconciliation of Jew and Gentile in Christ) into confusion by borrowing from the passages in Colossians language there used to express a different idea. Hence the changed sense of σῶμα, and the irrelevant ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ αὐτοῦ, irrelevant because "the slain body of Christ cannot well be regarded as a means of reconciliation . . . between Jew and Gentile" (Pfeiderer, p. 180). This extravagant criticism comes strangely from Pfeiderer, who has so clearly drawn out the significance of Christ's death to St. Paul in this respect (i. p. 7, ii. p. 44). The whole argument, in fact, for the priority of Colossians in this parallelism is open to the charge of ignoring, firstly, the main idea of the Epistle to the Ephesians (supra, § 2, d); secondly, the fact that, of the leading thoughts respectively distinctive of the three passages (cosmic efficacy of Christ's death, abolition of the law and consequent unification of all in Christ, abolition of the law as a hostile bond), that of Ephes. ii. 14 is in most immediate contact with the earlier teaching of St. Paul,—whence Holtzmann expunges, inter alia, all cosmic references from the first passage, while Von Soden also condemns part of the third;—thirdly, the extremely plain and straightforward connexion of the whole passage in Ephesians (ii. 11–20), the spontaneous flow of which absolutely forbids the idea of such laboured and unintelligent compilation as its supposed genesis involves.—The above is on the whole the strongest case of supposed priority; and if the result of a careful examination is so indecisive, may we not reasonably say that the method itself is open to suspicion? (Cp. Von Soden, Col. p. 328, "But who does not know how precarious are all conjectures, in literary criticism, as to the relative priority of parallel passages?")

ii. Critical Analysis of Ephesians. This test is supposed to bring to light a more or less studied "literary dependence" on St. Paul's earlier Epistles. The "auctor ad Ephesios," while borrowing most directly from the genitive Colossians, the whole of which, with the exception of its personal and polemic matter, he carefully uses up, has also shown himself a careful student of the rest of the Pauline literature. Of course, in applying this test, everything depends on distinguishing such resemblances and differences as naturally follow from the identity of the writer from such as betray the imitator. But this is exactly the weakest part of Holtzmann's discussion. To substantiate this, in addition to the few instances given above (c. i.), it may be well to examine one or two cases in detail. (1) The parallelism last given (Ephes. ii. 14, &c.) is a case in point. The words ἐχθρα (Rom. xi. 28), ἀποκαταλλάσσειν (καταλλ. Rom. xi. 15, 2 Cor. v. 18 sq.), σῶμα (Rom. vii. 4), ἀποκτείνω (Rom. vii. 11, 2 Cor. ii. 6), are, it is argued, borrowed from St. Paul to express ideas foreign to their original place in his vocabulary. But St. Paul's mind was more elastic than that of his critics: the ideas of slaying and enmity lend themselves to more metaphors than one; while the word σῶμα is admittedly used by him of the Church, and the transition from the literal to the mystic sense of it (Col. i. 22; Ephes. ii. 16) has a strict parallel in 1 Cor. x. 16, 17. To take another example: (2) the alleged imitation of 1 Cor. xv. 20, 23–25, 27, 28, in Ephes. i. 20–23, is clearly due to the natural connexion of ideas, which in a subject so habitually on the Apostle's lips would inevitably bring with it a standing collocation of terms. Once more (3) let us examine the passages Ephes. iv. 22 sqq., Col. iii. 8–10, together with their parallels in other Epistles.

ἀποθέσθαι ὑμᾶς κατὰ τὴν προτέραν ἀναστροφήν τὸν παλαιὸν ἄνθρωπον τὸν φθειρόμενον κατὰ τὰς ἐπιθυμίας τῆς ἀπάτης, ἀνανεῖσθαι δὲ τὸ πνεῦμα τοῦ νοῦς ἡμῶν, καὶ ἐνδύσασθαι τὸν καλὸν ἄνθρωπον τὸν κατὰ θεὸν κτισθέντα ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ ὁσιότητι τῆς ἀληθείας.

Cp. Rom. vi. 6. ὁ παλαιὸς ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος.

2 Cor. iv. 16. εἰ καὶ ὁ ἔσω ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος διαφθείρεται, ἀλλ' ὁ ἔσω ἡμῶν ἀνακαινοῦται . . . 2 Cor. v. 17, καινὴ κτίσις (and Gal. vi. 15).

Rom. xiii. 12, 14. ἀποθώμεθα οὖν . . . ἀλλὰ ἐνδύσασθε τὸν κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν.

In 1872 the latter passages were supposed to have been laid under contribution by the compiler of Ephesians, who subsequently abridged his patchwork in the passage Col. iii. In 1886 the latter is supposed to be from the hand of St. Paul (Holtzm. *Einl.*²; Von Soden, Col. p. 253), the borrowing from the older Epistles on the part of Ephesians being, as a consequence, restricted to the least obvious points of resemblance (φθειρόμενον?). Resemblances which

Col. iii. 8–10.

οὐκ ἐπιθυμοῦμεν οὐδὲ ἐνδύσασθαι τὸν παλαιὸν ἄνθρωπον τὸν κατὰ τὰς ἐπιθυμίας τῆς ἀπάτης, ἀλλὰ ἐνδύσασθαι τὸν καλὸν ἄνθρωπον τὸν κατὰ θεὸν κτισθέντα ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ καὶ ὁσιότητι τῆς ἀληθείας.

were formerly proofs of the "dependence" of Ephesians are now allowed to prove the Pauline authorship of Colossians. If we further recollect that (although Pfeiderer, ii. 188, sees in Ephes. iv. 24 an unintelligent reproduction of Col. iii. 10) the words καὶ ὑμεῖς, Col. iii. 8 (of which Von Soden is therefore anxious to get rid), strongly suggest that the writer had in his mind a similar summons addressed to other readers,—a fact which, taken with Ephes. iv.

22, 25, makes it far more natural to assume that the priority, if any, is here on the side of Ephesians,—the examination of this single instance will have sufficed to show the precarious character of Holtzmann's canon of dependence.

One more example shall be given, this time in his own words, and without comment (Krit. p. 141). "What is said of love, iv. 3, has its double in Rom. xiii. 10, the reference to ἡ ἀγάπη καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα, iv. 4, in 1 Cor. x. 17, xii. 4, Rom. xii. 5. That καλεῖσθαι is constructed with ἐν, in preference to the favourite ἐκ, follows the example of 1 Cor. vii. 15," &c. Holtzmann has certainly collected an admirable mass of illustrative matter for our Epistle (even if not always quite fairly selected), but what evidence does he offer that furnishes solid ground for his theory?

iii. The "original Epistle to the Colossians." As the result of the comparative and critical processes which we have described (parturiunt innotescit . . .), Holtzmann arrives at a supposed genuine relic of St. Paul,—in reality a cento of words and phrases from the Colossian Epistle, in connexions of his own. He analyses it verse by verse with the aim of showing the conformity of its language to the Pauline standard, and does so, we may admit, with success. But, with every wish on his part to avoid the pitfall (Krit. p. 184), it strikes the reader at every turn that the very same phenomena which betray imitation elsewhere are here the credentials of authenticity. For example, while Holtzmann is unable to approve "the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Ephes. v. 5), the phrase in Col. i. 13, τῆν βασιλείαν τοῦ υἱοῦ . . . αὐτοῦ (τῆς ἐκκλησίας is condemned), is in his eyes "an indisputable trace of the Apostle's hand" (p. 172); to Pfeiderer (ii. 112) it is the very reverse. In its reduced form the letter is supposed to gain in clearness, unity of purpose, consecutiveness, and compactness of structure. The two latter are more than doubtful: the "purpose" is the very general one νεκρωτησάτω ὑμᾶς ἅγιος τοῦ Θεοῦ (Col. i. 10); the whole is a laboriously dovetailed piece-work, without colour, point, or passion.

iv. Improbability of Holtzmann's hypothesis. We now come to an unanswerable objection to the hypothesis, quite independent of the foregoing strictures. Could such a process of interpolation have been carried out without leaving its traces upon the textual evidence? It is no answer to appeal to admitted interpolations such as those of the Ignatian letters, for the latter have survived in their earlier form as well. Nor is the appeal to interpolations in classical writers legitimate: for in the case of N. T. writings the evidence is abundant enough to bear traces even of very early alterations in the text [COLOSSIANS]. The most elementary principles of evidence, then, are fatal to such a theory as Holtzmann's. He has, it is true, made some concession to the force of this objection, in his assumption of the identity of the Ephesian compiler and the interpolator of Colossians. Every addition to the dramatis personæ aggravates the unlikelihood of the plot by widening the circle of persons acquainted with the original Pauline letter, and so adds to the force of the demand for evidence of its having ever existed. But the necessity of assuming that the interpolator "rescued" this precious relic "from oblivion" (Krit. p. 305) only to relegate it thither again,—in other words, that its existence was known to one person alone,—is in its turn a sufficient reductio ad absurdum. Accordingly the tendency now is to reduce the number of interpolated passages to such limits as leave the relation between Ephesians and Colossians exactly where Holtzmann found it. Under his guidance we find ourselves as much in a cul de sac as ever.

v. Probable Solution. It is fatal to the theory of reciprocal priority to give up the identity of compiler and interpolator, as has been done by most of those critics who have expressed partial approval of Holtzmann's scheme. We have then to choose between complete dependence on one side or the other, and simultaneous composition by a single author. The former alternative Holtzmann's analysis has shown to be inadmissible. His instances of "priority of Ephesians," for example, may be shown (as by Von Soden) to fall short of proving their case: but the same may be shown of the instances alleged in favour of the converse relation. To both classes of instances, however, we can consistently allow an equal negative validity, as disproving that, the contrary of which they fail to establish. Holtzmann, as is so commonly the case, succeeds in pulling down the assumptions of others, but fails in proving his own. A continuous survey of the language and thought* of the two Epistles shows the impossibility of carrying out any hypothesis of simple dependence on either side, while the only consistently worked out attempt at a more complex solution breaks down, both from the indecisiveness of the internal evidence, from the absolute lack of external proof, and from the improbability of its historical presuppositions.

There is, then, on the assumption of literary dependence, no consistent hypothesis in the field. What then prevents our accepting as true that account of the origin of these letters which they bear upon their face,—that they were simultaneously composed by St. Paul, and sent by him to the same province by the same messenger? Simply the supposed impossibility of simultaneous composition on the one hand; the improbability, on the other, of St. Paul copying his own letters. But this objection must be regarded as altogether unreal. Are not the phenomena of our Epistles such as we should expect in letters written to different persons, but on partially identical subjects, by the same writer, and possibly on the same day?

* The principal names are Hausrath (Ap. Paulus,² and *Zeitgesch.*² vol. iii. "differs in details"); Pfeiderer (see above); Von Soden (In Jahrbücher für prot. Theol. 1885, 1887), who merely expunges eight and a half verses of Colossians, and except as to these substantially goes back to the old view of De Wette, &c.; Schmiel (in Ersch and Gruber, 1886); Mangold (Bleek,⁴ p. 802). These critics generally reject Holtzmann's distinctive hypothesis (reciprocity of relations), but approve the idea of interpolations in Colossians, and dependence of Ephesians, ascribing the latter to a third hand.

* The contention (Hönlg. Zeitschr. wis. Theol. 1872; Pfeiderer, ii. 99, 165, &c.) that the two Epistles betray diversities of thought incompatible with unity of authorship has been incidentally anticipated (§§ 2, d; 3, c). But on the special points of supposed difference, a reference to Lightfoot's notes and Excursus, and often to Holtzmann's discussions, will show the inconclusiveness of the reasons alleged.

B. Relation to the First Epistle of St. Peter.

The resemblances between the two Epistles are such in number^p and in kind as to exclude the idea of accidental coincidence. One instance may be discussed in full:—

Descent and Exaltation of Christ.

Ephes. i. 20-22.

ἐγείρας αὐτὸν καὶ καθίσης ἐν δεξιᾷ αὐτοῦ ἐν τοῖς ἰπουρανίοις ὑπεράνω πάσης ἀρχῆς καὶ ἐξουσίας καὶ δυνάμεως . . . καὶ πάντα ὑπέταξεν ὑπὸ τοὺς πόδας αὐτοῦ.

1 Pet. iii. 19, 21.

19. ἐν ᾧ καὶ τοῖς ἐν φυλακῇ πνεύμασι πορεύεσθε ἐκήρυξε . . .

21. . . . δι' ἀναστάσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, ὅς ἐστιν ἐν δεξιᾷ θεοῦ πορευθεὶς εἰς οὐρανὸν ὑποταγέντων αὐτῇ ἀγγέλων καὶ ἐξουσιῶν καὶ δυνάμεων.

Ephes. iv. 8-10.

τὸ δὲ ἀνέβη τί ἐστὶν εἰ μὴ ὅτι καὶ κατέβη εἰς τὰ κατώτερα μέρη τῆς γῆς; ὁ καταβάς αὐτός ἐστιν καὶ ἄναβας ὑπεράνω πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν . . .

What attracts our attention here is the correspondence of the ideas with which the exaltation of Christ is associated in the two Epistles. On the one hand the subjection, to the risen Christ at the right hand of God in heaven, of Angels and powers (passages 1 and 2), on the other the exaltation (here only in N. T.) coupled with the descent into hades (passages 2 and 3: the reference to the latter doctrine is disputed, but probably correct, in the Ephesians, and overwhelmingly probable in 1 Peter: the latter passage at any rate appears to be founded upon the other, so much so that Holtzmann calls it the first known commentary upon it). The two Epistles are moreover linked by several marked words and expressions applied by either writer in the same way, e.g. πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου, ἀναστροφή, ἄγνοια, ἄκρογωνιαίος, διάβολος;—by the similarity of their opening,—by the scheme of household relations and duties,—by the encyclical character of either,—by the reproduction of the idea of Ephes. iii. 10 in 1 Pet. i. 12 (Angels spectators of the work of Redemption), &c. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that the writer of one Epistle was directly influenced by his knowledge of the other. If the Epistle of Peter is regarded as prior in date, and spurious—so Pfeiderer, Hilgenfeld, &c.—our Epistle of course is condemned also. If 1 Peter is prior but genuine, we have to suppose that St. Paul borrowed from St. Peter. This is the hypothesis of Weiss (Petr. Lehrbegriff, v. 5; Introd. § 25, 6), which is at once obliged to face the fact that 1 Peter shows equally striking correspondences with other Epistles of St. Paul (notably Romans, e.g. Rom. vi. 10, 1 Pet. iv. 1; Rom. ii. 28, 1 Pet. iii. 4, and above all Rom. xii., xiii.). Weiss accepts the challenge by assuming that there also St. Paul is the borrower, a contention (connected with an elaborate theory as to the diffusion of Christianity in Asia Minor at a very early date, and with a special view as to date and readers of 1 Peter) which cannot be discussed here [PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF; ROMANS, EPISTLE TO], but which, in common with almost every one whose opinion is entitled to respect, we regard as untenable. (It is supported by Kühl in the last issue of Meyer's Commentary on 1 Peter. Holtzmann, Einl. p. 517, calls it "the most desperate step upon which modern apologetics have ventured." Weiss' last restatement of his case, Introd. to N. T. § 40.) The other alternative, that 1 Peter borrows from Ephesians, does not affect the genuineness of the latter, and the questions involved in it will be discussed in the art. PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF. It is necessary, however, to mention the attempt of Seufert (Zeitsch. v. is. Theol. 1881, pp. 178, 332) to show that both Epistles are the work of a single author, probably the compiler of the Third Gospel and the Acts. It should in fairness be observed that Seufert only follows up a hint thrown out by Holtzmann (Krit. p. 265, l. 24), without, however, securing even his master's agreement with the result. That the order of ideas in the two Epistles is "on the whole (Krit. ibid., and Seufert repeatedly) similar," is a generalisation which will not bear statement in detail.

γ. Relation to other New Testament writings. The points of contact with the Synoptic Gospels (Holtzm. Krit. p. 248) are numerous though slight: they prove nothing more than that the writer of our Epistle was acquainted with the πεντηκοστήριον of the Apostolic preaching. The connexion with the Third Gospel (χαριστῶν, πανοπλία, δόξης, &c.) is slightly more marked: that with the Acts (cp. supra, § 2, α, β) is not peculiar to our Epistle (cp. e.g. Acts xxvi. 18 with Col. i. 12-14) and forms part of the larger question of the Pauline affinities of the third Evangelist [ACTS; GOSPELS]. The like applies to the coincidences with HEBREWS (e.g. Ephes. v. 26, Heb. xiii. 12, and the Christology), which, it may be added (in agreement with Von Soden, pp. 483-486), are not such as to suggest the dependence of our Epistle (against Holtzm. p. 255, and passim). With regard to the Johannine writings, while Dr. Salmon's remark

^p The following are among the most striking: a fuller list in Weiss (Einl. § 27, 6, note 2, and Petr. Lehrbegriff, p. 425 sq.):

- 1 Pet. i. 3 = Ephes. i. 3.
- 1 Pet. i. 14 = Ephes. v. 11 (and ii. 3).
- 1 Pet. i. 16-18 = Ephes. iv. 22.
- 1 Pet. i. 18-20 = Ephes. i. 4, 7; iv. 17.
- 1 Pet. ii. 1 = Ephes. iv. 21, 25, 31.
- 1 Pet. ii. 4-6 = Ephes. ii. 20 sq.
- 1 Pet. ii. 9 = Ephes. v. 8.
- 1 Pet. ii. 16 = Ephes. vi. 6.

- 1 Pet. ii. 18 = Ephes. vi. 5.
- 1 Pet. iii. 1 = Ephes. v. 22.
- 1 Pet. iii. 18 = Ephes. ii. 18.
- 1 Pet. iii. 19, 21, 22 = Ephes. iv. 8, 9; i. 20-22.
- 1 Pet. iv. 3 = Ephes. v. 7-14.
- 1 Pet. iv. 10 = Ephes. iii. 10; iv. 12?
- 1 Pet. v. 2 = Ephes. iv. 11 (σοφ.).
- 1 Pet. v. 8, 9 = Ephes. vi. 11.

(p. 487, note) that "St. John read and valued St. Paul's writings" is on any theory a sufficient explanation of the few but striking resemblances between the Gospel and our Epistle (those in 1 John are very faint), the relations of the latter to the Apocalypse require a little more discussion. Holtzmann confidently includes the Apocalypse among the materials used by the compiler of Ephesians, and even sees in Rom. xvi. 26 (γραφ. προφ.—see below), Ephes. ii. 20, iii. 3, iv. 11, an express reference to the prophetic (Rev. xiii. 9) author of the former! In this, as when he derives the phrase ἄγιοι ἄστροι. (Ephes. iii. 5) from the indisputably wrong reading of Rev. xviii. 20, and refers Ephes. iii. 18 to the dimensions of the heavenly city in Rev. xxi. 16, we recognize the old fallacy of reading into the phenomena more than they really tell us. The undoubted resemblances (Ephes. i. 15, T. R., and Rev. ii. 4, ii. 20, cp. Rev. xxi. 14; iii. 5, cp. Rev. x. 7; iii. 9, cp. Rev. iv. 11; v. 11, cp. Rev. xviii. 4; v. 25 sq., cp. Rev. xix. 7, xxi., xxii., &c.) are partly explicable (as in the last instance mentioned) by common use of O. T. symbolism, and partly lend themselves at least as easily to Dr. Salmon's explanation as to that of Holtzmann.

It remains to add a few supplementary remarks as to the relation of our Epistle to St. Paul's undoubted writings. Rejecting the idea of literary dependence, as the result of an arbitrary method of investigation (as shown by its now generally admitted failure as applied to the greater portion of Colossians), and taking as admitted the general conformity of our Epistle to the Pauline theology, we remark: (1) the peculiar resemblance to it, in language and ideas, of the doxology in Rom. xvi. 25-27 (Ephes. iii. 5, 20 sq., &c.). Holtzmann ascribes the doxology to his "Autor ad Ephesios," and there are well-known textual grounds which warrant the suggestion that the doxology may be nearer in date to our Epistle than to that of which it now forms the conclusion (see ROMANS and Gifford's Introduction to that Epistle). (2) Use made of the Old Testament. To estimate the influence of the LXX. upon the forms both of thought and of language in our Epistle, recourse must be had to the commentaries: a glance at the text as printed by Westcott and Hort will show the most conspicuous instances, but by no means all. The quotations are mostly according to the LXX., but not in every case dependent upon it: in particular, iv. 8 (Ps. lxxviii. 19) betrays familiarity with rabbinical exegesis (cp. v. 32 and Meyer on both places); v. 31, iv. 25, 26, &c. are free quotations and combinations quite in St. Paul's manner, while v. 14 (cp. Is. xxvi. 19, ii. 17, lii. 1, lx. 1, 2; Ps. xlv. 23) presents a problem closely analogous to that of 1 Cor. ii. 9 (ἑρμηνεία). Moreover the characteristic ideas of our Epistle—Christ the Corner-stone, Peace preached to those far and near, the heavenly spouse, the Church wedded to her Lord (see above, § 2, d), &c.—find close points of contact in the Old Testament.

Relation to Philippians. The use frequently made of that Epistle in the foregoing discussion brings the genuineness of Ephesians into close reciprocal connexion with the order of the Epistles of the Imprisonment. The latter fall into two sub-groups, of which Philip-prians by itself constitutes one. If our Epistle is genuine, the sub-group to which it belongs must be placed after, not as has usually been supposed before, the other. If, again, there are independent grounds for putting Philippians earlier in the Roman imprisonment than has been usually inferred, and as near as possible to the great polemic group (Lightfoot, Philipp., Introd.; PHILIPPIANS), not only is a real psychological objection to the Pauline authorship of our Epistle (ably put by Pileiderer, i. p. 31, note) removed, but an important link is recovered between our Epistle and the "Pauline homologumena." This is conspicuously true of the Christology (allowed by Holtzmann, supra, c. ii.), of the stress laid upon ἐκκλησία and cognate ideas, of the position assigned to good works (Philip. ii. 12, 13), of the practical teaching (Philip. i. 27, cp. Ephes. iv. 1, 4), of the "wealth" of God in Christ (Philip. iv. 19; Ephes. i. 18, &c.), of the true and false πνεύματι (Philip. iii. 3; Ephes. ii. 11): cp. also Ephes. iii. 19 with Philip. iii. 8, iv. 7; Ephes. ii. 6 with Philip. iii. 20; Ephes. v. 21 with Philip. ii. 3; Ephes. v. 19 with the tone of Philip. iv. 4, 6. Considering the shortness of the Epistle to Philippians and the great proportion of it taken up with personal matter, the instances given—and they might be multiplied—of its affinity in ideas and language with our Epistle are striking enough. If it reaches out one hand (see Lightfoot's parallel passages) to the Pauline homologumena, it touches Ephesians and Colossians with the other. (The points of contact with Colossians are not limited to the matter common to Ephes. Col., but make in the same direction as those here given; a list is given by Von Soden, Col. p. 541.)

f. Summary of literary question and conclusion of question of Authenticity.—An examination of the relations between our Epistle and other New Testament writings has shown the failure of all attempts hitherto made to construct, upon that basis, an account of its origin which can weigh in the balance against that which the letter bears upon its face. The ablest and only complete attempt of the kind, that of Holtzmann, has been adopted, in its essential points, by nobody, although it has been before the world for nineteen years. An examination of it upon its merits has not gained us over to its side. On the contrary, the Epistle's own account of itself has received incidental confirmation from more sources than one. Since, then, literary and historical indications (supra, d) alike fail to confront that account with any rival or counter-theory, and since the purely negative objections are, to say the least, indecisive (supra, a-c), what is there to stay judgment in the case? True, it is easier to meet specific charges than to prove positively the Pauline character of an Epistle. If we take as the tests of the "pectus Paulinum" mystical depth, dogmatic firmness, warmth of personal feeling, polemic incisiveness—the last being excluded by the scope of our Epistle—then the others, we venture to say, are all there. Still, the appeal must be, from the nature of the case, lectorī cordato; the matter is one of taste and feeling, not one to be argued.

Without attempting, therefore, to prove what is no subject for demonstration, we accept the Epistle's own account of its authorship, supported as it is by the unanimous testimony of antiquity, and uncontradicted by any decisive test or by the claims of any equally probable theory of its origin. We will only add, in the words of Erasmus, to which modern investigations have only lent an added significance, "non est cuiusvis hominis Pauli pectus effingere." If the exact theological idiosyncrasy of St. Paul, "so Jewish in its foundations, so anti-Jewish in its results" (as in this Epistle, supra, § 2, d), was so little understood by the generation which succeeded him,—if, in fact, "Paulinism as a living whole existed but once, and that in the mind of its original exponent" (Holtzm. Einv. p. 105 sq.), then the attempt to insert the Epistle to the Ephesians in the sub-apostolic cycle, to class it with the Epistles of Clement and Barnabas, the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, and the other literature of that singularly uncreative period, is a historical paradox, and nothing more.

§ 4. TEXT—LITERATURE.

(1) The text of Ephesians has suffered less from assimilation than that of Colossians: the longer and more general would seem to have somewhat overshadowed the shorter and more special Epistle. But there are striking assimilations of Ephesians to Colossians in such passages, among others, as i. 15, τὴν ἀγαπήν, N^cD., Vulg., Syr. Verss., many Fathers (= Col. i. 4); om. NAB., Orig., Hier., &c. (see WH); iii. 7, τὴν δοξασίαν, D^eE., &c., and Greek Fathers (= Col. i. 25): τῆς δοξασίας, NBD.*, Vulg., &c.; v. 22, ὑποτάσασθε, KL., Syr., Chrys. (= Col. iii. 18, but -σώσαν, NA. Verss., Greek Fathers, &c. = ὡς ἔν, Col. ?): om. B. and MSS. seen by Jerome. Among textual crucis may be mentioned iii. 9, πάντας; iii. 11, ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ: while in iii. 5 the view of ἁγίους suggested above is adopted by Lachmann and Tregelles, who place a comma after the word,—the suggestion of some primitive disturbance in the text finding support in a certain confusion in the readings (Orig., Theod. omit ἁγίους; B. Ambrst omit ἀποστ.; several MSS. and Fathers put αὐτοῦ before ἀποστ.), coupled with the fact that in early times the difficulty of the words as they stand would scarcely be felt. On the materials for the text, see COLOSSIANS, but add that with the exception of C, which contains only ii. 18–iv. 16 of our Epistle, the materials for Ephesians are slightly more abundant (e.g. for the Old Lat. r. contains Ephes. i. 16–ii. 16).

(2) Literature.—For general commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, see ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE, and the Introd. to Meyer's Romans (E. Tr.). For patristic commentaries on our Epistle, see COLOSSIANS (and cp. Lightfoot in Galatians, p. 223 sq.). For Ephesians, Cramer's Catena preserves many valuable fragments of Origen's commentary (see Dict. Christ. Biog. vol. iv. p. 118). For a full list of modern commentaries, see the Introd. to Meyer's Ephesians (Eng. Tr.); another list in the last German edition by Schmidt. Among the older special commentaries on Ephesians (mentioned in the 1st ed. of this Dict.), Harless (1834, 2nd ed., 1858) stands pre-eminent for point and thoroughness, and still well repays consultation. The most recent German commentaries (in addition to Ewald's Sendschreiben des Ap. Paulus, 1857; Sieben Sendschr. des N. B. 1870) are those of Schenkel in the 1st ed. of Lange's Bibelwerk

(2nd separate ed., 1867, when Braune's commentary took the place of it in Lange), Bleek (1867), and Woldemar Schmidt (6th German ed. of Meyer, 1886, very judiciously retouched). Ellicott (3rd ed. 1864) remains the standard English edition; that of Llewelyn Davies (2nd ed., 1884) is brief, but able, reverent, and often suggestive; while that by Moule (Camb. Bib. Sch. 1886) is careful and concise, though the exegesis is apt to be founded upon doctrinal presuppositions. The doctrine and ethics of the Epistle are the subject of the Lectures of R. W. Dale (3rd ed., 1887), a masterpiece of insight and theological grasp, and the best possible introduction to the thought of the Epistle. Bishop Lightfoot's Colossians contains much incidental matter relating to Ephesians: his commentary on the latter, promised in the Introduction to Colossians, was not completed. Beet and Klöpffer have published editions (1891), and one by Von Soden is announced. Of works other than commentaries, Holtzmann's Kritik (1872), so often quoted above, is, whatever may be thought of its method and conclusions, a thorough and luminous manual of almost everything bearing upon the question of authorship; Von Soden, in Jahrb. für Prot. Theol. 1887, is most able, especially on the theology of the Epistle, although the view taken by him is not that maintained in the present article. It has been referred to above as "Von Soden" simply. "Von Soden, Col." refers to his articles on Colossians, 1885. Of articles on the Epistle, the most recent is by Schmiechel in Ersch and Gruber's Encycl. (1886, commended by Holtzmann); that in Herzog² (under "Paulus") is by Wold. Schmidt, and is worth consulting (the article in Herzog¹ by Weiss has been referred to above). Nothing new will be found in Riehm's HWB. ("Ephesus"). In the Bibel-Lex. the article is Schenkel's own; that by Dr. Milligan in the Encycl. Brit. is excellent. [A. R.]

EPHESUS (Ἐφεσός), an illustrious city in the district of Ionia (πόλις Ἰωνίας ἐπιφανέστατη, Steph. Byz. s. v.), nearly opposite the island of Samos, and about the middle of the western coast of the peninsula commonly called Asia Minor. Not that this geographical term was known in the 1st century. The ASIA of the N. T. was simply the Roman province which embraced the western part of the peninsula (Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, ch. viii. See especially Marquardt's Römische Alterthümer, vol. iv.). Of this province Ephesus was the capital.

Among the more marked physical features of the peninsula are the two large rivers, Hermus and Maeander, which flow from a remote part of the interior westward to the Archipelago, Smyrna (Rev. ii. 8) being near the mouth of one and Miletus (Acts xx. 17) of the other. Between the valleys drained by these two rivers is the shorter stream and smaller basin of the Cayster, called by the Turks Kuchuk Mendere, or the Little Maeander. Its upper level (often called the Caystrian meadows) was closed to the westward by the gorge between Gallesus and Pactyas, the latter of these mountains being a prolongation of the range of Messogis which bounds the valley of the Maeander on the north, the former more remotely connected with the range of Tmolus which bounds the valley of the Hermus on the south. Beyond the gorge and towards the sea the valley opens out again into an alluvial flat (Herod. ii. 10), with hills rising abruptly from it. The plain is now about five miles in breadth, but formerly it must have been smaller; and some of the hills were once probably islands. Here Ephesus stood, partly on the level ground and partly on the hills. The early history of Ephesus was an oscillation between the ascendancy of the Greek city on the hills and the old Asiatic temple on the plain.

Of the hills, on which a large portion of the city was built, the two most important were Prion (or Pion) and Coressus, the latter on the S. of the plain, and being in fact almost a continuation of Pactyas, the former being in front of Coressus and near it, though separated by a deep and definite valley. The height of the Acropolis on Coressus is about 1250 ft.; that of Prion, about 500 ft. On the east side of Prion is a church, cut in the solid rock, which is said to have been dedicated to the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus (J in Map, p. 970). Further to the N.E. is another conspicuous eminence, about 250 ft. high. It seems to be the hill mentioned by Pro-

Ephesus from the Theatre. (From Laborde.)

In the centre are the ruins of the "Great Gymnasium," with the "Civil Port" beyond them, and a hill crowned with the "Prison of St. Paul" in the middle distance. To the left of this hill are the slopes of Coressus, and, to the right, the windings of the Caystrus.

copius (de Aedif. v. 1) as one on which a church dedicated to St. John was built; and the present name of the village on its slopes, Ayasoluk, is a corruption of "Ἅγιος Θεολόγος." Considerable remains of a church were found in excavations on the hill: these may perhaps be identified with St. John's church, which was in existence when the Council of Bishops assembled in 431 A.D. Among the coins found under the Turkish pavement on the site of the temple of Diana were a number bearing the legend moneta pax fit in Theologo.

Ephesus is closely connected with St. John, not only as being the scene (Rev. i. 11; ii. 1) of the most prominent of the churches of the Apocalypse, but also in the story of his later life as given by Eusebius. Possibly his Gospel and Epistles were written here. The so-called "Tomb of St. Luke," S. of Prion (F in Map), is a Greek polyandron (Prof. W. M. Ramsay's Historical Geography of Asia Minor, 1890, p. 110). "St. Paul's Prison" is the name fancifully given to the other ruins of an ancient fort on the crest of a hill between the "Civil Port" and the sea (L in Map). There is a tradition that the mother of our Lord was buried at Ephesus, as also Timothy and St. John: and Ignatius addressed one of his epistles to the church of this place (τῆ ἐκκλησίᾳ τῆ ἀξιωμακαρίστω, τῆ ὁσῆ ἐν Ἐφέσῳ τῆς Ἀσίας, Hefele, Pat. Apostol. p. 154; Lightfoot's Ignatius, p. 27), which held a conspicuous position during the early ages of Christianity, and was in fact the metropolis of the churches of this part of Asia. But for direct Biblical illustration we must turn to the life and writings of St. Paul, in following which minutely it is remarkable how all the most characteristic features of ancient Ephesus come successively into view.

1. Geographical Relations.—These may be viewed in connexion, first with the sea and then with the land.

All the cities of Ionia were remarkably well situated for the growth of commercial prosperity (Herod. i. 142), and none more so than Ephesus. With a fertile neighbourhood and an excellent climate, it was also most conveniently placed for traffic with all the neighbouring parts of the Levant. In the time of Augustus it was the great emporium of all the regions of Asia within the Taurus (Strabo, xiv. p. 950): its harbour (named Panormus), at the mouth of the Cayster, was injudiciously reconstructed in the time of Attalus (ib. p. 641), and the consequent increase of alluvial matter caused serious hindrances, especially in St. Paul's own time (Tac. Ann. xvi. 23). The Apostle's life alone furnishes illustrations of its mercantile relations with Achaia on the W., Macedonia on the N., and Syria on the E. At the close of his second missionary circuit, he sailed across from Corinth to Ephesus (Acts xviii. 19) when on his way to Syria (ib. 21, 22); and there is some reason for believing that he once made the same short voyage over the Aegean in the opposite direction at a later period [CORINTHIANS, FIRST EPISTLE TO]. On the third missionary circuit, besides the notice of the journey from Ephesus to Macedonia (xix. 21; xx. 1), we have the coast voyage on the return to Syria given in detail (xx. xxi.), and the geographical relations of this city with the islands and neighbouring parts of the coast minutely indicated (xx. 15–17). To these passages we must add 1 Tim. i. 3, 2 Tim. iv. 12, 20; though it is difficult to say confidently whether the journeys implied there were by land or by water. See likewise Acts xix. 27; xx. 1.

As to the relations of Ephesus to the inland regions of the continent, these also are prominently brought before us in the Apostle's travels. The "upper coasts" (τὰ ἄνωρρηκὰ μέρη, Acts xix. 1) through which he passed, when about to take up his residence in the city, were the Phrygian table-lands of the interior; and it was probably in the same district that on a previous occasion (Acts xvi. 6) he formed the unsuccessful project of preaching the Gospel in the district of Asia. Two great roads at least, in the Roman times, led eastward from Ephesus; one through the passes of Tmolus to Sardis (Rev. iii. 1) and thence to Galatia and the N.E., the other round the extremity of Paectyas to Magnesia, and so up the valley of the Maeander to Laodicea and Colossae, and thence to the east as far as the Euphrates, with cross-roads running south to Iconium, Tarsus, and the Syrian Antioch (Prof. Ramsay, l. c. p. 49). There was a Magnesian gate on the E. side of Ephesus (Wood's Ephesus, p. 79). There were also roads leading northwards to Smyrna and southwards to Miletus. By the latter of these it is probable that the Ephesian elders travelled, when summoned to meet Paul at the latter city (Acts xx.

17, 18). Part of the pavement of the Sardian road has been noticed by travellers under the cliffs of Mount Galesus. All these roads, and others, are exhibited on the map in Leake's Asia Minor. See also the Index Map in Prof. Ramsay, l. c.

2. Temple and worship of Diana.—Conspicuous among the buildings of Ephesus was the great temple of Diana or Artemis, the tutelary divinity of the city. The earlier temple, which had been begun by Chersiphron before the Persian war, and afterwards enlarged, or even rebuilt, by Paeonius in the 5th century (Vitruv. vii. praef. 16; iii. 2, § 7), constituted an epoch in the history of Greek art; since it was here first that the graceful Ionic order was perfected (Vitruv. iv. 1, 7). This temple was burnt down by Herostratus, B.C. 356, in the night when Alexander the Great was born (Strabo, xiv. 1); and another structure, raised by the enthusiastic co-operation of all the inhabitants of "Asia," took its place (Greek Inscriptions in the British Museum, iii., 1890, Nos. 518, 519, ed. Hicks). This building was raised on immense substructions, in consequence of the swampy nature of the ground (Pliny, xxxvi. § 95). The architect was Dinocrates, a Macedonian, and among the sculptors employed in its decoration was Scopas. Its dimensions as given by Pliny, l. c., were very great. In length it was 425 feet, and in breadth 220. The columns were 127 in number, and each of them was 60 feet high. The magnificence of this sanctuary was a proverb throughout the civilised world ('Ο τῆς Ἀπρείδου ναὸς ἐν Ἐφέσῳ μόνος ἐστὶ θεῶν ὄλκος, Philo Byz. Spect. Mund. 7). All these circumstances give increased force to the architectural allegory in the great Epistle which St. Paul wrote in this place (1 Cor. iii. 9–17), to the passages where imagery of this kind is used in the Epistles addressed to Ephesus (Eph. ii. 19–22; 1 Tim. iii. 15, vi. 19; 2 Tim. ii. 19, 20), and to the words spoken to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts xx. 32).

The site of the famous temple remained long unknown. In 1824 Colonel Leake appears to have been the first to make any sensible suggestion as to the place where it should be sought. In 1863, Mr. J. T. Wood excavated the Odeum on the S. side of Mount Prion. In the Odeum he discovered several inscriptions containing mention of Publius Vedium Antoninus, γραμματεὺς of the city. One of these is a copy of a letter from Antoninus Pius to the magistrates and council of Ephesus (between 140 and 144 A.D.), dealing with a dispute between Ephesus and Smyrna on matters of titular precedence (Greek Inscriptions in the British Museum, iii., 1890, No. 489, p. 154, ed. Hicks). In 1866–8, Mr. Wood explored the Great Theatre (A) on the western slope of Prion. Among the inscriptions here discovered was a series of decrees, chiefly relating to more than thirty gold and silver images (ἀπεικονίσματα), being figures of Artemis with two stags, and a variety of emblematical objects, weighing from three to seven pounds each, dedicated to Artemis and ordered to be placed in her temple by a wealthy Roman, C. Vibius Salutaris. On May 25, the birthday of the goddess, these images were to be carried from the temple past the Magnesian Gate to the theatre, and thence to the Coressian Gate, before being taken back to the temple. The date of the decrees, which are now in the British Museum (ib. iii. No. 481, pp. 83, 135, 140, 145), is not much later than A.D. 104. They are thus nearly contemporaneous with Pliny's correspondence with Trajan (about 112 A.D.), and may be regarded as marking a reaction against Christianity, which shows no sign of abatement until perhaps half a century later (A.D. 161).^a

The theatre in which these inscriptions were the manufacturers of silver shrines for the Temple of Artemis (Wood's Discoveries at Ephesus, pp. 73-4). Its diameter was 495 feet, and it has been estimated that it was capable of seating 24,500 persons. Some of the columns in St. Sophia at Constantinople, said to have been taken from the temple at Ephesus, possibly came from this theatre.

Mr. Wood next ascertained the position of the Magnesian Gate to the S.E. of Prion.^b In 1869

he came upon a massive wall, proved to have belonged to the precincts of the temple by an inscription stating that they had been rebuilt by Augustus (Inscr. in Brit. Museum, iii. No. 522; B.C. 6). This wall was built to restrict the limits of the sacred precinct, which had approached too near the city, and had thus unduly facilitated the escape of criminals who claimed the privilege of sanctuary within the precinct (Strabo, p. 641, and Tacitus, Ann. iii. 61). Further, in 1870, he lighted on a marble pavement, 19 feet below the alluvial soil, with drums of columns, 6 feet high, one base being still attached to its plinth. The site of the temple was thus reached, and its style was at once seen to have been similar to that of the temple of Athene Polias at Priene, and of Apollo at Branchidae. The largest and best preserved of the drums was found in 1871, and is now in the British Museum. From the figures carved on it, one of which represents Hermes, it may fairly be presumed that it was one of the 36 columnae caelatae recorded by Pliny, xxxvi. 95. In the subsequent course of the excavations, Mr. Wood discovered the remains of three distinct temples, the earliest of them being that built 500 B.C., for which the solid foundations described by Pliny and Vitruvius were laid. Between 5 and 6 feet below the pavement, and under the foundations of the walls of the cella, he found the layer of charcoal, 3 inches thick, described by Pliny (Wood, l. c. p. 259; Vaux, Greek Cities of Asia Minor, p. 45). The dimensions of the temple were ascertained to be 163 feet 9½ inches by 342 feet 6½ inches, with eight columns in front and two ranks of columns all round the cella. This agrees with the description in Vitruvius. The columns of the peristyle were 100 in number (Wood, l. c. pp. 264-5). He also found in massive pieces beneath the site of the cella a number of archaic fragments of sculpture and ^b Mr. Wood placed the Coressian gate on the N.E. of the city near the Stadium, and was thus led to suppose that the hill on the E. was Coressus, and the range on the S., Prion. As regards the names of the two hills, the converse is the view now generally accepted; while the Coressian gate may be identified with a gate leading towards the sea and situated near the western extremity of the range of Coressus (see Map, and Weber's monograph in Μουσείον και Βιβλιοθήκη της Ευαγγελικής Σχολής, 1884, pp. 4-11; cp. note by Mr. Hicks on Gk. Inscr. in British Museum, iii. p. 140).

found is undoubtedly the same as that mentioned in the Acts as the scene of the uproar caused by architecture which have been identified as remains of the cornice of the archaic temple (A. S. Murray, Journal of Hellenic Studies, x. 1-10, 1889). One or more canals, formed by diverting the waters of the Cayster, and its tributaries, afforded a water-way to the temple, which thus became accessible from the sea (Gk. Inscr. in British Museum, iii. p. 179). An inscription belonging to A.D. 160-1, and partly quoted in note * on p. 967, states that "the Ephesian goddess, whose worship had hitherto been universally recognised, was now being set at nought (ἀτιμάται) in her own native city" (ib. p. 145). The Goths are credited with the partial destruction of the last of the several successive temples, A.D. 262; and some twenty years later its total destruction was accomplished by the early Christians.

^a This is the date of an important inscription which may fairly be interpreted "as an involuntary confession of the subsequent decline of the Artemis-worship under the growing influence of the new faith" (ib. No. 482, p. 146). The speech of Demetrius in Acts xix. 27-28 finds a parallel in part of this document, B (1): [ὁ]φεν τῆς πρώτης καὶ μεγίστης μητροπόλεως τῆς Ἀσίας καὶ ἐκ τῶν ἄλλων τῶν Σεβαστῶν καὶ φιλοσεβαστῶν Ἐφεσίων πόλεως τῆ βουλή καὶ τῆ δήμου· περὶ ὧν εἰσῆλθῆται—Ἀγαθά· Ἄριστος φιλοσεβαστος· ὁ γραμματεὺς τοῦ δήμου· ἐπέφησαν δὲ οἱ στρωματῶν τῆς πόλεως φιλοσεβαστοι· [ὁ]σὼν ἢ ἠροστώσα τῆς πόλεως ἡμῶν θεὸς Ἄρτεμις οὐ αἶμα ἢ τῆ ἀντὶς πατρίδ· ἀτιμάται, ἢν ἄλλων ἀπασῶν πόλεων· ἐπιφοβῶν δὲ τῆς ἰδίας θεῖτης[ος] πεποιθῆκεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ παρὰ [Ἐλλοσίν τε καὶ] [Ἰερσάρ]οις, ὥστε πάλαι· ἀνοῦσαι αὐτῆς ἰερά τε καὶ τιμάς· κ.τ.λ. (ib. pp. 144, 294).

The chief points connected with the uproar at Ephesus (Acts xix. 23-41) are mentioned in the article DIANA; but the following details must be added. In consequence of this devotion the city of Ephesus was called νεωκόπος (v. 35), "temple-keeper" (R.V.) or "warden" of Artemis. This was a recognised title applied in such cases, not only to individuals, but to communities. In the instance of Ephesus, the term is frequently found both on coins (Transactions of the Numismatic Society, 1841) and on inscriptions (see below). Its neocorate was, in fact, as the "town-clerk" (ὁ γραμματεὺς) said, proverbial (Guhl's Ephesiaca, pp. 114, 115). Another consequence of the celebrity of the worship of Artemis at Ephesus was, that a large manufactory grew up there of small silver shrines (ραοί, v. 24), which strangers purchased and devotees carried with them on journeys or set up in their houses. [See DIANA, p. 782.] Of the manufacturers engaged in this business, perhaps Alexander the "coppersmith" (ὁ χαλκεύς,

In the background the highest point is the Acropolis on Coronaeus (1250 ft.), with part of the city-walls running along the ridge; and, below it, towards the left, the slopes of Lepra (about 500 ft.). To the extreme left of the city-wall across the plain is the Magnesian Gate. To the right of Lepra and the Acropolis is the summit of Prion (about 500 ft.). To the extreme right is a hill (280 ft.), crowned with the "Prison of St. Paul." The precincts of the temple are approached by two routes:—(1) to the left, leaving the wall near the tomb of Androclus; and (2) to the right, leaving it near the Stadium (see Map).

2 Tim. iv. 14) was one. The case of Demetrius the "silversmith" (ἀργυροποιός in the Acts) is explicit. He was alarmed for his trade, when he saw the Gospel, under the preaching of St. Paul, gaining ground upon idolatry and superstition; and he spread a panic among the craftsmen of various grades, the τεχνίται (v. 24) or designers, and the ἐργάται (v. 25) or common workmen, if this is the distinction between them. Lastly, as an illustration of the cry "Great is Diana of the Ephesians," we have an inscription in C. I. G. 2963, describing her statue outside Ephesus as "the great goddess Artemis."

3. The Asiarchs.—Public games were connected with the worship of Artemis at Ephesus. They were held in the month of 'Αρτεμισιών, partly corresponding to our March and April.

* See Hicks in Gk. Inscr. in British Museum, iii. p. 79.

The uproar mentioned in the Acts possibly took place at this season. St. Paul was certainly at Ephesus about that time of the year (1 Cor. xvi. 8); and Demetrius might well be peculiarly sensitive, if he found his trade failing at the time of greatest concourse. However this may be, the Asiarchs (Ἀσιάρχαι, R. V. "chief officers of Asia") were present (Acts xix. 31). These were wealthy persons appointed as officers, after the manner of the aediles at Rome, to preside over the games which were held in honour of the Caesars in different parts of the province of Asia, just as other provinces had their Galatarchs, Lyciarchs, &c. Various cities would require the presence of these officers in turn. In the account of Polycarp's martyrdom at Smyrna (chap. 12,—Hefele, Pat. Apost. p. 286) an important part is played by the Asiarch Philip (Lightfoot's Ignatius, p. 967). It is a remarkable proof of the influence which St. Paul had gained at Ephesus, that the Asiarchs took his side in the disturbance. See Dr. Wordsworth's note on Acts xix. 31; Conybeare and Howson, chap. xvi., ii. p. 96, ed. 1865; Hicks in Gk. Inscr. in British Museum, iii. p. 87; and especially Lightfoot's Ignatius, ii. p. 987 sq. [ASIAECHAE.]

4. Study and practice of magic.—Not unconnected with the preceding subject was the remarkable prevalence of magical arts at Ephesus. This also comes conspicuously into view in St. Luke's narrative. The peculiar character of St. Paul's miracles (δυνάμεις οὐ τὰς τυχεύσας, c. 11) would seem to have been intended as antagonistic to the prevalent superstition. In illustration of the magical books which were publicly burnt (v. 19) under the influence of St. Paul's preaching, it is enough here to refer to the Ἐφέσια γράμματα (mentioned in Plutarch's Symposium, vii. 5, 4; Athenaeus, p. 548; Clem. Alex. Str. i. 73; and elsewhere), which were regarded as a charm when pronounced, and when written down were carried about as amulets. The faith in these mystic syllables continued, more or less, till the 6th century. See Conybeare and Howson, chap. xiv., ii. p. 16; Falkener's Ephesus, chap. vi.; and the Life of Alexander of Tralles in the Dict. of Bioy. There is a terracotta tablet with Ἐφέσια γράμματα in the museum at Syracuse. [DIANA, p. 781.]

5. Provincial and municipal government.—It is well known that Asia was a proconsular province; and in harmony with this fact we find ἀνθύπατοι ("proconsuls," R. V.; "deputies," A. V.) specially mentioned (v. 38). Nor is it necessary to inquire here whether the plural in this passage is generic, or whether the governors of other provinces were present in Ephesus at the time. Again we learn from Pliny (N. H. v. § 120) that Ephesus was an assize-town (forum or conventus); and in the sacred narrative (v. 38) we find the court-days alluded to as actually being held (ἀγῶναι ἐγούσαι, R. V. "the courts are open") during the uproar; though perhaps it is not absolutely necessary to give the expression this exact reference as to time (see Wordsworth). Ephesus itself was a "free city," and had its own assemblies and its own magistrates. The βουλή is mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xiv. 10, § 25; xvi. 6, §§ 4, 7); and St. Luke, in the narrative before us, speaks of the δῆμος (vv. 30, 33; A. V. "the people") and of its customary assemblies (τῆ ἐνόνῳ ἐκκλησίᾳ, v. 39; R. V. "the regular assembly"). That the tumultuary meeting which was gathered on the occasion in question should take place in the theatre (v. 29, 31) was nothing extraordinary. It was at a meeting in the theatre at Caesarea that Agrippa I. received his death-stroke (Acts xii. 23), and in Greek cities this was often the place for large assemblies (Tac. Hist. ii. 80; Val. Max. ii. 2). We even find conspicuous mention made of one of the most important municipal officers of Ephesus, the "Town-Clerk" (γραμματεὺς), or keeper of the records, whom we know from other sources to have been a person of great influence and responsibility.

It is remarkable how all these political and religious characteristics of Ephesus, which appear in the sacred narrative, are illustrated by inscriptions and coins. An ἀρχεῖον or state-paper office is mentioned on an inscription in Chishull's Travels in Turkey, p. 20. The γραμματεὺς frequently appears; so also the Ἀσιαρχαί and ἀνθύπατοι. Sometimes these words are combined in the same inscription: see for instance Boeckh, Corp. Inscr. 2999, 2994. The following is worth quoting at length, as containing also the words δῆμος and νεοκῆρος:—Ἡ φιλοσέβαστος Ἐφεσίων βουλή καὶ ὁ νεοκῆρος δῆμος καθιέρωσαν ἐπὶ ἀνθυπάτου Πειδικαίου Πρεισκείου ψηφισαμένου Τιβ. ΚΑ. Ἰταλικῶ τοῦ γραμματέως τοῦ δήμου, 2966 (about 127 A.D.). See also 2968, 2977, 2972. Among the inscriptions discovered by Mr. Wood we have some early in the 2nd century of our era, including phrases such as ἡ νεοκῆρος Ἐφεσίων πόλις, and ὁ νεοκῆρος δῆμος.⁴ (For further illustrations, see article by E. L. Hicks in the Coin of Ephesus, exhibiting the Temple of Diana.

Expositor, June 1890, No. 6.) The coins of Ephesus are full of allusions to the worship of Artemis in various aspects. The word νεοκῆρος is of frequent occurrence. That which is given above has also the word ἀνθύπατος: it exhibits an image of the temple, and, bearing as it does the name and head of Nero, it must have been struck about the time of St. Paul's stay at Ephesus.

In the inscriptions of Ephesus we find frequent mention of a board of νεοποιοί who had charge of the fabric of the temple of Artemis (Hicks, Gk. Inscr. in British Museum, iii. p. 80 b). In the inscription recording the bequest by Salutaris (ib. No. 481) two of the νεοποιοί are directed to accompany the procession of images from the pronaos of the temple, and to see that they were brought back safely (ib. p. 81 a). By the side of the civic βουλή and δῆμος, there was founded in the time of Lysimachus, about 300 B.C. (Strabo, p. 640), an important body called the γερονσία, which was probably engaged, from the very first, with matters of religion (Hicks, ib. pp. 71–78, 105, where it is conjectured that the γερονσία of the Roman time was a continuation of the γερονσία of Lysimachus).

Each of these three bodies had a γραμματεὺς, and it was the γραμματεὺς τοῦ δήμου that, in Roman times, was the most prominent of the three. "As the real vigour of the ἐκκλησία declined in the atmosphere of imperial rule, while at the same time the forms of the free republic were retained, it was more and more left to the γραμματεὺς to arrange the business of the public assembly." The importance of this official is proved by the extant inscriptions of Ephesus. "It is therefore one example the more of St. Luke's accuracy in speaking of titles, when in Acts xix. 35 sq. he describes the γραμματεὺς as possessed of great influence with the assembly and keenly sensible of his own responsibility" (ib. p. 82 a).

We should enter on doubtful ground if we were to speculate on the Gnostic and other errors which grew up at Ephesus in the later apostolic age, and which are foretold in the address at Miletus, and indicated in the Epistle to the Ephesians, and more distinctly in the Epistles to Timothy. It is more to our purpose if we briefly put down the actual facts recorded in the N. T. as connected with the rise and early progress of Christianity in this city.

That Jews were established there in considerable numbers is known from Josephus (l. c.), and might be inferred from its mercantile eminence; but it is also evident from Acts ii. 9, vi. 9. In harmony with the character of Ephesus as a place of concourse and commerce, it is here, and here only, that we find disciples of John the Baptist explicitly mentioned after the Ascension of Christ (Acts xviii. 25; xix. 3). The case of Apollos (xviii. 24) is an exemplification further of the intercourse between this place and Alexandria. The first seeds of Christian truth were possibly sown at Ephesus immediately after the Great Pentecost (Acts ii.). Whatever previous plans St. Paul may have entertained (xvi. 6), his first visit was on his return from the second missionary circuit (xviii. 19-21); and his stay on that occasion was very short: nor is there any proof that he found any Christians at Ephesus; but he left there Aquila and Priscilla (c. 19), who both then and at a later period (2 Tim. iv. 19) were of signal service. In St. Paul's own stay of more than two years (xix. 8, 10; xx. 31), which formed the most important passage of his third circuit, and during which he laboured, first in the synagogue (xix. 8), and then in the school of Tyrannus (c. 9), and also in private houses (xx. 20), and during which he wrote the First Epistle to the Corinthians, we have the period of the chief evangelization of this shore of the Aegean. The direct narrative in Acts xix. receives but little elucidation from the Epistle to the Ephesians, which was written after several years from Rome; but it is supplemented in some important particulars (especially as regards the Apostle's personal habits of self-denial, xx. 34) by the address at Miletus. This address shows that the church at Ephesus was thoroughly organised under its presbyters. At a later period TIMOTHY was set over them, as we learn from the two epistles addressed to him. Among St. Paul's other companions, two, Trophimus and Tychicus, were natives of Asia (xx. 4), and the latter probably (2 Tim. iv. 12), the former certainly (Acts xxi. 29), natives of Ephesus. In the same connexion we ought to mention Onesiphorus (2 Tim. i. 16-18) and his household (iv. 19). On the other hand must be noticed certain specified Ephesian antagonists of the Apostle, the sons of Sceva and his party (Acts xix. 14), Hymenaeus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 14), and Phygelus and Hermogenes (2 Tim. i. 15).

The site of ancient Ephesus has been visited and examined by many travellers during the last 200 years; and descriptions, more or less copious, have been given by Pococke, Tournefort, Spion and Wheler, Chandler, Poujoulat, Prokesch, Beaujour, Schubert, Arundell, Fellows, and Hamilton. The fullest accounts are, among the older travellers, in Chandler, and, among the more recent, in Hamilton. Some views are given in the second volume of the Ionian Antiquities, published by the Dilettanti Society. Leake, in his Asia Minor, has a discussion on the dimensions and style of the Temple. Falkener published in 1862 an elaborate work on Ephesus, with numerous sketches taken on the spot during a fortnight's visit seventeen years before. Finally, in 1877, appeared Mr. Wood's important volume entitled Discoveries at Ephesus, including the Site and Remains of the great Temple of Diana; a popular account of Modern Discoveries on the Site of Ancient Ephesus by the same author was published by the Religious Tract Society in 1890. The ruins are of vast extent, both on the hills and on the plain: the map on the opposite page, drawn under the superintendence of Sir Charles Wilson, explains most of the topographical details.

To the works above referred to must be added, Gronov. Antiq. Graec. vii. 387-401; Perry, De Rebus Ephesiorum (Gött. 1837), a slight sketch; Guhl, Ephesiaca (Berl. 1843), a very elaborate work; Hemsen's Paulus (Gött. 1830), which contains a good chapter on Ephesus; Biscoe On the Acts (Oxf. 1829), pp. 274-285; an article by Ampère in the Rev. des Deux Mondes for Jan. 1842; Mr. Akerman's paper on the Coins of Ephesus in the Trans. of the Numismatic Soc. 1841; Head's History of the Coinage of Ephesus EPH'LAL (Ἐφλάλ); B. Ἀφάμῃλ, B*. -μηδ, A. Ὀφλάδ; Ophlal), a descendant of Judah, of the family of Hezron and of Jerahmeel (1 Ch. ii. 37).

EPHOD (Ἐφὸδ), a sacred vestment originally appropriate to the high-priest (Ezra xxviii. 4), but afterwards worn by ordinary priests (1 Sam. xxii. 18), and deemed characteristic of the office (1 Sam. ii. 28, xiv. 3; Hos. iii. 4). For a description and illustration of the robe itself, see HIGH-PRIEST. A kind of ephod was worn by Samuel (1 Sam. ii. 18), and by David, when he brought the Ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi. 14; 1 Ch. xv. 27); it differed from the priestly ephod in material, being made of ordinary linen (bad), whereas the other was of fine linen (shesh). See DRESS 1); it is noticeable that the LXX. does not give ἔπωμις or Ἐφὸδ in the passages last quoted, but terms of more general import, στολή ἔξαλλος, στολή βυσσίνω. Attached to the ephod of the high-priest was the breast-plate with the Urim and Thummim: this was the ephod κατ' ἔξοχήν, which Abiathar carried off (1 Sam. xxiii. 6) from the Tabernacle at Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 9), and which David consulted (1 Sam. xxiii. 9, xxx. 7). The importance of the ephod as the receptacle of the breast-plate led to its adoption in the idolatrous forms of worship instituted in the time of the Judges (Judg. viii. 27, xvii. 5, xviii. 14 sq.). The amount of gold used by Gideon in making his ephod (Judg. viii. 26) has led Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 135), Bertheau and others, following the Peshitto Version, to give the word the meaning of an idol-image, as though that and not the priest was clothed with the ephod: but there is no evidence that the idol was so invested, nor is the opinion supported by modern critics (see Keil, Riehm, Kleinert, and Budde [1890]). The ephod itself would require a considerable amount of gold (Ex. xxviii. 6 sq., xxxix. 2 sq.), and, with the jewels necessary, may well have required the large sum stated to have been used by Gideon. The meaning and consequences of his act are considered under GIDEON. [W. L. B.] [F.] E'PHOD (Ἐφὸδ); B. Ζουφί, AF. Οὐφίδ; Ephod). Hanniel the son of Ephod, as head of the tribe of Manasseh, was one of the men appointed to assist Joshua and Eleazar in the apportionment of the land of Canaan (Num. xxiv. 23).

EPHRAIM, Heb. EPH-RA'IM (עִפְרַיִם; 'Eppalū; Joseph. 'Eppalūns: Ephraim), the second son of JOSEPH by his wife Asenath. He was born during the seven years of plenteousness, and an allusion to this is possibly latent in the name, though it may also allude to Joseph's increasing family: "The name of the second he called Ephraim (i.e. double fruitfulness), for God hath caused me to be fruitful (עִפְרַיִם, hiphran) in the land of my affliction" (Gen. xli. 52; xlv. 20).*

The first indication we have of that ascendancy over his elder brother Manasseh, which at a later period the tribe of Ephraim so unmistakably possessed, is in the blessing of the children by Jacob, Gen. xlviii. (see Delitzsch [1887] and Dillmann³ in loco). Like his own father, on an occasion not dissimilar, Jacob's eyes were dim so that he could not see (xlviii. 10; cp. xxvii. 1). The intention of Joseph was evidently that the right hand of Jacob should convey its ampler blessing to the head of Manasseh, his first-born, and he had so arranged the young men. But the result was otherwise ordained. Jacob had been himself a younger brother, and his words show plainly that he had not forgotten this, and that his sympathies were still with the younger of his two grandchildren. He recalls the time when he was flying with the birthright from the vengeance of Esau; the day when, still a wanderer, God Almighty had appeared to him at "Luz in the land of Canaan," and blessed him in words which foreshadowed the name of^b Ephraim; the still later day when the name of Ephrath^c became bound up with the sorest trial of his life (xlviii. 7; xxxv. 16). And thus, notwithstanding the pre-arrangement and the remonstrance of Joseph, for the second time in that family, the younger brother was made greater than the elder—Ephraim was set before Manasseh (xlviii. 19, 20).

Ephraim would appear at that time to have been about 21 years old. He was born before the beginning of the seven years of famine,

* Josephus (Ant. ii. 6, § 1) gives the derivation of the name somewhat differently—"restorer, because he was restored to the freedom of his forefathers;" ἀποδοῦν . . . διὰ τὸ ἀποδοῦναι κ.τ.λ.

^b "I will make thee fruitful," עִפְרַיִם (Gen. xlviii. 4); "Be thou fruitful," עִפְרַיִם (xxxv. 11); both from the same root as the name Ephraim.

^c There seems to have been some connexion between Ephrath, or Bethlehem, and Ephraim, the clue to which is now lost (Ewald, Gesch. i. 493, note). The expression "Ephrathite" is generally applied to a native of Ephrath, i.e. Bethlehem; but there are some instances of its meaning an Ephraimite. These are 1 Sam. i. 1 (see Driver in loco), 1 K. xi. 26; in both of which the Heb. word is accurately transferred to A. V., but is rendered Ephraimite in R. V. But in Judg. xii. 5, where the Hebrew word is the same, and with the definite article (עִפְרַיִמִּית), it is incorrectly rendered "an Ephraimite." In the other occurrences of the word "Ephraimite" in vv. 4, 5, 6 of the same chapter, and in Josh. xvi. 10, the Hebrew is "Ephraim."

towards the latter part of which Jacob had come to Egypt, 17 years before his death (Gen. xlvii. 28). Before Joseph's death Ephraim's family had reached the third generation (Gen. i. 23), and it must have been about this time that the affray mentioned in 1 Ch. vii. 21 occurred, when some of the sons were killed on a plundering expedition along the sea-coast to rob the cattle of the men of Gath, and when Ephraim named a son Beriah, to perpetuate the memory of the disaster which had fallen on his house. [BERIAH.] Obscure as is the interpretation of this fragment, it enables us to catch our last glimpse of the Patriarch, mourning inconsolably in the midst of the circle of his brethren, and at last commemorating his loss in the name of the new child, who, unknown to him, was to be the progenitor of the most illustrious of all his descendants—Jehoshua, or Joshua, the son of Nun (1 Ch. vii. 27; see Ewald, i. 491). To this early period too must probably be referred the circumstance alluded to in Ps. lxxviii. 4, when the "children of Ephraim, carrying slack bows,⁴ turned back in the day of battle." Certainly no instance of such behaviour is recorded in the later history.

The numbers of the tribe do not at once fulfil the promise of the blessing of Jacob. At the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 32, 33; ii. 19) its numbers were 40,500, placing it at the head of the children of Rachel—Manasseh's number being 32,200 and Benjamin's 35,400. But forty years later, on the eve of the conquest (Num. xxvi. 37), without any apparent cause, while Manasseh had advanced to 52,700 and Benjamin to 45,600, Ephraim had decreased to 32,500, the only smaller number being that of Simeon, 22,200. At this period the families of both the brother tribes are enumerated, and Manasseh has precedence over Ephraim in order of mention. During the march through the wilderness the position of the sons of Joseph and Benjamin was on the west side of the Tabernacle (Num. ii. 18-24), and the prince of Ephraim was Elishama the son of Ammihud (Num. i. 10).

It is at the time of the sending of the spies that we are first introduced to the great hero to whom the tribe owed much of its subsequent greatness. The representative of Ephraim on this occasion was "Oshea the son of Nun," whose name was at the termination of the affair changed by Moses to the more distinguished form in which it is familiar to us. As among the founders of the nation Abram had acquired the name of Abraham, and Jacob of Israel, so Oshea, "help," became Jehoshua or Joshua, "the help of Jehovah" (Ewald, ii. 306).

Under this great leader, and in spite of the smallness of its numbers, the tribe must have taken a high position in the nation, to judge from the tone which the Ephraimites assumed on occasions shortly subsequent to the conquest. These will be referred to in their turn.

According to the present arrangement of the records of the Book of Joshua—the "Domesday book of Palestine"—the two great tribes of Judah and Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) first took their inheritance; and after them, the seven other tribes entered on theirs (Josh. xv., xvi.,

xvii. xviii. 5). The boundaries of the portion of Ephraim are given in xvi. 1-10. They include the territory that was afterwards allotted to Dan; but the passage (cp. Dillmann² in loco) is evidently in some disorder, and in our ignorance of the force of many of the almost technical terms with which these descriptions abound, it is unfortunately impossible to arrive at more than an approximation to the case. The south boundary was coincident for part of its length with the north boundary of Benjamin. It probably left the Jordan at the mouth of W. Nüciameh, and, passing N. of Jericho to 'Ain Dik, went up through the hill-country to Bethel, Beitin, and Luz. It then went down by the border of the Archites, 'Ain Artk; Ataroth, Kh. Dârieh, on the S. side of the Lower Beth-horon, Beit 'Ürel-tahta; and Gezer, Tell Jezar, to the Mediterranean. This agrees with the enumeration in 1 Ch. vii. 28, in which Bethel is given as the eastern, and Gezer as the western, limit. The general direction of this line is N.E. by E. The common border of Ephraim and Manasseh is defined in Josh. xvi. 6-8; and partially in xvii. 7-10. From Asher ham Michmethah, E. of Shechem, and probably in the plain of Mukhna, it ran, on the one hand, southward to En-tappuah, Yâsûf, and thence along the course of the river Kanah, W. Kânah, to the sea; and, on the other, eastward to Taanath-Shiloh, Tana; Janoah, Yanûn; Ataroth; Naarah, el-'Aujeh, to Jericho and Jordan. The boundary between Ephraim and Dan, on the west, is not defined; but its approximate position can be ascertained from the notice of certain towns belonging to Dan, and of others in Mount Ephraim. It appears to have run along the crests of the spurs above the low hills of the Shephelah, or "low-land." Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 22) makes the territory of Ephraim extend from the Jordan to Gezer, and from Bethel northwards to the "Great Plain," by which he perhaps means the plain of Mukhna, and not Esdraelon, which was the limit of

Map of Ephraim.

Manasseh. It is very possible that at first there was no definite subdivision of the territory assigned to the two brother-tribes. Such is certainly the inference to be drawn from the very old fragment preserved in Josh. xvii. 14-18, in which the two are represented as complaining that only one portion had been allotted to them. The territory allotted to the "house of Joseph" may be roughly estimated at 55 miles from E. to W. by 70 from N. to S., a portion about equal in extent to the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk combined. But though similar in size, nothing can be more different in its nature from those level counties than this broken and hilly tract. Central Palestine consists of an elevated district which rises from the flat ranges of the wilderness on the south of Judah, and terminates on the north with the slopes which descend into the great plain of Esdraelon. On the west a flat strip separates it from the sea, and on the east another flat strip forms the valley of the Jordan. Of this district the northern half was occupied by the great tribe we are now considering. This was the Har-Ephraim, the "Mount Ephraim," a district which seems to extend as far south as Ramah and Bethel (1 Sam. i. 1, vii. 17; 2 Ch. xiii. 4, 19, compared with xv. 8), places but a few miles north of Jerusalem, and within the limits of Benjamin. In structure it is limestone—rounded hills separated by valleys of denudation, but much less regular and monotonous than the part more to the south, about and below Jerusalem; with "wide plains in the heart of the mountains, streams of running water, and continuous tracts of vegetation" (Stanley, p. 229). All travellers bear testimony to the "general growing richness" and beauty of the country in going northwards from Jerusalem, the "innumerable fountains" and streamlets, the villages more thickly scattered than anywhere in the south, the continuous cornfields and orchards, the moist, vapour atmosphere (Martineau, pp. 516, 521; Van de Velde, i. 386-8; Stanley, pp. 234-5). These are the "precious things of the earth, and the fulness thereof," which are invoked on the "ten thousands of Ephraim" and the "thousands of Manasseh" in the blessing of Moses. These it is which, while Dan, Judah, and Benjamin are personified as lions and wolves, making their lair and tearing their prey among the barren rocks of the south, suggested to the Lawgiver, as they had done to the Patriarch before him, the patient "bullock" and the "bough by the spring, whose branches ran over the wall," as fitter images for Ephraim (Gen. xlix. 22; Deut. xxxiii. 17). And centuries after, when its great disaster had fallen on the kingdom of Israel, the same images recur to the prophets. The "flowers" are still there in the "olive valleys," "faded" though they be (Is. xxviii. 1). The vine is an empty unprofitable vine, whose very abundance is evil (Hos. x. 1); Ephraim is still the "bullock," now "unaccustomed to the yoke," but waiting a restoration to the "pleasant places" of his former "pasture" (Jer. xxxi. 18; Hos. ix. 13, iv. 16)—"the heifer that is taught and loveth to tread out the corn," the heifer with the "beautiful neck" (Hos. x. 11), or the "kine of Bashan on the mountain of Samaria" (Amos iv. 1).

The wealth of their possession had not the same immediately degrading effect on this tribe that it had on some of its northern brethren. [ASHER.] Various causes may have helped to avert this evil. 1. The central situation of Ephraim, in the highway of all communications from one part of the country to another. From north to south, from Jordan to the Sea—from Galilee, or still more distant Damascus, to Philistia and Egypt—these roads all lay more or less through Ephraim, and the constant traffic along them must have always tended to keep the district from sinking into stagnation. 2. The position of Shechem, the original settlement of Jacob, with his well and his "parcel of ground," with the two sacred mountains of Ebal and Gerizim, the scene of the impressive and significant ceremonial of blessing and cursing; and of Shiloh, from whence the division of the land was made, and where the Ark remained from the time of Joshua to that of Eli; and further of the tomb and patrimony of Joshua, the great hero not only of Ephraim but of the nation—the fact that all these localities were deep in the heart of the tribe, must have made it always the resort of large numbers from all parts of the country—of larger numbers than any other place, until the establishment of Jerusalem by David. 3. But there was a spirit about the tribe itself which may have been both a cause and a consequence of these advantages of position. That spirit, though sometimes taking the form of noble remonstrance and reparation (2 Ch. xxviii. 9-15), usually manifests itself in jealous complaint at some enterprise undertaken or advantage gained in which they had not a chief share. To Gideon (Judg. viii. 1), to Jephthah (xii. 1), and to David (2 Sam. xix. 41-43), the cry is still the same in effect—almost the same in words—"Why did ye despise us that our advice should not have been first had?" "Why hast thou served us thus that thou callest us not?" The unsettled state of the country in general, and of the interior of Ephraim in particular (Judg. ix.), and the continual incursions of foreigners, prevented the power of the tribe from manifesting itself in a more formidable manner than by these murmurs, during the time of the Judges and the first stage of the monarchy. Samuel, though a Levite, was a native of Ramah in Mount Ephraim, and Saul belonged to a tribe closely allied to the family of Joseph, so that during the priesthood of the former and the reign of the latter the supremacy of Ephraim may be said to have been practically maintained. Certainly in neither case had any advantage been gained by their great rival in the south. Again, the brilliant successes of David and his wide influence and religious zeal, kept matters smooth for another period, even in the face of the blow given to both Shechem and Shiloh by the concentration of the civil and ecclesiastical capitals at Jerusalem. When Saul fell on Mount Gilboa, Ephraim, in common with all the tribes except Judah, acknowledged Ishbosheth as king (2 Sam. ii. 9). But after the murder of the latter, 20,800 of the choice warriors of the tribe, "men of name throughout the house of their father," went as far as Hebron to make David king over Israel (1 Ch. xii. 30). Among the officers of his court we find more than one Ephraimite (1 Ch. xxvii. 10, 14), and the attachment of the tribe to his person seems to have been great (2 Sam. xix. 41-43). But this could not last much longer, and the reign of Solomon, splendid in appearance but oppressive to the people, developed both the circumstances of revolt, and the leader who was to turn them to account. Solomon saw through the crisis; and if he could have succeeded in killing Jeroboam as he tried to do (1 K. xi. 40), the disruption might have been postponed for another century. As it was, the outbreak was deferred for a time, but the irritation was not allayed, and the insane folly of his son brought the mischief to a head. Rehoboam probably selected Shechem—the old capital of the country—for his coronation, in the hope that his presence and the ceremonial might make a favourable impression, but in this he failed utterly, and the tumult which followed shows how complete was the breach—"To your tents, O Israel! now see to thine own house, David!" Rehoboam was certainly not the last king of Judah whose chariot went as far north as Shechem, but he was the last who visited it as a part of his own dominion, and he was the last who, having come so far, returned unmolested to his own capital. Jehoshaphat escaped, in a manner little short of miraculous, from the risks of the battle of Ramoth-Gilead, and it was the fate of two of his successors, Ahaziah and Josiah—differing in everything else, and agreeing only in this—that they were both carried dead in their chariots from the plain of Esdraelon to Jerusalem.

Henceforward in two senses the history of Ephraim is the history of the kingdom of Israel, since not only did the tribe become a kingdom, but the kingdom embraced little besides the tribe. This is not surprising, and quite susceptible of explanation. North of Ephraim the country appears never to have been really taken possession of by the Israelites. Whether from want of energy on their part, or great stubbornness of resistance on that of the Canaanites, certain it is that of the list of towns from which the original inhabitants were not expelled, the great majority belong to the northern tribes, Manasseh, Asher, Issachar, and Naphtali. And in addition to this original defect there is much in the physical formation and circumstances of the upper portion of Palestine to explain why those tribes never took any active part in the kingdom. They were exposed to the inroads and seductions of their surrounding heathen neighbours—on one side the luxurious Phœnicians, on the other the plundering Bedouins of Midian; they were open to the attacks of Syria and Assyria from the north, and Egypt from the south; the great plain of Esdraelon, which communicated more or less with all the northern tribes, was the natural outlet of the no less natural high roads of the maritime plain from Egypt, and the Jordan valley for the tribes of the East, and formed an admirable base of operations for an invading army.

But on the other hand the position of Ephraim was altogether different. It was one of very great richness and great security. Her fertile plains and well-watered valleys could only be reached by a laborious ascent through steep and narrow ravines, all but impassable for an army. There is no record of any attack on the central kingdom, either from the Jordan valley or the maritime plain. On the north side, from the plain of Esdraelon, it was more accessible, and it was from this side that the final invasion appears to have been made. But even on that side the entrance was so difficult and so easily defensible—as we learn from the description in the Book of Judith (iv. 6, 7)—that, had the kingdom of Samaria been less weakened by internal dissensions, the attacks even of the great Shalmaneser might have been resisted, as at a later date were those of Holofernes. How that kingdom originated, how it progressed, and how it fell, will be elsewhere considered. [ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.] There are few things more mournful in the sacred story than the descent of this haughty and jealous tribe, from the culminating point at which it stood when it entered on the fairest portion of the Land of Promise—the chief sanctuary and the chief settlement of the nation within its limits, its leader the leader of the whole people—through the distrust which marked its intercourse with its fellows while it was a member of the confederacy, and the tumult, dissension, and ungodliness which characterised its independent existence, down to the sudden captivity and total oblivion which closed its career. Judah had her times of revival and of recurring prosperity, but here the course is uniformly downward—a sad picture of opportunities wasted and personal gifts abused. “When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt. . . . I taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by their arms; but they knew not that I healed them. I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love. . . . but the Assyrian shall be their king, because they refused to return. . . . How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee, Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim?” (Hos. xi. 1-8.) [G.] [W.]

EPH-RA'IM (עִפְרַיִם; 'Ephraim; Ephraim)

In “Baal-hazor which is ‘by’ Ephraim” was Absalom’s sheep-farm, at which took place the murder of Amnon, one of the earliest precursors of the great revolt (2 Sam. xiii. 23). The Hebrew particle עַל, rendered above “by” (R. V. “beside”), always seems to imply actual proximity, and therefore we should conclude that Ephraim was not the tribe of that name, but a town. Ewald conjectures that it is identical with EPHRAIM, EPHRON, and OPHRAH of the O. T., and also with the EPHRAIM which was for a time the residence of our Lord (Gesch. iii. 219, note). But with regard to the first three names there is the difficulty that they are spelt with the guttural letter ain, which is very rarely exchanged for the aleph, which commences the name before us. The only clue to its situation is its proximity to Baal-hazor, which has been identified with Tell 'Asûr, 2½ miles N.W. of et-Taiyibeh, Ephraim. The LXX. make the following addition to verse 34:—“And the watchman went and told the king, and said, I have seen men on the road of the Oronen (Β. τῆς Ὀρωνῆν, Α. τῶν ὄρωνῆν) by the side of the mountain.” Ewald considers this to be a genuine addition, and to refer to Beth-horon, N.W. of Jerusalem, off the Nablûs road, but the indication is surely too slight for such an inference. Any force it may have is against the identity of this Ephraim with that in John xi. 54, which was probably in the direction N.E. of Jerusalem. [G.] [W.]

EPH-RA'IM (Ἐφραΐμ; Ephraim; Cod. Amiat. Efren), a city (Ἐ. λεγομένη πόλις) “in the district near the wilderness” to which our Lord retired with His disciples when threatened with violence by the priests (John xi. 54). By the “wilderness” (ἐρημος) is probably meant the wild uncultivated hill-country N.E. of Jerusalem, lying between the central towns and the Jordan valley. In this case the conjecture of Dr. Robinson is very admissible that Ophrah and Ephraim are identical, and that their modern representation is et-Taiyibeh, a village on a conspicuous conical hill, commanding a view “over the whole eastern slope, the valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea” (Rob. i. 444). It is situated 4 miles N.E. of Bethel, and 14 from Jerusalem; a position agreeing tolerably with the indications of Jerome in the Onomasticon (Efraim, Efron), and is too conspicuous to have escaped mention in the Bible. It is probably also the Ephraim mentioned by Josephus (B. J. iv. 9, § 9) as having, with Bethel, been taken by Vespasian; and the place which gave its name to the toparchy of Apharema (1 Macc. xi. 34). Guérin, Judée, iii. 45-51, gives a good description of et-Taiyibeh, with a summary of the arguments in favour of its identification with Ephraim. [G.] [W.]

EPH-RA'IM, GATE OF (עַלְמַת עִפְרַיִם; עַלְמַת עִפְרַיִם; porta Ephraim), one of the gates of the city of Jerusalem (2 K. xiv. 13; 2 Ch. xxv. 23; Neh. viii. 16, xii. 39), doubtless, according to the Oriental practice, on the side-looking towards the locality from which it derived its name, and therefore at the north, perhaps at or near the position of the present “Damascus gate.” [JERUSALEM.] [G.] [W.]

EPH-RA'IM, MOUNT, more correctly, as in R. V., “the hill country of Ephraim.” In Jer. iv. 15, xxxi. 6, l. 19, R. V. reads “the hills of Ephraim." The name by which the territory allotted to the children of Joseph (Josh. xvii. 15) was apparently known. In its widest sense it included part of Benjamin (Judg. iv. 5); and it was also known as the mountain of Israel (Josh. xi. 16, 21), and as the Mount of the Amalekites (Judg. xii. 15). It is frequently mentioned in the O. T. (Judg. iii. 27, vii. 24, xvii. 1, 8, xviii. 2, 13, xix. 1, 16, 18; 1 Sam. ix. 4, xiv. 22; 2 Sam. xx. 21; 2 K. v. 22; 2 Ch. xv. 8, xix. 4); and within its limits were, Timnath-serah, or Timnath-heres, Joshua's inheritance, and the place of his burial (Josh. xix. 50, xxiv. 30; Judg. ii. 9); Gibeah of Phinehas (Josh. xxiv. 33); Shechem (Josh. xx. 7, xxi. 21; 1 K. xii. 25; 1 Ch. vi. 67); Shamir (Judg. x. 1); Ramathaim-zophim (1 Sam. i. 1); and Mount Zemaraim (2 Ch. xiii. 4). It was one of the twelve districts into which Solomon divided the country for commissariat purposes (1 K. iv. 8); and was very fruitful and in places covered with forest. The general character of the hill-country allotted to Ephraim has already been described. [EPHRAIM.] The highest points are Mount Gerizim, 2848 feet; Mount Ebal, 3076 feet; and Tell 'Asûr, 3376 feet. The deeply-cut valleys that descend on the west, to the plain of Sharon, are fertile and cultivated, whilst those that descend on the east to the Jordan Valley are barren and waste. [W.]

EPH-RA'IM, THE WOOD OF (עֵרְ פְרַיִם); Συρμας 'Eφραϊμ; saltus Ephraim, a wood, or rather, as in R. V., a forest (the word war implying dense growth*), in which the fatal battle was fought between the armies of David and of Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 6), and the entanglement in which added greatly to the slaughter of the latter (v. 8). It would be very tempting to believe that the forest derived its name from the place near which Absalom's sheep-farm was situated (2 Sam. xiii. 23), and which would have been a natural spot for his head-quarters before the battle, especially associated as it was with the murder of Amnon. But the statements of xvii. 24, 26, and also the expression of xviii. 3, "that thou succour us out of the city," i.e. Mahanaim, not to speak of the statement of Josephus (Ant. vii. 10, § 1), that Absalom crossed the Jordan and camped not far from Mahanaim, in the country of Gilead, allow no escape from the conclusion that the locality was on the east side of Jordan, though it is impossible to account satisfactorily for the presence of the name of Ephraim (the Luc. Rec. reads here Μαανάν = מַאנַן) on that side of the river. The suggestion is due to Grotius that the name was derived from the slaughter of Ephraim at the fords of Jordan by the Gileadites under Jephthah (Judg. xii. 1, 4, 5); and this is in accord with the statement of Josephus (Ant. vii. 10, § 2), that the battle took place in the "Great Plain," or Jordan Valley. But is it not at least equally probable that the forest derived its name from this very battle? The great tribe of Ephraim, though not specially mentioned in the transactions of Absalom's revolt, cannot fail to have taken the most conspicuous part in the affair, and the reverse was a more serious one than had overtaken the tribe for a very long time, and possibly combined with other circumstances to retard materially their rising into an independent kingdom. Ephron, the strong city between Carnaim and Bethshean, is too far distant to admit of any connexion between it and the forest of Ephraim. [G.] [W.]

EPH-RA'IMITE (עֵרְ פְרַיִם; B. 'Eφραθῆιται, A. ἐκ τοῦ 'Eφραϊμ; Ephrathæus). Of the tribe of Ephraim (Judg. xii. 5), elsewhere called "Ephrathite." [W. A. W.]

EPHRAIN (עֵפְרַיִן, R. V. Ephron; Κοῖ; Ἰ. 'Eφραϊν; 'Eφραϊν; Ephron), a city of Israel, which with its dependent hamlets (בְּנוֹת) = "daughters," A. V. "towns") Abijah and the army of Judah captured from Jeroboam (2 Ch. xiii. 19). Jerome (Q. Heb.) on this passage says, Ephron ipse est Sichem. So fruitful was Ephraim that it was a proverb not to carry straw to Ephraim (Otho, Lex. 172). It is mentioned with Bethel and Jeshanah, 'Ain Sinia, 3½ miles north of Beitin, and was apparently not far from them. It has been conjectured that this Ephraim or Ephron is identical with the Ephraim by which Absalom's sheep-farm of Baal-hazor was situated; with the city called Ephraim near the wilderness in which our Lord lived for some time (John xi. 54); and with Ophrah (עֵפְרַיִן), a city of Benjamin, apparently not far from Bethel (Josh. xviii. 23; cp. Joseph. B. J. iv. 9, § 9), and which has been located by Dr. Robinson (i. 447), with some probability, at the modern village of et-Taiybeh. But nothing more than conjecture can be arrived at on these points (see Ewald, Geschichte, iii. 219, 486, v. 365; Stanley, p. 214). [EPHRAIM.] [G.] [W.]

EPH-RA'TAH (R. V. EPHRATHAH), or EPH-RATH (עֵפְרַתָּה, or עֵפְרַת; 'Eφραθῶ; 'Eφραθῶ; Ephratha, Jerome). 1. Second wife of Caleb the son of Hezron, mother of Hur, and grandmother of Caleb the spy, according to 1 Ch. ii. 19, 50, and probably r. 24, and iv. 4. [CALEB-EPHRATAH.]

2. The ancient name of Bethlehem-Judah, as is manifest from Gen. xxxv. 16, 19, xlviii. 7, both which passages distinctly prove that it was called Ephrath or Ephrath in Jacob's time, and use the regular formula for adding the modern name, הָיָא בֵּית לְחֵם, which is Bethlehem, cp. g. Gen. xxiii. 2, xxxv. 27; Josh. xv. 10. It cannot therefore have derived its name from Ephrath, the mother of Hur, as the author of Quæst. Hebr. in Paralip. says, and as one might otherwise have supposed from the connexion of her descendants, Salma and Hur, with Bethlehem, which is somewhat obscurely intimated in 1 Ch. ii. 50, 51, iv. 4. It seems obvious therefore to infer that, on the contrary, Ephrath the mother of Hur was so called from the town of her birth, and that she probably was the owner of the town and district. In fact, that her name was really gentilitious. But if this be so, it would indicate more communication between the Israelites in Egypt and the Canaanites than is commonly supposed. When, however, we recollect that the land of Goshen was the border country on the Palestine side; that the Israelites in Goshen were a tribe of sheep- and cattle-drovers (Gen. xlvi. 3); that there was an easy communication between Palestine and Egypt from the earliest times (Gen. xii. 10, xvi. 1, xxi. 21, &c.); that there are indications of communications between the Israelites in Egypt and the Canaanites, caused by their trade as keepers of cattle (1 Ch. vii. 21), and that in the nature of things the owners or keepers of large herds and flocks in Goshen would have dealings with the nomad tribes in Palestine, it will perhaps seem not impossible that a son of Hezron may have married a woman having property in Ephrathah. Another way of accounting for the connexion between Ephrathah's descendants and Bethlehem is to suppose that the elder Caleb was not really the son of Hezron, but merely so reckoned as the head of a Hezronite house. He may in this case have been one of an Edomitish or Horite tribe, an idea which is favoured by the name of his son Hur [CALEB], and have married an Ephrathite. Caleb the spy may have been their grandson. It is singular that "Salma the father of Bethlehem" should have married a Canaanitish woman. Could she have been of the kindred of Caleb in any way? If she were, and if Salma obtained Bethlehem, a portion of Hur's inheritance, in consequence, this would account for both Hur and Salma being called "father of Bethlehem." Another possible explanation is, that Ephrathah may have been the name given to some daughter of Benjamin to commemorate the circumstance of Rachel his mother having died close to Ephrath. This would receive some support from the son of Rachel's other son Joseph being called Ephraim, a word of identical etymology, as appears from the fact that עֲפְרַיִם means indifferently an Ephrathite, i.e. Bethlemite (Ruth i. 1, 2), or an Ephraimite (1 Sam. i. 1). But it would not account for Ephrathah's descendants being settled at Bethlehem. The author of the quest. Hebr. in Paralip. derives Ephrathah from Ephraim, "Ephrath, quia de Ephraim fuit." But this is not consistent with the appearance of the name in Genesis. It is perhaps impossible to come to any certainty on the subject. It must suffice therefore to note, that in Gen., and perhaps in Chron., it is called Ephrath or Ephrata; in Ruth, Bethlehem-Judah, but the inhabitants, Ephrathites; in Micah (v. 2), Bethlehem-Ephrathah; in Matt. ii. 6, Bethlehem in the land of Juda. Jerome, and after him Kalsch, observe that Ephrathah, fruitful, has the same meaning as Bethlehem, house of bread; a view which is favoured by Stanley's description of the neighbouring corn-fields (Sinai & Palestine, p. 164). [BETHLEHEM.]

* The low thorny brushwood or scrub which covers many rocky and barren spots in the uplands of the Bible is still called war by the fellahin (Geikie, Holy Land and the Bible, i. 49).

3 Gesenius thinks that in Ps. cxxiii. 6 Ephrathah means Ephraim (so R. V. marg.).

[A. C. H.]

EPH-RATHITE (עֲפְרַתִּי; Ἐφραθῆσι; Ephrathites). 1. An inhabitant of Bethlehem (Ruth i. 2). 2. An Ephraimite (1 Sam. i. 1; Judg. xii. 4, &c.). [A. C. H.]

EPH-RON (עֲפְרֹן; vitulinus; Ἐφρών; Ephron), the son of Zochar, a Hittite; the owner of a field which lay facing Mamre or Hebron, and of the cave therein contained, which Abraham bought from him for 400 shekels of silver (Gen. xxiii. 8-17, xxv. 9, xlix. 29, 30, l. 13). By Josephus (Ant. i. 14) the name is given as Ephraim; and the purchase-money 40 shekels. On the similarity of the negotiations to those of the present day in Syria and Palestine, see Thomson, L. and B. ii. 381-4. [G.] [W.]

EPH-RON (Ἐφρών; Ephron), a very strong city (πόλις μεγάλη ὄχυρά σφόδρα) on the east of Jordan between Carnaim (Ashteroth-Karnaim) and Bethshean, attacked and demolished by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. v. 46-52; 2 Macc. xii. 27). From the description in the former of these two passages, it appears to have been situated in a defile or valley, and to have completely occupied the pass. (See Josephus, Ant. xii. 8, § 5.) Its site has not yet been discovered. [G.] [W.]

EPH-RON, MOUNT (הַר עֲפְרֹן; τὸ ὄρος Ἐφρών; Mons Ephron). The "cities of Mount Ephron" formed one of the landmarks on the northern boundary of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 9), between the "water of Nephtoah" and Kirjath-jearim. If these latter are identified with 'Ain Liffa and Kuryet el-'Enab, Mount Ephron is probably the range of hills on the west side of the Wady Beit Hannina (traditional valley of the Terebinth), opposite Liffa, which stands on the eastern side. If, on the other hand, they are identified with Etam, 'Ain 'Atán and Kh. 'Erma, Mount Ephron is probably the long ridge or spur down which the road runs from Solomon's Pools, near Bethlehem, to 'Ain Shems, Bethshemesh. In this case it may possibly be the same place as the Ephrathah or Ephraim of Ps. cxxii. 6. [G.] [W.]

EPICURE'ANS, THE (Ἐπικουρεῖαι), derived their name from Epicurus (342-271 B.C.), a philosopher of Attic descent, whose "Garden" at Athens rivalled in popularity the "Porch" and the "Academy." The doctrines of Epicurus found wide acceptance in Asia Minor (Lampsacus, Mitylene, Tarsus, Diog. L. x. 1, 11 sq.) and Alexandria (Diog. L. l. c.), and they gained a brilliant advocate at Rome in Lucretius (95-50 B.C.). The object of Epicurus was to find in philosophy a practical guide to happiness (ἐνέργεια . . . τῶν εὐδαιμόνων βίον περιποιούσα, Sext. Emp. adv. Math. xi. 169). True pleasure and not absolute truth was the end at which he aimed; experience and not reason the test on which he relied. He necessarily cast aside dialectics as a profitless science (Diog. L. x. 30, 31), and substituted in its place (as τὸ κανονικόν, Diog. L. x. 19) an assertion of the right of the senses, in the widest acceptation of the term, to be considered as the criterion of truth (κριτήρια τῆς ἀληθείας εἶναι τὰς αἰσθήσεις καὶ τὰς προλήψεις [general notions] καὶ τὰ πάθη). He made the study of physics subservient to the uses of life, and especially to the removal of superstitious fears (Lucr. i. 146 sq.); and maintained that ethics are the proper study of man, as leading him to that supreme and lasting pleasure which is the common object of all.

It is obvious that a system thus framed would degenerate by a natural descent into mere materialism; and in this form Epicurism was the popular philosophy at the beginning of the Christian era (cp. Diog. L. x. 5, 9). When St. Paul addressed "Epicureans and Stoics" (Acts xvii. 18) at Athens, the philosophy of life was practically reduced to the teaching of those two antagonistic schools, which represented in their final separation the distinct and complementary elements which the Gospel reconciled. For it is unjust to regard Epicurism as a mere sensual opposition to religion. It was a necessary step in the development of thought, and prepared the way for the reception of Christianity, not only negatively but positively. It not only weakened the hold which polytheism retained on the mass of men by daring criticism, but it maintained with resolute energy the claims of the body to be considered a necessary part of man's nature co-ordinate with the soul, and affirmed the existence of individual freedom against the Stoic doctrines of pure spiritualism and absolute fate. Yet outwardly Epicurism appears further removed from Christianity than Stoicism, though essentially it is at least as near; and in the address of St. Paul (Acts xvii. 22 sq.) the affirmation of the doctrines of creation (v. 24), providence (v. 26), inspiration (v. 28), resurrection, and judgment (v. 31), appears to be directed against the cardinal errors which it involved.

The tendency which produced Greek Epicurism, when carried out to its fullest development, is peculiar to no age or country. Among the Jews it led to Sadduceism [SADDUCEES], and Josephus appears to have drawn his picture of the sect with a distinct regard to the Greek prototype (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1, § 4; de B. J. ii. 8, § 14; cp. Ant. x. 11, § 7, de Epicureis). In modern times the essay of Gassendi (Syntagma Philosophiæ Epicuri, Hag. Com. 1659) was a significant symptom of the restoration of sensualism.

The chief original authority for the philosophy of Epicurus is Diogenes Laertius (lib. x.), who has preserved some of his letters and a list of his principal writings. The poem of Lucretius must be used with caution, and the notices in Cicero, Seneca, and Plutarch are undisguisedly hostile.

EPIPHANES (1 Macc. i. 10; x. 1). [ANTI-
OCHUS EPIPHANES.]

EPI-PHI (Ἐπιφί, 3 Macc. vi. 38), name of the eleventh month of the Egyptian Vague year, and the Alexandrian or Egyptian Julian year:

Copt. ΕΠΗΠ; Arab. أَيَّيب. In ancient Egyptian it is called "the third month [of] the season of the waters." [EGYPT.] The name Epiphi is derived from that of the goddess of the month, Apap-t (Lepsius, Chron. d. Aeg. i. 141). The supposed derivation of the Hebrew month-name Abib from Epiphi is discussed in other articles. [CHRONOLOGY; MONTHS.] [R. S. P.]

EPISTLE (ἐπιστολή). The Epistles of the N. T. are described under the names of the Apostles by whom, or the Churches to whom, they were addressed. It is proposed in the present article to speak of the epistle or letter as a means of communication. The use of written letters implies, it need hardly be said, a considerable progress in the development of civilised life. There must be a recognised system of notation, phonetic or symbolic; men must be taught to write, and have writing materials at hand. In the early nomadic stages of society accordingly, like those which mark the period of the Patriarchs of the O. T., we find no traces of any but oral communications. Messengers are sent instructed what to say from Jacob to Esau (Gen. xxxii. 3), from Balak to Balaam (Num. xxii. 5, 7, 16), bringing back in like manner a verbal, not a written answer (Num. xxiv. 12). The negotiations between Jephthah and the king of the Ammonites (Judg. xi. 12, 13) are conducted in the same way. It is still the received practice in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xi. 7, 9). The reign of David, bringing the Israelites, as it did, into contact with the higher civilisation of the Phœnicians, witnessed a change in this respect. The first recorded letter (רָבִדָּן, LXX. βιβλιον: cp. the use of the same word in Herod. i. 123) in the history of the O. T. was that which "David wrote to Joab, and sent by the hand of Uriah" (2 Sam. xi. 14); and this most obviously, like the letters (רָבִדָּן, LXX. βιβλιον) that came into another history of crime (in this case also in traceable connexion with Phœnician influence, 1 K. xxi. 8, 9), have been "sealed with the king's seal," as at once the guarantee of their authority, and a safeguard against their being read by any but the persons to whom they were addressed. The material used for the impression of the seal was probably the "clay" of Job xxxviii. 14. The act of sending such a letter is, however, pre-eminently, if not exclusively, a kingly act, where authority and secrecy were necessary. Joab, e.g., answers the letter which David had sent him after the old plan, and receives a verbal message in return. The demand of Benhadad and Ahab's answer to it are conveyed in the same way (1 K. xx. 2, 5). Written communications, however, become much more frequent in the later history. The king of Syria sends a letter (רָבִדָּן) to the king of Israel (2 K. v. 3, 6). A "writing" (רָבִדָּן, LXX. ἐν γραφῆ) comes to Jehoram from Elijah the prophet (2 Ch. xxi. 12). Hezekiah on one occasion makes use of a system of couriers like that afterwards so fully organized under the Persian kings (2 Ch. xxx. 6, 10, רָבִדָּן, LXX. ἐπιστολή; cp. Herod. viii. 98, and Esth. iii. 13, viii. 10, 14), and receives from Sennacherib the letter (רָבִדָּן, LXX. τὰ βιβλία) which he "spreads before the Lord" (2 K. xix. 14). Jeremiah writes a letter (רָבִדָּן, βιβλιον) to the exiles in Babylon (Jer. xxix. 1, 3, the prototype of the apocryphal Epistle of Jeremiah, placed as Baruch vi. in the A. V.; on which see BARUCH, THE BOOK OF). The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah contain or refer to many such documents (Ezra iv. 6 sq., v. 6, vii. 11; Neh. ii. 7, 9, vi. 5). The influence of Persian, and yet more, perhaps, that of Greek civilisation, led to the more frequent use of letters as a means of intercourse. Whatever doubts may be entertained as to the genuineness of the epistles themselves, their occurrence in 1 Macc. xi. 30, xii. 6, 20, xv. 1, 16; 2 Macc. xi. 16, 34, together with the allusions to them in 1 Macc. v. 10, ix. 60, x. 3, indicates that they were recognised as having mainly (yet not entirely: see 1 Macc. vii. 10, xv. 32) superseded the older plan of messages orally delivered. The two stages of the history of the N. T. present in this respect a striking contrast. The list of the canonical Books shows how largely epistles were used in the expansion and organization of the Church. Those which have survived may be regarded as the representatives of many others that are lost. The mention of "every epistle" and the warning of 2 Thess. iii. 17 indicate that St. Paul had already written more than the two Epistles to the Thessalonians—the only ones of that early date still preserved. 1 Cor. v. 9, but probably see Col. iv. 16 (cp. Lightfoot in loco), alludes to a lost epistle, as does 3 John 9. We are perhaps too much in the habit of forgetting that quite as noticeable is the absence of all mention of written letters from the Gospel history. With the exception of the spurious letter to Abgarus of Edessa (Euseb. H. E. i. 13), no epistles have been attributed to Jesus. The explanation of this is to be found partly in the circumstances of one who, known as the "carpenter's son," was training as His disciples those who, like Himself, belonged to the class of labourers and peasants; partly in the fact that it was by personal rather than by written teaching that the work of the prophetic office, which He reproduced and perfected, had to be accomplished. The Epistles of the N. T. in their outward form are such as might be expected from men who were brought into contact with Greek and Roman customs, themselves belonging to a different race, and so reproducing the imported style with only partial accuracy. They fall into two main groups: (1) the "Pauline" Epistles, including the Epistle to the Hebrews, and (2) the "Catholic Epistles," viz. James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1, 2, and 3 John, and Jude. The title given to this second group is not in strictness of speech applicable to all of those contained in it. 2 Peter and Jude are indeed perfectly general in their address. James, 1 Peter, and 1 John are general in their application, and are not (like St. Paul's Epistles) addressed to the Church in a single city or country. Hence the term was applied to them also; and afterwards, though less accurately, its range was extended so as to include 2 and 3 John as well (cp. Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, p. xxviii.). The Epistles in each group begin (the Epistle to the Hebrews and 1 John excepted) with the names of the writer and those to whom the Epistle is addressed. Then follows the formula of salutation (analogous to the εὐχαριστίαι of Greek; the S., S. D., or S. D. M., salutem, salutem dicit, salutem dicit autem, of Latin correspondence), generally in some combination of the words χαίρει, ἑσπείρει, εὐφραίνει; occasionally, as in Acts xv. 23, Jas. i. 1, with the closer equivalent χαίρειν (cp. Acts xiii. 26). Then the letter itself commences, in the first person, the singular and plural being used, as in the letters of Cicero, indiscriminately (cp. 1 Cor. ii. ; 2 Cor. i. 8, 15; 1 Thess. iii. 1, 2; and passim). Then when the substance of the letter has been completed, questions answered, truths enforced, come the individual messages, characteristic, in St. Paul's Epistles especially, of one who never allowed his personal affections to be swallowed up in the greatness of his work. The conclusion in this case was probably modified by the fact that the letters were dictated to an amanuensis. When he had done his work, the Apostle took up the pen or reed, and added in his own large characters (Gal. vi. 11)

the authenticating autograph, sometimes with special stress on the fact that this was his writing (1 Cor. xvi. 21; Gal. vi. 11; Col. iv. 18; 2 Thess. iii. 17), always with one of the closing formulae of salutation, "Grace be with thee"—"the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit." In one instance, Rom. xvi. 22, the amanuensis in his own name adds his salutation. In the ἔρρωσθε of Acts xv. 29, and ἔρρωσα of the received text in xxiii. 30, we have the equivalents of the valet, vale, which formed the customary conclusion of Roman letters. It need hardly be said that the fact that St. Paul's Epistles were dictated in this way accounts for many of their most striking peculiarities,—the frequent digressions, the long parentheses, the vehemence and energy as of a man who is speaking strongly as his feelings prompt him rather than writing calmly. For the authorities on which the text of the two groups of Epistles rest, see NEW TESTAMENT.

An allusion in 2 Cor. iii. 1 brings before us another class of letters which must have been in frequent use in the early ages of the Christian Church, the ἐπιστολαὶ συστατικαί, by which travellers or teachers were commended by one Church to the good offices of others. Other persons had come to the Church of Corinth relying on these. St. Paul appeals to his converts as the ἐπιστολὴ Χριστοῦ (2 Cor. iii. 3), written "not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God." Another instance of this kind of letter is found in Acts xviii. 27; and cp. the mention of Zenas and Apollos in Titus iii. 13. On the later history of ἐπιστολαὶ συστατικαί, see Suicer. Theol. ii. 1194, and Dict. of Christ. Antiq., art. "Commendatory Letters."

ER (𐤀𐤓 = watchful; 𐤀𐤓; Her). 1. First-born of Judah. His mother was Bath-Shuah (daughter of Shuah), a Canaanite. His wife was Tamar, the mother, after his death, of Pharez and Zarah, by Judah. Er "was wicked in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord slew him." It does not appear what the nature of his sin was; but, from his Canaanitish birth on the mother's side, it was probably connected with the abominable idolatries of Canaan (Gen. xxxviii. 3-7; Num. xxvi. 19).

2. Descendant of Shelah the son of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 21).

3. With a final yod, ERJ, perhaps designating a family, son of Gad (Gen. xli. 16; LXX. Ἀρηδῖς).

4. Son of Jose, and father of Elmodam, in our Lord's genealogy (Luke iii. 28), about contemporary with Uzziah king of Judah.

[A. C. H.]

E'ERAN (𐤀𐤓𐤁, but Sam. and Syr. 𐤀𐤓𐤁, Edan; 'Ešēv; Heran), son of Shuthelah, eldest son of Ephraim (Num. xxvi. 36). The name does not occur in the genealogies of Ephraim in 1 Ch. vii. 20-29, though a name, EZER (𐤀𐤓𐤁), is found which may possibly be a corruption of it. Eran was the head of the family of E'ERANITES, THE (𐤀𐤓𐤁𐤏; Sam. 𐤀𐤓𐤁𐤏; 'Ešēv; Heranites), Num. xxvi. 36.

ERASTUS ("Εραστός; Erastus). 1. One of the attendants or deacons of St. Paul at Ephesus, who with Timothy was sent forward into Macedonia while the Apostle himself remained in Asia (Acts xix. 22). He is probably the same as Erastus who is again mentioned in the salutations to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 20), though not, as Meyer maintains, the same as Erastus the chamberlain of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23).

2. Erastus the chamberlain, or rather the public treasurer (οικονόμος, arcarius) of Corinth, who was one of the early converts to Christianity (Rom. xvi. 23). According to the traditions of the Greek Church (Menol. Græcum, i. p. 179), he was first oeconomus to the Church at Jerusalem, and afterwards Bishop of Panens. He is probably not the same as Erastus who was with St. Paul at Ephesus, for in this case we should be compelled to assume that he is mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans by the title of an office which he had once held and afterwards resigned. [W. A. W.]

E'RECH (עֶרֶךְ; 'Opéx; Arach) is the second city of the list of four given in Gen. x. 10 as the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom in the land of Shinar; the others being Babel, Accad, and Calneh. This important city, supposed at first to be Edessa or Calirrhœ (Urfah) in the N.W. of Mesopotamia (so St. Ephrem, Jerome, and the Targumists), is now known to be the site called by the Arabs Warka, which lies half-way between Hilla and Korna on the left bank of the Euphrates, having on its eastern side the Nile canal. This town was called Uruk (or Arku) by the Babylonians and Assyrians, whence the Heb. Erech and the Arab. Warka. The original Akkadian name was Unu, Unuy,* or Unuga, which is translated in the Bilingual lists by ubtu, "seat," "dwelling." Other native (Akkadian) names for the city were Illag (or Illab); Namerim; Tir-ana, "the heavenly grove;" Ara-imina (or Uru-imina) and Da-imina, "district seven" (or "the seven districts"), Gipar-imina, "enclosure seven" (or "the seven enclosures"); Īi-ná-ana, "the heavenly resting-place," &c., &c. As may be supposed from this, the Babylonians thought a great deal of this city, which, in ancient days, must have been a much more delightful place than the present scene of desolation which the ruins present would lead one to suppose. That this was the case is also indicated by the ruins themselves, which show remains of large and elegant buildings with the usual recessed or fluted walls, in some cases decorated with patterns formed with the circular ends of cones imbedded in mortar, and coloured various hues. At the time when the Babylonian empire was at the height of its power, it is probable that the country around the city was well drained, and properly fertilised by the numerous canals. The dwellings of the people seem, at one time, to have extended some three miles beyond the walls of the city, which was itself nearly six miles in circumference.

* It is from this form that, by change of n into r, the Bab.-Assyr. form Uruk comes. The Greek form of the name of the city is 'Opéx; and the inhabitants are mentioned in Ezra iv. 9 under the name of Archelites (אֶרְכִּיטַי; אֶרְכִּיטַי). Compare the Assyr. Arkda, fem. Arkdaitu, "Erechite."

Erech seems to have been used as a necropolis, large numbers of glazed earthenware coffins and other receptacles, used for the burial of the dead, having been found there. These coffins are mostly of the Parthian period, though the city had probably been used as a burial-place long before then.

That it was a very ancient city is proved by the Babylonian and Assyrian inscriptions. It seems to have been the capital of the semi-mythical hero-king Gilgameš (Gilgames), in the wonderful legend concerning whom it is constantly mentioned under the name of Uruk or Uruk supuri, "Erech of the enclosure"^b (see above). From time to time it was attacked by enemies, and devastated, as the following extract from a hymn of an unknown and probably pre-historic period will show:—

"How long, O my lady, shall the strong enemy hold thy sanctuary?
In thy primeval city, Erech, famine existeth;
In E-ulbar, the house of thine oracle, blood like water floweth;
He hath set fire in all thy lands, and poured it out like date-fruit.
My lady, greatly am I bound up with misfortune.
My lady, thou hast hemmed me in, and entreated me evilly.
The mighty enemy hath smitten me down like a single reed.
I take not counsel, myself I am not wise.
Like the fields, day and night I mourn.
I, thy servant, pray to thee—
Let thy heart take rest; let thy mood be softened."

During the historical period many kings reigned in Erech, and some of them—such as Dungi, Ur-Bau, and Gudea, about 2500 B.C.; Sin-gasid, at a little later date; and Merodach-baladan I., about 1325 B.C.—have left records of their having done so on the many inscribed and stamped bricks which are found in the ruins. In the year 2280 B.C., Kudur-Nanhundi, king of Elam, invaded this part of Babylonia, captured Erech, and carried away the image of the goddess Naná, which was restored to its place 1635 years later by Aššur-bani-apli, king of Assyria. Tablets of the reigns of Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus, Cyrus, Darius, and some of the Seleucidæ have also been found on the site.

This city contained two great temples, the abodes of the patron divinities of the place. One was called E-ulbar ("the house of the oracle:" see the hymn above), and was dedicated to the goddess Ištar (Venus as evening star); the other E-ana ("the house of heaven"), dedicated to Naná (the goddess whose image was carried off by the Elamite king), and now represented by the Buwariga mound. It is argued by Prof. Fried. Delitzsch that in former times the river Euphrates must have flowed much nearer to the city than at present, because, in the legend of Gilgameš, it is related that Gilgameš and Ē-bani, after they had killed, in Erech, the bull sent by the goddess Ištar, washed their hands in the stream. See Loftus, Travels, &c.; Oppert, Expédition en Mésopotamie, vol. i.; Smith, Chaldean Genesis, p. 194; Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? and Records of the Past, vol. i., N.S., pp. 78–85. [T. ^b Supuri (or Suduru) means "ring" (round the moon), "halo," and "fold," "sheep-fold."

ERI (𐤀𐤓𐤓; 'Aḥḥis in Gen., B. 'Aḥḥel, AF. -ḥi in Num. [v. 25]; Heri, Her), son of Gad (Gen. xli. 16; Num. xxvi. 16, LXX. v. 25).

FRITES, THE (𐤀𐤓𐤓𐤓; ḥ 'Aḥel or -ḥi; Heri-ta). A branch of the tribe of Gad, descended from Eri (Num. xxvi. 16).

ESAIAS [3 syll.] (Westcott and Hort, 'Hōaias; Isaias; Cod. Amiat. Esaias), Matt. iii. 3, iv. 14, viii. 17, xii. 17, xiii. 14, xv. 7; Mark vii. 6; Luke iii. 4, iv. 17; John i. 23, xii. 38, 39, 41; Acts viii. 28, 30, xxviii. 25; Rom. ix. 27, 29, x. 16, 20, xv. 12. [ISAIAH.]

ESAR-HAD-DON (𐤀𐤓𐤓𐤓𐤓𐤓; 'Asorḥan; LXX. Σαρχεδωνός; Ptol. 'Asarḥanos; Assyr. Ašur-ḥa-iddina, Aššur-ḥu-iddina, "Asshur has given a brother"; Asar-haddon), the name of one of the greatest and also the mildest of the kings of Assyria. He was the son of Sennacherib (2 K. xix. 37), and grandson of Sargon of Assyria, surnamed "the later" [SARGON], who succeeded Shalmaneser IV. Esarhaddon was not the eldest son of Sennacherib; the unfortunate Aššur-nadin-šum, who was made king of Babylon by his father, having been the firstborn. Judging from the meaning of his name, "Asshur has given a brother," he was possibly the second son of Sennacherib. The others were Aššur-munik (or Aššur-mulik) [ADRAMMELECH] and Sharezer (= Šarra-ušur?).

Esarhaddon ascended the throne of Assyria on the 18th day of Adar (Feb.-March), in the year 680 B.C., after, as is supposed, he had defeated the army of his brothers in the land of Hanirabbe, near the Upper Euphrates, and his brothers had taken refuge in Armenia. Esarhaddon at once turned his attention to Babylonia, where Nabū-zēr-napišti-līšir, son of Merodach-baladan, had taken possession of the city of Ur. On the Assyrian army marching against him, he fled to Elam, where, however, the king of the country, Ummanaldas, put him to death. Na'id-Marduk, brother of Nabū-zēr-napišti-līšir, threw himself on the mercy of Esarhaddon, who restored him to the dominions of his brother on the sea-coast (called māt Tāmti). Esarhaddon now restored those portions of Babylon which had been destroyed by Sennacherib, his father, and returned the images of the gods which had been carried away, thus conciliating the people. He also defeated and put to death the chief of the Chaldean tribe of Dakkuri, Šamaš-ibni, who had taken possession of the fields of the people of Babylon and Borsippa. Having restored the land to its rightful owners, he placed Nabū-illim on the throne as king of the tribe of Dakkuri.

Affairs in Babylonia being thus satisfactorily settled, Esarhaddon, in the fourth year of his reign, captured the cities Sidon and Bazza, and executed Abdi-Milkutti, king of Sidon, together with Sanduqari, king of Kundu and Sisū. He also built a new town near Sidon, peopling it with the captives from the old city, and placing it under the control of an Assyrian governor. This was apparently an attempt to divert the trade of Sidon to the new settlement, but the commerce lost at the destruction of Sidon went to the sister-city, Tyre. At this time the whole of Palestine and the surrounding district made submission to Esarhaddon, who gives us a list of twelve kings of the mainland (including Baal of Tyre, Manasseh of Judah, and the kings of Edom, Moab, Gaza, Askalon, Ekron, &c.) and ten kings of the island of Cyprus, all of whom sent presents, and were directed by Esarhaddon to supply him with building materials for his new palace at Nineveh.

In his sixth year, Esarhaddon began to turn his attention to Egypt, and seems to have made some slight conquests there. Operations were continued in his seventh year, when there was a battle on the 5th day of Adar; but it was not a vigorous campaign, as a part of the Assyrian army was engaged in Hupuskia, against the Cimmerians, who were now beginning to make inroads. Checked in the south, the Cimmerians turned to the west and overran part of Asia Minor. Cilicia and Du'ua, in the neighbourhood of Tubal, were also invaded, and thirty-one cities taken; and Barnaki, "a powerful enemy dwelling in Til-Aššuri" (Tel-Assar—cp. Is. xxxvii. 12), was overrun by the Assyrian army. The Medesa, the Mannāa (Minni or Armenians), and other tribes on the north and east of Assyria, were next attacked, the result being that three Median chiefs journeyed in person to Nineveh and made submission to Esarhaddon.

Esarhaddon's next move was in the direction of Arabia, whither, after having returned to the king, Haza-ilu or Hazael, the images of the gods which Sennacherib had carried away, with his own name written upon them (a common custom with the Assyrian kings), Esarhaddon conducted an expedition to subdue the country. He travelled 900 miles, and reached two districts, called Hazū and Bāzu (Hazo and Buz), where he subdued seven kings. An eighth, Lalē, king of Yadi, who had fled, afterwards made submission at Nineveh, when Esarhaddon returned to him the images of his gods, inscribed with "the power of Assur," and conferred upon him the land of Bāzu or Buz. After the death of Hazāflu, king of Arabia, Esarhaddon placed his son, Ya'flu, on the throne. He was unpopular with the tribes, however, and Esarhaddon had to send an army to quell the insurrection which took place. The Assyrians were successful, and Wabu, a pretender, was captured and taken to Nineveh.

In his eighth year Esarhaddon invaded and plundered the land of the Rurišāa, the spoils of which were taken to Erech in Babylonia. In this year Esarhaddon lost his queen, who died on the 5th day of Adar (Feb.-March).

In Nisan (March-April) of the tenth year of his reign, Esarhaddon began the conquest of Egypt. Battles were fought there on the 3rd, 16th, and 18th of Tammuz (June-July), resulting in the capture of Memphis on the 22nd. Tirhakah, who was then king of Egypt, fled; but his sons and nephews were captured, and the city spoiled. Esarhaddon now divided Egypt into twenty provinces, placing the majority of them under Egyptian princes, who submitted to his rule. Those not under native government—and these were probably the more important posts—he garrisoned with Assyrian troops under Assyrian governors. A complete list of these provinces, with the names of their governors, has come down to us.

In the eleventh year several of the great men of Assyria were, for some reason unknown, executed by Esarhaddon.

Esarhaddon's last expedition was again against Egypt, but he fell ill on the road, and died on the 10th of Marcheswan, in the twelfth year of his reign, according to the Babylonian Chronicle, and in the thirteenth, according to the Babylonian Canon (667 or 668 B.C.).

Besides setting on foot the campaigns mentioned in his inscriptions, Esarhaddon carried away captive Manasseh, king of Judah, who was seized at Jerusalem by his captains on a charge of rebellion, and taken to Babylon (2 Ch. xxxiii. 11), where Esarhaddon held his court. The Jewish king was, however, afterwards pardoned and restored to his kingdom. As has already been mentioned above, Manasseh is given in his inscriptions as a tributary of Esarhaddon.

Esarhaddon rebuilt the walls of Babylon and the temple of Bel in that city, as well as many temples in Assyria and Akkad. He also built a palace at Nineveh, on an old site which he enlarged, and for which twenty-two kings of Hit, the seacoast, and the middle of the sea (Cyprus), furnished the materials. It was adorned with winged bulls and colossi, and decorated with rare and valuable stones. The doors were made of sweetly-smelling wood overlaid with silver and bronze. The south-west palace at Nimroud is the best-preserved of his constructions. This building, which was excavated by Sir A. H. Layard, is remarkable for the peculiarity of its plan as well as for the scale on which it is constructed, and the Rev. G. Rawlinson says that it corresponds in its general design almost exactly with the palace of Solomon (1 K. vii. 1-12), but is of larger dimensions, the great hall being 220 feet long by 100 broad (Layard's Nin. & Bab., p. 634), and the porch or antechamber 160 feet by 60. It had the usual adornments of winged bulls, colossi, and sculptured slabs, but it has suffered so severely from fire, that the stones and alabaster slabs, &c., were all split and calcined. This is all the more to be regretted, as, from what has been said above, there is reason to believe that Hittite, Phoenician, and Cypriote artificers took part in the work. Portions of very fine winged bulls from Esarhaddon's palace at Nineveh are now in the British Museum.

Esarhaddon was probably one of the most energetic of a very energetic race of kings, and carried his conquests farther than any of his predecessors, leaving his kingdom, at his unexpected death, in a very prosperous condition. Although many acts of severity mark his reign, he must nevertheless be regarded as one of the most clement rulers of his time in the East—as witness his treatment of Manasseh, Na'id-Marduk, Haza-llu of Arabia, and others. On the whole, his was a wise and common-sense reign (as things went at that time in the East), and must have had the effect of reconciling the diverse elements under his sway. At his death, the kingdom was divided between his two sons, Assurbanipal (see ASNAPPER) becoming king of Assyria and its dependencies, and Šamaš-šum-ukin (Saosduchinos) king of Babylon under him. Both princes had probably not yet reached manhood when this took place. Esarhaddon's third son, Assur-mukin-palis, was raised to the priesthood, with the title of urigallu, probably at Nineveh; and his fourth and youngest, Assur-ētil-šamē-šariti-bullit-su, became urigallu "before the god Sin" in Harran.

ESAU, the eldest son of Isaac, and twin-brother of Jacob. The singular appearance of the child at his birth originated the name: "And the first came out red (רָדִים), indicative of the colour of the skin, all over like an hairy garment, and they called his name Esau" (עֵשָׂו), i.e. "hairy," "rough," Gen. xxv. 25; see Delitzsch [1887]). This was not the only remarkable circumstance connected with the birth of the infant. Esau was the first-born; but as he was issuing into life Jacob's hand grasped his heel. The after enmity of two brothers, and the increasing strife of two great nations, were thus foreshadowed (xxv. 23, 26. Cp. Dillmann,⁵ p. 310 sq.). Esau's robust frame and "rough" aspect were the types of a wild and daring nature (cp. the Phœnician legends about Ossaos in Dillmann,⁵ p. 7). The peculiarities of his character soon began to develop themselves. Scorning the peaceful and commonplace occupations of the shepherd, he revelled in the excitement of the chase, and in the martial exercises of the Canaanites (xxv. 27). He was, in fact, a thorough Bedawy, a "son of the desert," who delighted to roam free as the wind of heaven, and who was impatient of the restraints of civilised or settled life. His old father, by a caprice of affection not uncommon, loved his wilful, vagrant boy; and his keen relish for savoury food being gratified by Esau's venison, he liked him all the better for his skill in hunting (xxv. 28). An event occurred which exhibited the reckless character of Esau on the one hand, and the selfish, grasping nature of his brother on the other. The former returned from the field, exhausted by the exercise of the chase, and faint with hunger. Seeing some pottage of lentiles which Jacob had prepared, he asked for it. Jacob only consented to give the food on Esau's swearing to him that he would in return give up his birthright. There is something revolting in the whole transaction. Jacob takes advantage of his brother's distress to rob him of that which was dear as life itself to an Eastern patriarch. The birthright not only gave him the headship of the tribe, both sacerdotal and temporal, and the possession of the great bulk of the family property, but it carried with it the covenant blessing (xxvii. 28, 29, 36; Heb. xii. 16, 17). Then again whilst Esau, under the pressure of temporary suffering, despises his birthright by selling it for a mess of pottage (Gen. xxv. 34), he afterwards attempts to secure that which he had deliberately sold (xxvii. 4, 34, 38; Heb. xii. 17).

It is evident that the whole transaction was public, for it resulted in a new name being given to Esau. He said to Jacob (cp. R. V.), "Feed me with that same red (רָדִים) . . . ; therefore was his name called Edom" (עֵדוֹם), Gen. xxv. 30). It is worthy of note, however, that this name is seldom applied to Esau himself, though almost universally given to the country he settled in, and to his posterity. [EDOM; EDMITES.] The name "children of Esau" is in a few cases applied to the Edomites (Deut. ii. 4; Jer. xlix. 8; Obad. v. 18); but it is rather a poetical expression.

Esau married at the age of forty, and contrary to the wish of his parents. His wives were both Canaanites; and they "were bitterness of spirit unto Isaac and to Rebekah" (Gen. xxvi. 34, 35).*

The next episode in the history of Esau and Jacob is still more painful than the former, as it brings out fully those bitter family rivalries and divisions which were all but universal in ancient times, and which are still a disgrace to Eastern society. Isaac, conceiving himself near death, wished to bless Esau before he died; but Jacob, co-operating with the craft of his mother, is again successful, and secures irrevocably the covenant blessing. Esau vows vengeance. But fearing his aged father's patriarchal authority, he secretly congratulates himself: "The days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob" (Gen. xxvii. 41). Thus he imagined that by one bloody deed he would regain all that had been taken from him by artifice. But he knew not a mother's watchful care. Not a sinister glance of his eyes, not a hasty expression of his tongue, escaped Rebekah. She felt that the life of her darling son, whose gentle nature and domestic habits had won her heart's affections, was now in imminent peril; and she advised him to flee for a time to her relations in Mesopotamia. The sins of both mother and child were visited upon them by a long and painful separation, and all the attendant anxieties and dangers. By a characteristic piece of domestic policy Rebekah succeeded both in exciting Isaac's anger against Esau, and obtaining his consent to Jacob's departure—"and Rebekah said to Isaac, I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth; if Jacob take a wife such as these, what good shall my life do me?" Her object was attained at once. The blessing was renewed to Jacob, and he received his father's commands to go to Padan-aram (Gen. xxvii. 46; xxviii. 1-5).

When Esau heard that his father had commanded Jacob to take a wife of the daughters of his kinsman Laban, he also resolved to try whether by a new alliance he could propitiate his parents. He accordingly married his cousin Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael (xxviii. 8, 9). This marriage appears to have brought him into connexion with the Ishmaelitic tribes beyond the valley of Arabah. He soon afterwards established himself in Mount Seir, still retaining, however, some interest in his father's property in Southern Palestine. It is probable that his own habits, and the idolatrous practices of his wife and rising family, continued to excite and even increase the anger of his parents; and that he, consequently, considered it more prudent to remove his household to a distance. He was residing in Mount Seir when Jacob returned from Padan-aram, and had then become so rich and powerful that the impressions of his brother's early offences seem to have been almost completely effaced. His reception of Jacob was cordial and honest; though doubts and fears still lurked in the mind of the latter, and betrayed him into something of his old duplicity; for while he promises to go to Seir, he carefully declines his brother's escort, and, immediately after his departure, turns westward across the Jordan (Gen. xxxii. 7, 8, 11; xxxiii. 4, 12, 17).

It does not appear that the brothers again met until the death of their father, about twenty years afterwards. Mutual interests and mutual fear seem to have constrained them to act honestly, and even generously, towards each other at this solemn interview. They united in laying Isaac's body in the cave of Machpelah. Then "Esau took all his cattle, and all his substance, which he had got in the land of Canaan"—such, doubtless, as his father with Jacob's consent had assigned to him—"and went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob" (xxxv. 29; xxxvi. 6). He now saw clearly that the covenant blessing was Jacob's; that God had inalienably allotted the land of Canaan to Jacob's posterity; and that it would be folly to strive against the Divine will. He knew also that as Canaan was given to Jacob, Mount Seir was given to himself (cp. xxvii. 39, xxiii. 3; and Deut. ii. 5); and he was, therefore, desirous with his increased wealth and power to enter into full possession of his country, and drive out its old inhabitants (Deut. ii. 12). Another circumstance may have influenced him in leaving Canaan. He "lived by his sword" (Gen. xxvii. 40); and he felt that the rocky fastnesses of Edom would be a safer and more suitable abode for such as by their habits provoked the hostilities of neighbouring tribes, than the open plains of Southern Palestine.

There is a difficulty connected with the names of Esau's wives, which is discussed under AHOLIBAMAH and BASHEMATH. Of his subsequent history nothing is known; for that of his descendants, see EDOM and EDMITES. [J. L. P.]

ESCHATOLOGY. Eschatology, or the Doctrine of the Last Things, is the name which of late has become common for doctrine concerning both the future state of the individual and the consummation of the present dispensation, or end of the world, with its accompanying events; and a complete view cannot be obtained of the way in which either of these reached its final form, apart from a consideration of the other. The present article will necessarily be confined to a review of Biblical Eschatology. An attempt will be made to trace the progress of thought and Revelation on the Last Things in the Old and New Testaments, though this also can be done only in bare outline, while other articles will be referred to for information on particular points. (1) It will be convenient to speak first of belief in the future of the individual. As regards actual knowledge and clear ideas on this subject, the Israelites, during the greater part of that period to which the Old Testament refers and belongs, are not in advance of other nations. Indeed, their very superiority consists in part in the severe restraint under which their thoughts are kept in this region, where they have no sure light to guide them. They have no mythology in regard to it, and give but little the reins to imagination. The bareness of their conceptions necessarily makes their words few, and may explain how it has been possible to doubt whether they believed in any continued existence of the soul after death at all.

* The opinion that this mésalliance was the original tradition round which the other Biblical events connected with Esau were made to centre is too hypothetical and unsupported to secure acceptance. Not less imaginative is the opinion that Esau and Edom are but names of gods transferred to men who have human biographies annexed to them.—[F.]

Such passages as Job xxxiv. 14, 15, and Eccles. xiii. 7, with which also Pss. civ. 29 and cxlvi. 4 may be compared, might possibly, taken by themselves, be supposed to imply a pantheistic conception: the spirit in man, which animates his frame, seems to be regarded as an effluence from an original Divine Source, with which it is to be reunited at death. But the strong sense of man's personality and relationship of responsibility and love to a personal God which distinguishes the Old Testament, negatives this idea.

Expressions like those in Pss. xxxix. 13, cxv. 17, cxlvi. 4; Is. xxxviii. 18, 19, depict the loss of all the interests and hopes and joys, the warmth and light, of this present scene. They do not necessarily exclude the notion of continued existence of the soul in another world. Indeed such an expression as "going down into silence" (Ps. cxv. 17) seems to imply it. Among such slight indications of belief in a continuance of existence may be reckoned the phrase "gathered unto his people" or "to his fathers," which clearly, from some passages in which it is used, cannot mean "buried in the family burying-place." See, for example, Gen. xxv. 8 (of Abraham, far away from his ancestral home), xlix. 33 (where it is used not of Jacob's burial, but of his death); Num. xx. 24 (of Aaron's death on Mount Hor); Judg. ii. 10 (of the passing away of a whole generation). As showing a similar view of death, compare David's language, 2 Sam. i. 23. A still clearer proof of belief in existence after death is the practice of necromancy (Deut. xviii. 11; Is. viii. 19; 1 Sam. xxviii. 9 sq.). Is. xiv. 9 sq. and Ezek. xxxii. 31 give fuller pictures of the realms of the dead. In all this, however—and the same holds of the language of the Old Testament generally, with but few exceptions—the state after death is contemplated as one of gloom, sadness, enervation; while no clear distinction is made between the condition of the righteous and the wicked, and no doctrine of retribution is associated with it. Compare especially the Book of Job, chaps. vii. and xiv. To the same effect is the name by which the dead are in some places described, the Rephaim, translated by the Revisers "the Shades," which gives well the general sense of the word, though not agreeing strictly with its derivation. (On Rephaim, see art. GIANTS, § 3. On Sheol, the common name for the Under-world, see HELI, and note also the name Abaddon, "destruction.")

These mournful forebodings were the utterance of human misgiving and doubt, natural even for the righteous when so little clear knowledge of the future life had as yet been vouchsafed. They are preserved in Holy Scripture, because it is a faithful record of human experience, apart from which it would be impossible to understand the actual history of the progress of Revelation. The prospect of gloomy death made the sorrows and injustices of life harder to bear. The triumph of faith was as yet most commonly seen in the confidence that, in spite of all appearances to the contrary, God's righteousness would be vindicated even in this life. The broad lesson of the Providential ordering of this world had to be mastered before men were allowed to dwell on recompense in a life to come. Even such words as those of Balaam (Num. xxiii. 10), which seem to us so naturally to speak of the hope of future bliss, must, on the ground of the prevailing tenor and usage of Old Testament language, be understood to refer to the long life and peaceful end which were regarded as the fitting and appointed reward of godliness.

But now and again, especially while viewing the incompleteness of the manifestation of Divine justice here, the soul is permitted to attain to a confidence that even in and through death it must be well with it, if it is reposing in trust upon God (see Pss. xvi. 10, 11; xvii. 14, 15; xlix. 14, 15; lxxiii. 24–26). Some interpreters hold that no hope of immortality is expressed even in these passages. But in Ps. xlix. it seems clear that the reference must be to the joy of the righteous after death, from the fact that the contrast drawn is between their lot and the lot of the ungodly who are prosperous even to the end of life. Such is also the most natural sense, and, supported by Ps. xlix. we may say is almost certainly the sense, of Ps. xvii. In Pss. xvii. and lxxiii. again no interpretation which does not see in the language the expression of the hope of eternal communion with God seems adequate. But it is particularly to be noted that this confident hope of living enjoyment of God hereafter springs from the intense realisation of communion with God here. These psalmists are sure that Death cannot have power to triumph over such a fellowship. "The communion instituted by Revelation between the living God and man imparts to human personality an eternal importance" (Oehler). Compare our Lord's argument with the Sadducees, especially as recorded by St. Luke (xx. 37, 38). Another well-known passage (Job xix. 25 sq.) seems to hold out hope of satisfaction after death for the righteous, while moving more than those last considered in the plane of Old Testament ideas. The exact rendering of this passage does not favour the view that it refers to a resurrection. And even if the rendering of the A. V. were right, the words would, in the absence of all other intimations of belief in a resurrection in the Book, have to be understood of a vindication of the sufferer even in this life. But the thought seems rather to be that over his dust God would stand as his vindicator, and that even in Sheol he would be permitted to derive comfort from the proof given of his innocence and of God's favour.

The further development, however, of the doctrine of immortality was not after the manner of ordinary Theism. It did not consist in attributing fuller life to the spirit apart from the body, but in the growing expectation of a resurrection. In the case both of Is. xvi. 19 and Ezek. xxxvii. 1–14, it is difficult to decide whether a literal resurrection of the dead, or a figurative representation of national revival, is to be understood. There is most to be said for the former view in Is. xxvi. 19, where, as a much earlier passage, we should least expect it. But at all events, in Dan. xii. 2, a resurrection which, though not universal, should comprise both godly and ungodly, is plainly foretold. Cp. also v. 13. The doctrine of the resurrection of the righteous is still more clearly insisted on in 2 Macc. vii. 9, 11, 14, 23, 29; xii. 43, 44. The oppressions to which the faithful among the Jews were subjected under Antiochus Epiphanes were peculiarly suited to bring such a hope into prominence. It formed, as we know, a definite article of the creed of the Pharisees, and is fully recognised in the Jewish Apocalyptic literature. The work of Christ with respect to this doctrine was (1) to refine and spiritualise it (Matt. xxii. 23-30, and parallels: cp. also St. Paul's teaching concerning the "spiritual body," 1 Cor. xv. 35-end); (2) to place it upon a sure foundation through His revealing word and His own resurrection as the "first-fruits" (1 Cor. xv. 20), the "first-born from the dead" (Col. i. 18; Rev. i. 5).

2. But there is another hope more clearly apprehended and largely dwelt upon in the Old Testament than that of personal immortality; it is that of the Redemption of Zion, the complete peace, righteousness, and happiness of Israel under their promised God-given King. The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, when at length it arose, linked the hopes of the individual to those of the nation. The righteous would rise again in order to share in that triumph of the Divine love and righteousness in which, notwithstanding all seeming evidence to the contrary, they had believed. The faith in this glorious future for the nation had its foundation in the knowledge of God's covenant with Israel, to which He must prove faithful, and the sense in every age that the ideal of their condition as the People of God had not as yet been attained, either as regards their inward state or their surroundings. It rose ever clearer and fuller in and through every period of adversity.

This is not the place in which to discuss the justness of the language of the Seventh of the Thirty-nine Articles of the English Church. But the passing remark may be permitted, that whatever may be thought of its fitness when we are reviewing the uncertain hold upon the hope of bliss hereafter for the individual in the Old Testament, yet at least when we turn to the hope for Israel, as God's people, we see the inadequacy of the theory that "the Old Fathers did look only for transitory promises." Though the future bliss is no doubt conceived under earthly forms and as taking place upon this earth, yet the whole drift of Old Testament hope sets towards a final and complete establishment of the Kingdom of God.

The germ of the later Jewish and the Christian conceptions of the Last Things is to be found in the imagery of the Prophets of the Old Testament concerning the Redemption of Zion. Jehovah's final judgment on the enemies of Israel passed into the loftier conception of the Day of Universal Judgment, and the picture of a restored Jerusalem furnished the image of the heavenly, eternal city. From the same imagery the doctrine of a Millennium, preceded and closed by specially fierce onslaughts of the enemies of God, was also drawn. While, again, the valley near Jerusalem where the enemies were to be slaughtered gave the name of the place of torment in another world (see the arts. HELL and GEHENNA).

Foremost among the conceptions prepared under the Old Testament which in Christian faith were to be associated with the future coming of Christ as the Judge and heavenly King, we have the expression "day of the Lord" (i.e. of Jehovah), for a time of Divine judgment. We find it used of times of Divine visitation generally (Amos. v. 18; Is. ii. 12, xiii. 6, 9; Lam. ii. 22; Ezek. xiii. 5); but it had also a special application to a final judgment upon the enemies of Zion, and of the ungodly in the midst of her, closely connected with her redemption (Is. xxiv. 8; Obad. v. 15; Joel iii. 14; Mal. iv. 5). The idea of such a "day" does not seem to have been originally taken from a judge holding court, but from a terrible triumphant conqueror executing vengeance in a day of battle and slaughter (cp. Is. xiii. 4, Zeph. i. 8, 16; Ezek. xiii. 5, xxx. 3, 4; and Joel ii. may also be compared). Touches are also added to the descriptions, drawn from the terrors of nature (Is. xiii. 10; Zeph. i. 15). The Lord's judgments were sometimes literally executed through the sword of human warriors. But in the visions of that last great judgment the vengeance upon the heathen and the sinners in Zion seems to be the work of powers of Nature, or powers supernatural. In Joel iii. 12, an addition is made to the conception which was of the greatest moment in the history of the doctrine of judgment. The image of a great slaughter is still employed in that passage, but Jehovah is represented as sitting to judge while it is taking place. The valley in the mind of the Prophet here, when he speaks of "the valley of decision," is most probably that same valley of Hinnom where were seen in the vision of Isaiah lxvi. the carcasses of those who had been slain in the great Divine visitation, and which furnished the name Gehenna to after-times. This term came eventually to be loosely used of the place of punishment to which the wicked go at death, as well as of that connected with the Messianic judgment; but originally it belonged to the latter only.

After the destruction of the enemies of Zion, and of the rebellious sinners among her own people, there would follow a time of overflowing prosperity and peace. All nations would acknowledge the God of Israel and pay reverence to His people. Nature herself would be rendered newly propitious to man. All that is harsh and cruel in her would be altered, and the fruitfulness of the earth would be multiplied many-fold. So great would the change be that it might be described as a renewal of heaven and earth (Hos. ii. 18-23; Is. ii. 2-4, xi., lxxv. 17, &c.). Similar descriptions, based upon these in the Prophets, are found in the Jewish Sibylline fragments, the pre-Christian portions of the Book of Enoch, and the Psalms of Solomon, the figures being sometimes grotesquely exaggerated (Sib. Or. iii. 702-794; Enoch v. 6-9, x. 16-xi. 2; Pss. of Sol. xvii. 23 sq.). We have not here, it is to be observed, the doctrine of the Millennium in its definite and ultimate form: for no indication is given of a limit to this period of bliss, and of another world to follow it. The first trace of such a conception which we meet with in Enoch xci. 12-17. It comes out with far greater distinctness in 4 Esdras vii. 26-31, and in the Apocalypse of Baruch (lxxiii.-lxxxiv. 2), writings which most probably belong to the last thirty years or so of the 1st century A.D. It may be noted in passing that the duration of this Messianic time according to 4 Esdras is 400 years, and that very various lengths are assigned to it in Rabbinic writings. Into Jerusalem or around it all the faithful were to be gathered, and the difficulties attending such an arrangement are quaintly dealt with. (For Rabbinic doctrine on the subject, see Gfrörer, Jahrhundert des Heils, pt. ii. c. 10.)

For the conception of the Universal Judgment as well as for that of a Millennium, properly so called, we have to go beyond the Old Testament. The doctrine, indeed, of man's personal responsibility to God pervades the Old Testament; but we do not find there the representation of one great future assize to which shall be brought fallen spirits and all men living and dead. For the earliest instances of this we must pass to the portions of the Book of Enoch which are generally admitted to be pre-Christian and to belong to the last century or century and a half before Christ (see chs. xvi. 1; xxii. 4, &c.). It is unnecessary to give particular references to later books.—4 Esdras, the Apocalypse of Baruch, the Book of Jubilees. Isaiah xxiv. 21, 22, has been thought by some to refer to a future judgment on spiritual beings and on departed kings. But at any rate a universal judgment is not there described.

There are differences in the representations of the things of the end in different portions of the New Testament. Language resembling that of the Jewish Apocalypses is chiefly to be found in the Synoptic Gospels, the Apocalypse of St. John, the Epistles of St. Peter and St. Jude, and the Epistles to the Thessalonians. Deeper and more comprehensive teaching, more divested of such imagery, is set before us in the remaining writings of St. Paul and St. John. But besides this broad distinction there are differences of imagery even in the former group, corresponding in a measure to varieties in Jewish ideas. It will be most convenient to follow the order of events in the Apocalypse and to compare other descriptions by the way. The succession of calamities in the gradually unfolding visions of the Apocalypse may be compared with the briefer and more general description of the signs of the end in our Lord's Apocalyptic discourse in Matt. xxiv. (Mark xiii.; Luke xxi.). Then after the fall of the city mystically called Babylon, He Whose Name is "The Word of God" is seen going forth to war followed by the armies of heaven; and the enemies of God assemble to make war with Him and are overthrown (Rev. xix. 11-21). Then follows a reign of the Saints (xx. 1-7) for a thousand years. This passage does not enter into details, and it is not clear that what is ordinarily meant by the Millennium is intended. Such a belief, known as Chiliasm or Millenarianism, was, indeed, very prevalent in the Christian Church of the 2nd century, and they so interpreted this passage of the Apocalypse. But their ideas on the subject were evidently chiefly drawn from Jewish sources (Justin M. Dial.

cum Tryph., 51, 80, 81; Irenaeus, v. 33-36). If all ages of the Church and schools of interpreters be taken into account, it has been more commonly held that this portion of the imagery of the Apocalypse has been fulfilled in the victory, partial as it is, which Christ and His Church have already won. Elsewhere in the New Testament there is no clear indication of a finite period before the Judgment, like that of the reign of the Messiah in the later Jewish writings. In the Synoptic Gospels figures of earthly felicity are drawn from the Old Testament and from current Jewish language to describe the triumph of the kingdom of God, such as that of the great banquet (Matt. viii. 11, &c.), and of abundant possessions, including the reign of the Apostles with Christ (Matt. xix. 28, 29, &c.). But if the language be considered as a whole, it will be seen that it agrees rather with those earlier and simpler ideas described above, according to which the Messianic times and the world to come were not distinguished from one another. According to 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, the resurrection of those that "sleep in Jesus" is to be a first incident of His appearing, so that they will share in all its joy and glory. Thus far this passage accords with Rev. xx. 7; but no room seems to be left for a reign on earth.

To return to the Apocalypse. After the thousand years a renewed activity is permitted to spiritual wickedness; and the powers of this world, under the names of Gog and Magog (cp. Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix.), are again gathered together. The result is that they are destroyed, and the Devil, who deceived them, cast into the lake of fire. According to the older type of prophetic imagery, the judgment upon the ungodly was, as we have seen, conceived not as a formal process of judgment, but as a great slaughter. This view seems to be followed in 2 Thess. i. 7-10; but it is to be supernaturally inflicted by the Christ Himself. In the more fully developed ideas of the things of the end, room was found for this ancient representation of the judgment by placing an overthrow of enemies (or even two, one at the beginning and one at the close of the Messianic times) before the final, universal forensic judgment upon quick and dead. This more developed conception is presented to us in the Apocalypse.

We are thus brought to the Last Judgment, and here we meet with the most significant point of contrast between Christian and Jewish teaching. It is that in the New Testament the Christ appears as the Judge in the Universal Judgment (Matt. xxv. 31 sq.; 2 Cor. v. 10, and other allusions in St. Paul's Epistles; James v. 7-9; 1 John ii. 28, with iv. 17; and perhaps also 1 Pet. iv. 5). This point does not appear quite so clearly in the Apocalypse; it may, however, be inferred. The dead stand "before the Throne" (right reading, xx. 12), and this Throne is that "of God and of the Lamb" (xxii. 1). Compare also xxi. 27 with xx. 12; and see ii. 23 and xxii. 12.

Just before the Judgment the Devil is cast into the lake of fire (xx. 10) to which the Beast and the False Prophet have also been consigned (xix. 20). Death and Hades, after they have given up their dead, are also cast there (xx. 13, 14). The binding of Satan during the thousand years and his final consignment to the lake of fire should be compared with the story in the Book of Enoch and other Jewish Apocalypses of the imprisonment, from the time of their fall, of the angels who fell by lust just before the Flood, and their removal at the Judgment Day to a still worse place of torture (Enoch x. 4-6, 12, 13; Apoc. of Baruch lvi. 10-13; Book of Jubilees, ch. v.). But Satan and his angels are not identical with the latter, though there must evidently be some connexion between the ideas about them both.

Wicked men are cast into the same lake of fire (ix. 15, xxi. 8; cp. the other comparatively speaking full description of the Judgment in Matt. xxv. 31-46). In the Book of Enoch, on the other hand, the place of punishment to which the wicked angels are to be sent is distinct from, though similar to, that for wicked men. Other passages suggesting conscious suffering, without end, or of which no end is indicated, are Matt. v. 30, xiii. 49, 50, xviii. 8, 9 (Mark ix. 43, 45, 47, 48), xii. 32 (Mark iii. 29). More vague is the image of the "outer darkness," outside the lighted banqueting-hall, where the Feast is held, which represents the Joy of the triumphant kingdom of God (Matt. viii. 12, xiii. 13, xxiv. 51, xxv. 30; Luke xiii. 28). On the other hand, we have language which recalls rather the image of the destruction of God's enemies, and suggests annihilation. This is true especially of 2 Thess. i. 7-10; but with this view the following passages seem also best to agree: Matt. iii. 12; 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18; 2 Pet. iii. 7; Jude 14, 15. Cp. also Heb. x. 27. Of the four following it is difficult to say under which of the preceding heads they should be classed: Matt. x. 28, xvi. 25; Luke xiii. 5, xi. 18. On the other hand, Luke xii. 47, 48, 59, speaks of punishment limited in duration as well as in severity; for an unending hell, however modified, could not be described as "few stripes." Even the "many stripes" are scarcely consistent with such a thought. An end seems also suggested in Matt. v. 25, 26, stern as the purpose of the passage is. Again, the very saying of our Lord, which speaks of a sin that hath "never forgiveness, either in this world or in the world to come," suggests that there are others which have (Matt. xii. 32; Mark iii. 28, 29). Again, the phrase "to every man according to his deeds," and similar expressions, regarding the Judgment (Matt. xvi. 27; 2 Cor. v. 10; Rev. xx. 12), seem to imply a greater variety of award than simply the division into two great classes of the saved and the damned. Moreover, these passages all plainly refer not to the intermediate state, but to the Judgment Day. Cp. also 1 Cor. iii. 13, 15. The doctrine of Purgatory, when presented in a spiritual form, seems to commend itself to the reason, but it must be allowed that it has no basis in Holy Scripture.

All this language has its correspondences with Jewish descriptions of future judgment and punishment. Yet there is in the New Testament a greater simplicity and dignity; details are less dwelt upon; the moral and spiritual lessons count for much more, while a curious imagination is less gratified. In that other group of New Testament writings to which reference has been made, glimpses are afforded into deeper underlying truths. All judgment has been committed to the Son of Man (John v. 22-27). When He was on earth, the judgment of men of all classes, and of the Evil One himself, was proceeding, and it is proceeding still (John xii. 31; xvi. 8, 11). The word "eternal" is applied to a state of life and death on earth, where we should rather use the word "spiritual." In no mere metaphorical sense there is a resurrection now, as well as hereafter (John iii. 36, v. 24, xi. 25, xvii. 3; 1 John iii. 14, v. 12, 13; Rom. vi. 1 sq.). But this does not destroy the sense of the need of future resurrection and judgment (John v. 25, 29; 1 John iii. 2 sq.; Rom. viii. 16 sq.). Here and there also a more sublime close seems to be indicated than that of the Judgment Day itself, a time when at last every rational will shall be brought into obedience to Christ, and complete harmony and happiness shall be established through every realm of being (1 Cor. xv. 23-27; Col. i. 20; Ephes. i. 20; Acts iii. 21; Rom. xi. 32; Philip. ii. 10, 11). It is too much overlooked how much of the most distinctive teaching of the Christian Revelation is contained in its eschatology; in other words, in the new view which it gives of God's ultimate purposes with regard to mankind and His kingdom. For instance, the real gist of St. Paul's great argument in the Epistle to the Romans is to be found not less in chs. viii.-xi. than in chs. ii.-vii.

We have attempted thus far to bring out clearly the facts in regard to the language of Holy Scripture on future judgment and punishment. Any adequate consideration of the conclusions to be drawn in view of the modern controversies on the subject would be impossible here. We must confine ourselves to one or two remarks: (a) The descriptions are figurative, and the figures are not matter of Revelation. They are neither derived, except in germ, from the Old Testament, nor newly given by Christ, but are taken from prevailing Jewish language, for the purpose of enforcing certain great truths. There are, moreover, variations in the imagery employed which show that the precise form of the representations is of small account. It is, for example, impossible to fit together the picture of the servants beaten with few or many stripes with that of the two classes of the righteous and the wicked in the parable of the sheep and the goats.

(b) We have as little right to explain away the passages which speak of the final restitution of all things as we have to destroy the force of those which describe the doom of the wicked. It may be that no thoroughly satisfactory way of reconciling them will present itself. If so, the apparently conflicting teaching should bring home to us our own ignorance and the weakness of our thought.

3. The subject of the Intermediate State is treated—at least as regards the righteous—in the article on PARADISE. It must suffice here to note its connexion with the topics which have been discussed in the present article. It would seem probable that the effort to combine the ideas respecting the Under-world to which the soul would go at death, spoken of in 1, when brought into comparison with those concerning the great consummation referred to in 2, must have helped to render definite the conception of an intermediate state. The holy dead must, it was felt, share in the future glory of Zion, and a term was thus set to their present state of existence. The imagery on this subject also underwent a development after the close of the Old Testament Canon, as appears from the same Apocalyptic and Rabbinic literature to which reference has already been made. The most distinct use of such imagery in the New Testament is in the picture of separate abodes for the righteous and wicked in Hades in the parable of Lazarus and Dives in Hades (Luke xvi. 22 sq.).

It is always to be remembered that we can know nothing concerning either the future of the individual soul or the end of the world, except in figurative language. But the figures which we have noticed, albeit not first promulgated in Holy Scripture, have received its sanction; and, taken in general outline, they shadow forth truth to which our own minds and hearts give a response. In spite of the part taken by the body in all our thinking and acting, ineradicable instincts of the human heart and conscience protest against the materialism which supposes that there is no continued existence of the human personality after death. At the same time we see that an organism, such as that of the resurrection-body, is necessary to the spirit for the fullness of life; while all that we have learnt and are learning concerning the manifold ties that bind us together reconciles us to the thought that the individual must wait for perfect consummation and bliss in the final regeneration.

Jewish Eschatology and its relation to Christian Faith is discussed, from various standpoints, in many modern German works which deal with the subject of Messianic doctrine. On the doctrine of Future Life in the Old Testament, Oehler's Theology of the Old Testament may be consulted with advantage. Information respecting Jewish doctrine later than the Old Testament, and the critical questions connected with the Jewish documents of the last one or two centuries B.C., and the 1st century A.D., may be obtained in The Jewish Messiah, by J. Drummond, or both on these points and their relation to Christian doctrine in The Jewish and Christian Messiah, by V. H. Stanton. A good succinct account of Jewish belief in regard to the things of the end will be found in Schürer, The Jewish People in the time of Jesus Christ, Div. ii. vol. ii. § 29, pp. 154-187, Eng. trans. F. Weber's Altsynagogale Palästinische Theologie, pp. 322-382, is also to be mentioned as specially useful for the Rabbinic doctrine on the subject. [V. H. S.]

ESCHEW (Job i. 1, 8, ii. 3; 1 Pet. iii. 11) = to flee from or shun. The word occurs in the collect for the Third Sunday after Easter, and is retained by the R. V. in the above O. T. passages, but replaced by "turn away" in 1 Pet. [F.]

ESDRAELON (Ἐσδραῖλόν, B. Ἐσδραήλων, Judith iii. 9; B. Ἐσραήλόν, A. Ἐσερρήων, Judith iv. 6; Ἐσδραήλῳ, B. Ἐσδραήλῳ, Judith vii. 3; Ἐσδραήλῳ, N. Ἐσδραήλῳ, B. Ἐσραήμ, A. Ἐσδραήμ, Judith i. 8; Esdreton). This name is merely the Greek form of the Hebrew word JEZREEL. It occurs in this exact shape only twice in the A. V. (Judith iii. 9, iv. 6). In Judith vii. 3, it is ESDRAELON (Esdraelon, ed. 1611); and in i. 8, ESDRELOM (Esdreton, ed. 1611), with the addition of "the great plain." The name is derived from the old royal city of JEZREEL, which occupied a commanding site at the eastern extremity of the plain.

The "great plain of Esdraelon" is called in the O. T. the "valley of Megiddo" (2 Ch. xxxv. 22), the "valley of Megeddon" (Zech. xii. 11), and "Jezeel" only in 2 Sam. ii. 9: in the Apocrypha, "the plain of Megiddo" (1 Esd. i. 29) and "the great plain" (1 Macc. xii. 49); by Josephus, "the great plain," τὸ πεδῖον μέγα (Ant. xii. 8, § 5; B. J. iii. 3, § 1. &c.); and by Eusebius and Jerome, "the plain of Legio," πεδῖον τῆς Λεγεῶνος, Campus Legionis, from the Roman town Legio on its S. side. It separates the hills of Samaria on the S. from those of Galilee on the N.; and is not only the largest and most fertile plain in Palestine, but one of the most remarkable features of the country. "A glance at its situation will show that to a certain extent, though not in an equal degree, it formed the same kind of separation between the mass of Central Palestine and the tribes of the extreme north, as the valley of the Jordan effected between that same mass and the trans-Jordanic tribes on the east" (Stanley. S. & P. p. 337). At its eastern extremity stood Jezeel, Zerin, the royal residence of the kings of Israel, whence the broad, open "valley of Jezeel" (Josh. xvii. 16; Judg. vi. 33; Hos. i. 5) slopes gradually down to the Jordan valley; and at its western end was JOKNEAM of Carmel. Tell Keimûn. Its length from Zerin to Tell Keimûn is 15 miles, and its greatest breadth from Jenin to Junjâr is 14 miles. On the N.E. the plain extends 3½ miles further, to the foot of Mount Tabor; and on the S.E. it stretches eastward from Jenin, for 3½ miles between Mount Gilboa and the hills to the S. On the N. the mountains of Galilee rise boldly from the plain, and the "Mount of the Precipitation" (1285 ft.), below Nazareth, is conspicuous: whilst on the S. low olive-clad hills slope gently upwards to the heights of Mount Ephraim. On the N.E. are the ridge of J. Dûhy (1690 ft.) and the isolated hill of Tabor (1843 ft.), and on the N.W. the Kishon runs out through a narrow gorge, between Carmel and the Galilean hills, to the plain of Acre and the sea.

The wide undulating plain, now called Merj ibn 'Amir, is dotted with grey tells, and scamed in every direction with small watercourses, which convey the drainage of the surrounding hills to the Kishon. The fall is slight; the water parting near Jenin is only 260 ft. above the sea, and during winter the central portion of the plain becomes an impassable morass. The Kishon at the same time becomes a deep, turbid stream, and after heavy rain it rolls down in flood as it did on the day when it swept away the host of Sisera (Judg. v. 21). In summer the rich, crumbling volcanic soil cracks, and numerous fissures make riding off the beaten tracks difficult. Wherever it is tilled the plain yields abundant crops of wheat, cotton, tobacco, sesame, and millet, and everywhere flowers and rank weeds attest the fertility of the soil. To this richness there are allusions in Hos. ii. 21, 22; Gen. xlix. 14, 15; 1 Ch. xii. 40; and in the modern name of the district, Belâd Hârîtheh, the "country of the ploughed land." The plain is now fully cultivated, but thirty years ago it was the favourite resort of the Beduin, who, like the nomad Midianites and Amalekites, —those “children of the east” who were “as locusts for multitude,” whose “camels were without number as sand by the seaside,”—devoured its rich pasture. Trees are rare except round villages; but where there is an abundance of water, as at Jenin, they grow with great luxuriance. The whole plain is watered by the numerous springs on the N.E. and W. Between Tell Keimûn and Tell Abu Audeis there are from fifty to sixty springs, all fresh and good, and some of them feeding running streams. The three most remarkable groups are those of Lejjûn, W. ed-Dufleh, and Aireh, from which even in the dry season considerable streams run down. No important town was ever situated in the plain itself, but on its borders were places of high historic and sacred interest. Such were Jokneam of Carmel, commanding roads through the gorge of the Kishon to Acco, and over the ridge to the plain of Sharon; Megiddo, at the northern end of the easiest pass through the hills that separate Esdraelon from the Maritime Plain; Taanach; En-gannim, the Ginaia of Josephus (B. J. iii. 3, § 4), which marked the boundary of Samaria; Jezeel, the royal city, commanding the great road down the Valley of Jezeel to Bethshean and the country east of Jordan; Shunem, Nain, and Endor, on the slopes of J. Dûhy; Daberath; Chesulloth, the Xaloth of Josephus (B. J. iii. 3, § 1); Gaba “of the Horsemen” (B. J. iii. 3, § 1); and Harosheth of the Gentiles.

The principal roads which cross the plain are: (1) the main road from Nâblus to Jenin and Nazareth; (2) the great trade route from Akka and Haifa to Zerin, Beisân, and the Haurân, and to Tiberias and Damascus; (3) the main road from Lydda to Bâka, and across the ridge of Carmel to Jokneam (Tell Keimûn), Haifa, and Akka; (4) the road which runs from the Maritime Plain up the broad W. Arah, and, crossing the ridge at Ain Ibrahim, descends to Megiddo (Lejjûn), whence it branches off to Nazareth, and Zerin.—this line is one of the easiest across the country, and must always have been of great importance; (5) the road from Jenin, that passes along the plain of Arrâbch, N. of Dothan, and descends by W. el-Armût to the Plain of Sharon: this, which is also an easy road, is probably the one that was followed by the Midianite and Amalekite merchants who carried Joseph down with them to Egypt. Over these roads the caravans of merchants and the armies of contending nations must always have passed on their way from E. to W. or from N. to S.; and the fact that the great plain was such a common thoroughfare must have made it in peaceful times the most available and eligible possession of Palestine. “It was the frontier of Zebulun—‘Rejoice, O Zebulun, in thy goings out.’ But it was the special portion of Issachar, and in its condition, thus exposed to the good and evil fate of the beaten highway of Palestine, we read the fortunes of the tribe which, for the sake of this possession, consented to sink into the half-nomadic state of the Bedouins who wandered over it,—into the condition of tributaries to the Canaanite tribes, whose iron chariots drove victoriously through it. ‘Rejoice, O Issachar, in thy tents . . . they shall suck of the abundance of the seas [from Acre], and of the [glassy] treasures hid in the sands [of the torrent Belus] . . . Issachar is a strong ass, couching down between two ‘troughs’; and he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant to tribute.’” (Stanley, S. & P. p. 348.)

The plain was the scene of two of the greatest victories, and of two of the saddest defeats, in the history of the Jews. On the banks of the Kishon, in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo, the Lord delivered Sisera and his host into the hands of Barak (Judg. iv. v.); and, in the Valley of Jezeel, Gideon broke the “rod of the oppressor” (Judg. vii.). On the “high places” of Gilboa, Saul and Jonathan perished miserably (1 Sam. xxxi.; 2 Sam. i. 17–27); and in the Valley of Megiddo, Josiah was sore wounded by an arrow when attempting to stop the passage of Necho’s army northwards from the Maritime Plain (2 Ch. xxxv. 20–27). To these battles the plain probably owes its celebrity as the battle-field of the world, "the place which is called in the Hebrew tongue, Armageddon;" that is, "the city or mountain of Megiddo." It was across one portion of the plain, towards Jenin, that Ahaziah fled from Jehu, and it was to Megiddo that he was brought to die when sore wounded at the ascent of Gur (2 K. ix. 27). Here too, spreading themselves out from Bethulia to Cyamon, Tell Keimûn, Holofernes and his soldiers were encamped during the siege of the former place (Judith vii. 3). At a later period during the Jewish war the plain was the scene of frequent skirmishes, and at the foot of Mount Tabor the Jews were sharply defeated by Placidus (B. J. iv. 1, § 8). Here Crusaders and Saracens met in conflict, and in 1799, at Filéh, the Turks were conquered, by Bonaparte and Kleber, at the battle of Mount Tabor. A graphic sketch of Esdraelon is given in Stanley's S. & P. pp. 335 sq. See also *PEF. ESDRAS (Ἔσδρας; Esdras), 1 Esd. viii. 1, 3, 7, 8, 9, 19, 23, 25, 91, 92, 96; ix. 1, 7, 16, 39, 40, 42, 45, 46, 49; 2 Esd. i. 1; ii. 10, 33, 42; vi. 10; vii. 2, 25; viii. 2, 19; xiv. 1, 38. [EZRA.]

ESDRAS, FIRST BOOK OF.—I. Title. This is the first in order of the apocryphal books in the English Bible, which follows Luther and the German Bibles in separating the apocryphal from the Canonical Books, instead of binding them up together according to historical order (Walton's Prolegom. de vers. Græc. § 9). The classification of the four books which have been named after Ezra is particularly complicated. In the Vatican (B) edition of the LXX., our 1st Esd. is called "Esdras A." or the first Book of Esdras, in relation to the canonical Book of Ezra which follows it and is called "Esdras B." (i.e. our Ezra and Nehemiah) or the second Esdras, the reason for this order being probably due to the fact that the events related in it precede in point of time, at least partly, those related in the other two (see Lupton, p. 5, n. 3). But in the Vulgate, 1st Esd. means the canonical Book of Ezra, and 2nd Esd. means Nehemiah, according to the primitive Hebrew arrangement, mentioned by Jerome, in which Ezra and Nehemiah made up two parts of the one Book of Ezra; and 3rd and 4th Esd.—placed after the N. T.—are what we now call 1 and 2 Esdras. These last, with the Prayer of Manasses, are the only apocryphal books admitted eo nomine into the Romish Bibles, the other apocrypha being declared canonical by the Council of Trent (1546). The reason of the exclusion of 3rd Esdras from the Canon seems to be either that the Tridentine fathers in 1546 were content to follow the estimate passed upon the book by Jerome (§ II. below), or that they were not aware, or did not remember, that it then existed in Greek. For, though it is not in the Complutensian edition (1515), nor in the Biblia Regia, yet it is found in the Aldine edition (1518), in the Strasburg edition (1526), and in the Basle edition (1545. See Lupton, p. 4). Vatablus (about 1540) had, it would seem, never seen a Greek copy, and, in the preface to the apocryphal books, speaks of it as only existing in some MSS. and printed Latin Bibles.* For reasons now unknown, it was excluded from the Canon, though it has certainly quite as good a title to be admitted as Tobit, Judith, &c. It has indeed been stated (Bp. Marsh, Comp. View, ap. Soames, Hist. of Ref. ii. 608) that the Council of Trent in excluding the two books of Esdras followed Augustine's Canon. But this is not so. Augustine (de Doctr. Christ. lib. ii. 13) distinctly mentions among the libri Canonici, Esdrae duo;^b and that one of these was our 1st Esdras is manifest from the quotation from it given below from De Civit. Dei. Hence it is also sure that it was included among those pronounced as Canonical by the 3rd Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), where the same title is given, Esdrae libri duo. In all the earlier editions of the English Bible the books of Esdras are numbered as in the Vulgate. In the 6th Article of the Church of England (first introduced in 1571) the first and second books denote Ezra and Nehemiah, and the 3rd and 4th, among the Apocrypha, are our present 1st and 2nd. In the list of revisers or translators of the Bishops' Bible, sent by Archbishop Parker to Sir William Cecil, with the portion revised by each, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and the apocryphal books of Esdras seem to be all comprised under the one title of ESDRAS. Barlow, bishop of Chichester, was the translator, as also of the books of Judith, Tobias, and Sapientia (Corresp. of Archbp. Parker, p. 335, Parker Soc. See Westcott, Hist. of the Engl. Bible, p. 115). The Geneva Bible first adopted the classification used in our present Bibles, in which EZRA and NEHEMIAH give their names to the two Canonical Books, and the two apocryphal become 1 and 2 Esdras; where the Greek form of the name indicates that these books do not exist in Hebrew or Chaldee.

II. Reception of the book.—As regards the antiquity of this book and the rank assigned to it in the early Church, it may suffice to mention that Josephus quotes largely from it, and follows its authority, even in contradiction to the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah, by which he has been led into hopeless historical blunders and anachronisms. It is quoted also by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i.); and the famous sentence "Veritas manet, et invalescit in æternum, et vivit et obtinet in sæcula sæculorum" (iv. 38) is cited by Cyprian as from Esdras, and prefaced by ut scriptum est (Epist. lxxiv.). Augustine also refers to the same passage (de Civit. Dei, xviii. 36), and suggests that it may be prophetic of Christ, Who is the truth. He includes under the name of Esdras our 1st Esd. and the canonical Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. 1 Esd. is also cited by Athanasius and other fathers (see Pohlmenn in Tüb. Theolog. Quartalschr. p. 263 sq., 1859); and perhaps there is no sentence that has been more widely divulged than that of iv. 41, "Magna est veritas et praevallet." It is rightly included by us among the Apocrypha, not only on the ground of its historical inaccuracy, and contradiction of the true Ezra, but also on the external evidence of the early Church. That it was never known to exist in Hebrew, and formed no part of the Hebrew Canon, is admitted by all (see Bissell, § 4). Jerome, in his preface to Ezra and Neh., speaks contemptuously of the dreams (somnia) of the 3rd and 4th Esdras, and says that they are to be utterly rejected. In his Prologus Galeatus he clearly defines the number of Books in the Canon, xiii., corresponding to the xiii. letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and says that all others are apocryphal. This of course excludes 1 Esdras. Melito, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Gregory Nazianzen, Hilary of Poitiers, Cyril of Jerusalem, the Council of Laodicea, and many other fathers, expressly follow the same Canon, counting as apocryphal whatever is not comprehended in it.

* "Oratio Manassæ, necnon libri duo qui sub libro tertii et quarti Esdræ nomine circumferuntur, hoc in loco, extra scilicet seriem canonicoorum librorum, quos sancta Tridentina synodus suscepit, et pro canonici suscipiendos decrevit, sepositi sunt, ne prorsus interferant, quippe qui à nonnullis sanctis Patribus interdum citantur, et in aliquibus Bibliis Latinis, tam manuscriptorum quam impressarum, reperuntur."

^b Jerome, in his preface to his Latin Version of Ezra and Nehemiah, says, "Unus à nobis liber editus est," &c.; though he implies that they were sometimes called 1 and 2 Esdras.

III. Contents.—As regards the contents of the book, the first chapter is a transcript of the last two chapters of 2 Ch., for the most part verbatim, and only in one or two parts slightly abridged and paraphrased, and showing some corruptions of the text, the use of a different Greek Version, and some various readings. Chapters iii., iv., and v., to the end of v. 6, are the original portions of the book, containing the legend of the three young Jews at the court of Darius; and the rest is a transcript more or less exact of the Book of Ezra, with the chapters transposed and quite otherwise arranged, and of a portion of Nehemiah (cp. Lupton, Schürer, and Zöckler). The central subject of the book, now very commonly accepted, is that originated by the heading of the Old Latin Version, "De restitutione Templi:" but other and collateral designs are apparent on the part of the compiler, such as his wish to stimulate his countrymen to a more zealous observance of the Law, and win the favour of a Ptolemaic or other heathen power; or his desire to introduce and give Scriptural sanction to the legend about Zerubbabel, which may or may not have an historical base, and may have existed as a separate work; or to explain the great obscurities of the Book of Ezra, and to present the narrative, as the author understood it, in historical order. In this latter point, however, he has signally failed. For, not to advert to innumerable other contradictions, the introducing the opposition of the heathen, as offered to Zerubbabel after he had been sent to Jerusalem in such triumph by Darius, and the describing that opposition as lasting "until the reign of Darius" (v. 73), and as put down by an appeal to the decree of Cyrus, is such a palpable inconsistency, as is alone quite sufficient to discredit the authority of the book. It even induces the suspicion that it is a farrago made up of scraps by several different hands. At all events, attempts to reconcile the different portions with each other, or with Scripture, is lost labour (see Lupton, § iii.). The compiler himself is unknown.

V. Time and place.—As regards the time when and place where the compilation was made, the original portion (iii. 1-v. 6)—original, that is, in the sense that there is nothing to answer to it in the Canonical Books—does not afford much clue. It may have come from a current Persian court anecdote or from a Jewish tradition. The conjecture (Fritzsche and Reuss) that not Zerubbabel but his son Joachim is the hero of this episode, and the deduction of date from this change, is unsatisfactory, and does not remove other difficulties (see Lupton and Zöckler). The writer was conversant with Hebrew, though he did not write the book in that language. He was well acquainted with the Books of Esther and Daniel (1 Ed. iii. 1, 2 sq.), and other Books of Scripture (ib. cc. 20, 21, 39, 41, &c., and v. 45 compared with Pa. cxixvii. 7); but that he did not live under the Persian kings, and was not contemporary with the events narrated, appears by the indiscriminating way in which he uses promiscuously the phrase Medes and Persians, or Persians and Medes, according as he happened to be imitating the language of Daniel or of the Book of Esther. The allusion in iv. 23 to "sailing upon the sea and upon the rivers," for the purpose of "robbing and stealing," seems to indicate residence in Egypt, and acquaintance with the lawlessness of Greek pirates there acquired. The phraseology of v. 73 (of disputed meaning) savours also strongly of Greek rather than Hebrew. If, however, as seems very probable, the legend of Zerubbabel appeared first as a separate piece, and was afterwards incorporated into the narrative made up from the Book of Ezra, this Greek sentence from ch. v. would not prove anything as to the language in which the original legend was written. The expressions in iv. 40, "She is the strength, kingdom, power, and majesty of all ages," is very like the doxology found in some copies of the Lord's Prayer, and retained by us, "thine is the kingdom, and the power and the glory for ever;" but Lightfoot says that the Jews in the Temple-service, instead of saying Amen, used this antiphon, "Blessed be the Name of the Glory of Thy Kingdom for ever and ever" (vi. 427). So that the resemblance may be accounted for by their being both taken from a common source. Indications, though faint ones, seem to place the origin of the work in the 1st, or at the latter end of the 2nd, century B.C. Ewald finds traces of the story of chs. iii. iv. in the earliest of the Sibylline books (B.C. 181-143), and affirms that the "history" of Aristæus (on the LXX.; 1st century) must have been known to the compiler. Lupton argues that the building of a temple, or restoration and adaptation of an Egyptian temple, for Jewish worship, such as is connected with Onias in the time of Ptolemy Philometor, suggested the production of 1 Esdras, and furnishes other reasons for agreeing with Herzfeld in assigning the work to a period preceding the Maccabean wars. The point cannot be said to be conclusively settled.

ES'DRAS, SECOND BOOK OF, in the English Version of the Apocrypha, and so called by the author (2 Esd. i. 1), is more commonly known, according to the reckoning of the Latin Version, as the fourth Book of Ezra [see above, 1 ESDRAS]; but the arrangement in the Latin MSS. is not uniform (see that of the Codex Sangermanensis quoted in Lupton, § i.), and in the Arabic and Aethiopic Versions the book is called the first of Ezra. The original title, Ἐσδραβίβλος Ἐσδρα (or προφητεία Ἐσδρα), "the Revelation of Ezra," which is preserved in some old catalogues of the canonical and apocryphal books (Nicephorus, ap. Fabric. Cod. Pseut. V. T., ii. 176; Montfaucon, Biblioth. Coislin. p. 194), is far more appropriate, and it were to be wished that it could have been restored, had it been possible to do so without confusion with a later and inferior work, bearing this title, and published by Tischendorf in 1866 (cp. Lupton, § i.)

I. Language and Versions.—The original language of the book was Greek (cp. Van der Vliet, Disputatio critica de Ezrae libro Apocrypho, &c., pp. 10-14, 1839), but for a long time it was known only by an Old Latin Version, which is preserved in some MSS. of the Vulgate. This Version (3rd cent., Fritzsche) was used by Ambrose (see the parallels in Lupton, § ii.), and, like the other parts of the Vetus Latina, is probably older than the time of Tertullian. The Arabic text was discovered by Mr. Gregory about the middle of the 17th century in two Bodleian MSS., and an English Version made from this by Simon Ockley was inserted by Whiston in the last volume of his Primitive Christianity (London, 1711). Fabricius added the various readings of the Arabic text to his edition of the Latin in 1723 (Cod. Pseut. V. T., ii. 174 sq.). The Aethiopic text was published in 1820 by [Archbp.] Laurence with English and Latin translations, likewise from a Bodleian MS. which had remained wholly disregarded, though quoted by Ludolf in his Dictionary ("Primi Ezrae libri, versio Aethiopica. . . Latine Anglicae reddita;" Oxon. 1820). The emendations made by Van der Vliet (p. 77), the readings from other MSS. collected by Dillmann (printed at the end of Ewald's edition of the Arabic text), and those subsequently made by Praetorius, are necessary for the study of a text of great value. The Latin translation has been reprinted by Gfrörer, with the various readings of the Latin and Arabic (Praef. Pseut., Stuttgart. 1840, p. 66 sq.); and the Bodleian Arabic text has been published by Ewald (1863), who dates it A.D. 1354, and another version of it, also of the 14th cent., by Gildemeister (1877). The Armenian Version, published in 1666, and translated in Hilgenfeld's Messias Judaeorum, diverges very widely from the rest.

Of the five existing Versions, four (the Syriac, Arabic, Aethiopic, and Latin) are thought to have been made from a Greek text; the Armenian Version was not. This is certainly the case with regard to the Latin, the oldest and most important of all, which bears everywhere traces of Greek idiom (Lücke, Versuch einer vollst. Einleitung, i. 144), and the Aethiopic (Van der Vliet, p. 75 sq.), but is less certain with regard to the two versions of the Arabic (Fritzsche thinks the first text of the Arabic to be taken from the Syriac). A clear witness to the Greek text is Clement of Alexandria, who expressly quotes the book as the work of "the prophet Ezra" (Strom. iii. 16; cp. Ambrose, de bono mortis, ch. xii.). A question, however, has been raised whether the Greek text was not itself a translation from the Hebrew (Bretschneider in Henke's Mus. iii. 478 sq.; ap. Lücke, l. c.); but the arguments from language by which the hypothesis of a Hebrew (Aramaic) original is supported, are wholly unsatisfactory; and in default of direct evidence to the contrary, it must be supposed that the book was composed in Greek. This conclusion is further strengthened by its internal character, which points to Egypt as the place of its composition.

The Latin text, for many years that of the Codex Sangermanensis (A.D. 822), compared with that of the Codex Turinensis (13th cent.) and of the Codex Dresdensis (15th cent.), can now be improved by a Complutensian MS. of the 8th cent. discovered by Prof. Palmer in 1826, and by the Amiens MS. of the 9th cent. discovered by Mr. Bensley in 1874 (cp. Lupton, § iii.). Followed by the English Version, it contains two important interpolations (chs. i. ii.; xv. xvi.) which are not found in the four Oriental Versions, and are separated from the genuine Apocalypse in the best Latin MSS. Both of these passages are evidently Christian origin: they contain traces of the use of the Christian Scriptures (e.g. i. 30, 33, 37; ii. 13, 26, 45 sq.; xv. 8, 35; xvi. 54), and still more they are pervaded by an anti-Jewish spirit. Thus, in the opening chapter, Ezra is commanded to reprove the people of Israel for their continual rebellions (i. 1-23), in consequence of which God threatens to cast them off (i. 24-34) and to "give their houses to a people that shall come." But in spite of their desertion, God offers once more to receive them (ii. 1-32). The offer is rejected (ii. 33), and the heathen are called. Then Ezra sees "the Son of God" standing in the midst of a great multitude "wearing crowns and bearing palms in their hands," in token of their victorious confession of the truth. The last two chapters (xv., xvi.) are different in character. They contain a stere prophecy of the woes which shall come upon Egypt, Babylon, Asia, and Syria, and upon the whole earth, with an exhortation to the chosen to guard their faith in the midst of all the trials with which they shall be visited (? the Decian persecution. Cp. Lücke, p. 186, &c.). Another smaller interpolation occurs in the Latin Version in vii. 28, where filius meus Jesus answers to "My Messiah" in the Aethiopic, and to "My Son Messiah" in the Arabic (cp. Lücke, p. 170 n. &c.; Speaker's Comm. in loco). The passage in the Oriental Versions after vii. 35, now also restored to the Latin, was probably omitted from dogmatic causes. The chapter contains a strange description of the intermediate state of souls, and ends with a peremptory denial of the efficacy of human intercession after death. Vigilantius appealed to the passage in support of his views, and called down upon himself by this the severe reproof of Jerome (Lb. c. Vigil. c. 7). This circumstance, combined with the Jewish complexion of the narrative, may have led to its rejection in later times (cp. Lücke, p. 155 sq.).

II. Contents.—The original Apocalypse (iii.-xiv.) consists of a series of angelic revelations and visions in which Ezra, musing in the outskirts of Babylon, is instructed in some of the great mysteries of the moral world, and assured of the final triumph of the righteous. The first revelation (iii.-v. 15, according to the E. V.) is given by the Angel Uriel to Ezra, in "the thirtieth year after the ruin of the city" (i.e. some ninety years too early!), in answer to his complaints (ch. iii.) that Israel was neglected by God while the heathen were lords over them; and the chief subject is the unsearchableness of God's purposes, and the signs of the last age. The second revelation (v. 20-vi. 34) carries out this teaching yet further, and lays open the gradual progress of the plan of Providence, and the nearness of the visitation before which evil must attain its most terrible climax. The third revelation (vi. 35-ix. 25) answers the objections which arise from the apparent narrowness of the limits within which the hope of blessedness is confined, and describes the coming of Messiah and the last scene of Judgment. After this follow three visions. The first vision (ix. 26-x. 59) is of a woman (Sion) in deep sorrow, lamenting the death, upon his bridal day, of her only son (the city built by Solomon), who had been born to her after she had had no child for thirty years. But while Ezra looked, her face "upon a sudden shined exceedingly," and "the woman appeared no more, but there was a city builded." The second vision (chs. xi., xii.), in a dream, is of an eagle (Rome) which "came up from the sea" and "spread her wings over all the earth." As Ezra looked, the eagle suffered strange transformations, so that at one time "three heads and six little wings" remained; and at last only one head was left, when suddenly a lion (Messiah) came forth, and with the voice of a man rebuked the eagle, and it was burnt up. The third vision (ch. xiii.), in a dream, is of a man (Messiah) "flying with the clouds of heaven," against whom the nations of the earth are gathered, till he destroys them with the blast of His mouth, and gathers together the lost tribes of Israel and offers Sion, "prepared and builded," to His people. The last chapter (xiv.) recounts an appearance to Ezra of the Lord Who showed Himself to Moses in the bush, at Whose command he receives again the Law which had been burnt, and with the help of scribes writes down ninety-four books (the twenty-four canonical Books of the O. T. and seventy books of secret mysteries), and thus the people are prepared for their last trial, guided by the recovered Law.*

III. Date.—The date of the book (chs. iii.-xiv.) is much disputed (see the three main conclusions in Schürer²), though the limits within which opinions vary are narrower than in the case of the book of Enoch. Lücke (*Versuch einer vollst. Einl.*² i. 209) places it in the time of Caesar; Van der Vlis, shortly after the death of Caesar. Laurence (l. c.) brings it down somewhat lower, to 28-25 B.C., and Hilgenfeld (Jud. Apok. p. 221; Messias Judaeorum, p. lxi.) agrees with this conclusion, though he arrives at it by very different reasoning. On the other hand, Gfrörer (Jahrh. d. Heils, i. 69 sq.) assigns the book to the time of Domitian (A.D. 81-96), and in this he is followed by most authorities, Wieseler, Reuss, Fritzsche, Dillmann, Schürer,² &c. The interpretation of the details of the vision of the eagle furnishes the chief data for determining the time of its composition (cp. Fabricius, Cod. Pseul. ii. p. 189 sq.; and Lücke, p. 187, n. &c., for a summary of the earlier opinions on the composition of the book).

The chief characteristics of the "three-headed eagle," which refer apparently to historical details,¹ are "twelve feathered wings" (duodecim alas pennarum), "eight counterfeathers" (contrariae pennae), and "three heads;" but though the writer expressly interprets these of kings (xii. 14, 20) and "kingdoms" (xii. 23), he is, perhaps intentionally, so obscure in his allusions, that the interpretation only increases the difficulties of the vision itself. One point only may be considered certain,—the eagle can typify no other empire than Rome. Notwithstanding the identification of the eagle with the fourth empire of Daniel (cp. Barn. Ep. 4; DANIEL, BOOK OF), it is impossible to suppose that it represents the Greek kingdom (Hilgenfeld; cp. Volkmar, Die vierte Buch Esra, p. 36 sq., Zürich, 1858). The power of the Ptolemies could scarcely have been described in language which may be rightly applied to Rome (xi. 2, 6, 40); and the succession of kings quoted by Hilgenfeld to represent "the twelve wings" preserves only a faint resemblance to the imagery of the vision. Seeking then the interpretation of the vision in the history of Rome, the second wing (i.e. king), which rules twice as long as the other (xi. 17), is found in Augustus, who reigned some fifty-six years. The "three heads" are taken to represent the three Flavii (Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian), and "the twelve" to be the nine Caesars (Jul. Caesar to Vitellius) and the three pretenders Piso, Vindex, and Nymphidius (Gfrörer). Volkmar's interpretation—by which the twelve wings represent six Caesars (Caesar to Nero); the eight "counter-feathers," four usurping emperors, Galba, Otho, Vitellius, and Nerva; and the three heads the three Flavii—offers many striking coincidences with the text, but is directly opposed to the form of interpretation given by Ezra (xii. 14, 18), and for other less than five minor Apocalypses worked up in the time of Hadrian (A.D. 120), may be seen in Zöckler, p. 447.—[F.]

* For other arrangements of the revelations and visions (e.g. sevenfold) see Schürer, Zöckler, and Lupton, l. v. who also gives a fuller analysis of the contents. The arbitrary views of Laelin, who considers the work a fiction, composed by a Syrian Christian against Mahomedanism, and of Rablach, who finds in ch. xiv. not reasons is extremely improbable. Van der Vlis and Lücke² regard the twelve kings as only generally symbolic of the Roman power; and while they identify the three heads with the Triumvirs, seek no explanation of the other details. The clearer light now thrown upon Jewish thought and history during the critical period 100 B.C.—100 A.D. makes Gfrürer's hypothesis, with modifications, the most probable (see Schürer²).

The book—apocalyptic in cast and markedly distinct from the historically framed books which also bear the name of Ezra—is a genuine product of Jewish thought. Weisse (Evangelienfrage, p. 222) alone dissents on this point from the unanimous judgment of recent scholars (Hilgenfeld, p. 190, &c.); and the contrast between the tone and style of the Christian interpolations and the remainder of the book is in itself sufficient to prove the fact. This apocalypse was written in Alexandria more probably than in Palestine; the opening and closing chapters certainly were; while their author is now considered to have been a Christian. The date of chs. xv., xvi. is placed between 260–270 A.D.; that of ch. i., ii. is not fixed so unanimously.

IV. Character.—In tone and character the apocalypse of Ezra offers a striking contrast to that of Enoch [BOOK OF ENOCH]. Triumphant anticipations are overshadowed by gloomy forebodings over the destiny of the world. The idea of victory is lost in that of revenge. Future blessedness is reserved only for "a very few" (vii. 70; viii. 1, 3, 52–55; ix. 1–13). The great question is "not how the ungodly shall be punished, but how the righteous shall be saved, for whom the world is created" (ix. 13). The "woes of Messiah" are described with a terrible minuteness, which approaches the despairing traditions of the Talmud (r., xiv. 10 sq., ix. 3 sq.); and after a reign of 400 years (vii. 28–35; the clause is wanting in Aeth. v. 29), "Christ," it is said, "My Son, shall die (Arab. omits), and all men that have breath; and the world shall be turned into the old silence seven days, like as in the first beginning, and no man shall remain" (vii. 29). Then shall follow the resurrection and the judgment, "the end of this time and the beginning of immortality" (vii. 43). In other points the doctrine of the book offers curious approximations to that of St. Paul, as the imagery does to that of the Apocalypse (e.g. 2 Esd. xiii. 43 sq.; v. 4).³ The relation of "the first Adam" to his sinful posterity, and the operation of the Law (iii. 20 sq., vii. 48, ix. 36); the transitoriness of the world (iv. 26); the eternal counsels of God (vi. sq.); His Providence (vii. 11) and long-suffering (vii. 64); His sanctification of His people "from the beginning" (ix. 8) and their peculiar and lasting privileges (vi. 59), are plainly stated; and on the other hand the efficacy of good works (viii. 33) in conjunction with faith (ix. 7) is no less clearly affirmed.

One tradition which the book contains obtained a wide reception in early times, and served as a pendant to the legend of the origin of the LXX. Ezra, it is said, in answer to his prayer that he might be inspired to write again all the Law which was burnt, received a command to take with him tablets and five men, and retire for forty days. In this retirement a cup was given him to drink, and forthwith his understanding was quickened and his memory strengthened; and for forty days and forty nights he dictated to his scribes, who wrote ninety-four books (Latin, 204), of which twenty-four were delivered to the people in place of the books which were lost (xiv. 20–48). This strange story was repeated in various forms by Irenaeus (adv. Haer. iii. 21, 2), Tertullian (de cult. foem. i. 3, "omne instrumentum Judaicae literaturae per Esdras constat restauratum"), Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 22, p. 410, P.; cp. p. 392), Jerome (adv. Helv. 7, cp. Pseudo-Augustine, de Mirab. S. Scr. ii. 32), and many others; and probably owed its origin to the tradition which regarded Ezra as the representative of the men of "the Great Synagogue," to whom the final revision of the Canonical Books was universally assigned in early times. [CANON.]

V. Reception.—Though the book was assigned to the "prophet" Ezra by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 16) and quoted with respect by Irenaeus (l. c.) and Ambrose, who adopts or paraphrases many passages in it (Lupton, § ii.), it did not maintain its ecclesiastical position in the Church.⁴ Jerome speaks of it with contempt (adv. Vigilant. See quotation in Speaker's Comm. on vii. 102*), and it is rarely found in MSS. of the Latin Bible. Archbishop Laurence examined 180 MSS., and the book was contained only in thirteen, and in these it was arranged very differently. It is found, however, in the printed copies of the Vulgate older than the Council of Trent, by which it was excluded from the Canon; and quotations from it still occur in the Roman services (Basnage, op. Fabr. Cod. Pseud. ii. 191. The words of ii. 34, 35 are embodied in the "Missa pro defunctis" of the Sarum use). On the other hand, though this book is included among those which are "read for examples of life" by the English Church, no use of it is now made in public worship, though formerly ii. 36, 37 was used as an Introit for Whitsun Tuesday. Luther and the Reformed Church rejected the book entirely; but it was held in high estimation by numerous mystics (Fabric. l. c. p. 178 sq.), for whom its contents naturally had great attractions.

VI. Literature.—The literature of the subject is very large. Some works have been already noted. Schürer (Gesch. d. Jüd. Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi,² p. 661) and Zöckler ('Die Apokryphen d. A. T.'s nebst einem Anhang über die Pseudepigraphen,' p. 448 in Strack u. Zöckler's Kjf. Komm. in d. heil. Schriften A. u. N. T.'s) give a full list. The English reader will find help from Bissell, "The Apocrypha," Appendix i. (Lange's Comm. on the Holy Scriptures); Eddrup, Introduction to 1 and 2 Esdras in S.P.C.K. Comm. on the Apocrypha; Churton's The Uncanonical and Apocryphal Scriptures; and above all from Lupton in the Speaker's Comm. on 2 Esdras. The essay of Van der Vlis is the most important contribution to the study of the text, of which a critical edition is still needed, though the Latin materials for its construction are abundant. [B. F. W.] [F.]

³ A complete list of parallel passages between 2 Esd. and the N. T. may be seen in Lec, 'Αποκαλύψεις, pp. 112–25, 1752.

ESDRE'LOM, ESDRE'LOM. [ESDRA-ELON.]

ESEBON, THEY OF (τοὺς Ἑσεβωνίτας, A. τοὺς Ἑσεβόν; Hesebon), Judith v. 15. [HESHBON.]

ESEBRIAS (Ἑσεβρίας; Sudebias), 1 Esd. viii. 54. [SHEREBIAH.]

ESEK (Ἑσέκ = strife; Ἀδικία; Calumnia), a well (קעק) containing a spring of water; which the herdsmen of Isaac dug in the valley of Gerar, and which received its name of Esek, or "strife," because the herdsmen of Gerar "strove" (ἔστρεψον) with him for the possession of it* (Gen. xxvi. 20). Josephus (Ant. i. 18, § 2) gives the name as Ἑσκόv. [G.] [W.]

ESH-BAAL (Ἑσβαάλ = Baal's man [עשן as in Phoenician = עשן]; Esbaal), the fourth son of Saul, according to the genealogy of 1 Ch. viii. 33 (B. Ἄσαβάλ, A. Ἰεβάλ) and ix. 39 (B. Ἰεβάλ, N. Ἰσβαάλ, A. Βαάλ). He is doubtless the same person as ISH-BOGHETH, since it was the practice to change the obnoxious name of Baal into Bosheth, as in the case of Jerubbesheth for Jerub-baal, and (in this very genealogy) of Merib-baal for Mephibosheth: cf. also Hos. ix. 10, where Busheth (A. V. and R. V. marg. "shame") appears to be used as a synonym for Baal. Which of the two names is the earlier it is not possible to decide. [G.] [W.]

ESH'BAN (Ἑσβάν; Ἀσβάν [Gen.], B. Ἀσεβάν, A. Ἑσεβάν [1 Ch.]; Eseban), a Horite; one of the four sons of DISHAN (so the Hebrew in Gen.; but A. V. has Dishon), the son of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvii. 26; 1 Ch. i. 41). No trace of the name appears to have been discovered among the modern tribes of Idumaea. [G.] [W.]

ESH'COL (Ἑσκόλ; Ἑσχώλ; Joseph. Ἑσχώλης; Eshcol), brother of Mamre the Amorite, and of Aner; and one of Abraham's companions in his pursuit of the four kings who had carried off Lot (Gen. xiv. 13, 24). According to Josephus (Ant. i. 10, § 2) he was the foremost of the three brothers, but the Bible narrative leaves this quite uncertain (cp. v. 13 with v. 24). Their residence was at Hebron (xiii. 18), and possibly the name of Eshcol remained attached to one of the fruitful valleys in that district till the arrival of the Israelites, who then interpreted the appellation as significant of the Sicilianic "cluster" (in Heb. Eshcol) which they obtained there. [G.] [W.]

* The word rendered "strive" (ἔστρεψον) in the former part of v. 20 and in vv. 21 and 22 is not the same as that from which Esek derived its name, and has therefore been translated by R. V. by a different English word, "contended." Such points, though small, are anything but unimportant in connexion with these ancient and peculiar records.

ESH'COL, THE VALLEY, OR THE

BROOK, OF (ἡ ἐσκόλ-ἡ, or ἡ ἐσκόλ; φάραξ Βότρπος: Torrents botri; Nehetescol, id est torrents botri; Vallis botri), a wady in the neighbourhood of Hebron, explored by the spies who were sent by Moses from Kadesh-barnea. From the terms of two of the notices of this transaction (Num. xxxii. 9; Deut. i. 24), and from the speech of Caleb (Josh. xiv. 7-12), it might be gathered that Eshcol was the furthest point to which the spies penetrated. But this would be to contradict the express statement of Num. xiii. 21, that they went as far as Rehob. From this fruitful valley they brought back a huge cluster of grapes; an incident which, according to the narrative, obtained for the place its appellation of the "valley of the cluster" (Num. xiii. 23, 24). It is true that in Hebrew Eshcol signifies a cluster or bunch, but the name had existed in this neighbourhood centuries before, when Abraham lived there with the chiefs Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre, not Hebrews but Amorites; and this was possibly the Hebrew way of appropriating the ancient name derived from that hero into the language of the conquerors, consistently with the paronomastic turns so much in favour at that time, and with a practice of which traces appear elsewhere.

In the Onomasticon of Eusebius the φάραξ Βότρπος is placed, with some hesitation, at Gophna, 15 miles north of Jerusalem, on the Neapolis road (OS. p. 288, 92). By Jerome it is given as north of Hebron, on the road to Bethsur (Epitaph. Paulae). The Jewish traveller Ha-Parchi speaks of it as north of the mountain on which the (ancient) city of Hebron stood (Benjamin of Tudela, Asher, ii. 437). A short distance N.W. of Hebron is a fine spring called 'Ain Keshkaleh, which in ordinary conversation is pronounced 'Ain Ashkali. It is mentioned under the name 'Ain Eskali by Van de Velde (ii. 64), De Sauley (Voy. en Terre Sainte, i. 155), Sepp (Jerus. u. d. heil. Land, i. 593), and identified with Eshcol. On the other hand, Dr. Rosen (ZDMG., 1858, pp. 481-2), Guérin (Judée, iii. 215), and Conder (PEF. Mem. iii. 306) give the form Keshkaleh, which may represent Eshcol, though the corruption would be unusual. The Jews of Hebron identify it with W. Tuffûh, up which runs the road from Hebron to Tuffûh and Beit Jibrin. The vineyards in this valley are very fine, and produce the largest and best grapes in the country, especially a large seedless grape which is much sought after (Robinson, Phys. Geog. of H. Land, p. 110; Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 393). Geikie (Holy Land and the Bible, i. 318) places Eshcol near Beersheba, but there are many objections to this. [G.] [W.]

ESH'EAN, R. V. ESH'AN (Ἑσάν; B. Σομά, A. (?) Ἑσάν; Esaan), one of the cities of Judah, in the mountainous district, and in the same group with Arab, er-Rabiyeh, and Dumah, ed-Dâmeh (Josh. xv. 52). It is possibly es-Simia, 2½ m. E. of Dâmeh (PEF. Mem. iii. 313, 378). [G.] [W.]

E'SHEK (Ἑσέκ = oppression; B. Ἀσηλ, A. Ἑσελείκ; Esec), a Benjamite, one of the late descendants of Saul; the founder of a large and noted family of archers, lit. "treaders of the bow" (1 Ch. viii. 39). The name is omitted in the parallel list of 1 Ch. ix. [G.]

ESHKALO'NITES, THE (accurately "the Eshkelonite," יִשְׁכֶּלֹנִי , in the singular number; $\tau\eta\ \text{Ἀσκαλωνίτης}$; Ascalonitas), Josh. xiii. 3. [ASHKELON.] [G.]

ESHTA'OL (עִשְׁתָּאֹל and עִשְׁתָּאֹל , (?) = request, Ges.; B. 'Ασθαῶλ and 'Ασθ, A. 'Εσθαῶλ; Esthaol, Estaol, Asthaol), a town in the low country—the Shefelah—of Judah. It is the first of the first group of cities in that district (Josh. xv. 33) enumerated with Zoreah (Heb. Zareah), in company with which it is commonly mentioned. Zorah (R. V.) and Eshtaol were two of the towns allotted to the tribe of Dan out of Judah (Josh. xix. 41). Between them, and behind Kirjath-jearim, was situated Mahaneh-Dan, the camp or stronghold which formed the head-quarters of that little community during their constant encounters with the Philistines. Here, among the old warriors of the tribe, Samson spent his boyhood, and experienced the first impulses of the Spirit of Jehovah; and hither after his last exploit his body was brought, up the long slopes of the western hills, to its last rest in the burying-place of Manoah his father (Judg. xiii. 25; xvi. 31; xviii. 2, 8, 11, 12). [DAN.] In the genealogical records of 1 Chron. the relationship between Eshtaol, Zareah, and Kirjath-jearim is still maintained. [ESHTA'ULITES.]

In the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome it is mentioned as Esthaol ('Εσθαῶλ) of Dan, 10 miles N. of Eleutheropolis on the road to Nicopolis (*OS*² p. 261, 87; p. 153, 32). It is now the small village of Eshū'a, 13 English miles N. of Beit Jibrin, Eleutheropolis, and not far from Sur'ah, Zorah, which is also placed by the Onomasticon 10 miles N. of Eleutheropolis (PEF. Mem. iii. 25). Guérin (Judée, ii. 12) also identifies the village, which he calls Achou'a, with Eshtaol. He connects a Wely Sheikh Gherb with the tomb of Samson (ii. 382, but see PEF. Mem. iii. 164). A description of the locality is given by Geikie (Holy Land and the Bible, ii. 147). [G.] [W.]

ESHTA'ULITES, THE ($\text{עִשְׁתָּאֹלִיטַיִם}$, accur. "the Eshtaulite," in sing. number; B. vīol 'Εσθαῶται, A. oi 'Εσθαῶλῆται; Esthaolites), with the Zareathites, were among the families of Kirjath-jearim (1 Ch. ii. 53). [ESHTAOL.] [G.]

ESHTEMO'A, and in shorter form, without the final guttural, ESHTEMOH' (עִשְׁתֵּמוֹא and עִשְׁתֵּמוֹה); the latter occurs in Josh. xv. only: in Josh. xv., B. corruptly 'Εσκαμῶν, A. 'Εσθεμῶ; in Josh. xxi., B. corruptly Τέμα, A. 'Εσθεμῶ; in 1 Sam., B. 'Εσθεῖε, A. 'Εσθεμῶ: Istemo, Estemo, Esthamo, Esthemo), a town of Judah, in the mountains; one of the group containing DEBR (Josh. xv. 50). With its "suburbs" Eshtemoa was allotted to the priests (xxi. 14; 1 Ch. vi. 57). It was one of the places frequented by David and his followers during the long period of their wanderings; and to his friends there he sent presents of the spoil of the Amalekites (1 Sam. xxx. 28, cp. v. 31). The place was known in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, who describe it as a κῶμη μεγίστη in Daroma (*OS*² p. 254, 70, 'Εσθεμῶ). There is little doubt that it was discovered by Dr. Robinson at es-Semū'a, a village 7 miles south of Hebron, on the great road from el-Mīlā, and in the neighbourhood of other villages still bearing the names of its companions in the list of Josh. xv.; Anab, Socoh, Jattir, &c. The village is full of ancient remains; there are some interesting tombs, and boundary stones which appear to mark the ancient limits of the city (see Robinson, i. 494, ii. 204-5; Schwarz, p. 165; PEF. Mem. iii. 403, 412; Guérin, Judée, iii. 173-75).

In the lists—half genealogical, half topographical—of the descendants of Judah in 1 Ch., Eshtemoa occurs as derived from Ishbah, "the father of Eshtemoa" (1 Ch. iv. 17); Gedor, Socoh, and Zanoah, all towns in the same locality, being named in the following verse. Eshtemoa appears to have been founded by the descendants of the Egyptian wife of a certain Mered, the three other towns by those of his Jewish wife. See the explanations of Bertheau (Chronik, ad loc.). [G.] [W.]

ESHTEMO'A (B. 'Εσθαμῶν, A. 'Ιεσθεμῶν; Esthamo), in 1 Ch. iv. 19, appears to be the name of an actual person, "Eshtemoa the Machathite." [MAACHATHITE.]

ESH'TON (Ἰσθῶν ; 'Ασθαθῶν; Esthon), a name which occurs in the genealogies of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 11, 12). Mehir was "the father of Eshton," and amongst the names of his four children are two—Beth-rapha and Ir-nahash—which have the appearance of being names, not of persons, but of places. [G.] [W.]

ES'LI (Rec. T. 'Εσλί, B. 'Εσλεί, probably = Ἰθὺλῆν , AZALIAH; Esli, Cod. Amiat. Hesli), son of Nagge or Naggai, and father of Naum, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 25). See Hervef, Genealogies, &c., p. 136. [G.]

ESO'RA (Aiswad; Vulg. omits: the Peshitto Syriac reads Bethchorn), a place fortified by the Jews on the approach of the Assyrian army under Holofernes (Judith iv. 4). The name may be the representative of the Hebrew word Hazor, or Zorah (Simonis, Onom. N. T. p. 19), but no identification has yet been arrived at. The Syriac reading suggests Beth-horon, which is not impossible (see Speaker's Comm.). [G.]

ESPOUSAL. [MARRIAGE.]

ES'RIL ('Εσρίλ, A. 'Εζρίλ; Vulg. omits), 1 Esd. ix. 34. [AZAREEL, or SHARAI.] [G.]

ES'ROM (Rec. T. 'Εσρώμ; in Luke, Lachm. with B, 'Εσρών; Esrom), Matt. i. 3; Luke iii. 33. [HEZRON.] [G.]

ESSE'NES. 1. In describing the different sects which existed among the Jews in his own time, Josephus dwells at great length and with especial emphasis on the faith and practice of the Essenes, the third in his category; the Pharisees and the Sadducees being the other two. They appear in his description to combine the ascetic virtues of the Pythagoreans and Stoics with a spiritual knowledge of the Divine Law. An analogous sect, marked, however, by characteristic differences, used, at one time, to be found in the Egyptian Therapeutae; and from the detailed notices of Josephus (B. J. ii. 8; Ant. xiii. 5, § 9, xv. 10, § 4 sq., xviii. 1, § 2 sq. [see § 12]) and Philo (Quod omn. prob. ver. § 12 sq. [see p. 628, note *]; Fragm. ap. Euseb. Præp. Ec. de vita contemplativa), and the casual remarks of Pliny (H. N. v. 17), later writers have frequently discussed the relation which these Jewish mystics occupied towards the popular religion of the time, and more particularly towards the doctrines of Christianity. For it is a most remarkable fact that the existence of such sects appears to be unrecognised both in the Apostolic writings and in early Hebrew literature.

2. The name Essene (Ἐσσηνοί, Joseph.; Esseni, Plin.) or Essæan (Ἐσσαῖοι, Philo; Jos. B. J. i. 3, 5, &c.) is itself full of difficulty. Various derivations have been proposed for it, and all are more or less open to objection (see the list in Lightfoot,² p. 349 sq.). The derivation preferred by Schürer and Ginsburg is that from נְדָוִי = "the pious ones"; Lightfoot would give the preference to דְּנִשְׁוִי = "the silent ones."

3. The obscurity of the Essenes as a distinct body arises from the fact that they represented originally a tendency rather than an organisation. The communities which were formed out of them were a result of their practice, and not a necessary part of it. As a sect they were distinguished by an aspiration after ideal purity rather than by any special code of doctrines; and, like the Chasidim of earlier times [ASSIDEANS], they were confounded in the popular estimation with the great body of the zealous observers of the Law (Pharisees). The growth of Essenism was a natural result of the religious feeling which was called out by the circumstances of the Greek dominion; and it is easy to trace the process by which it was matured. From the Maccabæan age there was a continuous effort among the stricter Jews to attain an absolute standard of holiness. Each class of devotees was looked upon as practically impure by their successors, who carried the laws of purity still further; and the Essenes stand at the extreme limit of the mystic asceticism which was thus gradually reduced to shape. The associations of the "Scribes and Pharisees" (סֹבְרִי, "the companions, the wise") gave place to others bound by a more rigid rule; and the rule of the Essenes was made gradually stricter. Judas, the earliest Essene who is mentioned (c. 110 B.C.), appears living in ordinary society (Jos. B. J. i. 3, § 5). Menahem, according to tradition a colleague of Hillel, was a friend of Herod, and secured for his sect the favour of the king (Jos. Ant. xv. 10, § 5). But by a natural impulse the Essenes withdrew from the dangers and distractions of business. From the cities they retired to the wilderness to realize the conceptions of religion which they formed, while they remained on the whole true to their ancient faith. To the Pharisees they stood nearly in the same relation as that in which the Pharisees themselves stood with regard to the mass of the people. The differences lay mainly in rigour of practice, and not in articles of belief. While the Pharisees and Sadducees represented political-religious parties, the Essenes came to resemble a monastic order (Schürer,² p. 468).

4. The traces of the existence of Essenes in common society are not wanting nor confined to individual cases. Not only was a gate at Jerusalem named from them (Jos. B. J. v. 4, § 2, Ἐσσηῶν πύλη), but a later tradition mentions the existence of a congregation there which devoted "one-third of the day to study, one-third to prayer, and one-third to labour" (Frankel, Zeitschrift, 1846, p. 458). Those, again, whom Josephus speaks of (B. J. ii. 8, § 13) as allowing marriage may be supposed to have belonged to such bodies as had not yet withdrawn from intercourse with their fellow-men. But the practices of the extreme section—which included non-marriage, absence from the Temple, &c.—were afterwards regarded as characteristic of the whole class, and the isolated communities of Essenes furnished the type which is preserved in the popular descriptions. These were regulated by strict rules (see them at length in Ginsburg), analogous to those of the monastic institutions of a later date. The candidate for admission first passed through a year's novitiate, in which he received, as symbolic gifts, an axe, an apron, and a white robe, and gave proof of his temperance by observing the ascetic rules of the order (τὴν αὐτὴν διαίταν). At the close of this probation, his character (τὸ ἦθος) was submitted to a fresh trial of two years, and meanwhile he shared in the lustral rites of the initiated, but not in their meals. The full membership was imparted at the end of this second period, when the novice bound himself "by awful oaths"—though oaths were absolutely forbidden at all other times—to observe piety, justice, obedience, honesty, and secrecy, "preserving alike the books of their sect, and the names of the Angels" (Joseph. B. J. ii. 8, § 7).

5. The order itself was regulated by an internal jurisdiction. Excommunication, unless revoked after due repentance, would be equivalent to a slow death, since an Essene could not take food prepared by strangers for fear of pollution. All things were held in common, without distinction of property or house; and special provision was made for the relief of the poor. Self-denial, temperance, and labour—especially agriculture—were the marks of the outward life of the Essenes; purity and divine communion the objects of their aspiration. Slavery, war, and commerce were alike forbidden (Philo, Quod om. prob. l. § 12, p. 877 M.); and, according to Philo, their conduct generally was directed by three rules, "the love of God, the love of virtue, and the love of man" (Philo, l. c.).

6. In doctrine they did not differ essentially from strict Pharisees. Moses was honoured by them next to God (Joseph. B. J. ii. 8, 9). They observed the Sabbath with singular strictness; and though they were unable to offer sacrifices at Jerusalem, chiefly from regard to purity (διαφορότατοι ἀγνεῖων), but partly also from their conception of sacrifices as of inferior value (Lightfoot, pp. 371–3; Ginsburg, p. 205), they sent gifts thither (Jos. Ant. xviii. 2, § 5). At the same time, like most ascetics, they turned their attention specially to the mysteries of the spiritual world, and looked upon the body as a mere prison of the soul, though this, it would seem, is not to be understood as denying the resurrection of the body (see Ginsburg, p. 207). They studied and practised with signal success, according to Josephus, the art of prophecy (see the instances in Joseph. B. J. i. 8; cp. Ant. xv. 10, § 5; B. J. i. 3, § 5), though Lightfoot considers them prophets in the sense only of fortune-tellers or soothsayers (p. 418); and familiar intercourse with nature gave them an unusual knowledge of physical truths. They asserted with peculiar boldness the absolute power and foreknowledge of God (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 5, § 9; xviii. 1, § 5), and disparaged the various forms of mental philosophy as useless or beyond the range of man (Philo, l. c. p. 877).

7. The number of the Essenes is roughly estimated by Philo at 4,000 (Philo, l. c.; followed by Josephus, Ant. xviii. 2, § 5; cp. B. J. ii. 8; Schürer,² p. 470, n. 12). Their best-known settlements were on the N.W. shore of the Dead Sea (Philo; Plin. ll. cc.), but others lived in scattered communities throughout Palestine, and in other cities besides Jerusalem (Jos. B. J. ii. 8, § 4. Cp. [Hippol.] Philos. ix. 20; Schürer,² p. 471).

8. In the Talmudic writings there is, as has been already said, no direct mention of the Essenes, but their existence is recognised by the notice of peculiar points of practice and teaching. Under the titles of "the pious," "the weakly" (i.e. with study), "the retiring," their maxims are quoted with respect, and many of the traits preserved in Josephus find parallels in the notices of the Talmud (Z. Frankel, Zeitschrift, Dec. 1846, p. 451 sq.; Monatsschrift, 1853, p. 37 sq.). The four stages of purity which are distinguished by the doctors (Chajijah, 18 a, ap. Frankel, op. cit. p. 451) correspond in a singular manner with the four classes into which the Essenes are said to have been divided (Joseph. B. J. ii. 8, § 10); and the periods of probation observed in the two cases offer similar coincidences.*

9. But the best among the Jews felt the peril of Essenism as a system, and combined to discourage it. They shrank with an instinctive dread from the danger of connecting asceticism with spiritual power, and cherished the great truth which lay in the saying "Doctrine is not in heaven." The miraculous energy which was attributed to mystics was regarded by them as rather a matter of suspicion than of respect; and theosophic speculations were condemned with emphatic distinctness (Frankel, Monatsschrift, 1853, pp. 62 sq., 68, 71).

10. The character of Essenism limited its spread. Out of Palestine, Levitical purity was impossible, for the very land was impure; and thus there is no trace of the sect in Babylonia. The case was different in Egypt, where Judaism assumed a new shape from its intimate connexion with Greece. Here the original form in which it was moulded was represented not by direct copies, but by analogous forms; and the tendency which gave birth to the Essenes has been sometimes thought to have found a fresh development in the pure speculation of the Therapeutae. These (according to Philo) were Alexandrine mystics who abjured the practical labours which rightly belonged to the Essenes, and gave themselves up to the study of the inner meaning of the Scriptures. The "whole day, from sunrise to sunset, was spent in mental discipline." Bodily wants were often forgotten in the absorbing pursuit of wisdom, and "meat and drink" were at all times held to be unworthy of the light (Philo, De vit. contempl., § 4). But Philo's treatise is now (see Schürer,² p. 863) generally considered unauthentic. The Therapeutae were probably only Christian monks.

11. From the nature of the case Essenism in its extreme form could exercise very little influence on Christianity.^b In all its practical bearings it was diametrically opposed to the Apostolic teaching. The dangers which it involved were far more clear to the eye of the Christian than they were to the Jewish doctors. The only real similarity between Essenism and Christianity lay in the common element of true Judaism. Nationally, the Essenes occupy the same position as that to which John the Baptist was personally called. They mark the close of the old, the longing for the new, but in this case without the promise. In place of the message of the coming "kingdom" they could proclaim only individual purity and isolation. At a later time traces of Essenism appear in the Clementines (cp. Lightfoot,² p. 372), and the strange account which Epiphanius gives of the Osseni (Ὀσσῆνοι) appears to point to some combination of Essene and pseudo-Christian doctrines (Haec. xix.). After the Jewish war the Essenes disappear from history. The character of Judaism was changed, and ascetic Pharisaism became almost impossible.

12. The original sources for the history of the Essenes have been already noticed. Of modern essays, the most original and important are those of Frankel in his Zeitschrift, 1846, pp. 441-461, and Monatsschrift, 1853, p. 30 sq.; cp. the wider view of Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. i. 207 sq. See also Hilgenfeld (Die Ketzergeschichte d. Urchristenthums, p. 84 sq.); Gröber (Philo, ii. 299 sq.); Dähne (Jüd.-Alex. Relig.-Philos. i. 467 sq.); Ewald (Gesch. d. Volk. Isr. iv. 420 sq.); Lightfoot (Epp. to the Colossians and Philemon, p. 349 sq.); Ginsburg ("Essenes" in Dict. of Christian Biography); Schürer (Gesch. d. Jüd. Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, ii. p. 467 sq.); Morrison (The Jews under Roman Rule, ch. xiv.). The rejection by Ohle (Die Essener, in Jahrb. f. Prot. Theol. xiv. [1888]: Die Pseudophilon-Essäer u.s.c., in Beiträge z. Kirchengeschichte [1888]) of the statements of Josephus as spurious is not accepted by the best modern critics. Lucius (Der Essenismus in seinem Verhältniss z. Judenthum [1881]) is less radical and peremptory. [B. F. W.] [F.]

ESTHER (אֶסְתֵּר = the planet Venus; 'E-ḥap), the Persian name of HADASSAH, daughter of Abihail the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite [MORDECAI], and cousin of Mordecai. The explanation of her old name Hadassah, by the addition of her new name, by which she was better known, with the formula אֶסְתֵּר מִיָּדָה.

^b On this point again Lightfoot² (p. 397 sq.) is radically opposed to Ginsburg (p. 201 sq.), whose ruling idea is that "Jesus... belonged to (the Essene) portion of His religious brethren."

"that is, Esther" (Esth. ii. 7), is exactly analogous to the usual addition of the modern names of towns to explain the use of the old obsolete ones (Gen. xxxv. 19, 27; Josh. xv. 10, &c.). Esther was a beautiful Jewish maiden, whose ancestor Kish had been among the captives led away from Jerusalem (part of which was in the tribe of Benjamin) by Nebuchadnezzar when Jehoiachin was taken captive. She was an orphan without father or mother, and had been brought up by her cousin Mordecai, who had an office in the household of Ahasuerus king of Persia, and dwelt at "Shushan the palace." When Vashti was dismissed from being queen, and all the fairest virgins of the kingdom had been collected at Shushan for the king to make choice of a successor to her from among them, the choice fell upon Esther, and she was crowned queen in the room of Vashti with much pomp and rejoicing. The king was not aware, however, of her race and parentage; and so, with the careless profusion of a sensual despot, on the representation of Haman the Agagite, his prime minister, that the Jews scattered through his empire were a pernicious race, he gave him full power and authority to kill them all, young and old, women and children, and take possession of all their property. The means taken by Esther to avert this great calamity from her people and her kindred, at the risk of her own life, and to turn upon Haman the destruction he had plotted against the Jews, and the success of her scheme, by which she changed their mourning, fasting, weeping, and wailing, into light and gladness and joy and honour, and became for ever especially honoured amongst her countrymen, are fully related in the Book of Esther. The feast of Purim, i.e. of Lots (?), was appointed by Esther and Mordecai to be kept on the 14th and 15th of the month Adar (February and March) in commemoration of this great deliverance.

[PURIM.] The decree of Esther to this effect is the last thing recorded of her (ix. 32). The continuous celebration of this feast by the Jews to the present day is thought to be a strong evidence of the historical truth of the Book.

[ESTHER, BOOK OF.]

The questions which arise in attempting to give Esther her place in profane history are—

I. Who is Ahasuerus? This question is answered under AHASUERUS, and the reasons there given lead to the conclusion that he was Xerxes the son of Darius Hystaspis (cp. Sayce, Introd. to Ezra, . . . Esther, p. 96 sq.).

II. The second inquiry is, Who then was Esther? Artissona, Atossa, and others are indeed excluded by the above decision; but are we to conclude with Scaliger, that because Ahasuerus is Xerxes, therefore Esther is Amestris? Surely not. None of the historical particulars related by Herodotus concerning Amestris make it possible to identify her with Esther. Amestris was the daughter of Otanes (Oophas in Ctesias), one of Xerxes' generals, and brother to his father Darius (Herod. vii. 61, 62). Esther's father and mother had been Jews. Amestris was wife to Xerxes before the Greek expedition (Herod. vii. 61), and her sons accompanied Xerxes to Greece (Herod. vii. 39), and all three come to man's estate at the death of Xerxes in the 20th year of his reign. Darius, the eldest, had married immediately after the return from Greece. Esther did not enter the king's palace till his 7th year, just the time of Darius's marriage. These objections are conclusive, without adding the difference of character of the two queens. The truth is that history is wholly silent both about Vashti and Esther. Herodotus only happens to mention one of Xerxes' wives; Scripture only mentions two, if indeed either of them were wives at all. But since we know that it was the custom of the Persian kings before Xerxes to have several wives, besides their concubines; that Cyrus had several (Herod. iii. 3); that Cambyses had four whose names are mentioned, and others besides (iii. 31, 32, 68); that Smerdis had several (ib. 68, 69); and that Darius had six wives, whose names are mentioned (ib. passim), it is most improbable that Xerxes should have been content with one wife. Another strong objection to the idea of Esther being his one legitimate wife, and perhaps to her being strictly his wife at all, is that the Persian kings selected their wives not from the harem, but, if not foreign princesses, from the noblest Persian families, either their own nearest relatives, or from one of the seven great Persian houses. It seems therefore natural to conclude that Esther, a captive and one of the harem, was not of the highest rank of wives, but that a special honour, with the name of queen, may have been given to her, as to Vashti before her, as the favourite concubine or inferior wife, whose offspring, however, if she had any, would not have succeeded to the Persian throne. This view, which seems to be strictly in accordance with what we know of the manners of the Persian court, removes all difficulty in reconciling the history of Esther with the scanty accounts left us by profane authors of the reign of Xerxes.

It only remains to remark on the character of Esther as given in the Bible. She appears there as a woman of deep piety, faith, courage, patriotism, and caution, combined with resolution; a dutiful daughter to her adoptive father, docile and obedient to his counsels, and anxious to share the king's favour with him for the good of the Jewish people. That she was a virtuous woman, and, as far as her situation made it possible, a good wife to the king, her continued influence over him for so long a time warrants us to infer. And there must have been a singular grace and charm in her aspect and manners, since she "obtained favour in the sight of all that looked upon her" (ii. 15). That she was raised up as an instrument in the hands of God to avert the destruction of the Jewish people, and to afford them protection, and forward their wealth and peace in their captivity, is also manifest from the Scripture account. But to impute to her the sentiments put into her mouth by the apocryphal author of ch. xiv., or to accuse her of cruelty because of the death of Haman and his sons, and the second day's slaughter of the Jews' enemies at Shushan, is utterly to ignore the manners and feelings of her age and nation, and to judge her by the standard of Christian morality in her own age and country instead. In fact the simplicity and truth to nature of the Scriptural narrative afford a striking contrast, both with the forced and florid amplifications of the apocryptal additions (see e.g. Speaker's Comm. on the Apocrypha, i. 402), and with the sentiments of some later commentators. It may be convenient to add that the third year of Xerxes was B.C. 483, his seventh 479, and his twelfth 474 (Clinton, F.H.), and that the simultaneous battles of Plataea and Mycale, which frightened Xerxes from Sardis (Diod. Sic. xi. § 36) to Susa, happened, according to Prideaux and Clinton, in September of his seventh year. For a fuller discussion of the identity of Esther, and different views of the subject, see Prideaux's Connexion, i. 236, 243, 297 sqq., and Petav. de doctr. Temp. ii. 27, 28, who make Esther wife of Artaxerxes Longimanus, following Joseph. Ant. xi. 6, as he followed the LXX. and the apocryphal Esther; J. Scaliger (de emend. Temp. vi. 591; Animadv. Euseb. 100) makes Ahasuerus, Xerxes; Ussher (Annal. Vet. Test.) makes him Darius Hystaspis; Loftus, Chaldaei, &c. Eusebius (Canon. Chron. 338, ed. Mediol.) rejects the hypothesis of Artaxerxes Longimanus, on the score of the silence of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, and adopts that of Artaxerxes Mnemon, following the Jews, who make Darius Codomanus to be the same as Darius Hystaspis, and the son of Artaxerxes by Esther! It is observable that all Petavius's and Prideaux's arguments against Scaliger's view apply solely to the now obsolete opinion that Esther is Amestris. [A. C. H.]

ESTHER, BOOK OF. 1. Title and authorship. The Book is one of the latest of the Canonical Books of Scripture, having been written late in the reign of Xerxes, or early in that of his son Artaxerxes Longimanus. The author is not known, but some think that he may possibly have been Mordecai himself. The minute details given of the great banquet, of the names of the chamberlains and eunuchs and Haman's wife and sons, and of the customs and regulations of the palace, betoken that the author lived at Shushan, and probably at court, while his no less intimate acquaintance with the most private affairs both of Esther and Mordecai are thought to suit the hypothesis of the latter being himself the writer. It is also not in itself improbable that as Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah, who held high offices under the Persian kings, wrote an account of the affairs of their nation, in which they took a leading part, so Mordecai should have also recorded the transactions of the Book of Esther. The termination of the Book with the mention of Mordecai's elevation and government agrees with this view, which has the sanction of Ibn Ezra, most of the Jews, Vatablus, Carpovius, and others, though not accepted by modern commentators. The Book is included by Josephus (c. Apion. i. 8) in the twenty-two Books of the Canon, and probably as the last of those δικαίως θεία περιουρούμενα. Those who ascribe it to Ezra, or to the men of the great Synagogue (Baba Bathra, f. 14), may have merely meant that Ezra edited and added it to the Canon of Scripture, which he probably did, bringing it, and perhaps the Book of Daniel, with him from Babylon to Jerusalem.

2. Date and place.—The earliest reference to the Book is in 2 Macc. xv. 36, but the apocryphal additions of the LXX. and Josephus carry the evidence for it further back than the date of that work (c. 2nd cent. B.C.). The closing words of the LXX. Version (see § 3, b) do not advance the matter. The language (see § 3, a), but above all the evident familiarity of the writer with Persia, go to show that the author lived in Persia, if after the reign of Xerxes; and the end of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus (B.C. 425) is accepted by many commentators as the date of composition (Eichhorn, Keil, Rawlinson, Sayce, &c.). It must, however, be admitted that the same premises lead others (Ewald, Stähelin, Bertheau, and Orelli) to prefer a later Persian period or the beginning of the Greek period (c. B.C. 332), while another class of critics refuse to the Book any historical value, and carry it down to much more modern times (see Oettli, § 6).

3. Text.—The Book of Esther appears in a form in the LXX,* and in the translations from that Version, different from that in which it is found in the Hebrew Bible. In speaking of it we shall first speak of (a) the Canonical Book found in Hebrew, and next (b) of the Greek Book with its apocryphal additions. (a) The Canonical ESTHER then is placed among the hagiographa or כתובי קודש by the Jews, and in that first portion of them which they call the five volumes, מגילת. It is sometimes emphatically called Megillah, without other distinction, and was held in such high repute by the Jews that it is a saying of Maimonides that in the days of Messiah the prophetic and hagiographical Books will pass away, except the Book of Esther, which will remain with the Pentateuch. This Book is read through by the Jews in their synagogues at the feast of Purim, when it was once the custom—since abandoned at least by British Jews—at the mention of Haman's name to hiss, and stamp, and clench the fist, and cry, "Let his name be blotted out; may the name of the wicked rot." It is said also that the names of Haman's ten sons are read in one breath, to signify that they all expired at the same instant of time. Even in writing the names of Haman's sons in the 7th, 8th, and 9th verses of Esth. ix., the Jewish scribes have contrived to express their abhorrence of the race of Haman. For these ten names are written in three perpendicular columns of 3, 3, 4, as if they were hanging upon three parallel cords, three upon each cord, one above another, to represent the hanging of Haman's sons (Stehelin's Rabbin. Literat. ii. 349; Speaker's Commentary on the Apocrypha, "The rest of Esther," pp. 362, col. 2, n. 1, 402 (d)). The Targum of Esth. ix., in Walton's Polyglott,^b inserts a very minute account of the exact position occupied by Haman and his sons on the gallows, the height from the ground, and the interval between each; according to which they all hung in one line. Haman at the top, and his ten sons at intervals of half a cubit under him. It is added that Zeresh and Haman's seventy surviving sons fled, and begged their bread from door to door, in

* The term LXX. is used here to indicate the whole Greek volume as we now have it.

^b There are two Targums to Esther, both of late date. See Wolf's Bibl. Hebr. Pars II. 1171-81; Speaker's Comm. on the Apocrypha, i. 363.

evident allusion to Ps. cix. 9, 10. It has often been remarked as a peculiarity of this Book that the name of God does not once occur in it. Some of the ancient Jewish teachers were somewhat staggered at this, but others accounted for it by saying that it was a transcript, under Divine inspiration, from the Chronicles of the Medes and Persians; and that, being meant to be read by heathen, the sacred Name was wisely omitted. Baxter (Saint's Rest, iv. ch. iii.) speaks of the Jewish practice of casting to the ground the Book of Esther, because the Name of God was not in it; but Wolf (B. H. ii. 90) denies this, and says that if any such custom prevailed among the Oriental Jews, to whom it is ascribed by Sandys, it must have been rather to express their hatred of Haman. This peculiarity of the Book must not be pressed too far. Certain it is that this Book was always reckoned in the Jewish Canon, and is named or implied in almost every enumeration of the Books composing it, from Josephus downwards. Jerome mentions it by name in the Prolog. Gal., in his Epistle to Paulinus, and in the preface to Esther; as does Augustine, de Civit. Dei and de Doctr. Christ., and Origen, as cited by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi. 25), and many others. Some modern commentators, both English and German, have objected to the contents of the Book as improbable and not strictly historical; but if it be true, as Diodorus Siculus relates, that Xerxes put the Medians foremost at Thermoplae on purpose that they might be all killed, because he thought they were not thoroughly reconciled to the loss of their national supremacy, it is surely not incredible that he should have given permission to Haman to destroy a few thousand strange people like the Jews, who were represented to be injurious to his empire, and disobedient to his laws. Nor again, when we remember what Herodotus relates of Xerxes in respect to promises made at banquets, can we deem it incredible that he should perform his promise to Esther to reverse the decree in the only way that seemed practicable. It is likely too that the secret friends and adherents of Haman would be the persons to attack the Jews, which would be a reason why Ahasuerus would rather rejoice at their destruction.* In so many respects the writer shows such accurate acquaintance with Persian manners, and is so true to history and chronology, as to afford the strongest internal evidences to the truth of the Book. The casual way in which the author of 2 Macc. xv. 36 alludes to the feast of Purim, under the name of "Mardochæus's day," as kept by the Jews in the time of Nicanor (B.C. 161), is another strong testimony in its favour; and indeed justifies the expression of Dr. Lee (quoted in Whiston's Josephus, xi. ch. vi.), that "the truth of this history is demonstrated by the feast of Purim, kept up from that time to this very day."^d

The style of writing is remarkably chaste and simple. Xerxes, Haman, Mordecai, and Esther are personages full of life and individuality; and the narrative of the struggle in Esther's mind between fear and the desire to save her people, and of the final resolve made in the strength of that help, which was to be sought in prayer and fasting, is very touching and beautiful, and without any exaggeration. It does not in the least savour of romance. The Hebrew is very like that of Ezra and parts of the Chronicles (al. like that of Ecclesiastes); generally pure, but mixed with words of Persian origin (Sayce, p. 93), and of Chaldaic affinity, which do not occur in older Hebrew.

In short it is just what one would expect to find in a work of the age to which the Book of Esther pretends to belong. The student has indeed only to compare the Hebrew Esther with the Greek Esther now to be noticed in order to see the difference between what may be called genuine history and what is certainly not.

(b) As regards the LXX. Version of the Book (of which there are two texts, called by Dr. Fritzsche, A and B), it consists of the Canonical Esther with various interpolations prefixed, interspersed, and added at the close. Read in Greek, it makes a complete and continuous history, except that here and there, as e.g. in the repetition of Mordecai's pedigree, the patchwork betrays itself. The chief additions are:—A preface containing Mordecai's pedigree, his dream, and his appointment to sit in the king's gate, in the second year of Artaxerxes. In the third chapter, a pretended copy of Artaxerxes's decree for the destruction of the Jews is added, written in thorough Greek style; a prayer of Mordecai is inserted in the fourth chapter; followed by a prayer of Esther, in which she excuses herself for being wife to the uncircumcised king, and denies having eaten anything or drunk wine at the table of Haman; an amplification of v. 1-3; a pretended copy of Artaxerxes's letter for reversing the previous decree (also of manifestly Greek origin in ch. viii.), in which Haman is called a Macedonian, and is accused of having plotted to transfer the empire from the Persians to the Macedonians, a palpable proof of this portion having been composed after the overthrow of the Persian empire by the Greeks; and lastly an addition to the tenth chapter, in which Mordecai shows how his dream was fulfilled in the events that had happened, gives glory to God, and prescribes the observance of the feast of the 14th and 15th Adar. The whole book is closed with the following entry:—"In the fourth year of the reign of Ptolemaeus and

Identification of Purim with a Persian festival which the later Jews metamorphosed into that connected with the Book of Esther has been, in various forms, advocated by Hitzig, Zunz, Lagarde, Reuss (see Oettli, p. 233). The result is not philologically successful (see Halévy, REV. xv. 289, as against Lagarde's Purim), neither is it historically defensible.—[F.]

* The Targum to Esther contains other copious embellishments and amplifications. On the whole subject of the apocryphal "Additions to Esther," see Speaker's Comm. on "The rest of Esther." Jacob, 'Das Buch Esther bei den LXX.' in ZATW. x. 290, considers the LXX. Version to have been made in Egypt about B.C. 30.

^d Dr. W. Lee also has some remarks on the proof of the historical character of the Book derived from the feast of Purim, as well as on other points (Inspir. of E. S. 439 sq.). See also Sayce, p. 101; Oettli, p. 233. The etymological derivation from the Persian and the Cleopatra, Dositheus, who said he was a priest and Levite, and Ptolemy his son, brought this epistle of Phurim, which they said was the same, and that Lysimachus, the son of Ptolemy, that was in Jerusalem, had interpreted it." This entry was apparently intended to give authority to this Greek Version of ESTHER, by pretending that it was a certified translation from the Hebrew original. Ptolemy Philometor, who is here meant,^f began to reign B.C. 181. Though, however, the interpolations of the Greek copy are thus manifest, they make a consistent and intelligible story. But the apocryphal additions as they are inserted in some editions of the Latin Vulgate, and in the English Bible, are incomprehensible; the history of which is this:—When Jerome translated the Book of Esther, he first gave the Version of the Hebrew only as being alone authentic. He then added at the end a Version in Latin of those several passages which he found in the LXX., and which were not in the Hebrew, stating where each passage came in, and marking them all with an obelus. The first passage so given is that which forms the continuation of chapter x. (which of course immediately precedes it), ending with the above entry about Dositheus. Having annexed this conclusion, he then gives the Prooemium, which he says forms the beginning of the Greek Vulgate, beginning with what is now v. 2 of ch. xi.; and so proceeds with the other passages. But in subsequent editions all Jerome's explanatory matter has been swept away, and the disjointed portions have been printed as chapters xi., xii., xiii., xiv., xv., xvi., as if they formed a narrative in continuance of the Canonical Book. The extreme absurdity of this arrangement is nowhere more apparent than in chapter xi., where the verse (1) which closes the whole Book in the Greek copies, and in St. Jerome's Latin translation, is actually made immediately to precede that (v. 2) which is the very first verse of the Prooemium. As regards the place assigned to Esther in the LXX., in the Vatican edition, and most others, it comes between Judith and Job. Its place before Job is a remnant of the Hebrew order, Esther there closing the historical, and Job beginning the metrical Megilloth. Tobit and Judith have been placed between it and Nehemiah, doubtless for chronological reasons. But in the very ancient Codex published by Tischendorf, and called C. Friderico-Augustanus (now N), Esther immediately follows Nehemiah (included under Esdras B), and precedes Tobit. This Codex, which contains the apocryphal additions to Esther, was copied from one written by the martyr Pamphilus with his own hand, as far as to the end of Esther, and is ascribed by the editor to the 4th century.

As regards the motive which led to these additions, one seems evidently to have been to supply what was thought an omission in the Hebrew Book, by introducing copious mention of the name of God. It is further evident from the other apocryphal books, and additions to canonical Scripture, which appear in the LXX., such as Bel and the Dragon, Susanna, the Song of the Three Children, &c., that the Alexandrian Jews loved to dwell upon the events of the Babylonish Captivity, and especially upon the Divine interpositions in their behalf, probably as being the latest manifestations of God's special care for Israel. Traditional stories would be likely to be current among them, and these would be sure sooner or later to be committed to writing, with additions according to the fancy of the writers. The most popular among them, or those which had most of an historical basis, or which were written by men of most weight, or whose origin was lost in the most remote antiquity, or which most gratified the national feelings, would acquire something of sacred authority (especially in the absence of real inspiration dictating fresh Scriptures), and get admitted into the volume of Scripture, less rigidly fenced by the Hellenistic than by the Hebrew Jews. No subject would be more likely to engage the thoughts and exercise the pens of such writers, than the deliverance of the Jews from utter destruction by the intervention of Esther and Mordecai, and the overthrow of their enemies in their stead. Those who made the additions to the Hebrew narrative according to the religious taste and feeling of their own times, probably acted in the same spirit as others have often done, who have added florid architectural ornaments to temples which were too plain for their own corrupted taste. The account which Josephus follows seems to have contained yet further particulars, as e.g. the name of the Eunuch's servant, a Jew, who betrayed the conspiracy to Mordecai; other passages from the Persian Chronicles read to Ahasuerus, besides that relating to Mordecai, and amplifications of the king's speech to Haman, &c. It is of this LXX. version that Athanasius (Fest. Epist. 39, Oxf. transl.) spoke when he ascribed the Book of Esther to the non-canonical books; and this also is perhaps the reason why in some of the lists of the canonical Books Esther is not named, as e.g. in those of Melito of Sardis and Gregory Nazianzen, unless in these it is included under some other book, as Ruth, or Esdras* (see Whitaker, Disput. on H. Scr., pp. 57, 58 [Park. Soc.]; Cosins on the Canon of Scr. pp. 49, 50 [ditto]). Origen, singularly enough, takes a different line in his Ep. to Africanus (Oper. i. 14). He defends the canonicity of these Greek additions, though he admits they are not in the Hebrew. His sole argument, unworthy of a great scholar, is the use of the LXX. in the Churches, an argument which embraces equally all the apocryphal books. Africanus, in his Ep. to Origen, had made the being in the Hebrew essential to canonicity, as Jerome did later. The Council of Trent (1546) pronounced the whole Book of Esther to be canonical (see the R. C. commentators in Kaulen, Einleit. in die heil. Schriften A. T. § 270 sq.), and ^f He is the same as is frequently mentioned in 1 Macc.; e.g. x. 57, xl. 12; cp. Joseph. A. J. xiii. 4, § 1, 5, and Clinton, F. H. iii. 393. This identification with Philometor, if not positively certain, cannot be said to be seriously refuted by Jacob, p. 274 sq. Dositheus seems to be a Greek version of Mattathiah; Ptolemy was also a common name for Jews at that time. See Speaker's Comm. on the Apocrypha, i. 364-6.

* "This Book of Esther, or sixth of Esdras, as it is placed in some of the most ancient copies of the Vulgate." (Lee's Dissert. on 2nd Esdras, p. 25.)

Vatablus says that prior to that decision it was doubtful whether or no Esther was to be included in the Canon, some authors affirming and some denying it. He afterwards qualifies the statement by saying that at all events the last seven chapters were doubtful. Sixtus Senensis, in spite of the decision of the Council, speaks of these additions, after the example of Jerome, as "laciniis hinc inde quorundam Scriptorum temeritate insertas," and thinks that they are chiefly derived from Josephus, but this last opinion is without probability. The manner and the order in which Josephus cites them (Ant. xi. 6) show that they had already in his days obtained currency among the Hellenistic Jews as portions of the Book of Esther; as we know from the way in which he cites other apocryphal books that they were current likewise; with others which are now lost. For it was probably from such that Josephus derived his stories about Moses, about Sanballat, and the temple on Mount Gerizim, and the meeting of the high-priest and Alexander the Great. But these, not having happened to be bound up with the LXX., perished. However, the marvellous purity with which the Hebrew Canon has been preserved, under the providence of God, is brought out into very strong light, by the contrast of the Greek volume. Nor is it uninteresting to observe how the relaxation of the peculiarity of their national character, by the Alexandrian Jews, implied in the adoption of the Greek language and Greek names, seems to have been accompanied with a less jealous, and consequently a less trustworthy guardianship of their great national treasure, "the oracles of God."

ETAM (עֵתָם; Airám; Etam). 1. A village (עֵתָם) of the tribe of Simeon, specified only in the list in 1 Ch. iv. 32 (cp. Josh. xix. 7); but that it is intentionally introduced appears from the fact that the number of places is summed as five, though in the parallel list as four. The cities of Simeon appear all to have been in the extreme south of the country (see Joseph. Ant. v. 1. § 22). Conder (PEF. Mem. iii. 261) proposes to identify it with Kh. 'Atán, between 8 and 9 miles S. of Beit Jibrin, Eleutheropolis.

2. B. Airám, A. Airám (in Josh. xv. 59 a). A place in Judah, fortified and garrisoned by Rehoboam (2 Ch. xi. 6, B. 'Awdá, B^b. Airám, A. Airám). From its position in this list we may conclude that it was near Bethlehem and Tekoa; and in accordance with this is the mention of the name among the ten cities which the LXX. (ed. Swete) inserts in the text of Josh. xv. 59 a, "Thecoa and Ephratha which is Bethlehem, and Phagor and Aitan (Ethan)." Reasons are shown below for believing it possible that this may have been the scene of Samson's residence, the cliff Etam being one of the numerous bold eminences which abound in this part of the country; and the spring of En-hak-kore one of those abundant fountains which have procured for Etam its chief fame. For here, according to the statements of Josephus (Ant. viii. 7, § 3) and the Talmudists, were the sources of the water from which Solomon's gardens and pleasure-grounds were fed, and Bethlehem and the Temple supplied (see Light-foot on John v.). The name is retained in that of 'Ain 'Atán, a fine spring, close to "Solomon's Pools," near Úrtás, the waters of which were formerly conveyed to the Temple by an aqueduct (see Dillmann^a on Josh. i. c.).

3. B. Airám, A. Airám. A name occurring in the lists of Judah's descendants (1 Ch. iv. 3), but probably referring to the place named above (2), Bethlehem being mentioned in the following verse. [G.]

ETAM, THE ROCK (עֵתָם הַבְּרָבָה; ἡ πέτρα Htrám, for A. see below; Joseph. Airám; Petra, and silex, Etam), a cliff or lofty rock (such seems to be the special force of Sela) into a cleft or chasm (הַבְּרָבָה; A. V. "top," R. V. "cleft") of which Samson retired after his slaughter of the Philistines, in revenge for their burning the Timnite woman who was to have been his wife (Judg. xv. 8, 11^a). The general tenor of the narrative seems to indicate that this natural stronghold (πέτρα ὅ ἐστιν ὄχυρά, Jos. Ant. v. 8, § 8) was in Judah, and that the Philistines had advanced into the heart of the territory of that tribe (rv. 9, 10) in their search for Samson. At Lehi in Judah they were defeated, and the victory was so complete that it raised Samson to be Judge, and secured peace for 20 years (v. 20). It is evident that the place Lehi, in which was the spring En-hak-kore (v. 19), was above, or at a higher altitude than the country of the Philistines (v. 9) and the rock Etam (rv. 11, 13). There is no further indication of position (the names have vanished), but it may be inferred that "the rock" was not far from a town of the same name.

The identifications that have been proposed are:—(1) A cliff, or "crag," in the extremely uneven and broken ground in the Wady (χελμαῖος: see note *) Úrtás, below 'Ain 'Atán [ETAM. 2]. Here is a fitting scene for the adventure of Samson. It was sufficiently distant from Timnah to have seemed a safe refuge from the wrath of the Philistines, while on the other hand it was not too far for them to advance in search of him; and it may be remarked that one of the easiest and most direct routes from Philistia to the heart of Judah, now marked by a Roman road, was that which passes 'Ain Shems, and goes up by Beit 'Atáb and el-Khūd to "Solomon's Pools," Bethlehem, and Jerusalem. This road was frequently followed at a later date by the Philistines, who, even in the reign of David, had a garrison at Bethlehem near its head. This position is apparently at variance with the statement, in v. 8, that Samson went down to the rock Etam after the slaughter of the Philistines; but it is possible that an allusion to the ascent which preceded the descent has been omitted. In 1 Ch. xiii. 6 David is said to have gone up to Kirjath-jearim (from Hebron) to bring up from thence the Ark of God (to Jerusalem), no mention being made of the previous descent. The view that the cliff Etam, Ramath Lehi, and En-hak-kore must be looked for in the abundant springs and numerous eminences in the district round 'Ain 'Atán and Úrtás, is supported by Stanley, Lect. on Jewish Ch. i. 371; Guérin, Judée, iii. 118; Schenkel, Bib. Lex.; Winer, RWB.; Bertheau²; Birch, PEFQy. Stat. 1881, p. 323. (2) Major Conder (PEF. Mem. iii. 22, 23, and Tent Work, i. 275-77) has proposed Beit 'Atáb, "a small village, standing on a remarkable knoll of rock which rises some 60 ft. to 100 ft. above the surrounding hilly ridge." "A remarkable cavern," which might have been used as a hiding-place by Samson, runs beneath the houses. This place is in Judah, on the direct road to Bethlehem, mentioned above, and not far from Samson's home. But there is nothing at Beit 'Atáb to which the term Sela, "cliff," used in connexion with such places as Petra and the gorge at Michmash, could be applied; and there is also the difficulty that the Philistines, in advancing to the higher ground of Lehi, would have left "the rock" behind them, and would consequently have been between Samson and the men of Judah. Major Conder's identification has been accepted by Tristram, Bib. Places, p. 48; and Geikie, H. Land and the Bible, ii. 142. (3) Van de Velde (ii. 141) would identify the rock Etam with the Etam of 1 Ch. iv. 32 near 'Ain Rimmon, Kh. Umín er-Rumámin, and Lehi with Lekiych, a short distance N. of Beersheba, but these places are too far to the south, and must have been within the territory of Simeon, while it is clear from the narrative that the scene of Samson's exploit was in Judah. This view has the support of Riehm, HWB. (s. v.); Keil, Comm. zu Richter, xv. 8, p. 316; Boettger, Lex. Joseph. s. v. Aita. [G.] [W.]

^a There is some uncertainty about the text of this passage, the Alex. MS. of the LXX. inserting in v. 8 the words παρὰ τῷ χελμαῖῳ, "by the torrent," before the mention of the rock. Eusebius (OS. p. 264, 83-84) has ἐν τῷ σπηλαίῳ 'Htrám παρὰ τῷ χελμαῖῳ. In v. 11 the reading agrees with the Hebrew.

E'THAM. [EXODUS, THE.]

E'THAN (Ἰθάν = strong; Γαιθάν [1 K.], Αἰθάν [Ps. BN.]; Ethan). The name of several persons. 1. ETHAN THE EZRAHITE, one of the four sons of Mahol, whose wisdom was excelled by Solomon (1 K. iv. 31; LXX. v. 27). His name is in the title of Ps. lxxxix. There is little doubt that this is the same person who in 1 Ch. ii. 6 (v. Αἰθάν, A. -α) is mentioned—with the same brothers as before—as a son of Zerach, the son of Judah. [DARDA; EZRAHITE.] But being a son of Judah, he must have been a different person from

2. B. Αἰθάν, A. -α. Son of Kishi or Kushaiah, a Merarite Levite, head of that family in the time of King David (1 Ch. vi. 44, Heb. v. 29), and spoken of as a "singer." With Heman and Asaph, the heads of the two other families of Levites, Ethan was appointed to sound with cymbals (xv. 17, 19). From the fact that in other passages of these Books the three names are given as Asaph, Heman, and JEDUTHUN, it has been conjectured that the two names both belonged to the one man, or are identical; but there is no direct evidence of this, nor is there anything to show that Ethan the singer was the same person as Ethan the Ezrahite, whose name stands at the head of Ps. lxxxix. though it is a curious coincidence that there should be two persons named Heman and Ethan so closely connected in two different tribes and walks of life.

3. B. Αἰθάν, A. Οὐφί. A Gershonite Levite, one of the ancestors of Asaph the singer (1 Ch. vi. 42, Heb. v. 27). In the reversed genealogy of the Gershonites (v. 21 of this chap.) Joab stands in the place of Ethan as the son of Zimzah. [G.]

ETHANIM. [MONTHS.]

ETHBA'AL (Ἰθβαάλ; Ἰεθβαάλ; Joseph. Ἰεθβαλος; Ethbaal), king of Sidon and father of Jezebel, wife of Ahab (1 K. xvi. 31). Josephus (Ant. viii. 13, § 1) represents him as king of the Tyrians as well as of the Sidonians. We may thus identify him with Eithobalus (Ἰεθβαλος), noticed by Menander (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 18), a priest of Astarte, who, after having assassinated Pheles, usurped the throne of Tyre for 32 years. As 50 years elapsed between the deaths of Hiram and Pheles, the date of Ethbaal's reign may be given as about B.C. 940-908. The variation in the name is easily explained; Ethbaal = with Baal; Ithobalus (Ἰθβαάλ) = Baal with him, which is preferable in point of sense to the other. The position which Ethbaal held explains, to a certain extent, the idolatrous zeal which Jezebel displayed. [W. L. B.] [A. H. S.]

E'THER (Ἰθέρ; Ether, Athar), one of the cities of Judah in the low country, the Shefelah (Josh. xv. 42; B. Ἰθάρ, A. Ἀθήρ), allotted to Simeon (xix. 7; B. Ἰέθερ, A. Βεθέρ). In the parallel list of the towns of Simeon in 1 Ch. iv. 32, TOCHEN is substituted for Ether. In his Onomasticon Eusebius mentions it (OS. p. 261. 78-79) as being in his time a considerable place (κάμη μεγίστη), called Jethira (Ἰεθίρα), near Malatha in the interior of the district of Daroma. But he evidently confounds it with JATTIR, now Kh. Attir, to the S.W. of es-Semū'a, Eshtemoa. Conder (PEF. Mem. iii. 261, 279) and Mühlau (in Riehm's HWB.) identify it with Kh. el-'Atr, a short distance N.W. of Beit Jibrin, but this seems too far N. for a town belonging to Simeon. The identification of the place is still uncertain. It was probably situated nearer Beersheba. [G.] [W.]

ETHIOPIA (Ἰθιοπία; Αἰθιοπία; Aethiopia). The country which the Greeks and Romans described as "Aethiopia" and the Hebrews as "Cush" lay to the south of Egypt, and embraced, in its most extended sense, the modern Nubia, Sennaar, Kordofan, and Northern Abyssinia, and in its more definite sense the kingdom of Meroë, from the junction of the Blue and White branches of the Nile to the border of Egypt. The only direction in which a clear boundary can be fixed is in the north, where Syene marked the division between Ethiopia and Egypt (Ezek. xxix. 10); in other directions the boundaries can be only generally described as the Red Sea on the east, the Libyan desert on the west, and the Abyssinian highlands on the south. The name "Ethiopia" is probably an adaptation of the native Egyptian name "Eti-haush," which bears a tolerably close resemblance to the gentile form "Aethiops;" the Greeks themselves regarded it as expressive of a dark complexion (from αἴθω, "to burn," and ἄψ, "a countenance"). The Hebrew and Assyrian Cush was borrowed from the Egyptian Kesh, which designated the district of which Napata, the modern Gebel Barkal, was afterwards the capital. The Hebrews do not appear to have had much practical acquaintance with Ethiopia itself, though the Ethiopians were well known to them through their intercourse with Egypt. They were, however, perfectly aware of its position (Ezek. xxix. 10); and they describe it as a well-watered country "beyond" the waters of Cush (Is. xviii. 1; Zeph. iii. 10), being traversed by the two branches of the Nile, and by the Astaboras or Ticazze. The Nile descends with a rapid stream in this part of its course, forming a series of cataracts: its branches are referred to in the words of Is. xviii. 2, "whose land the rivers divide." The papyrus boats ("vessels of bulrushes," Is. xviii. 2), which were peculiarly adapted to the navigation of the Upper Nile, admitting of being carried on men's backs when necessary, were regarded as a characteristic feature of the country. The Hebrews carried on commercial intercourse with Ethiopia, its "merchandise" (Is. xlv. 14) consisting of ebony, ivory, frankincense, and gold (Herod. iii. 97, 114), and precious stones (Job xxviii. 19; Joseph. Ant. viii. 6, § 5). The country is for the most part mountainous, the ranges gradually increasing in altitude towards the south, until they attain an elevation of about 8000 feet in Abyssinia.

The inhabitants of Ethiopia were a Hamitic race (Gen. x. 6), and are described in the Bible as a dark-complexioned (Jer. xiii. 23) and stalwart race (Is. xlv. 14, "men of stature;" xviii. 2, for "scattered," substitute "tall," R. V.). Their stature is noticed by Herodotus (iii. 20, 114), as well as their handsomeness. Not improbably the latter quality is intended by the term in Is. xviii. 2, which is rendered "peeled" (A. V.) or "smooth" (R. V.), but which rather means "fine-looking." Their appearance led to their being selected as attendants in royal households (Jer. xxxviii. 7). The Ethiopians are on one occasion coupled with the Arabians, as occupying the opposite shores of the Red Sea (2 Ch. xxi. 16); but elsewhere they are connected with African nations, particularly Egypt (Ps. lxxviii. 31; Is. xl. 3, 4, xliii. 3, xlv. 14), Phut (Jer. xlvii. 9), Lub and Lud (Ezek. xxx. 5), and the Sukkiims (2 Ch. xii. 3). They were divided into various tribes, of which the Sabaeans were the most powerful. [SEBA; SUKKIIM.]

The history of Ethiopia is closely interwoven with that of Egypt. The two countries were not unfrequently united under the rule of the same sovereign. Pepi I. of the 6th dynasty overran that part of Cush or Ethiopia—the To-kens of the Egyptian monuments—which lay between the First and Second Cataracts, but its complete conquest was reserved for the kings of the 12th dynasty. Amen-em-hat I. subdued the Wawai, who extended from the First Cataract to Koroako; his son Usirtesen I. subjugated the negro tribes who spread southward to Wadi Helifa, and Usirtesen III. fixed the frontier of Egypt at Semneh, where he built a fortress on either side of the river. Nubia was at this time well-watered and fertile, the present First Cataract not having as yet been formed, and the break in the navigation of the Nile being apparently at Silsileh. The negro tribes extended much further north than subsequently; the area occupied by the Nubians being comparatively limited. During the period of the Hyksos, Ethiopia was lost to Egypt, but Ahmes, the founder of the 18th dynasty, who had married a Nubian queen, set about the work of reconquering it. His successor, Amenophis I., completed the work: Ethiopia became an Egyptian province as far south as Sennaar; colonies of fellahin were planted in different parts of it, and the eldest son of the Egyptian monarch took from henceforth the title of "the prince of Cush." In the time of Ramses II., the Sesostris of the Greeks (of the 19th dynasty), the great temple of Abu-Simbel was excavated in the rock; and though from time to time expeditions were required against the restless tribes of the Soudan, the country remained in the possession of Egypt until after the fall of the 20th dynasty, when one of the high-priests of Amun of Thebes established an independent kingdom at Napata. For some centuries this kingdom remained in all respects Egyptian, language, names, and customs being alike those of Egypt; and it was only gradually that the foreign culture was replaced by one of native growth. More than once the kings of Napata overran Egypt, and finally under Sabako, the So of 2 K. xvii. 4, they made themselves masters of the whole country and founded the 25th dynasty. Taharka or Tirhakah (2 K. xix. 9) was driven back into Ethiopia by the Assyrian forces of Esar-haddon, B.C. 672; and though he made more than one attempt to recover Egypt during the Assyrian occupation of it, his efforts were unsuccessful. After the reign of his successor, Nut Mi-Amun, Ethiopia was divided into two kingdoms—that of To-Kens, with its capital at Kikip; and that of Napata, which at one time included Berna or Meroë, and the country of Alo, which extended from the White and Blue Nile to the plain of Sennaar. Ethiopia now disappears from history, and is hardly heard of again until the campaign of Cambyes; but the Persian rule did not take any root there, nor did the influence of the Ptolemies generally extend beyond Northern Ethiopia. Shortly before our Saviour's birth, a native dynasty of females, holding the official title of Candace (Plin. vi. 35), held sway in Ethiopia, and even resisted the advance of the Roman arms. One of these is the queen noticed in Acts viii. 27. [CANDACE.] [A. H. S.]

ETHIOPIAN (ἠθίοψ; Αἰθίοψ; Aethiops). Properly "Cushite" (Jer. xiii. 23); used of Zerah (2 Ch. xiv. 9 [8]), and Ebedmelech (Jer. xxxviii. 7, 10, 12; xxxix. 16). [W. A. W.]

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH. Acts viii. 26 sq. gives the history of the baptism by Philip the Evangelist of the Ethiopian chamberlain of Candace. He had gone as a proselyte to Jerusalem to attend the great Feast; he had heard probably while at Jerusalem of the Death, Resurrection, and Ascension of Jesus Christ, of the claims put forth in His Name, and of those who were known as His followers. When Philip overtook him he was reading the Messianic passage, Is. liiii., and possibly debating with himself how far the Prophet's words might be said to have found their fulfilment in Christ. The explanation was given which induced him to embrace the Gospel. Eusebius does not hesitate to attribute to this Ethiopian—whom he calls Indich—the first preaching of the Gospel to his own people, and the founding of Christianity among them (see Dict. of Christ. Biog., s. v. "Ethiopian Church"). [F.]

ETHIOPIAN WOMAN (ἠθιοπίς; Aithiopiassa; Acthiopiassa). Zipporah, the wife of Moses, is so described in Num. xii. 1. She is elsewhere said to have been the daughter of a Midianite, and in consequence of this Ewald and others have supposed that the allusion is to another wife whom Moses married after the death of Zipporah. [W. A. W.]

ETHIOPIANS (ἠθιοπίς, Is. xx. 4; Jer. xli. 9, ἠθιοπίς; Aithiopes; Acthiopia, Acthiopes). Properly "Cush" or "Ethiopia" in two passages (Is. xx. 4; Jer. xli. 9). Elsewhere "Cushites," or inhabitants of Ethiopia (2 Ch. xii. 3, xiv. 12 [11], 13 [12], xvi. 8, xxi. 16; Dan. xi. 43; Amos ix. 7; Zeph. ii. 12; Acts viii. 27). [ETHIOPIA.] [W. A. W.]

ETH'MA (B. 'Ooμα, A. Nooμα; Nobai), 1 Esd. ix. 35 (see Speaker's Comm. in loco). It occupies the place of NEBO in the parallel list of Ezra x. 43.

ETH'NAN (ἠθνη, (?) = gift; B. Ξενών, A. 'Εθναδί; Ethnan), a descendant of Judah; one of the sons of Helah the wife of Ashur, "the father of Tekoa" (1 Ch. iv. 7).

ETHNARCH (2 Cor. xi. 32). [GOVERNOR, No. 11.]

ETH'NI (ἠθνη; (?) = munificent; 'Aθηναι; Athanaï), a Gershonite Levite, one of the forefathers of Asaph the singer (1 Ch. vi. 41; Heb. v. 26).

EUBULUS (Εὐβουλος), a Christian at Rome mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 21).

EUER'GETES (Εὐεργέτης, a benefactor; Ptolemæus Euergetes), a common surname and title of honour (cp. Plato, Gorg. p. 506 C, and Stallbaum in loco) in Greek states, conferred at Athens by a public vote (Dem. p. 475), and so notorious as to pass into a proverb (Luke xxii. 5). The title was borne by two of the Ptolemies: Ptol. III., Euergetes I., B.C. 247-222, and Ptol. VII., Euergetes II., B.C. 146-117. The Euergetes mentioned in the prologue to Ecclesiasticus has been identified with each of these, according to the different views taken of the history of the book. [ECCLESIASTICUS; JESUS SON OF SIRACH.] [B. F. W.]

EUMENES II. (Εὐμένης), king of Pergamus, succeeded his father Attalus I., B.C. 197, from whom he inherited the favour and alliance of the Romans. In the war with Antiochus the Great he rendered the most important services to the growing republic; and at the battle of Magnesia (B.C. 190) commanded his contingent in person (Just. xxxi. 8, 5; App. Syr. 34). After peace was made (B.C. 189) he repaired to Rome to claim the reward of his loyalty; and the Senate conferred on him the provinces of Mysia, Lydia, Ionia (with some exceptions), Phrygia, Lycaonia, and the Thracian Chersonese (App. Syr. 44; Polyb. xxii. 7; Liv. xxxviii. 56). His influence at Rome continued uninterrupted till the war with Perseus, with whom he is said to have entertained reasonable correspondence (Liv. xxiv. 24, 25); and after the defeat of Perseus (B.C. 167) he was looked upon with suspicion, which he vainly endeavoured to remove. The exact date of his death is not mentioned, but it must have taken place in B.C. 159.

The large accession of territory which was granted to Eumenes from the former dominions of Antiochus is mentioned 1 Macc. viii. 8, but the present reading of the Greek and Latin texts offers insuperable difficulties. "The Romans gave him," it is said, "the country of India and Media, and Lydia and parts of his (Antiochus') fairest countries (ἀπὸ τῶν καλλ. χωρῶν αὐτοῦ)." Various conjectures have been proposed to remove these obvious errors; but though it may be reasonably allowed that Mysia may have stood originally for Media (Ἰνδία for Ἰνδία, Michaelis), it is not equally easy to explain the origin of χώραν τῆν Ἰνδικήν. It is barely possible that 'Ἰνδικήν may have been substituted for Ἰωνικήν after Μηθίαν was already established in the text. Other explanations are given by Grimm (Exeg. Handb.) and Wernsdorf (De fide Libr. Macc. p. 50 sq.), but they have little plausibility (see Speaker's Comm., Bissell, and Zöckler, in loco). [B. F. W.] [F.]

EUNA'TAN (B. 'Ενατάν, A. 'Εναθάς; Ennagan), 1 Esd. viii. 44, possibly a misprint for Ennatan, the reading of the Geneva Version and of the Bishops' Bible (see D. B. Amer. ed.) [ELNATHAN.] [F.]

EUNICE (Εὐνίκη; Eunice), mother of Timothy (2 Tim. i. 5), a woman of unfeigned faith, and, as we learn from Acts xvi. 1, a Jewess and a Christian (πιστή). That her husband was a Greek is probably mentioned to explain why Timothy had not been circumcised (see TIMOTHY). The influence of the tradition of her widowhood appears in the addition of χήρας (widow) in one cursive MS. [E. R. B.]

EUNUCH (Εὐνοῦχος; θαλάσιος; ἄραδο; variously rendered in the A. V. "eunuch," "officer," and "chamberlain," apparently as though the word intended a class of attendants who were not always mutilated).^a The original Hebrew word (root Arab. عمرس, impotens esse ad venerem, Gesen. s. v.) clearly implies the incapacity which mutilation involves, and perhaps includes all the classes mentioned in Matt. xix. 12, not signifying, as the Greek εὐνοῦχος, an office merely. The law, Deut. xxiii. 1 (cp. Lev. xxii. 24), is repugnant to thus treating any Israelite; and Samuel, when describing the arbitrary power of the future king (1 Sam. viii.

^a So Whiston, Joseph. Ant. x. 10, § 2, note.

15, marg.), mentions "his eunuchs," but does not say that he would make "their sons" such. This, if we compare 2 K. xx. 18, Is. xxxix. 7, possibly implies that these persons would be foreigners; cp. Jer. xxxviii. 7. It was a barbarous custom of the East thus to treat captives (Herod. iii. 49, vi. 32), not only of tender age (when a non-development of beard and feminine mould of limbs and modulation of voice ensued), but, it should seem, when past puberty, which there occurs at an early age. Physiological considerations lead to the supposition that in the latter case a remnant of animal feeling is left; which may explain Ecclus. xx. 4, xxx. 20 (cp. Jur. vi. 366, and Mart. vi. 67; Philostr. Apoll. Tyam. i. 37; Ter. Eun. iv. 3, 24), where a sexual function, though fruitless, is implied. Busbequius (Ep. iii. 122, Ox. 1660) seems to ascribe the absence or presence of this to the total or partial character of the mutilation; but modern surgery would rather assign the earlier or later period of the operation as the real explanation. It is total among modern Turks (Tournefort, ii. 8, 9, 10, ed. Par. 1717, Grotius on Deut. xxiii. 1; cp. Burckhardt, Trav. in Arab. i. 290). Nor is it wholly repugnant to that barbarous social standard to think that the prospect of rank, honour, and royal confidence might even induce parents to thus treat their children at a later age, if they showed an aptness for such preferment. The characteristics as regards beard, voice, &c., might then perhaps be modified, or might gradually follow. The Poti-pherah of Gen. xii. 50, whose daughter Joseph married, was "priest of On," and no doubt a different person.

The origination of the practice is ascribed to Semiramis (Amm. Marcell. xiv. 6), and is no doubt as early, or nearly so, as Eastern despotism itself. Their incapacity, as in the case of mutes, is the ground of reliance upon them (Clarke's Travels, part ii. § 1, 13; Busbeq. Ep. i. p. 33). By reason of the mysterious distance at which the sovereign sought to keep his subjects (Herod. i. 99; cp. Esth. iv. 11), and of the malignant jealousy fostered by the debased relation of the sexes, such wretches, detached from social interests and hopes of issue (especially when, as commonly, and as amongst the Jews, foreigners), the natural slaves of either sex (Esth. iv. 5), and having no prospect in rebellion save the change of masters, were the fittest props of a government resting on a servile relation, the most complete εργατα εμψυχα of its despotism or its lust, the surest (but see Esth. ii. 21) guardians (Xenoph. Cyrop. vii. 5, § 60 sq.; Herod. viii. 103) of the monarch's person, and the sole confidential witnesses of his unguarded or tallés à fleur de ventre); a precaution arising from mixed ignorance and jealousy. The "officer" Potiphar (Gen. xxxvii. 36; xxxix. 1, marg. eunuch, and LXX. σπάρδορι, εβουχος) was an Egyptian, was married, and was the "captain of the guard"; and in the Assyrian monuments an eunuch often appears, sometimes armed and in a warlike capacity, or as a scribe, noting the number of heads and amount of spoil, as receiving the prisoners, and even as officiating in religious ceremonies (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 334-6, 334). A bloated beardless face and double chin is there their conventional type. Chardin (Voyages en Perse, ii. 283, ed. Amsterd. 1711) speaks of eunuchs having a harem of their own. If Potiphar had become such by operation for disease, by accident, or even by malice, such a marriage seems, therefore, according to Eastern notions, supposable^b (see undignified moments. Hence they have in all ages frequently risen to high offices of trust. Thus the "chief" of the cup-bearers and of the cooks of Pharaoh were eunuchs, as being near his person, though their inferior agents need not have been so (Gen. xl. 1, 7, LXX.). The complete assimilation of the kingdom of Israel, and latterly^d of Judah, to the neighbouring models of despotism, is traceable in the rank and prominence of eunuchs (2 K. viii. 6, on Gen. xxxix. 1, xli. 50, and the details given in xxxix. 13.

^c Wilkinson (Anc. Egypt. ii. 61) denies the use of eunuchs in Egypt. Herodotus, indeed (ii. 92), confirms his statement as regards Egyptian monogamy; but if this as a rule applied to the kings, they seemed at any rate to have allowed themselves concubines (ib. 181). From the general beardless character of Egyptian heads it is not easy to pronounce whether any eunuchs appear in the sculptures or not.

^d 1 Ch. xxviii. 1 (LXX.) is remarkable as ascribing eunuchs to the period of David, nor can it be doubted that Solomon's polygamy made them a necessary consequence; but in this state they do not seem to have played an important part at this period.

^b The Jewish tradition is that Joseph was made a eunuch on his first introduction to Egypt; and yet the accusation of Potiphar's wife, his marriage and the birth of his children, are related subsequently without any explanation. See Targum Pseudojon.

ix. 32, xxiii. 11, xxv. 19; Is. lvi. 3, 4; Jer. xxix. 2, xxxiv. 19, xxxviii. 7, xli. 16, lii. 25). They mostly appear in one of two relations, either military as "set over the men of war," greater trustworthiness possibly counterbalancing inferior courage and military vigour, or associated, as we mostly recognise them, with women and children. It is possible but uncertain that Daniel and his companions were thus treated, in fulfilment of 2 K. xx. 17, 18; Is. xxxix. 7; cp. Dan. i. 3, 7. The court of Herod of course had its eunuchs (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 8, § 1; xv. 7, § 4), as had also that of Queen Candace (Acts viii. 27). We find the Assyrian Rab-Saris, or chief eunuch (2 K. xviii. 17), employed together with other high officials as ambassador. Similarly, in the details of the travels of an embassy sent by the Duke of Holstein (p. 136), we find an eunuch mentioned as sent on occasion of a state-marriage to negotiate, and of another (p. 273) who was the Meheter, or chamberlain of Shah Abbas, who was always near his person, and had his ear (cp. Chardin, iii. 37), and of another, originally a Georgian prisoner, who officiated as supreme judge. Fryer (Travels in India and Persia, 1698) and Chardin (ii. 283) describe them as being the base and ready tools of licentiousness, as tyrannical in humour, and pertinacious in the authority which they exercise; Clarke (Travels in Europe, &c., part ii. § 1, p. 22), as eluded and ridiculed by those whom it is their office to guard. A great number of them accompany the Shah and his ladies when hunting, and no one is allowed, on pain of death, to come within two leagues of the field, unless the king sends an eunuch for him. So eunuchs ran before the closed arabs of the sultanas when abroad, crying out to all to keep at a distance. This illustrates Esth. i. 10, 12, 15, 16; ii. 3, 8, 14. The moral tendency of this sad condition is well known to be the repression of courage, gentleness, shame, and remorse, the development of malice, and often of melancholy, and a disposition to suicide. The favourable description of them in Xenophon (l. c.) is overcharged, or at least is not confirmed by modern observation. They are not more liable to disease than others, unless of such as often follows the foul vices of which they are the tools. Michaelis (ii. 180) regards them as the proper consequences of the gross polygamy of the East, although his further remark that they tend to balance the sexual disparity which such monopoly of women causes is less just, since the countries despoiled of their women for the one purpose are not commonly those which furnish male children for the other.

In the three classes mentioned in Matt. xix. 12 the first is to be ranked with other examples of defective organization; the last, if taken literally, as it is said to have been personally exemplified in Origen (Euseb. Eccl. Hist. vi. 8), is an instance of human ways and means of ascetic devotion being valued by the Jews above revealed precept (see Schöttgen, Hor. Heb. i. 159). But a figurative sense of εὐνοικός (cp. 1 Cor. vii. 32, 34) is also possible.

The operation itself, especially in infancy, is not more dangerous than an ordinary amputation. Chardin (ii. 285) indeed says that only one in four survives; and Clot Bey, chief physician of the Pasha, states that two-thirds die; but Burckhardt affirms (Nub. p. 329) that the operation is only fatal in about two out of a hundred cases.

In the A. V. of Esther the word "chamberlain" (margin. eunuch) is the constant rendering of ד'רד; and as the word also occurs in Acts xii. 20 and Rom. xvi. 23, where the original expressions are very different, some caution is required. In Acts xii. 20 τὸν ἐπὶ τοῦ κοιτῶνος τοῦ βασιλέως may mean a "chamberlain" merely. Such were persons of public influence, as we learn from a Greek inscription, preserved in Walpole's Turkey (ii. 559), in honour of P. Aelius Alcibiades, "chamberlain of the emperor" (ἐπὶ κοιτῶνος Σεβ.), the epithets in which exactly suggest the kind of patronage expressed. In Rom. xvi. 23 the word ἐπίτροπος is the one commonly rendered "steward" (cp. Matt. xx. 8; Luke viii. 3), and means the one to whom the care of the city was committed. See Salden, Otia Theol. de Eunuchis; Keim, H.W.B. s. n. 'Verschnittene.' [H. H.]

EUNUCH, ETHIOPIAN. [ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH.]

EUO'DIA, R. V. (Εὐδία; textus receptus, wrongly Εὐωδία; Evhodia, Amiat.), a Christian woman of Philippi, named with Syntyche (Phil. iv. 2). St. Paul beseeches the two to be of one mind in the Lord. They are described (τ. 3) as having laboured with Paul in the Gospel, an important testimony to the work of women in the primitive Church. The A. V. erroneously takes Εὐωδία as a man's name from a nom. Εὐωδίας (see Lightfoot's note in loco). [E. R. B.]

EUPHRATES (עֶפְרַת; Eúφρατης; Euphrates) is a word of Accadian or pre-Semitic origin. The early inhabitants of Chaldaea called the river the Pura-nunu, "the great water," or Pura, "the water," simply. From this, the later Semitic population formed Purátu by attaching the Semitic suffix of the feminine to the Accadian word. The Greek Euphrátēs is a popular modification of the Persian Ufrátu, where the first syllable represents the adventitious vowel produced by the omission of the first vowel of the original name, and the consequent coalescence of two initial consonants. In the Babylonian inscriptions, the Euphrates is often called "the river of Sippara." It was also termed "Sakkan," for which the Semitic equivalent seems to have been Gikhinnu or Gihon. It is most frequently denoted in the Bible by the term עֶפְרַת, han-nahar, i.e. "the river," the river of Asia, in grand contrast to the short-lived torrents of Palestine (see a list of the occurrences of this term in Stanley, S. and P., App. § 34).

The Euphrates is the largest, the longest, and by far the most important of the rivers of Western Asia. It rises from two chief sources in the Armenian mountains, one of them at Domli, 25 miles N.E. of Erzerum, and little more than a degree from the Black Sea; the other on the northern slope of the mountain range called Ala-Tagh, near the village of Diyadin, and not far from Mount Ararat. The former, or Northern Euphrates, has the name Frát from the first, but is known also as the Kara-Su (Black River); the latter, or Southern Euphrates, is not called the Frát but the Murad

Chai, yet it is in reality the main river. Both branches flow at first towards the west or south-west, passing through the wildest mountain-districts of Armenia; they meet at Kebban-Haden, nearly in long. 39° E. from Greenwich, having run respectively 400 and 270 miles. Here the stream formed by their combined waters is 120 yards wide, rapid, and very deep; it now flows nearly southward, but in a tortuous course, forcing a way through the ranges of Taurus and anti-Taurus, and still seeming as if it would empty itself into the Mediterranean; but prevented from so doing by the longitudinal ranges of Amanus and Lebanon, which here run parallel to the Syrian coast, and at no great distance from it, the river at last desists from its endeavour, and in about lat. 36° turns towards the south-east, and proceeds in this direction for above 1,000 miles to its embouchure in the Persian Gulf. The last part of its course, from Hit downwards, is through a low, flat, and alluvial plain, over which it has a tendency to spread and stagnate; above Hit, and from thence to Samosat (Samosata), the country along its banks is for the most part open but hilly; north of Samosat, the stream runs in a narrow valley among high mountains, and is interrupted by numerous rapids. The entire course is calculated at 1780 miles, nearly 650 more than that of the Tigris, and only 200 short of that of the Indus; and of this distance more than two-thirds (1200 miles) is navigable for boats, and even, as the expedition of Col. Chesney proved, for small steamers. The width of the river is greatest at the distance of 700 or 800 miles from its mouth—that is to say, from its junction with the Khabour to the village of Weraï. It there averages 400 yards, while lower down, from Werdî to Lamtun, it continually decreases, until at the last-named place its width is not more than 120 yards, its depth having at the same time diminished from an average of 18 to one of 12 feet. The causes of this singular phenomenon are the entire lack of tributaries below the Khabour, and the employment of the water in irrigation. The river has also in this part of its course the tendency already noted, to run off and waste itself in vast marshes, which every year more and more cover the alluvial tract west and south of the stream. From this cause its lower course is continually varying, and it is doubted whether at present, except in the season of the inundation, any portion of the Euphrates water is poured into the Shat-el-Arab.

The annual inundation of the Euphrates is caused by the melting of the snows in the Armenian highlands. It occurs in the month of May. The rise of the Tigris is earlier, since it drains the southern flank of the great Armenian chain. The Tigris scarcely ever overflows [HIDDEKEL], but the Euphrates inundates large tracts on both sides of its course from Hit downwards. The great hydraulic works ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar (Abyden. Fr. 8) had for their object to control the inundation by turning the waters through sluices into canals prepared for them, and distributing them in channels over a wide extent of country.

The Euphrates has at all times been of some importance as furnishing a line of traffic between the East and the West. Herodotus speaks of persons, probably merchants, using it regularly on their passage from the Mediterranean to Babylon (Herod. i. 185). He also describes the boats which were in use upon the stream (i. 194)—and mentions that their principal freight was wine, which was furnished by Armenia. Boats such as he describes, of wicker-work and coated with bitumen, or sometimes covered with skins, still abound on the river. Alexander appears to have brought to Babylon by the Euphrates route vessels of some considerable size, which he had made in Cyprus and Phoenicia. They were so constructed that they could be taken to pieces, and were thus carried piecemeal to Thapsacus, where they were put together and launched (Aristobul. ap. Strab. xvi. 1, § 11). The disadvantage of the route was the difficulty of conveying return cargoes against the current. According to Herodotus, the boats which descended the river were broken to pieces and sold at Babylon, and the owners returned on foot to Armenia, taking with them only the skins (i. 194). Aristobulus however related (ap. Strab. xvi. 3, § 3) that the Gerrhaeans ascended the river in their rafts not only to Babylon, but to Thapsacus, whence they carried their wares on foot in all directions. The spices and other products of Arabia formed their principal merchandise. On the whole there are sufficient grounds for believing that throughout the Babylonian and Persian periods this route was made use of by the merchants of various nations, and that by it the east and west continually interchanged their most important products (see Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, pp. 536-37).

The Euphrates is first mentioned in Scripture as one of the four rivers of Eden (Gen. ii. 14). Its celebrity is there sufficiently indicated by the absence of any explanatory phrase, such as accompanies the names of the other streams. We next hear of it in the covenant made with Abraham (Gen. xv. 18), where the whole country from "the great river, the river Euphrates," to the river of Egypt, is promised to the chosen race. In Deuteronomy and Joshua we find that this promise was borne in mind at the time of the settlement in Canaan (Deut. i. 7, xi. 24;

Josh. i. 4); and from an important passage in the First Book of Chronicles it appears that the tribe of Reuben did actually extend itself to the Euphrates in the times anterior to Saul (1 Ch. v. 9). Here they came in contact with the Hagarites, who appear upon the middle Euphrates in the Assyrian inscriptions of the later empire. It is David, however, who seems for the first time to have entered on the full enjoyment of the promise, by the victories which he gained over Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and his allies, the Syrians of Damascus (2 Sam. viii. 3-8; 1 Ch. xviii. 3). The object of his expedition was "to recover his border," and "to establish his dominion by the river Euphrates;" and in this object he appears to have been altogether successful; inasmuch that Solomon, his son, who was not a man of war, but only inherited his father's dominions, is said to have "reigned over all kingdoms from the river (i.e. the Euphrates) unto the land of the Philistines and unto the border of Egypt" (1 K. iv. 21; cp. 2 Ch. ix. 26). Thus during the reigns of David and Solomon the dominion of Israel actually attained to the full extent both ways of the original promise, the Euphrates forming the boundary of their empire to the north-east, and the river of Egypt (torrens Aegypti) to the south-west. This wide-spread dominion was lost before the disruption of the empire under Rehoboam; and no more is heard in Scripture of the Euphrates until the expedition of Necho against the Babylonians in the reign of Josiah. The "great river" had meanwhile served for some time as a boundary between Assyria and the country of the Hittites [see ASSYRIA], but had been repeatedly crossed by the armies of the Ninevite kings, who gradually established their sway over the countries upon its right bank. The crossing of the river was always difficult; and at the point where certain natural facilities fixed the ordinary passage, the strong fort of Carchemish had been built, probably in very early times, to command the position. [CARCHEMISH.] Hence, when Necho determined to attempt the permanent conquest of Syria, his march was directed upon "Carchemish by Euphrates" (2 Ch. xxxv. 20), which he captured and held, thus extending the dominion of Egypt to the Euphrates, and renewing the old glories of the Ramesside kings. His triumph, however, was short-lived. Three years afterwards the Babylonians—who had inherited the Assyrian dominion in these parts—made an expedition under Nebuchadnezzar against Necho, defeated his army, "which was by the river Euphrates in Carchemish" (Jer. xlvi. 2), and recovered all Syria and Palestine. Then "the king of Egypt came no more out of his land, for the king of Babylon had taken from the river of Egypt unto the river Euphrates all that pertained to the king of Egypt" (2 K. xxiv. 7).

These are the chief events which Scripture distinctly connects with the "great river." It is probably included among the "rivers of Babylon," by the side of which the Jewish captives "remembered Zion" and "wept" (Ps. cxxxvii. 1); and no doubt is glanced at in the threats of Jeremiah against the Chaldeans "waters" and "springs," upon which there is to be a "drought," that shall "dry them up" (Jer. l. 38; li. 26). The fulfilment of these prophecies has been noticed under the head of CHALDAEA. The river still brings down as much water as of old, but the precious element is wasted by the neglect of man; the various watercourses along which it was in former times conveyed are dry; the same channel had shrunk; and the water stagnates in unwholesome marshes.

In ancient times the Euphrates fell into the sea without first joining the Tigris, as is now the case. When Sennacherib pursued the subjects of Merodach-Baladan to the mouth of the Euphrates, he had, after sailing out of the Euphrates, quite a long voyage by sea. According to Pliny (N. H. vi. 31), the city of Charax, the present Mohammerah, which was built by Alexander the Great, was originally 10 stades distant from the sea; in the age of Juba II. 50 miles, and in his own time 120 miles. Loftus (Chaldaea and Susiana, p. 282) states that the delta at the mouths of the Euphrates and Tigris has increased since the beginning of the Christian era, at the rate of a mile in about seventy years. The ancient city of Eridu, now Abu-Shahreïn, when first founded stood upon the coast. Between the actual mouth of the Euphrates and the sea, however, lay extensive "salt-marshes," called Marratim in Babylonian, the Merathaim of Jer. i. 21. It was in these marshes that Bit-Yagina, the ancestral capital of Merodach-Baladan, was situated, and it was here that we first hear of his subjects, the Kaldá or Chaldaeans.

See, for a general account of the Euphrates, Sir G. Chesney's Euphrates Expedition, vol. i.; and for the lower course of the stream, cp. Loftus's Chaldaea and Susiana. See also Rawlinson's Herodotus, vol. i. Essay ix., and Layard's Nimreh and Babylon, chs. xxi. and xxii. [A. H. S.]

EU-POLEMUS (Εὐπόλεμος), the "son of John, the son of Accos" (Ακκός; cp. Neh. iii. 4, 21, &c.), one of the envoys sent to Rome by Judas Maccabaeus, c. B.C. 161 (1 Macc. viii. 17; 2 Macc. iv. 11; Joseph. Ant. xii. 10, § 6). He has been identified with the historian of the same name (Euseb. Praep. Ev. ix. 17 sq.); but it is by no means clear that the historian was of Jewish descent (Joseph. c. Ap. i. 23; yet cp. Hieron. de Vir. Illustr. p. 38). [B. F. W.]

EURO-CLYDON; R. V. EUR-AQUILO (Εὐροκλύδων; N.A. Εὐρακίλων; Euro-aquilo, the name given (Acts xxvii. 14) to the gale of wind which off the south coast of Crete seized the ship in which St. Paul was ultimately wrecked on the coast of Malta. The circumstances of this gale are described with much particularity: and they admit of abundant illustration from the experience of modern seamen in the Levant. In the first place it came down from the island (κατ' αὐτῆς), and therefore must have blown, more or less, from the northward, since the ship was sailing along the south coast, not far from Mount Ida, and on the way from FAIR HAVENS toward PHOENICE. So Captain Spratt, R.N., after leaving Fair Havens with a light southerly wind, fell in with "a strong northerly breeze, blowing direct from Mount Ida" (Smith, Voy. and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1856, pp. 97, 245). Next, the wind is described as being like a typhoon or whirlwind

(τυφονικός, A. V. and R. V. "tempestuous"); and the same authority speaks of such gales in the Levant as being generally "accompanied by terrific gusts and squalls from those high mountains" (Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, 1856, ii. 401). It is also observable that the change of wind in the voyage before us (xxvii. 13, 14) is exactly what might have been expected; for Captain J. Stewart, R.N., observes, in his remarks on the Archipelago, that "it is always safe to anchor under the lee of an island with a northerly wind, as it dies away gradually, but it would be extremely dangerous with southerly winds, as they almost invariably shift to a violent northerly wind" (Purdy's Sailing Directory, pt. ii. p. 61). The long duration of the gale ("the fourteenth night," v. 27), the over-clouded state of the sky ("neither sun nor stars appearing," v. 20), and even the heavy rain which concluded the storm (τὸν ἕτερον, xxviii. 2), could easily be matched with parallel instances in modern times (see Voy. and Shipwreck, p. 144; Life and Epp. ii. 412). We have seen that the wind was more or less northerly. The context gives us full materials for determining its direction with great exactitude. The vessel was driven from the coast of Crete to CLAUDA (xxvii. 16), and apprehension was felt that she would be driven into the African Syrtis (v. 17). Combining these two circumstances with the fact that she was less than half-way from Fair Havens to Phoenice when the storm began (v. 14), we come to the conclusion that it came from the N.E. or E.N.E. This is quite in harmony with the natural sense of Εὐρακίλων (Euro-aquilo, Vulg.), which is found in some of the best MSS., and has been adopted in R. V.; but we are disposed to adhere to the Received Text, more especially as it is the more difficult reading, and the phrase used by St. Luke (ὁ καλούμενος Εὐροκλύδων) seems to point to some peculiar word in use among the sailors. Dean Alford thinks that the true name of the wind was εὐρακίλων, but that the Greek sailors, not understanding the Latin termination, corrupted the word into εὐροκλύδων, and that so St. Luke wrote it. EUTYCHUS (Εὐτυχος; Eutyclus; Acts xx. 9-11). Sitting in the window of the upper room where St. Paul was preaching, he was overcome by sleep and fell to the ground. He was taken up dead. But after St. Paul had embraced him (like Elisha, 2 K. iv. 34) he said (R. V.), "Make ye no ado; for his life is in him." St. Paul then returned to the upper room, and the story closes with the words, "they brought the lad alive." St. Paul's words, "his life is in him," appear to imply that he had not really expired. But if we accept literally the distinct statement that he was taken up dead, we must suppose that St. Paul means "his life is now in him," as a consequence of what had been done, without implying that it had continued to be in him throughout. It is difficult to interpret the apparent contradiction without unduly straining one of the two phrases. It is clear, however, that the author intends to relate a notable miracle, either of healing or of raising from the dead, otherwise the whole story would be without point. [E. R. B.]

EVANGELIST (εὐαγγελιστής; evangelista: Acts xxi. 8; Eph. iv. 11; 2 Tim. iv. 5). The constitution of the apostolic Church included a body of men known as Evangelists. The absence of any detailed account of the organization and practical working of the Church in the 1st century leaves us in some uncertainty as to their functions and position. The meaning of the name, "the publishers of glad tidings," seems common to the work of the Christian ministry generally, yet in Ephes. iv. 11 the εὐαγγελιστῶν appear on the one hand after the ἀπόστολοι and πρόφῃται, and on the other before the ποιμένες and διδασκαλοὶ. Assuming that the Apostles here, whether limited to the twelve or not, are those who were looked upon as the special delegates and representatives of Christ, and therefore higher than all others in their authority, and that the Prophets were men speaking under the immediate impulse of the Spirit words that were mighty in their effects on men's hearts and consciences, it would follow that the Evangelists had a function subordinate to theirs; yet more conspicuous and so far higher than that of the pastors who watched over a Church that had been founded, and of the teachers who carried on the work of systematic instruction. This passage would accordingly lead us to think of them as standing between the two other groups—sent forth as missionary preachers of the Gospel by the first, and as such preparing the way for the labours of the second. The same inference would seem to follow from the occurrence of the word as applied to Philip in Acts xxi. 8. He had been one of those who had gone everywhere, εὐαγγελίζοντες τὸν λόγον (Acts viii. 4), now in one city, now in another (viii. 40); but he has not the power and authority of an Apostle (see the whole narrative in ch. viii.), he does not speak as a prophet himself, though the gift of prophecy belongs to his four daughters (xxi. 9), and exercises apparently no pastoral superintendence over any portion of the flock. The omission of Evangelists in the text of 1 Cor. xii. may be explained on the hypothesis that the nature of St. Paul's argument led him there to speak of the settled organization of a given local church, which of course presupposed the work of the missionary preacher as already accomplished, while the train of thought in Ephes. iv. 11 brought before his mind all who were in any way instrumental in building up the Church universal. It follows from what has been said that the calling of the Evangelist is expressed by the word κηρύσσειν rather than διδάσκειν, or παρακαλεῖν: it is the proclamation of the glad tidings to those who have not known them, rather than the instruction and pastoral care of those who have believed and have been baptized. And this is also what we gather from 2 Tim. iv. 2-5. Timothy is to "preach the word;" in doing this he is to "do the work of an evangelist." It follows also that the name denotes a work rather than an order. And hence there are no references to the existence of an order bearing this title in any later writers. The word εὐαγγελιστής does not occur in the Apostolic Fathers, nor even in the διδαχὴ τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων, which recognises a distinction between two kinds of ministers, missionary (ἀπόστολοι καὶ προφῃται) and stationary (ἐπίσκοποι καὶ διάκονοι). The Evangelist might or might not be a Bishop-elder or a deacon. The Apostles, so far as they evangelized (Acts viii. 25, xiv. 7; 1 Cor. i. 17), might claim the title, though there were many Evangelists who were not Apostles. "Omnis apostolus evangelista, non omnis evangelista apostolus" (Pelagius). The "brother whose praise was in the Gospel" (2 Cor. viii. 18) may be looked upon as one of St. Paul's companions in this work, and known probably by the same name. In this as in other points connected with the organization of the Church in the apostolic age, but little information is to be gained from later writers. The name was no longer explained by the presence of those to whom it had been specially applied, and came to be variously interpreted. Theodoret (on Ephes. iv. 11) describes the Evangelists—as they have been described above—as travelling missionaries, who περίπλυντες ἐκέρυττον: Chrysostom, as men who preached the Gospel μη περίπλυντες πανταχοῦ. The two expressions, when taken together, give us the idea of the office very fairly. They were distinguished from the Apostles, to whom they acted as subordinates: "missionary assistants of the Apostles" (Meyer). The account given by Eusebius (H. E. ii. 37), though somewhat rhetorical and vague, gives prominence to the idea of itinerant missionary preaching. Men "do the work of Evangelists, leaving their homes to proclaim Christ, and deliver the written Gospels to those who were ignorant of the faith." The last clause of this description indicates a change in the work which before long affected the meaning of the name. If the Gospel was a written book, and the office of the Evangelist was to read or distribute it, then the writers were κατ' ἐξοχὴν THE Evangelists. It is thus accordingly that Eusebius (l. c.) speaks of them, though the old meaning of the word (as in H. E. v. 10, where he applies it to Pantænus) is not forgotten by him. Soon this meaning so overshadowed the old that Oecumenius (Estius on Ephes. iv. 11) has no other notion of the Evangelists than as those who have written a Gospel (cp. Harless on Ephes. iv. 11). Augustine, though commonly using the word in this sense, at times remembers its earlier signification (Serm. xciv. and cclxvi.). Ambrosianus (Estius l. c.) identifies them with deacons. In later liturgical language the word was applied to the reader of the Gospel for the day (cp. Neander, Pfanz. u. Leit., iii. 5; Hooker, E. P. v. ch. lxxviii.; Meyer on Acts xxi. 8; and for the symbolic representations of the Evangelists in the Church, see Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, s. v. "Evangelists").

EVE (Ἔβη), i. e. Chavvah, LXX. in Gen. iii. 20, Zavh, elsewhere Eva; Hava), the name given in Scripture to the first woman. It is simply a feminine form of the adjective ἔβη, living, alive, which more commonly makes ἔβηται; or it may be regarded as a variation of the noun ἔβη, which means life. The account of Eve's creation is found in Gen. ii. 21, 22. Upon the failure of a companion suitable for Adam among the creatures which were brought to him to be named, the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon him, and took one of his ribs from him, which he fashioned into a woman, and brought her to the man. Various explanations of this narrative have been offered. Perhaps that which we are chiefly intended to learn from it is the foundation upon which the union between man and wife is built, viz. identity of nature and oneness of origin.

Through the subtlety of the serpent, Eve was beguiled into a violation of the one commandment had been imposed upon her and Adam. She took of the fruit of the forbidden tree and gave it her husband (cp. 2 Cor. xi. 3; 1 Tim. ii. 13, 14). [ADAM.] The different aspects under which Eve regarded her mission as a mother are seen in the names of her sons. At the birth of the first she said, "I have gotten a man from the Lord," or perhaps, "I have gotten a man, ecce the Lord," mistaking him for the Redeemer. When the second was born, finding her hopes frustrated, she named him Abel, or vanity. When his brother had slain him, and she again bare a son, she called his name Seth, and the joy of a mother seemed to outweigh the sense of the vanity of life: "For God," said she, "hath appointed ME another seed instead of Abel, for Cain slew him." The Scripture account of Eve closes with the birth of Seth. [S. L.]

EVI (עִוִּי; Evi; Evi, Hevevus), one of the five kings or princes of Midian, slain by the Israelites in the war after the matter of Baal-peor, and whose lands were afterwards allotted to Reuben (Num. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21). [MIDIAN.] [E. S. P.]

EVIDENCE. The term used by the A. V. to describe the document of purchase which Jeremiah (xxxii. 10 sq.) signed and sealed upon buying a field at a time when, humanly speaking, such purchase seemed an act of folly. He relied on God's promise (v. 15). The R. V. renders "deed." [F.]

EVIL-MERODACH (עִוִּי מֶרֶדַּח; B. Evelmarodach [2 K.] Κ. Οὐλαυμαροδάχ; Abyden. Ἀμυλαροδάχος; Beros. Εὐελαμαροδόχος; Evilmerodach; Bab. Amel-Marduk [= Amel-Marduk, -Marduk], "Man of Merodach") was, according to Berosus, Abydenus, &c., the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, and came to the throne of Babylonia about 562 B.C. The Second Book of Kings (xxv. 27) and the Book of Jeremiah (lii. 31) relate that in the accession year, or first year of his reign, this king had compassion upon Jehoiachin, king of Judah (whom Nebuchadnezzar had cast into prison thirty-seven years before), released him from his confinement, "spake kindly to him," honoured him above all the vassal-kings at Babylon, and gave him a portion of his table for the rest of his life. As Evil-Merodach only reigned for two years (Abydenus, Fr. 9; Berosus, Fr. 14), or two years and a few months, according to the tablets dated in his reign, this must have been done by means of a deed drawn up in legal form, such as the words of the passages of Scripture imply, and as was usual in Babylonia at the time, though it is not impossible that Jehoiachin died before his royal master. Evil-Merodach was killed in a rebellion led by his sister's husband, a Babylonian noble named Neriglissar [NERGAL-SHAREZER], who then seized the Babylonian crown. According to Berosus, Evil-Merodach rendered himself odious by his debaucheries and other extravagances, and it is to this that his untimely end was really due. He was a good-natured, though unwarlike and unwise ruler. [T. G. P.]

EXCELLENCY OF CARMEL, Is. xxxv. 2. The wonderful profusion of flowering shrubs is to Tristram "the grand characteristic of the excellency of Carmel." [CARMEL.] [F.]

EXCELLENT, as applied by A. V. to Theophilus (Luke i. 3) and to Felix (Acts xiii. 26) in the phrase "most excellent" (ἀριτίστοτος), is usually considered a title or office (cp. "your Excellency"). The li. V. preserves the same English word for the same Greek word when speaking of Felix (Acts xxiv. 3) and Festus (Acts xxvi. 25), where the A. V. uses "noble." [F.]

EXCOMMUNICATION (Ἀφορισμός; Excommunicatio). Excommunication is a power founded upon a right inherent in all religious societies, and is analogous to the powers of capital punishment, banishment, and exclusion from membership, which are exercised by political and municipal bodies. If Christianity is merely a philosophical idea thrown into the world to do battle with other theories, and to be valued according as it maintains its ground or not in the conflict of opinions, excommunication, ecclesiastical punishments, and penitential discipline are unreasonable. If a society has been instituted for maintaining any body of doctrine, and any code of morals, they are necessary to the existence of that society. That the Christian Church is an organised polity, a spiritual "Kingdom of God" on earth, is the declaration of the Bible [CHURCH]; and that the Jewish Church was at once a spiritual and a temporal organization is clear.

I. Jewish Excommunication. — The Jewish system of excommunication was threefold. For a first offence a delinquent was subjected to the penalty of נִדְחָו (Niddah). Maimonides (quoted by Lightfoot, Horae Hebraicae, on 1 Cor. v. 5), Morinus (de Poenitentia, iv. 27), and Buxtorf (Lexicon, s. v. נִדְחָו) enumerate the twenty-four offences for which it was inflicted. They are various, and range in heinousness from the offence of keeping a fierce dog to that of taking God's name in vain. Elsewhere (Bab. Moed Katon, fol. 16, 1) the causes of its infliction are reduced to two, termed money and epicurism, by which is meant debt and wanton insolence. The offender was first cited to appear in court, and if he refused to appear or to make amends, his sentence was pronounced—"Let M, or N, be under excommunication." The excommunicated person was prohibited the use of the bath, or of the razor, or of the convivial table; and all who had to do with him were commanded to keep him at four cubits' distance. He was allowed to go to the Temple, but not to make the circuit in the ordinary manner. The term of this punishment was thirty days; and it was extended to a second, and to a third thirty days when necessary. If at the end of that time the offender was still contumacious, he was subjected to the second excommunication, termed צְרֵם (cherem), a word meaning something devoted to God (Lev. xxvii. 21, 28; Ex. xxii. 20; Num. xviii. 14). Severer penalties were now attached. The offender was not allowed to teach or to be taught in company with others, to hire or to be hired, nor to perform any commercial transactions beyond purchasing the necessaries of life. The sentence was delivered by a court of ten, and was accompanied by a solemn malediction, for which authority was supposed to be found in the "Curse ye Meroz" of Judg. v. 23. Lastly followed שַׁמְמָתָה (Shammáthá), which was an entire cutting off from the congregation. It has been supposed by some that these two latter forms of excommunication were undistinguishable from each other.*

The punishment of excommunication is not appointed by the Law of Moses. It is founded on the natural right of self-protection which all societies enjoy. The case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Num. xvi.), the curse denounced on Meroz (Judg. v. 23), the commission and proclamation of Ezra (vii. 26, x. 8), and the reformation of Nehemiah (xiii. 25), are appealed to by the Talmudists as precedents by which their proceedings are regulated. In respect to the principle involved, the "cutting off from the people" commanded for certain sins (Ex. xxx. 33, 38, xxxi. 14; Lev. xvii. 4), and the exclusion from the camp denounced on the leprous (Lev. xiii. 46; Num. xii. 14), are more apposite.

In the New Testament, Jewish excommunication is brought prominently before us in the case of the man that was born blind and restored to sight (John ix.). "The Jews had agreed already that if any man did confess that Jesus was Christ, he should be put out of the synagogue. Therefore said his parents, He is of age, ask him" (vv. 22, 23). "And they cast him out. Jesus heard that they had cast him out" (vv. 34, 35). The expressions here used, ἔβανον αὐτὸν ἔξω, appear to refer to the first form of excommunication or Niddui. Our Lord warns His disciples that they will have to suffer excommunication at the hands of their countrymen (John xvi. 2); and the fear of it is described as sufficient to prevent persons in a respectable position from acknowledging their belief in Christ (John xii. 42). In Luke vi. 22, it has been thought that our Lord referred specifically to the three forms of Jewish excommunication—"Blessed are ye when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company [ἀπορρώσω], and shall reproach you [ὀνειδίσω], and cast out your name as evil [ἐκβάλω], for the Son of Man's sake." The three words very accurately express the simple separation, the additional malediction, and the final exclusion of niddui, cherem, and shammáthá. This verse makes it probable that the three stages were already formally distinguished from each other, though, no doubt, the words appropriate to each are occasionally used inexactly.

II. Christian Excommunication.—Excommunication, as exercised by the Christian Church, is founded not merely on the natural right possessed by all societies, not merely on the example of the Jewish Church and nation. It was instituted by our Lord (Matt. xviii. 15, 18), and it was practised by and commanded by St. Paul (1 Tim. i. 20; 1 Cor. v. 11; Tit. iii. 10).

Its Institution.—The passage in St. Matthew has led to much controversy, into which we do not enter. It runs as follows:—"If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican. Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." Our Lord here recognises and appoints a way in which a member of His Church is to become to his brethren as a heathen man and a publican—i.e. be reduced to a state analogous to that of the Jew suffering the penalty of the third form of excommunication. It is to follow on his contempt of the censure of the Church passed on him for a trespass which he has committed. The final excision is to be preceded, as in the case of the Jew, by two warnings.

Apostolic Example.—In the Epistles we find St. Paul frequently claiming the right to exercise discipline over his converts (cp. 2 Cor. i. 23; xiii. 10). In two cases we find him exercising this authority to the extent of cutting off offenders from the Church. One of these is the case of the incestuous Corinthian: "Ye are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he that hath done this deed might be taken away from among you. For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have judged already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, to deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (1 Cor. v. 2-5). The other case is that of Hymenaeus and Alexander: "Holding faith, and a good conscience; which some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck of whom is Hymenaeus and Alexander; whom I have delivered unto Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme" (1 Tim. i. 19, 20). It seems certain that these persons were excommunicated, the first for immorality, the others for heresy. What is the full meaning of the expression, "deliver unto Satan," is doubtful. All agree that excommunication is contained in it, but whether it implies any further punishment, inflicted by the extraordinary powers committed specially to the Apostles, has been questioned. The strongest argument for the phrase meaning no more than excommunication may be drawn from a comparison of Col. i. 13. Addressing himself to the "saints and faithful brethren in Christ which are at Colosse," St. Paul exhorts them to "give thanks unto the Father Which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light: Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of His dear Son: in Whom we have redemption through His blood, even the forgiveness of sins." The conception of the Apostle here is of men lying in the realm of darkness, and transported from thence into the kingdom of the Son of God, which is the inheritance of the saints in light, by admission into the Church. What he means by the power of darkness is abundantly clear from many other passages in his writings, of which it will be sufficient to quote Ephes. vi. 12: "Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil; for we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Introduction into the Church is therefore, in St. Paul's mind, a translation from the kingdom and power of Satan to the kingdom and government of Christ. This being so, he could hardly more naturally describe the effect of excluding a man from the Church than by the words, "deliver him unto Satan," the idea being, that the man ceasing to be a subject of Christ's kingdom of light, was at once transported back to the kingdom of darkness, and delivered therefore into the power of its ruler, Satan. This interpretation is strongly confirmed by the terms in which St. Paul describes the commission which he received from the Lord Jesus Christ, when he was sent to the Gentiles: "To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in Me" (Acts xvi. 18). Here again the act of being placed in Christ's kingdom, the Church, is pronounced to be a translation from darkness to light, from the power of Satan unto God. Conversely, to be cast out of the Church would be to be removed from light to darkness, to be withdrawn from God's government, and delivered into the power of Satan (so Balsamon and Zonaras, in Basil. Can. 7; Estius, in 1 Cor. v.; Beveridge, in Can. Apost. x.). If, however, the expression means more than excommunication, it would imply the additional exercise of a special apostolical power, similar to that exerted on Ananias and Sapphira (Acts v. 1), Simon Magus (viii. 20), and Elymas (xiii. 10: so Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, Hammond, Grotius, and the elder Lightfoot).

Apostolic Precept.—In addition to the claim to exercise discipline, and its actual exercise in the form of excommunication, by the Apostles, we find apostolic precept directing that discipline should be exercised by the rulers of the Church, and that in some cases excommunication should be resorted to: "If any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother," writes St. Paul to the Thessalonians (2 Thess. iii. 14). To the Romans: "Mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have heard, and avoid them" (Rom. xvi. 17).

To the Galatians: "I would they were even cut off that trouble you" (Gal. v. 12). To Timothy: "If any man teach otherwise, . . . from such withdraw thyself" (1 Tim. vi. 3). To Titus he uses a still stronger expression: "A man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject" (Tit. iii. 10). St. John instructs the lady to whom he addresses his Second Epistle, not to receive into her house nor bid God speed to any who did not believe in Christ (2 John v. 10); and we read that in the case of Cerinthus he acted himself on the precept that he had given (Euseb. H. E. iii. 28). In his Third Epistle he describes Diotrophes, apparently a Judaizing presbyter, "who loved to have the pre-eminence," as "casting out of the Church," i.e. refusing Church communion to the stranger brethren who were travelling about preaching to the Gentiles (3 John v. 10). In the addresses to the Seven Churches, the angels or rulers of the Church of Pergamos and of Thyatira are rebuked for "suffering" the Nicolaitans and Balaamites "to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols" (Rev. ii. 20). There are two passages still more important to our subject. In the Epistle to the Galatians, St. Paul denounces, "Though we, or an Angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed (ἀνάθεμα ἔστω). As I said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed" (ἀνάθεμα ἔστω, Gal. i. 8, 9). And in the First Epistle to the Corinthians: "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha" (1 Cor. xvi. 22). It has been supposed that these two expressions, "let him be Anathema," "let him be Anathema Maran-atha," refer respectively to the two later stages of Jewish excommunication—the cherem and the sham-máthá. This requires consideration.

The words ἀνάθεμα and ἀνάθημα have evidently the same derivation, and originally they bore the same meaning. They express a person or thing set apart, laid up, or devoted. But whereas a thing may be set apart by way of honour or for destruction, the words, like the Latin sacer and the English "devoted," came to have opposite senses—τὸ ἀπὸλλοτρωμένον Θεοῦ, and τὸ ἀφορισμένον Θεῷ. The LXX. and several ecclesiastical writers use the two words almost indiscriminately, but in general the form ἀνάθημα is applied to the votive offering (see 2 Macc. ix. 16; Luke xxi. 5; and Chrys. Hom. xvi. in Ep. ad Rom.), and the form ἀνάθεμα to that which is devoted to evil (see Deut. vii. 26; Josh. vi. 17, vii. 13). Thus St. Paul declares that he could wish himself an ἀνάθεμα from Christ, if he could thereby save the Jews (Rom. ix. 3). His meaning is that he would be willing to be set apart as a vile thing, to be cast aside and destroyed, if only it could bring about the salvation of his brethren. Hence we see the force of ἀνάθεμα ἔστω in Gal. i. 8. "Have nothing to do with him," would be the Apostle's injunction, "but let him be set apart as an evil thing, for God to deal with him as he thinks fit." Hammond (in loc.) paraphrases it as follows:—"You are to disclaim and renounce all communion with him, to look on him as on an excommunicated person, under the second degree of excommunication, that none is to have any commerce with in sacred things." Hence it is that ἀνάθεμα ἔστω came to be the common expression employed by Councils at the termination of each canon which they enacted, meaning that whoever was disobedient to the canon was to be separated from the communion of the Church and its privileges, and from the favour of God, until he repented (see Bingham, Ant. xvi. 2, 16).

The expression Ἀνάθεμα μαρναθά, as it stands by itself without explanation in 1 Cor. xvi. 22, is so peculiar, that it has tempted a number of ingenious expositors. Parkhurst hesitatingly derives it from אָנָה דָּרְנָה, "Cursed be thou." But this derivation is not tenable. Buxtorf, Morinus, Hammond, Bingham, and others identify it with the Jewish shammáthá. They do so by translating shammáthá, "The Lord comes." But shammáthá cannot be made to mean "The Lord comes" (see Lightfoot in loco). Several fanciful derivations of it are given by Rabbinical writers, as "There is death," "There is desolation"; but there is no mention by them of such a signification as "The Lord comes." Lightfoot derives it from אָנָה, and it probably means a thing excluded or shut out. Maranatha, however peculiar its use in the text may seem to us, is an Aramaic expression, signifying "Our Lord is come" (Chrysostom, Jerome, Estius, Lightfoot), or "Our Lord cometh." If we take the former meaning, we may regard it as giving the reason why the offender was to be anathematized; if the latter, it would either imply that the separation was to be in perpetuity, "donec Dominus redeat" (Augustine), or, more properly, it would be a form of solemn appeal to the day on which the judgment should be ratified by the Lord (cp. Jude, v. 14). In any case, it is a strengthened form of the simple ἀνάθεμα ἔστω. And thus it may be regarded as holding towards it a similar relation to that which existed between the shammáthá and the cherem, but not on any supposed ground of etymological identity between the two words shammáthá and maran-atha. Perhaps we ought to interpunctuate more strongly between ἀνάθεμα and μαρναθά, and read ἦτω ἀνάθεμα-μαρναθά, i.e. "Let him be anathema. The Lord will come" (cp. R. V. "let him be anathema. Maranatha"—explained as meaning "our Lord cometh"). The anathema and the cherem answer very exactly to each other (see Lev. xvii. 28; Num. xxi. 3; Is. xliiii. 28).

Restoration to Communion.—Two cases of excommunication are related in Holy Scripture; and in one of them the restitution of the offender is specially recounted. The incestuous Corinthian had been excommunicated by the authority of St. Paul, who had issued his sentence from a distance without any consultation with the Corinthians. He had required them publicly to promulgate it and to act upon it. They had done so. The offender had been brought to repentance, and was overwhelmed with grief. Hereupon St. Paul, still absent as before, forbids the further infliction of the punishment, pronounces the forgiveness of the penitent, and exhorts the Corinthians to receive him back to communion, and to confirm their love towards him.

The Nature of Excommunication is made more evident by these acts of St. Paul than by any investigation of Jewish practice or of the etymology of words. We thus find, (1) that it is a spiritual penalty, involving no temporal punishment, except accidentally; (2) that it consists in separation from the communion of the Church; (3) that its object is the good of the sufferer (1 Cor. v. 5), and the protection of the sound members of the Church (2 Tim. iii. 17); (4) that its subjects are those who are guilty of heresy (1 Tim. i. 20), or gross immorality (1 Cor. v. 1); (5) that it is inflicted by the authority of the Church at large (Matt. xviii. 18), wielded by the highest ecclesiastical officer (1 Cor. v. 3; Tit. iii. 10); (6) that this officer's sentence is promulgated by the congregation to which the offender belongs (1 Cor. v. 4), in deference to his superior judgment and command (2 Cor. ii. 9), and in spite of any opposition on the part of a minority (v. 6); (7) that the exclusion may be of indefinite duration, or for a period; (8) that its duration may be abridged at the discretion and by the indulgence of the person who has imposed the penalty (v. 8); (9) that penitence is the condition on which restoration to communion is granted (v. 7); (10) that the sentence is to be publicly reversed as it was publicly promulgated (v. 10).

Practice of Excommunication in the Post-Apostolic Church.—The first step was an admonition to the offender, repeated once, or even more than once, in accordance with St. Paul's precept (Tit. iii. 10. See Apostol. Constitutions, ii. 37-39; S. Ambr. De Offic. ii. 27; Prosper, De Vit. Contempl. ii. 7; Synesius, Ep. lviii.) If this did not reclaim him, it was succeeded by the Lesser Excommunication (ἀφορισμός), by which he was excluded from the participation of the Eucharist, and was shut out from the Communion-service, although admitted to what was called the Service of the Catechumens (see Theodoret, Ep. lxxvii. ad Eulal.). Thirdly followed the Greater Excommunication or Anathema (πρωτελής ἀφορισμός, ἀνάθεμα), by which the offender was debarred, not only from the Eucharist, but from taking part in all religious acts in any assembly of the Church, and from the company of the faithful in the ordinary concerns of life. In case of submission, offenders were received back to communion by going through the four stages of public penance, in which they were termed, (1) προσκλιοντες, flentes, or weepers; (2) ἀκροόμενοι, audientes, or hearers; (3) ὀπίσπιτοντες, substrati, or kneelers; (4) συσεστάτες, consistentes, or co-standers; after which they were restored to communion by absolution, accompanied by imposition of hands. To trace out this branch of the subject more minutely would carry us beyond our legitimate sphere. Reference may be made to Suicer's Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus, s. vv. πρόσκλαισις, ἀκρόσις, ὀπίσπισις, σύστασις.

EXECUTIONER (ΠΕΘ); σκευολάτρ).

The Hebrew tabbach describes in the first instance the general office of one of the body-guard of a monarch; and, in the second place, the special office of an executioner as belonging to that guard (cp. Delitzsch, Genesis [1887], in loco). Thus Potiphar was "captain of the executioners" (Gen. xxxvii. 36; see margin), and had his official residence at the public gaol (Gen. xl. 3). Nebuzaradan (2 K. xxv. 8; Jer. xxxix. 9) and Arioch (Dan. ii. 14) held the same office. That the "captain of the guard" himself occasionally performed the duty of an executioner appears from 1 K. ii. 25, 34. The post was one of high dignity, and something beyond the present position of the zâbit of modern Egypt (cp. Lane, i. 163), with which Wilkinson (ii. 45 [1878]) compares it. It is still not unusual for officers of high rank to inflict corporal punishment with their own hands (Wilkinson, ii. 43). The LXX. takes the word in its original sense (cp. 1 Sam. ix. 23), and terms Potiphar chief-cook, ἀρχιμαγειρος.

The Greek σκευολάτρ (Mark vi. 27) is borrowed from the Latin speculator; originally a military spy or scout, but under the emperors transferred to the body-guard, from the vigilance which their office demanded (Tac. Hist. ii. 11; Suet. Claud. 35). [W. L. B.] [F.]

EXILE. [CAPTIVITY; DISPERSION.]

EX'ODUS (Ἔξοδος: called by the Jews, from its opening words, Πῦξ Πῦξ), or more briefly Πῦξ, its usual name), the Second Book of the Pentateuch, carrying on the narrative of the history and antiquities of the Israelitish nation [see GENESIS] from the death of Joseph to the beginning of the second year after the Exodus from Egypt (xl. 1, 17).

I. Contents.

§ 1. (i.) Chs. i.-xii. Events leading to the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt, viz.: a. The increase of Jacob's posterity in Egypt, and their oppression under a new king, who paid no heed to the memory of Joseph (ch. i.); b. The birth and education of Moses, and his flight from Egypt into the land of Midian (ch. ii.); c. The call and commission of Moses to be the deliverer of his people (iii. 1-iv. 26), and preliminary negotiations with the Israelites and Pharaoh (iv. 27-vii. 7); d. The series of signs and wonders by means of which the deliverance from Egypt was at length effected, and the institution of the Passover (vii. 8-xii. 51).

(ii.) Chs. xiii. 1-xix. 2. The journey of the Israelites from Rameses to Sinai: a. The march to the Red Sea, the passage through it, and Moses' song of triumph on the occasion (xii. 37-xv. 21); b. The journey from the Red Sea to Sinai, with particulars of the bitter waters of Marah (xv. 23-6), the giving of quails and manna, and the observance of the Sabbath (ch. xvi.), the miraculous supply of water at Rephidim, and the conflict with Amalek at the same time (ch. xvii.), the meeting with Jethro and the advice given by him to Moses (ch. xviii.).

(iii.) Chs. xix. 3-xl. 38. Events during the first part of the sojourn at Sinai, viz.: a. The solemn establishment of the Theocracy (see xix. 3-8, xxiv. 3-8), on the basis (a) of the Ten Commandments (xx. 1-17); (β) of a code of laws (xx. 23-xxiii. 33), regulating the social life and religious observances of the people (xix. 3-xxiv. 11); b. The giving of instructions to Moses on Mount Sinai, for the construction of the Tabernacle, with the vessels and furniture belonging to it, for the consecration of Aaron and his sons as priests, the selection of Bezaleel and Oholiab to execute the skilled work that was necessary, and the delivery to Moses of the two tables of the Law (xxiv. 12-xxxi. 18); c. The incident of the golden calf, Moses' intercession for the people, and the renewal of the covenant (xxxii.-xxxiv.); d. The construction of the Tabernacle, in its various parts, in accordance with the directions prescribed in chs. xxv.-xxxi., and its erection (xl. 17) on the first day of the second year of the Exodus (xxxv.-xl.): the consecration of the priests in accordance with the injunctions laid down in ch. xxix. is not related till Lev. viii.; some other omissions in xxxv.-xl., as compared with xxv.-xxxi., will be noticed in § 14. In the course of the history, it will be observed, different legislative enactments are interspersed (see, besides the passages that have been specified, chs. xii., xiii., and xxxi. 12-17): the relation of these to one another, and to the narratives with which they are connected, will appear subsequently.

II. Structure and Authorship.

§ 2. The Book of Exodus is a continuation of the narrative of Genesis, and presents the same structural peculiarities. The same two contrasted narratives, the priestly (P) and the prophetic (JE), appear still side by side, each displaying the same phraseological criteria, and each marked by the same differences of representation and style. Referring to the article GENESIS* for an account of the main characteristics of these sources, we proceed to analyse the narrative of Exodus upon the same principles. The interest of P, it will be observed, lies chiefly in the ceremonial institutions of the theocracy, which are described by him at length (xxv.-xxxi., xxxv.-xl.): the parts contributed by him in Exodus, prior to ch. xxv., form an introductory sketch of the main features of the history, constructed upon a similar scale and plan to that adopted in Genesis, and explained in the article on that Book.

* And especially to § 12 on the analysis of JE. It is not the intention of the following Tables to represent this in every detail as final.

* To commanded.

† From and the blood.

‡ To land of Egypt.

² So Jülicher [see § 16]. Dillmann gives vv. 15-23a to J, arguing chiefly from the name Reuel, for which in ch. xviii. 2 (E) we have Jethro. But, as Jülicher remarks, the name Reuel may be here a later insertion: had it originally stood in the narrative, it would have appeared naturally in v. 16, rather than in v. 18.

§ 3. The grounds of the preceding analysis are particularly evident in the account of the negotiations of Moses with Pharaoh, and in the narrative of the Plagues. Both are marked, namely, by a series of systematic differences, pervading the narrative from beginning to end. Thus in the former, the section vi. 2-vii. 13, as seems clear, is not in reality the sequel of iii. 1-vi. 1, but is parallel to it. Chs. iii. 1-vi. 1 (disregarding, for the present, iv. 17, 18, 20b-21) describe the call and commission of Moses, the appointment of Aaron to be his representative with the people (iii. 16; iv. 1, 16), and three signs given to him for the satisfaction of the people: Moses and Aaron have satisfied the people (iv. 31), but the application to Pharaoh has been unsuccessful, and something further is threatened. The continuation of vi. 1, however, is vii. 14; with vi. 2 there begins evidently another account of Moses' call, in which, unlike iv. 31, the people refuse to listen to the promises conveyed to them (vi. 9), and in which, Moses protesting his inability to plead with Pharaoh (not, as before, with the people), Aaron is appointed to be his spokesman with him (vi. 11, 12, 29, 30; vii. 1, 2). The case of Pharaoh's requiring a guarantee is provided for: Aaron's rod is to be thrown down that it may become a reptile (וַיִּשְׁלַח, not וַיִּשְׁלַח, a serpent, as iv. 4), vii. 8 f. Pharaoh's heart, however, is hardened, and the narrative at vii. 13 reaches just the same point as vi. 1. Thus vi. 2-8 is parallel to iii. 6-9, 14, 15; vi. 12b=30 to iv. 10; vii. 1 to iv. 16; vii. 4 f. to iii. 19 f., vi. 1. Corresponding to these material differences, others of expression and style mark each narrative throughout.

§ 4. The principal differences between the two narratives of the Plagues may be arranged as follows: each, it will be noticed, while differing from the other, exhibits several traits connecting it with the corresponding narrative in chs. iii.-vii. 9. In one narrative (P) Aaron cooperates with Moses, and the command is Say unto Aaron . . . (vii. 19, viii. 5 [Heb. 1], 16 [Heb. 12]; so before, vii. 9: even ix. 8, where Moses acts, both are expressly addressed): no demand is ever made of Pharaoh; the sequel is told briefly, usually within the compass of one or two verses; the success or failure of the Egyptian magicians is noted: the hardening of Pharaoh's heart is expressed by חַמְּסוֹ (was strong, or made strong, R. V. marg.), vii. 22, viii. 19 (Heb. 15), ix. 12 (so vii. 13), and the concluding formula is And he hearkened not unto them as the LORD had spoken (vii. 22, viii. 15b [Heb. 11b], 19 [Heb. 15], ix. 12; so vii. 13).

* If Pharaoh, as in the present narrative (ch. v), had already refused to hear Moses, the different, a priori ground alleged in vi. 12 for his hesitation (a ground, moreover, inconsistent with iv. 31) is difficult to understand.

In the other narrative (JE), on the contrary, Moses alone, without Aaron, is commissioned to go to Pharaoh: he addresses Pharaoh himself (in agreement with iv. 10-16, where Aaron is appointed to be his spokesman with the people): a formal demand is regularly made, Let my people go that they may serve me (vii. 16, viii. 1 [Heb. vii. 26], ix. 1, 13; x. 3; so before, in the same narrative, iv. 23, v. 1); upon Pharaoh's refusing, the plague is announced, and takes effect without further human intervention (viii. 24 [Heb. 20], ix. 6), or at a signal given by Moses, not by Aaron (vii. 20, ix. 22 sq., x. 12 sq., 22); the interview with Pharaoh is prolonged, and described in some detail; and the term used to express the hardening of Pharaoh's heart is not חַמְּסוֹ, but כִּבְדוֹ, to be or to make heavy (vii. 14, viii. 15 [Heb. 11], 32 [Heb. 28], ix. 7, 34, x. 1; see R. V. marg.). The style of the narrative generally is more picturesque and varied than that of P; it is marked by recurring phrases, which are, however, different from those of P, as Thus saith the Lord, said regularly to Pharaoh; Behold, with the participle, in the announcement of the plague, Thou, thy people, and thy servants; the expression God of the Hebrews (vii. 16, ix. 1, 13, x. 3, as before, iii. 18, v. 3), and several others which the careful reader will note for himself.

§ 5. Examining JE more particularly, we observe that the main narrative is J, with traces of E.

The reasons for supposing it to be not entirely homogeneous may be stated briefly thus. (i.) The verses iv. 17, 20b-21 stand in no relation to their context; iv. 17 speaks of "the signs" to be performed with the rod, whereas only one sign to be so performed has been described in vv. 1-9; iv. 21 mentions similarly wonders to be done before Pharaoh, whereas vv. 1-9 speak only of credentials for the satisfaction of the people. The verses read, in fact, like fragments from another narrative, which once of course contained the explanations which are now missing, and to which either v. 18 or v. 19 doubtless also belonged (for in the existing narrative both are not required, or, at least, v. 19 should precede v. 18). (ii.) It is observed that in some of the plagues the effect is not brought about immediately by God (as e.g. ix. 6), but Moses, as here directed, uses his rod (vii. 17, 20b; ix. 23; x. 13). It is difficult now not to connect these passages with iv. 17, 20b-21, and to suppose them to have been derived by the compiler from the same source. Many critics are of opinion that other traits in the narrative, especially some which when viewed carefully seem to be redundant, are derived likewise from E. One or two examples (ix. 24a, 35; x. 14a) have been introduced into the Table; but the criteria are slight, and may not be decisive. It is wiser, therefore, to adopt this opinion, if at all, with reserve.

² With v. 31b cp. iii. 12, x. 8, 11; with v. 32, x. 9, 24 (E).
⁶ In ch. xvi. vv. 4 and 5, on material even more than phraseological grounds, must have their source in a different current of narrative from v. 6 sq.; for in vv. 6, 7 (evening and morning, in agreement with vv. 8, 12, fish at evening, and bread at morning) the communication made to the people differs in its terms from that stated in vv. 4, 5 (bread alone) to have been given to Moses; and vv. 25-30 agree with vv. 4, 5. In the text of P, it is remarkable that the instructions to Moses to convey the promise of food to the people (vv. 11, 12) follow the account of the actual delivery of the message, vv. 6-8: if it might be assumed that a transposition had taken place, and that the original order was vv. 1-3, 9-12, 6-8, 13, &c., the consecution of the narrative would be improved. Man in v. 15 is strange: in the sense of "What?" man is a secondary, contracted form, confined to particular Aramaic dialects (Nölske, Syr. Gr. § 68; Wright, Compar. Grammar of the Semitic Languages, p. 126).

§ 7. In chs. xii. and xiii. the double treatment is discernible without difficulty. Notice in P, xii. 1-13^b (Passover); 14-20 (Unleavened Cakes); 28, 37a, 40-42, 51 (narrative); 43-50 (Passover—supplemental); xiii. 1 sq. (Firstborn),* 20:

in JE, xii. 21-7 (Passover); 29-36, 37b, 38 (narrative—continuation of xi. 4-8); 39; xiii. 3-10 (Unleavened Cakes); 11-16 (Firstborn). The connexion between the different parts of each narrative is observable, not merely in technical details, but also in general style and tone. The Passover was followed by the Feast of Mazzoth; but the two are in their origin distinct, and are treated accordingly, especially in JE. The Passover commemorates the sparing of the Israelites (xii. 13, 27), the Feast of Mazzoth the morning of the Exodus (xiii. 3-10; so xii. 17, xxiii. 15), being brought into connexion with the circumstance that through the haste with which the Hebrews left Egypt they were obliged to bake for themselves unleavened cakes on the morrow (xii. 34, 39); the dedication of the Firstborn (xiii. 11-16) is made a memorial of the slaughter of the firstborn of the Egyptians (xii. 29 sq.).

^a In xii. 14 "this day" is the first day of Mazzoth (Unleavened Cakes), not the Passover: cp. Lev. xxiii. 6.
^b In P this injunction is here isolated: the full explanation is first given in Num. iii. 12 sq.; viii. 16-19.

Ch. xii. 21-27 cannot be the original sequel to vv. 1-13. The verses do not describe the execution of the commands enjoined, vv. 1-13: Moses does not repeat to the people, even in an abridged form, the injunctions that he has received; on the contrary, several important points (e.g. the character of the lamb, and the manner in which it was to be eaten) are omitted; and fresh points (the hyssop, the basin, none to leave the house) are mentioned respecting which the instructions just given to him are silent. It seems clear that vv. 21-27 are really part of a different account of the institution of the Passover, which "stands to xii. 3-13 in the same relation that the Mazzoth-ordinance in xii. 3-10 stands to that in xii. 14-20" (Dillm. p. 100). Vv. 25-27 resemble strongly xiii. 3-16 (see vv. 5, 8, 10, 14 sq.), and are no doubt to be referred to the same source, i.e. either J (Dillm.), or the compiler of JE expanding materials derived from J (so Wellh., at least for xiii. 3-16).

If the different laws respecting these feasts be compared, the simplest will be seen to be those in Ex. xxiii. 15, 18; then come those of JE in chs. xii., xiii., and xxxiv. 18-20, 23-25; then Deut. xvi.; lastly, the injunctions of P in Ex. xii. In chs. xii. and xiii. it may be noticed: (1) Passover and Mazzoth are more clearly distinguished in JE than in P; (2) in JE greater stress is laid on their relation with the history and commemorative import; (3) the provisions in P are far more definite and strict than in JE (e.g. xii. 15b, 16, 18, 19b, and the whole of vv. 43-49). It is remarked by Delitzsch that the greater specialization of the ordinances in P creates a strong presumption that they were codified later (Studien, vii. pp. 340, 342).

* To cloud.

† To testimony.

† So Wellh., Dillm.; but admitting that vv. 3-8, the "classical expression in the O. T. of the nature and scope of the theocratic covenant," has been amplified by the compiler of JE, perhaps (Dillm.) with elements derived from J. The sequence of the chapter is in many places imperfect, an indication that it has been formed by a combination of different sources. Thus the natural sequel of v. 3, went up, would be not v. 7, came, but v. 14, went down; v. 9b is superfluous after v. 8b (if, indeed, it be more than a repetition of it, introduced by a clerical error); v. 13b is obscure, and not explained by anything which follows [the "trumpet" of vv. 16, 19 is not the "ram's-horn" of this verse]. In the latter part of the chapter, vv. 20-25 manifestly interrupt the connexion: v. 20 is a repetition of v. 18a ("descended"), and v. 21 of v. 12; v. 25, "and said [יָדַעְתֶּם] unto them" (not, "and told them") should be followed by the words reported, and is entirely disconnected with xx. 1: on the other hand, xx. 1 is the natural continuation of xix. 19. Clearly, two parallel narratives of the theophany on Sinai have been combined together: though it is no longer possible to determine throughout the precise limits of each (see the attempt of Jülicher, pp. 306 sq.). Ch. xix. 20-25 is generally assigned to J: Kuenen regards these verses, together with v. 13b, xxiv. 1-2, 9-11 (which similarly interrupt the connexion in ch. xxiv.), as standing by themselves, and forming part of a third independent narrative of the occurrences at Sinai.

‡ Chs. xxv. 1-xxxl. 18a contain P's account of the instructions given for the construction of the Tabernacle, &c., the sequel following in chs. xxxv.-xl., which describe how these instructions were carried out. On some questions arising out of these sections of P, see below, §§ 13, 14.

§ 9. In chs. xix. 2b-xxiv. (after separating xxiv. 15-18a, which belongs to P, and is the introduction to ch. xxv.) there are two narratives of the occurrences at Sinai, one attached to the Decalogue, the other to the "Book of the Covenant" (i.e. the laws xx. 22-xxiii. 33; see xxiv. 7). The Decalogue, with the narratives attached to it, is generally allowed to belong to E: the Book of the Covenant is considered by Wellhausen (Comp. p. 90) to have formed part of J; but Kuenen (§ 8. 12, 18), Dillmann (p. 220), Jülicher (p. 305), assign it to E, though it is doubtful whether the grounds alleged are decisive. The principal grounds for the separation in ch. xix. have been stated in § 8, note 1. In xx. 1, 19, 20, 21, notice God (not Jehovah), as in xix. 3, 17, 19. The sequel to the "Book of the Covenant" is evidently xxiv. 3-8. Ch. xxiv. 12-14, 18b, on the contrary, form a natural continuation of xx. 18-21: the "elders" in v. 14 cannot well be the seventy mentioned in v. 9 (among whom disputes are not likely to have arisen during Moses' absence), but the elders of the people generally, named as the people's representatives: Moses goes up into the mountain to receive, not merely the tables of stone, but also instruction of a more general kind ("the law and the commandment"), enabling him to speak to the people instead of God, and in accordance with the request, xx. 19 (cp. Deut. v. 27-31). The intermediate verses (xxiv. 1, 2, 9-11) are of uncertain origin. Possibly they are to be regarded as introductory to v. 12 sq., and assigned to E; possibly they form, with xix. 13b, 20-25 (see § 8, note 1), part of an independent narrative, of which only fragments have been preserved.

§ 10. The Decalogue, it need hardly be said, is not the composition of E, but is merely incorporated by him in his narrative. It is repeated, as is well known, in Deut. v. 6-21, where, though it is introduced formally (v. 5, 22) as a verbal quotation, it presents in fact considerable differences, especially in the fourth, fifth, and tenth commandments, from the text of Exodus. The variations are manifestly due to the author of Deuteronomy, whose style and characteristic thought they mostly exhibit.⁴ It is the opinion, however, of many critics,⁵ based in part upon the fact of this varying text, that the primitive form of the Decalogue was not that in which it appears now even in Exodus; but that originally it consisted merely of the Commandments themselves, all expressed with the same terseness exhibited still by the first, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth, and that the explanatory comments appended in the case of the others were only added subsequently (probably by the compiler of JE). These comments, in the case of Ex. xx. 10b, 12, bear a singular resemblance to the style of Deuteronomy; so that, unless (as has been supposed) they can have been introduced here from Deuteronomy itself, they must be regarded as belonging to the class of passages in Exodus indicated in DEUTERONOMY, § 34, as being the source of some of the expressions which in their entirety give to Deuteronomy its peculiar and distinctive colouring (ib. § 36). The case of Ex. xx. 11, however (which is not found in Deuteronomy), is somewhat different. Not only does this verse form no model for the style of Deuteronomy, but it is alien in style to JE; while on the other hand it resembles closely two passages of P, Ex. xxxi. 17b, Gen. ii. 2b: hence, as it is not perhaps very probable that it would have been omitted when the Decalogue was incorporated in Deuteronomy, had it already formed part of it, the conjecture is not an unreasonable one that it was introduced into the text of Exodus, after Deuteronomy was written, on the basis of the two passages of P just referred to.

§ 11. The laws contained in the "Book of the Covenant" (xx. 22-xxiii. 33) comprise two elements (xxiv. 3), the "words" (or commands) and the "judgments:" the latter, expressed all hypothetically, occupy xxi. 1-xxii. 17 (Heb. 16), 25a (24a), 26 (25), xxiii. 4 sq.; the former occupy the rest of the section to xxiii. 19: what follows, xxiii. 20 sq., annexing a promise in case of obedience, imparts, as Wellh. observes, to the preceding law-book the character of a "covenant" (cp. xxiv. 7). The laws themselves are taken naturally from a pre-existing source, in most cases (as it seems) without alteration of form, though most critics are of opinion that here and there slight parenthetic additions have been made by the compiler: for instance, xxii. 21b-22 (observe in v. 23 [Heb. 22] him, he, his in the Hebrew, pointing back to the sinj. "sojourner" in v. 21); perhaps also in xxiii. 23-25a. The verses xxiii. 4 sq. will hardly be in their original position, for the context (on both sides) relates to a different matter, viz. just judgment.

The laws are designed to regulate the life of a community living under simple conditions of society, and devoted chiefly to agriculture. After some introductory directions respecting the erection of altars xx. 24-26, there follow the דְּבָרֵי (xxi. 1), embodying in its main principles the civil and criminal law of the ancient Hebrews, and (xxiii. 14 sq.) certain elementary religious observances. Slavery, murder and manslaughter, manstealing, injuries to life or limb, injuries caused by culpable neglect (as by permitting an unruly animal to be at large, or opening a pit negligently), theft, burglary, damage caused by straying animals or fire to a neighbour's field, neglect in the care of deposits and loans, seduction, witchcraft, idolatry (xxii. 20), usury and pledges, veracity in matters affecting a neighbour's character, and impartiality in judgment (xxiii. 1-3, 6-9) are, in outline, the subjects dealt with in the code: intermixed (xxii. 21, 22-24, 29-31; xxiii. 4, 5) or appended (xxiii. 9, 10-12, 14-19) are precepts touching various religious and moral duties (as oppression of strangers or of others unable to protect themselves, the offering of firstlings and first-fruits, the prohibition to eat חֵרֶב; the injunction xxiii. 4 sq. not to refuse help to an enemy in his need, the sacred seasons—viz. the Sabbatical year and the Sabbath [of both of which the scope, as here defined, is a philanthropic one], the three annual pilgrimages). The character of the society for the use of which the code is designed, is evident from the conditions of life which it presupposes, and the cases which it contemplates as likely to arise: notice, for instance, the frequency with which the ox, the sheep, and the ass are mentioned—they form even the typical example of the "deposit," xxii. 9, 10—and the allusions to agricultural life in xxi. 33 sq., xxii. 5, 6, xxiii. 10 sq., 16. The only forms of punishment prescribed are retaliation and pecuniary compensation. Definite rights are secured to the slave. Women do not enjoy the same social equality with men. The Ger, or sojourner, living under the protection of a family or the community, has no legal status, but he must not be oppressed.^f It is interesting to compare the Laws of the Twelve Tables, or the Laws of Solon (preserved in Plutarch, Viz. Solonis), which in many respects presuppose a similar condition of society. In what way this code (with additions not of course to be neglected) is made the basis of the later legislation of Deuteronomy (chs. xii.-xxvi.) has been shown in the article on that Book.

§ 12. The sequel of JE's narrative in chs. ix.-xxiv. is xxxi. 18b-xxxiv. 28, comprising the narrative of the Golden Calf and incidents arising out of it. Ch. xxxii. as a whole may be assigned plausibly to E, only vv. 11-13 being somewhat unlike E's usual style and manner, and having been perhaps expanded by the compiler of JE (cp. Gen. xxii. 16-18, to which in v. 13 allusion is made). Chs. xxxii. 34, xxxiii. 1-6 exhibit traces of a double narrative—in v. 5b, for instance, the people are commanded to do what they have already done (v. 4b)—which confirms the primâ facie view that vv. 5a, 6 are doublets of vv. 3b, 4b. The complication is recognised by critics,* but no generally accepted analysis of the entire passage has been effected.

Ch. xxxiii. 7-11 is an interesting passage, which, as the tenses in the original show,^h describes throughout Moses' habitual practice (v. 7, "used to take and pitch," &c.). In its original connexion it is not improbable that it was preceded by an account of the construction of the "Tent of Meeting," and of the Ark,ⁱ of which the Tent was to be the depository, which, it may be conjectured, was the purpose for which the ornaments, vv. 4-6, were employed: when the narrative was combined with that of P, this part of it was probably omitted on the ground that it was no longer needed by the side of the fuller description in chs. xxv., xxxv., &c.

Chs. xxxiii. 12-xxxiv. 9 form a continuous whole: as it is difficult to determine whether it belongs definitely to J or to the compiler of JE, it is printed in the Table in the line between the J and the E lines. Ch. xxxiv. 10-26^k introduces the terms of the covenant, v. 27: it agrees substantially, often even verbally, with the theocratic section of the "Book of the Covenant" (xxxiii. 10 sq.), the essential conditions of which appear to be repeated here, with some enlargement (especially in the warning against idolatry, vv. 12-17), as the terms on which the removal of the covenant is granted.

The structure of JE's narrative in chs. xix.-xxiv., xxxii.-xxxiv. is complicated. The narrative appears indeed to exhibit unambiguous marks of composition; but when the attempt is made to distribute it in detail between the different narrators, the criteria are frequently indecisive; and it is possible to frame more than one hypothesis which will account, at least apparently, for the facts. Similarly the relation of the Code xxxiv. 10 sq. to the very similar Code in xxxiii. 10 sq. is not perfectly evident, and may be differently explained. Wellhausen, Dillmann, Jülicher, and Kuenen have displayed in their treatment of the subject surprising ability and acuteness: but beyond a certain point their conclusions diverge; and even the most plausible cannot claim to be more than a possible interpretation of the facts. The writer has accordingly made no attempt to do more than indicate the broad and patent lines of demarcation which occur in the narrative. In all probability it reached its present form by a series of stages, which can no longer be wholly disengaged with certainty.¹

§ 13. We may now revert to chs. xxv.-xxxi. 18a, which contain P's account of the instructions given to Moses respecting the Tabernacle and the priesthood. The instructions fall into two parts, chs. xxv.-xxix and chs. xxx.-xxxi. The contents of chs. xxv.-xxix. relate to (1) the vessels of the Sanctuary (ch. xxv.); (2) the Tabernacle, its curtains, boards, Veil, and Screen at the entrance (ch. xxvi.); (3) the Court round the Tabernacle, containing the Altar of Burnt-offering (ch. xxvii.); (4) the vestments (ch. xxviii.) and rite of consecration (xxix. 1-37) of the priests; (5) the daily Burnt-offering, the maintenance of which is a primary duty of the priesthood (xxix. 38-42), followed by what appears to be the close of the entire body of instructions (xxix. 43-46), in which Jehovah promises to bless the sanctuary thus established with His abiding presence. Chs. xxx.-xxxi. relate to (1) the Altar of Incense (xxx. 1-10); (2) the maintenance of public service (xxx. 11-16); (3) the Brazen Laver (xxx. 17-21); (4) the holy Anointing Oil (xxx. 22-33); (5) the Incense (xxx. 34-38); (6) the nomination of Bezaleel and Oholiab (xxxi. 1-11); (7) the observance of the Sabbath (xxxi. 12-17).

A critical question of some difficulty here arises in connexion with the relation of chs. xxx.-xxxi. to chs. xxv.-xxix. It is surprising to find the Altar of Incense, which from its importance might have seemed to demand a place in ch. xxv. (among the other vessels of the Tabernacle), mentioned for the first time in xxx. 1-10, where the directions respecting the essential parts of the Tabernacle are seemingly complete (ch. xxix. 44-46): even in xxvi. 34 sq. (where the position of the vessels of the Sanctuary is defined) it is not named. Moreover, whereas in Ex. xxx. 10 an annual rite to be observed in connexion with it is enjoined, in the ceremony for the day of atonement, described in detail in Lev. xvii., no notice of such a rite is to be found, and only one altar, the Altar of Burnt-offering, is mentioned throughout the chapter. Further, a number of passages occur in which the Altar of Burnt-offering is described as "the altar," implying, apparently, that there was no other (e.g. chs. xxviii.-xxix.; Lev. i.-iii., v.-vi., viii., ix., xvi.). It is argued,^m on these grounds, that the original legislation of P mentioned no Altar of Incense (incense being only offered on censers, Lev. xvi. 12, &c.), and that both this and other passages in which it is spoken of (xxx. 27, xxxi. 8, xxxv. 15, xxxvii. 25, xxxix. 38, xl. 5, 26; Lev. iv. 7, 18; Num. iv. 11), or which term "the Altar" of xxvii. 1, &c., as though for distinction, "the Altar of Burnt-offering" (as xxx. 28, xxxi. 9, xxxv. 16, xxxviii. 1, xl. 6, 10, 29; Lev. iv.) or "the Brazen Altar" (xxxviii. 30, xxxix. 39), belong to a secondary and posterior stratum of P. The other subjects treated in chs. xxx.-xxxi. (above, 2-7) are either such as would naturally find place in an Appendix, or (remarkably enough) occasion difficulties similar to those arising out of the mention of the Altar of Incense. Thus in xxix. 7, Lev. viii. 12, the ceremony of anointing is confined to the chief priest (Aaron); in xxx. 30 it is extended to the ordinary priests (his "sons"). The same extension recurs in xviii. 41, xl. 15; Lev. vii. 36, x. 7; Num. iii. 3. That the ceremony was limited originally to Aaron seems, however, to be confirmed by the title "the Anointed Priest" applied to the chief priest (Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16, vi. 22 [Heb. 15]: cp. Ex. xxix. 29 sq.; Lev. xvi. 32, xxi. 10, 12; Num. xxxv. 25), which, if the priests generally were anointed, would be destitute of any distinctive significance.

These arguments are undoubtedly forcible. It is true, the use of the term "the Altar" for the Altar of Burnt-offering might in itself be explained by the supposition that it was so styled κατ' ἔξοχην, in passages where there was no danger of confusion with any other altar; but in order to be properly estimated, the usage must of course be viewed in connexion with the other circumstances referred to. In considering the argument based on the silence of Lev. xvi., Delitzsch (Studien, iii. p. 117) admits that "were Lev. xvi. silent as to the Altar of Incense, the distinction drawn by Wellhausen between two strata of P would be established:" he contends, however, that this altar is alluded to in r. 18. Dillmann, on the contrary (with Oehler, Keil, &c.), considers—as it seems, justly—that the order of the ceremonial in Lev. xvi. 16b-18 supports the view that the Altar of Burnt-offering (outside the Tabernacle) is referred to in r. 18: admitting thus that the Altar of Incense is not alluded to, he is obliged to own that at least Ex. xxx. 10 is an addition to the original law, designed for the purpose of supplementing Lev. xvi. 16b. But, even with this concession, it remains that, whatever be the explanation,* in the body of instructions contained in Ex. xxv.-xxx. the Altar of Incense holds a secondary place.

The extension of the ceremony of anointing to the ordinary priests is allowed by Dillmann (pp. 463 sq.) to be evidence that the passages so mentioning it are of secondary origin, unless, with Kurtz, it could be assumed that the rite alluded to is the sprinkling with oil and blood noticed in Ex. xxix. 21, Lev. viii. 30, which, however, is not termed "anointing," and is subsequent to the anointing proper (Ex. xxix. 7; Lev. viii. 12). It is doubtful, therefore, whether this explanation is admissible; and in his final discussion of the sources of the Pent. (NDJ, p. 635), Dillmann himself implicitly rejects it, for he remarks there that the entire section xxx. 17-38 (together with xxxi. 7-11) appears to be a later insertion. The section on the Sabbath (xxi. 12-17), as has been frequently remarked (e.g. by Delitzsch, Studien, xii. p. 622), has in

* Dillmann suggests that it may have been partly due to the writer's historic consciousness that the Altar of Incense did not form part of the original idea of a Tabernacle, as the Table, Candlestick, and Altar of Burnt-offering did: Del. supposes that the Divine idea of the Tabernacle took shape gradually in the legislator's mind, and that the need of an Incense-Altar was only realised by him after the plan of the Tabernacle as a whole (chs. xxv.-xxxix) had been completed.

rr. 13-14a affinities with the Code (the "Law of Holiness") of which extracts have been preserved in Lev. xvii.-xxvi.; and the inference is probably a just one, that that Code is the ultimate source of the verses referred to.*

§ 14. Chs. xxxv.-xl. form the sequel to chs. xxv.-xxx., narrating the execution of the instructions there communicated to Moses. Much is repeated verbatim, with the simple change of future tenses into past: there are, however, a few cases of omission or abridgment, and the order is different. The change of order is in most cases intelligible. The injunction respecting the Sabbath, which stands last in the instructions, occupies here the first place (xxxv. 1-3). Next follow the presentation of offerings by the people, and the appointment of Bezaleel and Oholiab to superintend the work (xxxv. 4-xxxvi. 7). In the account of the execution of the work, the Tabernacle stands first (xxxvi. 8-38); then follow the sacred vessels to be placed in it (ch. xxxvii.), the Altar and Laver with the Court surrounding them (xxxviii. 1-20), and particulars of the amount of metal employed (xxxviii. 21-31). The Sanctuary being thus completed, the dress of the Priests is prepared (xxxix. 1-31), and the entire work delivered to Moses (xxxix. 32-43.) Finally, ch. xl. narrates how the Tabernacle was erected, and its various vessels arranged in order. The Altar of Incense and the Brazen Laver, it will be noticed, which appear in the Appendix to chs. xxv.-xxix (viz. in ch. xxx.), are here mentioned in accordance with the place which they properly hold (viz. xxxvii. 25-28; xxxviii. 8). A few unimportant verses (as xxv. 15, 22, 40) are not repeated at all; some other notices (as xxv. 16, 21, 30, 37b), chiefly relating to the position of the various vessels named, are not repeated in their corresponding place, but transferred (in substance) to xl. 17-33; the only material omissions are the notices of the Urim and Thummim (xxviii. 30), the Consecration of Priests (xxix. 1-37), which is deferred till Lev. viii., the oil for the lamps (xxvii. 20 sq.), and the Daily Burnt-offering (xxix. 38-42), for the repetition of which there would scarcely be occasion. The principal instance of abridgment is xxxvii. 29, where the sections dealing with the Anointing Oil and the Incense (xxx. 22-33, 34-38) are merely referred to briefly. In ch. xxxix., as compared with ch. xxxvi., some other cases may also be noticed.

These chapters, like ch. xxx. sq., are treated by Wellhausen and Kuenen as belonging to a secondary stratum of P. If the secondary nature of ch. xxx. sq. be admitted, this conclusion will indeed follow of necessity: in chs. xxxv.-xxxix. the notices referring to ch. xxxi. sq. are introduced in their proper order, and ch. xl. alludes to the Altar of Incense: chs. xxxv.-xl. thus presuppose chs. xxx.-xxxix. as well as chs. xxv.-xxx. There are also other grounds, peculiar to these chapters, thought to point in the same direction, for which it must suffice to refer to Kuenen's carefully-written note (Hez. § 6. 16).[†]

* See LEVITICUS; or the writer's Introduction to the Literature of the O. T. (1891), pp. 43 sq., 54.

[†] E.g., ch. xxxviii. 24-28, besides presupposing (in the figure 603,550) the census of Num. 1., appears to imply a misunderstanding of xxx. 11-16, as though the contribution imposed there for the maintenance of the service of the Sanctuary were designed to meet the cost of its construction.

Dillmann, though in EL. p. 354 sq. he had expressed himself in a different sense, in his final review of the contents of P (NDJ. p. 635) adopts virtually the same opinion, supposing the original nucleus of the six chapters to have been limited to xxxv. 1-3, 4-5, 20 sq.; xxxvi. 2-6; xl. 1 sq., 34-38, and considering the rest (which presupposes chs. xxv.-xxxl. in its present form) to be of later origin.

As soon as the Priest's Code is examined with sufficient minuteness, the question of its stratification—i.e. the question whether all its parts are perfectly consistent, and belong to the same stage of Hebrew legislation—forces itself upon the reader's attention; though the problem which thus arises can hardly be said to have been as yet adequately grappled with.

§ 15. The text of Exodus, with but few exceptions, appears to be free from corruptions. The question of the origin and probable date of the sources of which it is composed will be considered under the article PENTATEUCHI, where also their most characteristic literary features will be noticed. The "Egyptianisms," it perhaps need hardly be remarked, which Canon Cook affects to discover in the Book,^a and which Canon Rawlinson accepts as well-established fact,^b are purely imaginary: the language is as genuinely Hebrew as the language of Samuel or Isaiah; and the few words of foreign origin which it exhibits (except, of course, certain proper names) are simply such as were naturalized in Hebrew, just as words like paradise or palanquin are naturalized among ourselves.

EXODUS, THE. The object of this article is to describe the Exodus chiefly in its geographical aspect, and to give the results arrived at in the latest researches on this great event. The chronology and history will be only shortly referred to, having been treated more fully in other articles.

1. Date.—The date of the Exodus is discussed under CHRONOLOGY. Most Egyptologists consider that this great event took place under Menepthah, the son of Rameses II., and that it was facilitated by the troubles which beset the beginning of Menepthah's reign, especially by the invasion of Mediterranean nations which threatened his throne. Lepsius puts the Exodus in the year 1314 B.C. The date most commonly adopted is 1312; but it varies according to the views taken of Egyptian chronology. Lately, Dr. Mahler of Vienna, explaining the plague of darkness as a solar eclipse, has fixed the 27th of March, 1335 B.C., as the day and year of the Exodus. It would thus fall, not in the reign of Menepthah, but under Rameses II., whose reign the Viennese astronomer has calculated to have lasted from 1347 to 1280 B.C. If we adopt Dr. Mahler's calculation as to the Exodus, it raises a considerable historical difficulty, for it is hardly possible to admit that the Hebrews should have left Egypt at the beginning of the reign of Rameses II., when the king was at the pinnacle of his might and power (cp. PSBA. xii. 167 sq., xiii. 439 sq.).

2. History.—The Exodus is a great turning-point in Biblical history. With it the Patriarchal dispensation ends and the Law begins, and with it the Israelites cease to be a family and become a nation. It is therefore important to observe how the previous history led up to this event. The advancement of Joseph, and the placing of his kinsmen in what was to a pastoral people "the best of the land," favoured the multiplying of the Israelites, and the preservation of their nationality. The subsequent persecution bound them more firmly together, and at the same time loosened the hold that Egypt had gained upon them. It was thus that the Israelites were ready when Moses declared his mission to go forth as one man from the land of their bondage.

The history of the Exodus itself commences with the close of that of the Ten Plagues. [PLAGUES OF EGYPT.] In the night in which, at midnight, the firstborn were slain (Ex. xii. 29), Pharaoh urged the departure of the Israelites (cv. 31, 32). They at once set forth from Rameses (cv. 37, 39), apparently during the night (c. 42), but towards morning, on the 15th day of the first month (Num. xxxiii. 3). They made three journeys and encamped by the Red Sea. Here the vanguard of Pharaoh's army, his chariots and horses, overtook them, and the great miracle occurred by which they were saved.

3. Geography.—The determination of the route taken by the Israelites when they left Egypt is a difficult and much discussed question, on which, however, recent excavations have thrown some light. The Hebrews were settled in the land of Goshen, which originally was the region between the present towns of Belbeis, Zagazig, and the site called Tell el-Kebir, and belonged to the nome of Heliopolis. When the people increased in number, they extended north towards Tanis (Zoan), south towards Heliopolis, and east in the Wady Tuineilât [GOSHEN]. They carried with them the name "land of Goshen," which applied to all the territory in which they were settled; but the centre, Goshen proper, was the region originally assigned to them, also called "land of Rameses." It contained the city of Rameses, the site of which has not yet been identified. It is from there that they started; there, between Tell el-Kebir and Zagazig, was their place of meeting, to which flocked the people scattered north and south towards Tanis and Heliopolis. We do not know where the king was living when those events took place; it has generally been admitted that it was at Tanis, but it may have been at Bubastis, a much nearer locality, which was then a city of great importance, and a favourite residence of the Pharaohs.

Map to illustrate the Exodus.

In going to the land of Canaan they had the choice between two roads. One went through Tanis and crossed the Pelusiac branch of the Nile at the place now called Kantarah; soon afterwards it reached the coast of the Mediterranean, and from there the frontiers of the Philistines. This road is called in Scripture (Ex. xiii. 17) "the way of the land of the Philistines," which the Hebrews were to avoid, for they would have had to conquer or to march round important strongholds and cities occupied by large garrisons which would have imperilled considerably their journey. This statement,

"God led them not by the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near" (Ex. xiii. 17), would alone be sufficient to refute the opinion of Schleiden (Die Landenge von Sués), who considers the הַיָּם הַסּוּף , Yam Suph, as being not the Red Sea, but Lake Serbonis, on the coast of the Mediterranean; and who makes the Hebrews follow a track of sand between the lake and the sea.

The other route, through which Moses led the people, followed the valley now called Wády Tumeilát, and reached the desert near the present town of Ismailia. It was on this way that Jacob had arrived several hundred years before, since we know that the place where he met Joseph was Pithom-Heropolis. [PITHOM.] This road skirted the northern end of the Red Sea, which at that time extended much further north than now, comprising not only the Bitter Lakes, but very likely also Lake Timsah. The opinions differ as to the exact spot where the Hebrews crossed the Yam Suph, the "sea of reeds;" but the scholars and travellers who have dealt with the subject lately, agree on one point, that the place of the crossing must be looked for north of Suez.

Rameses, the starting-place, must not be considered the name of a city, but as referring to the land of Rameses. [RAMESES.] It is more natural to suppose that the camping-ground and the place of meeting for a large multitude was a district rather than a city, which could have contained only a small portion of the departing people. From there to the border of the desert of Étham the distance to be travelled over was about thirty miles.

The first station after Rameses was Succoth, a Hebrew word meaning "tents." It seems to be a well-appropriated name for the resting-place of a nomad population; but as it refers to a locality situated in Egypt, it is more natural to take Succoth as an Egyptian word which has been slightly distorted in its form, so as to have a meaning in the language of the Hebrews, though retaining nearly the same sound as in Egyptian. Succoth is not a city, it is a district, and may be considered as an altered form of the Egyptian name Thuket or Thukut, a region the capital of which was the city of Pithom. This identification, proposed first by Brugsch, has been adopted by Ebers, Lieblein, and other Egyptologists.

From Succoth, pushing straightforward, the Hebrews reached "Étham in the edge of the wilderness" (Ex. xiii. 20). All the desert east of the present Suez Canal, where the Israelites marched three days after having crossed the sea, was called the desert of Étham. This name is transcribed by the Septuagint 'Οθάμ (Ex. xiii. 20) and Βουθάν (Num. xxxiii. 6). It has been suggested that Étham was the Egyptian word chetem, meaning "an enclosure," "a fort," and that it referred either to the fortified wall which the Pharaohs raised in the isthmus in order to be protected against invasions of the Asiatic nomads (Ebers, Gosen, p. 522), or to some stronghold of which we cannot fix exactly the site (Brugsch, Dict. Géogr., p. 646; Knobel-Dillmann on Exod. xiv. 2). This etymology seems doubtful, for the reason that the Hebrew language has also the root חָתַם , with the same sense; and it is not easy to understand why the Hebrews should have modified the word as if it had been strange to them, while they had it in their own language in the same form, and with the same meaning. Étham can also be compared to the region of Atuma or Atima, mentioned several times in the papyri as bordering on Egypt, and inhabited by nomad shepherds (Naville, Pithom, p. 28).

Following the Wády Tumeilát, along the canal dug by Rameses II., parallel in its direction to the present Freshwater Canal, the Hebrews had reached the wilderness, with the intention of taking a desert route, the entrance of which is still to be recognised, when they received a command which at first sight seemed to throw them entirely out of their way (Ex. xiv. 2, R.V.): "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, that they turn back and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon: over against it shall ye encamp by the sea."

By this command they were compelled, after having perhaps retraced their steps for a short way, to make a right angle, and to march south, so as to put the sea between themselves and the desert. The place where they were to camp is pointed out minutely, the neighbouring localities being indicated as landmarks; but the sites can only be determined by conjecture, and the identifications proposed differ considerably. For the expression $\text{לְפָנַי פִּי־הַחִירוֹת}$, "before Pi-hahiroth," the Septuagint have the following translations: ἀπέναντι τῆς ἐραβλαεὸς (Ex. xiv. 2, 9), ἐπὶ στόμα Εἰρώθ (Num. xxxiii. 7; see Swete's text), ἀπέναντι Εἰρώθ (v. 8). Here again several interpretations have been suggested.

Jablonski proposes the Coptic ΠΙ ΔΧΙ ΡΩΤ , "the place where sedge grows," which would correspond to the localities called at present Ghuweybet-el-boos, "the bed of reeds." This etymology has been adopted by Ebers, while Brugsch has advocated another translation derived from Semitic roots: "the entrance of the caverns or of the pits," βάραθρα (Dict. Géogr. p. 97). It is also possible that Pi-hahiroth should only be a modified form of Pi kerehet, the house of the serpent, the name of a sanctuary of Osiris belonging to the nome of Pithom, and nearer the sea. [PI-HAHIROTH.]

We know with certainty that there was a city of Migdol, Μάγδαλον (Jer. xlii. 1, xlii. 14; Ezek. xxix. 10, xxx. 6), on the north-eastern frontier of the land, the present Tell es Semut, twelve miles from Pelusium according to the Itinerary of Antoninus; but the name mentioned here clearly refers to another place. The word maktar or maktal exists also in the Egyptian language, with a fortified wall as determinative, and it means, as in Hebrew, "a tower." We know of a "tower of Seti I.;" and there must have been many watch-towers in Egypt, especially on the border, just as in Italy there are a great number of "Torre." Baal-zephon is a place where the Semitic god Baal was worshipped. The name is formed like Baal-Gad, Baal-Hamon. According to Philo, Zaphon was the Phœnician name for the North wind. Baal-zephon, mentioned in a papyrus as Baal Zapuna, would thus be Baal of the North, or the North wind, and might be located, according to Tischendorf and Ebers, on one of the heights overhanging the Red Sea. The name being Semitic, it is natural look for the site on the eastern side of the lake, opposite the camp,—ἔξω πύργου, according to the Septuagint.

From the scanty information we possess of these localities, different roads have been proposed for the crossing of the sea. Ebers makes the Israelites change their course near the present city of Ismailia, and march south along the Great Lakes nearly as far as Suez. Pi-hahiroth for him the ruined castle of Agerud, about 15 miles north-west of Suez. Migdol is near the present Shalouf el Terraba, on the east side of the present canal; and Baal-zephon the summit of Mount Atakah, south of Suez, towering over the Red Sea, and visible from a great distance. The Hebrews would have crossed in the passes which are immediately north of Suez. This is the most southern route proposed, and advocated also by Professor Godet (Bibl. annotée, 415). An objection to which it is open, is its very long march which the Hebrews would have had to make when they turned round at Itham, in order to reach their new camp at Pi-hahiroth.

Sir W. Dawson, who explored the place in 1883, has come to the following conclusion (Modern Science in Bible Lands, p. 389):—"After somewhat careful examination of the country; believe that only one place can be found to satisfy the conditions of the Mosaic narrative; namely, the south part of the Bitter Lake, between station Fayid on the railway and station Benefeh. Near this place are some inconsiderable ancient ruins, and flats covered with rusco and Scirpus, which may represent Pi-hahiroth. On the west is the very conspicuous peak known as Jebel Shebremet, more than 50 feet high (Migdol), commanding a very wide prospect, and forming a most conspicuous object to the traveller approaching from the north. Opposite, in the Arabian desert, rises the prominent northern point of the Jebel er-abah, marked on the maps as Jebel Maksheih, and which may have been the Baal-zephon of Moses. Here there is also a basin-like plain, suitable for an encampment, and at its north-west the foot of Jebel Shebremet juts out so as to form a narrow pass, easy of defence. Here is the Bitter Lake narrows, and its shallower part begins, and a north-east wind, combined with a low tide, would produce the greatest possible effect in lowering the water."

The route which is advocated by the author of this article, and which seems to him to agree with the results of the excavations in the Delta, as well as with the Biblical narrative, is the more northern one, between the Bitter Lakes and Lake Timsah. The Israelites, arriving near the present city of Ismailia, receive the order to turn to the south and to march along the sea as far as a place where the sea was narrow, the water shallow, and where there was a watch-tower (Migdol), which is supposed to have been on the hill where many centuries afterwards the Greeks erected a stele, and which has been called by the French engineers the Serapeum. Pi-hahiroth would be the Egyptian city of Pikerehet, a sanctuary of Osiris, which is represented now by the ruins situate at the place where the canal issues out of Lake Timsah, at the foot of Gebel Miriam. Baal-zephon would be a sanctuary on a hill, on the other side of the sea, an isolated place of worship, like the so-called sheikhs of the present day. This view, which is that of Linant, who derives it chiefly from geological arguments, has been adopted by Lieblein, Poole, and by the author of the Suez Canal, Lesseps.

The route of the Exodus has called forth a great number of books and papers, the latest of which are: Ebers, Durch Gosen zum Sinai, 2nd ed.; Linant, Mémoire sur les principaux travaux d'utilité publique exécutés en Égypte, p. 137 sq.; Lieblein, Handel und Schifffahrt auf dem Rothen Meere; Sir W. Dawson, Egypt and Syria, p. 43 sq.; Modern Science in Bible Lands, p. 382 sq.; Naville, The Store City of Pithom and the Route of the Exodus, 3rd ed. [Memoirs of the Egypt Exploration Fund]. EXORCIST (ἔξορκιστής; exorcista). The word exorcist occurs only once in the Bible (Acts xix. 13), and is then employed as a designation of persons who professed to cast out evil spirits by exorcising them, i.e. by adjuring them by some potent name or spell, to come out of those whom they possessed (ἄρτιζω ὑμᾶς τὸν Ἰησοῦν, Acts, l. c.; cp. ἔξορκώσις, ἀρκώσις; Joseph. Ant. viii. 2, § 5). The cognate verb (ἔξορκίζω) is found once in the N. T. and once in the LXX. Version of the O. T.; but in both of these places it is used in its classical sense of administering an oath to a person, or charging him with an oath, and as a synonym of the simple verb (ἀρκίζω) in the same sense (cp. Matt. xxvii. 63, with Mark v. 7; Gen. xxiv. 3, Heb. אָנֹכִי אֶשְׁבַּע, "I will make thee swear," with v. 37; Demoth. 1265-6. See also 1 Thess. v. 27, where ἐξορκίζω is the generally accepted reading).

The use of the word "exorcists" in the passage from the Acts, as a recognised description of certain "strolling Jews," confirms what we know from other sources as to the practice of exorcism among the Jews. The only example of anything at all resembling the practice in the O. T., though as regards the means employed it is not properly an exorcism, is the familiar instance of David playing on his harp before Saul, when "an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him" (1 Sam. xvi. 14). The effect of David's playing is said to have been that "Saul was refreshed and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him" (v. 23). The way in which both the malady and its cure are spoken of by the servants of Saul (v. 16) shows that the idea of demoniacal possession and of deliverance from it was familiar to the Jews of that day. Passing to the N. T., we find our Lord Himself recognising not only the prevalence, but in some cases at least the efficacy, of exorcism among the Jews of His own day. When the nature of the charge brought against Him by the Pharisees, and the circumstances under which it was brought, are taken into account, it is impossible to regard His question to them, "If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your disciples (viol) cast them out?" (Matt. xii. 27) as anything short of an admission, that there were instances in which exorcism was successfully practised by the disciples of the Pharisees. The only alternative is to degrade Him, morally and intellectually, to the level of His adversaries, and to suppose, that in order to silence or conciliate them, He credited them with a power which He and they alike knew to be simulated. The remark of the people on another occasion, when our Lord had cast out a devil, "It was never so seen in Israel," and the wonder they evinced, may have been called forth, as Alford suggests, by the manner rather than by the fact of the cure (Matt. ix. 33; cp. Mark ii. 12). Justin Martyr has an interesting suggestion as to the possibility of a Jew of his day successfully exorcising a devil, by employing the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (ἀλλ' εἰ ἔρα ἐφορκίῃσι τις ὤμων κατὰ τοῦ θεοῦ Ἀβραὰμ καὶ θεοῦ Ἰσαὰκ καὶ θεοῦ Ἰακώβ, Ἰσως ὑποταγήσεται [τὸ δαιμόνιον], Dial. cum Tryph. c. 85, p. 311, C. See also Apol. ii. c. 6, p. 45, B, where he claims for Christianity superior but not necessarily exclusive power in this respect. Compare the statements of Iren. adr. Haeres. ii. 5, and the authorities quoted by Grotius on Matt. xii. 27). But Justin goes on to say that the Jewish exorcists, as a class, had sunk down to the superstitious rites and usages of the heathen ("Ἦδη μέντοι οἱ ἐξ ὤμων ἐπορκιστὰι τῆ τέχνη, ὡσπερ καὶ τὰ ἔθνη, χρώμενοι ἐφορκίῃσιν καὶ θυμιάμασι καὶ καταθέσμοις χρώνται, εἰπον). It accords with experience, that the decay of a religious system should be marked by the profane and spurious imitation of spiritual powers which were once really, though it may be exceptionally, possessed by its adherents. "Non habebant quidem Judaei exorcistas ex Legis praescripto: verum scimus Deum, ut in foederis sui fide pro quoque cultu illos retineret, suam inter eos praesentiam variis miraculis subinde testatum esse. Ita fieri potuit ut invocato Dei nomine daemones fugarent. Populus vero talem Dei virtutem expertus, ordinarium sibi munus temere instituit" (Calvin on Matt. xii. 27). The driving away of an evil spirit by fumigation, as described in the Book of Tobit (viii. 2, 3), though not strictly an exorcism, is an example of such perversion. Josephus, after asserting of Solomon, τρόπους ἐφορκώσεων κατέλιπεν, οἷς ἐνδόμυνα τὰ δαιμόνια ὡς μηκέτ' ἐπαλεθεῖν ἐκδιώκουσι, says that he himself had seen one Eleazar, a Jew, releasing people from the power of demons by the method of Solomon, in the presence of Vespasian and his sons and soldiers (Ant. viii. 2, § 5). In another place (Bell. Jud. vii. 6, § 3) he has a wild story of exorcism by the use of a root, called Baaras, from the name of the place where it grows. It was the profane use by strolling impostors of the name of Jesus, as a charm or spell to dispossess evil spirits, that issued in the disastrous failure recorded in the Book of the Acts (xix. 13 sq.).

The Christian miracle of casting out devils, whether as performed by Christ or by His apostles and followers, is never called by the name of exorcism in the N. T.; nor does it appear that adjuration was used in performing it. The simple word of command, coming as it did from His lips "with authority and power" (Luke iv. 36, cp. Mark i. 27), was enough in the case of our Lord to ensure the result, though, in some instances at least, that word rose, and should seem, to special dignity and solemnity, and was not obeyed without marked tokens of resistance. The word most commonly used by the Evangelists to describe our Lord's action is ἐπετίμησε.

It is used of the miracle in the synagogue at Capernaum by the only two of them who record it, with the addition of the actual terms (φιμώθητι, καὶ ἔξελθε ἐξ αὐτοῦ) in which the rebuke was conveyed (Mark i. 25; Luke iv. 35). All three of the Synoptists use it in describing the miracle on the possessed child, immediately after the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 18; Mark ix. 25; Luke ix. 42); St. Mark alone giving the solemn form of address (τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἔλαλον καὶ κωφόν, ἐγὼ σοι ἐπιτάσσω, ἔξελθε ἐξ αὐτοῦ, καὶ μηκέτι εἰσέλθῃς εἰς αὐτόν), called forth perhaps by the peculiar malignity of the spirit and his reluctance to desert his prey (c. 26). In the miracle in the country of the Gadarenes, St. Mark's ἔξελθε (v. 8) becomes in St. Luke παρήγγειλε ἐξελεθεῖν (viii. 29; or παρήγγελλε). The daughter of the Syro-Phoenician woman was set free by His mere volition, without personal contact at all (Mark vii. 29, 30). Authority (ἐξουσία) to cast out devils was bestowed by Christ while on earth upon the Apostles and the seventy disciples (Matt. x. 1; Luke x. 19; cp. Luke iv. 36; Mark i. 27), and a like power was promised by Him to believers after His Ascension (Mark xvi. 17). But though this power was to be exercised by them "in His Name" (Luke x. 17; Mark xvi. 17; cp. Matt. vii. 22; Mark ix. 38), the virtue of that Name, as simply uttered in faith, appears to have sufficed, without any formula of adjuration such as would properly constitute an exorcism (παραγγέλλω σοι ἐν τ. ὀνόματι Ἰησοῦ Χρ., Acts xvi. 18, the only case in which the words used are given. See v. 16; viii. 7). In one case, which however is specially mentioned as exceptional, "handkerchiefs or aprons," carried away to them from the body of St. Paul, had power to deliver the possessed from the evil spirits who tormented them (Acts xix. 12).

The reality of exorcism, or of the expulsion of evil spirits which is commonly understood by that name, must of course depend upon the reality of possession. If there be no such thing as demoniacal possession, there can be no need and no room for deliverance from it. But if, by a careful consideration of those passages of the N. T. which bear upon the subject, we are led to the conclusion that "there are evil spirits, subjects of the Evil One, who, in the days of the Lord Himself and His Apostles especially, were permitted by God to exercise a direct influence over the souls and bodies of certain men" [DEMONIACS]; then it is only reasonable to suppose that He Who "for this cause was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil" (1 John iii. 8; cp. Acts x. 38), should grapple with and overcome that influence. At the same time, it should not be forgotten that the argument is strong, when taken in the reverse order. From the reality of expulsion we may reasonably infer the reality of possession. No theory of accommodation can satisfactorily account for the language used by Christ in casting out devils. As well might we affirm, "if a physician were solemnly to address the moon, bidding it to abstain from harming his patient" (Trench, Notes on the Miracles), that he was only employing the popular language which speaks of madness as lunacy, as to affirm that —when our Lord says to one brought to Him as possessed, "Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him, and enter no more into him" (Mark ix. 25)—it is an honest and truthful accommodation to the views and prejudices of His hearers on the subject of possession. If possession were not real, He Who is "the Truth" could not so have spoken. If so He spoke and was obeyed, then possession and His victory over it are undoubted facts. [T. T. P.]

EXPIATION. [SACRIFICE.]

EYE-SERVICE. It has been pointed out (B. D., Amer. ed.) that we are indebted to the translators of the Bishops' Bible for this rendering of ὀφθαλμοδουλεία (Ephes. vi. 6; Col. iii. 22). It describes that service which, duly performed only when the master's eye is upon it, is for that reason reluctant and mercenary. [F.]

EZAR, 1 Ch. i. 38. [EZEK.]

EZ'BAI (עִזְבַּי; B. 'A(ω)bal, N. -be, A. 'A(β)l; Asar), father of Naari, who was one of David's thirty mighty men (1 Ch. xi. 37). In the parallel list (2 Sam. xxiii. 35) the names are given "Paarai the Arbite," which Kennicott decides to be a corruption of the reading in Chronicles (Dissertation, &c. p. 209). It is to be noted that some twenty MSS. of the text in Samuel read Οὐραλ υἱὸς τοῦ Ἀσβί (Driver in loco). [F.]

EZ'BON (עִזְבֹּן; Osobón; Esobon). 1. Son of Gad, and founder of one of the Gadite families (Gen. xlv. 16; Num. xxvi. 16). In the latter passage the name is written עִזְנִי (A. V. Ozni), probably by a corruption of the text of very early date (or, by tradition, Delitzsch [1887], Gen. in loco) since the LXX. (v. 25) have Β. 'A(ε)νί (Bab. 'A(α)νί, AF. 'A(α)νί). The process may have been the accidental omission of the ז in the first instance (as in עִזְנִי, Abiezer [Josh. xvii. 2], which in Num. xxvi. is written עִזְזִי, Jeezer), and then, when עִזְנִי was no longer a Hebrew form, the changing it into עִזְבֹּן.

2. 'Aseβón. Son of Bela, the son of Benjamin, according to 1 Ch. vii. 7. It is singular, however, that while Ezbon is nowhere else mentioned among the sons of Bela, or Benjamin, he appears here in company with יְרִי, Iri, which is not a Benjamite family either, according to the other lists, but which is found in company with Ezbon among the Gadite families, both in Gen. xlv. 16 (Eri, יְרִי) and Num. xxvi. 16. Were these two Gadite families incorporated into Benjamin after the slaughter mentioned in Judg. xx. ? Possibly they were from Jabesh-Gilead (cp. xxi. 12-14). [BECHER.] 1 Ch. vii. 2 seems to fix the date of the census as in King David's time. [A. C. H.]

EZECHIAS (B. 'E(ε)las, A. 'E(ε)las; Ozias, Ezechias). 1. 1 Esd. ix. 14. Son of Theocanus, one of those who took up the matter of "strange" marriage with "strange wives;" put for JAH-ZIAH (R. V. Jahzeiah), son of Tikvah, in Ezra i. 15 (B. Δα(ε)ιά, N. -as, A. 'Ia(ε)las). 2. 2 Esd. vii. 40. [HEZEKIAH.]

EZECHIAS (E(ε)las; Ezechias), 1 Esd. ix. 43, one of those who stood on the right hand of Ezra when he read the Book of the Law; for HILKIAH in the parallel passage, Neh. viii. 4.

EZEKIAS (E(ε)las, and so Westcott and Hort in N. T.; Ezechias), Ecclus. xlviii. 17, 22, xlix. 4; 2 Macc. xv. 22; Matt. i. 9, 10. [HEZEKIAH.]

EZEKIEL (עֶזְקִיֵּאל). The name is derived from עֶזְקָה עִזְקָה, God will strengthen (Gesen. Theo. i. 464), or from עֶזְקָה עִזְקָה, God will prevail (Simonis Onomast. V. T. p. 499). The name has been strangely misrepresented. The LXX. calls the Prophet 'Ιε(ε)κιήλ (so too Ecclus. xlix. 8); Josephus, 'Ιε(ε)κιήλαος; Vulg. Ezechiel; Luther, Hesechiel. The same Hebrew name occurs in 1 Ch. xxiv. 16 as that of the head of the twentieth of the twenty-four priestly courses, and there the A. V. represents it by Jehzekel. Jewish writers give it under the nearer and more correct form of Jechek-el. Abarbanel (Praef. in Ezech.) gives a direct significance to the name, as that of "one who narrated the might of God to be displayed in the future." Villalpandus (Praef. in Ezech. x.) sees a reference by the Prophet to his own name in the word עֶזְקָה (on the one hand "impudent," on the other "strong" or "firm") in Ezek. iii. 7-9; and at last we get the wholly groundless conjecture that it was a title applied to the Prophet descriptively after the commencement of his career (Sanctius, Prolegom. in Ezech. p. 2; Carpzov, Introductio, ii. pt. ii. ch. v.).

The Prophet Ezekiel was, as he himself informs us, "the son of Buzi the priest" (i. 3). In the A. V. and R. V. the clause is rendered "Ezekiel the priest, the son of Buzi," and this translation is defended by Hengstenberg, who takes it to mean that Ezekiel was priest of the exiles among whom he lived. The Hebrew accent however points to the other rendering, which is generally adopted by Jewish writers. The word Buz (בִּז) means contempt, and it might seem strange that such a name should be conferred on any child, yet this was also the name of the second son of Milcah and Nahor. The Rabbis, however, have built a theory upon the name. They have a rule that, whenever a prophet names his father, the father must also have been a prophet, and Rabbi David Qimchi in his commentary mentions a conjecture that Ezekiel was the son of Jeremiah, who was called Buzi because he was rejected and despised. It need hardly be said that the conjecture is impossible, as also is the tradition mentioned by St. Gregory of Nazianzus that Ezekiel was a servant of Jeremiah. Of the real relations which subsisted between the two Prophets we shall speak further on; all that we know of Buzi is that he was a priest of Jerusalem. Ezekiel thus belonged to the highest aristocracy of his nation, and it is obvious that he received from his father a careful and learned education.

The date of his birth depends on the interpretation given to Ezek. i. 1, where he mentions his call "in the thirtieth year," and "in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity." The latter expression gives us, according to the Hebrew way of reckoning, the date B.C. 594; and as, in all other places, Ezekiel dates from the year of Jehoiachin's captivity (viii. 1; xxiv. 1; xxix. 17; xxx. 20; xl. 1), we are fairly acquainted with the chronology of his prophecies. The expression "in the thirtieth year" has been variously explained. Many commentators refer it to the thirtieth year from the new era of Nabopolassar, father of Nebuchadnezzar, who began to reign B.C. 625 (Rawlinson, Herodotus, i. 508). It has been supposed that Ezekiel thus furnished a Chaldaean as well as a Jewish date, and similar dates are found in Dan. ii. 1, vii. 1; Ezra vii. 7; Neh. ii. 1, v. 14 (Rosenmüller, Schol. ad loc.; Scaliger, de emend. Temp. Prolegom. p. xii.). On the other hand, Ezekiel nowhere else alludes to this epoch, and it does not seem to be certain that the accession of Nabopolassar was observed as an era in Babylon. Setting aside the conjecture of some early commentators mentioned by Jerome (Comment. in Ezech.), and followed by R. Qimchi and Hitzig, that the expression refers to the thirtieth year from the year of jubilee, we may observe that the Targum of Jonathan has "thirty years after Hilkiah the high-priest had found the Book of the Law in the vestibule under the porch at midnight, after the setting of the moon, in the days of Josiah, &c., in the month of Thammuz, in the fifth day of the month" (cp. 2 K. xxii. 8-xxiii. 26). This view is adopted by Jerome, Grotius, Ussher, Hävernick, &c. The Book was discovered in the eighteenth year of Josiah, and the date thus furnished coincides with the reference to the fifth year of king Jehoiachin's captivity. But there is no trace, either in Ezekiel or elsewhere, that the finding of the Book of the Law was ever used to mark an era, and there can now be little doubt that by the expression "in the thirtieth year" Ezekiel was referring to his own age. This is the more likely because he is speaking of a strictly personal incident, and because at the age of thirty a priest assumed his full functions (Num. iv. 23-30). To one who writes more than any of the earlier Prophets in a priestly spirit, and was so deeply saturated with priestly traditions, it was natural to refer to a date which added new solemnity to the commencement of his prophetic mission, because it connected that mission with the hereditary duties of his office.

It is however a fact of profound significance that the birth of the Prophet happened at the period in which Josiah, startled by the revelation which he found in the Book of the Law, began his great reform of worship. The effects of that reform must have been deeply felt in the education of a boy whose father was a priest, and who lived under the very shadow of the Temple. Whether Ezekiel during his earlier years travelled among the neighbouring nations, and so acquired those vivid conceptions of their circumstances which he afterwards embodied in his prophecies, we cannot tell; but he was brought up amid the influences of a reformation, during which the Temple and its ritual occupied no small part of the thoughts of his people. Jeremiah, who had attained to manhood before the great religious movement which marked the days of Josiah, was less profoundly affected by it. He earnestly enforced the truth that offerings and services were in themselves far from sufficient; and when he witnessed that utter ruin of his nation and of its Temple which he had prophesied, he became the herald of a new covenant, and found comfort in the thought of days when there should indeed be no Ark and no Temple, yet all should know the Lord their God, and have the Law written in their hearts (Jer. iii. 15-18; xxxi. 31-34). The work to which Ezekiel was called was different. The day for the New Covenant of which Jeremiah prophesied had not yet dawned, and the younger Prophet was commissioned, while teaching to his nation many spiritual truths of the deepest importance, to keep alive in their hearts that faithfulness to the old ordinances which inspired them with hope and patriotism during the centuries which were yet to elapse before the Desire of all nations came suddenly to that Second Temple which the returning exiles raised from the ruins of the First (Hag. ii. 7; Mal. iii. 1).

* The Hebrew expression means literally "in thirty years." It may be compared with "after forty years," to indicate the age of Absalom in 2 Sam. xv. 7; unless, with the Peshitto, Vulgate, and many MSS., we here read "four" (see Driver in loco).

King Josiah, at the early age of thirty-nine, fell in the great battle of Megiddo (B.C. 608), after receiving a crushing defeat at the hands of Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt. The disastrous end of so good a king was a sore trial to the faith of the pious Israelites. But worse trials were to follow. Pharaoh placed Jehoiakim, the eldest son of Josiah, as his vassal on the throne of Judah, but in B.C. 605 was himself defeated at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar. The conqueror allowed Jehoiakim to retain his throne, but in spite of this Jehoiakim rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar three years later, and was slain in the eleventh year of a bad reign (2 K. xxiii. 37; 2 Ch. xxxvi. 8). His son and successor, Jehoiachin, reigned but three months and ten days, at the close of which Nebuchadnezzar carried him away captive to Babylon with his family, his treasure, and ten thousand prisoners (2 K. xxiv. 14, 16),^b among whom were the flower of the aristocracy and of the male population of Jerusalem. This took place in the year 597 B.C.

Among these prisoners was Ezekiel, who must accordingly have been about twenty-five years old. Josephus, indeed, whose account of this period is both untrustworthy and marked by positive errors, says that he was carried away to Babylon while he was yet a boy (Jos. Antt. x. 7, § 3). But this statement is inherently improbable. Ezekiel's last prophecy is dated in the twenty-seventh year of the exile of Jehoiachin (xxix. 17), and it is unlikely that he long survived that date. If then he was only a boy at the beginning of the exile, he must have died at an early age, and must have begun his prophetic work as a very young man; a fact which would almost certainly have been mentioned by tradition. Besides this, it is hardly probable that Ezekiel would have received so deep an impress from the Temple services, or have presented so vigorous and mature a type of the priestly character, as that which is manifested in his Book, if he had been taken from Jerusalem before his habits and convictions were fully formed. There seems to be little ground for Theodoret's supposition that Ezekiel was a Nazarite.

Nebuchadnezzar was not one of the mere rough soldiers who founded some of the ancient monarchies. He resembled Alexander the Great in his powers of organisation and in the breadth of his designs, and, like Cyrus and Darius, he is always spoken of with respect by the Hebrew Prophets (Ezek. xxvi. 7; Dan. v. 18, &c.). The captivity which he inflicted on the Jewish exiles took the form of a deportation or transmigration, and their lot was not aggravated by needless cruelties. Ezekiel was placed with a little colony of his companions at Tel Abib ("Hill of grassland") on the river Chebar (iii. 15). Of Tel Abib nothing is known, nor has the site been identified.⁶ The Vulgate renders it "aceruus vocarum frugum;" and the LXX., stumbling over it, represents it by μετέσπος. It is not certain whether the river Chebar was the Nahr Malka, the "Royal canal" (Cellarius, Geogr. c. 22; Bochart, Phaleg, i. 8), or the river Ahabor (the ancient Ἀβάρρας), which flows into the Euphrates 200 miles north of Babylon. There can be little doubt that Ezekiel's place of exile was in Chaldaea proper (i. 3), and therefore that the Chebar cannot be (as Bleek conjectured, Einleit. § 221. See Fried. Delitzsch, Wo lag das Paradies? p. 47 sq.) the river Habor in Gozan (2 K. xvii. 6), which is an affluent of the Tigris. The nominal tomb of Ezekiel is shown at a place called Kesil, south of Babylon (Menasse ben Israel, de Resur. Mort. p. 23; see Ps. Epiphani. de Vit. et Mort. Prophet. ix.). It is mentioned by Pietro de la Valle, and fully described in the Itinerary of Benjamin of Tudela (Itiner. p. 66; Hottinger, Thes. Phil. ii. i. 3; Cippi Hebraici, p. 82; Carpov, Apparat. Crit. pp. 203, 204).

It was on the banks of the Chebar, "in the land of the Chaldeans," that God's message first reached Ezekiel, and "the heavens were opened" to him in the thirtieth year of his age, as to Christ in the river Jordan (Origen). In the passage describing his call (Ezek. i. 3) the Targum interpolates the words "in the land [of Israel, and again a second time He spake to him in the land] of the Chaldeans." The interpolation may partly have been suggested by the structure of some of Ezekiel's early prophecies, in which he imagines himself an ideal spectator of scenes in Jerusalem (viii. 7, &c.); but it also probably sprang from the Jewish notion that the Shekinah could not overshadow a Prophet out of the Holy Land. For this reason Rashi supposes that ch. xvii. was Ezekiel's first prophecy, and was uttered before he went into captivity, a view which he supports by the Hebrew idiom הָיָה הַיְיָ (A. V. and R. V. "came expressly") in i. 3. R. Qimchi, however, admits of exceptions to the Rabbinic rule in case the prophecy was inspired in some pure and quiet spot like a river's bank.

Unlike his predecessor in the prophetic office, who gives us the amplest details of his personal history, Ezekiel rarely alludes to the facts of his own life, and we have to complete the imperfect picture by the colours of late and dubious tradition. We only learn from an incidental allusion that he was married, and had a house (viii. 1) in his place of exile, and lost his wife by a sudden and unforeseen stroke. The way in which he bore this deep affliction was due to that absorbing recognition of his high calling which enabled him to face every duty which was laid upon him, and even to submit to the ceremonial pollution from which he shrank with characteristic loathing (iv. 14). It is only in one expression that the feelings of the man burst through the self-devotion of the Prophet. His obedience was unwavering, but the deep pathos of his brief allusion to his wife's death (xxiv. 15-18) shows what well-springs of the tenderest emotion were concealed under his uncompromising opposition to every form of sin.⁴

He lived in the highest consideration among his companions in exile, and their elders consulted him on all occasions (viii. 1, xi. 25, xiv. 1, xx. 1, &c.), because in his united offices of priest and Prophet he was a living witness to "them of the captivity" that God had not abandoned them. Vitringa even says (de Synag. Vet. p. 332) that "in aedibus suis ut in scholâ quâdam publicâ conventus instituebat, ibique coram frequenti concione divinam interpretabatur voluntatem oratione facundâ" (quoted by Hävernick). Jewish writers regard these meetings as the first beginnings of the future synagogues, and to this they refer Ezek. xi. 16, "Although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them as a little sanctuary in the countries where they be." On this passage the Targum distinctly says that the synagogues are next in holiness to the Temple (see Megilla, f. 29, 1; Jer. Berakhoth, 5, 1; Hamburger, RE. ii. s. v. Synagoge).

The last date mentioned by the Prophet is the twenty-seventh year of the Captivity (xxix. 17), so that his mission extended over twenty-two years, during part of which period Daniel was probably living, and already famous (Ezek. xiv. 14, xxviii. 3). Tradition ascribes various miracles to him, as, for instance, escaping from his enemies by walking dry-shod across the Chebar; feeding the famished people with a miraculous draught of fishes, &c. He is said to have been murdered in Babylon by some Jewish prince (? ὁ ἡγούμενος τοῦ λαοῦ, called in the Roman martyrology for vi. Id. Apr. "judex populi." Carpov, Introd. l. c.), whom he had convicted of idolatry; and to have been buried in a σηπταίων δικλοῦν, the tomb of Shem and Arphaxad, on the banks of the Euphrates. A curious conjecture, discredited by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. c. xv. § 70), but considered not impossible by Selden (Syntagm. de Duis Syr. ii. p. 120), Meyer and others, identifies him with "Nazaratus the Assyrian," the teacher of Pythagoras. We need hardly mention the foolish suppositions that he is identical with Zoroaster, or with the Alexandrian Ἐρεκίηλος ὁ τῶν Ἰουδαϊκῶν πραγμῶν ποιητής (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. § 155; Euseb. Præp. Evang. ix. 28, 29) who wrote a play on the Exodus, called Ἐξαγωγή (Fabricius, Bibl. Grec. ii. 19). This Ezekiel seems to have lived about B.C. 140 (see Grätz, Gesch. d. Jud. iii. pp. 42, 440).

But by the side of the scattered data of his external life, those of his internal life appear so much the richer. We have already noticed his stern and inflexible energy of will and character; and we also observe a devoted adherence to the rites and ceremonies of his national religion. Ezekiel is no cosmopolite, but displays everywhere the peculiar tendencies of a Hebrew educated under Levitical training. The priestly bias is always visible, especially in chs. viii.-xi., xl.-xlviii., and in iv. 13 sq., xx. 12 sq., xxii. 8, &c. De Wette and Gesenius attribute this to a "contracted spirituality," and Ewald sees in it "a one-sided conception of antiquity which he obtained merely from books and traditions," and "a depression of spirit enhanced by the long continuance of the banishment and bondage of the people." But it was surely this very intensity of patriotic loyalty to a system whose partial suspension he both predicted and survived, which cheered the exiles with the confidence of the Prophet's hopes for the future, and tended to preserve the decaying nationality of his people. Mr. F. Newman is even more contemptuous than the German critics. "The writings of Ezekiel," he says, "painfully show the growth of what is merely visionary, and an increasing value for hard sacerdotalism" (Hebr. Monarchy, p. 330). He speaks of the "heavy materialism" of Ezekiel's Temple as being "as tedious and unedifying as Leviticus itself;" but he refutes his own criticisms when he adds that Ezekiel's predictions "so kept alive in the minds of the next generation a belief in a certain return from Captivity as to have tended exceedingly towards that result."

We shall try to show in the sketch of his teaching that what has been called his predominating ceremonialism and externalism were partly indeed due to his birth and early training, but were also essential to the work which he was appointed to fulfil. It must be borne in mind that five centuries were yet to elapse, even after the Restoration of the Captivity, during which it was the duty of the Jews to preserve their national institutions until the Saviour of the world should come. Over the religious life of those centuries no Old Testament writer exercised a more powerful influence than the prophet Ezekiel.*

It was not only his attainment of the full age for priestly functions which called forth the prophetic gifts of Ezekiel. God, Who prepares His servants by the education of history and experience, trained the mind of His Prophet by the course of events for the first overpowering revelation which determined his future career. When Jehoiachin had been taken to Babylon, his uncle Zedekiah was left as a viceroy over the poor remnants of the people. In the fourth year of his reign he joined in a great movement of Jews, Phœnicians, Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites, to throw off the hated yoke of Nebuchadnezzar. Such designs could not be kept secret, and to afford himself with a colourable excuse Zedekiah seems to have gone in person to Babylon (Jer. li. 59),[†] accompanied by ambassadors, to some of whom Jeremiah entrusted the memorable letter in which he had prophesied that the Captivity should last for seventy years (xxv. 11), and in which he sternly rebuked the false prophets who encouraged the exiles in vain hopes (Jer. xxix. 1-32). It was probably this letter, and the thoughts which it kindled, which awoke the flame of prophecy in the heart of the exiled priest. Jeremiah was at this time all but universally hated and persecuted, and his life was constantly endangered by the fury of lying prophets and apostate princes (Jer. xx. 7-18). By the side of the Chebar it was brought home to the mind of Ezekiel that he, the aristocratic descendant of Zadok, must throw himself into the cause of the poor priest of Anathoth, and share the intense odium which his prophecies had inspired. It is the moral and spiritual relationship between these great Prophets of the epoch of the fall of Judah which is dimly shadowed in Jewish legends. Jerome supposes that, being contemporaries during a part of their mission, they interchanged their prophecies, sending them respectively to Jerusalem and Chaldea for mutual confirmation and encouragement, that the Jews might hear as it were a strophe and antistrophe of warning and promise, "velut ac si duo cantores alter ad alterius vocem sese componeret" (Calvin, Comment. ad Ezech. i. 2). Although it was only towards the close of Jeremiah's lengthened office that Ezekiel received his commission, yet these suppositions are easily accounted for by the internal harmony between the two Prophets, in proof of which we may refer to Ezek. xiii. as compared with Jer. xxiii. 9 sq., and Ezek. xxiv. with Jer. xxxiii., &c. This inner resemblance is the more striking from the otherwise wide difference of character which separates the two Prophets. Jeremiah is far more of a poet than Ezekiel, though the latter shows a more daring imagination. The elegiac tenderness of Jeremiah is the reflex of his gentle and introspective spirit, while Ezekiel, in that age when true prophecy was so rare (Ezek. xii. 21-25; Lam. ii. 9), "comes forward with all abruptness and iron consistency. Has he to contend with a people of brazen front and unbending neck? He possesses on his own part an unbending nature, opposing the evil with an unflinching spirit of boldness, with words full of consuming fire."

Of the reception of Ezekiel's prophecies during the twenty-two years over which—though probably at irregular intervals—his work extended (Ezek. i. 1, xxix. 17), we have no direct information. It is, however, unlikely that he escaped the bitter and violent opposition which is the ordinary fate of the true Prophet.* From vague and incidental notices we may infer that at first he was made to suffer even to the extent of bonds and imprisonment (Ezek. iii. 25); but if so, he soon triumphed over his enemies, and obtained honour and recognition as a Prophet, even while the people took no practical heed to his words (xxxiii. 32, 33). But while the general tenor of his life seems to have been far less stormy and troubled than that of his spiritual father Jeremiah, his ministry was exceptionally powerful. Its central lesson has been summed up in the words "through repentance to salvation" (Cornill, Der Prophet Ezekiel, p. 264). The chosen people had drunk to the dregs the cup of humiliation; they had seen their kings defeated, dishonoured, dragged into captivity, cruelly tortured, shamefully slain; they had seen their royal city ruined and dismantled, and their Temple destroyed by fire. They had seen the God of Israel become as a stranger in His own land (Jer. iv. 8). Yet there were many of the people who only spoke the language of unbelief and defiance. They expressed open doubts of God's power (Is. lix. 1) or of His justice (Ezek. xviii. 25, 29; xxxiii. 17, 20). It was the task of Ezekiel again and again to refute these blasphemies, and to show that the secret of Israel's ruin lay exclusively in Israel's sins, and especially in the sins of gross idolatry (Ezek. viii. 1-12), lasciviousness (xvi. xxiii.), and bloodguiltiness (xxiv. 6-9), and in the general corruption and trust in lies of prophets, priests, princes and people (xxii. 1-31). In preaching his Theodicean, Ezekiel had especially to revive the national faith which had been so deeply shaken by the miserable end of the good king Josiah. He had to show how false was the application of the proverb that "The father had eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth were set on edge" (xviii. 3-32), and how completely the personal punishment of his contemporaries was due to their own offences. But while thus rebuking a rebellious despair, he was obliged at the same time to strike down an overweening confidence. In his days, as in those of John the Baptist, the people, encouraged in their national conceit by false prophets, were founding vain hopes on the fact that "they had Abraham to their father" (Ezek. xxxiii. 24). Ezekiel not only pointed out how futile was such a plea for guilty souls (cc. 25-29), but he dealt at this pride of birth the most tremendous blow which it had ever received when he exclaimed, "Thy birth and thy nativity was of the land of Canaan; thy mother was an Hittite, and thy father an Amorite;† and thine elder sister is Samaria, and thy younger sister that dwelleth at thy right hand is Sodom and her daughters" (xvi. 3, 44-59). They relied on their holy origin, but their true paternity was proved by their deeds (Is. i. 10; Matt. iii. 9; John viii. 44).

[†] It should, however, be observed that the readings of this verse are uncertain. The LXX., followed by Bleek and others, read "from Zedekiah" for "with"; and the Peshitto reads "eleventh" for "fourth" year of his reign.

* In our Masoretic canon he is placed third of the Nebiim Acharonim, or greater Prophets; in Baba Kama, f. 14, 2, he is placed second.

Side by side however with the insolence of obstinate self-defence, Ezekiel found that in the hearts of others there was an abject despondency. They were saying, "If our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we pine away in them, how should we then live?" (xxxiii. 10). It was in answer to such melancholy spirits that Ezekiel set forth more clearly than any of his predecessors the truth that the one object of punishment is not vengeance, but reformation. The key-note of all his teaching was, "I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel?" (xxxiii. 11). The sole remedy for the present disastrous condition of the nation was that heartfelt repentance which proves its sincerity by amendment (iii. 20; xviii. 24-32; xxxiii. 13). For those whose despair was too deeply-seated to be reached even by this high moral teaching, which for the first time set forth Jehovah as the Educator of the human race, Ezekiel received his remarkable vision of the Resurrection in the Valley of Dry Bones (xxxvii. 1-14). This striking allegory had for its immediate object the revival of national hopes; but it has a far wider and more glorious meaning, and, pointing as it does to "a hope full of immortality," it is one of the deepest notes of revelation which the Old Testament contains.†

Besides his high moral and spiritual teaching, it was Ezekiel's mission to keep alive among the Jews a sense of their religious unity and political existence. Judaism was never intended to be a cosmopolitan religion; and when the exiles contrasted the colossal splendour of Babylon with their own poor Jerusalem, they needed the message "Fear not, thou worm Jacob" (Is. xli. 14), and the reminder that they were not to sink into Babylonians, since they had higher hopes and nobler promises. Their tears were but to be as the softening showers which should prepare the soil for a purer seed. It was therefore essential that they should not relapse into the idolatry of their conquerors; and since they had no longer a Temple or sacrifices, it was necessary to insist with the utmost stringency on their ancient and peculiar institution of the Sabbath.‡ Ezekiel has been severely judged because, amid the lofty teachings of his eighteenth chapter, he dwells so strongly on one or two negative and positive rules (xviii. 6-8, 11-

* He speaks of his people, even his fellow-exiles, as "a house of rebellion," ii. 5-8; iii. 9, 28, 27; xxiv. 3, &c. See too xiv. 3, xx. 32. "The Holy One—blessed be He—afflicted Ezekiel in order to cleanse Israel from their iniquities." (Sanhedrin, f. 39.)

† How bitterly this verse was felt by the Jews is shown centuries later by the Rabbis of the Talmud.

‡ When the Holy One—blessed be He—commissioned Ezeiel to say to Israel, 'Thy father was an Amorite and thy mother a Hittite,' a pleading spirit " (according to Raah, the angel Gabriel) "objected and said, 'If Abraham and Sarah were to stand here in Thy presence, wouldst Thou thus humiliate them to their face?'"

(Sanhedrin, f. 44, 1.) The passage certainly shows an intensely unfavourable view of Israel's past, though it was not meant to apply to Abraham and Sarah at all, but to the heathen origin and moral affinities of the city of Jerusalem. See chs. xvi., xx., xxiii.

§ The Rabbis lost themselves in frivolous discussions as to whether the scene was real or not; and, if real, what became of the men who were raised!

¶ For the same reason Jeremiah dwells strongly on the sacredness of the Sabbath (Jer. xvii. 21-27). It was the strongest bulwark of the Law and national life of the Jews.

13, 15-17). The criticism is unjust, because those rules are not meant to include all morality, but are aimed at the dangers which most immediately menaced the national existence—idolatry, impurity, greed, and unkindness. How little the teaching of Ezekiel was akin to Pharisaism may be seen in his insistence on the fact that a new heart and a new spirit (xxxvi. 26, 27) are not the reward of merit, but the gift of God's free love (v. 21-23, 32, 33; xvi. 62, 63; xx. 43, 44). By this mixture of doctrine and morality, by his thorough examination of the problems of sin and punishment, and repentance and free grace (xviii. 32), and by his reference of all questions to the will and glory of God, Ezekiel has earned the title of "the Paul of the Old Testament." Further than this, by his chosen title "Son of Man" and its accordance with his deepest thoughts, he becomes a type of Christ (Isidore, de Vit. et ob. Sanct. 39).

That title was no ordinary one. It is true that "son of man" is common in Scripture in the sense of "man"; but the only two Prophets to whom the title is given are Daniel, who is thus addressed once only (Dan. viii. 17), and Ezekiel, to whom the phrase is applied ninety times. It is equivalent to weak mortal, and is doubtless suggested by the noble language of the viiith Psalm (viii. 4, 5). If in one aspect it implies the deep humility of the Prophet in the presence of Him Who had revealed Himself as throned upon the Cherubim, in another it suggests to Ezekiel as to David the glory of his privilege in being chosen to receive the messages of God (see i. 28; iii. 23; xliii. 3; xlv. 4). [F. W. F.]

EZEKIEL, BOOK OF. We see in his Book the gradual transition from the Prophet into the scribe. He is the precursor of Ezra in inaugurating the religion of legalism. He was neither a statesman nor a politician, but resembles the figure of his own visions,—the man in the white robe with the inkhorn by his side (Ezek. ix.). Jeremiah, "the last great Prophet, the evening star of the declining day of prophecy, occupies the dividing line between two ages, and without intending it closes the species of entirely pure prophecy." He points to the new covenant (Jer. xxxi. 33, 34),* while it was the main duty of Ezekiel to secure and protect the resuscitation of the old covenant until the fulness of the times. The object of the "new heart and a new spirit" is "that they may walk in My ordinances and observe My statutes." He does not, like Isaiah, look mainly for new heavens and a new earth (Is. lxxv. 19; lxxvi. 22), but sketches a new and minutely regulated national life.^b It is only in his denunciations that Ezekiel treads in the footsteps of his prophetic predecessors; his remedies and ideals are priestly, and his personal work was to a great extent of a pastoral and didactic character (see xxiii. 6), such as suited a period of national inaction.

I. Style.—His prophetic method was very varied. He furnishes instances of visions (viii.—xi.), symbolic actions (iv. v. xii.), similitudes (xv. xvi.), parables (xvii.), proverbs (xii. 22; xviii. 2), poems (xix.), allegories (xxi. xxiii. xxiv.), and direct prophecies (vi. xx., &c.). Carpov says, "Tanta ubertate et figurarum variatione floret ut unus ornatus propheticus sermonis numeros ac modos explevisse, jure suo sit dicendus" (Introd. ii. pt. iii. 5). Michaelis and others talk of his "plagiarism;" but although his language is undoubtedly moulded by his early studies, it shows a marked originality in form, in conception, and in many unique phrases, which may be seen by contrasting his prophecy against Tyre (xxviii.) with that of Isaiah (xxiii.). He is indeed more of a writer than either a poet or an orator, and his style is in general the result of literary elaboration rather than of spontaneous passion. This is doubtless due to the fact that many of his prophecies do not seem to have been publicly uttered, but recorded in private. He seems to have been a man of silent, meditative, and almost melancholy character,^c and this gave to his expressions the "evenness and repose" of which Ewald speaks. The style of Ezekiel bears a certain indefinable stamp of distinction and self-restraint, which makes it contrast with the more impassioned eloquence of his persecuted contemporary, Jeremiah. On the other hand, some of his symbols, images, and expressions are crude and displeasing (xvi. 1-5; xxiii. passim), and he is sometimes prolix from the many iterations and recurrent formulæ.^d His composite symbols show clear traces of the extent to which his attention had been seized by the strange forms of art by which he was surrounded amid the temples and palaces of Babylon. The attempt to interpret these by painting taxed the highest powers even of an Albrecht Dürer and a Raphael. These symbols furnish an almost unique phenomenon in Semitic literature, and one which can only be explained by recent familiarity with Aryan surroundings. But Ezekiel shows in the combination of these diverse elements a daring imagination and an architectonic skill. They have exercised a strong fascination over the minds of thinkers. St. Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 23) calls Ezekiel the loftiest and most wonderful of all Prophets, ὁ τῶν μεγάλων ἐποπτικῆς καὶ ἐξηγητικῆς μυστηρίων (see Carpov, Introd. i. 192), and Herder describes him as the Aeschylus and Shakspeare of the Hebrews. Schiller wished that he had learnt Hebrew mainly because he wished to read Ezekiel in his own language. Havernick is perhaps too enthusiastic in speaking of "his glow of divine indignation," and the "torrent of his eloquence resting on a combination of power and consistency, the one as unwearyed as the ^b Compare Jer. iii. 16; vii. 4, 11-14, 21-23; ix. 25, 26; xxiv. 6, 7. Chapters xxx., xxxi. exhibit such "elevation of thought and expansion of horizon" that Movers, Hitzig, and others have unwarrantably supposed that they were written by "the second Isaiah" (see Dr. R. Williams, The Hebrew Prophets, ii. 60).

^c To speak of him as probably "afflicted by a chronic nervous malady" (Stud. u. Krit. 1877) is quite to exceed the limits of legitimate conjecture.

^d Duhm (Die Theol. d. Propheten) contrasts him unfavourably both with Jeremiah and the later Isaiah, but the difference between them does not necessarily prove inferiority. The work as well as the style of Ezekiel was of another order from that of his predecessors.

other is imposing." St. Jerome, on the other hand, writes too coldly when he says, "Sermo ejus nec satis disertus nec admodum rusticus, sed ex utroque genere medie temperatur" (Præf. in Ezech.). Among the most splendid passages are ch. i., the prophecy against Tyrus (xxvi.-xxviii.); that against Assyria, "the noblest monument of Eastern history" (xxi.); and ch. viii., the account of what he saw in the Temple-porch,

—"when, by the vision led,
His eye surveyed the dark idolatries Of alienated Judah."—MILTON, Par. Lost, i.

The depth of his matter, and the marvellous nature of his visions, make him occasionally obscure, but chiefly in passages which were designedly shrouded in enigmatic language (e.g. xxi. and xxxix.). His prophecy was placed by the Jews among the ⲓⲛⲓⲛⲓ (treasures), those portions of Scripture which (like the early part of Genesis and the Canticles) were not allowed to be read till the age of 30 (Jer. Ep. ad Eustoch.; Orig. præm. homil. iv. in Cantic.; Hottinger, Theol. Phil. ii. 1, 3). Hence Jerome compares the "inextricabilis error" of his writings to Virgil's labyrinth ("Oceanus Scripturarum, mysteriorumque Dei labyrinthus"), and also to the catacombs. The Jews classed him in the very highest rank of Prophets. The Sanhedrin is said to have hesitated long whether his Book should form part of the Canon, from its occasional obscurity, and from its supposed contradictions to the Law (xviii. 20-xx. 5, xxxiv. 7; Jer. xxxii. 18). But in point of fact these apparent oppositions are the mere expression of truths complementary to each other, as Moses himself might have taught them (Deut. xxiv. 16). Although, generally speaking, comments on this book were forbidden, R. Ananias undertook to reconcile the supposed differences.* Spinoza, Tract. Theol. Polit. ii. 27, partly from these considerations, inferred that the present Book is made up of mere fragments, but his argument from its commencing with a ⲓ, and from the expression in i. 3 above alluded to, hardly needs refutation.

II. Unity.—As to the unity of the Book there has never been any serious question. Josephus indeed (Antt. x. 5, § 1) has the following passage: οὐ μόνον δὲ οὗτος (Jeremiah) προεθέσπισε ταῦτα ἀλλὰ καὶ ὁ προφήτης Ἰεζεκιήλος [δὲ] πρῶτος περὶ τούτων δύο βιβλία γράψας κατέλιπεν. The undoubted meaning seems to be that Ezekiel (although Eichhorn on various grounds applies the word to Jeremiah) left two books of prophecy; which is also stated by Zonaras, and the Latin translation of Athanasius, where, after mentioning other lost books, and two of Ezekiel, the writer continues, "Nunc vero jam unum duntaxat inveniri scimus. Itaque hæc omnia per impiorum Judæorum amentiam et incuriam periisse manifestum est" (Synops. p. 136, but the passage does not occur in the Greek). In confirmation of this view (which is held by Maldonat and others) some have referred to passages quoted in Clem. Alex. Paedag. i. 10, § 91, ἐν ᾧ εὐρώ σε ἐν αὐτῷ καὶ κρινῶ σε: and again, τέτοκεν καὶ οὐ τέτοκεν φησὶν ἡ γραφή (Id. Strom. vii. 16, § 93). Tertullian says, "Legimus apud Ezechielem de vaccâ illâ quæ peperit et non peperit" (de Carn. Christi, § 23; cp. Epiph. Haeres. xxx. 30), and refers the supposed prophecy to the Virgin Mary. The attempt to identify it with Job xxi. 10 can hardly be maintained. That these passages (quoted by Fabricius, Cod. Pseudepigr. Vet. Test. § 221) can come from a lost genuine book is extremely improbable, since we know from the Talmud the extraordinary care with which the later Jews guarded the λόγια ζῶντα. They may indeed come from a lost apocryphal book, although we find no other trace of its existence (Sixtus Sen. Bibl. Sanct. ii. 61). Le Moyne (Vâr. Sacra, ii. p. 332 sq.) thinks that they undoubtedly belong to some collection of traditional Jewish apophthegms, such as those which are preserved in Pirke Aboth, or the "chapters of the fathers." Just in the same way we find certain ἑγράφα δόγματα attributed to our Lord by the Fathers, and even by the Apostles (Acts xx. 35), on which see a monograph by Kuinoel. The simplest supposition about the passage in Josephus is either to assume that he is in error, or to admit a former division of Ezekiel into two books at ch. xxv., or possibly at ch. xxxix. Le Moyne adopts the latter view, and supports it by analogous cases. There is nothing which militates against it in the fact that Josephus mentions δύο μόνα καὶ εἰκοσὶ βιβλία (c. Apion. i. 22) as forming the Canon.

III. Genuineness.—Of the genuineness of the Book of Ezekiel there has never been any serious doubt. It is true that in Baba Bathra, f. 15, 1, we are told that "the men of the Great Synagogue wrote the Book of Ezekiel, the Twelve Minor Prophets, the Book of Daniel, and the Book of Esther," where Rashi says that "the men of the Great Synagogue were Haggai, Malachi, Zerubbabel, Mordecai, and their associates." But "the Great Synagogue" is by many considered a purely unhistorical body, and it is clear that "wrote" can only mean "edited." It has indeed been rashly supposed by Oeder, Vogel, and a writer in the Monthly Magazine (1798) that the last nine chapters are a spurious addition to the Book, and it has even been suggested that they were written by some Samaritan author to induce the Jews to permit the co-operation of the Samaritans in the building of the Second Temple! Corrodi also doubted the genuineness of chs. xxxviii. and xxxix. It is needless to enter into the very slight show of argument which was advanced in favour of these views, because they have long been abandoned. Zunz went further (Gottesdienstl. Vortr. p. 183; Gesamm. Schriften, i. 217), and impugned the genuineness of the whole Book, which he believed to have been written between B.C. 440 and B.C. 400. He argued (1) from the specific character of some of the predictions (e.g. xvii. 10; xxiv. 2 sq.); (2) from the impossibility of believing that in B.C. 570 Ezekiel should have dreamed of suggesting a new set of laws, a new kind of Temple, and a new division of the Holy Land; (3) from the absence of any allusion to Ezekiel in the Books of Jeremiah and Esther; (4) from the allusions to Daniel (xiv. 14); (5) from certain grammatical and linguistic peculiarities. In answer to these objections of a sincere and learned author we may reply generally that, even if we allow the purely à priori objection to specific predictions, they would only prove at the outside that Ezekiel had edited his Book as a literary whole towards the end of his life. The views of the ancients and the moderns about literary methods differed widely, and the addition of subsequent touches may have been in no discord with the customs of an undeveloped literature, and the conditions under which the Book was made public.

* * Reverse the memory of Hananiah ben Hizkiah, for had it not been for him the Book of Ezekiel would have been suppressed, because it contradicts the Law. By the help of 300 bottles of oil he prolonged his studies till he reconciled all the discrepancies" (Shabbath, f. 13, 2). Rashi refers to Ezek. xlv. 31, xlv. 20, as passages which seem to contradict the Law.

Such is the suggestion of Ewald and Kuenen;^f and although it cannot be proved, and therefore need not be accepted, it would be absurd to view such circumstances from a modern standpoint, or to attribute such subsequent editing to literary fraud. The second objection of Zunz must be treated separately. The third is a mere argumentum e silentio, which, as has been proved again and again by the most decisive instances, has no validity at all, either in ancient or modern days. The fourth objection does not seem to have any intrinsic weight, and is of too vague a character to be dealt with. The fifth again has no validity because the conditions of the Exile are quite sufficient to account for many linguistic phenomena, and because it is far from improbable that some of these linguistic peculiarities may be due to a text which is regarded by many scholars as being the most corrupt in the Old Testament.

IV. Contents.—That Ezekiel was the editor as well as the author of the Book is admitted equally by Ewald, Keil, Kuenen, and nearly all other inquirers. The prophecies are arranged according to a definite plan. The Book is divided into two great parts, separated from each other by the destruction of Jerusalem. The ^f According to the headings of the prophecies, chs. 1.-vii. were delivered in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity; viii.-xix. in the sixth year; xx.-xxiii. in the seventh year; xxiv. in the ninth year. If those headings apply to the entire contents of each chapter, Ezekiel distinctly predicted the peculiar fate of Zedekiah (xii. 13), and the particulars of the siege and fall of Jerusalem. Kuenen argues that ch. xvii. could not have been written in the sixth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, because Zedekiah had not then actually revolted, nor could he at that time have made a covenant with Egypt, since Egypt is not mentioned in Jer. xxvii. 3. He also thinks that xxi. 20-32 could not have been written in B.C. 591, because "the reproach of the Ammonites" (xxv. 1-7) could not have been uttered till after the fall of Jerusalem and the profanation of the sanctuary. Hence he argues that Ezekiel "did not trouble himself about scrupulous accuracy in the literary reproduction of his spoken prophecies" (Prophecy, p. 328, E. T.). His view is that Ezekiel's slight subsequent additions to what he had previously written or delivered did not in any way militate with ancient and Eastern conceptions of literary good faith. Reuss (Les Prophètes, II. 1-12) goes even farther, and supposes that the first twenty-four chapters were merely written from an ideal standpoint anterior to the ruin of the Temple. The manner in which Ezekiel, in xxix. 17-21, professedly modifies and supplements without altering his original prophecy against Tyre, is wholly unlike the editing process suggested by these critics, and so far tells against their view.

first division consists of chs. i.-xxiv.; the second of chs. xxv.-xlviii. So marked is the division that the close of the twenty-fourth chapter marks the exact half of the Book.^g There are also marked differences between the general character of these great divisions. The first section is mainly characterised by threats of judgment; the second section by promises of deliverance, the idea of which is also involved in the threats against heathen nations. The Book may also be divided chronologically into three sections, viz.:—1. The prophecies before the fall of Jerusalem (i.-xxiv.); 2. Those delivered during the siege (xxv.-xxxii.); 3. Those delivered after the beginning of the final captivity (xxxiii.-xlviii.). Ezekiel himself gives fourteen dates for his groups of prophecies—namely, those delivered in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity (i.-vii.); in the sixth year (viii.-xix.); in the seventh year (xx.-xxiii.); in the ninth year (xxiv. xxv.); in the tenth year (xxix. 1-16); in the eleventh year (xxvi.-xxviii.); xxx. 20-26; xxxi.); in the twelfth year (xxxii., and perhaps xxxv.-xxxix.); in the twenty-fifth year (xl.-xlviii.); in the twenty-seventh year (xxix. 17-xxx. 1-20).^h

1. Looking yet more closely at the structure of the Book, we find that the first great section is composed of—I. The glorious vision which inaugurated the Prophet's work (i. ii. iii.). II. The general carrying out of his commission (iii.-vii.) by various symbolic actions (iv. v.); by the rebuke of idolatry (vi.); and the threat of the final doom of Judah (vii.). III. Details of the profanation of the Temple by idolatry, and of the consequent judgment which shall come upon Jerusalem (viii.-xi.). IV. Further rebukes of the special sins of the age, interspersed with exhortations to repentance, and threats of punishment (xii.-xix.). V. The imminence of the doom, and renewed denunciation of the crimes by which it had been precipitated (xx.-xxiii.). VI. The significance of the now-commencing punishment (xxiv.).

2. The next section (xxv.-xxxii.) is composed of seven oracles against Ammon, Moab, Edom, the Philistines, and Sidon,ⁱ together with the long and magnificent philippic against Tyre (xxvi.-xxviii. 19) and Egypt (xxix.-xxxii.); which, as the Prophet explains (xxviii. 24-26), are intended as a source of consolation to Israel. They were delivered during the eighteen months of the siege. Between the beginning of the siege and the destruction of the Temple the Prophet has no direct message to his countrymen; and some have even understood xxiv. 27, xxix. 21, xxxiii. 22 (cp. iii. 26) in the sense that during the progress of the siege he was actually dumb or silent, and that this accounts for the parenthetic character of these chapters.^k ^g It need hardly be said that the division of the Book into actual chapters did not take place until centuries after the days of Ezekiel.

^h xxix. 17 sq. is a postscript to modify what had been said about the sack of Tyre in xxvi. See infra.

ⁱ The comparatively insignificant Sidon (xxviii. 20-23) would perhaps hardly have been included among these denunciations except from the mystic significance attached to the number seven.

^k The real or ideal dumbness was removed "in the twelfth year of our captivity" (xxxiii. 21), but in this passage the Peshitto reads "eleventh," and is followed

In this section one paragraph (xxix. 17-21) is placed out of its proper chronological order, having been uttered in the twenty-seventh year of the captivity of Jehoiachin, and therefore being the latest of all the prophecies of which Ezekiel himself furnishes a date. It was added seventeen years after the general prophecy against Tyre, and may perhaps serve to explain circumstances about the siege which had not originally come into the sphere of the Prophet's vision, and of which the details are not accurately known to us.

3. The third section consists of eight oracles delivered after the fall of Jerusalem. They are more directly full of hope and consolation. The thirty-fourth chapter contains the reproof of the shepherds that feed themselves, and the thirty-fifth is the judgment of Mount Seir. The thirty-seventh contains the splendid vision in which, under the image of the dry bones in the valley, Ezekiel not only encourages his people to believe in the possibility of their restoration, but also foreshadows, more nearly than any of his predecessors, the great doctrine of the resurrection of the body. The thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters contain in four divisions the prophecy against Gog and Magog. This general picture of God's judgments is no doubt partly intended, like Rev. xx. 7-10, in which it is imitated, to indicate the final conflict and overthrow of the powers of evil, but may also be meant to indicate in a cryptographic manner the doom of Babylon. This would account for the obscurity of the prophecy, and the sort of apocalyptic twilight in which it is enveloped.

4. The last section contains nine chapters (xl.-xlviii.) which have suggested many difficulties, and have been explained in widely different manners. They fall into three sections. The first (xl.-xliii.) minutely describes the construction of the Temple; the second (xliv.-xlv.) the relation of different classes to the Temple and its service; the third (xlvii. xlviii.) the blessing which streams from the Temple, and its position in the redistributed territories of the land. On the way in which we understand this section depends our apprehension of the whole work and mind of Ezekiel, and of the remarkable position which he occupies in Jewish history.

Of the general views respecting these chapters some may be dismissed at once and finally. 1. It is certain that they are not historical, for the details differ absolutely from the details of Solomon's Temple, as well as from those of the second and of Herod's Temple. 2. It is equally certain, in spite of such isolated expressions as xliii. 10, xlv. 1, &c., that they could never have been meant to be literally carried out, for they abound in impossibilities on every page, and all commentators alike are compelled to admit that there can be nothing literal in the vision of the holy waters (xlvii. 1-12). 3. The attempt to give them a future applicability lands us in the absurd conclusion that there is to be a millennial retrogression from Christianity to the "weak and beggarly elements" of Jewish bondage. 4. All endeavours to explain them allegorically or symbolically have hopelessly failed, because,

although such meaning may be attached to some of the numbers and arrangements, they cannot be applied without the utmost arbitrariness to the great mass of minute particulars. 5. Hence there can be no reasonable doubt that in this, as in the previous vision of Gog and Magog, and indeed by a literary method which prevails throughout his Book, Ezekiel is simply clothing general views and conceptions in elaborate and concrete forms. It is clear from his appeal to direct Divine sanction (xliiii. 10, 11) that he is not indulging in an objectless play of fancy; and indeed his general views and enactments, as Reuss truly says, were not without influence on subsequent legislation. Nevertheless in these eight oracles we are evidently moving in the region of a pure Utopia, and dealing only with an imaginative composition.¹ That this ideal picture was incapable of realisation may be seen from the facts that (α) it sets at defiance the geography of the Holy Land,² and the entire circumstances of the returning exiles. (β) The Temple with its precincts is a mile square, or larger than all Jerusalem, and yet is on the top of a mountain. (γ) It is also placed nine and a half miles from the utmost bound of the city, and more than fourteen miles from its centre. (δ) If equal strips of land were, in defiance of all principles of justice, assigned to the twelve tribes, the Temple could have nothing to do with Zion, and would be well on the road to Samaria.³ (ε) The "oblation" (xlv. 1) of holy land for the sanctuary cannot by any possibility be brought into the limits assigned for Palestine (xlvii. 15-21). (ζ) The distribution of lands to the tribes, besides its other incongruities, directly contradicts the prediction of Obadiah v. 19. (η) The land assigned to the support of the Temple and its sacrifices is wholly inadequate, and yet the enormous size of the area set apart for the Temple itself leaves no room for some of the tribes in the districts marked out for them. It may therefore be regarded as unquestionable that all the concrete imagery is but the literary development of a free ideal.

But what was the object of the Prophet in this ideal? The answer is that it represents in concentrated form the view which he held of his entire mission. The famous nine chapters were written with the same kind of object as Plato's Republic, Sir Thomas More's Utopia, Bacon's New Atlantis, Campanella's Civitas Solis, Harington's Oceana, and Fénelon's Sulente. They clothe in concrete forms, which were never meant for actual realisation, Ezekiel's conceptions as to the future development of the theocracy, and they are therefore to be regarded as being, from his point of view, the crown and flower of all his work. He saw that it was God's will that the future of Israel should differ widely from the past, and that practical securities must be devised against the danger of a national relapse into former idolatries. He saw that those securities could best be provided in the then condition of his people by the development of an elaborate system of ritual. A priest by birth, by training, and by all his sympathies, he was also taught by the logic of events and the revelation of God, that hereafter the Temple and its service must occupy a different and more important position than it had done during the whole period since the Exodus. It was intended to fulfil the function of a necessary education to the Jews until the fulness of the time should come. They were to be reminded by every detail of worship that they were a peculiar people. The Temple was to be the centre and symbol of their life. That Temple could not be rich with treasures of gold and silver, like the Temple of Solomon, but (ideally) it was to be built with elaborate and symbolic symmetry, and isolated in the centre of an immense domain, and to be made the scene of continuous and solemn sacrifices. The king or prince was no longer to claim the prominent functions with regard to it which he had previously usurped, but was to be surrounded with safeguards against the temptations to oppression (xlv. 7, 8), and was to employ his revenues to supply the priests with sacrifices (xlv. 16, 17). The feasts and the offerings are carefully specified. The whole system is to be placed under the charge of a special order, the priests of the family of Zadok, who are to be the exclusive guardians of the sacred precincts. The aim of the code is "holiness" in the sense of consecrated separation (Lev. xix. 2): "the holy mount surrounded by the holy territory of the priests; the holy house upon the holy mount; the holy men to serve the holy house." In other words, the state is practically to be transformed into a Church, and the theocracy is to assume the form of a monarchy under the administration of scribes and people.

² The Transjordanic territory is excluded. The remainder of the strip assigned to the Holy City is divided between the priests of the house of Zadok, the other Levites, and the prince (xlviii.).

V. Ezekiel and Leviticus.—We have now to consider the modern theories respecting these chapters, which at the present time form one of the most debated problems of the Old Testament.

The resemblances between Ezekiel and Lev. xvii.–xxvi. are of the most remarkable character, and it cannot be for a moment denied that there is some connexion between the two Books. A similarity so close can only have arisen in one of four ways: (1) Either Ezekiel borrowed largely from the Book of Leviticus; or (2) those chapters of the Book of Leviticus are a later addition to the Pentateuch by authors who borrowed largely from the Book of Ezekiel; or (3) both are alike influenced in large measure by some common source; or (4) both were written by the same author.

The last conclusion (4) is that of Graf (Die Gesch. Bücher des Alten Testaments, 1866, pp. 81–83), whose theory was laboriously supported by Bishop Colenso (Pentateuch, pt. vi. ch. i. ii.).^o Kayser, in the main, maintained the same views ^o He held that Ezekiel wrote Lev. xxvi., and possibly Lev. xviii.–xx.; but, seeing the many expressions not found in Ezekiel which occur in Lev. xliii., xlv., xxv., xvii., he thought that others of the last ten chapters of Leviticus were written either by Ezekiel or by a writer or writers who stood in close relation to him.

(Jahrb. f. prot. Theol. 1881, pp. 541 sq.), by eliminating from the chapters certain elements which he regarded as Elohistie. The argument in favour of this opinion loses nearly all its force when side by side with the verbal resemblances we observe the differences between the systems of the two Books. Those differences are most striking. Thus Ezekiel ignores the existence of a high-priest, unless it be very indirectly implied in xli. 3. It is still more strange that he ignores the Day of Atonement, the Feast of Pentecost, and the New Moons, and says nothing of an evening sacrifice (xvi. 13–15) or of the Paschal Lamb. He also changes many other details of the Law as laid down in the Pentateuch, as for instance in the ritual of the Feast of Tabernacles (xlv. 25: cp. Num. xxix. 12–24, 35; Lev. xxiii. 36, 39. Compare also Ezek. xlv. 20; Lev. xxi. 5; Ezek. xlv. 22; Lev. xxi. 7, 13, 14, &c.).^p Accordingly this theory is rejected by Klostermann, Zeitschr. f. luther. Theol. 1877, pp. 401 sq.; Wellhausen, Eint. in d. A. T., Von Bleek, 1878, p. 173; Reuss, L'Hist. Sainte et la Loi, p. 253; Smend, Die Proph. Ezekiel erklärt, p. xxvii.; Delitzsch, Zeitsch. f. kirchl. Wiss. 1880, xii. 618; and Kuenen, De Godsdiens van Israel, ii. 94–96. The theory has however been again taken up by Horst, who in his Lev. xvii.–xxvi. und Hezekiel argues that the last nine chapters of Ezekiel were written by the Prophet long after the chapters in Leviticus, and in his prophetic capacity, while the Priestly-codex, as the section of Leviticus is often called, had been not so much written as compiled by him twenty-five years earlier from existing documents.

The first hypothesis—that Ezekiel borrowed largely from the Book of Leviticus—is the one adopted by Klostermann (l. c.); Dillmann, Komm. Ex. Levit., who, however, admits the possibility of additions to Leviticus at the time of the Exile and later; Hoffmann, Magazin f. d. Wissensch. des Judenth., 1879, pp. 209–215; Nöldeke, Zur Kritik des A. T., pp. 67–71, and Delitzsch, Pent. kritische Stud., p. 620.^q It is in favour of this opinion that, so far as phraseology is concerned, Ezekiel is not an original writer, for he borrows very largely from Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Zephaniah, and above all Jeremiah. If this hypothesis be true, the extent of Ezekiel's indebtedness still remains a remarkable problem, especially since many of the words and expressions are unique. Against these must indeed be set a certain number of peculiarities and differences. Hoffmann uses these as a proof that Ezekiel could not have written the Priest-codex, because in it there are none of the approximations to the language of older writers which are found in the prophecy; and also because in the Priest-codex the parallels are to the language of Ezekiel only, and not to the phrases which he has in common with Deuteronomy and Jeremiah. Full weight must be allowed to these considerations, but it still remains difficult to account for the circumstance that Ezekiel should have written a Book of forty-eight chapters, and should have singled out from the whole Pentateuch one small section, and especially one isolated chapter (Lev. xxvi.), for such deep study as to have become thoroughly saturated with its style and expressions, and to have borrowed from one chapter nearly fifty expressions, of which eighteen occur nowhere else in the Bible.*

^p On the many differences between Ezekiel and the Mosaic Law and later custom, see Professor Gardiner "on Ezekiel and the Law," Journ. of Soc. of Bib. Lit., June 1881. Strack, in his article on the Pentateuch (Herzog, RE³ xl.), argues further that the mention of the year of Jubilee in Lev. xxv. 8, and of the Urim and Thummim in Lev. viii. 8, is inconsistent with the theory that the main part of the Levitic legislation is of post-Exilian origin. See Edersheim, Prophecy and History, 1885, pp. 270–273.

^q See the long list of parallels in Smend's Commentary, pp. xxiv., xxv. Hoffmann shows that no less than eighty-one passages in this section of Leviticus have eighty-three parallels in Ezekiel, so that one of the writers must have seen the other.

The second hypothesis (2)—that the Priestly-codex is in reality later than Ezekiel and partially founded on him—is, with trivial variations, that of Wellhausen, Kuenen, Smend, Reuss, Lagarde, Stade, and Robertson Smith. Their opinion is that the Book of Deuteronomy was in the main the Book found—or, as they would say, produced—by the high-priest Hilkiyah in the reign of Josiah, and that the chapters in Leviticus are a modification of Ezekiel's preparatory and ideal scheme. They consider that the Prophet meant his Torah to be a sketch for the ritual of the Restoration, which was to supersede the old and corrupt usage of the Temple (xliii. 7; xliv. 5; xlv. 8, 9), and which was to be at once a reward for the repentance of his countrymen and a scheme to protect them from again falling into like sins (Rob. Smith, The Prophets of the Old Testament, pp. 374-387). The essence of this new ideal is its sacerdotalism, in that it gives prominence to an atoning ritual, and puts an end to the sacrifices of individual Israelites. This it effects partly by a stated national sacrifice, and partly by separating the worshippers from the sacrifices by "a double cordon of priests and Levites." The Levitical legislation, according to this view, is but a practical adaptation of Ezekiel's essential principles to the actual circumstances of the second Temple, when Jews were no longer a free people but a religious community. In the so-called "Priestly Codex" of Leviticus the nation becomes "the congregation;" the civil order is almost absorbed in the ecclesiastical; and the State becomes a Church; the old prophetic ideal becomes a sacerdotal ideal.† Ezekiel's last nine chapters are regarded as the modification of an old priestly Torah, and Lev. xvii.-xxvi. as a practical adaptation of this Torah, but with the re-admission of many ancient ordinances. On this hypothesis Lev. xxvi. is considered to be an intentional imitation of the style and manner of Ezekiel. For criticism of this view, we must refer to the paper of Prof. Gardiner already quoted. No literary question seems more difficult on à priori grounds than the decision as to which of two writers has borrowed from the other. For instance, every fresh critic takes a different view of the obvious relations between the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, and between St. Jude and 2 Pet. ii.; and quite recently there have been opposite opinions as to whether the Epistle of Barnabas borrows from the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles or vice versa. All that can be regarded as certain in this instance is that there is some direct relation between the two sections of Ezekiel and Leviticus. Writers like Hoffmann and Kalisch, among others, adopt the third hypothesis (3), that both alike are founded on an older work; but no one could compare such paragraphs as Lev. xxvi. 30-33 with Ezek. vi. 3-7, or again Lev. xxvi. with Ezek. xxxiv. 25-31, without a strong conviction that one of the writers must have actually seen the existing work of the other. The questions here suggested cannot be regarded as finally settled, but meanwhile we may see as clearly as Luther did centuries ago, that the authorship of this or that section of the Pentateuch is a matter to be decided (as alone it can be decided) by simple criticism, and that it lies altogether out of the domain of religion.

There are no direct quotations from Ezekiel in the New Testament, but in the Apocalypse there are many parallels and obvious allusions to the later chapters. A useful list of these will be found in Dr. Currey's Commentary (Speaker's Commentary, vi. 12-16).

The Vision of Ezekiel ("The Chariot") became one of the chief studies of the Kabbalists, and the repetition of it was supposed to be surrounded with perils. The Talmud tells us of a child who was trying to comprehend Chasmal (A. V. "amber," Ezek. i. 4), when a fire came out of the Chasmal and consumed him (Chagiga, f. 13, 1). Many other wonderful circumstances about the $\text{מַשְׁכָּבֵי הַקָּדוֹשׁ}$ are narrated in the same treatise, and in f. 11, 2, that there were four questions relating to it into which, if a man pried, "it were better for him that he had never been born." See, too, Sukka, f. 28, 1, and Klein, Le Judaïsme, p. 32.

The text of Ezekiel is considered to be the most corrupt in the Old Testament except that of the books of Samuel. It may often be conjecturally emended from the general character of the prophet's style, and sometimes from the renderings of the LXX., though many of the various readings are obviously older than that Version. Some are due to glosses and manipulations of later scribes, especially in chs. xl.-xlviii. See Smend, Der Proph. Ezechiel, p. xxix.

VI. Bibliography.—The chief commentators on this "most neglected of the prophets" are, among the Fathers, Origen, Jerome, and Theodoret; among the Jews, Rabbis David Qimchi and Abarbanel; among the Reformers, Oecolampadius and Calvin; among Romanists, Pradus and Villalpandus. There are modern commentaries by Marck (1731), Venema (1790), Newcome, Greenhill, Fairbairn (1851), Kliefoth (1856), Henderson, Hävernick (1843), Hitzig (1847), Hengstenberg (1867), Keil (1868), Smend* (1880), Schröder (in Lange's Bibelwerk), Cornill (1886), and Orelli (in Strack u. Zückler's Kgf. Komm., 1888). In the Speaker's Commentary (1876) the Book is edited by Dr. Currey; in Bishop Ellicott's Commentary (1884), by Dr. Gardiner.

E'ZEL, THE STONE (אֶזֶל הַצֵּן); B. $\epsilon\tau\lambda$ 'Εργάβ ἐκείνο, A. ἔργον; lapis cui nomen est Ezel). A well-known stone in the neighbourhood of Saul's residence, the scene of the parting of David and Jonathan when the former finally fled from the court (1 Sam. xx. 19). At the second mention of the spot (v. 41) the Hebrew text (אֶזֶל הַצֵּן); A. V. and R. V. "out of a place toward the south," R. V. marg. from beside the south) is, in the opinion of critics, undoubtedly corrupt (see the emendation of the text in Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. on 1 Sam. xx. 19). The true reading is indicated by the LXX. B., which in both cases has Ergab or Arjab—in v. 19 for the Hebrew Eben, "stone," and in v. 41 for han-nejeb, "the south." Ergab is doubtless the Greek rendering of the Hebrew Argob=a heap of stones. The true reading of v. 41 will therefore be as follows: "David arose from close to the stone heap,"—close to which (the same preposition, אֶל, A. V. "by") it had been arranged beforehand that he should remain (v. 19). The change in v. 41 from אֶל הַצֵּן, as the text stood at the time of the LXX., to אֶזֶל הַצֵּן, as it now stands, is one which might easily take place. [G.] [W.]

E'ZEM (אֶזֶם = bone; B. Βοσδάλ, A. Βασδύμ; Asom), one of the towns of Simeon (1 Ch. iv. 29). In the lists of Joshua (xix. 3) the name appears in the slightly different form of AZEM (the vowel being lengthened before the cause). [G.]

E'ZER (עֶזֶר = treasure; 'Εζέρ; Ezer). 1. A son of Ephraim, who was slain by the aboriginal inhabitants of Gath, while engaged in a foray on their cattle (1 Ch. vii. 21). Ewald (Geschichte, i. 490) assigns this occurrence to the pre-Egyptian period. 2. A priest noticed in the Book of Nehemiah (xii. 42; 'Ιεζούρ, LXX.). 3. 1 Ch. iv. 4. [W. L. B.]

E'ZION-GA'BER, or . . . GE'BER (גִּבְרָה = the giant's back-bone; Γαβρών Γαβέρ; Asiongaber; Num. xxxiii. 35; Deut. ii. 8; 1 K. ix. 26, xxii. 48; 2 Ch. viii. 17), the last station named for the encampment of the Israelites before they came to "the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh," subsequently the station of Solomon's navy, described as near "Elath, on the sea shore, in the land of Edom" (R. V.); and where that of Jehoshaphat was afterwards "broken"—probably destroyed on the rocks which lie in "jagged ranges on each side" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 2). Wellsted (ii. ch. ix. 153) would find it in Dahab [DIZAHAB], but this could hardly be regarded as "in the land of Edom" (although possibly the rocks which Wellsted describes may have been the actual scene of the wreck), nor would it accord with Josephus (Ant. viii. 6, § 4)* as "not far from Elath." According to the map of Kiepert (in Robinson, 1856), it stands at 'Ain el-Ghudyan, about 10 miles up what is now the dry bed of the Arabah, but, as he supposed, was then the northern end of the gulf, which may have anciently had, like that of Suez, a further extension. This probably is the best site for it. By comparing 1 K. ix. 26, 27 with 2 Ch. viii. 17, 18, it is probable that timber was floated from Tyre to the nearest point on the Mediterranean coast, and then conveyed over land to the head of the Gulf of Akabah, where the ships seem to have been built; for there can hardly have been adequate forests in the neighbourhood. EZ'NITE, THE (עֶזְנִית, Keri עֶזְנִי; B. δ 'Ασωνίαιος, A. 'Ασωνίαιος; Vulg. omits). According to the statement of 2 Sam. xxiii. 8, "Adino the Eznite" was another name for (R. V.) "Josh-ebbasshebeth a Tachemonite (A. V. "the Tachmonite that sate in the seat"), chief among the captains." The passage is, however, one of the most disputed in the whole Bible, owing partly to the difficulty of the one man bearing two names so distinct without any assigned reason, and partly to the discrepancy between it and the parallel sentence in 1 Ch. xi. 11, in which for the words "Adino the Eznite" other Hebrew words are found, not very dissimilar in appearance, but meaning "he shook (A. V. and R. V. "lifted up") his spear." Modern critics (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. in loco) are mostly agreed that the words in Chronicles preserve the original text, which in the Book of Samuel has become corrupted. The form of this particular word is the original text (the Āthibh) Etnzo, which has been altered to Etnzi by the Masoret scribes (in the Keri), apparently to admit of some meaning being obtained from it. Jerome read it Etnzo, and taking it to be a declension of Etz (= "wood") has rendered the words "quasi tenerrimus ligni vermiculus." The LXX. and some Hebrew MSS. (see Davidson's Heb. Text) add the words of Chronicles to the text of Samuel, a course followed by the A. V. The passage has been examined at length by Kennicott (Dissertation 1, 71-128) and Gesenius (Thes. pp. 994, 995), to whom the reader must be referred for details. Their conclusion is that the reading of the Chronicles is correct (see Driver, l. c.). Ewald does not mention it (Gesch. iii. 180, note). [G.] [W.]

EZ'RA (עֶזְרָא = help; "Εσδρας). 1. The head of one of the twenty-two courses of priests which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 2). But in the somewhat parallel list of Neh. x. 2-8, the name of the same person is written עֶזְרִיָּהּ, Azariah, as it is probably in Ezra vii. 1.

2. A man of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 17).

3. The famous scribe and priest, descended from Hilkiah the high-priest in Josiah's reign, from whose younger son Azariah sprung Seraiah, Ezra's father (Ezra vii. 1), thought by many to be quite a different person from Seraiah the high-priest. All that is really known of Ezra is contained in the last four chapters of the Book of Ezra and in Neh. viii. and xii. 26. From these passages we learn that he was a learned and pious priest residing at Babylon in the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus (B.C. 465-425). The origin of his influence with the king does not appear, but in the seventh year of his reign, in spite of the unfavourable report which had been sent by Rehum and Shimshai (Ezra iv. 8, 9), he obtained leave to go to Jerusalem, and to take with him a company of Israelites, together with priests, a few Levites, singers, porters, and Nethinim. Of these a list, amounting to 1754, is given in Ezra viii.; and these, also, doubtless form a part of the full list of the returned captives contained in Neh. vii., and in duplicate in Ezra ii. (cp. Smend, Die Listen d. BB. Esra u. Neh.). Including women and children, the number probably amounted to between 6,000 and 8,000 souls. The journey of Ezra and his companions from Babylon to Jerusalem took just four months; and they brought up with them a large free-will offering of gold, silver, and silver vessels, contributed, not only by the Babylonian Jews, but by the king himself and his counsellors. These offerings were for the House of God, to beautify it, and for the purchase of bullocks, rams, and the other offerings required for the Temple-service. In addition to this, Ezra was empowered to draw upon the king's treasurers beyond the river for any further supplies he might require; and all priests, Levites, and other ministers of the Temple, were exempted from taxation. Ezra had also authority given him to appoint magistrates and judges in Judaea, with power of life and death over all offenders. This ample commission was granted him at his own request (v. 6), and it appears that his great design was to effect a religious reformation among the Palestine Jews, and to bring them back to the observation of the Law of Moses, from which they had grievously declined. His first step, accordingly, was to enforce a separation from their wives upon all who had made heathen marriages, in which number were many priests and Levites, as well as other Israelites. This was effected in little more than six months after his arrival at Jerusalem.* With the detailed account of this important transaction Ezra's autobiography ends abruptly, and we hear nothing more of him till, thirteen years afterwards, in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, we find him again at Jerusalem with Nehemiah "the Tirshatha." It is generally assumed that Ezra had continued governor till Nehemiah superseded him; but as Ezra's commission was only of a temporary nature, "to inquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem" (Ezra vii. 14), and to carry thither "the silver and gold which the king and his counsellors had freely offered unto the God of Israel" (r. 15), and as there is no trace whatever of his presence at Jerusalem between the eighth and the twentieth of Artaxerxes, it seems probable that after he had effected the above-named reformation, and had appointed competent judges and magistrates, with authority to maintain it, he himself returned to the king of Persia. This is in itself what one would expect, and what is borne out by the parallel case of Nehemiah, and it also accounts for the abrupt termination of Ezra's narrative, and for that relapse of the Jews into their former irregularities which is apparent in the Book of Nehemiah. Such a relapse, and such a state of affairs at Jerusalem in general, could scarcely have occurred if Ezra had continued there.^b Whether he returned to Jerusalem with Nehemiah, or separately, does not appear certainly; but as he is not mentioned in Nehemiah's narrative till after the completion of the wall (Neh. viii. 1), it is perhaps probable that he followed the latter some months later, having, perhaps, been sent for to aid him in his work. The functions he executed under Nehemiah's government were purely of a priestly and ecclesiastical character, such as reading and interpreting the Law of Moses to the people during the eight days of the Feast of Tabernacles, praying in the congregation, assisting at the dedication of the wall, and in promoting the religious reformation so happily effected by the Tirshatha. But in this he filled the first place; being repeatedly coupled with Nehemiah the Tirshatha (viii. 9; xii. 26), while Eliashib the high-priest is not mentioned as taking any part in the reformation at all, through (as some think; cp. Hunter, ii. 235) hostility to the course pursued. In the sealing to the covenant described in Neh. x., Ezra's name does not occur, probably because this formal act on the part of the man who had drawn up the covenant was not considered necessary, though some consider that he sealed under the patronymic Seraiah or Azariah (v. 2). As Ezra is not mentioned after Nehemiah's departure for Babylon in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes, and as everything fell into confusion during Nehemiah's absence (Neh. xiii.), it is not unlikely that Ezra may have died or returned to Babylon before that year (see his character, Mal. ii. 5-7). Josephus, who should be our next best authority after Scripture, evidently knew nothing about the time or the place of his death. He vaguely says, "He died an old man, and was buried in a magnificent manner at Jerusalem" (Ant.

^b On the other hand, it is argued that Ezra remained all this time in Jerusalem, but was forced into inactivity by the strong reaction against his Puritan régime. Cp. Hunter, ii. 96 sq. —[F.]

* The steps of Ezra's reformation are well, if somewhat imaginatively, described by Hunter, After the Exile, II. chs. i. II.—[F.]

xi. 5, § 5), and places his death in the high-priesthood of Joacim, and before the government of Nehemiah! But that he lived under the high-priesthood of Eliashib and the government of Nehemiah is expressly stated in Nehemiah; and there was a strong Jewish tradition that he was buried in Persia. Thus Benjamin of Tudela says of Nehar-Samorah—apparently some place on the lower Tigris, on the frontier of Persia, Zamuza according to the Talmudists, otherwise Zamzumu—"The sepulchre of Ezra the priest and scribe is in this place, where he died on his journey from Jerusalem to king Artaxerxes" (i. 116), a tradition which certainly agrees very well with the narrative of Nehemiah. This sepulchre is shown to this day (ib. ii. 116, note).

Tomb of Ezra on the banks of the Euphrates.

As regards the traditional history of Ezra, it is extremely difficult to judge what portion of it has any historical foundation. The principal works ascribed to him by the Jews, and, on the strength of their testimony, by Christians also, are:—1. The institution of the Great Synagogue, of which, the Jews say, Ezra was president, and Daniel, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, Zorobabel, Mordecai, Jeshua, Nehemiah, &c., were members; Simeon the Just, the last survivor, living on till the time of Alexander the Great! 2. The settling the Canon of Scripture, and restoring, correcting, and editing the whole sacred volume according to the threefold arrangement of the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa, with the divisions of the Pesukim, or verses, the vowel-points handed down by tradition from Moses, and the emendations of the Keri. 3. The introduction of the Chaldee character instead of the old Hebrew or Samaritan. 4. The compilership of the Books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and, some add, Esther; and, many of the Jews say, also of the Books of Ezekiel, Daniel, and the twelve Prophets. 5. The establishment of synagogues. Of most of these works a full account is given in Prideaux's Connexion, i. 308-348 and 355-376; also in Buxtorf's Tiberias. References to the chief rabbinical and other authorities will be found in Winer; Fürst, Der Kanon d. A. Ts., p. 112 sq.; and Hamburger, R.E. s. n. A compendious account of the arguments by which most of these Jewish statements are proved to be fabulous is given in Stehelin's Rabbin. Literat. pp. 5-8. The chief are drawn from the silence of the sacred writers themselves, of the apocryphal books, and of Josephus—and, it might be added, of Jerome—and from the fact that they may be traced to the author of the chapter in the Mishna called Pirke Aroth. Here, however, it must suffice to observe that the pointed description of Ezra (vii. 6) as "a ready scribe in the Law of Moses," repeated in vv. 11, 12, 21, added to the information concerning him that "he had prepared his heart to seek the Law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments" (vii. 10), and his commission "to teach the laws of his God to such as knew them not" (c. 25), and his great diligence in reading the Scriptures to the people, all give the utmost probability to the account which attributes to him a corrected edition of the Scriptures, and the circulation of many such copies. The Books of Nehemiah and Malachi must indeed have been added later; possibly by Malachi's authority; and some tradition to this effect may have given rise to the Jewish fable of Malachi being the same person as Ezra. But we cannot affirm that Ezra inserted in the Canon any Books that were not already acknowledged as inspired, as we have no sufficient ground for ascribing to him the prophetic character. Even the Books of which he was the compiler may not have assumed definitely the character of SCRIPTURE till they were sanctioned by Malachi. There does not, however, seem to be sufficient ground for forming a definite opinion on the details of the subject. In like manner one can only say that the introduction of the Chaldee character, and the commencement of such stated meetings for hearing the Scriptures read as led to the regular synagogue-service, are things likely to have occurred about this time. For the question of Ezra's authorship, see CHRONICLES and EZRA, BOOK OF.

[A. C. H.]

EZRA, BOOK OF. I. Title and Structure of the Book.—The Book of Ezra speaks for itself to any one who reads it with ordinary intelligence, and without any prejudice as to its nature and composition. It is manifestly a continuation of the Books of Chronicles, as indeed it is called by Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, Sermones diersum Esdras (ap. Cosin's Canon of Scr. 51). It is naturally a fresh Book, as commencing the history of the returned captives after seventy years of suspension, as it were, of the national life. But when we speak of the Book as a chronicle, we at once declare the nature of it, which its contents also abundantly confirm. Like the two Books of Chronicles, it consists of the contemporary historical journals kept from time to time by the Prophets, or other authorised persons, who were eye-witnesses for the most part of what they record, and whose several narratives were afterwards strung together, and either abridged or added to, as the case required, by a later hand. That later hand, in the Book of Ezra, was doubtless Ezra's own, as appears by the last four chapters, as well as by other matter inserted in the previous chapters. While therefore, in a certain sense, the whole Book is Ezra's, as put together by him, yet, strictly, only the last four chapters are his original work. Nor will it be difficult to point out with tolerable certainty several of the writers of whose writings the first six chapters are composed. It has already been suggested [CHRONICLES, p. 577, col 1] that the chief portion of the last chapter of 2 Ch. and Ezra I. may probably have been written by Daniel. The evidences of this in Ezra i. must now be given more fully. No one probably can read Daniel as a genuine Book, and not be struck with the very singular circumstance that, while he tells us in ch. ix. that he was aware that the seventy years' Captivity, foretold by Jeremiah, was near its close, and was led thereby to pray earnestly for the restoration of Jerusalem, and while he records the remarkable vision in answer to his prayer, yet he takes not the slightest notice of Cyrus's decree, by which Jeremiah's prophecy was fulfilled, and his own heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel was accomplished, and which must have been the most stirring event in his long life, not even excepting the incident of the den of lions. He passes over in utter silence the first year of Cyrus, to which pointed allusion is made in Dan. i. 21, and proceeds in ch. x. to the third year of Cyrus. Such silence is utterly unaccountable. But Ezra i. supplies the missing notice. If placed between Dan. ix. and x. it exactly fills up the gap, and records the event of the first year of Cyrus, in which Daniel was so deeply interested. And not only so, but the manner of the record is exactly Daniel's. Ezra i. 1: "And in the first year of Cyrus, king of Persia," is the precise formula used in Dan. i. 1; ii. 1; vii. 1; viii. 1; ix. 1; x. 1; xi. 1. The designation (vv. 1, 2, 8) "Cyrus, king of Persia," is that used in Dan. x. 1; the reference to the prophecy of Jeremiah in v. 1 is similar to that in Dan. ix. 2, and the natural sequence to it. The giving the text of the decree, vv. 2-4 (cp. Dan. iv.), the mention of the name of "Mithredath the treasurer," v. 8 (cp. Dan. i. 3, 11), the allusion to the sacred vessels placed by Nebuchadnezzar in the house of his god, v. 7 (cp. Dan. i. 2), the giving the Chaldee name of Zerubbabel, vv. 8, 11 (cp. Dan. i. 7), and the whole locus standi of the narrator, who evidently wrote at Babylon, not at Jerusalem, are all circumstances which in a marked manner point to Daniel as the writer of Ezra i. Nor is there the least improbability in the supposition that if Ezra edited Daniel's papers he might think the chapter in question more conveniently placed in its chronological position in the Chronicles than in the collection of Daniel's prophecies. It is scarcely necessary to add that several chapters of the Prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah are actually found in the Book of Kings, as e.g. Is. xxxvi.-xxxix. in 2 K. xviii.-xx. In the opinion then of the writer of this article, Ezra i. was by the hand of Daniel.

As regards Ezra ii., and as far as iii. 1, where the change of name from Sheshbazzar to Zerubbabel in v. 2, the mention of Nehemiah the Tirshatha in vv. 2 and 63, and that of Mordecai in v. 2, at once indicate a different and much later hand, we need not seek long to discover where it came from, because it is found in extenso, verbatim et literatim (with the exception of clerical errors), in ch. vii. of Nehemiah, to which it belongs beyond a shadow of doubt [NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF]. This portion then was written by Nehemiah, and was placed by Ezra, or possibly by a still later hand, in this position, as bearing upon the return from Captivity related in ch. i., though chronologically out of place. Whether the extract originally extended so far as iii. 1 may be doubted.* The next portion extends from iii. 2 to the end of ch. vi. With the exception of one large explanatory addition by Ezra, extending from iv. 6 to 23 (see below), this portion is the work of a writer contemporary with Zerubbabel and Jeshua and an eye-witness of the rebuilding of the Temple in the beginning of the reign of Darius Hystaspis. The minute details given of all the circumstances, such as the weeping of the old men who had seen the first Temple, the names of the Levites who took part in the work, of the heathen governors who hindered it, the expression (vi. 15) "This house was finished," &c., the number of the sacrifices offered at the dedication, and the whole tone of the narrative, bespeak an actor in the scenes described. Who then was so likely to record these interesting events as one of those Prophets who took an active part in promoting them, and a portion of whose duty it would be to continue the national chronicles? That it was the Prophet Haggai becomes tolerably sure when we observe further the following coincidences in style.

1. The title "the Prophet" is throughout this portion of Ezra attached in a peculiar way to the name of Haggai. Thus in v. 1 we read, "Then the Prophets, Haggai the Prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo, prophesied," &c.; and in vi. 14, "They prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the Prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo." And in like manner in Hag. i. 1, 3, 12, ii. 1, 10, he is called "Haggai the Prophet."

2. The designation of Zerubbabel and Jeshua is identical in the two writers: "Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Jeshua the son of Jozadak" (cp. Ezra iii. 2, 8, v. 2, with Hag. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 2, 4, 23). It will be seen that both writers usually name them together, and in the same order: Zechariah, on the contrary, does not once name them together, and calls them simply Zerubbabel and Jeshua. Only in vi. 11 he adds "the son of Josedech," where the difference in transliteration is merely an inaccuracy in the A. V. corrected in the R. V. "Jehozadak."

3. The description in Ezra v. 1, 2 of the effect of the preaching of Haggai and Zechariah upon Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and the people, is identical with that in Hag. i., only abbreviated. And Hag. ii. 3 alludes to the interesting circumstance recorded in Ezra iii. 12.

4. Both writers mark the date of the transactions they record by the year of "Darius the king" (Ezra iv. 24, vi. 15, compared with Hag. i. 1, 15, ii. 10, &c.).

5. Ezra iii. 8 contains exactly the same enumeration of those that worked, viz. "Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and the remnant of their brethren," as Hag. i. 12, 14, where we have "Zerubbabel, and Jeshua, with all the remnant of the people" (cp. too Ezra vi. 16 and Hag. ii. 2).

6. Both writers use the expression "the work of the house of the Lord" (Ezra iii. 8, 9 compared with Hag. i. 14); and both use the phrase "the foundation of the Temple was laid" (Ezra iii. 6, 10, 11, 12, compared with Hag. ii. 18).

7. Both writers use indifferently the expressions "the house of the Lord" and "the Temple of the Lord," but the former much more frequently than the latter. Thus the writer in Ezra uses the expression "the house" (בֵּית) twenty-five times, to six in which he speaks of "the Temple" (מִקְדָּשׁ). Haggai speaks of "the house" seven times, of "the Temple" twice.

8. Both writers make marked and frequent references to the Law of Moses. Thus cp. Ezra iii. 2, 3-6, 8, vi. 14, 16-22, with Hag. i. 8, 10, ii. 5, 11-13, 17, &c.

Such strongly-marked resemblances in the compass of two such brief portions of Scripture seem to prove, in the opinion of the writer of this article, that they are from the pen of the same writer.

But the above observations do not apply to Ezra iv. 6-23, which is a parenthetic addition by a much later hand, and, as the passage most clearly shows, made in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus (B.C. 465-425). The compiler who inserted ch. ii., a document drawn up in the reign of Artaxerxes, to illustrate the return of the captives under Zerubbabel, here inserts a notice of two historical facts,—of which one occurred in the reign of Xerxes, and the other in the reign of Artaxerxes,—to illustrate the opposition offered by the heathen to the rebuilding of the Temple in the reigns of Cyrus and Cambyses. He tells us that in the beginning of the reign of Xerxes, i.e. before Esther was in favour, they had written to the king to prejudice him against the Jews—a circumstance, by the way, which may rather have inclined him to listen to Haman's proposition; and he gives the text of letters sent to Artaxerxes, and of Artaxerxes' answer, on the strength of which Rehum and Shimshai forcibly hindered the Jews from rebuilding the city. These letters doubtless came into Ezra's hands at Babylon, and may have led to those endeavours on his part to make the king favourable to Jerusalem which issued in his own commission in the seventh year of his reign. At v. 24 Haggai's narrative proceeds in connexion with v. 5. The mention of Artaxerxes in vi. 14 is of the same kind. The last four chapters, beginning with chapter vii., are Ezra's own, and continue the history after a gap of fifty-eight years—from the sixth of Darius to the seventh of Artaxerxes. The only history of Judaea during this interval is what is given in the above-named parenthesis, from which we may infer that during this time there was no one in Palestine to write the Chronicles. The history of the Jews in Persia for the same period is given in the Book of Esther.

[In the canon of the Jewish Church the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah are reckoned as one (Baba Bathra, f. 15 a), and Ezra was regarded as the "writer." Josephus, Origen (Ε. πρώτος και δεύτερος εν εβλ 'E(σ) in Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 25), Melito of Sardis, Epiphanius, Jerome, and the LXX. (N. and A.) also counted the two as one; led to their conclusion as much by the literary character of the Books as by a supposed desire to bring the number of the Canonical Books into keeping with the number of the letters in the Hebrew and Greek alphabets. The abrupt ending, or rather non-ending, of Ezra, lent itself to this conclusion; while some of the most interesting episodes in the history of Ezra are to be found not in the Book which bears his name but in Nehemiah (vii. 73 b-x). It seems impossible now to determine when the separation between the two Books (Heb. text, LXX. B., and Vulg.) took place; but at least the point fixed upon—the appearance of Nehemiah upon the scene—commends itself as the most natural which could be selected.

The question of authorship, or perhaps compilership, is by no means settled. In the case of the Book Ezra (for the Book of Nehemiah, see s. n.), separate compilership being presupposed, the style of the portions admitted to be his (e.g. vii. 27, ix. 15) is declared to be in agreement with that found elsewhere in the Book; and such peculiarities as transition from the first to the third person, or sections alternately Hebrew and Aramaic, are not considered incompatible with the view that Ezra was himself the compiler. On this supposition Ezra's Book was written "in B.C. 457 or very shortly afterwards" (Sayce, pp. 28-33). On the other hand, the peculiarities above mentioned are with some critics matters of special moment; and dual compilership with a final redaction not being considered satisfactory, a date is taken from Neh. xii. 23 ("Darius the Persian" being taken to be Darius Codomannus, B.C. 336-330), and the Book is—as regards its present form—placed at the end of the 4th cent. or in the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. (Oettli, § 5.)—F.]

II. Text.—The text of the Book of Ezra is not in a good condition. There are a good many palpable corruptions both in the names and numerals, and perhaps in some other points. It is written partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee. The Chaldee begins at iv. 8, and continues to the end of vi. 18. The letter or decree of Artaxerxes (vii. 12-26) is also given in the original Chaldee. There has never been any doubt about Ezra being canonical, although there is no quotation from it in the N. T. Augustine says of Ezra, "magis rerum gestarum scriptor est habitus quam propheta" (de Civ. Dei, xviii. 36). The period covered by the Book is eighty years, from the first of Cyrus (B.C. 536) to the beginning of the eighth of Artaxerxes (B.C. 456). It embraces the governments of Zerubbabel and Ezra, the high-priesthoods of Jeshua, Joiakim, and the early part of Eliashib; and the reigns of Cyrus, Cambyses, Smerdis, Darius Hystaspis, Xerxes, and part of Artaxerxes. Of these Cambyses and Smerdis are not named. Xerxes is barely named iv. 6. [EZRAH, FIRST BOOK OF.] [A. C. H.]

III. Literature.—The best edition of the Heb.-Aram. text is Baer's Libri Danielis, Ezrae, et Nehemiae, 1882, with glossary, &c. by Fried. Delitzsch. Good commentaries are supplied by Bertheau-Ryssel² (in the Kgf. Hdb. z. A. T.); Keil (in Keil u. Delitzsch's Bibl. Komm.); Schultz (in Lange's Theol.-hom. Bibelv.); Neteler, Die BB. Ezras, Neh., u. Esther; Rawlinson (in Speiser's Commentary); Sayce (Intro. to the Books of Ezra, Neh. and Esther); Ryle (in Cambridge Bible for Schools); Driver (LOT, p. 507 sq.); and Oettli (in Strack und Zöckler's Kgf. Kanon. z. d. heil. Schriften d. A. T.), who also supplies references to numerous German monographs on special points. [F.]

EZRAHITE, THE (עֲזָרָהִיט; B. δ Ζαβελίτης, A. δ Ἐζραήλιτης [in K.], BN. Ἰσραηλιεύτης [in Ps.]; Ezrahita), a title attached to two persons—Ethan (1 K. iv. 31; Ps. lxxxix. title) and Heman (Ps. lxxxviii. title). The word is naturally derivable from Ezrah, or—which is almost the same in Hebrew—Zerach, עֲרָךְ; and accordingly in 1 Ch. ii. 6, Ethan and Heman are both given as sons of Zerach the son of Judah. Another Ethan and another Heman are named as Levites and musicians in the lists of 1 Ch. vi. and elsewhere. [G.]

EZRI (עֲזְרִי = my help; 'Εσδρῆ, A. Ἐζραῖ; Εσρι), son of Chelub, superintendent for king David of those who worked "for tillage of the ground" (1 Ch. xxvii. 26). [G.]

FABLE (μῦθος; fabula). Taking the words "fable" and "parable," not in their strict etymological meaning, but in that which has been stamped upon them by current usage—looking, i.e. at the Aesopic fable as the type of the one, at the Parables of the N. T. as the type of the other,—we have to ask, (1) In what relation they stand to each other, as instruments of moral teaching? (2) What use is made in the Bible of this or of that form? That they have much in common is, of course, obvious enough. In both we find "statements of facts, which do not even pretend to be historical, used as vehicles for the exhibition of a general truth" (Neander, Leben Jesu, p. 68). Both differ from the Mythus, in the modern sense of that word, in being the result of a deliberate choice of such a mode of teaching, not the spontaneous, unconscious evolution of thought in some symbolic form.* They take their place so far as species of the same genus. What are the characteristic marks by which the fable and the Parable differ from each other, it is perhaps easier to feel than to define. Thus we have (cp. Trench, Notes on the Parables, p. 2) (1) Lessing's statement that the fable takes the form of an actual narrative, while the Parable assumes only that what is related might have happened; (2) Herder's, that the difference lies in the fable's dealing with brute or inanimate nature, in the Parable's drawing its materials exclusively from human life; (3) Olshausen's (on Matt. xiii. 1), followed by Trench (l. c.), that it is to be found in the higher truths of which the Parable is the vehicle. Perhaps the most satisfactory summing up of the chief distinctive features of each is to be found in the following extract from Neander (l. c.):—"The Parable is distinguished from the fable by this, that, in the latter, qualities or acts of a higher class of beings may be attributed to a lower (e.g. those of men to brutes); while, in the former, the lower sphere is kept perfectly distinct from that which it seems to illustrate. The beings and powers thus introduced always follow the law of their nature, but their acts, according to this law, are used to figure those of a higher race. . . . The mere introduction of brutes as personal agents, in the fable, is not sufficient to distinguish it from the Parable which may make use of the same contrivance; as, for example, Christ employs the sheep in one of His parables. The great distinction here, also, lies in what has already been remarked; brutes introduced in the Parable act according to the law of their nature, and the two spheres of nature and of the kingdom of God are carefully separated from each other. Hence the reciprocal relations of brutes to each other are not made use of, as these could furnish no appropriate image of the relation between man and the kingdom of God."

* On the myth see Bishop Westcott, Essays on the History of the Religious Thought in the West, p. 3.

Of the fable, as thus distinguished from the Parable, we have but two examples in the Bible: (1) that of the trees choosing their king, addressed by Jotham to the men of Shechem (Judg. ix. 8-15)—unnecessarily placed by some (cp. Bleek-Wellhausen, ⁴ p. 194) in the times of the Kings; (2) that of the cedar of Lebanon and the thistle, as the answer of Jehoshaphat to the challenge of Amaziah (2 K. xiv. 9). The narrative of Ezek. xvii. 1-10, though, in common with the fable, it brings before us the lower forms of creation as representatives of human characters and destinies, differs from it, in the points above noticed, (1) in not introducing them as having human attributes, (2) in the higher prophetic character of the truths conveyed by it. The great eagle, the cedar of Lebanon, the spreading vine, are not grouped together as the agents in a fable, but are simply, like the bear, the leopard, and the lion in the visions of Daniel, symbols of the great monarchies of the world.

In the two instances referred to, the fable has more the character of the Greek αἰῶς (Quintil. Inst. Orat. v. 11) than of the μῦθος: that is, it is less the fruit of a vivid imagination, sporting with the analogies between the worlds of nature and of men, than a covert reproof, making the sarcasm which it affects to hide all the sharper (Müller and Donaldson, Hist. of Greek Literature, vol. i. ch. xi.). The appearance of the fable thus early in the history of Israel, and its entire absence from the direct teaching both of the O. and N. T., are, each of them in its way, significant. Taking the received chronology, the fable of Jotham was spoken about 1209 B.C. The Arabian traditions of Lokman do not assign to him an earlier date than that of David. The earliest Greek αἰῶς is that of Hesiod (Op. et D. v. 202), and the prose form of the fable does not meet us till we come (about 550 B.C.) to Stesichorus and Aesop. The first example in the history of Rome is the apologue of Menenius Agrippa B.C. 494, and its genuineness has been questioned on the ground that the fable could hardly at that time have found its way to Latium (Müller and Donaldson, l. c.). It may be noticed, too, that when collections of fables became familiar to the Greeks, they were looked on as imported, not indigenous. The traditions that surround the name of Aesop, the absence of any evidence that he wrote fables, the traces of Eastern origin in those ascribed to him, leave him little more than the representative of a period when the forms of teaching, which had long been familiar to the more Eastern nations, were travelling westward, and were adopted eagerly by the Greeks. The collections themselves are described by titles that indicate a foreign origin. They are Libyan (Arist. Rhet. ii. 20), Cyprian, Cilician. All these facts lead to the conclusion that the Hebrew mind, gifted, as it was, in a special measure, with the power of perceiving analogies in things apparently dissimilar, attained, at a very early stage of its growth, the power which does not appear in the history of other nations till a later period. Whatever antiquity may be ascribed to the fables in the comparatively later collection of the Pancha Tantra, the land of Canaan is, so far as we have any data to conclude from, the fatherland of fable. To conceive brutes or inanimate objects as representing human characteristics; to personify them as acting, speaking, reasoning; to draw lessons from them applicable to human life,—this must have been common among the Israelites in the time of the Judges. The part assigned in the earliest records of the Bible to the impressions made by the brute creation on the mind of man when “the Lord God formed every beast of the field and every fowl of the air, and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them” (Gen. ii. 19), and the apparent symbolism of the serpent in the narrative of the Fall (Gen. iii. 1), are at once indications of teaching adapted to men in the possession of this power, and must have helped to develop it (Herder, Geist der Ebräischen Poesie; Werke, xxxiv. p. 16, ed. 1826). The large number of proverbs in which analogies of this kind are made the bases of a moral precept, and some of which (e.g. Prov. xxvi. 11, xxx. 15, 25-28) are of the nature of condensed fables, show that there was no decline of this power as the intellect of the people advanced. The absence of fables accordingly from the teaching of the O. T. must be ascribed to their want of fitness to be the media of the truths which that teaching was to convey. The points in which brutes or inanimate objects present analogies to man are chiefly those which belong to his lower nature, his pride, indolence, cunning, and the like; and the lessons derived from them accordingly do not rise higher than the prudential morality which aims at repressing such defects (cp. Trench, Notes on the Parables, l. c.). Hence the fable, apart from the associations of a grotesque and ludicrous nature which gather round it, apart too from its presenting narratives which are “nec verae nec verisimiles” (Cic. de Invent. i. 19), is inadequate as the exponent of the higher truths which belong to man’s spiritual life. It may serve to exhibit the relations between man and man; it fails to represent those between man and God. To do that is the office of the PARABLE, finding its outward framework in the dealings of men with each other, or in the world of nature as it is, not in any grotesque parody of nature, and exhibiting, in either case, real and not fanciful analogies. The fable seizes on that which man has in common with the creatures below him; the Parable rests on the truths that man is made in the image of God, and that “all things are double one against another.”

It is noticeable, as confirming this view of the office of the fable, that though those of Aesop (so called) were known to the great preacher of righteousness at Athens, though a metrical paraphrase of some of them was among the employments of his imprisonment (Plato, Phaedon, pp. 60, 61), they were not employed by him as illustrations, or channels of instruction. While Socrates shows an appreciation of the power of such fables to represent some of the phenomena of human life, he was not, he says, in this sense of the word, μυθολογικός. The myths which appear in the Gorgias, the Phaedrus, the Phaedon, the Republic, are as unlike as possible to the Aesopic fables, are (to take his own account of them) ὁ μῦθος ἄλλα λόγος,—true, though figurative, representations of spiritual realities; while the illustrations from the common facts of life which were so conspicuous in his ordinary teaching, though differing in being comparisons rather than narratives, come nearer to the parables of the Bible (cp. the contrast between τὰ Σακρατικά, as examples of the παραβολή and the λόγοι Διδάσκοντες, Arist. Rhet. ii. 20). It may be said indeed that the use of the fable as an instrument of teaching (apart from the embellishments of wit and fancy with which it is associated by such writers as Lessing and La Fontaine) belongs rather to childhood, and the child-like period of national life, than to a more advanced development. In the earlier stages of political change, as in the cases of Jotham, Steichorus (Arist. Rhet. i. c.), Menenius Agrippa, it is used as an element of persuasion or reproof. It ceases to appear in the higher eloquence of orators and statesmen. The special excellence of fables is that they are δημηγορικὸν (Arist. Rhet. i. c.); that "ducere animos solent, præcipue rusticorum et imperitorum" (Quint. Inst. Orat. i. c.).

The μῦθοι of false teachers claiming to belong to the Christian Church, alluded to by writers of the N. T. in connexion with γενεαλογίαι ἀπέραντοι (1 Tim. i. 4), or with epithets ἰουδαϊκοί (Tit. i. 14), γραῦδεῖς (1 Tim. iv. 7), σεσοφισμένοι (2 Pet. i. 16), do not appear to have had the character of fables, properly so called. As applied to them, the word takes its general meaning of anything false or unreal, and here we need not discuss the nature of the falsehoods so referred to (see Riehm, HWB. s. n. "Fabel"; Cremer, Bibl.-Theol. Wörterb. s. v. μῦθος). On the large use and specimens of fable in the Talmudical writings, see Hamburger, RE. Abth. ii. s. v. "Fabel." [E. H. P.] [F.]

FAIR HAVENS (Καλοὶ Λιμένες), a harbour in the island of CRETE (Acts xxvii. 8), not mentioned in any other ancient writing. There seems no probability that it is, as Biscoe suggested (on the Acts, p. 347, ed. 1829), the Καλή Ἀκτὴ of Steph. Byz.—for that is said to be a city, whereas Fair Havens is described as "a place near to which was a city called Lasaea" (τόπος τις ἔγγυς ἢν πόλις Λ.). Moreover Mr. Pashley found (Travels in Crete, ii. 57) a district called Acte; and it is most likely that Καλή Ἀκτὴ was situated there; but that district is in the W. of the island, whereas Fair Havens was on the S. Its position is now quite certain. Though not mentioned by classical writers, it is still known by its old Greek name, as it was in the time of Pococke, and other early travellers mentioned by Mr. Smith (Voyage and Shipw. of St. Paul,² pp. 80–82). LASAEA, too, has recently been most explicitly discovered. In fact Fair Havens appears to have been practically its harbour. These places are situated 4 or 5 miles to the E. of Cape Matala, which is the most conspicuous headland on the S. coast of Crete, and immediately to the W. of which the coast trends suddenly to the N. This last circumstance explains why the ship which conveyed St. Paul was brought to anchor in Fair Havens. In consequence of violent and continuing N. W. winds she had been unable to hold on her course towards Italy from Cnidus (v. 7), and had run down, by Salmone, under the lee of Crete. It was possible to reach Fair Havens: but beyond Cape Matala the difficulty would have recurred, so long as the wind remained in the same quarter. A considerable delay took place (v. 9), during which it is possible that St. Paul may have had opportunities of preaching the Gospel at Lasaea, or even at GORTYNA, where Jews resided (1 Macc. xv. 23), and which was not far distant: but all this is conjectural. A consultation took place, at which

τος πρὸς παραχειμασίαν (v. 12). All such terms are comparative: and there is no doubt that, as a safe winter harbour, Fair Havens is infinitely inferior to Phenice; though perhaps even as a matter of seamanship St. Paul's advice was not bad. However this may be, the south wind, which sprang up afterwards (v. 13), proved delusive; and the vessel was caught by a hurricane [EUROCLYDON] on her way towards Phenice, and ultimately wrecked. Besides a view (p. 81), Mr. Smith gives a chart of Fair Havens with the soundings (p. 257), from which any one can form a judgment for himself of the merits of the harbour. [J. S. H.] [W.]

FAIRS (פֶּרִי; ἀγορά; nundinae, forum), a word which occurs only in Ezek. xxvii. and there no less than seven times (v. 12, 14, 16, 19, 22, 27, 33); in the last of these verses it is rendered by the A. V. "wares;" and this, being the true meaning of the word, is used by the R. V. throughout. It will be observed that the word stands in some sort of relation to מַרְכָּו throughout the whole of the chapter, the latter word also occurring seven times, and translated by A. V. sometimes "market" (v. 13, 17, 19), and elsewhere "merchandise" (v. 9, 27, 33, 34, the rendering of R. V.). The words are used alternately, and represent the alternations of commercial business in which the merchants of Tyre were engaged. That the first of these words cannot signify "fairs" is evident from v. 12; for the inhabitants of Tarshish did not visit Tyre, but vice versa. Let the reader substitute the R. V. "traded for thy wares" for the A. V. "traded in thy fairs," and the sense is much improved. The relation which this term bears to maarab, which properly means "barter," appears to be pretty much the same as exists between exports and imports. The requirements of the Tyrians themselves, such as slaves (v. 13), wheat (v. 17), steel (v. 19), were a matter of marab; but where the business consisted in the exchange of Tyrian wares for foreign productions, it is specified in this form, "Tarshish paid for thy wares with silver, iron, tin, and lead." The use of the terms would probably have been more intelligible if the Prophet had mentioned what the Tyrians gave in exchange: as it is, he only notices the one side of the bargain, viz. what the Tyrians received, whether they were buyers or sellers.

FALLOW-DEER (פֶּרֶד; yachmûr; Arab.

بَحْمُور; A. βούβαλος; bubalus; R. V. roe-buck). The Heb. word, which is mentioned only in Deut. xiv. 5, as the name of one of the animals allowed by the Levitical law for food, and in 1 K. iv. 23 as forming part of the provisions for Solomon's table, appears to point to the Antilope bubalis, Pallas, the Alcelaphus bubalis of recent naturalists; the βούβαλος of the Greeks (see Herod. iv. 192; Aristotle, Hist. Anim. iii. 6, ed. Schneider, and De Part. Anim. iii. 2, 11, ed. Bekker; Oppian, Cyn. ii. 300) is properly, we believe, identified with the before-named antelope. From the different descriptions of the yachmûr, as given by Arabian writers, and cited by Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 284 sq.), it would seem that this is the animal denoted; though Damir's remarks in some respects are fabulous, and he represents the yachmûr as having deciduous horns, which will not apply to any antelope. Still Cazuinus, according to Rosenmüller, identifies the yachmûr with the bekker-el-wash ("wild cow"), which is the modern name in N. Africa for the Antilope bubalis. Kitto (Pict. Bibl. Deut. l. c.) says, "The yachmûr of the Hebrews is without doubt erroneously identified with the fallow-deer, which does not exist in Asia," and refers the name to the Oryz leucoryx, citing Niebuhr as authority for stating that this animal is known among the Eastern Arabs by the name of yazmur. The fallow-deer (Cervus dama) is undoubtedly a native of Asia; indeed Persia seems to be its proper country. Hasselquist (Trav. p. 211) noticed this deer in Mount Tabor. But it was unknown in Egypt, and can never, from its habits as a dweller in woods, have existed in Arabia. It was, therefore, unlikely to be mentioned by Moses. The authority of the LXX., however, in a question of this kind, has some weight: accordingly we have little doubt but that the yachmûr of the Heb. Scriptures denotes the bekker-el-wash, or "wild ox," of Barbary and N. Africa (see Shaw's Travels, p. 242, and Suppl. p. 75, folio; Buffon, Hist. Natur. xii. p. 294). The Greek βούβαλος evidently points to some animal having the general appearance of an ox. Pliny (N. H. viii. 15) tells us that the common people in their ignorance sometimes gave the name of bubalus to the Bison (Aurochs) and the Urus. He adds, the animal properly so called is produced in Africa, and bears a resemblance to the calf and the stag. That this antelope partakes in external form of the characters belonging both to the Cervine and Bovine ruminants will be evident to any one who glances at the woodcut.

^b Yachmûr, Ruber; "animal ad genus pertinens cui est apud Arabes nomen بقَر الوحش" (Freyt. l. c. Ar.)

The bekker-el-wash appears to be depicted in the Egyptian monuments, where it is represented as being hunted for the sake of its flesh, which Shaw tells us (Suppl. p. 75) is very sweet and nourishing, much preferable to that of the red deer (see Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. i. pp. 214-47 [smaller ed. 1878]). This animal, which is about the size of a stag, was common in N. Africa up to the last century, in the early part of which Dr. Shaw speaks of it as common on the Atlas mountains, where it is now all but extinct. It lives in small herds. The range of the Bubale is from Morocco to Arabia; and though I never myself obtained it in Palestine, yet I have found the Arabs east of Jordan perfectly familiar with it, and have seen its horns in their possession. They stated that they often shot it at its watering-places.

But we believe that the yachmûr equally includes the roebuck, and that the Revisers were fully justified in so rendering the word. The roebuck (Cercus capreolus, L.) identical with the British species was found, though now very rare in Palestine, by myself in the Galilean woods, and by Major Conder on Mount Carmel (Proc. Zool. Soc., London, 1876, pp. 420, 701). An animal so capable of maintaining itself in the neighbourhood of man, and still existing, cannot formerly have been rare. The Arabs are perfectly familiar with it, and call it يَحْمُور, identical with the Hebrew name. In general appearance, with its short horns and somewhat heavy gait, it would bear to incurious observers the semblance of a diminutive bubale; and as the larger animal became scarcer and almost forgotten, the name would be applied to the more familiar and smaller one. In a similar way, since the bustard and the stork became extinct in England, their names are applied by the country-folk to the smaller Norfolk plover and the heron. [H. B. T.]

FAMINE. When the "sweet influences (R. V. "cluster") of the Pleiades" are bound, and "the bands of Orion" cannot be loosed* (Job xxxviii. 31), then it is that famines generally prevail in the lands of the Bible. In Egypt a deficiency in the rise of the Nile, with drying winds, produces the same results. The famines recorded in the Bible are traceable to both these phenomena: and we generally find that Egypt was resorted to when scarcity afflicted Palestine. This is notably the case in the first three famines, those of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, although in the last case Egypt was involved in the calamity, and only saved from its horrors by the provident policy of Joseph. In this instance, too, the famine was widespread, and Palestine further suffered from the restriction which must have been placed on the supplies usually derived, in such circumstances, from Egypt.

In the whole of Syria and Arabia, the fruits of the earth must ever be dependent on rain: the watersheds have few large springs, and the small rivers are not sufficient for the irrigation of even the level lands. If therefore the heavy rains of November and December fail, the sustenance of the people is cut off in the parching drought of harvest time, when the country is almost devoid of moisture. Further, the pastoral tribes rely on the scanty herbage of the desert-plains and valleys for their flocks and herds; for the desert is interspersed in spring-time with spontaneous vegetation, which is the product of the preceding rainfall, and fails almost totally without it. It is therefore not difficult to conceive the frequent occurrence and severity of famines in ancient times, when the scattered population of a country—pastoral rather than agricultural—was dependent on natural phenomena which, however regular in their season, occasionally failed, and with them the sustenance of man and beast.

Egypt, again, owes all its fertility—a fertility that gained for Zoan [Sân] the striking comparison to the "garden of the Lord"—to its mighty river, whose annual flood is sufficient to inundate nearly the whole land and renders the cultivation of cereals an easy certainty. But this very bounty of nature has not unfrequently exposed the country to the opposite extreme of drought. With scarcely any rain, and that chiefly on the Mediterranean coast (though of late years showers have become more common at Cairo, and have even reached Thebes), and with wells only supplied by filtration from the river through a nitrous soil, a failure in the rise of the Nile almost certainly entails a degree of scarcity; but if it is followed by cool weather, and occurs only for a single year, the labour of the people may in a great measure avert the calamity. Dearth and famine in Egypt are caused by defective inundation, preceded, accompanied, and followed, by prevalent easterly and southerly winds. Both these winds dry up the earth, and the latter, keeping back the rain-clouds from the north, are perhaps the chief cause of the defective inundation, to which they also contribute by accelerating the current of the river, which northerly winds would retard. Famines in Egypt and Palestine seem to be affected by drought extending from Northern Syria, through the meridian of Egypt, as far as the highlands of Abyssinia.

The first famine recorded in the Bible is that of Abraham, after he had pitched his tent on the east of Bethel: "And there was a famine in the land: and Abram went down into Egypt to sojourn there, for the famine was grievous in the land" (Gen. xii. 10). We may conclude that this famine was extensive, although this is not quite proved by the fact of Abraham's going to Egypt; for on the occasion of the second famine, in the days of Isaac, this patriarch is recorded to have found refuge with Abimelech king of the Philistines in Gerar, and to have been warned by God not to go down into Egypt, whither therefore we may suppose he was journeying (Gen. xxvi.

* That is to say, when the best and most fertilising of the rains, which fall when the Pleiades set at dawn (not exactly heliacally) at the end of autumn, fall. [For other interpretations, see Dehltzsch, Davidson, Bradley, and Speaker's Comm. in loco.]

1 sq.). We hear no more of times of scarcity until the great famine of Egypt which "was over all the face of the earth;" "and all countries came into Egypt to Joseph to buy corn, because that the famine was sore in all lands" (Gen. xli. 56, 57). "And the sons of Israel came to buy corn among those that came: for the famine was in the land of Canaan" (xlii. 5). Thus, in the third generation, Jacob is afflicted like his ancestors, and sends from Hebron to Egypt when he hears that there is corn there; and it is added in a later passage, on the occasion of his sending the second time for corn to Egypt, "and the famine was sore in the land," i.e. Hebron (Gen. xliii. 1).

The famine of Joseph need be discussed here only with reference to its physical characteristics. We have mentioned the chief causes of famines in Egypt: this instance differs in the remarkable occurrence of seven consecutive years of plenty, whereby Joseph was enabled to provide against the coming dearth, and to supply not only the population of Egypt with corn, but those of the surrounding countries: "And the seven years of plenty, that was in the land of Egypt, came to an end. And the seven years of famine began to come, according as Joseph had said: and there was famine in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread. And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread; and Pharaoh said unto all the Egyptians, Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do. And the famine was over all the face of the earth: and Joseph opened all the storehouses, and sold unto the Egyptians; and the famine was sore in the land of Egypt" (Gen. xli. 53-56, R. V.).

The modern history of Egypt throws some curious light on these ancient records of famines; and instances of their recurrence may be cited to assist us in understanding their course and extent. They have not been infrequent since the Muhammadan conquest, according to the testimony of Arab historians: one of great severity, following a deficient rise of the Nile, in the year of the Flight 597 (A.D. 1200), is recorded by 'Abd-el-Latif, an eyewitness and a trustworthy authority. He gives a most interesting account of its horrors, states that the people throughout the country were driven to the last extremities, eating offal and even their own dead, and mentions, as an instance of the dire straits to which they were driven, that persons who were burnt alive for eating human flesh were themselves, thus ready roasted, eaten by others. Multitudes fled the country, only to perish in the desert-roads to Palestine (Relation de l'Égypte, trans. S. de Sacy, p. 360 sq.; White's text, p. 210 sq.).

But the most remarkable famine occurred in the reign of the Fâtimy Khalif el-Mustansir, the only famine of seven years' duration on record in Egypt since the time of Joseph. This famine (A.H. 457-464, A.D. 1064-1071) exceeded in severity all others of modern times, and was aggravated by the anarchy which then ravaged the country. Vehement drought and pestilence (says Es-Suyûti, in his Husn al-Muhâdarah) continued for seven consecutive years, so that they [the people] ate corpses, and animals that died of themselves; the cattle perished; a dog was sold for five dinârs, and a cat for three dinârs. . . and an ardebb (about five bushels) of wheat for one hundred dinârs, and then it failed altogether. He adds, that all the horses of the Khalif, save three, perished, and gives numerous instances of the straits to which the wretched inhabitants were driven, and of the organised bands of kidnappers who infested Cairo and caught passengers in the streets by ropes furnished with hooks and let down from the windows, in order to provide themselves with food. This account is confirmed by El-Makriziy (in his Khitât: cp. Quatremère, Mémoires géographiques et historiques sur l'Égypte, ii. 296), from whom we further learn that the family and even the women of the Khalif fled, by the way of Syria, on foot, to escape the peril that threatened all ranks of the population. The whole narrative is worthy of attention, since it contains a parallel to the duration of the famine of Joseph, and at the same time enables us to form an idea of the character of famines in the East. The famine of Samaria resembled it in many particulars; and that very briefly recorded in 2 K. viii. 1, 2 (R. V.), affords another instance of one of seven years: "Now Elisha had spoken unto the woman whose son he had restored to life, saying, Arise, and go thou and thy household, and sojourn wheresoever thou canst sojourn: for the Lord hath called for a famine; and it shall also come upon the land seven years. And the woman arose, and did according to the word of the man of God: and she went with her household and sojourned in the land of the Philistines seven years." Bunsen (Egypt's Place, &c., iii. 334, 335) quotes the record of a famine in the reign of Usurtasen I., which he supposes to be that of Joseph; but on chronological grounds alone the theory is untenable. The "famine lasting many years," referred to in the inscription in the tomb of Baba at El-Kab (immediately before the 18th Dynasty; Brugsch, Hist. of Egypt under the Pharaohs 2, i. 158, 302 sq., and Die bibl. sieben Jahre d. Hungersnoth, 1891), if "a pious fraud," yet shows the existence of a tradition that there had been, at some early date, a seven years' period of severe distress (Renouf, PSBA. 1891, xiii. 444).

In Arabia, famines are of frequent occurrence. The Arabs, in such cases, when they could not afford to slaughter their camels, used to bleed them, and drink the blood, or mix it with the shorn fur to make a kind of black-pudding. They ate also various plants and grains, which at other times were not used as articles of food. And the tribe of Hanifeh were taunted with having in a famine eaten their god in a dish of dates mashed up with clarified butter and a preparation of dried curds of milk (Lane, Ar. Lex. s. v. تبع). [E. S. P.]

FARTHING. Two names of coins, the fourth part of the other, are rendered in the A. V. and in the R. V. by this word.

1. ἀσάριον (Matt. x. 29; Luke xii. 6), properly a small as, assarium, but in the N. T. period used as the Greek equivalent of the Latin as. The Vulg. in Matt. x. 29 renders it by as, and in Luke xii. 6 translates "two asaria" by dipondius; the dipondius, or di-pondius, being equal in value to two asae. The Graeco-Roman, or technically Greek imperial, coin equivalent to the Roman as is no doubt intended by the Evangelists.

2. κοδράντης, quadrans (Matt. v. 26; Mark xii. 42), a coin equivalent to two lepta (λεπτά δύο, ὃ ἴσους κοδράντης, Mark, l. c.). The plain meaning of this passage is that two lepta were equal to a quadrans, the lepton (λεπτόν) being a coin current in Palestine, but the quadrans not necessarily so. St. Luke's use of Latin words renders it quite possible that he intended to give the information that two common Palestinian coins were equivalent to a Roman one, or to the fourth part of the as. There is no question that the smallest Roman coin of the earlier emperors was a quadrans, and that the smallest Judæan copper coin was lighter, and could well be reckoned as its half, it being remembered that bronze or copper money is always of the nature of a token currency, and that the weight consequently is not to be taken too seriously into account. It is doubtful if the currency of Palestine at the time referred to contained a κοδράντης. [R. S. P.]

FASTING AND FASTS. Fasting, in the sense of a religious or ceremonial abstinence from food, either partial or complete, for a certain time, at recurring periods, or under special public or private emergencies, is a practice the beginnings of which, like those of most other instinctive religious customs, are lost in the mists of an immemorial past. "Food I have not eaten; weeping is my fare; . . . tears are my meat and drink," is the cry of the old Accadian penitent, we know not how many thousands of years before our era.* And in certain old Babylonian calendars for the months of Intercalary Elul, Ve-Adar, Sebat, Tebet, Sivan, 2nd Nisan, and Marchesvan, prescribing the rites to be observed by the king on each day of the month, we find that on five days—viz. the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st, and 28th—the king was religiously bound to abstain from certain kinds of food and other indulgences, such as riding in his chariot.^b In this connexion, it should be borne in mind that Babylonia is the earliest recorded home of the fathers of Israel (Gen. xi. 31; Josh. xxiv. 2); and that the civilisation of Accad is the oldest, of which any authentic documents remain. On the other hand, the monuments of Egyptian antiquity make no mention of the usage of fasting.^c The brief statements of Herodotus, to the effect that the Egyptians fasted before sacrificing to Isis (ii. 40; cp. iv. 186), if correct, refer only to the voluntary practice of isolated localities at a comparatively late period.

Although there is no direct inculcation of fasting as a religious practice in the sacred literature of China before Buddhism, we find its disciplinary value recognised in the Doctrine of the Mean (e.g. in the phrase chai ming, to purify the mind by abstinence), a work ascribed to the grandson of Confucius. The Vedas prescribe fasting; and the practice of it forms an important element in the ascetic discipline both of the Brahman and the Buddhist. The system of Zoroaster and its modern representative Parsism naturally neglect an observance which, if favourable to the calm contemplative life of the religious mystic, is not compatible with the active stir and strain of a business career. The strict fast of the ninth month (Ramadan), universally observed in Islam, was probably instituted not without reference to Jewish and Christian precedents. Nor was the practice unknown to the Greeks and Romans, although it does not appear to have been a matter of general obligation as in the case of Semitic religions. It was customary in the Eleusinian mysteries; and the women who celebrated the Thesmophoria abstained from common food, though they might eat cakes of sesame and honey.

On the occasion of certain prodigia at Rome, B.C. 191, the Sibylline books ordered a quinquennial fast to be instituted in honour of Ceres; but this prescription doubtless concerned the priesthood only, and such of the laity as chose to honour it (Liv. xxxvi. 37). The idea involved was that of a sympathetic share in the grief of the goddess, who abstained from food and drink during her long search for her lost Proserpine. Tertullian informs us that on the occasion of a severe drought, the heathen kept a thoroughly Jewish fast, and walked in procession barefoot (De Jejunio, 15). On our Monday (dies Jovis) a fast in honour of Jupiter was recognised as meritorious by the Romans (Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 288–292). But, upon the whole, the practice had no more than a sporadic and isolated prevalence in classical antiquity.

In the Old Testament we find numerous references to fasting. The term צום—rendered moroseia by the LXX., and jejunium in the Latin Versions, denoting first "fasting" and then "a fast," in the concrete sense (plural צומות, Esth. ix. 31)—is common in the Prophets (including the histories) and occurs thrice in the Psalms (xxxv. 13; lxi. 10; cix. 24), but not once in the Law, where we find instead (Lev. xvi. 29, 31; Num. xxx. 13) the striking expression עָבַר הַנֶּפֶשׁ, "to afflict, abase, or humble the soul," i. e. the self (Ps. iii. 2; Is. li. 23), or perhaps specially the appetites and desires (Ps. xlii. 4; Prov. vi. 30; Jer. ii. 24).

It was only on one day in the year, the great Day of Atonement, that the Law required all Israelites to fast. [ATONEMENT, DAY OF.] It has been maintained by a powerful school of modern critics (Graf, Wellhausen) that the Day of Atonement is of post-Exilic origin, on the grounds that it is only mentioned in the "Priestly Legislation," and that no reference is made to it in the narrative (Neh. viii.–x.). We have seen, that so far as the element of religious fasting is concerned, that custom is of unknown antiquity; and the Hebrew phrase which describes it as an "abasing of the soul," may belong to a very distant past, independently of the relative age of the canonical documents in which it is now first found. No very profound study is required to enable persons of ordinary intelligence to realize the fact that the great fundamental conceptions and observances of religion are, broadly speaking, the same throughout the ancient world. The Old Testament adopts the common external forms of worship and service, and adapts them to the expression of the higher meanings of revealed religion. Thus it does not expressly originate sacrifice, although it lays down particular rules to be observed in sacrifice. It nowhere defines a temple or an altar as something previously unknown, any more than it defines the idea of God. It takes for granted that Israel is already familiar with these and a hundred other necessary elements of religion; yet it incidentally reveals, in the clearest way, the ancient and original sense of such a term as "altar," when it uses as a synonymous expression "the table of Jehovah" (Ezek. xii. 22; Mal. i. 7-12). Modern researches have demonstrated that this phrase covers the ultimate pre-historic conception of an altar. And yet the first Old Testament writers in which it occurs, both belong to the period after the fall of the Jewish monarchy. To argue that the idea was post-Exilic, on that ground, would be evidently absurd. The assumption, however, that Israel did not before the post-Exilic period observe the Day of Atonement, rests, as we have seen, upon the precisely similar ground that the Day is not mentioned by any writer previous to "the Priestly Legislation," which is referred to that period. This is not the place to discuss the age and authorship of the Book of Leviticus and of that section of the Hexateuch to which it belongs [PENTATEUCH]. The inherent weakness of an argument which assumes that a religious usage or prescription cannot be primitive, because no relatively early record of it happens to have survived, hardly requires to be pointed out. We may recognise the fact that the historical Books of the Old Testament nowhere mention the annual Fast of the tenth day of the seventh month (Tishri), without drawing Graf's inference that therefore it was unknown before the Exile (Graf, Die gesch. Büch. des A. T. p. 41). How many other things are missing in those fragmentary outlines of Israel's history! Some, at least, who carefully note the characteristics of these narratives, with their express references to fuller accounts upon which they are based, and their occasional episodes or "cameos" of personal history, interspersed unequally in the course of mere annals abbreviated at times to little more than a thin line of royal and dynastic names, will not be inclined to set much store by this argument from omission, where so much besides of equal or greater consequence is likewise omitted.

But the Day of Atonement is not mentioned in Neh. viii.-x. "Even in 444 B.C. the year of the publication of the Pentateuch by Ezra," writes Wellhausen, "the great Day of Atonement has not yet come into force. Ezra begins the reading of the Law in the beginning of the seventh month, and afterwards the Feast of Tabernacles is observed on the fifteenth; of an atoning solemnity on the tenth of the month not a word is said in the circumstantial narrative, which, moreover, is one specially interested in the liturgical element, but it is made up for on the twenty-fourth (Neh. viii. ix.). This testimonium e silentio is enough; down to that date the great day of the Priestly Code (now introduced for the first time) had not existed" (Prolegomena to the Hist. of Israel, p. 111, Eng. tr.). It is true that the chronicler exhibits a strong interest in everything that concerns the Temple and its services; but his narrative in these chapters is far from being "circumstantial" in the sense required by this argument, viz. that of containing a complete "record of proceedings from the first day of the seventh month onwards to the twenty-fourth," as stated by Professor Robertson Smith (Old Test. in Jewish Church, p. 377). The chronicler does not profess to supply such a consecutive relation within the space of these three chapters. Had that been his intention, the long prayer of the Levites (Neh. ix. 4-38) would hardly have been allowed to occupy such an altogether disproportionate share of his space. But why is the authority of the chronicler's compilation, which is referred by these learned critics to the "very end of the Persian or the beginning of the Greek period," preferred in this instance to that of the "Priestly Legislation," which they allow to have been published in its completeness at least a century and a half before his time? On the one hand, no writer suggests that the author of Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah was ignorant of the ordinance of the tenth day of the seventh month. On the other, critics have not scrupled to suppose him capable of freely antedating the customs and institutions of later times. If then he does not mention the Day of Atonement in this passage, it certainly is not because he did not believe that it had been observed at all before B.C. 444, nor because he intended to suggest such a surprising inference; but rather because he wished to dwell at length upon the exceptional public humiliation of the twenty-fourth day of the same month. After all, in this as in other portions of his compilation he made his choice of excerpts in his own way, like other Oriental compilers, without having the fear of modern criticism before his eyes. Perhaps, indeed, the celebration of the Day was not recorded in the source he was using. It is evident from the whole account that the returned exiles were unfamiliar with the ordinances of the ancient Law, which had fallen into desuetude during their long captivity in a heathen land. This it was that necessitated the public reading and exposition of the Law recorded in the eighth chapter. In the then irregular state of things, their religious leaders may not have judged it possible or expedient to proclaim the observance of the Day of Atonement on that occasion. The ceremonies of the Day, which were specially concerned, with the purification of the high priest and his family, and then that of the Temple and its vessels, would hardly have seemed appropriate, at a time when the people had not yet formally undertaken to observe the Law, and to provide for the maintenance of the sacrificial worship (Neh. x. 29 sq.); when the dues of the priesthood were left unpaid, and "the house of God was forsaken" (cp. Neh. xiii. 10, 11). The entire picture presented to us in these vivid though fragmentary chapters is one of a provisional state of things; of the gradual restoration and regulation of the public worship after long disuse and disorder. The walls of Jerusalem were not rebuilt in a day; nor were the precepts of the Law carried out at once in all their fulness by the struggling community of Judea. The remainder of the Book, which relates how the population of Jerusalem was recruited, the Levitical ministry re-established in the Temple, the observance of the Sabbath vindicated, witnesses to the fact clearly enough.⁴

There remains one other objection. It is urged that the Day of Atonement conflicts with that purely joyous conception of worship which characterised ancient Israel. But that conception is no more than a plausible hypothesis, which itself conflicts with the general analogy of the history of religion. Reference has already been made to those old Accadian confessions of sin which the Semitic Assyrians of the 7th century B.C. copied from Babylonian texts for their own use. Hebrew human nature even in the earliest period probably resembled human nature at large in respect of an occasional consciousness of guilt and the need of expiation. And there were too many occasions in the national history, when foreign oppression or domestic disaster, when the sword or drought or pestilence, irresistibly suggested the Divine wrath, to allow us to acquiesce in the proposition that national sin, atonement, and expiation became principal ideas in the religious consciousness of Israel only after the Exile. The witness of the Prophets and of the prophetic histories is against this view. Would the troubles of the times of the Judges, or the plague in David's reign, be the occasion of holiday rites and joyous feasting round the altar? On the other hand, what proof is there that during the period of the Exile "men felt themselves . . . unceasingly under the leaden pressure of sin and wrath" (Wellhausen, p. 112)? Such a conception of the time seems to be unnatural; or at least the statement is rhetorically exaggerated. The sorrowful utterances of the Lamentations do not express the uniform experience of the entire Captivity. If that were so, the buoyant oracles of the Prophets of the period are as inexplicable as the fact that so many of the banished preferred to stay in Babylonia, and so few took advantage of the Edict of Deliverance.*

* The late Friedrich Bleek maintained, on the ground of its peculiar contents, that Lev. xvi. was of Mosaic origin (Einleitung, § 12 sq.). The proceedings with reference to the desert-fiend (Azazel) can hardly have been instituted for the first time in the 5th cent.; and, as a matter of fact, this demon belongs to primitive Accadian religion (see PSBA., June 1890).

During the Exile four annual fast-days were established, in commemoration of the fall of Jerusalem and subsequent calamities. These days were the ninth of the fourth month, for the capture of Jerusalem (Jer. lii. 6); the tenth of the fifth month, for the destruction of the city and the Temple (2 K. xxv. 8, 9; Jer. lii. 12); the fast of the seventh month, for the murder of Gedaliah (2 K. xxv. 25; Jer. xli. 1, 2); and that of the tenth day of the tenth month, for the beginning of the siege (2 K. xxv. 1; Jer. lii. 4; Zech. viii. 19, 20). The Mishna (Taanith, iv. 6) and St. Jerome (in Zech. viii.), following contemporary Jewish notions, connect other events with these fasts, regardless of manifest anachronisms. After the Return, and when the rebuilding of the Temple had begun, the Jews of Babylon sent to inquire of the priests at Jerusalem whether they were still bound to keep the fast of the fifth month. Thereupon the Prophet Zechariah took occasion to rebuke their hypocritical observance of the fast-days of both the fifth and the seventh months (Zech. vii. 5, 6); and declared that all the four fasts would hereafter be turned into days of "joy and gladness and cheerful feasts" (viii. 19). According to Jewish tradition, this led to the abolition of the fasts, but they were re-introduced after the destruction of the second Temple. The Prophet's words, however, are scarcely a direct injunction to discontinue the four fasts. But it is a remarkable coincidence that Titus took Jerusalem in the fourth month, and the Temple was burnt in the fifth (on the 10th Lūs=Ab, according to Josephus; on the 9th of Ab, according to the Talmud). The Jews still observe these fasts (Friedländer, pp. 32, 33).

Fasting is one form of sacrifice, the essential idea of which is the surrender of some personal good in order to propitiate the Divine favour. The necessity of self-denial is illustrated at the very outset of Scripture by the parable of the Forbidden Fruit (cp. Tertull. de Jejun. 3). Fasting is, moreover, a natural outward evidence of inward self-abasement before God, and of humble acquiescence in the Divine chastisements; it is an instinctive mode of manifesting sorrow for sin, and of enhancing and intensifying that sorrow. Consequently, so long as the sense of sin, in any degree beyond a merely sentimental regret, shall survive; so long as it is felt that our worst transgressions are directly due to the indulgence of a fallen nature and the corrupt desires of the flesh,—so long will it seem right to earnest spiritual minds to mortify the body by the discipline of fasting.

As a natural accompaniment and token of intense grief, fasting finds many incidental illustrations in the Old Testament. It is associated with mourning for the dead (1 Sam. xxxi. 13; 2 Sam. i. 12); with private and personal distresses (1 Sam. i. 7; Ps. cix. 24); with sympathetic sorrow for the misfortunes of friends (1 Sam. xx. 34; Ps. xxxv. 13) and for national calamities (Judg. xx. 26; Neh. i. 4; Baruch i. 5; Joel i. 14, ii. 12, 15); with the expression of penitence for one's own offences (1 K. xxi. 27; Ecclus. xxxiv. 26) and for those of the community (1 Sam. vii. 6; Deut. ix. 18; Jonah iii. 5; Ps. lxi. 10; Ezra x. 6; Neh. ix. 1). Persons fasting often displayed other signs of mourning, such as wearing sackcloth, rending their garments and plucking out the hair of head and beard, sprinkling the head with earth and ashes, weeping, lying prostrate on the ground, neglect of washing and anointing the person, and walking barefoot (2 Sam. i. 11, xii. 16, 20; 1 K. xxi. 27; Ezra ix. 3; Neh. ix. 1; Esth. iv. 3; Add. to Esth. xiv. 2; Is. lviii. 5; Jonah iii. 6; Dan. ix. 3; Judith viii. 6; 1 Macc. iii. 47).

In the case of individuals, fasting was recognised as auxiliary to undisturbed communion with God, and as a preparation for the reception of Divine revelations (Exod. xxxiv. 28; Deut. ix. 9; Dan. x. 2; 2 Esd. v. 13, 20, vi. 31, 35, &c.; Matt. iv. 2). Upon similar grounds, the practice of a fasting reception of the Eucharist may be justified (cp. also Acts xiii. 3).

In special emergencies extraordinary general fasts were sometimes proclaimed, in token of national humiliation for sin, and by way of averting the Divine wrath or of ensuring the Divine assistance in public enterprises (1 Sam. vii. 6; 2 Ch. xx. 3; Ezra vii. 21; Jer. xxxvi. 6, 9; 2 Macc. xiii. 12; Judith iv. 9, 10, vi. 19; cp. 1 Sam. xiv. 24; 1 K. xxi. 9, 12).^f

The writings of the Prophets of the Exile and the Return reveal the origin of a popular tendency to regard fasting as in itself so pleasing to God as to atone for the flagrant neglect of the higher duties of righteousness, mercy, and truth. Against this delusion the Prophets of the period raise their protest, as their predecessors had done, against a similar heathenish view of the value of the old sacrificial system. Like the Ionic philosopher, they bid their countrymen fast from wickedness (ἠγορεύειν κακόντρος, Empedocles, Fragm. 454. See Is. lviii. 3 sq.; Zech. vii. 5 sq., viii. 16 sq.; and cp. Joel ii. 12, 13; Jer. xiv. 12), without implying any denunciation of the proper use of literal fasting as a spiritual discipline.

To this period must be referred the origin of fasting "twice in the week" (Luke xviii. 12), which was the regular custom of the Pharisees, the days chosen being the second and the fifth (Monday and Thursday, which were the days appointed for public fasts, according to Taanith, ii. 9). See also Matt. ix. 14, vi. 16; Mark ii. 18; Luke v. 33. Judith is represented as fasting daily, except on the Sabbaths and New Moons and the eves of those festivals (Judith viii. 6); a fact which clearly indicates the growing rigour of the standard of outward sanctity (cp. also Judith iv. 9; Tob. xii. 8; Ecclus. xxxiv. 26; Luke ii. 37).

Custom varied in the matters of time and strictness. There was the one day fast from evening to evening (Jos. Ant. iii. 10, § 3), terminating with the appearance of the stars; a limit which is still observed by the Moslems in their fast of Ramadan. But besides this, we read also of a fast of three days (Esth. iv. 16; 2 Macc. xiii. 12); of four (Acts x. 30, probably); of seven (1 Sam. xxxi. 13); and even of forty days. In the longer periods, we have to think of restriction to bare necessities (Dan. x. 2, 3),^g and perhaps of abstinence even from these until night-fall.^h The rules of fasting, which were long in dispute between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, are systematized in the Talmudic tracts Joma and Taanith.

It is important to remember that our Lord has emphatically recognised the religious value of fasting (Matt. vi. 16-18; ix. 15). He couples it with prayer as a source of spiritual power (Matt. xvii. 21). If His disciples are said not to have fasted so long as "the Bridegroom" was with them, the denial relates only to the frequent and excessive fasts of the Jewish sects (Matt. xi. 19; cp. ix. 15). Fasting was naturally important in the practice of John's disciples, their master's work being especially a preaching of repentance.

In view of our Lord's attitude towards this observance, we are not surprised to find that in the primitive Church not only did Jewish Christians long continue to keep the Jewish fast-days, but fasting and prayer were united in the practice of Gentile believers also, especially in the case of Ordination (Acts xiii. 1-3; xiv. 23). With St. Paul's warnings against the tendency to attach an independent value to fasting, and to reduce Christian holiness to a mere external asceticism (Rom. xiv. 2, 6, 17, 21; Col. ii. 16, 21-23; 1 Tim. iv. 3-5, 8, v. 23), we have also to consider his precept (1 Cor. vii. 5) in favour of fasting, and, above all, his own practice (2 Cor. vi. 5; xi. 27).

It is not logical to confess the Divine authority of Christ, and the inspiration of His Apostles, and at the same time to treat as of no permanent obligation an ordinance for which the Master Himself laid down rules, and which both He and His immediate followers carefully observed in practice. So far from being, as some suppose, contrary to the spirit of the Gospel; as a token of sorrow for sin, as a means of crucifying the flesh, as an act of obedience to the precepts and a following of the example of Christ, fasting is one of the proofs of a sincere acceptance of the Gospel. [C. J. B.]

FAT. The Hebrews distinguished between the suet or pure fat of an animal (שֶׁמֶן), and the fat which was intermixed with the lean (שֶׁמֶן וְחֵלֵב, Neh. viii. 10). Certain restrictions were imposed upon them in reference to the former: some parts of the suet—viz. about the stomach, the entrails, the kidneys, and the tail of a sheep, which grows to an excessive size in many Eastern countries, and produces a large quantity of rich fat [SHEEP]—were forbidden to be eaten in the case of animals offered to Jehovah in sacrifice (Lev. iii. 3, 9, 17; vii. 3, 23). The ground of the prohibition was that the fat was the richest part of the animal, and ^g Cp. Tertullian's portionalis jejunium, or partial fast, i.e. abstinence from particular kinds of food.

^h So the Council of Chalcedon decreed that in fasting one should take neither food nor drink all day until after the evening prayer (The Sixteenth Homily). It was the rule of the Essenes to abstain altogether from flesh and wine, and only to partake of such food as bread, vegetables, millet, and water, after sunset. [ESSENEs.]

^f In later times, the Sanhedrin was wont to order a general fast if the beginning of the rainy season was delayed. And Josephus informs us of a fast which the Pharisee Ananias succeeded in getting imposed upon the town of Tiberias, for his own private ends (Life, § 56).

therefore belonged to Him (iii. 16). It has been supposed that other reasons were super-added, as that the use of fat was unwholesome in the hot climate of Palestine. There appears, however, to be no ground for such an assumption. The presentation of the fat as the richest part of the animal was agreeable to the dictates of natural feeling, and was the ordinary practice even of heathen nations, as instanced in the Homeric descriptions of sacrifices (Il. i. 460, ii. 423; Od. iii. 457), and in the customs of the Egyptians (Her. ii. 47) and Persians (Strab. xv. p. 732). Indeed, the term cheleb is itself significant of the feeling on which the regulation was based; for it describes metaphorically the best of any production (Gen. xlv. 18; Num. xviii. 12; Ps. lxxxi. 16, cxlvii. 14; cp. 2 Sam. i. 22; Judg. iii. 29; Is. x. 16). With regard to other parts of the fat of sacrifices or the fat of other animals, it might be consumed, with the exception of those dying either by a violent or a natural death (Lev. vii. 24), which might still be used in any other way. The burning of the fat of sacrifices was particularly specified in each kind of offering, whether a peace-offering (Lev. iii. 9), consecration offering (viii. 25), sin-offering (iv. 8), trespass-offering (vii. 3), or redemption-offering (Num. xviii. 17). The Hebrews fully appreciated the luxury of well-fatted meat, and had their stall-fed oxen and calves (1 K. iv. 23; Jer. xlv. 21; Luke. xv. 23); nor is there any reason to suppose its use unwholesome. [W. L. B.]

FAT (A.-S. faet. Cp. Germ. fass), i.e. VAT. The word employed in the A. V. and R. V. to translate the Hebrew term שֶׁמֶן, Yekob, in Joel ii. 24, iii. 13 only. The word commonly used for yekob, indiscriminately with gath, גַּת, is "wine-press" or "wine-fat" and once "press-fat" (R. V. "wine-fat," Hag. ii. 16); but the two appear to be distinct—gath, the upper receptacle or "press" in which the grapes were trod; and yekob, the "vat," on a lower level, into which the juice or must was collected. The word is derived by Gesenius (Theo. 619 b) from a root signifying to "hollow or dig out": and in accordance with this is the practice in Palestine, where the "wine-press" and "vats" were excavated in the native rock of the hills on which the vineyards lay. Rock-cut presses are found in every part of the hills of Palestine. They usually consist of two square basins. The upper, which was large and shallow, was used for treading the grapes. A short channel led to the smaller and deeper basin, yekob, into which the wine ran, and whence it was sometimes strained off into a third basin. The "wine-fat" (R. V. "wine-press") of Mark xii. 1 is δωλῆριον, which is frequently used by the LXX. to translate yekob in the O. T. [G.] [W.]

FATHER (Ab, אב, Chald. Abba, אבא, Mark xiv. 36, Rom. viii. 15; πατήρ; pater: a primitive word, but following the analogy of אב, to show kindness, Gesen. Theo. pp. 6-8).

The position and authority of the father as the head of the family is expressly assumed and sanctioned in Scripture, as a likeness of that of the Almighty over His creatures; an authority, as Philo remarks, intermediate between human and divine (Philo, περὶ γυναικὸν τριμῆς, § 1). It lies of course at the root of that so-called patriarchal government (Gen. iii. 16; 1 Cor. xi. 3) which was introductory to the more definite systems which followed, and which in part, but not wholly, superseded it. When therefore the name of "father of nations" was given to Abram [ABRAHAM], he was thereby held up not only as the ancestor, but as the example to those who should come after him (Gen. xviii. 18, 19; Rom. iv. 17). The father's blessing was regarded as conferring special benefit, but his malediction special injury, on those on whom it fell (Gen. ix. 25, 27; xxvii. 27-40; xlviii. 15, 20; xlix.); and so also the sin of a parent was held to affect, in certain cases, the welfare of his descendants (2 K. v. 27), though the Law was forbidden to punish the son for his father's transgression (Deut. xxiv. 16; 2 K. xiv. 6; Ezek. xviii. 20). The command to honour parents is noticed by St. Paul as the only one of the Decalogue which bore a distinct promise (Ex. xx. 12; Eph. vi. 2), and disrespect towards them was condemned by the Law as one of the worst of crimes (Ex. xxi. 15, 17; 1 Tim. i. 9; cp. Virg. Aen. vi. 609; Aristoph. Ran. 274-773). Instances of legal enactment in support of parental authority are found in Ex. xxii. 17; Num. xxx. 3, 5, xii. 14; Deut. xxi. 18, 21; Lev. xx. 9, xxi. 9, xxii. 12; and the spirit of the Law in this direction may be seen in Prov. xiii. 1, xv. 5, xvii. 25, xix. 13, xx. 20, xxviii. 24, xxx. 17; Is. xlv. 10; Mal. i. 6. The father, however, had not the power of death over his child (Deut. xxi. 18-21; Philo, l. c.).

From the patriarchal spirit also the principle of respect to age and authority in general appears to be derived. Thus Jacob is described as blessing Pharaoh (Gen. xlviii. 7, 10; cp. Lev. xix. 32, Prov. xvi. 31; Juv. Sat. xiii. 54, 55; Philo, l. c. § 6).

It is to this well-recognised theory of parental authority and supremacy that the very various uses of the term "father" in Scripture are due. (1.) As the source or inventor of an art or practice (Gen. iv. 20, 21; Job xxxviii. 28, xvii. 14; John viii. 44; 2 Cor. i. 3). (2.) As an object of respect or reverence (Jer. ii. 27; 2 K. ii. 12, v. 13, vi. 21). (3.) Thus also the pupils or scholars of the prophetic schools, or of any teacher, are called sons (1 Sam. x. 12, 27; 1 K. xx. 35; 2 K. ii. 3, iv. 1; Heb. xii. 9; 1 Tim. i. 2). (4.) The term father and also mother is applied to any ancestor of the male or female line respectively (2 Sam. ix. 7; 2 Ch. xv. 16; Is. li. 2; Jer. xxxv. 6, 18; Dan. v. 2). (5.) In the Talmud the term father is used to indicate the chief, e.g. the principal of certain works are termed "fathers." Objects whose contact causes pollution are called "fathers" of defilement (Mishn. Shabb. vii. 2, vol. ii. p. 29; Pesach i. 6, vol. ii. p. 137, Surenh.). (6.) A protector or guardian (Deut. xxxii. 6; Job xxix. 16; Ps. lxxviii. 5). Many personal names are found with the prefixes אב and אב, as Ab-salom, Abi-shai, Abi-ram, &c., implying some quality or attribute possessed, or ascribed (Gesen. pp. 8, 10. See reff. under ABIA).

There is no word in Hebrew for "grand-father," and thus the word "fathers" is used in the sense of seniors (Acts vii. 2, xxii. 1), and of parents in general, or ancestors (Dan. v. 2; Pusey, Daniel, p. 405; Jer. xxvii. 7; Matt. xxiii. 30, 32).

Among Mohammedans parental authority has great weight during the time of pupilage. The son is not allowed to eat, scarcely to sit, in his father's presence. Disobedience to parents is reckoned one of the most heinous of crimes (Burckhardt, Notes on Bed. i. 355; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 84). [H. W. P.]

FAUCHION (Judith xiii. 6, xvi. 9), sometimes spelt faulchion or falchion. The Greek word ἀκινάκης is variously considered to have been a straight sword, or a crooked sword, or a short spear (see Speaker's Comm. on the Apocrypha in loco). A drawing of the "Akinakes" is given on p. 159.

FELIX (Φῆλιξ; Felix), Antonius Felix (Tac. Hist. v. 9). As a freedman of Antonia, mother of the Emperor Claudius, he had assumed her family name. He was brother of Pallas, one of the great freedmen who were the real administrators of the empire in the reign of Claudius. Felix was procurator of Judaea at the time of St. Paul's arrest at Jerusalem, and to Felix at Caesarea he was sent for trial (Acts xxiii. 24, 26). After hearing Tertullus and St. Paul (Acts xxiv. 1-21), Felix put off the Jews with the pretext that he would wait for the evidence of Lysias before deciding, though the chief captain's opinion was already before him in writing. A remarkable reason is given for the postponement (Acts xxiv. 22)—namely, that "he had more exact knowledge concerning the Way;" that is to say, that he knew a good deal about Christianity and its relation to Judaism; or, as may possibly be implied by the comparative, more than Paul's accusers had chosen to tell him. The postponement is therefore represented in the narrative as being made in St. Paul's favour, though a bolder and juster man would at once have acquitted the accused. On this statement of his knowledge of "the Way" follows naturally the account of the audience given by Felix to St. Paul on the subject of the Christian faith (Acts xxiv. 24). The Apostle chose topics of direct personal application to Felix and Drusilla themselves. The guilty conscience of Felix was moved to fear. He dismissed St. Paul abruptly. Other interviews followed, but the impression made does not seem to have been renewed, as we are expressly told that "he sent for him the oftener and communed with him," in the hope of getting a bribe for his release (Acts xxiv. 26). 'Two years' imprisonment followed the trial. Felix was recalled; and, desiring to gain favour with the Jews in view of the complaints which he knew would follow him to Rome, he left St. Paul in bonds (Acts xxiv. 27). The gross injustice of the imprisonment of an innocent man, prolonged for two years in the hope of obtaining a bribe for his release, is surely sufficient to meet the charge that the character of Felix in the Acts is inconsistent with that given by profane writers. For criticism in this direction, see Overbeck in loco; De Wette, *Apostelgesch.*⁴ The account in Josephus (B. J. iv. 13) represents Felix only as a stern governor in a time of great turbulence, dispersing rebels and crucifying robbers. But the later narrative of Ant. xx. 7, 8, shows him in his true colours, and from it we learn the following particulars. He persuaded Drusilla to desert her husband Aziz and live with him [DRUSILLA]. He induced Eleazar, the brigand chieftain, to surrender on promise of safety, and then sent him to Rome for punishment. He grew weary of the repeated admonitions of Jonathan the high-priest, to whom he owed his position, and procured his assassination. He made no attempt to restrain the warfare of the factions in Jerusalem. Things went on as if there was no government (ὡς ἐν ἀποστατήρῳ πόλει). On Felix's return to Rome he was followed by accusers from Judaea, and "he would certainly have suffered punishment for the wrongs he had committed against the Jews, had not Nero yielded to the urgent entreaties of Pallas (brother of the accused), who was then in great favour with the emperor" (Ant. xx. 8, 9).

Tacitus mentions Felix twice, and his own fellow-countryman paints him even in blacker colours than Josephus the Jew. "Relying on his brother's influence, Felix counted on impunity for any misdeeds he might commit. His remedial measures were such as to stimulate crime" (Tac. Ann. xii. 54). "He had the soul of a slave with the power of a sovereign, and he exercised his power in all manner of cruelty and lust" (Tac. Hist. v. 9). After all this, Tertullus' reference to the "peace" enjoyed by his means, and to the "clemency" which characterised him, sounds like the bitterest irony (Acts xxiv. 2-4).

It remains to notice very briefly a serious discrepancy between the statements of Josephus and Tacitus, which is as yet unreconciled. Tacitus states that Felix was joint procurator with Cumanus, having Samaria as his portion, before his appointment as sole procurator of Judaea, Samaria, Galilee, and Peraea. On the troubles between the Jews and Samaritans being referred to the legate of Syria, Quadratus acquitted Felix and sent Cumanus with others to Rome for trial (Tac. Ann. xii. 54). Josephus, on the other hand, while he gives a full account of the Samaritan troubles, and the legate's inquiry into them, does not mention Felix till his appointment to Judaea after the trial and condemnation of Cumanus at Rome. Ewald accepts Tacitus' account (Hist. Israel, vii. 418 sq.), but critics generally reject it as mistaken. It may be remarked that it is difficult to understand why Jonathan should have asked for Felix as procurator (Jos. Ant. xx. 8, 5) unless the latter had already served in Syria and gained favour with the Jews. The interest of the discrepancy for N. T. students lies in the justification which has been sought from this lengthened procuratorship of Felix for the words of St. Paul (Acts xxiv. 10), "of many years" (cp. "Jampridem Judaeae impositus," Tac. Ann. xii. 54). But accepting Wieseler's chronology (Chron. Apost. Zeit. pp. 66-88), Felix had been procurator for five years (A.D. 53-58) at the time of the trial, and in a government where so many changes had occurred this was a long period. The addition of dikaion to κρήνη in some few authorities, feebly justified by Chrysostom, would be a piece of flattery impossible in St. Paul's mouth. The only other mention of Felix is in Suetonius (Claud. 28), who calls him "the husband of three queens." One of the three was Drusilla, already mentioned. Another wife of royal descent was a grand-daughter of Antony and Cleopatra, also named Drusilla by Tacitus (Hist. v. 9). But probably this is by confusion with Drusilla the daughter of Herod Agrippa. The third "queen" is unknown. [E. R. B.]

FELLER (Is. xiv. 8; A. V. and R. V.) a cutter of wood, from the A.-S. fellan, "to fell." The word describes the destructive character of the king of Babylon. [F.]

FELLOES (A.-S. foelge), the curved pieces forming the circumference of a wheel (1 K. vii. 33, A. V. and R. V.; Lumby, "Glossary of Bible Words" in Eyre and Spottiswoode's Teachers' Bible). [F.]

FENCED CITIES (מִבְצָרוֹת, or מִבְצָרוֹת). Dan. xi. 15, from בָּצַר, cut off, separate, equivalent to בְּצָרוֹת עָרִים, Ges. p. 231; πόλεις ἄχυραι, τείχεσσι, τετειχισμένα; urbes, or civitates, munitae, munitissimae, firmae). The broad distinction between a city and a village in Biblical language has been shown to consist in the possession of walls. [CITY.] The City had walls, the village was unwallled, or had only a watchman's tower (מִגְדָּל; πύργος; turris custodum; compare Gesen. p. 267), to which the villagers resorted in times of danger. A three-fold distinction is thus obtained—1, cities; 2, unwallled villages; 3, villages with castles or towers (1 Ch. xxvii. 25). The district east of the Jordan, forming the kingdoms of Moab and Bashan, is said to have abounded from very early times in castles and fortresses, such as were built by Uzziah to protect the cattle, and to repel the inroads of the neighbouring tribes, besides unwallled towns (Amm. Marc. xiv. 9; Deut. iii. 5; 2 Ch. xxvi. 10). Of these many remains probably exist undiscovered at the present day, if many have been discovered (Porter, Damascus, ii. 197; Conder, Heth and Moab, p. 127). The dangers to which unwallled villages are exposed from the marauding tribes of the desert, and also the fortifications by which the inhabitants sometimes protect themselves, are illustrated by Sir J. Malcolm (Sketches of Persia, ch. xiv. 148; and Frazer, Persia, pp. 379, 380; cp. Judg. v. 7). Villages in the Hauran are sometimes enclosed by a wall, or rather the houses being joined together form a defence against Arab robbers, and the entrance is closed by a gate (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 212).

A further characteristic of a city as a fortified place is found in the use of the word בָּנָה, to build, and also fortify. So that "to build" a city appears to be sometimes the same thing as to fortify it (cp. Gen. viii. 20 and 2 Ch. xvi. 6 with 2 Ch. xi. 5-10 and 1 K. xv. 17).

Fortified place belonging to an enemy of the Assyrians.

The fortifications of the cities of Palestine, thus regularly "fenced," consisted of one or more walls crowned with battlemented parapets, having towers at regular intervals (2 Ch. xxxii. 5; Jer. xxxi. 38), on which in later times engines of war were placed, and watch was kept by day and night in time of war (Judg. ix. 45; 2 K. ix. 17; 2 Ch. xxvi. 9, 15). Along the oldest of the three walls of Jerusalem, there were 90 towers; in the second, 14; and in the third, 80 (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 2). One such tower, that of Hananeel, is repeatedly mentioned (Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. xiv. 10), as also others (Neh. iii. 1, 11, 27). The gateways of fortified towns were also fortified and closed with strong doors (Judg. xvi. 2, 3; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7; 2 Sam. xviii. 24, 33; 2 Ch. xiv. 7; Neh. ii. 8, iii. 3, 6, &c.; 1 Macc. xiii. 33, xv. 39). In advance of the wall there appears to have been sometimes an outwork (מִגְדָּל, προτείχισμα), in A. V. marg. ditch, R. V. "rampart" (1 K. xxi. 23; 2 Sam. xx. 15 [A. V. "trench," marg. the outmost wall; R. V. "rampart"]; Ges. Thes. p. 454), which was perhaps either a palisade or wall lining the ditch, or a wall raised midway within the ditch itself. Both of these methods of strengthening fortified places, by hindering the near approach of machines, were usual in earlier Egyptian fortifications (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 408 [1878]), but would generally be of less use in the hill forts of Palestine than in Egypt. In many towns there was a keep or citadel for a last resource to the defenders. Those remaining in the Haurán and Ledja are square. Such existed at Shechem and Thebez (Judg. ix. 46, 51, viii. 17; 2 K. ix. 17), and the great forts or towers of Psephinus, Hippicus, and especially Antonia, served a similar purpose, as well as that of overawing the town at Jerusalem. These forts were well furnished with cisterns (Acts xxi. 34; 2 Macc. v. 5; Joseph. Ant. xviii. 4, § 3; B. J. i. 5, § 4, v. 4, § 2, vi. 2, § 1). At the time of the entrance of Israel into Canaan there were many fenced cities existing, which at first caused great alarm to the exploring party of searchers (Num. xiii. 28), and afterwards much trouble to the people in subduing them. Many of these were refortified, or, as it is expressed, rebuilt by the Hebrews (Num. xxxii. 17, 34-42; Deut. iii. 4, 5; Josh. xi. 12, 13; Judg. i. 27-33), and many, especially those on the sea-coast, remained for a long time in the possession of their inhabitants, who were enabled to preserve them by means of their strength in chariots (Josh. xiii. 3, 6, xvii. 16; Judg. i. 19; 2 K. xviii. 8; 2 Ch. xxvi. 6). The strength of Jerusalem was shown by the fact that that city, or at least the citadel, or "stronghold of Zion," remained in the possession of the Jebusites until the time of David (2 Sam. v. 6, 7; 1 Ch. xi. 5). Among the kings of Israel and Judah several are mentioned as fortifiers or "builders" of cities: Solomon (1 K. ix. 17-19; 2 Ch. viii. 4-6), Jeroboam I. (1 K. xii. 25), Rehoboam (2 Ch. xi. 5, 12), Baasha (1 K. xv. 17), Omri (1 K. xvi. 24), Hezekiah (2 Ch. xxxii. 5), Asa (2 Ch. xiv. 6, 7), Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xvii. 12), but especially Uzziah (2 K. xiv. 22; 2 Ch. xxvi. 2, 9, 15); and in the reign of Ahab the town of Jericho was rebuilt and fortified by a private individual, Hiel of Bethel (1 K. xvi. 34). Herod the Great was conspicuous in fortifying strong positions, as Assyrian Fortifications.

Masada, Machaerus, Herodium, besides his great works at Jerusalem (Joseph. B. J. vii. 6, §§ 1, 2, and 8, § 3; B. J. i. 21, § 10; Ant. xiv. 13, § 9).

But the fortified places of Palestine served only in a few instances to check effectually the progress of an invading force, though many instances of determined and protracted resistance are on record, as of Samaria for three years (2 K. xviii. 10), of Jerusalem (2 K. xxv. 3) for four months, and in later times of Jotapata, Gamala, Machaerus, Masada, and above all Jerusalem itself, the strength of whose defences drew forth the admiration of the conqueror Titus (Joseph. B. J. iii. 6, iv. 1 and 9, vii. 6, §§ 2-4 and 8; Robinson, i. 232).

The earlier Egyptian fortifications consisted usually of a quadrangular and sometimes double wall of sun-dried brick, 15 feet thick, and often 50 feet in height, with square towers at intervals, of the same height as the walls, both crowned with a parapet, and a round-headed battlement in shape like a shield. A second lower wall with towers at the entrance was added, distant 13 to 20 feet from the main wall, and sometimes another was made of 70 or 100 feet in length, projecting at right angles from the main wall to enable the defenders to annoy the assailants in flank. The ditch was sometimes fortified by a sort of tenaille in the ditch itself, or a ravelin on its edge. In later times the practice of fortifying towns was laid aside, and the large temples with their enclosures were made to serve the purpose of forts (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i. 408, 409 [1878]).

The fortifications of Nineveh, Babylon, Ecbatana, and of Tyre and Sidon are all mentioned, either in the Canonical Books or in the Apocrypha.

The so-called Golden Gate of Jerusalem, showing supposed remains of the old Jewish Wall.

In the sculptures of Nineveh representations are found of walled towns, of which one is thought to represent Tyre, and all illustrate the mode of fortification adopted both by the Assyrians and their enemies (Jer. li. 30-32, 58; Ezek. xxvii. 11; Amos i. 10; Nah. iii. 14; Zech. ix. 3; Tob. i. 17, xiv. 14, 15; Judith i. 1, 4; Layard, Nin. ii. pp. 275, 279, 388, 395; Nin. & Bab. pp. 231, 358; Mon. of Nin. pt. ii. 39, 43). [H. W. P.]

FERRET (פֶּרֶט, anákhâh; μυγαλή; mygalc; R. V. "Gecko"), one of the unclean, creeping things forbidden as food in Lev. xi. 30. All commentators are agreed that the rendering of the A. V. is erroneous. That of the R. V. seems the most probable (see the marg. note in loco). This and the three which follow it in Leviticus are "creeping things," or reptiles; and the name is from a root פֶּרַט, "to sigh or groan," well applicable to the rapid clucking sound made by the Gecko (Ptyodactylus gecko) by vibrating its tongue against its palate, whence the name. The LXX. translates it μυγαλή, the shrew mouse (Sorex araneus), which is common enough in Palestine, where are also other species of shrew. The Rabbinical writers identify anákhâh with the hedgehog, which, though not uncommon in the country, would not be classed with the creeping things, but is looked upon as a small porcupine (Lewysohn, Zool. des Talmuds, §§ 129, 134). The gecko is extremely common in the Holy Land and in Arabia. It runs with great rapidity on walls and on smooth, indented surfaces, attaching itself to a ceiling by means of a remarkable provision in the structure of the underside of its toes, a series of fine laminae or plates, so that its movements appear like those of a fly. [H. B. T.]

FESTIVALS. I. The student of antiquity soon discovers that there is little that can be called strange or peculiar in the principal features of the Mosaic system of ritual and observance. The ceremonial actions in which the religious spirit found natural expression are much the same here as elsewhere [see FASTING]; allowing for modifications of more or less importance, introduced from time to time by special enactment, or originating in the altered circumstances of the Israelitish people at the various stages of their history. The Higher Revelation could find free course in the ancient channels; new ones were needless, and might even have proved a hindrance to its beneficent progress. What was good or capable of expressing good in existing religious usage was taken up and moulded to its own purposes by the religion of Moses and the Prophets. Among the institutions of natural* religion which were thus accepted by Mosaism as legitimate and worthy of adoption and regulation in the interests of a more spiritual faith and a more enlightened practice, was the festival.

A festival or feast is a period of time consisting of one or more consecutive holy days; that is, days hallowed or set apart for the honour of God. Generically a holy season, the festival is specifically a season of rejoicing, and thus excludes the fast. The principal business of the festival in the ancient world was sacrifice with its attendant ceremonies; and this naturally involved a more or less entire cessation of the ordinary business of life.

The opinion that the germ of the festival, as of all other worship, is to be found in periodical offerings and prayers to the departed, is far from being borne out by the oldest available evidence. It directly contradicts the testimony of the documents of the extremely primitive Accadian religion; where the chief objects of adoration are not ghosts, but elemental Powers of Heaven, Earth, the Deep, Fire, Wind, and Water: a religion which takes us back to at least five thousand years before our era, and whose beginnings must be referred to a yet remoter epoch. Ea, the Creator of Man, who has his home in "the waters under the earth," is no more a magnified ghost than is Nanna the Moon, or Utu the Sun, or Mermer the Wind, or Bilgi the Fire, or Nergal the God of War, or Ningirsu (the Chinese Siennung) the God of Tillage. Yet these deities belong to the earliest records of the oldest known language—the primitive speech of the land of Shumir and Accad.

To make "Animism" the one original form of religion is to ignore the fact that the impressions received in dreams and associated with the mystery of death were neither the most frequent nor the most vivid of the influences to which the primitive mind was subject. The powers of nature, the great objects of the physical world, the sun and moon daily departing and returning, apparently of their own will and motion, the sound and force of the unseen winds, the terrific phenomena of the storm, would from the outset impress ignorant but receptive humanity^b with those lively emotions of wonder and awe which find an instinctive expression in worship; even if we must grant that man first appeared upon this earthly scene in that forlorn destitution of reason and conscience and spiritual intuition which current speculation so freely presupposes. "Animism," to say the least, is no more a complete account of the origin of religion than the chemistry of the body is a complete account of human nature; and there is no ground in archaeology for denying that the sense of Unseen Non-human Living Powers is as truly an aboriginal endowment of humanity as the sense of an external world.

The Christian apologist is by no means concerned to prove the absolute originality of the Festivals prescribed or permitted by the Mosaic Law. It is enough for his purpose to establish the fact that these and other customary observances were vitalized under the new religion by the infusion of a new spirit. That Israel, like other contemporary peoples, observed certain festivals before the time of Moses is a fact which might reasonably be taken for granted. In those times no festivals could only mean no religion. Besides, if the ancestors of Israel migrated from "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi. 31), and if they there had "served other gods" (Josh. xxiv. 2), they must have kept the festivals of the Moon, the tutelary god of Ur. It is an arbitrary and ignorant conception, justified neither by the sacred records nor by historical experience, which imagines that the Mosaic legislation implied or made possible a clean sweep of all primitive traditions, and abolished for Israel the entire heritage of the past. That is not the method by which progress has been achieved in the history of religion.

But we have the positive evidence of the Hebrew language, with its use of the primitive Semitic term חג (chag), which is common to Hebrew and the cognate dialects, and must have descended from the period when the great Semitic family had not yet broken up into distinct nations. It is the term rendered "feast" in Exod. x. 9; cp. iii. 18, v. 1. The tenacious vitality of traditional festivals is well known from general history, and may be illustrated by the long survival of the Roman Saturnalia, under more or less transparent disguises, in Christian times.

In Israel, as in other ancient nations, we find Festivals or holy times associated (1) with the periodic changes of the moon, and (2) with the recurring seasons of the year. Of the former kind were the New Moons and Sabbaths; of the latter, the three great annual Pilgrimage-Fests. As regards the question of relative antiquity, the lunar Festivals would seem to be the older. All indications go to suggest that they were of primitive observance in Israel, and the opening page of Genesis represents the Sabbath as of immemorial institution; in perfect harmony with what we learn from other sources, viz. that a Sabbath or Day of Rest was known in ancient Babylonia, the primeval home of the forefathers of Jacob, and that the New Moons were there observed with prescribed hymns and offerings (see W.A.J. iv.², plates 25 and 32-33*). The differences of detail in regard to the observance of the Sabbath, e.g. that the Babylonian Kalendars seem to restrict it to the king and certain members of the priestly classes, and that the 19th day of the month is characterized in the same terms as the 7th, 14th, 21st, and 28th, cannot reasonably be considered to weaken the evidence for the Babylonian origin of the Sabbath. We should expect that in this as in other instances the effect of Mosaism would be to develop and spiritualize a pre-existing institution. In the prominence which it gave to the Sabbath, in the strictness and the universality of the ordinance, and above all in the religious significance associated therewith, we may still say with Dillmann that Mosaism was "quite original and creative."^c

As Wellhausen has remarked, it is probable that the Sabbath was originally regulated by the phases of the moon, and thus occurred on the 7th, 14th, 21st (and 28th) days of the month, the new moon being reckoned as the first day. Hence the anxious care with which from the earliest period watch was kept for the first appearance of the new moon which determined the beginning of the month. The service rendered to man by this planet as a measurer of time and an indicator of holy seasons is more than once recognised in the Old Testament. It is called "the faithful witness in the sky" (Ps. lxxxix. 37), and is said to have been appointed "for set seasons" (Ps. civ. 19; cp. Gen. i. 14).

That the New Moons, i.e. the first days of the twelve or thirteen lunar months of the Hebrew year [see YEAR], were held in high estimation from ancient times in Israel, is sufficiently attested, both by the Historical and by the Prophetical Books (1 Sam. xx. 5, 18; 2 K. iv. 23; Amos viii. 5; Hos. ii. 11; Is. i. 13; cp. Ps. lxxxi. 3); while the Law lent its sanction to these traditional holy days by the prescription of additional offerings (Num. xxviii. 11-15) for all of them, and by raising the New Moon of the Seventh Month to a position of special sanctity (Lev. xxiii. 24 sqq.; Num. xxix. 1 sqq.; FEAST OF TRUMPETS). The observance of the New Moons lasted even to Christian times (Col. ii. 16).

The position accorded to the New Moon of the seventh month is not an isolated fact. It stands in connexion with that peculiar extension of the Sabbatical idea to months and years, of which

* The late George Smith, quoted by Wellhausen, Proleg. p. 112, n. 2, speaks of "a general prohibition of work on these days" (Assyr. Eponym Comos., pp. 19, 20). Mr. Smith appears to have inferred this from the expression UD GUL-GAL, "a bad (or unlucky) day," šmu limnu, which the Babylonian Kalendars apply to the four (five) days. The texts, however, say nothing about general observance. They only regulate the conduct of the king and two other official persons—a priest and a soothsayer.

The definition preserved in W.A.J. ii. 32, 16 ab, šm nuš libbi | šabbatum, "The Day of Rest of the Heart | The Sabbath," is very remarkable. There is, however, no documentary evidence connecting it with the five days mentioned in the text.

no trace has been found outside of Mosaism. Thus, as the first day of the seventh month was to be hallowed by entire rest from work (shabbathôn) and by religious assembly and sacrifice, so the seventh year was ordained as a year of rest for the land, during which the sacred soil, Jehovah's gift to His people, was to keep "a Sabbath of perfect rest" (shabbath shabbathôn; Lev. xxv. 4) by being left to lie fallow all the year (Ex. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 2-7; Deut. xv. 1 sq.). Similarly, it was ordered that after the lapse of seven times seven years, or "seven Sabbaths (weeks) of years," the year of Jubilee should be celebrated (Lev. xxv. 8).

The great annual Festivals connected with the seasons of the year seem to have had their origin in the joy and thankfulness which led men to offer to God the firstlings of their flocks and herds and the first-fruits of the field and the vineyard (cp. Gen. iv. 3, 4). Hence the spring and autumn Festivals, vestiges of which are found in the remains of so many ancient peoples, remote from each other in space and time, in race and language. Among nations akin to the Hebrews, the festival of New Year was kept by the Babylonians and Assyrians, as we learn from the cuneiform inscriptions of Esarhaddon and Nebuchadnezzar; ⁴ while the Sacaean feast which was celebrated five days in the eleventh month, and was a kind of Saturnalia, may perhaps represent the Autumn feast (Berosus ap. Athen. Deipn. xiv. 9, 44; Ctesias, Fragm. Assyri. 20). The Syrians of Harran had a famous spring festival (Chwolohoh, Sabier, ii. 25); and the Arabs before Muhammad appear to have observed their seventh month, Rajab, as a holy festival month. Among peoples of Aryan race, the ancient Persians are said to have held a new year's festival (Nairôz) for six days at the beginning of the first month (Farvardin = March-April), and an autumn feast also of six days' duration (Mihrgan), from the 16th day of the seventh month (Mihr = September-October) onwards. The Hindus still celebrate their Huli-feast in March, and a feast of harvest in September. The general practice of antiquity, as established by these and similar instances, raises a strong presumption in favour of the historical character of the three great annual Festivals of Israel. It is true that there is little specific mention of these Festivals outside the Books of the Law. But here again, as in the case of Fasts, we have to bear in mind the poverty of our documents. The unexceptionable evidence of the prophetic allusions may be considered to supply the deficiencies of the historical narratives. We know from Amos (v. 21; viii. 5, 10) and Hosea (ii. 13; ix. 5) that the annual Feasts, as well as the New Moons and Sabbaths, were, with whatever deviations from the strict order of Mosaism as represented by the more orthodox practice of Judah, diligently observed in Northern Israel; and the references of Isaiah (i. 12-14; xxix. 1; xxx. 29) prove the popularity of the traditional Festivals in the southern kingdom. As regards the premonarchical period, Dillmann justly considers the notice of the first celebration in Canaan of Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Josh. v. 10, 11) to be ancient and authentic. The annual feast, celebrated with dances of virgins at Shiloh in the time of the Judges, appears from the context to have been a vintage-feast, and thus to represent the Feast of Tabernacles (Judg. xxi. 19 sq.); and towards the close of this period we have the yearly pilgrimage of Elkanah and his family to the same sanctuary (1 Sam. i. 3, 21). The sacrifices which Solomon offered "three times in a year" (1 K. ix. 25) are rightly referred by the later historian to the three great annual Feasts (2 Ch. viii. 13); and that sovereign is recorded to have dedicated the Temple in the seventh month immediately before the Feast of Tabernacles (1 K. viii. 2, 65, 66; cp. 2 Ch. vii. 9, 10). The important and unquestionably authentic notice of Jeroboam's transference of this last great Festival from the seventh to the eighth month proves at once its previous observance and the strong hold which it had upon the people (1 K. xii. 32). We thus have adequate if not abundant evidence in favour of what is, after all, the natural conclusion that Israel, like every other ancient people of note, had from the outset its regular Festivals and Holy Days. When, therefore, it is said (2 K. xxiii. 22) that no such Passover as that of the eighteenth year of Josiah had been held "from the days of the Judges," it is obvious that we are not to understand that the Passover had never before been celebrated at all. This extraordinary inference of a defunct criticism does violence to the context (Heb. "the like of this Passover"), and, moreover, would prove too much; for the chronicler has made a similar statement in regard to this celebration (2 Ch. xxxv. 18), and a yet more inclusive one in regard to the Feast of Tabernacles (Neh. viii. 17); and no critic would accuse that writer of disbelief in the Mosaic institution of the three great Festivals. The plain meaning of these passages is that the Festivals in question had not previously been observed in perfect accordance with the letter of the written Law.

While all the holy times of the Hebrews were alike Mô'adim (מוֹעֲדִים), "fixed or appointed seasons" (Gen. i. 14; Lev. xxiii. 2), the three annual Feasts of Passover and Unleavened Bread, of Pentecost, and of Tabernacles, were also called Chaggim (חַגִּים); a term which, according to its etymology, may have originally denoted dances in a ring, probably accompanied by music and singing, like the Greek cyclic chorus. The cognate verb (חָגַג) means "to dance." 1 Sam. xxx. 16; elsewhere it is "to keep festival" (Ex. xxxii. 6, 18, 19; Judg. xxi. 19; Lev. xxiii. 39; Ps. xlii. 4), "because they danced and expanded the Good Day (i.e. the Feast) with rejoicing," as Kimchi explains.*

* In Arabic the root ح, ḥaḡga, is "to go on pilgrimage" to Mecca; which agrees with the fact that the Hebrew chaggim were pilgrimage-feasts.

The Talmud uses the term חַגְגֵי רֵגֵלִים, regalim, in this sense; owing to a misunderstanding of the sense of that term in Ex. xxiii. 14; cp. Num. xxii. 28 (= "times") (Gea. Thez. s. v. חַגְגֵי).

⁴ The feast was called Zagmukku, a term explained to mean reš šatti, "Beginning of the year" (= Heb. תְּחִלַּת שָׁנָה), and derived from the Accadian zag, "lead," and mug, mu, "year."

Besides the earlier prescription of these Feasts in Ex. xxiii. 14-19, xxiv. 18 sq. (cp. Deut. xvi.), the middle section of the Law, now commonly known as "The Priestly Legislation" (das Priesterbuch), which Dillmann dates circ. 1000 B.C., but which Graf, Wellhausen, and their school refer to the age following the Return, furnishes a more elaborate Kalendar of Festivals (Lev. xxiii.; Num. xxviii., xxix.). In all, seven holy seasons ("set times," mô'ädim, Lev. xxiii. 2) are reckoned in addition to the weekly Sabbath, as follows:—

- (1.) Passover, on the 14th of the first month.
- (2.) Unleavened Bread, seven days, beginning with the 15th of the first month.
- (3.) Pentecost, the 50th day after the 16th of the first month.
- (4.) New Moon, or first day, of the seventh month.^f
- (5.) Day of Atonement, on the 10th day of the seventh month.
- (6.) Feast of Tabernacles, seven days, from the 15th of the seventh month.
- (7.) The Asêreth; that is, perhaps, the Closing Day, on the 22nd of the seventh month.

Thus six of the seven annual sacred times fall in the first and seventh months. The five (or six) months which include winter and the seasons of ploughing and sowing are unmarked by any annual feasts or holy seasons. So far as the numbers are concerned, there is no material divergence between the different accounts. Where only three Feasts are enumerated, the great popular Pilgrim-festivals (Chaggim) are intended. For particulars as to these Feasts, see the special articles. Here it may be observed that the Feast of Unleavened Bread, falling in the month Abib, i.e. the month of Ears of Corn (Ex. xxiii. 15), which was the month of the vernal equinox (March-April) when the first ears ripened, marked the beginning, as the Feast of Pentecost marked the end, of the corn-harvest; while the Feast of Tabernacles was essentially a vintage-feast. The agricultural basis of these festivals is evident from their alternative names. But the mode in which the Law associated new facts of religious import even with observances which in their origin had a different significance, and thus turned them into celebrations commemorative of great providential events in the history of Israel, is clearly seen in the reason assigned for making this month Abib the beginning of the year (Ex. xii. 2),^g and in the sacramental meaning ascribed to the ordinances of the Passover and of Unleavened Bread (Deut. xvi. 1-3). Even the Feast of Tabernacles, or of Ingathering (Ex. xxiii. 16), with its more obvious import of harvest joy and thanksgiving, had a historical reference connected with the feature of dwelling in leafy booths (Lev. xxiii. 42, 43). Abib or Nisan was, however, the first month of the Babylonian year (Nisannu; a softened form of the Accadian NI-SANGA, "that which is first");

as Tisri, the seventh month, had the same name and position in the Babylonian Kalendar (Tasritu, probably meaning "Consecration"). The Accadian name ITI DU AZAG, "month of the Pure Abode," suggests a possible connexion with the Feast of Tabernacles.^h However this may be, the fact that these two 7-day Festivals began on the 15th day of the month,—that is, at the time of full moon, which was also a Babylonian sacred season,—seems to indicate a connexion with the lunar cycle (cp. Num. ix. 9 sq.). The special importance of the Feast of Tabernacles, both in earlier and in later times, is evident from Jeroboam's interference with it (1 K. xii. 32) and from Zechariah's prophecy concerning it (Zech. xii. 14).

Ewald and Dillmann have plausibly grouped the six annual Festivals, including the Day of Atonement and excluding the seventh New Moon, round the two great Feasts of Unleavened Bread and Tabernacles. Each greater Festival is ushered in by a preliminary holy day (Vorfeier) and terminated by a closing celebration (Nachfeier). The Passover and Pentecost are thus subordinated to the spring Festival; the Day of Atonement and the Asêreth to that of autumn. Dillmann's ingenious argument must not, however, blind us to the fact that the documents always name three, never two Pilgrim-Feasts (Chaggim). A love of symmetry and system is apt to carry us beyond our evidence. Neither the Day of Pentecost nor that of Atonement really fit into the framework provided for them. Both are independent celebrations of the greatest importance; and the latter is not a "festival" at all in the sense of the three Pilgrim-Feasts.

All these sacred times involved the cessation of ordinary business. But seven days within the feast-cycle were distinguished as Days of Holy Convocation (Ex. xii. 15; Lev. xxiii.; Num. xxviii.; Is. i. 13), and were observed with a more Sabbatical strictness. They were the first and seventh days of the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the Day of Atonement, the first of the Feast of Tabernacles, the eighth day (Asêreth) which immediately followed it, the New Moon of the seventh month, and the Day of Pentecost. Of these, the Day of Atonement demanded absolute cessation of every kind of work (Lev. xvi. 29, xxiii. 2, 31; Num. xxix. 7); on the other six, abstention from all "servile work" (עבודה); perhaps chiefly husbandry) was enough (Lev. xxiii. 7, 8, 21, 25, 35, 36; Num. xxviii. 18, 19; cp. Ex. xii. 16). On all these days assemblies were called for public worship. Owing to their Sabbath-like characteristics, they are designated by a kindred Hebrew term (shabbâthôn); formed from shabbâth: Lev. xxiii. 24, 39): the Day of Atonement is distinguished by a title which combines the two expressions (shabbath shabbâthôn; Lev. xxiii. 32).ⁱ On any other day of the great 7-day

^f After the introduction of the Seleucid era, the New Moon of the seventh month became a sort of New Year's Day.

^g According to another reckoning (Ex. xxiii. 16), which was the rule in Syria, the year began in autumn [see YEAL].

^h The term DU is explained sukku, "hut,"—which seems to answer to the Heb. sukkôth, שֹׁכֵת, in the name of the feast,—as well as shûtu, "dwelling," and tilu, "mound" (see Sp. 25, 28, 30). We may remember that the booths of the Feast were set up on the house-tops.

ⁱ At the end of the verse, simply Shabbâth, Sabbath.

festivals work was for obvious reasons permissible, provided the day did not happen to coincide with a weekly Sabbath.

Festival days were naturally marked in the public service of the national Sanctuary by special sacrifices, and in some cases by offerings characteristic of the occasion, in addition to the ordinary morning and evening sacrifice (Lev. xliii.; Num. xxviii., xxix.). As regards the attendance of the people, it is evident that the public proclamation of a "Day of Holy Convocation" invited the presence at the services of all Israelites who might be in the neighbourhood of the Sanctuary; and for the three great Pilgrim-feasts, attendance was enjoined by the Law upon all males (Ex. xliiii. 14-17, xxiv. 23 sqq.; Deut. xvi. 16). It was expressly forbidden to come empty-handed; and the custom was to take advantage of the pilgrimages for the presentation of obligatory as well as free-will offerings. The fact that no penalties are threatened for non-attendance may indicate that the Law is rather regulating ancient and popular usage than ordaining new observances. At all events, the general enthusiasm for the pilgrimage-feasts from ancient times is sufficiently attested (Ps. xlii. 5, lxxxiv. 6, 7; and the Pilgrims' Hymn-book, Pss. cxx.-cxxxiv.; cp. 1 K. xii. 32). In individual cases, allowance would naturally be made for untoward circumstances, such as distance, difficulties of travelling, poverty, and other material obstacles (cp. John vii. 8, 10). Philo of Alexandria was even satisfied with a single pilgrimage, like a modern Mahometan Hajji.

Although women were not under formal obligation to make the annual pilgrimages, the examples of Hannah (1 Sam. i. 7; ii. 19) and of the Blessed Virgin (Luke ii. 41) indicate the practice of pious women in regard to the greater Festivals from the earliest period to the latest. In spite of all deductions, the conflux of Jews from all parts of the world to Jerusalem for the celebration of the three great Feasts, especially that of Pentecost (Acts ii. 9 sq.), was, in the period after the Return, enormous. Josephus estimates the number attending the Passover at over two millions; and the Roman procurator was always careful to make a strong show of military force in Jerusalem on these occasions, in order to overawe the multitudes of fervid patriots (Jos. Ant. xvii. 9 § 3, 10 § 2, xx. 8 § 11; Bell. Jud. ii. 12 § 1: cp. Matt. xxvi. 5; Luke xliii. 1; Acts xxi. 31 sq.). The great influence of these gatherings, not only as vivifying old religious memories and intensifying devotion, but also as fostering a sense of national unity, was already recognised in the early period of the monarchy (1 K. xii. 26, 27; cp. 2 Ch. xxx. 1); and their effect upon the maintenance of Judaism as a living force throughout the Greek and Roman world until the fall of Jerusalem can hardly be overrated.

II. In the period after the Return, certain annual festivals were instituted in commemoration of historical events in which the mercy of God was especially recognised. Of these the chief were:—(1) The Feast of Purim (Esth. ix. 20 sq.: see PURIM), in memory of the deliverance of the nation from the designs of Haman; and (2) the Feast of the Dedication, instituted

B.C. 164 by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. iv. 56; see DEDICATION). Other new festivals of this period—such as Nicanor's Day, commemorating the victory of the 13th Adar, B.C. 161 (see NICANOR: 1 Macc. vii. 49; Jos. Ant. xii. 10, § 5), and the anniversary of the taking of the Acra by Simon, B.C. 141 (1 Macc. xiii. 52)—soon fell into disuse, though the former appears to have survived until the time of Josephus. The so-called "Feasts of the Wood-carryings," ἑορτα τῶν ξυλοφοριῶν (Jos. Bell. Jud. ii. 17, §§ 6, 7; Taanith, iv. 5) grew out of the circumstance that the offerings of wood for Temple use (Neh. x. 34; xliii. 21) came in the course of time to be brought to Jerusalem by all contributors on the same day, viz. the 14th of the fifth month (Lōsos = Ab).

III. The New Testament does not record the formal institution of any Christian Festivals. But although not a word is said of its institution, we find the Lord's Day already recognised by the Church (Acts xx. 7: cp. 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2; Heb. x. 25; Rev. i. 10); and the earliest external testimonies confirm the natural inference from these passages [see LORD'S DAY]. The first Christians, moreover, followed the example of their Master in observing the greater Festivals of the Jewish Church, at least until the destruction of the Holy Place. Those Festivals, indeed, had received a new significance for them, by association with the principal events in the history of Redemption; just as the Law had given them a higher import for ancient Israel, by making them commemorative of the turning points in the historical emancipation of Jehovah's people. Thus the Passover was consecrated anew by the sacrifice of Christ our Passover (1 Cor. v. 7, 8); Pentecost, by the outpouring of the Holy Ghost (Acts ii. 1 sq.; xviii. 21; xx. 16).

For the rest, it is a superficial error to suppose that the cycle of Festivals is an unnecessary addition to the simplicity of the Gospel. A mechanical observance, and a total misconception of the use and meaning of festal solemnities, may make it such in effect, as happened in the case of the old Jewish Church. But a similar perversion of the Lord's Day is by no means unknown in the history of Christian sects. The widespread, indeed we may say universal observance of special days and seasons among the great historical races of mankind, is a fact which goes far to prove that they answer to some special needs of human nature; and reason cannot refuse to admit that the same grounds of religious expediency which suggested the institution of festivals and holy days in all the great pre-Christian systems, have lost little of their original force in the lapse of time. It seems plain that in our present circumstances—and more now, in the busy, restless modern world, than at any former period—such days and seasons of detachment, and holy meditation, and joyful commemoration of the great facts of Redemption—yes, and of the lives and deaths of those glorious patterns of our humbler walk, the saints of old,—can only be neglected at the deadly risk of complete absorption in the cares and pleasures of the passing scene. No stronger indication of the truth can well be imagined than the necessity that has driven religious bodies, which in time past have exhibited the greatest hostility to the "ecclesiastical superstition" of Saints' days, to the observance of unauthorised equivalents such as anniversaries, and harvest festivals, and "Flower Services," and "Watch Night." What are these and similar novelties but so many unconscious testimonies to the wisdom of the Church Catholic in her ordinance of fixed holy days? Festivals, in short, would seem to be necessary for the average of mankind, if the spiritual life needs recurring stimulus and renewal, if religion is to have its due, and if the homage of public worship and thanksgiving is to be offered at fitting intervals and with due solemnity to our Divine Lord and King.

FESTUS (Φήστος; Festus). Porcius Festus was sent by Nero as the successor of Felix in the government of Judaea, and probably arrived there in the summer of A.D. 60. On his reaching Jerusalem the case of St. Paul was at once brought before him by the chief priests, and on his return to Caesarea he held an inquiry. Perplexed by the religious questions raised on the trial (Acts xxv. 20), and still more from a desire to gain favour with his new subjects, he was disposed to carry St. Paul to Jerusalem for a further trial. The danger involved in this led St. Paul to appeal to Caesar. On the arrival of Agrippa, Festus related to him the whole affair, and sought his assistance in gaining understanding of the religious questions involved. The doctrine of the resurrection called out from Festus the words "Paul, thou art mad;" but the discourse strengthened the governor's conviction of the prisoner's innocence of the charges of the Jews, who had probably sought both before Felix and Festus to identify St. Paul with the religious impostors (γόητες) who under both governors played a prominent part in the disturbances of the time (cp. also Acts xxi. 38). Festus shows exactly the same selfishness as Felix in his readiness to gratify the Jews at St. Paul's expense. But he may not have heard of the conspiracy and ambush two years before, and may have suspected no treachery. Beyond this there is nothing to blame in him as a magistrate, and the narrative of the Acts harmonises with the account of Josephus (B. J. ii. 14, 1), who contrasts him favourably with his successor Albinus. His cynical inability to understand religious earnestness contrasts unfavourably with his predecessor's "knowledge of the Way" and awakened conscience; but Festus was certainly a better governor and probably a better man. His friendship with Herod Agrippa II. (Acts xxv. 13) is illustrated by an incident recorded by Josephus (Ant. xx. 8, 11), in which he takes Agrippa's part. He died in less than two years after his appointment. [E. R. B.]

FETTERS (נְשִׁיטִים; פְּרָל; יָקִים). 1. The first of these Hebrew words, nechushtaim, expresses the material of which fetters were usually made, viz. brass (עָדָי חַלְדָּאִי; A. V. and R. V. "fetters of brass"), and also that they were made in pairs, the word being in the dual number: it is the most usual term for fetters (Judg. xvi. 21; 2 Sam. iii. 34; 2 K. xxv. 7; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 11, xxxvi. 6; Jer. xxxix. 7, lii. 11). Iron was occasionally employed for the purpose (Ps. cv. 18, cxlix. 8). 2. Cebel occurs only in the above Psalms, and, from its appearing in the singular number, may perhaps apply to the link which connected the fetters. Zikkim ("fetters," Job xxxvi. 8) is more usually translated "chains" (Ps. cxlix. 8; Is. xlv. 14; Nah. iii. 10), but its radical sense appears to refer to the contraction of the feet by a chain (Gesen. Thesaur. p. 424). [W. L. B.]

FEVER (פָּרֶזֶת; פְּרִיזָה; פְּרִיזָה; ἄνερος, βίλος, ἐρεθισμός; Lev. xxvi. 16; Deut. xxviii. 22). These words, from various roots signifying heat or inflammation, are rendered in the A. V. by various words suggestive of fever, or a feverish affection. The word βίλος ("shuddering") suggests the ague as accompanied by fever, as in the opinion of the LXX. probably intended; and this is still a very common disease in Palestine. The third word, which they render ἐρεθισμός (a term still known to pathology), a feverish irritation, and which in the A. V. is called burning fever, may perhaps be erysipelas. The cases in the Gospels are St. Peter's wife's mother (Matt. viii. 14; Mark i. 30; Luke iv. 38) and the "nobleman's son" (John iv. 52, κυριέσσουσα, κυριετός), but neither having any distinctive symptom. Fever constantly accompanies the bloody flux, or dysentery (Acts xxviii. 8; cp. De Mandelslo, Travels, ed. 1669, p. 65). Fevers of an inflammatory character are mentioned (Burckhardt, Arab. i. 446) as common at Mecca, and putrid ones at Djidda. Intermittent fever and dysentery, the latter often fatal, are ordinary Arabian diseases. For the former, though often fatal to strangers, the natives care little, but much dread a relapse. These fevers sometimes occasion most troublesome swellings in the stomach and legs (ii. 290, 291). [H. H.]

FIELD (שָׂדֵה). The Hebrew sadeh is not adequately represented by our "field;" the two words agree in describing cultivated land, but they differ in point of extent, the sadeh being specifically applied to what is unenclosed, while the opposite notion of enclosure is involved in the word field. The essence of the Hebrew word has been variously taken to lie in each of these notions, Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 1321) giving it the sense of freedom, Stanley (S. and P. p. 490) that of smoothness, deriving arum from arare. On the one hand, sadeh is applied to any cultivated ground, whether pasture (Gen. xxix. 2, xxxi. 4, xxxiv. 7; Ex. ix. 3), tillage (Gen. xxxvii. 7, xlvii. 24; Ruth ii. 2, 3; Job xxiv. 6; Jer. xxvi. 11; Micah iii. 12), woodland (1 Sam. xiv. 25, A. V. and R. V. "ground;" Ps. cxxxii. 6), or mountain-top (Judg. ix. 32, 36; 2 Sam. i. 21); and in some instances in marked opposition to the neighbouring wilderness (Stanley, pp. 236, 490), as in the instance of Jacob settling in the field of Shechem (Gen. xxxiii 19), the field of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 35; Num. xxi. 20, A. V. "country;" Ruth i. 1), and the vale of Siddim, i.e. of the cultivated fields, which formed the oasis of the Pentapolis (Gen. xiv. 3, 8; see Delitzsch [1887] and Dillmann³), though a different sense has been given to the name by Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 1321). On the other hand, the sadeh is frequently contrasted with what is enclosed, whether a vineyard (Ex. xxii. 5; Lev. xiv. 3, 4; Num. xvi. 14, xx. 17; cp. Num. xxii. 23, "the ass went into the field," with v. 24, "a path of the vineyards, a wall being on this side and a wall on that side"), a garden (the very name of which, גַּן , implies enclosure), or a walled town (Deut. xxviii. 3, 16): unwalled villages or scattered houses ranked in the eye of the Law as fields (Lev. xxv. 31), and hence the expression eis rotis aëpōis = houses in the fields (in villas, Vulg.; Mark vi. 36, 56). In many passages the term implies what is remote from a house (Gen. iv. 8, xxiv. 63; Deut. xxii. 25) or settled habitation, as in the case of Esau (Gen. xxv. 27; the LXX., however, refers it to his character, ἀγροῖκος): this is more fully expressed by $\text{שָׂדֵה הַחַיְתָּוִת}$, "the open field" (Lev. xiv. 7, 53, xvii. 5; Num. xix. 16; 2 Sam. xi. 11), with which is naturally coupled the notion of exposure and desertion (Jer. ix. 22; Ezek. xvi. 5, xxxii. 4, xxxiii. 27, xxxix. 5).

The separate plots of ground were marked off by stones, which might easily be removed (Deut. xix. 14, xxvii. 17; cp. Job xxiv. 2; Prov. xxii. 28, xxiii. 10): the absence of fences rendered the fields liable to damage from straying cattle (Ex. xxii. 5) or fire (v. 6; 2 Sam. xiv. 30): hence the necessity of constantly watching flocks and herds, the people so employed being in the present day named Natooor (Wortabet, Syria, i. 293). A certain amount of protection was gained by sowing the tallest and strongest of the grain crops on the outside: "spelt" appears to have been most commonly used for this purpose (Is. xxviii. 25, as in the margin). From the absence of enclosures, cultivated land of any size might be termed a field, whether it were a piece of ground of limited area (Gen. xiii. 13, 17; Is. v. 8), a man's whole inheritance (Lev. xvii. 16 sq.; Ruth iv. 5; Jer. xxxii. 9, 25; Prov. xxvii. 26, xxxi. 16), the ager publicus of a town (Gen. xli. 48; Neh. xii. 29), as distinct, however, from the ground immediately adjacent to the walls of the Levitical cities, which was called שְׂדֵה עִיר (A. V. and R. V. "suburbs"), and was deemed an appendage of the town itself (Josh. xxi. 11, 12), or lastly the territory of a people (Gen. xiv. 7, xxiii. 3, xxxvi. 35; Num. xxi. 20; Ruth i. 6, iv. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 1, xxvii. 7, 11). In 1 Sam. xxvii. 5, "a town in the field" (A. V. and R. V. "country") = a provincial town as distinct from the royal city. A plot of ground separated from a larger one was termed שְׂדֵה יָחִיד (Gen. xxxiii. 19; Ruth ii. 3; 1 Ch. xi. 13), or simply חֵקֶל (2 Sam. xiv. 30, xxiii. 12; cp. 2 Sam. xix. 29). Fields occasionally received names after remarkable events, as Helkath-Hazzurim, the field of the strong men, or possibly of the sharp knives (R. V. marg., 2 Sam. ii. 16; cp. Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sun. The LXX. has a different reading), or from the use to which they may have been applied (2 K. xviii. 17; Is. vii. 3; Matt. xxvii. 7).

It should be observed that the expressions "fruitful field" (Is. x. 18, xxix. 17, xxxii. 15, 16) and "plentiful field" (Is. xvi. 10; Jer. xlvi. 33) are not connected with sadeh, but with carmel, meaning a park or well-kept wood, as distinct from a wilderness or a forest. The same term occurs in 2 K. xix. 23 and Is. xxxvii. 24 (A. V. "Carmel"), Is. x. 18 ("forest"), and Jer. iv. 26 ("fruitful place") [CARMEL]. Distinct from this is the expression in Ezek. xvii. 5, שָׂדֵה יִשְׂרָאֵל (A. V. "fruitful field"), which means a field suited for planting suckers.

We have further to notice other terms—(1) Shedemoth (שְׂדֵמֹת), translated "fields," and connected by Gesenius with the idea of enclosure. It is doubtful, however, whether the notion of burning does not rather lie at the bottom of the word. This gives a more consistent sense throughout. In Is. xvi. 8, it would thus mean the withered grape; in Hab. iii. 17, blasted corn; in Jer. xxxi. 40, the burnt parts of the city (no "fields" intervened between the south-eastern angle of Jerusalem and the Kedron); while in 2 K. xxiii. 4, and Deut. xxxii. 32, the sense of a place of burning is appropriate. It is not therefore necessary to treat the word in Is. xxvii. 27, "blasted," as a corrupt reading (cp. 2 K. xix. 26). (2) Abel

(אַבְלָה), a well-watered spot, frequently employed as a prefix in proper names. (3) Achu (אַחַז), a word of Egyptian origin (see reff. in *MV.*¹¹), given in the LXX. in a Grecised form, ἄχευ (Gen. xli. 2, 18, "meadow;" Job viii. 11, "flag;" Is. xix. 7, LXX.), meaning the green flags and rushes that grow in the marshes of Lower Egypt. (4) Maareh (מַעֲרֵה), which occurs only once (Judg. xx. 33, "meadows"; R. V. "Maareh-Geba"), with a sense of openness or bareness or exposure: thus, "they came forth on account of the exposure of Gibeah," the Benjamites having been previously enticed away (v. 31).

FIELD, POTTER'S, THE. [ACELDAMA; POTTER'S FIELD, THE.]

FIG, FIG-TREE (תְּאֵנָה , teēnah; Arab.

تِين , teen; συκή; figus) belongs to the natural order of the Bread-fruit family, and the sub-order Moraceæ, which includes also the mulberry. It is a word of frequent occurrence in the O. T., where it signifies the tree Ficus Carica of Linnaeus, and also its fruit. The LXX. render it by συκή and σῦκος, and when it signifies fruit by συκῆ—also by συκεῶν or συκῶν, ficetum, in Jer. v. 17 and Amos iv. 9. In N. T. συκή is the fig-tree, and σῦκα the figs (Jas. iii. 12). It is indigenous in Southern Europe, North Africa, the Canary Islands, Asia Minor, Syria, Persia, Armenia, and Northern India. It has a very smooth bark, with very large, thick, and palmate leaves. The branches are numerous, wide and spreading, presenting an object of striking beauty when in full leaf. The fruit, unlike any other in this country, is an enlarged, succulent, hollow receptacle, containing the imperfect flowers in its interior. Hence the blossom of the fig-tree is not visible till the receptacle has been cut open. The fig-tree is very common in Palestine (Deut. viii. 8). Mount Olivet was famous for its fig-trees in ancient times, and they are still found there (see Stanley, S. & P. pp. 187, 421, 422). The name probably means "early ripening," from אָי, "to be in good time." See MV.¹¹

In Gen. iii. 7, the identification of עֵץ הַתְּמָרָה with the leaves of the Ficus Carica has been disputed by Gesenius, Tuch, and others (see Delitzsch [1887] in loco), who think that the large leaves of the Indian Musa Paradisiaca are meant (Germ. Adamsfeige, Fr. figtier d'Adam). These leaves, however, would not have needed to be strung or sewn together, and the plant itself is not of the same kind as the fig-tree. Dillmann^a considers that the writer chose the fig-leaf as the largest with which he was familiar among Palestine leaves.

The failure or destruction of the fig is repeatedly threatened by the Prophets as one of Jehovah's sore judgments upon the land, which was "a land of wheat and barley and vines and fig-trees" (Deut. viii. 8). "He smote their vines also and fig-trees" (Ps. cv. 33). It must be borne in mind that the dried fig is not only an agreeable luxury, but, as an important article of daily food, is one of the staples of the country. Dried figs along with barley-cakes are the usual provender of the traveller, as well as the cheapest food.

"To sit every man under his vine and under his fig-tree" (1 K. iv. 25; 2 K. xviii. 31; Is. xxxvi. 16; Mic. iv. 4, Zech. iii. 10) conveyed to the Jew the fullest idea of peace, security, and prosperity. Nor is the expression merely figurative. There is no protection against the rays of an Eastern sun more complete than the dense foliage of the fig-tree, which often touches the ground at its circumference. Under such a fig-tree, screened from all human observation, had Nathanael wrestled in prayer, but was noted by the omniscient eye of Jesus the Messiah.

When figs are spoken of as distinguished from the fig-tree, the plur. form תְּמָרִים is used (see Jer. viii. 13).

2. There are also the words תְּמָרָה, תְּמָרָה, and תְּמָרָה, signifying different kinds of figs. (a) In Hos. ix. 10, תְּמָרָה בְּתֵמָרָה signifies the first ripe of the fig-tree, and the same word occurs in Is. xxviii. 4, and in Mic. vii. 1 (cp. Jer. xxiv. 2). Lowth on Is. xxviii. 4 quotes from Shaw's Trav. p. 370 sq. a notice of the early fig called buccôre, and in Spanish Albacora (see MV.¹¹ s. n.). (b) תְּמָרָה is the unripe fig, which hangs through the winter. It is mentioned only in Cant. ii. 13, and its name comes from the root תְּמָרָה, crudus fuit. The LXX. render it δλυρθολ. It is found in the Greek word Βηθφαγη = תְּמָרָה, "house of green figs" (see Buxt. p. 1691). (c) In the Historical Books of the O. T. mention is made of cakes of figs, used as articles of food, and compressed into that form for the sake of keeping them. They also appear to have been used remedially for boils (2 K. xx. 7; Is. xxxviii. 21). Such a cake was called תְּמָרָה, or more fully תְּמָרָה תְּמָרָה, from a root which in Arab. dabala = to make into a lump. Hence, or rather from the Syr.

תְּמָרָה, the first letter being dropped, came the Greek word παλάθη. Athenaeus (xi. p. 500, ed. Casaub.) makes express mention of the παλάθη Συριακή. Jerome on Ezek. vi. describes the παλάθη to be a mass of figs and rich dates, formed into the shape of bricks or tiles, and compressed in order that they may keep. Such cakes harden so as to need cutting with an axe.

Few passages in the Gospels have given occasion to so much perplexity as that of St. Mark xi. 13, where the Evangelist relates the circumstance of our Lord's cursing the fig-tree near Bethany: "And seeing a fig-tree afar off having leaves, He came, if haply He might find any thing thereon: and when He came to it, He found nothing but leaves; for the time of figs was not yet" (R. V. "for it was not the season of figs"). The apparent unreasonableness of seeking fruit at a time when none could naturally be expected, and the consequent injustice of the sentence pronounced upon the tree, is obvious to every reader.

The fig-tree, as has been stated above, in Palestine produces fruit at two, or even three, different periods of the year: first, there is the biccûrah, or "early ripe fig," which ripens from May to August, according to situation. The biccûrah drops off the tree as soon as ripe; hence the allusion in Nah. iii. 12, when shaken they "even fall into the mouth of the eater." Shaw (Trav. i. 264, 8vo ed.) aptly compares the Spanish name breba for this early fruit, "quasi breve," as continuing only for a short time. About the time of the ripening of the biccûrah, the karmous or summer fig begins to be formed; these rarely ripen before September, when another crop, called "the winter fig," appears. Shaw describes this kind as being of a much longer shape and darker complexion than the karmous, hanging and ripening on the tree even after the leaves are shed, and, provided the winter proves mild and temperate, being gathered as a delicious morsel in the spring (cp. also Plin. N. H. xvi. 26, 27).

The attempts to explain the above-quoted passage in St. Mark are numerous, and for the most part very unsatisfactory.

The explanation which has found favour with most writers is that which understands the words καρπὸς οὐκ ἔσται to mean "the fig-harvest;" the καρπὸς in this case is referred not to the clause immediately preceding, "He found nothing but leaves," but to the more remote one, "He came if haply He might find any thing thereon" (for a similar trajection it is usual to refer to Mark xvi. 3, 4); the sense of the whole passage being then as follows: "And seeing a fig-tree afar off having leaves, He came if perchance He might find any fruit on it (and He ought to have found some), for the time of gathering it had not yet arrived, but when He came He found nothing but leaves" (see the notes in the Greek Testament of Burton, Trollope, Bloomfield, Webster and Wilkinson; Macknight, Harm. of the Gospels, ii. p. 591, note, 1809; Elsley's Annot. ad l. c., &c.). A forcible objection to this explanation will be found in the fact that at the time implied, viz. the end of March or the beginning of April, no figs at all eatable would be found on the trees; the biccārim seldom ripen in Palestine before the end of June, and at the time of the Passover the fruit, to use Shaw's expression, would be "hard and no bigger than common plums," corresponding in this state to the paggim (פגים) of Cant. ii. 13, wholly unfit for food in an unprepared state; and it is but reasonable to infer that our Lord expected to find something more palatable than these small sour things upon a tree which by its show of foliage bespoke, though falsely, a corresponding show of good fruit, for it is important to remember that the fruit comes before the leaves. Again, if καυρds denotes the "fig-harvest," we must suppose that, although the fruit might not have been ripe, the season was not very far distant, and that the figs in consequence must have been considerably more matured than these hard paggim; but it is probable that St. Mark should have thought it necessary to state that it was not yet the season for gathering figs in March, when they could not have been fit to gather before June at the earliest?

The difficulty is best met by looking it full in the face, and by admitting that the words of the Evangelist are to be taken in the natural order in which they stand, neither having recourse to trajection, nor to unavailable attempts to prove that edible figs could have been found on the trees in March. It is true that occasionally the winter figs remain on the tree in mild seasons, and may be gathered the following spring, but this is not to be considered a usual circumstance.

But, after all, where is the unreasonableness of the whole transaction? It was stated above that the fruit of the fig-tree appears before the leaves; consequently if the tree produced leaves it should also have had some figs as well. As to what natural causes had operated to effect so unusual a thing for a fig-tree to have leaves in March, it is unimportant to inquire; but the stepping out of the way with the possible chance (εἰ ἔπα, si forte, "under the circumstances;" see Winer, Gram. of N. T. Diction, p. 465, Masson's transl.) of finding eatable fruit on a fig-tree in leaf at the end of March, would probably be repeated by any observant modern traveller in Palestine. The whole question turns on the pretensions of the tree: had it not proclaimed by its foliage its superiority over other fig-trees, and thus proudly exhibited its precociousness; or, had our Lord at that season of the year visited any of the other fig-trees upon which no leaves had as yet appeared with the prospect of finding fruit—then the case would be altered, and the unreasonableness and injustice real. The words of St. Mark, therefore, are to be understood in the sense which the order of the words naturally suggests. The Evangelist gives the reason why no fruit was found on the tree, viz. "because it was not the time for fruit;" we are left to infer the reason why it ought to have had fruit if it were true to its pretensions; and it must be remembered that this miracle had a typical design, to show how God would deal with the Jews, who, professing like this precocious fig-tree "to be first," should be "last" in His favour, seeing that no fruit was produced in their lives, but only, as Wordsworth well expresses it, "the rustling leaves of a religious profession, the barren traditions of the Pharisees, the ostentatious display of the Law, and vain exuberance of words without the good fruit of works."

The question is well summed up by Archbishop Trench (Notes on the Miracles, p. 438): "All the explanations which go to prove that, according to the natural order of things in a climate like that of Palestine, there might have been even at this early time of the year figs on that tree, either winter figs which had survived till spring or the early figs of spring themselves: all these, ingenious as they often are, yet seem to me beside the matter. For, without entering further into the question whether they prove their point or not, they shatter upon that ὅτι γὰρ ἦν καυρds οὐκ ἔστων of St. Mark; from which it is plain that no such calculation of probabilities brought the Lord thither, but those abnormal leaves which He had a right to count would have been accompanied with abnormal fruit." See also Trench's admirable reference to Ex. xvii. 24.

In the fig-tree as in all other plants, there are individual peculiarities, and the writer has often noticed, both in Palestine and especially in the Canary Islands, trees which naturally, or from their situation, put forth their leaves much earlier than their neighbours. But the fruit also precedes the foliage. Yet occasionally we have found trees in leaf without fruit. These were generally young trees which had been making vigorous growth. In some moist and hot nooks, as at Engedi, and in some Canary Island glens, the fig-tree never sheds its leaf and bears sparingly throughout the year. In Palestine irregular pieces of ground, the mouths of wells, and corners of vineyards are generally occupied by a fig-tree, "A fig-tree planted in a vineyard." The fig still maintains its repute in the East as the best poultice (Is. xxxviii. 21), and its use is familiar among ourselves as efficacious for gumbolls. [H. B. T.]

FIR (פִּיר, bērōsh; בְּרוֹתִים, bērōthim [see MV.¹¹]; from פָּרַשׁ, "to cut," Ges. p. 246, rendered indifferently in LXX. as ἀκρεῖθος, κέδρος, πίνος, κυπάρισσος, πεύκη; abies, cupressus; A. V. and R. V. "fir;" R. V. marg. cupress). The word occurs very frequently in the O. T., generally in connexion with Lebanon and other mountain districts, and the A. V. translation is probably correct, though the term may have included the cypress, which is a conifer, and the juniper, which is similar in general appearance. That it is a general expression, like our own word "fir," may be inferred from the LXX. rendering it sometimes πεύκη (pine), at other times κυπάρισσος (cypress), or ἀκρεῖθος (juniper), all of which must have been well known to the Alexandrines. The timber was used for boards or planks for the Temple (1 K. vi. 15); for its two doors (v. 34); for the ceiling of the greater house (2 Ch. iii. 5); for shipboards (Ezek. xxvii. 5); for musical instruments (2 Sam. vi. 5). The red heart-wood of the tall fragrant juniper of Lebanon was no doubt extensively used in the building of the Temple; and the identification of bērōsh or bērōth with this tree receives additional confirmation from the LXX. words ἀκρεῖθος and κέδρος, "a juniper." The deodar, the larch, and Scotch fir, which have been by some writers identified with the berūsh, do not exist in Syria or Palestine. The most abundant species of pine now found in Lebanon and Western Palestine is Pinus halepensis (Mill.) or Aleppo pine, a very handsome tree, not unlike our Scotch fir. It must be this species, still common on Lebanon, which is associated with the cedar for its noble growth. "The fir-trees were not like his boughs" (Ezek. xxxi. 8). "The choice fir-trees of Lebanon" (Is. xxxvii. 24). On Gilead and other mountainous regions east of Jordan its place is taken by Pinus carica (Don.), an allied species. The Aleppo pine is found occasionally throughout the country as far south as Hebron, but has generally been destroyed for fuel. In the time of the Crusades there was a fir-wood on the hills between Jerusalem and Bethlehem, of which not a trace now remains. A few trees linger far south of Hebron, near Jattir ('Attir). Pinus laricio (Poir.), the Austrian pine, has been introduced on the coast, where also Pinaster pinea, &c., is found sparingly. The only true fir, as distinguished from pine, is Abies cilicica (Ant. and K.) on Lebanon, probably abundant in ancient times. But the handsome Juniperus excelsa (Flor. canc.) is still very common, and Cupressus sempervirens (L.), both native and planted, is frequent. [CEDAR.] [H. B. T.]

FIRE (1. אֵשׁ; πῦρ; ignis; 2. אֵשׁ, and also אֵשׁ; φῶς; lux; flame or light). The applications of fire in Scripture may be classed as:—

I. Religious. (1.) That which consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the incense-offering, beginning with the sacrifice of Noah (Gen. viii. 20), and continued in the ever-burning fire on the Altar, first kindled from heaven (Lev. vi. 9, 13, ix. 24), and rekindled at the dedication of Solomon's Temple (2 Ch. vii. 1, 3).

(2.) The symbol of Jehovah's Presence, and the instrument of His power, in the way either of approval or of destruction (Ex. iii. 2, xiv. 19, xix. 18; Num. xi. 1, 3; Judg. xiii. 20; 1 K. xviii. 38; 2 K. . 10, 12, ii. 11, vi. 17; cp. Is. li. 6, lxvi. 15, 24; Joel ii. 30; Mal. iii. 2, 3, iv. 1; Mark ix. 44; 2 Pet. iii. 10; Rev. xx. 14, 15; Reland, Ant. Sacr. i. 8, p. 26; Jennings, Jewish Ant. ii. 1, p. 301; Joseph. Ant. iii. 8, § 6, viii. 4, § 4). Parallel with this application of fire and with its symbolical meaning is to be noted the similar use for sacrificial purposes, and the respect paid to it, or to the heavenly bodies as symbols of deity, which prevailed among so many nations of antiquity, and of which the traces are not even now extinct (W. R. Smith, The Religion of the Semites, i. Index s. n. "Fire"); e.g. the Sabæan and Magian systems of worship, and their alleged connexion with Abraham (Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. ii. 1, 2); the occasional relapse of the Jews themselves into sun-, or its corrupted form of fire-worship (Is. xxvii. 9; cp. Gesen. פֶּתַח , p. 489; Deut. xvii. 3; 2 K. xvii. 16, xxi. 3, xxiii. 5, 10, 11, 13; Jer. viii. 2; Ezek. viii. 16; Zeph. i. 5; Jahn, Arch. Bibl. c. vi. §§ 405, 408) [MOLUCH]; the worship or deification of heavenly bodies or of fire, prevailing to some extent, as among the Persians, so also even in Egypt (Her. iii. 16; Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i. 328 [1878]); the sacred fire of the Greeks and Romans (Thuc. i.

24, ii. 15; Cic. de Leg. ii. 8, 12; Liv. xxviii. 12; Dionys. ii. 67; Plut. Numa, 9, i. 263, ed. Reiske); the ancient forms and usages of worship, differing from each other in some important respects, but to some extent similar in principle, of Mexico and Peru (Prescott, Mexico, i. 60, 64; Peru, i. 101); and lastly the theory of the so-called Guebres of Persia, and the Parsees of Bombay (Frazer, Persia, c. iv. 141, 162, 164; Sir R. Porter, Travels, ii. 50, §24; Chardin, Voyages, ii. 310, iv. 258, viii. 367 sq.; Niebuhr, Voyages, ii. 36, 37; Mandelslo, Travels, b. i. p. 76; Gibbon, Hist. c. viii., i. 335, ed. Smith; Benj. of Tudela, Early Trav. pp. 114, 116; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 156).

The perpetual fire on the Altar was to be replenished with wood every morning (Lev. vi. 12; cp. Is. xxxi. 9). According to the Gemara, it was divided into three parts, one for burning the victims, one for incense, and one for supply of the other portions (Lev. vi. 15; Reland, Antiq. Hebr. i. 4, 8, p. 26; and ix. 10, p. 98). Fire for sacred purposes obtained elsewhere than from the Altar was called "strange fire," and on account of their use of such Nadab and Abihu were punished with death by fire from God (Lev. x. 1, 2; Num. iii. 4, xxvi. 61).

(3.) In the case of the spoil taken from the Midianites, such articles as could bear it were purified by fire as well as in the water appointed for the purpose (Num. xxxi. 23). The victims slain for sin-offerings were afterwards consumed by fire outside the camp (Lev. iv. 12, 21, vi. 30, xvi. 27; Heb. xiii. 11). The Nazarite who had completed his vow, marked its completion by shaving his head and casting the hair into the fire on the Altar on which the peace-offerings were being sacrificed (Num. vi. 18).

II. Domestic. Besides for cooking purposes, fire is often required in Palestine for warmth (Jer. xxxv. 22; Mark iv. 54; John xviii. 18; Harmer, Obs. i. 125; Rümer, p. 79). For this purpose a hearth with a chimney is sometimes constructed, on which either lighted wood or pans of charcoal are placed (Harmer, i. 405). In Persia a hole made in the floor is sometimes filled with charcoal, on which a sort of table is set covered with a carpet; and the company placing their feet under the carpet draw it over themselves (Olearius, Travels, p. 294; Chardin, Voyages, viii. 190). Rooms in Egypt are warmed, when necessary, with pans of charcoal, as there are no fire-places except in the kitchens (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 41; English-woman in Egypt, ii. 11).

On the Sabbath the Law forbade any fire to be kindled, even for cooking (Ex. xxxv. 3; Num. xv. 32). To this general prohibition the Jews added various refinements, e.g. that on the eve of the Sabbath no one might read with a light, though passages to be read on the Sabbath by children in schools might be looked out by the teacher. If a Gentile lighted a lamp, a Jew might use it, but not if it had been lighted for the use of the Jew. If a Festival day fell on the Sabbath eve, no cooking was to be done (Mishn. Shabb. i. 3, xvi. 8, vol. ii. pp. 4, 56; Moed Kat-in, ii. vol. ii. p. 287, Surenhus.).

III. The dryness of the land in the hot season in Syria of course increases liability to accident from fire. The Law therefore ordered that any one kindling a fire which caused damage to corn in a field, should make restitution (Ex. xxii. 6; cp. Judg. xv. 4, 5; 2 Sam. xiv. 30; Mishn. Maccoth, vi. 5, 6, vol. iv. p. 48, Surenh.; Burckhardt, Syria, pp. 496, 622).

IV. Punishment of death by fire was awarded by the Law only in the cases of incest with a mother-in-law, and of unchastity on the part of a daughter of a priest (Lev. x. 14, xxi. 9). In the former case both the parties were to suffer, in the latter the woman only. This sentence appears to have been a relaxation of the original practice in such cases (Gen. xxxviii. 24). Among other nations, burning appears to have been no uncommon mode, if not of judicial punishment, at least of vengeance upon captives; and in a modified form was not unknown in war among the Jews themselves (2 Sam. xii. 31; Jer. xxix. 22; Dan. iii. 20, 21). In certain cases the bodies of executed criminals and of infamous persons were subsequently burnt (Josh. vii. 25; 2 K. xiii. 16).

The Jews were expressly ordered to destroy the idols of the heathen nations, and especially any city of their own relapsed into idolatry (Ex. xxxiii. 20; 2 K. x. 26; Deut. vii. 5, xii. 3, xiii. 16). In some cases, the cities, and in the case of Hazer, the chariots also, were, by God's order, consumed with fire (Josh. vi. 24, viii. 28, xi. 6, 9, 13). One of the expedients of war in sieges was to set fire to the gate of the besieged place (Judg. ix. 49, 52). [SIEGES.]

V. Incense was sometimes burnt in honour of the dead, especially royal personages, as is mentioned specially in the cases of Asa and Zedekiah, and negatively in that of Jehoram (2 Ch. iv. 14, xxi. 19; Jer. xxxiv. 5).

VI. The use of fire in metallurgy was well known to the Hebrews at the time of the Exodus (Ex. xxxiii. 24, xxxv. 32, xxxvii. 2, 6, 17, xxxviii. 2, 8; Num. xvi. 38, 39). [HANDICRAFT.]

VII. Fire or flame is used in a metaphorical sense to express excited feeling and divine inspiration, and also to describe temporal calamities and future punishments (Ps. lxxvi. 12; Jer. xx. 9; Joel ii. 30; Mal. iii. 2; Matt. xxv. 41; Mark ix. 43; Rev. xx. 15). [H. W. P.]

FIREPAN (הַפָּאן; κρυβίον, θυμιατήριον; ignis receptaculum; thuribulum), one of the vessels of the Temple service (Ex. xxvii. 3, xxxviii. 3; 2 K. xv. 15; Jer. liii. 19). The same word is elsewhere rendered "snuff-dish" (Ex. xxix. 38, xxxvii. 23; Num. iv. 9; ἐναψωτήριον; emunctorium) and "censer" (Lev. x. 1, xvi. 12; Num. xvi. 6 sq.), a variety of rendering preserved by the R. V. There appear, therefore, to have been two articles so called: one, like a chafing-dish, to carry live coals for the purpose of burning incense; another, like a snuffer-dish, to be used in trimming the lamps, in order to carry the snuffers and convey away the snuff. FIRKIN. [MEASURES.]

FIRMAMENT. This term was introduced into our language from the Vulgate, which gives firmamentum as the equivalent of the στέφανον of the LXX. (better Greek Ven.—τίμα from τελέω), and of the rakia (רַקִּיָּא) of the Hebrew text (Gen. i. 6). The Hebrew term first demands notice (cp. Delitzsch [1887] and Dillmann⁴ in loco). It is generally regarded as expressive of simple expansion, and is so rendered in the margin of the A. V. (l. c.; R. V. "expanse"); but the true idea of the word is a complex one, taking in the mode by which the expansion is effected, and consequently implying the nature of the material expanded. The verb raka means to expand by beating, whether by the hand, the foot, or any instrument. It is especially used, however, of beating out metals into thin plates (Ex. xxxix. 3; Num. xvi. 39), and hence the substantive רַקִּיָּא = "broad (R. V. "beaten") plates" of metal (Num. xvi. 38). It is thus applied to the flattened surface of the solid earth (Is. xlii. 5, xlv. 24; Ps. cxxxvi. 6), and it is in this sense that the term is applied to the heaven in Job xxvii. 18 (R. V.)—"Canst thou with Him spread" (rather hammer) "out the sky, which is strong" as a molten mirror—the mirror to which he refers being made of metal. The sense of solidity, therefore, is combined with the ideas of expansion and tenuity in the term rakia. Saalschütz (Archaeol. ii. 67) conceives that the idea of solidity is inconsistent with Gen. ii. 6, which implies, according to him, the passage of the mist through the rakia; he therefore gives it the sense of pure expansion—it is the large and lofty room in which the winds, &c., have their abode. But it should be observed that Gen. ii. 6 implies the very reverse. If the mist had penetrated the rakia, it would have descended in the form of rain; the mist, however, was formed under the rakia, and resembled a heavy dew—a mode of fructifying the earth which, from its regularity and quietude, was more appropriate to a state of innocence than rain, the occasional violence of which associated it with the idea of Divine vengeance. But the same idea of solidity runs through all the references to the rakia. In Ezek. i. 22-26, the "firmament" is the floor on which the throne of the Most High is placed. That the rakia should be transparent, as implied in the comparisons with the sapphire (Ex. i. c.) and with crystal (Ezek. i. c.; cp. Rev. iv. 6), is by no means inconsistent with its solidity. Further, the office of the rakia in the economy of the world demanded strength and substance. It was to serve as a division between the waters above and the waters below (Gen. i. 7). In order to enter into this description we must carry our ideas back to the time when the earth was a chaotic mass, overspread with water, in which the material elements of the heavens were intermingled. The first step, therefore, in the work of orderly arrangement, was to separate the elements of heaven and earth, and to fix a floor of partition between the waters of the heaven and the waters of the earth; and accordingly the rakia was created to support the upper reservoir (Ps. cxlviii. 4), itself being supported at the edge or rim of the earth's disk by the mountains (2 Sam. xxii. 8; Job xxvi. 11). In keeping with this view the rakia was provided with "windows" (Gen. vii. 11; Is. xxiv. 18; Mal. iii. 10) and "doors" (Ps. lxxviii. 23), through which the rain and the snow might descend. A secondary purpose which the rakia served was to support the heavenly bodies, sun, moon, and stars (Gen. i. 14), in which they were fixed as nails, and from which, consequently, they might be said to drop off (Matt. xxiv. 29). In all these particulars we recognise the same view as was entertained by the Greeks and, to a certain extent, by the Latins. The former applied to the heaven such epithets as "brazen" (χάλκεον, Il. xvii. 425; πολύχάλκεον, Il. v. 504) and "iron" (σιδήρεον, Od. xv. 328, xvii. 565)—epithets also used in the Scriptures (Lev. xxvi. 19); and that this was not merely poetical embellishment appears from the views promulgated by their philosophers, Empedocles (Plutarch, Plac. Phil. ii. 11) and Artemidorus (Senec. Quaest. vii. 13). The same idea is expressed in the caelo affixa sidera of the Latins (Plin. ii. 39, xvii. 57). If it be objected to the Mosaic account that the view embodied in the word rakia does not harmonize with strict philosophical truth, the answer to such an objection is, that the writer describes things as they appeared to him rather than as they are. The writer purposed "to give, in a few broad and powerful strokes, the great outlines of creation: shadowing forth its deep mysteries in a series of grand and impressive representations on a scale of magnificence which is without parallel. In the tone of description suited to such a purpose, minute specification is out of place. All is vast and general. Let anything be added in the way of minute distinction, or of explanation and conciliation, and the whole style of conception is changed" (Conant). In truth the same absence of philosophic truth may be traced throughout all the terms applied to this subject, and the objection is levelled rather against the principles of language than anything else. Examine the Latin coelum (κοίλον), the "hollow place" or cave scooped out of solid space; our own "heaven," i.e. what is heaved up; the Greek οὐρανός, similarly significant of height (Pott. Etym. Forsch. i. 123); or the German "Himmel," from heimeln, to cover—the "roof" which constitutes the "heim" or abode of man: in each there is a large amount of philosophical error. Correctly speaking, of course, the atmosphere is the true rakia by which the clouds are supported, and undefined space is the abode of the celestial bodies. There certainly appears an inconsistency in treating the rakia as the support both of the clouds and of the stars, for it could not have escaped observation that the clouds were below the stars: but perhaps this may be referred to the same feeling which is expressed in the coelum ruit of the Latins, the downfall of the rakia in stormy weather. Although the rakia and the shamayim ("heaven") are treated as synonymous in Gen. i. 8, yet it would be more correct to recognise a distinction between them, as implied in the expression "firmament of the heavens" (Gen. i. 14), the former being the upheaving power and the latter the upheaved body—the former the line of demarcation between heaven and earth, the latter the strata or stories into which the heaven was divided. Dr. Conant (B. D. Amer. ed.) has pointed out that it is well to distinguish the merely ideal and poetical imagery in later writings (Ps. civ. 3; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Job xxvii. 11, xxxvii. 18) and in symbolic vision (Ezek. i. 22-26) from the purely descriptive, though manifestly phenomenal, representation in the Book Genesis.

[W. L. B.] [F.]

FIRST-BORN (בְּכֹרִית; πρωτότοκος; primogenitus; from בָּכַר, early, ripe, Gesen. p. 206), applied equally both to animals and human beings. That some rights of primogeniture existed in very early times is plain, but it is not so clear in what they consisted. They have been classed as, a. authority over the rest of the family; b. priesthood; c. a double portion of the inheritance. The birthright of Esau and of Reuben, set aside by authority or forfeited by misconduct, proves a general privilege as well as quasi-sacredness of primogeniture (Gen. xxv. 23, 31, 34, xlix. 3; 1 Ch. v. 1; Heb. xii. 16), and a precedence which obviously existed, and is alluded to in various passages (as Ps. lxxxix. 27; Job xviii. 13; Rom. viii. 29; Col. i. 15; Heb. xii. 23); but the story of Esau's rejection tends to show the supreme and sacred authority of the parent irrevocable even by himself, rather than inherent right existing in the eldest son, which was evidently not inalienable (Gen. xxvii. 29, 33, 36; Grotius, Calmet, Patrick, Knobel; Dillmann,² Delitzsch [1887] on Gen. xxv. and xxvii.).

Under the Law, in memory of the Exodus, the eldest son was regarded as devoted to God, and was in every case to be redeemed by an offering not exceeding five shekels, within one month from birth. If he died before the expiration of thirty days, the Jewish doctors held the father excused, but liable to the payment if he outlived that time (Ex. xiii. 12-15, xxii. 29; Num. viii. 17, xviii. 15, 16; Lev. xxvii. 6; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. on Luke ii. 22; Philo, de Pr. Sacerd. i. [ii. 233, Mangey]). This devotion of the first-born was believed to indicate a priesthood belonging to the eldest sons of families, which being set aside in the case of Reuben, was transferred to the tribe of Levi. This priesthood is said to have lasted till the completion of the Tabernacle (Jahn, Arch. Bibl. x. §§ 165, 387; Selden, de Syn. c. 16; Mishn. Zebachim, xiv. 4, vol. v. 58; cp. Ex. xxiv. 5).

The ceremony of redemption of the first-born is described by Calmet from Leo of Modena (Calm. on Num. xviii.). The eldest son received a double portion of the father's inheritance (Deut. xxi. 17), but not of the mother's (Mishn. Bechoroth, viii. 9. Cp. M. Bloch, Das Mos.-Talm. Erbrecht, § 16, 1890). If the father had married two wives, of whom he preferred one to the other, he was forbidden to give precedence to the son of the one, if the child of the other were the first-born (Deut. xxi. 15, 16). In the case of levirate marriage, the son of the next brother succeeded to his uncle's vacant inheritance (Deut. xxv. 5, 6). Under the monarchy, the eldest son usually, but not always, as appears in the case of Solomon, succeeded his father in the kingdom (1 K. i. 30, ii. 22).

The male first-born of animals (בְּכֹרֵי הַבְּהֵמָה; δισωρίγον μῆτραν; quod aperit vulvam) was also devoted to God (Ex. xiii. 2, 12, 13, xxii. 29, xxxiv. 19, 20; Philo, l. c., and Quis rerum dic. haeres. 24 [i. 489, Mang.]). Unclean animals were to be redeemed with the addition of one-fifth of the value, or else put to death; or, if not redeemed, to be sold, and the price given to the priests (Lev. xxvii. 13, 27, 28). The first-born of an ass was to be redeemed with a lamb; or, if not redeemed, put to death (Ex. xiii. 13, xxxiv.

20; Num. xviii. 15). Of cattle, goats, or sheep, the first-born from eight days to twelve months old were not to be used, but offered in sacrifice. After the burning of the fat, the remainder was appropriated to the priests (Ex. xxii. 30; Num. xviii. 17, 18; Deut. xv. 19, 20; Neh. x. 36). If there were any blemish, the animal was not to be sacrificed, but eaten at home (Deut. xv. 21, 22, and xii. 5-7, xiv. 23). Various refinements on the subject of blemishes are to be found in Mishn. Bechoroth (see Mal. i. 8. By "firstlings," Deut. xiv. 23, compared with Num. xviii. 17, are meant tithe animals: see Reland, Antiq. iii. 10, p. 327; Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 387). [H. W. P.]

FIRST - BORN, DEATH OF THE. [PLAGUES, No. 10.]

FIRST-FRUITS. 1. דְּרִישָׁה in pl. only, or דְּרִישָׁה. Gesen. p. 206: usually πρωτογενήματα, ἀρχαὶ τῶν πρωτογενήματων (Ex. xxiii. 19); primitiæ, frugum initia, primitiua. 2. רֵאשִׁית, from רֵאשִׁית, head or top in two places, followed by דְּרִישָׁה, Ex. xxiii. 12, xxxiv. 26 (Gesen. pp. 1249, 1252). 3. דְּרִישָׁה, Gesen. p. 1276: ἀπαίρεμα, ἀπαρχή; primitiæ.

Besides the first-born of man and of beast, the Law required that offerings of first-fruits of produce should be made publicly by the nation at each of the three great yearly Festivals, and also by individuals without limitation of time. No ordinance appears to have been more distinctly recognised than this, so that the use of the term in the way of illustration carried with it a full significance even in N. T. times (Prov. iii. 9; Tob. i. 6; 1 Macc. iii. 49; Rom. viii. 23, ii. 16; Jas. i. 18; Rev. xiv. 4).

1. The Law ordered in general, that the first of all ripe fruits and of liquors, or, as it is twice expressed, the first of first-fruits, should be offered in God's House. (Ex. xxii. 29, xxiii. 19, xxiv. 26; Philo, de Monarchia, ii. 3 [ii. 224, Mang.]).

2. On the morrow after the Passover sabbath, i.e. on the 16th of Nisan, a sheaf of new corn was to be brought to the priest, and waved before the Altar, in acknowledgment of the gift of fruitfulness (Lev. xxiii. 5, 6, 10, 12; ii. 12). Josephus tells us that the sheaf was of barley, and that when this ceremony had been performed, the harvest work might be begun (Joseph. Ant. iii. 10, § 5).

3. At the expiration of seven weeks from this time, i.e. at the Feast of Pentecost, an oblation was to be made of two loaves of leavened bread made from the new flour, which were to be waved in like manner with the Passover sheaf (Ex. xxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 15, 17; Num. xxviii. 26).

4. The feast of ingathering, i.e. the Feast of Tabernacles in the seventh month, was itself a acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest (Ex. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 39).

These four sorts of offerings were national. Besides them, the two following were of an individual kind, but the last was made by custom to assume also a national character.

5. A cake of the first dough that was baked was to be offered as a heave-offering (Num. xv. 19 21).

6. The first-fruits of the land were to be brought in a basket to the holy place of God's choice, and there presented to the priest, who was to set the basket down before the Altar. The offerer was then, in words of which the outline, if not the whole form was prescribed, to recite the story of Jacob's descent into Egypt, and the deliverance therefrom of his posterity; and to acknowledge the blessings with which God had visited him (Deut. xxvi. 2-11).

The offerings, both public and private, resolve themselves into two classes: a. produce in general, in the Mishna דְּרִישָׁה, Biccurim, first-fruits, primitivi fructus, πρωτογενήματα, raw produce. b. תרומות, Terumoth, offerings, primitiæ, ἀπαρχαί, prepared produce (Gesen. p. 1276; Augustine, Quæst. in Hept. iv. 32, vol. iii. p. 732; Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. iii. 9, p. 713; Reland, Antiq. iii. 7; Philo, de Pr. Sacerd. i. [ii. 233, Mang.] de Sacrific. Abel. et Cain, 21 [i. 177, M.]).

a. Of the public offerings of first-fruits, the Law defined no place from which the Passover sheaf should be chosen, but the Jewish custom, so far as it is represented by the Mishna, prescribed that the wave-sheaf or sheaves should be taken from the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (Terumoth, x. 2). Deputies from the Sanhedrin went on the eve of the Festival, and tied the growing stalks in bunches. In the evening of the Festival day the sheaf was cut with all possible publicity, and carried to the Temple. It was there threshed, and an omer of grain, after being winnowed, was bruised and roasted; and after it had been mixed with oil and frankincense laid upon it, the priest waved the offering in all directions. A handful was thrown on the altar-fire, and the rest belonged to the priests, to be eaten by those who were free from ceremonial defilement. After this the harvest might be carried on. After the destruction of the Temple all this was discontinued, on the principle, as it seems, that the House of God was exclusively the place for oblation (Lev. ii. 14, x. 14, xxiii. 13; Num. xviii. 11; Mishn. Terum. v. 6, x. 4, 5; Schekalim, viii. 8; Joseph. Ant. iii. 10, § 5; Philo, de Pr. Sacerd. i. [ii. 233, Mang.]; Reland, Antiq. iii. 7, 3, iv. 3, 8).

The offering made at the Feast of the Pentecost was a thanksgiving for the conclusion of wheat harvest. It consisted of two loaves (according to Josephus one loaf) of new flour baked with leaven, which were waved by the priest as at the Passover. The size of the loaves is fixed by the Mishna at seven palms long and four wide, with horns of four fingers' length. No private offerings of first-fruits were allowed before this public oblation of the two loaves (Lev. xxiii. 15, 20; Mishn. Terum. x. 6, xi. 4; Joseph. Ant. iii. 10, § 6; Reland, Antiq. iv. 4, 5). The private oblations of first-fruits may be classed in the same manner as the public. The directions of the Law respecting them have been stated generally above. To these the Jews added or from them deduced the following. Seven sorts of produce were considered liable to oblation, viz. wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and dates (Gesen. p. 219; Deut. viii. 8; Mishn. Biccurim, i. 3; Hasselquist, Travels, p. 417), but the Law appears to have contemplated produce of all sorts, and to have been so understood by Nehemiah (Deut. xxvi.

2; Neh. x. 35, 37). The portions intended to be offered were decided by inspection, and the selected fruits were fastened to the stem by a band of rushes (Bic. iii. 1). A proprietor might, if he thought fit, devote the whole of his produce as first-fruits (ibid. ii. 4). But though the Law laid down no rule as to quantity, the minimum fixed by custom was $\frac{1}{10}$ th (Reland, Antiq. iii. 8, 4). No offerings were to be made before Pentecost, nor after the feast of the Dedication, on the 25th of Cisleu (Ex. xxiii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 16, 17; Bic. i. 3, 6). The practice was for companies of twenty-four persons to assemble in the evening at a central station, and pass the night in the open air. In the morning they were summoned by the leader of the Feast with the words, "Let us arise and go up to Mount Zion, the House of the Lord our God." On the road to Jerusalem they recited portions of Psalms cxxiii. and cl. Each party was preceded by a piper, a sacrificial bullock having the tips of his horns gilt and crowned with olive. At their approach to the city they were met by priests appointed to inspect the offerings, and were welcomed by companies of citizens proportioned to the number of the pilgrims. On ascending the Temple mount each person took his basket, containing the first-fruits and an offering of turtle-doves, on his shoulders, and proceeded to the court of the Temple, where they were met by Levites singing Ps. xxx. 2. The doves were sacrificed as a burnt-offering, and the first-fruits presented to the priests with the words appointed in Deut. xxvi. The baskets of the rich were of gold or silver; those of the poor of peeled willow. The baskets of the latter kind were, as well as the offerings they contained, presented to the priests, who waved the offerings at the S.W. corner of the altar: the more valuable baskets were returned to the owners (Bic. iii. 6, 8). After passing the night at Jerusalem, the pilgrims returned on the following day to their homes (Deut. xvi. 7; Terum. ii. 4). It is mentioned that king Agrippa bore his part in this highly picturesque national ceremony by carrying his basket like the rest, to the Temple (Bic. iii. 4). Among other by-laws were the following: 1. He who ate his first-fruits elsewhere than in Jerusalem and without the proper form was liable to punishment (Maccoth. iii. 3, vol. iv. 284, Surenh.). 2. Women, slaves, deaf and dumb persons, and some others were exempt from the verbal oblation before the priest, which was not generally used after the Feast of Tabernacles (Bic. i. 5, 6).

b. The first-fruits prepared for use were not required to be taken to Jerusalem. They consisted of wine, wool, bread, oil, date-honey, onions, cucumbers (Terum. ii. 5, 6; Num. xv. 19, 21; Deut. xviii. 4). They were to be made, according to some, only by dwellers in Palestine; but according to others, by those also who dwelt in Moab, in Ammonitis, and in Egypt (Terum. i. 1). They were not to be taken from the portion intended for tithes, nor from the corners left for the poor (ibid. i. 5, iii. 7). The proportion to be given is thus estimated in that treatise: a liberal measure, $\frac{1}{10}$, or, according to the school of Shammai, $\frac{1}{30}$; a moderate portion, $\frac{1}{10}$; a scanty portion, $\frac{1}{30}$ (see Ezek. xlv. 13). The measuring-basket was to be thrice estimated during the season (ib. iv. 3). He who ate or drank his offering by mistake was bound to add $\frac{1}{2}$, and present it to the priest (Lev. v. 16; xxii. 14), who was forbidden to remit the penalty (Terum. vi. 1, 5). The offerings were the perquisite of the priests, not only at Jerusalem, but in the provinces, and were to be eaten or used only by those who were clean from ceremonial defilement (Num. xviii. 11; Deut. xviii. 4).

The corruption of the nation after the time of Solomon gave rise to neglect in these as well as in other ordinances of the Law, and restoration of them was among the reforms brought about by Hezekiah (2 Ch. xxxi. 5, 11). Nehemiah also, at the Return from Captivity, took pains to re-organise the offerings of first-fruits of both kinds, and to appoint places to receive them (Neh. x. 35, 37; xii. 44). Perversion or alienation of them is reprobated, as care in observing is eulogised by the Prophets, and specially mentioned in the sketch of the restoration of the Temple and Temple-service made by Ezekiel (Ezek. xx. 40, xlv. 30, xlvi. 14; Mal. iii. 8).

An offering of first-fruits is mentioned as an acceptable one to the prophet Elisha (2 K. iv. 42).

Besides the offerings of first-fruits mentioned above, the Law directed that the fruit of all trees freshly planted should be regarded as uncircumcised, or profane, and not to be tasted by the owner for three years. The whole produce of the fourth year was devoted to God, and did not become free to the owner till the fifth year (Lev. xix. 23-25). The trees found growing by the Jews at the conquest were treated as exempt from this rule (Mishn. Orlah. i. 2).

Offerings of first-fruits were sent to Jerusalem by Jews living in foreign countries (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 6, § 7).

Offerings of first-fruits were also customary in heathen systems of worship (see, for instances and authorities, Parker, Bibliotheca. v. 515; Patrick, On Deut. xxvi.; and a copious list in Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. iii. 9, de Primitivum Origine; also Leslie, On Tithes, Works, vol. ii.; Wiener, s. v. Erstlinge). [H. W. P.]

FISH, FISHING. Fishes, with the other inhabitants of the waters, as sea-monsters, whales, and great reptiles, as well as the fowl of the air, are the products of the fifth day, or creative epoch (Gen. i. 21). Their place in the record of creation is in exact accord with the results of geological investigation; which shows them to be the earliest vertebrate animals found in the stratified rocks. The earliest types appear in the Old Red Sandstone, the ganoid fishes of the Dura Den deposits. From these strata upwards fishes gradually increase, reaching their fullest development in the Cretaceous or chalk epoch, when the warm-blooded mammals or quadrupeds were beginning to prevail.

The Jewish literature does not show that the nation ever acquired any intimate knowledge of this branch of natural history. The fishermen, whether of the sea or the lake, doubtless had distinctive names for the various species which they caught, but of these only one is preserved in Josephus, and none in Scripture or in the Rabbinical writings. They simply classified them as great or small, clean or unclean. The latter is the only distinction between the kinds of fish in the law of Moses (Lev. xi. 9-12). The unclean fish, forbidden as food, were such as had no fins or scales. This would comprise all aquatic reptiles, the Siluridae or Sheat fish, very common in the Nile and Jordan, the Raidae or Skate fish, and the Petromizidae or Lampreys. To these the Rabbis afterwards added the Muraenidae or Eels, whose scales are very minute and covered with a slimy secretion. The Egyptians adopted a similar classification, and looked on all fishes without fins or scales as unwholesome (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 191-2 [1878]). One of the laws of El Hakim prohibits the sale or even the capture of such (Lane, Mod. Egypt. i. 132). This distinction is probably referred to in the terms σῶμα (esou non idonea, Schleusner, Lex. s. v.; Trench, Parables, p. 137) and καλά (Matt. xiii. 48). The second division is marked in Gen. i. 21 (as compared with v. 26), where the great marine animals (דגים ודגים ודגים; κῆτη μεγάλα), generically described as "whales" in the A. V. and "sea-monsters" in the R. V. (Gen. i. c.; Job vii. 12) [WHALE], but including also other animals, such as the crocodile [LEVIATHAN] and perhaps some kinds of serpents, are distinguished from "every living creature that creepeth" (רֶמֶשׂ יָרֹחַ; A. V. and R. V. "moveth"), a description applying to fish, along with other reptiles, as having no legs. To the former class we may assign the large fish referred to in Jon.

ii. 1 (דגים; κῆτος μέγα, Matt. xii. 40), which Winer (art. Fische), after Bochart, identifies with a species of shark (Comis carcharias); and also that referred to in Tob. vi. 2 sq., identified by Bochart (Hiexoz. iii. p. 697 sq.) with the Silurus glanis, but by Kitto (art. Fish) with a species of crocodile (the seesar) found in the Indus (see Speaker's Comm. in loco). The Hebrews were struck with the remarkable fecundity of fish, and have expressed this in the term דגים, the root of which signifies increase (cp. Gen. xlviii. 16), and in the secondary sense of רָבַעַ, lit. to creep, thence to multiply (Gen. i. 20, viii. 17, ix. 7; Ex. i. 7), as well as in the allusions in Ezek. xlvii. 10. Doubtless they became familiar with this fact in Egypt, where the abundance of fish in the Nile, and in the lakes and canals (Strab. xvii. p. 823; Diod. i. 36, 43, 52; Herod. ii. 93, 149), rendered it one of the staple commodities of food (Num. xi. 5; cp. Wilkinson, l. c.). The destruction of the fish was on this account a most serious visitation to the Egyptians (Ex. vii. 21; Is. xix. 8). Occasionally it is the result of natural causes: thus St. John (Travels in Valley of the Nile, ii. 246) describes a vast destruction of fish from cold, and Wellsted (Travels in Arabia, i. 310) states that in Oman the fish are visited with an epidemic about every five years, which destroys immense quantities of them.

The worship of fishes was expressly forbidden by the law of Moses: "The likeness of any fish that is in the waters beneath the earth" (Deut. iv. 18). This strange form of idolatry was widely spread and still exists in the East. It arose, perhaps, from the fecundity of fishes, which caused them to be taken as the emblems of abundance and increase. The blessing of Jacob upon the sons of Joseph was, "Let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth," A. V. marg. as fishes do increase (Gen. xlviii. 16). Nations the widest apart, as the Tartars and the ancient Britons, had their fish-gods, the one the Nataghi, the other the Brithyll of the Kelts and Belgae. In Egypt many species of fishes were objects of worship (Herod. ii. 72). Herodotus, in the passage referred to, mentions only two kinds as venerated, but we find from other authors that different fishes were worshipped in different places (Plut. de Is. § 18; Wilkinson, l. c.). Cuvier noticed no less than ten distinct species depicted on the walls of the sepulchral caves of Thebes (see also Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 120). The mummies of several kinds of fishes are found in great numbers stored up in the Egyptian temples. Fish-worship extended also to Assyria. The fish-god, a male form of the Phœnician Dagon, is represented on one of the sculptures of Khorsabad, though Rawlinson considers them distinct (Herod. i. 593). The male-god is also described by Berosus (Layard, Nineveh, ii. p. 466). Ichthyolatry spread also to India (Baur, Mythologie, ii. 51); but among the Philistines the fish-god or goddess was a national deity, and had temples in all their cities, notably at Gaza and Ashdod. In Scripture records Dagon was thought to have been represented with the head, arms, and body of a man, and the tail of a fish (cp. 1 Sam. v. 4; A. V.); "only the stump (fishy part, marg.) of Dagon was left to him;" but (cp. R. V.) the belief that his body terminated in the tail of a fish arose from a mistaken etymology of the name [DAGON]. This worship of Dagon remained to the time of the Hasmonæans, who destroyed the temple at Ashdod. At a later period the idol was of female form, as we find from Lucian (De Deâ Syr.) and Diodorus Siculus, who describes the image at Ashkalon as having the face of a woman and the body of a fish. Sidon was also the fish-goddess of Phœnicia (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii.). For an exhaustive summary of historical references, see Selden, de Dis Syris, de Dagono. The superstitious veneration of certain fishes still remains even among the Moslems in Northern Syria and Mesopotamia. A few miles north of the Syrian Tripoli is a monastery of dervishes, with a spring and pool swarming with fish, which are held sacred, as being inhabited by the souls of the faithful departed, and to which offerings are made. So at Orfa, the ancient Edessa, the fishes of the river are held sacred by the Moslems (see Robertson-Smith, The Religion of the Semites, i. 157 sq.).

Fish was a principal article of diet in Egypt, although forbidden to the priests. "We remember the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely," was the complaint of the Israelites when they murmured in the wilderness. Not only was there, and still is, prodigious abundance of fish in the Nile, and especially in the Delta, but the variety of species is very great. Herodotus, Josephus, and Strabo give us the names of several kinds, most of which are difficult of identification. Herodotus names the λειδωρρός, probably Cyprinus lepidotus, allied to the carp, δξύρρυγχος (Mormyrus oxyrhynchus), and the eel, as sacred fish (ii. 72, and Plut. de Is. vii. 18, 22). Strabo mentions these, and also κορδικωρος (Clarias macrocanthus); κείστρος, a species of mullet; φάγος, a bream, and many others which cannot be satisfactorily identified, as inhabiting the Nile (Strabo, Geogr. xvii. p. 1164; ed. Falconer, Oxford, 1807).^a The fresh-water fishes of Egypt are as varied as they are numerous, belonging chiefly to the families of the Sparidae, Labridae, Chromidae, and Cyprinidae, the bream, perch, and carp. It is very remarkable that while the Greek language possesses over 400 names for fishes, not more than one or two have been preserved in Hebrew.

The fishes of the Jordan, its lakes and affluents, bear a strong affinity to many of the species of the Nile, though with far less admixture of species found in other rivers of the Eastern Mediterranean. In fact, the ichthyology of the Jordan system is the most isolated and unique, as regards geographical distribution, in the world. Thirty-six species have been ascertained, and of these only one (Blennius lupulus) belongs to the ordinary Mediterranean fauna. Two others, Chromis niloticus and Clarias macrocanthus, are Nilotic. Seven other species occur also in the rivers of South-West Asia, as the Tigris and Euphrates. Ten more are found in other parts of Syria, chiefly in the Damascus lakes; and the remaining sixteen species of the families Chromidae, Cyprinodontidae, and Cyprinidae are peculiar to the Jordan. This analysis points to a very close affinity of the Jordan with the rivers and lakes of tropical Africa. The affinity is not only of families, but of genera, for Chromis and Hemichromis are peculiarly Ethiopian forms, while the other species are identical with, or very closely allied to, the fishes from other fresh waters of Syria. But the African forms are a very large proportion of the whole; and considering the difficulty of transportation in the case of fresh-water fishes, these peculiarities are of great significance. These fishes probably date from the earliest time after the elevation of the country from the Eocene ocean. They form a group far more distinct and divergent from that of the surrounding region than can be found in any other class of existing life. During the epochs subsequent to the Eocene, owing to the unbroken isolation of the basin, there have been no opportunities for the introduction of new forms, nor for the further dispersion of the old ones. The affinity is very close to the forms of the rivers and fresh-water lakes of East Africa, even as far south as the Zambesi; but while the genera are the same, the species are rather representative than identical. The solution appears to be, that during the Miocene and Pleiocene periods, the Jordan basin formed the northernmost of a vast system of fresh-water lakes, extending from north to south; of which, in the earlier part of the epochs, perhaps the Red Sea, and certainly the Nile basin, the Nyanza, the Nyassa, and Tanganyika lakes, and the feeders of the Zambesi, were members. During that warm period, a fluvial ichthyological fauna was developed suitable to its then conditions, consisting of representative and, perhaps, identical species throughout the area.

The advent of the Glacial period was, like its close, gradual. Many species must have perished under the changed conditions. The hardiest survived; and some, perhaps, have been modified to meet those new conditions. Under this strict isolation it could hardly be otherwise; and however severe the climate may have been—that of the Lebanon, with its glaciers, corresponding with the present temperature of the Alps at a similar elevation (regard being had to the difference of latitude), the fissure of the Jordan being, as we certainly know, as much depressed below the level of the ocean as it is at present, i.e. 1300 feet at the Dead Sea—there must have been an exceptionally warm temperature in its waters, in which the existing species could survive.

The most important species in the Lake of Galilee are two species of blenny, Blennius lupulus and B. varus; Chromis niloticus, known as Bolti in Egypt, and Moucht by the fishermen of Tiberias; Chromis tiberiadis, the Mouchtlet of the fishermen, found in amazing shoals; C. Andreeae, C. Simonis, C. Flavii-Josephi, the Addadi of the fishermen; C. microstomus, the Moucht kart of the fishermen, Hemichromis sacra, all peculiar to the lake; Clarias macrocanthus, the silurus, kopkivos of Josephus, barbour of the fishermen; Barbus canis and

B. longiceps, the Escheri of the fishermen, both peculiar, and swarming in the Jordan, as well as in the lake. The fishes of the genera Chromis and Hemichromis have an extraordinary manner of propagation. The spawn is deposited in a little cavity, and the male fish takes the ova into his mouth one by one, and hatches them there; and for several weeks after, until they are nearly four inches long, the young continue to live in his mouth and gills, which are distended so that his jaws cannot meet. Dr. Livingstone noticed a similar habit in a fish of the Lake Tanganyika. The density of the shoals of fish in the Lake of Galilee can scarcely be conceived by those who have not witnessed them. They sometimes cover an acre or more on the surface in one dense mass, their dorsal fins standing out of the water. Josephus notices this abundance, and mentions also the Coracinus, which, being the same as the Sheat-fish of the Nile, suggested the belief that the lake was connected with the Nile (Bell. Jud. iii. 10, 8). There was also a tradition that one of the ten laws of Joshua enacted that the fishing of the lake should be free to all comers (Lightfoot, Talm. Ex. Matt. iv. 18).

^a For a fuller account of the Nile fishes, see Atheneus, vii. 55 sq.

Many of the fish are carried by the rapid stream of the Jordan in shoals into the Dead Sea, where they are stupified and soon perish, and may be seen floating dead on the surface. No

Numerous allusions to the art of fishing occur in the Bible: in the O. T. these allusions are of a metaphorical character, descriptive either of the conversion (Jer. xvi. 16; Ezek. xlvi. 10) or of the destruction (Ezek. xxix. 3 sq.; Eccles. ix. 12; Amos iv. 2; Hab. i. 14) of the enemies of God. In the N. T. the allusions are of a historical character for the most part, though the metaphorical application is still maintained in Matt. xiii. 47 sq.

Fisherman of the Sea of Galilee casting his net.

more vivid illustration of the regeneration of the land by the waters of life could be presented than the vision of Ezekiel, showing these waters of death peopled by living things: "The fishers shall stand upon it from Engedi even unto Engelaim: they shall be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many" (xlvii. 10).

While the Jews diligently prosecuted fishing in the Sea of Galilee (Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 10, § 9) they do not appear to have themselves worked the fisheries on their coast; but they possessed few localities adapted for boat harbours. Joppa was indeed their only port where any considerable fleet of fishing-boats could find shelter; for the northern ports were held by the Phoenicians, who, from Tyre and Sidon, extensively practised this industry. The Hebrew name of Sidon signifies "fishing-place;" and fishing is the only remaining industry of the squalid village which occupies the site of Tyre. "Tyre shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea" (Ezek. xxvi. 5). Jerusalem was supplied with fish by Phoenician fishermen, "men of Tyre" (Neh. xiii. 16) who came up from Joppa; probably with dried fish, such as is still largely consumed. The trade in fish must have been considerable, as one of the gates of Jerusalem was the fish-gate (2 Ch. xxxiii. 14), implying a fish-market, which would be contiguous to it, as each commodity to the present day has its distinct bazaar. Salt-fish is often spoken of net to which our Lord compares the kingdom of Heaven (Matt. xiii. 47-50). The number of boats on the lake in our Lord's time was very large (Joseph. Bell. Jud. iii. 10, § 9), and the few boats which still exist there employ in the Talmud, where it is called לפית (Lightfoot on Matt. xiv. 17). There is no clear evidence that the Jews preserved fish alive in ponds or tanks as the Egyptians did. In the passages which are supposed to suggest this (Cant. vii. 4, "fish-pools in Heshbon"), "fish" is an interpolation, omitted in R. V. In Is. xix. 10 "all that make sluices and ponds for fish" is rendered in R. V. "all they that work for hire (marg. that make dams) shall be grieved the draw-net. The fishing is carried on at night, the best time for taking fish, as we know in our own seas, and as we read in Luke v. 5. Another net very commonly used was the casting-net—דַּרְוִי, cherom (Hab. i. 15; Ezek. xxvi. 5, 14, xlvii. 10), ἀμφίβληστρον (Matt. iv. 18; Mark i. 16), rete,—elsewhere expressed by the generic term δίκτυον. This was used either by a naked fisherman wading from the shore, and by a rapid motion throwing his net and then drawing it in in a circle, or thrown in the same manner from a boat. It was this casting-net that Peter and Andrew were using when called to be fishers of men (Matt. iv. 18), and it was also the same kind, as we see from the details of the narrative, which enclosed the second miraculous draught after the Resurrection (John xxi. 6-8). The casting-net is still in common use round the lake. Another mode of fishing which was and still is practised on the rivers was by weirs or stake-nets formed of a sort of cane wattle. According to the Rabbis, one of the traditional laws of Joshua forbade the use of stake-nets in the Lake of Galilee, where the fishing was free to all, lest the boats should be damaged by them (Lightfoot, Talm. Ex. Matt. iv. 18).

Other modes of taking fish in present use in Palestine, and alluded to in Scripture, are by the hook and line. Angling is often depicted on the Assyrian and Egyptian monuments. It was a favourite amusement, and was also followed as a livelihood (Wilkinson, ii. 186 [1878]). It is referred to by Isaiah (ix. 8), "They that cast angle (Heb. פִּזְוִן) into the Nile" (R. V.); Hab. i. 15, and Job xli. 1. Two other words are used by Amos: פִּזְוִי, tzimnah, and דִּרְוִי, sir, i.e. "thorn" (ch. iv. 2); in Matt. xvii. 27, we read "cast an hook" (δγκιστρον). Hooks were used with lines, with or without a rod, and especially with night-lines. Fly-fishing was unknown, as none of the fishes of the Nile or Palestine will rise like the Salmonidae to a fly. In Job xli. 2, "Canst thou put an hook into his nose? or bore his jaw through with a thorn?" the reference is not to fishing, but to the keeping alive, after the Egyptian fashion, in tanks, fishes not required for immediate use, by a hook through their gills (חֹכָאֵךְ, choach; "thorn," A.V.; "hook," R. V.). This was attached to a stake by a rope of rushes (אֲגֹמֹן, agmon, "hook;" A.V. "rope;" R. V. marg., rope of rushes).

Another method of fishing was with the fish-spear, still used in the Lebanon and North Syria. This is alluded to by Job (xli. 7; Hebr. xl. 31), "Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons? or his head with fish-spears?"

The fish is a favourite symbol in the Christian Church, frequent in the catacombs of Rome, and familiar especially on early Christian sepulchral monuments in Northern Syria and other parts of the East,—not, as has been absurdly suggested, from an old superstition, or in honour of the fishermen of Galilee, but from the circumstance that the initial letters of the words Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεοῦ υἱός, Σωτήρ, form the word ἰχθύς (see Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. n. "Fish"). [H. B. T.]

Jerusalem; it may have led to the fish market, or the Tyrian merchants who brought fish to the city (Neh. xiii. 16) may have sold them in front of it. [JERUSALEM.] [W.]

FISH-POOLS. Cant. vii. 4. More correctly POOLS, as in R. V. [HESHBON.]

FITCHES (i.e. VETCHES). Two Hebrew words are so rendered in A. V.: (1) קִשְׁמֵת, kussemeth (Ezek. iv. 9); elsewhere A. V. "rye,"

Nigella arvensis.

FISH GATE (שַׁעַר הַדִּיגִים), Neh. iii. 3, xii. 39; Zeph. i. 10. A gate in the north wall of

R. V. "spelt;" see RYE. (2) קִשְׁמֵת, ketsach; μυλδοθιον; gith; R. V. marg. black cummin

(Is. xxviii. 25, 27), denotes without doubt the Nigella sativa, L., an herbaceous annual plant belonging to the natural order Ranunculaceae and sub-order Helleboreae, which grows in the S. of Europe and in the N. of Africa. It is cultivated in Palestine for the sake of its seeds, which are to this day used in Eastern countries as a medicine and a condiment. They are black, whence the name, and hot to the taste, and are sprinkled thickly over the flat cakes of the country before they are baked, in the same way that caraway seeds are used among ourselves. The seeds may be seen on all the little provision stalls in the markets. The leaves of the plant are lacinated, like those of the ranunculus, the flower yellow (in other species red or purple), and the seed-vessel is a cup divided into partitions or cells with a fringe of horns. This plant is mentioned only in Is. xxviii. 25, 27, where especial reference is made to the mode of threshing it; not with "a threshing instrument" (קִרְבַּיִם), but "with a staff" (מַטְּוֹ), because the heavy-armed cylinders of the former implement would have crushed the seeds of the Nigella. The μελανθιον of Dioscorides (iii. 83, ed. Sprengel) is unquestionably the Nigella; both these terms having reference to its black seeds, which, according to the above-named author and Pliny (N. H. xix. 8), were sometimes mixed with bread. The word gûh is of uncertain origin. It is used by Pliny (N. H. xx. 17), who says, "Gûh ex Graecis alii melanthion, alii melaspermon vocant." Plautus also (Rud. v. 2, 39) has the same word git: "Ois calet tibi! num git frigide factas." Cp. Celsius (Hierob. ii. 71).

Besides the N. sativa, there are seven other species found wild in Palestine; N. arvensis, L., and N. damascena, L., being common field weeds; but the seeds of all the wild species are less aromatic than those the cultivated plant. [H. B. T.]

FLAG. See BULRUSH.

FLAGON, a word employed in the A. V. to render two distinct Hebrew terms: 1. Ashishah, אֲשִׁישָׁה (2 Sam. vi. 19; 1 Ch. xvi. 3; Cant. ii. 5; Hos. iii. 1). The real meaning of this word, according to the conclusions of Gesenius (Thes. p. 166), is a cake of pressed raisins. He derives it from a root signifying to compress, and this is confirmed by the renderings of the LXX. (ἀψισσός, ἀμορίστη, πέμματα) and of the Vulgate, and also by the indications of the Targum Pseudojon. and the Mishna (Nedarim, 6, § 10). In the passage in Hosea there is probably a reference to a practice of offering such cakes before the false deities (R. V. renders "a cake," or "cakes of raisins"). The rendering of the A. V. is perhaps to be traced to Luther, who in the first two of the above passages has ein Nüssel Wein, and in the last Kanne Wein; but primarily to the interpretations of modern Jews (e.g. Gemara, Baba Bathra, and Targum on Chronicles), grounded on a false etymology (see Michaelis, quoted by Gesenius, and the observations of the latter, as above). It will be observed that in the first two passages the words "of wine" are interpolated, and that in the last "of wine" should be "of grapes."

2. Nebel, נֶבֶל (Is. xxii. 24 only). Nebel is commonly used for a bottle or vessel, originally probably a skin, but in later times a piece of pottery (Is. xxx. 14). But it also frequently occurs with the force of a musical instrument (A. V. generally "psaltery," but sometimes "viol"), a meaning which is adopted by the Targum, the Arabic and Vulgate Versions, Luther, and given in the margin of the A. V. The text, however, follows the rendering of the LXX., and with this agrees Gesenius's rendering, "Becken und Flaschen, von allerhand Art." [G.] [W.]

FLAX. Two Hebrew words are used for this plant in O. T., or rather the same word slightly modified—קַלְבָּשׁוֹ and קַלְבָּשׁוֹ. About the former there is no question. It occurs only in three places (Ex. ix. 31; Is. xlii. 3, xliii. 17). As regards the latter, there is probably only one passage where it stands for the plant in its undressed state (Josh. ii. 6). Eliminating all the places where the words are used for the article manufactured in the thread, the piece, or the made-up garment [LINEN; COTTON], we reduce them to two: Ex. ix. 31, certain, and Josh. ii. 6, disputed.

In the former the flax of the Egyptians is recorded to have been damaged by the plague of hail. The word קַלְבָּשׁוֹ is retained by Onkelos; but is rendered in LXX. σπερματίζον, and in Vulg. folliculos germinabat. The A. V. seems to have followed the LXX. (boiled = σπερματίζον); and so Rosenm., "globulus seu nodus lini maturescentis" (Schol. ad loc.). Gesen. makes it the calyx, or corolla; he refers to the Mishna, where it is used for the calyx of the hyssop, and describes this explanation as one of long standing among the more learned Rabbins (Thes. p. 261).

For the flax of ancient Egypt, see Herodot. ii. 37, 105; Cels. ii. p. 285 sq.; Heeren, Ideon, ii. 2, p. 368 sq. For that of modern Egypt, see Hasselquist, Journey, p. 500; Olivier, Voyage, iii. p. 297; Girard's Observations in Descript. de l'Égypte, t. xvii. (état moderne), p. 98; Paul Lucas, Voyages, pt. ii. p. 47.

From Ritter's Erdrunde, ii. p. 916 (cp. his Vorhalle, &c., pp. 45-48), it seems probable that the cultivation of flax for the purpose of the manufacture of linen was by no means confined to Egypt; but that, originating in India, it spread over the whole continent of Asia at a very early period of antiquity. That it was grown in Palestine even before the conquest of that country by the Israelites appears from Josh. ii. 6, the second of the two passages mentioned above. There is, however, some difference of opinion about the meaning of the words קַלְבָּשׁוֹ; קַלְבָּשׁוֹ; καλαμῆ; Vulg. stipulae lini; and so A. V. "stalks of flax;" Joseph. speaks of λίνοι ἀγκαλίδας, armfuls or bundles of flax; but Arab. Vers. "stalks of cotton." Gesenius, however, and Rosenmüller are in favour of the rendering "stalks of flax." If this be correct, the place involves an allusion to the custom of drying the flax-stalks by exposing them to the heat of the sun upon the flat roofs of houses; and so expressly in Josephus (Ant. v. i. § 2), λίνοι γὰρ ἀγκαλίδας ἐπὶ τοῦ τεύους ἔψυχε. In later times this drying was done in ovens (Rosenm. Allerthumsk.). There is a decided reference to the raw material in the

LXX. rendering of Lev. xiii. 47, ἱματίῳ στυπνίῳ, and Judg. xv. 14, στυπνίων: cp. Is. i. 31.

The various processes employed in preparing the flax for manufacture into cloth are indicated —1. The drying process (see above). 2. The peeling of the stalks, and separation of the fibres (the name being derived by Gesen. from שׁוּב, “to tear apart,” “to stretch out.” But the term is probably of foreign origin). 3. The hackling (Is. xix. 9; LXX. λίνον τὸ σχιστόν: vid. Gesen. Lex. s. v. שׁוּב); and for the combs used in the process, cp. Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 90 [1878]. The flax, however, was not always dressed before weaving (see Ecclus. xl. 4, where ἀμόλιον is mentioned as a species of clothing worn by the poor). That the use of the coarser fibres was known to the Hebrews, may be inferred from the mention of טוּב (טוּב) in Judg. xvi. 9, Is. i. 31. That flax was anciently one of the most important crops in Palestine appears from Hos. ii. 5, 9; and that it continued to be grown, and manufactured into linen in N. Palestine down to the Middle Ages, we have the testimony of numerous Talmudists and Rabbins. It is still cultivated there, but not so extensively as the cotton plant. [COTTON; LINEN.] [T. E. B.]

FLEA (שׁוּב, parosh; ψύλλος; pulex) is only twice mentioned in Scripture (1 Sam. xxiv. 14, xxvi. 20), where David addressing Saul compares himself to it, as the most insignificant and contemptible of living things. The flea, Pulex irritans, L., of the insect order Aphaniptera, though world-wide in its distribution, is nowhere more abundant than in the East. It propagates there in countless myriads among the dust of caves, especially if used occasionally by cattle, and among the stubble and refuse of old camps. Woe betide the traveller who incautiously pitches on the site of an old Bedouin encampment! The villagers in the wattle huts of Northern Syria are frequently driven away by the swarms of fleas, and are compelled to desert their homes for a year or two. [H. B. T.]

FLESH. [FOOD.]

FLINT (שׁוּב). The corresponding Assyr. šimēku may betoken the diamond. See MV.¹¹) The Hebrew quadriliteral is rendered flint in Deut. viii. 15, xxxii. 13; Ps. cxiv. 8; and Is. l. 7. In Job xxviii. 9 the same word is rendered rock in the text, and flint in the margin (R. V. text, “flinty rock”). In the first three passages the reference is to God’s bringing water and oil out of the naturally barren rocks of the Wilderness for the sake of His people. In Isaiah the word is used metaphorically to signify the firmness of the Prophet in resistance to his persecutors. In Ezek. iii. 9 the English word “flint” occurs in the same sense, but there it represents the Hebrew ṭzor. So also in Is. v. 28 we have like flint applied to the hoofs of horses. In 1 Macc. x. 73, κόχλαξ is translated flint, and in Wisd. xi. 4 the expression ἐκ πέτρας ἀκροτόμου is adopted from Deut. viii. 15 (LXX.). [W. D.]

FLOOD. [NOAH.]

FLOOR. [PAVEMENT.]

FLOWER. [PALESTINE, BOTANY OF.]

FLOWERS, only in the phrase “her flowers,” A. V.; “her impurity,” R. V. (אֲנָחַת); ἡ ἀκαθαρσία αὐτῆς, ἐν τῇ ἀπέθρηξεν αὐτῆς; tempus sanguinis menstrualis), Lev. xv. 24, 33. “Stains” of the menstruation is intended; the earliest source of the expression being probably Plato, Rep. 429 D, where τὸ ἔνθος means “the dye,” there of purple (ἀλουργόν); see also 557 C, πᾶσιν ἔνθεσιν πεποικιλμένον. [ISSUE OF BLOOD.] [H. H.]

FLUTE, THE (Aramaic Mashrauqitho [מִשְׂרָאֻיְתוֹ], Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15), is one of the oldest musical instruments known. It is, no doubt, identical with the Hebrew Chalil (חָלִיל, 1 Sam. x. 5); but although old, and having naturally undergone much development and many changes of construction, it has yet preserved its two chief characteristics. Its piccolo is capable of producing very sharp notes indeed,—and hence its name Mashrauqitho: cp. Is. v. 26; Zech. x. 8. On the other hand, it has the power of imitating the feeble whisper of the dying, and the mysterious death-rattle. It is for these reasons that the ancient Hebrews employed this instrument on the most opposite occasions—at burials (Mishna Kethuboth, iv. 4), at weddings (Mishna Bobo Metz’o, vi. 1), and at festivals, both private (Is. xxx. 29) and public (1 Kings i. 40), profane (Is. v. 12) and religious (Mishna Sukkah, v. 1). [S. M. S.-S.]

FLUX, BLOODY (δυσεντερία, Acts xxviii. 8), the same as our dysentery, which in the East is, though sometimes sporadic, generally epidemic and infectious, and then assumes its worst form. It is always attended with fever. [FEVER.] A sharp gnawing and burning sensation seizes the bowels, which give off in purging much slimy matter and purulent discharge. When blood flows, it is said to be less dangerous than without it (Schmidt, Bibl. Medic. c. xiv. pp. 503–507). King Jehoram’s disease was probably a chronic dysentery and the “bowels falling out,” perhaps the prolapsus ani, known sometimes to ensue (2 Ch. xxi. 15, 19); but possibly it was the actual discharge of portions of the diseased organs (see Biblicisch-Talmudische Medicin, by R. J. Wunderbar, iii. B, c). [H. H.]

FLY, FLIES. The two following Hebrew terms denote flies of some kind.

1. Zēbūb (זֵבֻב); musca; musca) occurs only in Eccles. x. 1, “Dead zēbūbim cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour,” and in Is. vii. 18, where it is said, “The Lord shall hiss for the zēbūb that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt.” The Hebrew name, it is probable, is a generic one for any insect, but the etymology is a matter of doubt (see Gesenius, Thes. p. 401; MV.¹¹). In the first-quoted passage allusion is made to flies, chiefly of the family Muscidae, getting into vessels of ointment or other substances; even in this country we know what an intolerable nuisance the house-flies are in a hot summer when they abound, crawling everywhere and into everything; but in the East the nuisance is tenfold greater, where in a few minutes they will pollute a dish of food. The zēbūb from the rivers of Egypt has by some writers, as by Oedmann (Vernisch. Samn. vi. 79), been identified with the zimb of which Bruce (Trav. v. 190) gives a description, and which is evidently some species of Tabanus. Sir G. Wilkinson has given some account (Transac. of the Entomol. Soc. ii. p. 183) of a gad-fly (Oestrus) under the name of Dithebab, a term almost identical with zēbūb. Though zēbūb is probably a generic name for any flies, in this passage of Isaiah it may be used to denote some very troublesome and injurious fly, κατ' ἔξοχον. "The Dithebab is a long grey fly, which comes out about the rise of the Nile, and is like the Cleg of the north of England; it abounds in calm hot weather, and is often met with in June and July, both in the desert and on the Nile." This insect is very injurious to camels and horses, and causes their death, if the sores which it generates are neglected; it attacks both man and beast. We have found it extremely tormenting to our horses and mules in the hotter parts of Palestine.

So grievous a pest was the zēbūb in the plains of Philistia, that the Phoenicians invoked against it the aid of their God, under the name of BAAL-ZEBUB, "the Lord of the fly." Though such a title may seem a term of derision, and has been so interpreted, as applied in contempt by the Israelites (Selden, De Diis Syris, p. 375), yet there seems no reason to doubt that this was the name given to their god by his worshippers; and the torments caused by flies in hot climates amply account for the designation. Similarly the Greeks gave the epithet ἀρβύλιος to Zeus (Pausan. v. 14, § 2; Clem. Alex. Protrept. ii. 38). Pliny speaks of a Fly-god, Myiodes (xxi. 6, 34). The Jews in derision changed the name Baal-zebub to Baal-zebul, "Lord of the dunghill," and applied it in the time of our Lord to the prince of the devils (Matt. xii. 24, &c.).

2. Ἄρῶβ (אַרְוֵב); κυνόμυια; omne genus muscarum, muscae diversae generis, musca gravissima; "swarms of flies," "divers sorts of flies," A. V. and R. V.), the name of the insect, or insects, which God sent to punish Pharaoh: see Ex. viii. 21-31; Ps. lxxviii. 45, cv. 31. The question as to what particular insect is denoted by Ἄρῶβ, or whether any one species is to be understood by it, has long been a matter of dispute. The Scriptural details are as follows:—The Ἄρῶβ filled the houses of the Egyptians, covered the ground, lighted on the people, and the land was laid waste on their account. The LXX. explain Ἄρῶβ by κυνόμυια, i. e. "dog-fly:" it is not very clear what insect is meant by this Greek term, which is frequent in Homer, who often uses it as an abusive epithet. It is not improbable that one of the Hippoboscidae or horse-flies, perhaps H. Equina, Linn., is the κυνόμυια of Aelian (N. A. iv. 51), though Homer may have used the compound term to denote extreme impudence, implied by the shamelessness of the dog and the teasing impertinence of the common fly (Musca). As the Ἄρῶβ is said to have filled the houses of the Egyptians, it seems not improbable that common flies (Muscidae) are more especially intended, and that the compound κυνόμυια denotes the grievous nature of the plague, though we see no reason to restrict the Ἄρῶβ to any one family. It may include, besides the horse-fly, those blood-sucking tormentors the gnats or mosquitoes (Culicidae), and the gad-flies (Oestrus). The common horse-fly is, however, quite tormenting enough to have been of itself the Egyptian plague. It settles on the human body like the mosquito, sucks blood, and produces festering sores. "Of insects," says Sonnini (Trav. iii. p. 199), "the most troublesome in Egypt are flies; both man and beast are cruelly tormented with them. No idea can be formed of their obstinate rapacity. It is in vain to drive them away, they return again in the self-same moment, and their perseverance wearies out the most patient spirit." It is the great instrument of spreading the well-known purulent ophthalmia, which is conveyed from one individual to another by these dreadful pests, which alight on the diseased eye, and then with their feet moist from the discharge inoculate the next healthy person on whom they settle. See for cases of Myosis produced by Dipterous larvae, Transactions of Entomol. Soc. ii. pp. 266-269.

The identification of the Ἄρῶβ with the cockroach (Blatta Orientalis), which Oedmann (Vern. Sam. pt. ii. c. 7) suggests, and which Kirby (Bridge. Treat. ii. p. 357) adopts, has nothing at all to recommend it, and is purely gratuitous, as Mr. Hope proved in 1837 in a paper on this subject in the Trans. Entomol. Soc. ii. 179-183. The error of calling the cockroach a beetle, and the confusion which has been made between it and the sacred beetle of Egypt (Atrachus sacer), has been repeated by M. Kalisch (Hist. and Crit. Comment. Exod. i. c.). The cockroach, as Mr. Hope remarks, is a nocturnal insect, and prowls about for food at night, "but what reason have we to believe that the fly attacked the Egyptians by night and not by day?" We see no reason to be dissatisfied with the reading in our own Version. [W. H.] [H. B. T.]

FOOD. The diet of Eastern nations has been in all ages more light and simple than our own. The chief points of contrast are the small amount of animal food consumed, the variety of articles used as accompaniments to bread, the substitution of milk in various forms for our liquors, and the combination of what we should deem heterogeneous elements in the same dish, or the same meal. The chief point of agreement is the large consumption of bread, the importance of which in the eyes of the Hebrew is testified by the use of the term lechem (originally food of any kind) specifically for bread, as well as by the expression "staff of bread" (Lev. xxvi. 26; Ps. cv. 16; Ezek. iv. 16, xiv. 13). Simpler preparations of corn were, however, common; sometimes the fresh green ears were eaten in a natural state,* the husks being rubbed off by the hand (Lev. xxiii. 14; Deut. xxiii. 25; 2 K. iv. 42; Matt. xii. 1; Luke vi. 1); more frequently, however, the grains, after being carefully picked, were roasted in a pan over a fire (Lev. ii. 14), and eaten as "parched corn," in which form it was an ordinary article of diet, particularly among labourers, or others who had not the means of dressing food (Lev. xxiii. 14; Ruth ii. 14; 1 Sam. xvii. 17, xxv. 18; 2 Sam. xvii. 28): this practice is still very usual in the East (cp. Lane, i. 251; Robinson, Researches, ii. 350). Sometimes the grain was bruised (like the Greek polenta, Plin. xviii. 14), in which state it was termed either בִּרְיָה (ἔπιουρά, LXX.; A. V. "beaten," R. V. "bruised;" Lev. ii. 14, 16), or לֶחֶם מִבְּרִיָּה (πυρίδιον, Aq., Symm.; A. V. "ground corn," R. V. "bruised corn;" 2 Sam. xvii. 19; cp. Prov. xvii. 22), and then dried in the sun; it was eaten either mixed with oil (Lev. ii. 15), or made into a soft cake named חֶמְצָה (A. V. "dough," R. V. marg. coarse meal; Num. xv. 20; Neh. x. 37; Ezek. xiv. 30). The Hebrews used a great variety of articles (John xxi. 5) to give a relish to bread. Sometimes salt was so used (Job vi. 6), as we learn from the passage just quoted; sometimes the bread was dipped into the sour wine (A. V. and R. V. "vinegar") which the labourers drank (Ruth ii. 14); or, where meat was eaten, into the gravy, which was either served up separately for the purpose, as by Gideon (Judg. vi. 19), or placed in the middle of the meat dish, as done by the Arabs (Burckhardt, Notes, i. 63), whose practice of dipping bread in the broth, or melted fat of the animal, strongly illustrates the reference to the sop in John xiii. 26 sq. The modern Egyptians season their bread with a sauce^b composed of various stimulants, such as salt, mint, sesame, and chickpeas (Lane, i. 180). The Syrians, on the other hand, use a mixture of savory and salt for the same purpose (Russell, i. 93). Where the above-mentioned accessories were wanting, fruit, vegetables, fish, or honey, were used. In short it may be said that all the articles of food, which we are about to mention, were mainly viewed as subordinates to the staple commodity of bread. The various kinds of bread and cakes are described under the head of BREAD.

Milk and its preparations hold a conspicuous place in Eastern diet, as affording substantial nourishment; sometimes it was produced in a fresh state (חֵלֶב ; Gen. xviii. 8), but more generally in the form of the modern leben, i.e. sour milk (חֵלֶב מֵחַיִּים ; A. V. "butter;" Gen. xviii. 8; Judg. v. 25; 2 Sam. xvii. 29). The latter is universally used by the Bedouins, not only as their ordinary beverage (Burckhardt, Notes, i. 240), but mixed with rice, flour, meat, and even salad (Burckhardt, i. 58, 63; Russell, Aleppo, i. 118). It is constantly offered to travellers, and in some parts of Arabia it is deemed scandalous to take any money in return for it (Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 120). For a certain season of the year, leben makes up a great part of the food of the poor in Syria (Russell, l.c.). Butter (Prov. xxx. 33) and various forms of coagulated milk, of the consistency of the modern kaimat

^b The later Jews named this sauce מִשְׁחָה (Mishn. Pes. 2, § 8): it consisted of vinegar, almonds, and spice, thickened with flour. It was used at the celebration of the Passover (Pes. 10, § 3).

(Job x. 10; 1 Sam. xvii. 18; 2 Sam. xvii. 29), were also used. [BUTTER; CHEESE; MILK.]

Fruit was another source of subsistence: figs stand first in point of importance; the early sorts described as the "summer fruit" (פִּיִּץ ; Amos viii. 1, 2) and the "first ripe fruit" ($\text{פִּיִּץ הַבְּרִיָּה}$; Hos. ix. 10; Mic. vii. 1) were esteemed a great luxury, and were eaten as fresh fruit; but they were generally dried and pressed into cakes, similar to the date-cakes of the Arabians (Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 57), in which form they were termed כֵּזַבִּים (καλάθαι, A. V. "cakes of figs;" 1 Sam. xxv. 18, xxx. 12; 1 Ch. xii. 40), and occasionally פִּיִּץ simply (2 Sam. xvi. 1; A. V. "summer fruit"). Grapes were generally eaten in a dried state as raisins (דִּמְיוֹן ; ligatures uae passae, Vulg.; 1 Sam. xxv. 18, xxx. 12; 2 Sam. xvi. 1; 1 Ch. xii. 40), but sometimes, as before, pressed into cakes, named חֶמְצָה (2 Sam. vi. 19; 1 Ch. xvi. 3; Cant. ii. 5; Hos. iii. 1), understood by the LXX. as a sort of cake, λάγανον ἀπὸ τηγάνου, and by the A. V. as a "flagon of wine," and by the R. V. as "a cake of raisins." Fruit-cake forms a part of the daily food of the Arabians, and is particularly adapted to the wants of travellers; dissolved in water, it affords a sweet and refreshing drink (Niebuhr, Arabia, p. 57; Russell, Aleppo, i. 82); an instance of its stimulating effect is recorded in 1 Sam. xxx. 12. Apples (probably citrons) are occasionally noticed, but rather in reference to their fragrance (Cant. ii. 5, vi. 8) and colour (Prov. xxv. 11) than as an article of food. Dates are not noticed in Scripture, unless we accept the rendering of פִּיִּץ in the LXX. (2 Sam. xvi. 1) as = φολιάδες; it can hardly be doubted, however, that where the palm-tree flourished, as in the neighbourhood of Jericho, its fruit was consumed; in Joel i. 12 it is reckoned among other trees valuable for their fruit. The pomegranate tree is also noticed by Joel; it yields a luscious fruit, from which a species of wine was expressed (Cant. viii. 2; Hag. ii. 19). Melons were grown in Egypt (Num. xi. 5), but not in Palestine. The mulberry is undoubtedly mentioned in Luke xvii. 6 under the name συκιδμωτος: the Hebrew דִּמְיוֹן ; so translated (2 Sam. v. 23 [R. V. marg. balsam tree]; 1 Ch. xiv. 14) is rather doubtful; the Vulg. takes it to mean pears. The συκομορφέ ("sycomore," A. V.; Luke xix. 4) differed from the tree last mentioned; it was the Egyptian fig, which abounded in Palestine (1 K. x. 27), and was much valued for its fruit (1 Ch. xxvii. 28; Amos vii. 14). [APPLE; CITRON; FIGS; MULBERRY-TREE; PALM-TREE; POMEGRANATE; SYCAMORE-TREE; SYCAMORE.]

Of vegetables we have most frequent notice of lentils (Gen. xxv. 34; 2 Sam. xvii. 28, xxiii. 11; Ezek. iv. 9), which are still largely used by the Bedouins in travelling (Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 65); beans (2 Sam. xvii. 28; Ezek. iv. 9), which still form a favourite dish in Egypt and Arabia for breakfast, boiled in water and eaten with butter and pepper; from 2 Sam. xvii. 28 it might be inferred that beans and other kinds of pulse were roasted, as barley was, but the second פִּיִּץ in that verse is interpolated, not appearing in the LXX. and other Versions (see Q.P.B.); and, even if it were not so, the reference to pulse in the A. V., as of cicer in the Vulg., is wholly unwarranted; cucumbers (Num. xi. 5; Is. i. 8; Bar. vi. 70; cp. 2 K. iv. 39, where wild gourds, Cucumeres asinini, were picked in mistake for cucumbers); leeks, onions, and garlic, which were and still are of a superior quality in Egypt (Num. xi. 5; cp. Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i. 169 [1878]; Lane, i. 251); lettuce, of which the wild species, Lactuca agrestis, is identified with the Greek κικλός by Pliny (xii. 65), and formed, according to the LXX. and the Vulg., the "bitter herbs" (רִיחֵי קֹדֶשׁ) eaten with the Paschal lamb (Ex. xii. 8; Num. ix. 11); endive, which is still well known in the East (Russell, i. 91), may have been included under the same class. In addition to the above we have notice of certain "herbs" (רִיחֵי קֹדֶשׁ; 2 K. iv. 39) eaten in times of scarcity, which were mallows according to the Syriac and Arabic Versions, but, according to the Talmud, a vegetable resembling the Brassica eruca of Linnaeus; and again of sea-purslain (רִיחֵי קֹדֶשׁ; δλίμα; A. V. "mallows," R. V. "salt-wort" and broom-root (רִיחֵי קֹדֶשׁ; A. V. and R. V. "juniper;" Job xxx. 4), as eaten by the poor in time of famine, unless the latter were gathered as fuel. An insipid plant, probably purslain, used in salad, appears to be referred to in Job vi. 6, under the expression רִיחֵי קֹדֶשׁ ("white of egg," A. V., R. V. marg. the juice of purslain). The usual method of eating vegetables was in the form of pottage (רִיחֵי קֹדֶשׁ; θήνημα; pulmentum; Gen. xxv. 29; 2 K. iv. 38; Hag. ii. 12); a meal wholly of vegetables was deemed very poor fare (Prov. xv. 17; Dan. i. 12; Rom. xiv. 2). The modern Arabians consume but few vegetables; radishes and leeks are most in use, and are eaten raw with bread (Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 56). [BEANS; CUCUMBER; GARLIC; GOURD; LEEK; LENTIL; ONION.]

The spices or condiments known to the Hebrews were numerous: cummin (Is. xxviii. 25; Matt. xxiii. 23), dill (Matt. xxiii. 23; "anise," A. V.), coriander (Ex. xvi. 31; Num. xi. 7), mint (Matt. xxiii. 13), rue (Luke xi. 42), mustard (Matt. xiii. 31, xvii. 20), and salt (Job vi. 6), which is reckoned among "the principal things for the whole use of man's life" (Ecclus. xxxiii. 26). Nuts (pistachios) and almonds (Gen. xliii. 11) were also used as whets to the appetite. [ALMOND-TREE; ANISE; CORIANDER; CUMMIN; MINT; MUSTARD; NUTS; SPICES.]

In addition to these classes, we have to notice some other important articles of food: in the first place, honey, whether the natural product of the bee (1 Sam. xiv. 25; Matt. iii. 4), which abounds in most parts of Arabia (Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 54), or the other natural and artificial productions included under that head, especially the dijs of the Syrians and the Arabians, i.e. grape-juice boiled down to the state of the Roman defrutum, which is still extensively used in the East (Russell, i. 82); the latter is supposed to be referred to in Gen. xliii. 11 and Ezek. xxvii. 17. The importance of honey as a substitute for sugar is obvious; it was both used in certain kinds of cake (though prohibited in the case of meat offerings, Lev. ii. 11), as in the pastry of the Arabs (Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 54), and was also eaten in its natural state either by itself (1 Sam. xiv. 27; 2 Sam. xvii. 29; 1 K. xv. 3), or in conjunction with other things, even with fish (Luke xxiv. 42). "Butter and honey" is an expression for rich diet (Is. vii. 15, 22); such a mixture is popular among the Arabs (Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 54). "Milk and honey" are similarly coupled together, not only frequently by the sacred writers, as expressive of the richness of the promised land, but also by the Greek poets (cp. Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 48; Hom. Od. xx. 68). Too much honey was deemed unwholesome (Prov. xxv. 27). With regard to oil, it does not appear to have been used to the extent we might have anticipated; some modern Arabs only employ it in frying fish (Burckhardt, Arabia, i. 54), substituting butter for all other purposes; others make it a prominent article of food; while other Orientals eat it universally in place of butter and fat during Lent. Among the Hebrews oil was deemed an expensive luxury (Prov. xxi. 17), to be reserved for festive occasions (1 Ch. xii. 40); it was chiefly used in certain kinds of cake (Lev. ii. 5 sq.; 1 K. xvii. 12). "Oil and honey" are mentioned in conjunction with bread in Ezek. xvi. 13, 19. The Syrians, especially the Jews, eat oil and honey (dijs) mixed together (Russell, i. 80). Eggs are not often noticed, but were evidently known as articles of food (Is. x. 14, lix. 5; Luke xi. 12), and are reckoned by Jerome (In Epistol. Paul. i. 176) among the delicacies of the table. The Orientals of to-day fry them in twice their bulk of fat or butter or oil. [HONEY; OIL.]

The Orientals are, as a rule, sparing in the use of animal food*: not only does the excessive heat of the climate render it both unwholesome to eat much meat (Niebuhr, Descript. p. 46), and expensive from the necessity of immediately consuming a whole animal; but beyond this the ritual regulations of the Mosaic law in ancient, as of the Koran in modern times, have tended to the same result. It has been inferred from Gen. ix. 3, 4, that animal food was not permitted before the Flood: but the notices of the flock of Abel (Gen. iv. 2) and of the herds of Jabal (Gen. iv. 20), as well as the distinction between clean and unclean animals (Gen. vii. 2), favour the opposite opinion; and the permission in Gen. ix. 3 does not so much constitute a considerable difference (Dillmann⁸ in loco) as (cp. Delitzsch [1887] in loco) a more explicit declaration of a condition implied in the grant of universal dominion previously given (Gen. i. 28). The prohibition then expressed against consuming the blood of any animal (Gen. ix. 4) was more fully developed in the Levitical Law, and enforced by the penalty of death (Lev. iii. 17, vii. 26, xix. 26; Deut. xii. 16; 1 Sam. xiv. 32 sq.; Ezek. xiv. 7, 15), on the ground, as stated in Lev. xvii. 11 and Deut. xii. 23, that the blood contained the principle of life, and, as such, was to be offered on the Altar; probably there was an additional reason in the heathen practice of consuming blood in their sacrifices (Ps. xvi. 4; Ezek. xxxiii. 25). The prohibition applied to strangers as well as Israelites, and to all kinds of beast or fowl (Lev. vii. 26; xvii. 12, 13). So strong was the feeling of the Jews on this point, that the Gentile converts to Christianity were laid under similar restrictions (Acts xv. 20, 29; xxi. 25). As a necessary deduction from the above principle, all animals which had died a natural death (חַיָּה טְרוּפָה, Deut. xiv. 21), or had been torn of beasts (חַיָּה טְרוּפָה, Ex. xxii. 31), were also prohibited (Lev. xvii. 15; cp. Ezek. iv. 14), and were to be thrown to the dogs (Ex. xxii. 31): this prohibition did not extend to strangers (Deut. xiv. 21). Any person infringing this rule was held unclean until the evening, and was obliged to wash his clothes (Lev. xvii. 15). In the N. T. these cases are described under the term κτενόν (Acts xv. 20), applying not only to what was strangled (as in A. V.), but to any animal from which the blood was not regularly poured forth. Similar prohibitions are contained in the Koran (ii. 175, v. 4, xvi. 116), the result of which is that at the present day the Arabians eat no meat except what has been bought at the shambles. Certain portions of the fat of sacrifices were also forbidden (Lev. iii. 9, 10), as being set apart for the Altar (Lev. iii. 16, vii. 25: cp. 1 Sam. ii. 16 sq.; 2 Ch. vii. 7): it should be observed that the term in Neh. viii. 10, translated fat, is not חֵלֶב, but חֵלֶב טָמֵא = the fatty pieces of meat, delicacies. In addition to the above, Christians were forbidden to eat the flesh of animals, portions of which had been offered to idols (εἰδωλόθυρα), whether at private feasts, or as bought in the market (Acts xv. 29, xxi. 25; 1 Cor. viii. 1 sq.). All beasts and birds classed as unclean (Lev. xi. 1 sq.; Deut. xiv. 4 sq.) were also prohibited [UNCLEAN BEASTS AND BIRDS]: and in addition to these general precepts there was a special prohibition against "seething a kid in his mother's milk" (Ex. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Deut. xiv. 21), which has been variously understood, by Talmudical writers as a general prohibition against the joint use of meat and milk (Mishna, Cholín, cap. 8, § 1); by Michaelis (Mos. Recht, iv. 210) as prohibiting the use of fat or milk, as compared with oil, in cooking; by Luther and Calvin as prohibiting the slaughter of young animals; and by Bochart and others as discountenancing cruelty in any way. These interpretations, however, all fail in establishing any connexion between the precept and the offering of the first-fruits, as implied in the three passages quoted. More probably it has reference to certain heathen usages at their harvest festivals (Maimonides, More Neboch. 3, 48; Spencer, de Legg. Hebr. Rit. 535 sq. Cp. Knobel-Dillmann on Exod. xxiii. 19): and there is a remarkable addition in the Samaritan Version and in some copies of the LXX. in Deut. xiv. 21, which supports this view; ὅς γὰρ ποιεῖ τούτο, ὅσει ἀσφάλακα θύσει, ὅτι μίασμα ἐστὶ τῷ θεῷ Ἰακώβ (cp. Knobel, Comment. in Ex. xxiii. 19). The Hebrews further abstained from eating the sinew of the hip (חֵלֶב הַכִּי, Gen. xxxii. 32 [Heb. v. 33]), in memory of the struggle between Jacob and the Angel (cp. v. 25). The LXX., the Vulg., and the A. V. interpret the ἄφατ λεγόμενον word nashet of the shrinking or benumbing of the muscle (ὁ ἐνδρακισαί; qui emarcuit; "which shrank"; Josephus (Ant. i. 20, § 2) more correctly explains it, τὸ νεῦρον τὸ πλατὺ; and there is little doubt that the nerve he refers to is the nervus ischiadicus, which attains its greatest thickness at the hip. There is no further reference to this custom in the Bible; but the Talmudists (Cholín, 7) enforced its observance by penalties.

* Dr. Post (B. D. Amer. ed., s. v. "Food," note at end) points out, however, that dyspepsia is very common among the people, and arises partly from their heavy and unwholesome food, and partly from the fact that their heavy meal is taken just before retiring for the night. He describes a stew as consisting of meat and vegetables fried in butter or fat, and the eater as drinking as much of the fatty matter as possible.

Under these restrictions the Hebrews were permitted the free use of animal food: generally speaking, they only availed themselves of it in the exercise of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 7), or at festivals of a religious (Ex. xii. 8), public (1 K. i. 9; 1 Ch. xii. 40), or private character (Gen. xxvii. 4; Luke xv. 23): it was only in royal households that there was a daily consumption of meat (1 K. iv. 23; Neh. v. 18). The use of meat is reserved for similar occasions among the Bedouins (Burckhardt's Notes, i. 63). The animals killed for meat were—calves (Gen. xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xviii. 24; Amos vi. 4), which are farther described by the term fattling (חֵלֶב טָמֵא = μῶσχος στευτός, Luke xv. 23, and στειτόν, Matt. xxii. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 13; 1 K. i. 9 sq.; A. V. "fat cattle"); lambs (2 Sam. xii. 4; Amos vi. 4); oxen, not above three years of age (1 K. i. 9; Prov. xv. 17; Is. xxii. 13; Matt. xxii. 4), which were either stall-fed (חֵלֶב טָמֵא; μῶσχος ἐκλεκτός), or taken up from the pastures (חֵלֶב; βόες νομάδες; 1 K. iv. 23); kids (Gen. xxvii. 9; Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. xvi. 20); harts, roebucks, and fallow-deer (1 K. iv. 23), which are also brought into close connexion with ordinary cattle in Deut. xiv. 5, as though holding an intermediate place between tame and wild animals; birds of various kinds (חֵלֶב טָמֵא; A. V. "fowls"; Neh. v. 18; the LXX., however, gives χίμαρος, as though the reading were חֵלֶב טָמֵא); quail in certain parts of Arabia (Ex. xvi. 13; Num. xi. 32); poultry (חֵלֶב טָמֵא; 1 K. iv. 23; understood generally by the LXX., ὄρνιθων ἐκλεκτῶν στευτόν; by Kimchi and the A. V. and R. V. as "fatted fowl"; by Gesenius, Thesaur. p. 246, as geese, from the whiteness of their plumage; by Thenius, Comm. in l. c. as guinea-fowls, as though the word represented the call of that bird); partridges (1 Sam. xxvi. 20); fish, with the exception of such as were without scales and fins (Lev. xi. 9; Deut. xiv. 9), both salted, as was probably the case with the sea-fish brought to Jerusalem (Neh. xiii. 16), and fresh (Matt. xiv. 19, xv. 36; Luke xxiv. 42). This in our Saviour's time appears to have been the usual food about the Sea of Galilee (Matt. vii. 10); the term ὀψάριον is applied to it by St. John (vi. 9; xxi. 9 sq.) in the restricted sense which the word obtained among the later Greeks, as = fish. Locusts, of which certain species only were esteemed clean (Lev. xi. 22), were occasionally eaten (Matt. iii. 4), but considered as poor fare. They are at the present day largely consumed by the poor both in Persia (Morier's Second Journey, p. 44) and in Arabia (Niebuhr, Voyage, i. 319); they are salted and dried, and roasted, when required, on a frying-pan with butter (Burckhardt's Notes, ii. 92; Niebuhr, l. c.).

Meat does not appear ever to have been eaten by itself; various accompaniments are noticed in Scripture, as bread, milk, and sour milk (Gen. xviii. 8); bread and broth (Judg. vi. 19); and with fish either bread (Matt. xiv. 19, xv. 36; John xxi. 9) or honeycomb (Luke xxiv. 42): the instance in 2 Sam. vi. 19 cannot be relied on, as the meaning of the term רֶגֶל, rendered in the A. V. "a good piece of flesh," after the Vulg., assatura bibulæ carnis, is quite unknown (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam., in loco. The R. V. renders in text a portion of flesh, and in marg. of wine). For the modes of preparing meat, see COOKING; and for the times and manner of eating, MEALS: see also FISH, FOWL, &c.

To pass from ordinary to occasional sources of subsistence: prison diet consisted of bread and water administered in small quantities (1 K. xxii. 27; Jer. xxxvii. 21): pulse and water was considered but little better (Dan. i. 12): in time of sorrow or fasting it was usual to abstain either altogether from food (2 Sam. xii. 17, 20), or from meat, wine, and other delicacies, which were described as חֶמְדַּיִם וְלֶחֶם, lit. bread of desires (Dan. x. 3). In time of extreme famine the most loathsome food was swallowed; such as an ass's head (2 K. vi. 25), the ass, it must be remembered, being an unclean animal (for a parallel case cp. Plutarch, Artaxerx. 24), and dove's dung (see the article on that subject), the dung of cattle (Joseph. B. J. v. 13, § 7), and even possibly their own dung (2 K. xviii. 27). The consumption of human flesh was not altogether unknown (2 K. vi. 28; cp. Joseph. B. J. vi. 3, § 4), the passages quoted supplying instances of the exact fulfilment of the prediction in Deut. xxviii. 56, 57: cp. also Lam. ii. 20, iv. 10; Ezek. v. 10.

With regard to the beverages used by the Hebrews, we have already mentioned milk, and the probable use of barley-water, and of a mixture resembling the modern sherbet, formed of fig-cake and water. The Hebrews probably resembled the Arabs in not drinking much during their meals, but concluding them with a long draught of water. It is almost needless to say that water was most generally drunk. In addition to these the Hebrews were acquainted with various intoxicating liquors, the most valued of which was the juice of the grape, while others were described under the general term of shechar or strong drink (Lev. x. 9; Num. vi. 3; Judg. xiii. 4, 7), if indeed the latter does not sometimes include the former (Num. xxviii. 7): these were reserved for the wealthy or for festive occasions. The poor consumed a sour wine (A. V. "vinegar;" Ruth ii. 14; Matt. xxvii. 48), calculated to quench thirst, but not agreeable to the taste (Prov. x. 26). [DRINK, STRONG; VINEGAR; WATER; WINE.] [W. L. B.] [F.]

FOOT, watering with the (Dent. xi. 10). [GARDEN.]

FOOTMAN, a word employed in the A. V. in two senses. 1. Generally, to distinguish those of the people or of the fighting-men who went on foot from those who were on horseback or in chariots. The Hebrew word for this is

But, 2. The word occurs in a more special sense (in 1 Sam. xxii. 17 only; R. V. "guard;" both A. V. and R. V. have in marg. Heb. runners), and as the translation of a different term from the above—רִגְלִי, rootz. This passage affords the first mention of the existence of a body of swift runners in attendance on the king, though such a thing had been foretold by Samuel (1 Sam. viii. 11). This body appears to have been afterwards kept up, and to have been distinct from the body-guard—the six hundred, and the thirty—who were originated by David. See 1 K. xiv. 27, 28; 2 Ch. xii. 10, 11; 2 K. xi. 4, 6, 11, 13, 19. In each of these cases the word is the same as the above, and is rendered "guard;" but the translators and revisers were evidently aware of its signification, for they have put the word "runners" in the margin (1 K. xiv. 27, A. V. and R. V.; 2 K. xi. 4; 2 Ch. xii. 10, R. V.). This indeed was the force of the term "footman" at the time the A. V. was made, as is plain not only from the references just quoted, but amongst others from the title of a well-known tract of Bunyan's—The Heavenly Footman, or a Description of the Man that gets to Heaven, on 1 Cor. ix. 24 (St. Paul's figure of the race). Swift running was evidently a valued accomplishment of a perfect warrior—a gibbor, as the Hebrew word is—among the Israelites. There are constant allusions to this in the Bible, though obscured in the E. V., from the translators not recognising or not adopting the technical sense of the word gibbor. Among others see Ps. xix. 5; Job xvi. 14; Joel ii. 7, where "strong man," "giant," and "mighty man" are all gibbor, used in connexion with running. David was famed for his powers of running; they are so mentioned as to seem characteristic of him (1 Sam. xvii. 22, 48, 51; xx. 6), and he makes them a special subject of thanksgiving to God (2 Sam. xxii. 30; Ps. xviii. 29). The cases of Cush and Ahimaaz (2 Sam. xviii.) will occur to every one. It is not impossible that the former—"the Ethiopian," as his name most likely is—had some peculiar mode of running. [CUSH.] Asahel also was "swift on his feet," and the Gadite heroes who came across to David in his difficulties were "swift as the roes upon the mountains:" but in neither of these last cases is the word rootz employed. The word probably derives its modern sense from the custom of domestic servants running by the carriage of their master. [GUARD.] [G.] [W.]

FORDS. [See JORDAN.]

FOREHEAD (פָּדָה, from פָּדָה, rad. inus. to shine, Gesen. p. 815; μέτωπον; frons). The practice for women of the higher classes, especially married women, in the East, to veil their faces in public, sufficiently stigmatizes with reproach the unveiled face of women of bad character (Gen. xxv. 65; Jer. iii. 3; Niebuhr, Voy. i. 132, 149, 150; Shaw, Travels, pp. 228, 240; Hasselquist, Travels, p. 58; Buckingham, Arab Tribes, p. 312; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 72, 77, 225-248; Burckhardt, Travels, i. 233). An especial force is thus given to the term "hard of forehead," as descriptive of audacity in general (Ezek. iii. 7-9; comp. Juv. Sat. xiv. 242 — "Ejectum atritâ de fronte ruborem").

The custom among many Oriental nations both of colouring the face and forehead, and of impressing on the body marks indicative of devotion to some special deity or religious sect, is mentioned elsewhere [CUTTINGS IN FLESH]. (Burckhardt, Notes on Bed. i. 51; Niebuhr, Voy. ii. 57; Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. 342 [1878]; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 66.) It is doubtless alluded to in Rev. (xiii. 16, 17; xiv. 9; xvii. 5; xx. 4), and in the opposite direction by Ezekiel (ix. 4-6) and in Rev. (vii. 3; ix. 4; xiv. 1; xxii. 4). The mark mentioned by Ezekiel with approval has been supposed to be the figure of the cross, said to be denoted by the word here used, 𐤀𐤍, in the ancient Semitic language (Gesen. p. 1495; Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. ii. 20. 3, pp. 409, 413; MV.¹¹).

It may have been by way of contradiction to heathen practice that the high-priest wore on the front of his mitre the golden plate inscribed "Holiness to the Lord" (Ex. xxviii. 36, xxxix. 30; Spencer, l. c.).

The "jewel for the forehead" mentioned by Ezekiel (xvi. 12), and in margin of A. V. Gen. xxiv. 22, was in all probability nose-rings (so R. V. Cp. Is. iii. 21; Lane, Mod. Eg. iii. 225, 226; Harmer, Obs. iv. 311, 312; Gesen. p. 870; Winer, v. Nasenring). The Persian and also Egyptian women wear jewels and strings of coins across their foreheads (Olearius, Travels, p. 317; Lane, Mod. Eg. ii. 228). [NOSE-JEWEL.]

FORESKIN. [CIRCUMCISION.]

FOREST. The corresponding Hebrew terms are ַעֲרָב, שֵׁטֶף, and פִּרְדֵּס. The first of these most truly expresses the idea of a forest, the etymological force of the word being abundance, and its use being restricted (with the exception of 1 Sam. xiv. 26, and Cant. v. 1, in which it refers to honey) to an abundance of trees. The second is seldom used, the word itself involving the idea of what is being cut down (silva a caedendo dicta, Gesen. Thesaur. p. 530): it is only twice (1 Sam. xxiii. 15 sq.; 2 Ch. xxvii. 4) applied to woods properly so called, and there probably to woods on hills as distinguished from woods on the plain; its sense, however, is illustrated in the other passages in which it occurs, viz. Is. xvii. 2 (A. V. "bough," R. V. "wood." The verse is difficult, and the readings various. See Dilitzsch⁴ and Dillmann⁵ in loco), where the comparison is to the "forsaken places" (R. V.) of worship in the forest, and Ezek. xxxi. 3, where it applies to trees or foliage sufficient to afford shelter (frondibus nemorosus, Vulg.; A. V. and R. V. "with a shadowing shroud"). The third, pardes (a word of foreign origin [see MV.¹¹], meaning an enclosed place, whether garden or park, whence also comes the Greek παράδεισος), refers perhaps to forest trees (Neh. ii. 8), the forests of Palestine being carefully preserved under the Persian rule, a regular warden being appointed, without whose sanction no tree could be felled. Elsewhere the word describes a garden or orchard (Eccles. ii. 5; Cant. iv. 13).

Although Palestine has never been in historical times a woodland country, yet there can be no doubt that there was much more wood formerly than there is at present. It is not improbable that the highlands were once covered with a primeval forest, of which the celebrated oaks and terebinths scattered here and there are the relics. The woods and forests mentioned in the Bible appear to have been situated, where they are usually found in cultivated countries, in the valleys and defiles that lead down from the high- to the lowlands and in the adjacent plains. They were therefore of no great size, and correspond rather with the idea of the Latin saltus than with our forest.

(1.) The wood of Ephraim was the most extensive. It clothed the slopes of the hills that bordered the plain of Jezreel, and the plain itself in the neighbourhood of Bethshan (Josh. xvii. 15 sq.), extending, perhaps, at one time to Tabor, which is translated δρυμὸς by Theodotion (Hos. v. 1), and which is still well covered with forest trees (Stanley, p. 350). (2.) The wood of Bethel (2 K. ii. 23, 24) was situated in the ravine which descends to the plain of Jericho. (3.) The forest of Hareth (1 Sam. xxii. 5) was somewhere on the border of the Philistine plain, in the southern part of Judah. (4.) The wood through which the Israelites passed in their pursuit of the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv. 25) was probably near Ajalon (cp. v. 31), in one of the valleys leading down to the plain of Philistia. (5.) The "wood" (Ps. cxxxii. 6) implied in the name of Kirjath-jearim (1 Sam. vii. 2) must have been similarly situated, as also (6) were the "forests" (Choresch) in which Jotham placed his forts (2 Ch. xxvii. 4). (7.) The plain of Sharon was partly covered with wood (Strab. xvii. p. 578), whence the LXX. gives δρυμὸς as an equivalent (Is. lrv. 10). It has still a fair amount of wood (Stanley, p. 260). (8.) The wood (Choresch) in the wilderness of Ziph, in which David concealed himself (1 Sam. xxiii. 15 sq.), lay S.E. of Hebron.

The greater portion of Peraea was, and still is, covered with forests of oak and terebinth (Is. ii. 13; Ezek. xxvii. 6; Zech. xi. 2: cp. Buckingham's Palestine, pp. 103 sq., 240 sq.; Stanley, p. 324). A portion of this near Mahanaim was known as the "wood of Ephraim" (2 Sam. xviii. 6), in which the battle between David and Absalom took place. Winer (art. Wälder) places it on the west side of the Jordan, but a comparison of 2 Sam. xvii. 26, xviii. 3, 23, proves the reverse. The statement in xviii. 23, in particular, marks its position as on the highlands, at some little distance from the valley of the Jordan (cp. Joseph. Ant. vii. 10, §§ 1, 2).

"The house of the forest of Lebanon" (1 K. vii. 2, x. 17, 21; 2 Ch. ix. 16, 20) was so called probably from being fitted up with cedar. It has also been explained as referring to the forest-like rows of cedar pillars. The number and magnificence of the cedars of Lebanon is frequently noticed in the poetical portions of the Bible. The forest generally supplied Hebrew writers with an image of pride and exaltation doomed to destruction (2 K. xix. 23; Is. x. 18, xxxii. 19, xxxvii. 24; Jer. xxi. 14, xxii. 7, xlvi. 23; Zech. xi. 2), as well as of unfruitful-ness as contrasted with a cultivated field or vineyard (Is. xxix. 17, xxxii. 15; Jer. xxvi. 18; Hos. ii. 12). [W. L. B.] [F.]

FORNICATION. [ADULTERY.]

FORTIFICATIONS. [FENCED CITIES.]

FORTUNATUS (Φορτουνάτος; Fortunatus), mentioned in 1 Cor. xvi. 17, and in Clem. Rom. Ep. lix., where Bishop Lightfoot has the following note:—"The form of the expression (ὄνυ και Φ.) seems to separate Fortunatus from Ephebus and Bitō; and, if so, he was perhaps not a Roman who accompanied the letter, but a Corinthian from whom Clement was expecting a visit. In this case there is no improbability in identifying him with the Fortunatus of 1 Cor. xvi. 17, for he seems to be mentioned by St. Paul (A.D. 57) as a younger member of the household of Stephanas, and might well be alive less than forty years after, when Clement wrote. It must be remembered, however, that Fortunatus is a very common name." [E. R. B.]

FOUNTAIN. 1. מַיִם, from יָמַן, to flow; also signifies an "eye," Gesen. p. 1017. 2. מַיִם (from 1), a well-watered place; sometimes in A. V. "well," or "spring." 3. מַיִם נִצְּרָה, from נָצַח, to go forth, Gesen. p. 613; a gushing forth of waters. 4. מַקְוֵה, from קָוָה, to dig, Gesen. p. 1209. 5. מַבְּבֵה, from בָּבַב, to bubble forth, Gesen. p. 845. 6. גִּלְגַּל, or גִּלְגָּל, from גָּלַגַּל, to roll, Gesen. p. 288; all usually rendered πηγή, or πηγή ὕδατος; fons and fons aquarum. The special use of these various terms will be found examined in the Appendix to Stanley's Sinai and Palestine.

Among the attractive features presented by the Land of Promise to the nation migrating from Egypt by way of the desert, none would be more striking than the natural gush of waters from the ground. Instead of watering his field or garden, as in Egypt, "with his foot" (Shaw, Travels, p. 408), the Hebrew cultivator was taught to look forward to a land that "drinketh water of the rain of heaven, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths springing forth in valleys and hills" (Deut. viii. 7; xi. 11, R. V.). In the desert of Sinai, "the few living, perhaps perennial springs," by the fact of their rarity assume an importance hardly to be understood in moister climates, and more than justify a poetical expression of national rejoicing over the discovery of one (Num. xxi. 17). But the springs of Palestine, though short-lived, are remarkable for their abundance and beauty, especially those which fall into the Jordan and its lakes throughout its whole course (Stanley, S. & P. pp. 17, 122, 123, 295, 373, 509; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 344). The spring or fountain of living water, the "eye" of the landscape (see No. 1), is distinguished in all Oriental languages from the artificially sunk and enclosed well (Stanley, p. 509). Its importance is implied by the number of topographical names compounded with En, or Ain (Arab.): En-gedi, Ain-jidy, "spring of the gazelle," may serve as a striking instance (1 Sam. xxiii. 29; Reland, p. 763; Robinson, i. 504; Stanley, App. § 50).

The volcanic agency which has operated so powerfully in Palestine, has from very early times given tokens of its working in the warm springs which are found near the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. One of them, En-eglain, the "spring of calves," at the N.E. end of the latter, is probably identical with Callirrhoe, mentioned by Josephus as a place resorted to by Herod in his last illness (Joseph. B. J. i. 33, § 5; Kitto, Phys. Geogr. of Pal. pp. 120, 121; Stanley, S. & P. p. 285). His son Philip built the town, which he named Tiberias, at the sulphureous hot-springs at the S. of the Sea of Galilee (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 2, § 3; Hasselquist, Travels, App. 283; Kitto, p. 114; Burckhardt, Syria, pp. 328, 330; Oliphant, Haiifa, p. 127). Other hot-springs are found at seven miles' distance from Tiberias, and at Omkeis (Gadara) (Reland, p. 775; Burckhardt, p. 276, 277; Kitto, pp. 116, 118).

Jerusalem, though mainly dependent for its supply of water upon its rain-water cisterns, appears from recent inquiries to have possessed either more than one perennial spring, or one issuing by more than one outlet. To this agree the "fons perennis aquae" of Tacitus (Hist. v. 12), and the ἄδραν ἀνέκλειστός ὑδατος of Aristeas (Joseph. ii. 112, ed. Havercamp; Robinson, i. 343, 345; Williams, Holy City, ii. 458, 468; Raumer, p. 298; Ezek. xlvii. 1, 12; Kitto, Phys. Geogr. pp. 412, 415). [CISTERNS; SILOAM.]

In the towers built by Herod, Josephus says there were cisterns with χαλκουρῆματα through which water was poured forth: these may have been statues or figures containing spouts for water after Roman models (Plin. Epist. v. 6; N. H. xxxvi. 15, 151; Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 4).

No Eastern city is so well supplied with water as Damascus (Early Trav. p. 294). In Oriental cities generally public fountains are frequent (Poole, Englishiv. in Egypt, i. 180). Traces of such fountains at Jerusalem may perhaps be found in the names En-rogel (2 Sam. xvii. 17), the "Dragon-well" or fountain, and the "gate of the fountain" (Neh. ii. 13, 14). The water which supplied Solomon's pools near Bethlehem was conveyed to them by subterranean channels. In these may also be found "the sealed fountain" of Cant. iv. 12 (Hasselquist, p. 145; Maundrell, Early Trav. p. 457). The fountain of Nazareth

So-called "Fountain" of Cana. (From Roberts.)

bears a traditional antiquity, to which it has probably good derivative, if not actual, claim (Roberts, Views in Palestine, i. 21, 29, 33; Col. Ch. Chron. No. cxxx. 147; Fisher's Views in Syria, i. 31, iii. 44). [H. W. P.]

FOUNTAIN GATE, Neh. iii. 15; xii. 37. A gate in the city walls on the south side of Jerusalem, near, and probably leading to, Siloam. [JERUSALEM.]

FOWL, FATTED (בָּרִירִים מְבֻשְׁלִים, barberim avosim; ŕpvidēs avovral; aves attiles). The word only occurs in 1 K. iv. 23, in the list of supplies for the daily provision of Solomon's table. There is no other clue to the meaning of the term than the rendering of the LXX. Gesenius proposes "fatted geese" or swans, from בָּרַר, "to be white." But the goose is not an inhabitant of Syria, which is much too warm for it, and the swan is only a rare visitor in winter. Others have suggested guinea-fowls. But we have no evidence that this tropical African bird was ever introduced by Solomon or the Phoenicians. But there seems no difficulty in accepting the ordinary rendering of our domestic fowl; for although we have no proof of the Jews having possessed poultry before the Captivity, yet when Solomon introduced peacocks from India, it is most probable he would also import the common fowl, which has been from time immemorial domesticated in that its native country. [H. B. T.]

FOWL, FOWLER. [SPARROW.]

FOX (אַרְבֵּי, shū'al; ἀλώπηξ; vulpes). The Turkish چاقال, jakāl, French chacal, German schakal, R. V. marg. jackals, are evidently related to the Hebrew word, and refer to the jackal (Canis aureus, L.). The various passages where the word occurs, show that the Hebrews, like the Arabs at the present day, used the same name for both fox and jackal. At the same time, there is another word—יְיִם, iyim, lit. "howlers"—which occurs in Is. xiii. 22, xxxiv. 14, Jer. l. 39, rendered in A. V. "wild beasts of the islands," and R. V. "wolves," which more probably represents the jackal, whom the Arabs call بَنِي وُلُوْل beni walwal, "sons of howling," or وَاوِي wawi, as commonly as jakāl.

In all the passages where the Hebrew shū'al occurs, excepting possibly Cant. ii. 15, Ezek. xiii. 4, jackals rather than foxes are intended. The passage in Ps. lxxiii. 10, "they shall be a portion for shū'ālim," evidently refers to "jackals," which are ever ready to prey on the dead bodies of the slain, follow caravans for the chance of the animals that fall, and attack graves for the carrion. The fondness of the fox for grapes is well known in the East; but not more so than that of the jackal, which, going in packs, often commits great devastation in the vineyards. Both animals are, like the dog, omnivorous. Thus in many parts of North Africa, where the jackals swarm, there is no possibility of obtaining flesh or carrion, and they subsist on the fruit of the dwarf palmetto, with which the plains are covered.

The shū'ālim of Judg. xv. 4 are evidently "jackals," and not "foxes," for the former animal is gregarious, whereas the latter is solitary in its habits; and it is in the highest degree improbable that Samson should ever have succeeded in catching so many as 300 foxes, whereas he could readily have "taken in snares," as the Hebrew verb (לָכַד) properly means, so many jackals, which go together for the most part in large groups. The whole passage, which describes the manner in which Samson avenged himself on the Philistines by tying the tails of two jackals together, with a firebrand between them, and then sending them into the standing corn and orchards of his enemies, has, it is well known, been the subject of much dispute. Dr. Kennicott (Remarks on Select Passages in the O. T., Oxford, 1787, p. 100) proposed, on the authority of seven Hebrew MSS., to read shē'ālim (שְׂעָלִים), "sheaves" (?), instead of shū'ālim (שְׁוֹאִלִים), leaving out the letter י: the meaning then being, simply, that Samson took 300 sheaves of corn, and put them end to end ("tail to tail"), and then set a burning torch between them (see also what an anonymous French author has written under the title of Rénards de Samson, and his arguments refuted in a treatise, "De Vulpibus Simsonaei," by B. H. Gebhard, in Theol. Nov. Theol. Phil. i. 553 sq.). The proposed reading of Kennicott has deservedly found little favour with commentators. Not to mention the authority of the important old Versions which are opposed to this view, it is pretty certain that shē'ālim cannot mean "sheaves." The word, which occurs only three times, denotes in Is. xl. 12 "the hollow of the hand," and in 1 K. xx. 10, Ezek. xiii. 19, "handfuls."

The difficulty of the whole passage consists in understanding how two animals tied together by their tails would run far in the same direction. Col. H. Smith (in Kitto's Cyc., art. "Shual") observes, "they would assuredly pull counter to each other, and ultimately fight most fiercely." Probably they would; but it is only fair to remember, in reply to the objections which critics have advanced to this transaction of the Hebrew judge, that it has yet to be demonstrated that two jackals united by their tails would run counter, and thus defeat the intended purpose; in so important a matter as the verification of a Scripture narrative the proper course is experimental where it can be resorted to. Again, we know nothing as to the length of the cord which attached the animals, a consideration which is obviously of much importance in the question at issue; for, as jackals are gregarious, the couples would naturally run together if we allow a length of cord of two or three yards, especially when we reflect that the terrified animals would endeavour to escape as far as possible out of the reach of their captor, and make the best of their way out of his sight. The translation of the A. V. is unquestionably the correct rendering of the Hebrew, and has the authority of the LXX. and Vulg. in its favour. But if the above remarks are deemed inadequate to a satisfactory solution of Samson's exploit, we are at liberty to suppose that he had men to help him, both in the capture of the jackals and in the use to which he put them, and it is not necessary to conclude that the animals were all caught at, and let loose from, the same place: some might have been taken in one portion of the Philistines' territory, and some in another, and let loose in different parts of the country. This view would obviate

the alleged difficulty alluded to above; for there would be no necessity for the jackals to run any great distance in order to insure the greatest amount of damage to the crops: 150 different centres, so to speak, of conflagration throughout the country of the Philistines must have burnt up nearly all their corn; and, from the whole context, it is evident that the injury done was one of almost unlimited extent.

With respect to the jackals and foxes of Palestine, the common jackal of the country is the Canis aureus, L., so named from its tawny yellow colour, and which may be heard every night in the villages. The fox of the southern and central regions of Palestine, extremely abundant in Judaea and the east of Jordan, is Vulpes Nilotica, Rüpp, which differs very slightly from our own, being a little smaller, more tawny above, and of a greyer hue below. In its habits it is very distinct from the jackal, being solitary, and often hunting in the daytime. It is found through Egypt, Arabia, and the Syrian desert.

Another species is common in the wooded districts of Galilee and the north, Vulpes flavescens, Gray, the Canis Syriacus of Col. H. Smith, known to the natives as ثعلب, tha'lab.

It is considerably larger than the last species, and differs from the English fox, of which we believe it to be only a local race, by its peculiarly bright light yellowish colour throughout, and finer and longer fur. It has black ears, and a splendid brush. It ranges from Syria to Central Asia, and the north side of the Himaayas (cp. Hemp. and Ehr. Symb. Phys. pt. i.; Hasselquist, Trav. p. 184). That jackals and foxes were formerly, as now, common in Palestine is evident from the names of places derived from these animals, as Hazar-Shual (Josh. xv. 28), Shaalvim (Judg. i. 35).

Canis Syriacus.

The Rabbinical writers make frequent mention of the fox and his habits. In the Talmud it is said, "The fox does not die from being under the earth: he is used to it, and it does not hurt him." Again: "He has gained as much as a fox in a ploughed field," i.e. nothing. Another proverb relating to him is:

"If the fox be at the rudder, Speak him fairly—"My dear brother."

FRANKINCENSE לְבָנָה, leb'nah, from לָבַן, "to be white"; לבανος; thus; Arab. لُبَان, lubān [Ex. xxx. 34, &c.; 1 Ch. ix. 29; Matt. ii. 11; Rev. viii. 3], the fragrant gum of an Indian tree, procured through Arabia. "All they from Sheba shall come. They shall bring gold and incense" (Is. lx. 6); "Incense from Sheba" (Jer. vi. 20). Frankincense is the gum or resin of the tree Boswellia serrata of botanists, which grows abundantly in the hilly districts of Central and Southern India, and is known as "Salai" by the natives. It belongs to the natural order Amyridaceae, or the Myrrh family. All the trees of the order, which is tropical, abound in balsamic resin. Among the genera which it includes are Amyris and Sciaea, yielding elemi and incense-wood, and Balsamodendron, or balsam tree, from some species of which the mbr of the Hebrews, the myrrh of commerce, is procured. Boswellia serrata, and to a more limited extent Boswellia glabra, are the sources of the Olibanum, the Hebrew Lebonah, and Greek Albavos, the frankincense of the Scriptures and of modern commerce. The Hindoos call the gum "Cundur." It is abundant especially about Nagpur, whence large quantities are exported to Europe. It requires no preparation, and is procured by cutting slits in the bark, whence it copiously exudes. The best gum is of a white colour, brittle and bitter to the taste, and is reserved for the Mohammedan markets. That which is yellowish in colour is considered less pure, but is in large demand in Southern and Central Europe for use in the ceremonial of the Greek and Roman Churches. Previous to the English occupation of India there was great uncertainty as to the origin of frankincense; the greater part of that supplied to Europe reaching us by caravan through Persia to Aleppo. Nor do the ancients, as may be seen from Theophrastus and Pliny, appear to have been much better informed (Theophr. Hist. Plant. ix. 4; Plin. Hist. xii. 31). No tree yielding such a gum has ever been found in Palestine (Cels. Hierob. i. 231 sqq.). [H. B. T.]

FREEDOM, Acts xxii. 28. [CITIZENSHIP.]

FRET (A.-S. fretan), used in the sense of "devour." In Lev. xiii. 55 the word, as a noun (R. V. "afret"), is the translation of מַחְרָה, and signifies the leprosy spot which has eaten into a garment. [F.]

FRINGES. [DRESS.]

FROG (עֲרָבָה, tzephar'da; βέρραχος; rana). Gesenius derives the Hebrew word from עָרַב, "to leap," and the Arabic رَدَاع, reda',

"marsh," i.e. "the marsh-leaper;" but Dietrich's derivation of the word from the root עָרַב, "to swell," is now more generally accepted (see MV. 11). The frog was selected by God as an instrument for humbling the pride of Pharaoh (Ex. viii. 2-14; Ps. lxxviii. 45, cv. 30; Wisd. xix. 10): frogs came in prodigious numbers from the canals, the rivers, and the marshes; they filled the houses, and even entered the ovens and kneading troughs. When at the command of Moses the frogs died, the people gathered them in heaps, and "the land stank" from the corruption of the bodies. There can be no doubt that the whole transaction was miraculous: frogs, it is true, if allowed to increase, can easily be imagined to occur in such multitudes as marked the second plague of Egypt—indeed, similar plagues are on record as having occurred in various places, as at Paeonia and Dardania, where frogs suddenly appeared in such numbers as to cause the inhabitants to leave that region—(see Eustathius on Hom. Il. i., and other quotations cited by Bochart, Hieroz. iii. 575)—but that the transaction was miraculous appears further from the fact that the frogs would not naturally have died, in such prodigious numbers as is recorded, in a single day.

It is stated (Ex. viii. 7) that the Egyptian "magicians brought up frogs." Some writers have denied that they could have had any such power, and think that they must have practised some deceit. It is worthy of remark, that though they may have been permitted by God to increase the plagues, they were quite unable to remove them.

Amongst the Egyptians the frog was considered a symbol of an imperfect man, and was supposed to be generated from the slime of the river—ἐκ τῆς τοῦ ποταμοῦ λάσος (see Herapolo, i. 26). A frog sitting upon a lotus (Nelumbium) was also regarded by the ancient Egyptians as symbolical of the return of the Nile to its bed after the inundations. The symbol was probably suggested by the habit of the tree frog (Hyla arborea, L.), which sits on the foliage for the greater part of the year, but returns to the water for three months in spring for the spawning season. Some have connected the Egyptian word Hirur, used to denote the Nile descending, with Chrur, the Coptic name of a frog (Jablonski, Panth. Aegypt. iv. 1, § 9); but the connexion suggested is more than doubtful.

The only known species of frog which occur at present in Egypt are the Rana esculenta, Schinz, of which two varieties are described, which differ from Spallanzani's species in some slight peculiarities (Descript. de l'Égypte, Hist. Nat. tom. i. p. 181, fol. ed.), and the little tree frog (Hyla arborea), mentioned above, which in spring lives in the water in vast myriads. Its croak, when there are many together, may be heard at a distance of more than a mile. The Rana esculenta, the well-known edible frog of the Continent, has a wide geographical range, being found all over Europe (though scarce in the British Isles); through Northern Asia and Japan; in North Africa and Egypt; in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Northern Persia. [W. H.] [H. B. T.]

FRONTLETS, or PHYLACTERIES (פְּרָסְפוֹת, Ex. xiii. 16; Deut. vi. 8, xi. 18; the only three passages of the O. T. in which the word occurs; LXX. ἀσδέλευτα; N. T. φυλακτήρια, Matt. xxiii. 5; the modern Jews called them Tephillin, תְּפִלִּין, a word not found in the Bible, Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v.). These "frontlets" or "phylacteries" were strips of parchment, on which were written four passages of Scripture (Ex. xiii. 2-10, 11-17; Deut. vi. 4-9, 13-22) in an ink prepared for the purpose. They were then rolled up in a case (תֵּיבָה) of black calfskin, which was attached to a stiffer piece of leather, having a thong one finger broad, and one and a half cubits long. "They were placed at the bend of the left arm; and after the thong had made a little knot in the shape of the letter ψ , it was wound about the arm in a spiral line, which ended at the top of the middle finger." This was called "the Tephillah on the arm," and the leather case contained only one cell, the passages being written on a single piece of parchment, with thin lines ruled between (Godwin, Mos. & Aar. 1, ch. x. 2159). Those worn on the forehead were written on four strips of parchment (which might not be of any hide except cow's hide, Nork. Brann. und Rabb. p. 211; cp. Hesych. s. v. Σκνυρική ἐπικουρία), and put into four little cells within a square case, on which the letter ψ was written; the three points of the ψ being "an emblem of the heavenly Father's, Jehovah, our Lord Jehovah" (Zohar, fol. 54, col. 2). The square had two thongs (תְּפִלִּין), on which Hebrew letters were inscribed; these were passed round the head, and after making a knot in the shape of η passed over the breast. This phylactery was called "the Tephillah on the head," and was worn in the centre of the forehead (Leo of Modena, Ceremonies of the Jews, i. 11, n. 4; Calmet, s. v. Phylactery; Otho, Lex. Rabbin. p. 656).

The derivation of תְּפִלִּין is uncertain. Genesis derives it by contraction from תְּפִלָּה (Gen. p. 548). The Rabbinic name תְּפִלִּין comes from תְּפִלָּה, "a prayer," because they were worn during prayer, and were supposed to testify the sincerity of the worshipper; hence they were bound on the left wrist (Gem. Eruvin. 95, 2; Otho, l. c.; Buxt. Lex. Talm. s. v.). In Matt. xxiii. 5, only, they are called φυλακτήρια, either because they tended to promote observance of the Law (ἀεὶ μνημὴν ἐχειν τοῦ Θεοῦ, Iust. Mart. Dial. c. Tryph. p. 205, for which reason Luther happily renders the word by Leibzettel), or from the use of them as amulets (Lat. præcōia, Gk. περίπαιτα, Grotius ad Matt. xxiii. 5). Φυλακτήριον is the ordinary Greek word for an amulet (Plut. ii. 378 B, where φάλαξ = the Roman bullā), and is used apparently with this meaning by a Greek translator (Ezek.

xiii. 18) for תְּפִלִּין, cushions (Rosenmüller, Schol. ad loc. i.; Schleusner, Lex. in N. T.). That phylacteries were used as amulets is certain, and was very natural (Targ. ad Cant. viii. 3; Bartolocci, Bibl. Rab. i. 576; Winer, s. vv. Amulette, Phylakterien). Jerome (on Matt. xxiii. 5) says that they were thus used in his day by the Babylonians, Persians, and Indians, and condemns certain Christian "mulierculæ" for similarly using the Gospels ("parvula evangelia," βιβλία μικρά, Chrys.) as περίμματα, especially the Proem. to St. John (cp. Chrysost. Hom. in Matt. 73). The Koran and other sacred books are applied to the same purpose to this day (Hottinger, Hist. Orient. i. 8, p. 301; de nummis Orient. xvii. sq. "The most esteemed of all Hhegabs is a Mooshaf, or copy of the Koran," Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 338). Scaliger even supposes that phylacteries were designed to supersede those amulets, the use of which had been already learnt by the Israelites in Egypt. [AMULETS.] There was a spurious book called Phylact. Angelorum, where Pope Gelasius evidently understood the word to mean "amulets," for he remarks that Phylacteria ought rather to be ascribed to devils. In this sense they were expressly forbidden by Pope Gregory ("Si quis . . . phylacteris usus fuerit, anathema sit," Sixt. Senensis, Bibl. Sanct. p. 92; cp. Can. 36, Concil. Laod.).

The LXX. rendering ἀσδέλευτα (Aquill. ἀτίνακτρα) must allude to their being tightly bound on the forehead and wrist during prayer. Petit (Var. Lectt. ii. 3) would read ἀσδέλευτα (h. e. appensa, αἰδοία ἐπὶ ἀποτροπῇ? Schleusner, Thes. s. v. ἀσδλ.), but he is amply refuted by Spencer (de Legg. Riv. iv. 2, p. 1210) and Witsius (Aegypt. ii. 9, § 11). Jerome calls them Pittaciola (al. Pictat.), a name which tolerably expresses their purpose (Forcellini, Lex. s. v.).

The expression "they make broad their phylacteries" (πλατύνουσι τὰ φυλ. αὐτῶν, Matt. xxiii. 5) refers not so much to the phylactery itself, which seems to have been of a prescribed breadth, as to the case (תְּפִלִּין) in which the parchment was kept, which the Pharisees (among their other pretentious customs, Mark vii. 3, 4; Luke v. 33, &c.) made as conspicuous as they could (Reland, Antiq. ii. 9, 15). Misled probably by the term πλατύνουσι, and by the mention of the ΠΥΨ or fringe (Num. xv. 38, κλωσμα δακύνθινον ἐπὶ τὰ κράσπεδα τῶν περυγίων, LXX.) in connexion with them, Epiphanius says that they were πλάτεια σχήματα πορφύρας, like the Roman laticlavæ, or the stripes on a dalmatic (τὰ δὲ σχήματα τῆς πορφύρας φυλακτήρια εἰδῶσαν οἱ ἠκριβωμένοι μετονομάζειν, c. Haer. i. 33; Sixt. Sen. l. c.). He says that these purple stripes were worn by the Pharisees with fringes, and four pomegranates, that no one might touch them, and hence he derives their name (Reland, Ant. ii. 9, 15). But that this is an error is clearly shown by Scaliger (Elench. Trihaer. viii. p. 66 sq.). It is said that the Pharisees wore them always, whereas the common people only used them at prayers, because they were considered to be even holier than the $\gamma\gamma\psi$, or golden plate, on the priest's tiara (Ex. xxviii. 36), since that had the sacred name once engraved, but in each of the Tephillin the tetragrammaton recurred twenty-three times (Carpzov, App. Critic. p. 196). Again the Pharisees wore the Tephillah above the elbow, but the Sadducees on the palm of the hand (Godwin, l. c.). The modern Jews only wear them at morning prayers, and sometimes at noon (Leo of Modena, l. c.).

In our Lord's time they were worn by all Jews, except the Karaites, women, and slaves. Boys, when (at the age of thirteen years and a day) they became בני מצוות (sons of the commandments), were bound to wear them (Baba Berac. fol. 22, 1, in Glossa), and therefore they may have been used even by our Lord, as He merely discountenanced their abuse. The suggestion was made by Scaliger (l. c.), and led to a somewhat idle controversy. Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. xxiii. 5) and Otho (Lex. Rab. p. 656) agree with Scaliger, but Carpzov (l. c.) and others strongly deny it, from a belief that the entire use of phylacteries arose from an error.

The Karaites explained Deut. vi. 8, Ex. xiii. 9, &c., as a figurative command to remember the Law (Reland, Ant. p. 132), as is certainly the case in similar passages (Prov. iii. 3, vi. 21, vii. 3; Cant. viii. 6, &c.). It seems clear to us that the scope of these injunctions favours the Karaite interpretation, and in Ex. xiii. 9 the word is not כַּתְּמוּלֹת, but כְּרִיזָה, "a memorial" (Gerhardus on Deut. vi. 8; Eduardus on Berachoth, i. 209; Heidanus, de Orig. Erroris, viii. B. 6; Schöttgen, Hor. Hebr. i. 199; Rosenmüller, ad loc.; Hengstenberg, Pent. i. 458). Considering too the nature of the passages inscribed on the phylacteries (by no means the most important in the Pentateuch—for the Fathers are mistaken in saying that the Decalogue was used in this way, Jer. l. c.; Chrysost. l. c.; Theophyl. ad Matt. xxiii. 5), and the fact that we have no trace whatever of their use before the Exile (during which time the Jews probably learnt the practice of wearing them from the Babylonians), we have no doubt that the object of the precepts (Deut. vi. 8; Ex. xii. 9) was to impress on the minds of the people the necessity of remembering the Law. But the figurative language in which this duty was urged upon them was mistaken for a literal command. An additional argument against the literal interpretation of the direction is the dangerous abuse to which it was immediately liable. Indeed such an observance would defeat the supposed intention of it, by substituting an outward ceremony for an inward remembrance. We have a specimen of this in the curious literalism of Kimchi's Comment on Ps. i. 2. Starting the objection that it is impossible to meditate in God's law day and night, because of sleep, domestic cares, &c., he answers that for the fulfilment of the text it is sufficient to wear Tephillin!

In spite of these considerations, Justin (Dial. c. Tryph. l. c.), Chrysostom, Euthymius, Theophylact, and many moderns (Baumgarten, Comm. i. 479; Winer, s. v. Phylact.) prefer the literal meaning. It rests therefore with them to account for the entire absence of all allusion to phylacteries in the O. T. The passages in Proverbs (c. supra) contain no such reference, and in Ezek. xxiv. 17 מִצְוֹת means not a Phylactery

(as Rashi says), but a turban. [CROWNS.] (Ges. Thes. p. 1089.)

The Rabbis have many rules about their use. They were not worn on Sabbaths or other sacred days, because those days were themselves a sign or pledge (תּוֹמָה), and required no further memorial (Zohar, f. 236; Reland, l. c.). They must be read standing in the morning (when blue can be distinguished from green), but in the evening (at sunset) they might be read sitting. In times of persecution a red thread was worn instead (Munster, de Praec. affirm.; cp. Josh. ii. 18). Both hands were to be used, if possible, in writing them. The leather must have no hole in it. A single blot did not signify if an uneducated boy could read the word. At the top of the parchment no more room must be left than would suffice for the letter ל, but at the bottom there might be room even for פ or ט. A man, when wearing the Tephillin, must not approach within four cubits of a cemetery (Sixt. Senensis, l. c.). He who has a taste for further frivolities (which yet are deeply interesting as illustrative of a priestly superstition) may find them in Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. ad loc.), Schöttgen, Otho (Lex. Rab. s. v.), and in the Mishna—especially in the treatise called Rosh Hashanah (see, too, Bab. Berachoth, f. 7a, &c., in Schwabe, pp. 17, 98, 247, &c.).

The Rabbis even declared that God wore them, arguing from Is. lxiii. 8, Deut. xxxiii. 2; cp. Is. xlix. 16. Perhaps this was a pious fraud to inculcate their use; or it may have had some mystic meaning (Zohar, pt. ii. fol. 2; Carpzov, l. c.).

Josephus gives their general significance (Ant. iv. 8, § 13, ὡς περιβεβητοὶ πανταχόθεν τὸ ἐπὶ αὐτοὺς πρόσθιον τοῦ Θεοῦ). They were supposed to save from the Devil (Targ. ad Cant. viii. 3) and from sin (Hottinger, Jur. Hebr. Leg. xx. p. 29), and they were used for oaths; but the Rabbis disapproved the application of them to charm wounds, or lull children to sleep (Id. Leg. 253; Maimon. de Idol. ii.). He who wore them was supposed to prolong his days (Is. xxxviii. 16), but he who did not was doomed to perdition, since he thereby broke eight affirmative precepts (Maimon. Tephil. iv. 26).

On the analogous practice alluded to in Rev. xiii. 16, xiv. 1, see FOREHEAD.

FULLER (מְלָךְ, from מְלָךְ, to tread, Ges. p. 657; γαφεύς; fullo). The trade of the fullers, so far as it is mentioned in Scripture, appears to have consisted chiefly in cleansing garments and whitening them. The use of white garments, and also the feeling respecting their use for festal and religious purposes, may be gathered from the following passages:—

 Eccles. ix. 8; Dan. vii. 9; Is. lxiv. 6; Zech. iii. 3, 5; 2 Sam. vi. 14; 1 Ch. xv. 27; Mark ix. 3; Rev. iv. 4, vii. 11, vii. 9; Mishna Taanith, iv. 8: see also Stat. Silo. i. 2, 237; Ovid, Fast. i. 79; Claudian, de Laud. Stil. iii. 289. This branch of the trade was perhaps exercised by other persons than those who carded the wool and smoothed the cloth when woven (Mishna Bava Kama, i.; x. 10). In applying the marks used to distinguish cloths sent to be cleansed, fullers were desired to be careful to avoid the mixtures forbidden by the Law (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11; Mishna Gilaim, ix. 10).

The process of fulling or cleansing cloth, so far as it may be gathered from the practice of other nations, consisted in treading on the garments with the feet or beating with bats in tubs of water, in which some alkaline substance answering the purpose of soap had been dissolved (Ges. Thes. p. 1261, מלח); Beckmann, Hist. of Inventions, ii. 94, 95, Bohn). The substances used for this purpose which are mentioned in Scripture are מלח; nitre, νίτρον, nitrum (Ges. p. 930; Prov. xxv. 20; Jer. ii. 22), and מלח צלעה, soap, rola, herba fullonum, herba borith (Ges. p. 246; Mal. iii. 2). Nitre is found in Egypt and in Syria, and vegetable alkali was also obtained there from the ashes of certain plants, probably Salsola kali (Ges. p. 246; Plin. xxxi. 10, 46; Hasselquist, p. 275; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 214). The juice also of some saponaceous plant, perhaps Gypsophila struthium, or Saponaria officinalis, was sometimes mixed with the water for the like purpose, and may thus be regarded as representing the soap of Scripture. Other substances also are mentioned as being employed in cleansing, which, together with alkali, seem to identify the Jewish with the Roman process, as urine and chalk, Creta cimolia, and bean-water, i.e. bean-meal mixed with water (Mishna, Shabb. ix. 5; Niddah, ix. 6). Urine, both of men and of animals, was regularly collected at Rome for cleansing cloths (Plin. H. N. xxxviii. 6, 8; Athen. xi. p. 484; Mart. ix. 93; Plautus, Asin. v. 2, 57), and it seems not improbable that its use in the fullers' trade at Jerusalem may have suggested the coarse taunt of Rabshakeh, during his interview with the deputies of Hezekiah in the highway of the fullers' field (2 K. xviii. 27), but Schoettgen thinks it doubtful whether the Jews made use of it in fulling (Antiq. full. § 9). The process of whitening garments was performed by rubbing into them chalk or earth of some kind. Creta cimolia (cimolite) was probably the earth most frequently used. The whitest sort of earth for this purpose is a white potter's clay or marl, with which the poor at Rome rubbed their clothes on festival days to make them appear brighter (Plin. xxxi. 10, § 118; xxxv. 17). Sulphur, which was used at Rome for discharging positive colour, was abundant in some parts of Palestine, but there is no evidence to show that it was used in the fullers' trade.

Egyptian Fullers.

The trade of the fullers, which in Egypt was carried on both by men and women, as causing offensive smells, and also as requiring space for drying cloths, appears to have been carried on at Jerusalem outside the city; and from them a field, a monument, and also a spring (Enrogel), derived their names (Jer. ii. 22; Beckmann, Hist. of Inv. ii. 92, 106, Bohn; Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiq., art. Fullo; Winer, s. v. Walker; Wilkinson, ii. 106 [1878]; Saalschütz, i. 3, 14, 32, ii. 14, 6; Schoettgen, Antiq. fullonicae). [HANDICRAFT.] [H. W. P.]

FULLER'S FIELD, THE (שַׁרְה כּוֹסִים; ἀγρός τοῦ γναφέως, or κναφέως; ager fullonis), a spot near Jerusalem (2 K. xviii. 17; Is. xxxvi. 2, vii. 3), so close to the walls that a person speaking from there could be heard on them (2 K. xviii. 17, 26). It is only incidentally mentioned in these passages, as giving its name to a "highway" (מִסְלָה) = an embanked road, Ges. Thes. p. 957 b), "in" (בְּ) or "on" (עַל, A. V. "in"), which highway was the "conduit of the upper pool." The "end" (קֵץ) of the conduit, whatever that was, appears to have been close to the road (Is. vii. 3). One resort of the fullers of Jerusalem would seem to have been below the city on the south-east side. [EN-ROGEL.] But Rabshakeh and his "great host" can hardly have approached in that direction. They must have come from the north—the only accessible side for any body of people—as is certainly indicated by the route traced in Is. x. 28–32 [GIBEAH]; and the fuller's field was therefore, to judge from this circumstance, on the table-land on the northern side of the city. The "pool" and the "conduit" would be sufficient reasons for the presence of the fullers.

The fuller's Monument, mentioned by Josephus (B. J. v. 4, § 2) as being near the N.E. corner of the third wall, was possibly connected with the fuller's field. The only known conduit on the N. side of the city is that, undoubtedly a very ancient one, which entered the city to the E. of the Damascus Gate, and in close proximity to it must have been the fuller's field.

In considering the nature of this spot, it should be borne in mind that Sadeh, "field," is a term almost invariably confined to cultivated arable land, as opposed to unreclaimed ground. [JERUSALEM.] [G.] [W.]

FUNERALS. [BURIAL.]

FURLONG. [MEASURES.]

FURNACE. Various kinds of furnaces are noticed in the Bible. (1.) חִירָה is so translated in the A. V. in Gen. xv. 17; Is. xxxi. 9; Neh. iii. 11, xii. 38. Generally the word applies to the baker's oven, which is described under BREAD, and some think that the "tower of the furnaces" in Neh. should be rendered "tower of the ovens." In Gen. xv. and Is. xxxi. it is used in a more general sense. (2.) חִירָה , a smelting or calcining furnace (Gen. xix. 28; Ex. ix. 8, 10, xix. 18), especially a lime-kiln, the use of which was evidently well known to the Hebrews (Is. xxxiii. 12; Amos ii. 1). (3.) חִירָה , a refining furnace (Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; Ezek. xxii.

Furnace.—An Egyptian blowing the fire for melting gold. (Wilkinson.)

18 sq.), metaphorically applied to a state of trial (Deut. iv. 20; 1 K. viii. 51; Is. xlvi. 10; Jer. xi. 4). The form of it was probably similar to the one used in Egypt, which is figured above.

The Egyptian Potter's Furnace. (Wilkinson.)

(4.) חִירָה , a large furnace built like a brick-kiln, with an opening at the top to cast in the materials (Dan. iii. 22, 23), with a door on the ground by which the metal might be extracted (r. 26). The Roman forax, as represented in Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. s. n., gives an idea of the Persian Attun. The Babylonians and Persians were in the habit of using the furnace as a means of inflicting capital punishment (Dan. l. c.; Jer. xxix. 22; 2 Macc. vii. 5; Hos. vii. 7). A parallel case is mentioned by Chardin (Voyage en Perse, iv. 276), two ovens having been kept ready heated for a whole month to throw in any corn-dealers who raised the price of corn. (5.) The potter's furnace (Ecclus. xxvii. 5; xxxviii. 30), which resembles a chimney in shape, and was about five or six feet high, as represented above. (6.) The blacksmith's furnace (Ecclus. xxxviii. 28). The Greek $\kappa\alpha\mu\omega\varsigma$, which is applied to the two latter, also describes the calcining furnace (Xen. Vectig. iv. 49). It is metaphorically used in the N. T. in this sense (Rev. i. 15, ix. 2), and in Matt. xiii. 42 with an especial reference to Dan. iii. 6. [W. L. B.]

G

GA'AL (גַּאֵל) = a graft [Ges.] or loathing [al.]:

B. var. גַּאֵל , גַּאֵל , גַּאֵל ; A. גַּאֵל , גַּאֵל ; Joseph. גַּאֵל : Gaal, son of Ebed, aided the Shechemites in their rebellion against Abimelech (Judg. ix.; Joseph. Ant. v. 7, §§ 3, 4). He does not seem to have been a native of Shechem, nor specially interested in the revolution, but rather one of a class of condottieri, who at such a period of anarchy would be willing to sell their services to the highest bidder. Josephus calls him $\tau\iota\varsigma\ \tau\omega\upsilon\upsilon\ \alpha\rho\chi\acute{o}\nu\tau\omega\upsilon$, a term which scarcely designates any special office, as in the case of Zebul ($\tau\acute{\omega}\nu\ \Sigma\iota\kappa\iota\mu\iota\acute{o}\tau\omega\upsilon\ \xi\rho\chi\omega\upsilon$, Joseph. l. c.): more probably it has reference to the headship of his family (Judg. ix. 26; Joseph. l. c.), and the command of a body of men-at-arms, who seem to have been permanently attached to his service ($\sigma\upsilon\upsilon\upsilon\ \delta\epsilon\alpha\lambda\tau\alpha\iota\varsigma\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \sigma\upsilon\gamma\gamma\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\iota$, Joseph.). His appeal to ante-Israelitish traditions (Judg. ix. 28), together with the re-establishment of idolatry at Shechem, shows that the movement in which he took part was a reactionary one, and proceeded upon the principle of a combination of the aborigines with the idolatrous Israelites against the iconoclastic family of Gideon as represented by Abimelech. The ambitious designs of Gaal, who seems to have aspired to the supreme command, awakened the jealousy of Zebul, who recalled Abimelech, and procured the expulsion of Gaal from the city upon a charge of cowardice. [T. E. B.]

GA'ASH (גַּאֵשׁ) = spur: B. גַּאֵשׁ , A. גַּאֵשׁ ; Josh. xxiv. 30; Gaas). On the north side of "the hill of Gaash" (accurately, as in R. V., "mountain of G." גַּאֵשׁ), in the district of "mount Ephraim," was Timnath-serah, or Timnath-heres, the city which at his request was given by the nation to Joshua; where he resided, and where at last he was buried (Josh. xxiv. 30; Judg. ii. 9; cp. Josh. xix. 49, 50). We only hear of it again incidentally as the native place of one of David's guard, "Hiddai, or Hurai, of the brooks (the torrent-beds or wadya, גַּאֵשׁ) of Gaash"—the "torrents of the earthquake" (2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Ch. xi. 32). By Eusebius and Jerome it is said to have been near Thamna, i. e. Tibneh, about 12 miles N.E. of Lydda (OS. p. 255, 63; cp. p. 264, 3). Its site depends on that of TIMNATH-HERES, which has been identified by some writers (see Dillmann, s. in loco) with Tibneh, and by others (Conder) with Kefr Hâris, 9 miles S.W. of Shechem. [G.] [W.] GA'BA (גַּבָּא); גַּבָּא , גַּבָּא , גַּבָּא ; Gabee, Gaboa, Geba). Pausal pronunciation of GEBÄ (R. V.). It is found in the A. V. in

Josh. xviii. 24; Ezra ii. 26; Neh. vii. 30: but in the Hebrew also in 2 Sam. v. 25; 2 K. xxiii. 8; Neh. xi. 31. [GABDES.]

GAB'BA-EL (בן גַּבְבָּאֵל, A. Γαβαήλ; Vet. Lat. Gababel [Tob. i. 1], Vulg. Gabelus). 1. An ancestor of Tobit (Tob. i. 1).

2. A poor Jew (Tob. i. 17, Vulg.) of "Rages in Media," to whom Tobias lent (sub chirographo dedit, Vulg.) ten talents of silver, which Gabael afterwards faithfully restored to Tobias in the time of Tobit's distress (Tob. i. 14, iv. 1, 20, v. 6, ix., x. 2). [GABRIAS.] [B. F. W.]

GAB'ATHA (Bagatha), Esth. xii. 1. [BIGTHAN.]

GAB'BAI (גַּבְבַּי = ? exactor of tribute; B. Γηβή [for Ν. and A. see Swete's text]; Gebbar), apparently the head of an important family of Benjamin resident at Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 8).

GAB'BATHA (Γαββαθᾶ; Gabbatha). The Hebrew or Chaldee appellation of a place also called "Pavement" (λιθόστρωτον), where the judgment-seat or bema (βῆμα) was planted, from his place on which Pilate delivered our Lord to death (John xix. 13). The name, and the incident which leads to the mention of the name, occur nowhere but in this passage of St. John. The place was outside the praetorium (A. V. "judgment-hall," R. V. "palace"), for Pilate brought Jesus forth from thence to it.

It is suggested by Lightfoot (Exerc. on St. John in loc) that the word is derived from גַּב, "a surface," in which case Gabbatha would be a mere translation of λιθόστρωτον. There was a room in the Temple in which the Sanhedrin sat, and which was called Gazith (see Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, ii. 553), because it was paved with smooth and square flags (גַּזִּית); and Lightfoot conjectures that Pilate may on this occasion have delivered his judgment in that room. But this is not consistent with the practice of St. John, who in other instances gives the Hebrew name as that properly belonging to the place, not as a mere translation of a Greek one. Besides, Pilate evidently spoke from the bema—the regular seat of justice—and this in an important place like Jerusalem would be a fixed spot, and that spot not within the Temple, where the Praetorium, a Roman residence with the idolatrous emblems,* could not have been. The word Gabbatha is more probably Chaldee, גַּבְבָּאֵל, from a root signifying height or roundness (see Edersheim, ii. 578, n. 2)—the root of the Hebrew word Gibeah, which is the common term in the O. T. for a bald rounded hill, or elevation of moderate height. In this case Gabbatha designated the place on which the bema was planted, or perhaps the elevated bema; and the "pavement" was possibly some mosaic or tessellated work, either forming the bema itself, or the flooring of the court immediately round it—perhaps some such work as that which we are told by Suetonius (Caesar, 46) that Julius Caesar was accustomed to carry with him on his expeditions, in order to give the bema or tribunal its conventional elevation. [G.] [W.]

GAB'DES (A. Γαβδῆς, B. Κάβδης; Gabea), 1 Esd. v. 20. In Ezra ii. 26, GABA.

GAB'RILAS (B. Γαβρίας; Ν. Γαβriel, i.e. גַּבְרִיאֵל, the man of Jehovah), according to the present text of the LXX, the brother of Gabael, the creditor of Tobit (Tob. i. 14), though in another place (Tob. iv. 20, τῷ τοῦ Γαβρία; cp. Fritzsche ad loc.) he is described as his father by E. V. (but doubtfully, the word "son" being in italics). The readings throughout are very uncertain, and in the Versions the names are strangely confused. It is an obvious correction to suppose that Γαβαήλ τῷ ἀδελφῷ τῷ Γαβρία should be read in i. 14, as is in fact suggested by Ν., Γαβήλ . . . τῷ ἀδ. τῷ Γαβriel. The misunderstanding of τῷ ἀδελφῷ (cp. Tob. i. 10, 16, &c.) naturally occasioned the omission of the article. The Old Latin has, Gabelo fratri meo filio Gabael, and in iv. 20. [B. F. W.]

GAB'RIEL (גַּבְרִיאֵל = man of God; Γαβριήλ, LXX. and N. T.). The word, which is not in itself distinctive, but merely a description of the angelic office, is used as a proper name or title of the Angel sent to Daniel (Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21), and of the Angel of the Annunciation sent to Zacharias and to the Blessed Virgin (Luke i. 19, 26). In the Targums and Chaldee paraphrase of the Old Testament, Gabriel is spoken of [Deut. xxxiv. 16] as one of the angelic ministrants at the burial of Moses, and [2 Ch. xxxii. 21] as the Angel destroying the army of Sennacherib). In the ordinary Jewish and Christian traditions he is described as one of the "four great Archangels," or as one of the "seven holy Angels who stand before God" (cp. Luke i. 19, and Rev. viii. 2). In Holy Scripture he is called simply "the Angel" and (in Dan. ix. 21) "the man Gabriel;" and he appears as the representative of the angelic nature, not in its dignity or power of contending against evil [MICHAEL], but in its ministrations of comfort and sympathy to man. Thus his mission to Daniel is to interpret in plain words the vision of the ram and the he-goat, and to comfort him after his prayer with the prophecy of the "seventy weeks." Similarly in the New Testament he is the herald of good tidings, declaring the coming of the predicted Messiah and of His forerunner. His prominent character, therefore, is that of a "man of God," a "fellow-servant" of the saints on earth; and there is a corresponding simplicity, and absence of all terror and mystery, in his communications to men, though the vision of him inspired special awe. It may be noted that the Koran, imitating in this respect our Holy Scripture, makes him the special medium of Divine revelation to Mahomet, and so a kind of patron-Angel of Islam. [A. B.]

GAD (גַּד; Γάδ, Joseph. Γάδας; Gad), Jacob's seventh son, the first-born of Zilpah, Leah's maid, and whole-brother to Asher (Gen. xxx. 11–13; xlv. 16, 18). (a) The passage in which the bestowal of the name of Gad is preserved—like the others, an exclamation on his birth—is more than usually obscure: "And Leah said, Fortunate! (R. V.; be gad, גַּד), and she called his name Gad" (Gen. xxx. 11). Such is supposed to be the meaning of the old text of the passage (the Kethib): so it stood at the time of the LXX., who render the key-word by ἐν τύχη; in which they are followed by Jerome in the Vulgate, felicitate, and by most modern commentators.* But in the marginal emendations of the Masorites (the Keri) the word is given גַּד נְסֵי, "Gad comes" (A. V. "a troop cometh"). This construction is adopted by the ancient Versions of Onkelos, Aquila (ἤλθεν ἡ ζώσις), and Symmachus (ἤλθεν Γάδ). (b) In the blessing of Jacob, however, we find the name played upon in a different manner: "Gad" is here taken as meaning a marauding band or troop (the term constantly used for which is gedūd, גִּדּוּד), and the allusion—the turns of which it is impossible adequately to convey in English—would seem to be to the irregular life of predatory warfare which would be pursued by the tribe after their settlement on the borders of the Promised Land. "Gad, a plundering troop (gedūd) shall plunder him (ya-gūdenū), but he will plunder (ya-gūd) at their heels" (Gen. xlix. 19). A. V. renders the words, "Gad, a troop shall overcome him; but he shall overcome at the last." The R. V. is, "Gad, a troop shall press upon him, but he shall press upon their heel." (c) The force here lent to the name has been by some partially transferred to the narrative of Gen. xxx., e.g. the Samaritan Version, the Veneto-Greek, and our own A. V.; but it must not be overlooked that the word gedūd—by which it is here sought to interpret the gad of Gen. xxx. 11—possessed its own special signification of turbulence and fierceness, which makes it hardly applicable to children in the sense of a number or crowd, the image suggested by the A. V. Exactly as the turns of Jacob's language apply to the characteristics of the tribe, it does not appear that there is any connexion between his allusions and those in the exclamation of Leah. The key to the latter is probably lost. To suppose that Leah was invoking some ancient divinity, the god Fortune, who is conjectured to be once alluded to—and only once—in the so-called later part of the Book of Isaiah, under the title of Gad (Is. lxxv. 11; A. V. "that troop," R. V. "Fortune;" Ges., "dem Glück"), is by some considered a poor explanation, by others not improbable in an Aramaean.

Of the childhood and life of the individual GAD nothing is preserved. At the time of the descent into Egypt seven sons are ascribed to him, remarkable from the fact that a majority of their names have plural terminations, as if those of families rather than persons (Gen. xli. 16). The list, with a slight variation, is again given on the occasion of the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. xxvi. 15–18). [AROD; EZBON;

* In his Quaest. in Genesim, Jerome has in fortuna. Josephus (Ant. i. 19, § 5) gives it a still different turn—τυχεῖος = fortunatus.

† Jerome (De Benedict. Jacobi) interprets this of the revenge taken by the warriors of the tribe on their return from the conquest of Western Palestine, for the incursions of the desert tribes during their absence.

[OZNI.] The position of Gad during the march to the Promised Land was on the south side of the Tabernacle (Num. ii. 14). The leader of the tribe at the time of the start from Sinai was Eliasaph, son of Reuel or Deuel (ii. 14, x. 20). Gad is regularly named in the various enumerations of the tribes through the wanderings—at the despatching of the spies (xiii. 15)—the numbering in the plains of Moab (xxvi. 3, 15); but the only inference we can draw is an indication of a commencing alliance with the tribe which was subsequently to be his next neighbour (see Dillmann⁶ and Delitzsch [1887] in Gen. i. c.). He has left the more closely related tribe of Asher, to take up his position next to Reuben. These two tribes also preserve a near equality in their numbers, not suffering from the fluctuations which were endured by the others. At the first census Gad had 45,650, and Reuben 48,500; at the last, Gad had 40,500, and Reuben 43,330. This alliance was doubtless induced by the similarity of their pursuits. Of all the sons of Jacob these two tribes alone returned to the land which their forefathers had left five hundred years before, with their occupations unchanged. "The trade of thy slaves hath been about cattle from our youth even till now"—"we are shepherds, both we and our fathers" (Gen. xli. 34, xli. 4)—such was the account which the Patriarchs gave of themselves to Pharaoh. The civilisation and the persecutions of Egypt had worked a change in the habits of most of the tribes, but Reuben and Gad remained faithful to the pastoral pursuits of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and at the halt on the east of Jordan we find them coming forward to Moses with the representation that they "have cattle"—"a great multitude of cattle"—and the land where they now are is a "place for cattle." What should they do in the close precincts of the country west of Jordan with all their flocks and herds? Wherefore let this land, they pray, be given them for a possession, and let them not be brought over Jordan (Num. xxxii. 1–5). They did not, however, attempt to evade taking their proper share of the difficulties of subduing the land of Canaan; and after that task had been effected, and the apportionment amongst the nine and a half tribes completed "at the doorway of the tabernacle of the congregation in Shiloh, before Jehovah," they were dismissed by Joshua "to their tents," to their "wives, their little ones, and their cattle," which they had left behind them in Gilead. To their tents they went—to the dangers and delights of the free Bedawi life in which they had elected to remain, and in which—a few partial glimpses excepted—the later history allows them to remain hidden from view.

The country allotted to Gad formed the northern portion of the kingdom of Sihon, king of the Amorites. This kingdom, which was divided between Reuben and Gad, lay east of Jordan, and comprised all the hill-country from the Arnon, Wādy Mojib, to the Jabbok, Wādy ez-Zerka, and the whole of the Jordan valley to the east of the river from the Salt Sea to the Sea of Chinnereth, or Gennesaret (Deut. iii. 12–17; Josh. xii. 2, 3; xiii. 27). North of the Jabbok⁶ was the kingdom of Og, which was allotted to the half tribe of Manasseh, and the boundary between the two Amorite kingdoms thus became the common frontier between Gad and Manasseh. The possessions of Gad commenced at or near Heshbon (Josh. xiii. 26). They embraced "half the hill country of Gilead" (Deut. iii. 12), or "half the land of the children of Ammon" (Josh. xiii. 25); and included the ancient sanctuary of Mahanaim. On the east the furthest landmark given is "Aroer, that faces Rabbah," the present 'Ammán (Josh. xiii. 25). West was the Jordan (v. 27). The territory thus consisted of two comparatively separate and independent parts—(1) the high land, on the general level of the country east of Jordan; and (2) the sunk valley of the Jordan itself—the former stopping short at the Jabbok; the latter occupying the whole of the great valley on the east side of the river, and extending up to the very sea of Chinnereth, or Gennesaret, itself.

The territory of Gad has been well described as a "combination of rich arable and pasture lands with fine forests" (Oliphant, Land of Gilead, p. 223), as "park-like and beautiful," and as "offering the most attractive combination of soil, climate, and scenery" (p. 197). The undulating downs clothed with rich grass, on the east, are pre-eminently a "land for cattle" (Num. xxxii. 4). The broken country on the west above the Jordan is very picturesque, and "most beautifully varied with hanging woods, mostly of the vallonias oak, laurestinus, cedar, common arbutus, Arbutus

andrachne, &c. At times the country had all the appearance of a noble park" (Irby, p. 147). It is also a land of rivers and springs, and the gorges through which the streams find their way from the plateau to the Jordan valley are of great beauty. "Clear brooks are running between lawns of turf, or breaking in falls over high precipices, hung with brambles and green with fern: thick oak woods of most English character climb the slopes and here and there crown a white chalk-cliff" (Conder, Heth and Moab, p. 163). The highest point, Jebel Osh'a, is 3,597 ft., and the level of the plateau is from 2,500 ft. to 3,000 ft. above the sea. [GILEAD.]

Such was the territory allotted to the Gadites: but there is no doubt that they soon extended themselves beyond these limits. The official records of the reign of Jotham of Judah (1 Ch.

v. 11, 16) show them to have been at that time established over the whole of Gilead, and in possession of Bashan as far as Salcah—the modern Sülkhad, a town at the eastern extremity of the noble plain of the Haurán—and very far both to the north and the east of the border given them originally, while the Manassites were pushed still further northwards to Mount Hermon (1 Ch. v. 23). They soon became identified with Gilead—that name so memorable in the earliest history of the nation; and in many of the earlier records it superseded the name of Gad, as we have already remarked it did that of Bashan. In the Song of Deborah "Gilead" is said to have "abode beyond Jordan" (Judg. v. 17). Jephthah appears to have been a Gadite, a native of Mizpeh (Judg. xi. 34; cp. v. 31, and Josh. xiii. 26), and yet he is always designated "the Gileadite;" and so also with Barzillai of Mahanaim (2 Sam. xvii. 17; Ezra ii. 61: cp. Josh. xiii. 26).

The character of the tribe is throughout strongly marked—fierce and warlike—"strong men of might, men of war for the battle, that could handle shield and buckler, their faces the faces of lions, and like roes upon the mountains for swiftness." Such is the graphic description given of those eleven heroes of Gad—"the least of them more than equal to a hundred, and the greatest to a thousand"—who joined their fortunes to David at the time of his greatest discredit and embarrassment (1 Ch. xii. 8), undeterred by the natural difficulties of a "flood and field" which stood in their way. Surrounded, as they were, by Ammonites, Midianites, Hagarites, "Children of the East," and all the other countless tribes, animated by a common hostility to the strangers whose coming had dispossessed them of their fairest districts, the warlike propensities of the tribe must have had many opportunities of exercise. One of its great engagements is related in 1 Ch. v. 19-22. Here their opponents were the wandering Ishmaelite tribes of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab (cp. Gen. xxv. 15), nomad people, possessed of an enormous wealth in camels, sheep, and asses, to this day the characteristic possessions of their Bedawi successors. This immense booty came into the hands of the conquerors, who seem to have entered with it on the former mode of life of their victims: probably pushed their way further into the eastern wilderness in the "steads" of these Hagarites. Another of these encounters is contained in the history of Jephthah, but this latter story develops elements of a different nature and a higher order than the mere fierceness necessary to repel the attacks of the plunderers of the desert. In the behaviour of Jephthah, throughout that affecting history, there are traces of a spirit which we may almost call chivalresque: the high tone taken with the Elders of Gilead, the noble but fruitless expostulation with the king of Ammon before the attack, the hasty vow, the overwhelming grief, and yet the persistent devotion of purpose, surely in all these there are marks of a great nobility of character, which must have been more or less characteristic of the Gadites in general. If to this we add the loyalty, the generosity, and the delicacy of Barzillai (2 Sam. xix. 32-39), we obtain a very high idea of the tribe at whose head were such men as these. Nor must we, while enumerating the worthies of Gad, forget that in all probability Elijah the Tishbite, "who was of the inhabitants of Gilead," was one of them.

But while exhibiting these high personal qualities, Gad appears to have been wanting in the powers necessary to enable the tribe to take any active or leading part in the confederacy of the nation. The warriors who rendered such assistance to David might, when Ishbosheth set up his court at Mahanaim as king of Israel, have done much towards affirming his rights. Had Abner made choice of Shechem or Shiloh instead of Mahanaim—the quick, explosive Ephraim instead of the unready Gad—who can doubt that the troubles of David's reign would have been immensely increased, perhaps the establishment of the northern kingdom antedated by nearly a century? David's presence at the same city during his flight from Absalom produced no effect on the tribe, and they are not mentioned as having taken any part in the quarrels between Ephraim and Judah.

Cut off as Gad was by position and circumstances from its brethren on the west of Jordan, it still retained some connexion with them. We may infer that it was considered as belonging to the northern kingdom—"Know ye not," says Ahab in Samaria, "know ye not that Ramoth in Gilead is ours, and we be still, and take it not out of the hand of the king of Syria?" (1 K. xxii. 3). The territory of Gad was the battlefield on which the long and fierce struggles of Syria and Israel were fought out, and, as an agricultural pastoral country, it must have suffered severely in consequence (2 K. xx. 33). The "men of Gad" are supposed to be noticed on the Moabite Stone (l. 10; Records of the Past, New Ser. ii. 208); but it is possible that "Gad" may have another meaning in this passage.

Gad was carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch. v. 26), and in the time of Jeremiah the cities of the tribe seem to have been inhabited by the Ammonites. "Hath Israel no sons? hath he no heir? why doth Malcham (i.e. Moloch) inherit Gad, and his people dwell in his cities?" (Jer. xlix. 1). [G.] [W.]

GAD (גַּד; גַּד; Gad), "the seer" (הַחֹזֵן), or "the king's seer," i.e. David's—such appears to have been his official title (1 Ch. xxix. 29; 2 Ch. xxix. 25; 2 Sam. xxiv. 11; 1 Ch. xxi. 9)—was "a prophet" (נָבִיא), who appears to have joined David when in "the hold," and at whose advice David quitted it for the forest of Hareth (1 Sam. xxii. 5). Whether he remained with David during his wanderings is not to be ascertained: we do not again encounter him till late in the life of the king, when he reappears in connexion with the punishment inflicted for the numbering of the people (2 Sam. xxiv. 11-19; 1 Ch. xxi. 9-19). But he was evidently attached to the royal establishment at Jerusalem, for he wrote a book of the Acts of David (1 Ch. xxix. 29), and also assisted in settling the arrangements for the musical service of the "house of God," by which his name was handed down to times long after his own (2 Ch. xxix. 25). In the abruptness of his introduction Gad has been compared with Elijah (Jerome, Qu. Hebr. on 1 Sam. xxii. 5), with whom he may have been of the same tribe, if his name can be taken as denoting his parentage, but this is unsupported by any evidence. Nor is there any apparent ground for Ewald's suggestion (Gesch. iii. 116) that he was of the school of Samuel. If this could be made out, it would afford a natural reason for his joining David. [G.] [W.]

GAD (גַּד; δαίμόνιον, ἢ δαίμων; Fortuna). Properly "the Gad," with the article. In the A. V. of Is. lxx. 11 the clause "that prepare a table for that troop" has in the margin instead of the last word the proper name Gad, which evidently denotes some idol (cp. the second clause where the A. V. text "number" is in marg. Μερί, and in R. V. "Destiny"). That Gad was the deity Fortune, under whatever outward form it was worshipped, is supported by the etymology, by the common assent of commentators, and by the R. V. It is evidently connected with the Syriac ܓܕܐ, gādō, "fortune, luck," and with the Arabic ܓܕ, jad, "good fortune," and Gesenius is probably right in his conjecture that Gad was the planet Jupiter, which was regarded by the astrologers of the East (Pococke, Spec. Hist. Ar. p. 130) as the star of greater good fortune. The name appears frequently in Phoenician (e.g. ܓܕܢܗܘ) and Palmyrene (e.g. ܓܕܢܗܘ) inscriptions (see MV.¹¹; Bähgen, Beiträge z. Semit. Religionsgeschichte, p. 77); and a trace of the Syrian worship of Gad is to be found in the exclamation of Leah, when Zilpah bare a son (Gen. xxx. 11; ܓܕ, begād [LXX. ἐν τύχῃ], the Kethib reading now generally preferred to the Keri ܓܕ, "Gad, or good fortune cometh"). The Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum both render "a lucky planet cometh," and testimony to the worship of Gad among the ancient Canaanites is furnished by the names Baal-Gad, Migdal-Gad. The name is not Babylonian, however identical the worship of Gad and Bel is, by some, thought to have been. Buxtorf (Lex. Talm. s. v.) reports the ancient custom for each man to have in his house a splendid couch, which was not used, but was set apart for "the prince of the house;" that is, for the star or constellation Fortune, to render it more propitious. This couch was called the couch of Gada, or good-luck (Talm. Babl. Sanhed. f. 20 a; Nedarim, f. 56 a). Again in Bereshith Rabba, p. 65, the words ܓܕ ܕܒܝ, in Gen. xxvii. 31 are explained as an invocation to Gada or Fortune. Rabbi Moses the Priest, quoted by Aben Ezra (on Gen. xxx. 11), says "that ܓܕ (Is. lxx. 11) signifies the star of luck, which points to everything that is good; for thus is the language of Kedar (Arabic): but he says that ܓܕ ܕܒܝ (Gen. xxx. 11) is not used in the same sense."

Illustrations of the ancient custom of lectisteria (cp. Jer. vii. 18, li. 44) or the placing a banqueting table in honour of idols will be found in the table spread for the sun among the Ethiopians (Her. iii. 17, 18), and in the feast made by the Babylonians for their god Bel, which is described in the Apocryphal history of Bel and the Dragon, v. 3 (cp. also Her. i. 181, &c., and the fact as attested by Nebuchadnezzar; see Speaker's Comm. on Bel and the Dragon, v. 3). The table in the temple of Belus is described by Diodorus Siculus (ii. 9) as being of beaten gold, 40 feet long, 15 wide, and weighing 500 talents. On it were placed two drinking cups (κρατήρια) weighing 30 talents, two censers of 300 talents each, and three golden goblets, that of Jupiter or Bel weighing 1200 Babylonian talents. The couch and table of the god in the temple of Zeus Triphylus at Patara in the island of Panthaea are mentioned by Diodorus (v. 46). Cp. also Virg. Aen. ii. 763:

"Huc undique Troia gaza

Incensis erepta adytis, mensaeque deorum
Crateresque auro solidi, captivaeque vestis Congeritur."

Other, now obsolete, opinions upon Gad may be seen in the first edition of this Dictionary. See the commentaries on Isaiah (l. c.) by Delitzsch⁴ and Dillmann,⁵ and the monographs noted there and by Baudissin in Herzog's *RE.*² s. n. "Gad." [W. A. W.] [F.]

GAD, RIVER OF (R. V. "valley of [margin, toward; see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. in loco] Gad"), 2 Sam. xxiv. 5. From its mention in connexion with Aroer, and "the city that lieth in the midst of the river," it is evident that the river Arnon is intended. Riehm, however (HWB. s. v. Gad), identifies it with the Jabbok. [ARNON; AROER.] [W.]

GAD'ARA (Γάδαρα; Eth. Γαδαρεβς, fem. Γαδαρίς) is not mentioned in the Bible, but is evidently referred to in the expression "country of the Gadarenes," χώρα or περίχωρος τῶν Γαδαρηνῶν (Mark v. 1; Luke viii. 26, 37). The town would appear, from its name (Gadara = Geder, Gederah, Gederoth, Gedor), to have been of Jewish or earlier origin, and, according to a tradition preserved in the Mishna (Erukhin, ix. 6), it was fortified by Joshua. The first historical notice of Gadara is its surrender to Antiochus "the Great," after his victory, B.C. 198, over Scopas, the general of Ptolemy, at the sources of the Jordan (Polyb. v. 71; Josephus, Ant. xii. 3, § 3). But, like other cities in the debateable provinces of Phoenicia and Coele-Syria, it must previously have undergone many vicissitudes during the long war between the Seleucidae and the Ptolemies. It was taken from the Syrians by Alexander Jannaeus, early in his reign (B.C. 105-79), after a siege of ten months (Ant. xiii. 13, § 3; B. J. i. 4, § 2), and its inhabitants were apparently enslaved (B. J. i. 4, § 3), and compelled to accept the religion of the Jews (Ant. xiii. 15, § 4). Possibly it was the scene of Alexander's defeat by the Arabs (Ant. xiii. 13, § 5); but cp. B. J. i. 4, § 4, in which this battle is said to have taken place near Golan. Gadara remained in the possession of the Jews for many years, apparently until it was destroyed by them (B. J. i. 7, § 7) during the civil war between Aristobulus and Hyrcanus. Shortly afterwards Pompey, having taken Jerusalem (B.C. 63), rebuilt Gadara to gratify his freedman Demetrius, who was a Gadarene, and at the same time made it a free city and restored it to its own citizens. Like all the other cities to which Pompey granted self-government, and freedom and immunity from taxation, it was placed under the jurisdiction of the Governor of Syria, and counted from the era of Pompey, B.C. 64 (Ant. xiv. 4, § 4; B. J. i. 7, § 7). When Gabinius, who was Proconsul of Syria, B.C. 57-55, instituted five Sanhedrin for the government of the Jews, he seated one of them at Gadara (Ant. xiv. 5, § 4; B. J. i. 8, § 5).⁶ Augustus gave the city to Herod the Great (Ant. xv. 7, § 3), whose government does not seem to have given complete satisfaction to the Gadarenes

(Ant. xv. 10, §§ 2, 3). On Herod's death it was transferred back to Syria (Ant. xvii. 11, § 4; B. J. ii. 6, § 3).

At the very commencement of the Jewish insurrection, the Jews, enraged at the massacre of their kinsmen at Caesarea, ravaged the country round Gadara, and set fire to the villages that belonged to it. Upon this the Syrian residents put the most troublesome Jews to death, and imprisoned others (Vit. § 9; B. J. ii. 18, §§ 1, 2, 5). Not long afterwards the Gadarenes, with the people of Gabara, Sogane, and Tyre, would appear to have attacked and captured Gischala, where the Jews had declared against the Romans (Vit. § 10); and at a later period Gadara was taken by Josephus (Vit. § 15). It opened its gates to Vespasian^b when he marched against it after having crushed the insurrection in Galilee, and the people pulled down its walls to show that they desired peace (B. J. iv. 7, § 3). The coins of Gadara are autonomous and imperial; and cover the period from the year 8 (B.C. 56) to the year 303 (A.D. 239). The types are: a female head with mural crown; cornucopias; the figure of Astarte crowned; Jupiter seated in a tetrastyle temple; Hercules; Pallas; and a trirème with the legend ΓΑΔΑΡΕΩΝ ΝΑΥΜΑ. The surname Pompeiaus appears first on a coin of Antoninus; and the Naumachia must have been held either near the hot springs or on the Sea of Galilee. Several bishops of Gadara are mentioned as having been present at the General Councils of the Church: Cajanus at Nicaea, Eusebius at Antioch, Theodorus at Ephesus, &c. The Latins in the Middle Ages called the place Kedar (John of Würzburg, xxv.); and the Arab writer Dimashki (A.D. 1300) calls it Jedar, i.e. Gadara—a name which Seetzen, who discovered the ruins in the present century, found attached to the steep hillside below them.

Gadara was a strongly fortified city (Ant. xiii. 3, § 3; B. J. iv. 7, § 3); situated near the Hieromax, Gadara Hieromace præfluenta (Plin. H. N. v. 16); east of Jordan, and over against Scythopolis and Tiberias. It stood on a hill, at the foot of which, at a place called Amatha (Ἐμμαθα), 3 M. P. from the city, there were warm springs and baths (Eusebius and Jerome, *OS.*² p. 248, 11; p. 219, 78; p. 130, 15; p. 91, 26; Itin. Ant. Mart. vii.). According to the Jerusalem Talmud (Erubin, v. 7) Hamthan (Amatha) was a Sabbath day's journey from the city Josephus calls Gadara, at the time of the Jewish War, the capital of Peraea; and Polybius says that it was one of the most strongly fortified cities in the country (Joseph. B. J. iv. 7, § 3; Polyb. v. 71). It was one of the cities of Decapolis (Plin. v. 16); and had a district, called Gadarititis, under its jurisdiction, which, on the west, had a common boundary with Galilee (B. J. iii. 3, § 1; 10, § 10). This district is referred to by Strabo (xvi. 2, 45), and apparently corresponds to the "country of the Gadarenes" in the N. T. Ptolemy (v. 15) and Steph. Byz. (254) call Gadara a city of Coele-Syria; and the latter says that it once bore the names of Seleucia and Antiochia. The position of the city was one of great strategic importance, for the roads from Tiberias and Scythopolis to Damascus and Gerasa passed through it. Gadara was 16 M. P. from Scythopolis and 16 from Capitolias (Itin. Ant. ed. Wess. pp. 197, 198), 16 from Tiberias (Tab. Peut.), and 12 from Abila (*OS.*² p. 243, 8). Josephus (Vit. 65) places it 60 stadia from Tiberias, but this is evidently wrong.

Like all the other cities of Decapolis, Gadara had a mixed population. After it was rebuilt and made a free city by Pompey, the governing and wealthy classes were probably of Greek origin, whilst the greater part of the people, urban and rural, were Aramaeans, more or less Hellenised. Josephus (Ant. xvii. 11, § 4; B. J. ii. 6, § 3) calls it a Greek city, and it may be inferred from what he says that this was the cause of its re-transfer to Syria on the death of Herod. The coins bear Greek legends, and the Greek inscriptions, found on the site, contain such names as Theodoros, Pamphilos, &c. Strabo (xvi. 3) mentions several learned Greek Gadarenes: e.g. Philodemas, the Epicurean; Menippus; Theodorus, the Sophist, who was tutor to the Emperor Tiberius; Apsines, the Rhetorician, &c. There was, however, a strong Jewish element in the population, and possibly many Judaised Aramaeans. The Midrash (Ester, ch. 1, 2) speaks of a "hall of justice," perhaps that in which the Sanhedrin sat; and there is said to have been an important school at Migdal Gadar (Tal. Bab. Taanith, 2 a). According to the Talmudists, Mount Gadar was one of the physical subdivisions of the hill-country of Peraea, and the site of one of the fire signal-stations (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, pp. 40, 243). Gadara owes its celebrity to its hot springs and baths, which were reckoned second only to those at Baiae (Eunap. Sardian. ap. Reland, Palaest. p. 775), and are praised by Origen (iv. 140) and by Epiphanius (Adv. Haer. i. 131). They are mentioned in the Itinerary of Antoninus Martyr (vii.) who calls them the "Baths of Elias," and by the early Arab historians and geographers.

The ruins of Gadara, now called Umm Keis, cover a hill on the S. side of the Hieromax, Sheri'at el-Mandhūr, about 6 Eng. miles S.E. of the Sea of Galilee. The ruins include two theatres, a basilica, a temple, a fine street with a colonnade on each side, of which the columns are prostrate, the city wall and gates, an aqueduct, and other buildings. On the pavement of the main street the ruts formed by the chariot wheels can still be seen. On the eastern side of the city, the ground bears the name Jedūr Umm K̄is, and here there are numerous rock-hewn tombs, with their stone doors still swinging on their hinges, and a large number of basalt sarcophagi (for descriptions of the ruins, see Burckhardt, Syria, p. 270 sq.; Schumacher, Northern 'Ajlūn, p. 46 sq.; Wilson, Recoy. of Jerusalem, p. 373 sq.; Sepp, Jerusm. u. d. heilige Land, ii.

most ancient MSS. in these verses: \aleph . reads $\Gamma\alpha\delta\alpha\rho\eta\eta\omega\upsilon\upsilon$ in Matt., $\Gamma\epsilon\rho\sigma\eta\eta\omega\upsilon\upsilon$ in Mark, and $\Gamma\epsilon\rho\gamma\sigma\eta\eta\omega\upsilon\upsilon$ in Luke; in Matt. and Mark the readings have been altered by a later hand to agree with Luke; B., which is followed by R. V., has $\Gamma\alpha\delta\alpha\rho\eta\eta\omega\upsilon\upsilon$ in Matt. and $\Gamma\epsilon\rho\sigma\eta\eta\omega\upsilon\upsilon$ in Mark and Luke; A., which is followed by A. V., has $\Gamma\epsilon\rho\gamma\sigma\eta\eta\omega\upsilon\upsilon$ in Matt. and $\Gamma\alpha\delta\alpha\rho\eta\eta\omega\upsilon\upsilon$ in Mark and Luke. Of these readings $\Gamma\epsilon\rho\sigma\eta\eta\omega\upsilon\upsilon$ is manifestly wrong, for Gerasa is about 35 miles from the Sea of Galilee, and is never mentioned in connexion with it. The question therefore lies between Gadara and Gergesa. The miracle took place "on the other side of the sea," "over against Galilee," i.e. on the eastern shore of the lake, near the spot where Jesus and His disciples landed (Mark v. 2), in 216 sq.; Porter, Hbk. for Syr. & Pal.) About 2½ Eng. miles N. of the ruins, on the right bank of the Sheri'at el-Mandhūr, are the hot springs. The water is strongly impregnated with sulphur, and has a temperature of 110° Fahr.; its medicinal qualities are highly valued by the Bedawin. The ruins of baths and houses cover a large area (Schumacher, The Jaulān, p. 149 sq., and authorities cited above).

Tomb at Gadara.

It was in the "land of the Gadarenes" that, according to the A. V. of Mark v. 1 (R. V. "Gerasenes") and Luke viii. 26, 37 (R. V. "Gerasenes"), our Lord healed the demoniac and permitted the devils to enter into a herd of swine. In Matt. viii. 28, however, the same miracle is said (A. V.) to have been performed in the "land of the Gergesenes" (R. V. "Gadarenes"). There is a remarkable difference in the readings of the close proximity to a town, and not very far from ground sloping steeply down to the margin of the lake (Matt. viii. 32; Mark v. 13; Luke viii. 32, 33). The only place on the E. shore of the lake which fulfils these conditions is a spot near the mouth of Wādī Semakh. There are here the ruins of a town called K̄ersa, and about a mile to the south "the hills, which everywhere else on the eastern side are recessed from a half to three-quarters of a mile from the water's edge, approach within forty feet of it; they do not terminate abruptly, but there is a steep even slope" (Recoy. of Jerusalem, p. 368: cp. Macgregor, Rob Roy on the Jordan, p. 422 sq.; Thomson, Land and the Book, ed. 1869, p. 315 sq.). The pronunciation of the word K̄ersa by the Bedawin is so similar to Gergesa as to suggest its identification with that place. The word $\Gamma\epsilon\rho\gamma\sigma\eta\eta\omega\upsilon\upsilon$ seems to be the same as the Hebrew גֵּרְשָׁאִים (LXX. $\Gamma\epsilon\rho\gamma\sigma\alpha\iota\omicron\varsigma$) in Gen. xv. 21 and Deut. vii. 1—the name of an old Canaanitish tribe [GIRGASHITES], which Jerome (in Comm. ad Gen. xv.) locates on the shore of the Sea of Tiberias. Origen says (Opp. iv. 140) that there was an ancient city called Gergesa on the shore of the lake, and that bordering on the water there was a precipitous descent which it appears that the swine descended. Eusebius and Jerome (*OS*² p. 256, 14; p. 162, 18) also allude to Gergesa, which was then a village on a hill above the lake. Gadara, situated on a hill 6 m. from the shore of the lake, cannot be the city referred to by the Evangelists (the opinion followed by Riehni, HWB. s. n.); and, though the land of the Gadarenes probably extended to the lake, there is no topographical feature south of Wady Fit such as that indicated in the narrative. It is also remarkable that the reading Γαδαρηνών does not occur once in the Sinaitic MS. (8). The possibility that the land at the mouth of Wady Semakh was under the jurisdiction of Gadara is slight, for the district of Hippos, Süsiyeh, which ran down to the lake (B. J. iii. 3, § 1), intervened. It is more probable that Gergesa, Kersa, was in Gaulanitis. An interesting discussion between Mr. Gladstone and Professor Huxley on the nationality of the swine-herds, the character of the miracle, and the place at which it took place will be found in the Nineteenth Century Magazine, 1890 and 1891. GALA'TIA (Γαλατία, Γαλατικῆ, Γαλλογραικία), a central district of Asia Minor, lying north of Phrygia and Cappadocia, and consisting of a broad strip of country about 200 miles in length, stretching from south-west to north-east. On the south-west it bordered on Phrygia, Pessinus being the chief town; on the north-east it bordered on Pontus and Cappadocia, the chief town being Tavium; in the centre was Ancyra, generally regarded as the capital of the whole district (Ramsay, Histor. Geography of Asia Minor, pp. 221-254).

It derives its name from Gallic tribes, who made a settlement there. The name Galatia was that by which the country which the Romans called Gallia was known to the Greeks, and they gave the same name to the Asiatic country in which the Gallic tribes settled. In a time somewhat later than that to which the Books of Scripture belong, Greek writers made a distinction between European and Asiatic Gaul, adopting the Latin names Gallia for the former and Gallograecia for the latter; but so late as the lifetime of St. Paul, the name Galatia was ambiguous and might denote either country. Consequently when St. Paul says (2 Tim. iv. 10) that he had sent Crescens to Galatia, the phrase does not absolutely determine whether it was to European or Asiatic Galatia that Crescens had been sent; and so in the margin of the Revised Version of the New Testament, the alternative rendering "Gaul" is given. Several ancient writers suppose that what we call Gaul was intended. Thus Eusebius (H. E. iii. 4; cp. note in loco, edd. Wace and Schaff) certainly understood Gaul to be meant in 2 Timothy. So also Epiphanius (Haer. li. 11), who boldly pronounces it to be an error to understand Galatia. Theodoret (in loco) reads Galatia, but interprets, "that is to say, Gaul, for that was the ancient name of the country, and so it is still called by those acquainted with foreign literature." When Christianity came to be the predominant religion in Gaul, there was a natural desire of the inhabitants to connect the origin of their Churches with apostolic times by claiming Crescens as one of their founders, and it might be expected that French writers should take the same view. But Tillemont (St. Paul, Art. 52 and note 81, vol. i. pp. 312, 584) understands the passage of the Eastern Galatia, and gives strong reasons for thinking that the conversion of Gaul belongs to a later date, and that there is no trace of the work of Crescens in that country. Accordingly modern commentators generally reject the interpretation "Gaul."

In the inscription of the First Epistle of St. Peter, "to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia," &c., the collocation of the words leaves no doubt that the Asiatic Galatia is intended.

But there is an earlier passage where Galatia is mentioned and where some have claimed for the word the meaning "Gaul." In 1 Macc. viii. 2, among the reasons why Judas Maccabaeus sent an embassy to the Romans it is stated that he had heard of their wars with the Galatians, and how they had conquered them and brought them under tribute. Here the margin of the English Version for "Galatians" has "Frenchmen"; and in support of the view that the Western country is intended, it is urged that in the next verse (1 Macc. viii. 3), immediately after the mention of the victories of the Romans over the Galatians, their conquest of Spain is spoken of; and further that, although the Romans under Manlius Vulso also gained a great victory over the Galatians (B.C. 189), it does not appear that he brought them under tribute; whence it is contended that the Galatians intended must be the Gauls of Northern Italy. Yet notwithstanding these arguments, it seems more natural to think of those Galatians whom Manlius had conquered less than thirty years before the embassy of Judas Maccabaeus. The Jews would hear with interest of this victory of Manlius; for Jews had themselves been in conflict with these Galatians, and could boast of a victory over them. This we learn from a reference made in the Second Book of Maccabees (viii. 20) to a great victory gained in Babylonia by Jews over Galatians, and there can be no doubt that Eastern Galatians are intended, though we have no other information as to the battle in question. It has been conjectured that it may have been fought by Jews serving under Antiochus, king of Syria, who gained the name of Soter by his victories over the Galatians.

There can be no doubt that the repression of Gallic brigandage was a public service which well deserved recognition. It would not be relevant to this article to describe what Southern Europe suffered from successive waves of Gallic invasion from the time of the burning of Rome in 390 B.C. to the subjugation of Gaul by Julius Caesar. Here we are only concerned with Asia, which had its first experience of the rapacity of the Gauls in B.C. 278, when a large body of them crossed the Hellespont in search of plunder. For some fifty years they and those who followed them levied contributions widely on the unwarlike inhabitants of Asia Minor. The first great check was given them, as already stated, by Antiochus Soter; but it was Attalus, the ruler of Pergamum, who first refused to pay them tribute, and, having defeated them in a great battle, confined them to the district which derived its name from them. The date of the victory of Attalus is not exactly known, but he ruled from B.C. 241 to 197, and 230 may be set down as an approximate date. The Gallic invaders had consisted of three distinct tribes, and so the country in which they settled was divided into three cantons,—the Trocmi occupying the north-eastern extremity next Pontus, having Tavium for their capital; the Tolistobii being at the opposite or south-western extremity, having Pessinus for their capital, and the Tectosages at Ancyra in the centre. These Eastern Gauls preserved much of their ancient character, and something of their ancient language (see Mommsen, Provinces of the Roman Empire, i. 341, Eng. tr.). At least Jerome says that in his day the same language might be heard at Ancyra as at Trèves: and he is a good witness; for he himself had been at Trèves. The prevailing speech, however, of the district was Greek. Hence the Galatians were called Gallograeci (“Hi jam degeneres sunt: mixti, et Gallograeci vere, quod appellantur:” Manlius in Livy, xxxviii. 17). The inscriptions found at Ancyra are Greek, and St. Paul wrote his Epistle in Greek.

These warlike people had more than once given their services as mercenaries to Syrian kings in their wars with their neighbours, and they fought on the side of Antiochus the Great in his war with the Romans, and took part in the last great battle in which he was defeated.

This drew the attention of the Romans on them, and the Consul Manlius invaded their country in B.C. 189, and succeeded in bringing them to complete submission. The account of his campaign is given in the 38th book of Livy, who also has a reference (xxxiii. 21) to the previous victory of Attalus.

We have here no concern with the history of Galatia in the years immediately following; but it is important to note that Amyntas, the last of the independent rulers of the country, had through favour, first of M. Antonius, afterwards of Augustus, been in possession not only of Galatia, but of a good deal of adjacent territory. So, when on the death of Amyntas (B.C. 25) Galatia was made into a Roman province by Augustus, the province included, in addition to Galatia proper, Lycaonia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, and a good deal of Phrygia. The result is to introduce a new ambiguity into the word Galatia, obliging us to consider, when we meet the word in the New Testament, whether it is to be understood as a geographical or as a political term. In particular, St. Paul speaks (1 Cor. xvi. 1) of the churches of Galatia, and he addresses an Epistle to the Galatians, and some have thence inferred that among the travels of the Apostle must have been one of which St. Luke in the Acts gives no particulars, in which he evangelized the whole country of Galatia proper, even, as some would have it, travelling from Pessinus to Tavium and back; others understand the word Galatia in its political sense, and contend that we are not bound to think of any churches of Galatia but those whose foundation by St. Paul is recorded in the Acts, such as Derbe and Lystra, Antioch in Pisidia, &c., which, though not belonging to Galatia proper, were included in the Roman province of Galatia. The question thus raised will be more conveniently discussed in the next article, THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS. [G. S.]

GALATIANS, THE EPISTLE TO THE

I. Authorship.—In the case of the Epistle to the Galatians, we are able to touch lightly on discussions as to its authorship which require more serious consideration in the case of other New Testament Books. That this is a genuine letter of the Apostle Paul may be accounted as a fact acknowledged by the best critics of all schools. It is true that the acknowledgment is not absolutely universal, but the exceptions are not important enough to deserve much regard, for it would evidently be impossible in this Dictionary to discuss every paradox in maintaining which critics have exhibited their ingenuity.

The absence of controversy as to the authorship of this Epistle is not to be ascribed to its possessing any great superiority in respect of external attestation over other New Testament Books. It is true that it is formally quoted towards the end of the 2nd century by Irenaeus (III. vii. 2, xvi. 2; v. xxi. 1, &c.), Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 15, &c.), Tertullian (De Monog. vi., &c.), the citations by each writer being so numerous, that it would be inconvenient to give a complete list. Somewhat earlier Celsus, writing against the Christians, quotes this Epistle as being in general use among them; this being, as Origen remarks, Celsus's only quotation from St. Paul's Epistles (Orig. adv.

Cels. v. 64). Celsus had been speaking of the variety of sects among the Christians and their mutual hostility; but all of them, he says, you will hear saying, "The world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world" (Gal. vi. 14). The Clementine Homilies, a work exhibiting bitter hostility to St. Paul, show a knowledge of this Epistle in a spiteful reference (xvii. 19) to St. Paul's having withstood St. Peter (Gal. ii. 11). There are besides distinct proofs of knowledge of the Epistle, though without formal quotation of it, by Justin Martyr (Trypho, 95, 96), Tatian (Hieron. in Ep. Gal. vi. 8), Polycarp (cc. 3, 5, 12), and Ignatius (Magnes. 8). The Epistle formed part of the heretic Marcion's Apostolicon, or collection of apostolic letters, in the early part of the 2nd century. This mass of external attestation, the enumeration of which does not profess to be complete, might certainly be held to afford sufficient evidence of the Pauline authorship of the Epistle, if it were not that similar testimony has not been accepted as conclusive in the case of other New Testament Books.

But what has silenced controversy is the note of early date stamped on the Epistle by the character of its contents. It deals with the question whether or not it was obligatory on Gentile converts to Christianity to submit to the rite of circumcision. St. Luke has informed us (Acts xv.) that this question did give rise to warm controversy in the Christian Church at an early period of its history; but from the nature of the case it was inevitable that this question must give rise to violent controversy the first time that heathens were proposed for admission in any numbers into the Church. To become a Christian was not merely to acknowledge Jesus of Nazareth as a Divine Teacher, it was also to become one of a society the members of which were bound together by close bonds of brotherly association and mutual love; and the partaking of a common meal, which was a familiar institution in friendly societies at the time, came to possess in the Christian societies the highest religious significance. That Jews should enter into such intimate association with uncircumcised persons was opposed to all their prejudices. St. Luke represents St. Peter as telling Cornelius, "Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company or come unto one of another nation," and as afterwards having to excuse himself to his countrymen "because he had gone in to men uncircumcised and had eaten with them" (Acts x. 28, xi. 2). Of heathen testimonies to this feature of Jewish exclusiveness it is enough to cite the description of Tacitus (Hist. v. 5): "adversus omnes alios hostile odium: separati epulis, discreti cubilibus." Jewish converts to Christianity had been largely made from the Pharisees, the most exclusive of the Jewish sects, and the most rigid in its observance of the Mosaic Law. Thus it might beforehand have seemed impossible to unite Jews and Gentiles in such close fraternity as that which was the rule of the Christian societies; for the demand of circumcision as a condition of communion was certain to be made by the Jews, while very few Gentiles would consent to submit to an ordinance which was not only painful, but was regarded as degrading.

Yet, as we know that Gentile Churches were formed in a number of places at a very early period in the history of Christianity, we can certainly infer that the controversy concerning the necessity of circumcision must have been one of short duration. For this was no speculative question about which men might go on disputing for years; it was an urgent practical one which demanded immediate decision: Was the Church at Jerusalem to recognise as daughter Churches those new communities in which uncircumcised persons predominated? Now all our authorities give what is clearly independent testimony to the fact that the relations between the Jerusalem Church and the Churches founded by Paul were not only friendly, but were cemented by pecuniary obligations; that just as Jews residing in foreign countries contributed their half-shekel to the support of the Temple service, so the Christian converts among the Gentiles made contributions for the necessities of the parent Church at Jerusalem. We are told in the Acts of two journeys made by St. Paul to Jerusalem as the bearer of such contributions: we find in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (cc. viii., ix.; see also 1 Cor. xvi. 1, Rom. xv. 25) St. Paul making elaborate arrangements for the collection of such contributions from different Churches; this Epistle to the Galatians represents St. Paul's mission to the Gentiles as recognised by the leading Apostles, and describes this collection for the Jewish poor as having been a condition agreed on at the time of that recognition. The inference that the admissibility of uncircumcised persons to Christian membership was recognised at a very early period of the Church's history is confirmed by the fact that there is no trace of controversy on this subject in any documents that have come down to us of later date than that claimed for the Epistle to the Galatians. It may well be believed that there were some among the original Jewish members of the Church to whom the decision to admit uncircumcised persons to their fellowship was altogether distasteful, and who were shocked at St. Paul's teaching that compliance with the obligations of the Mosaic Law was a matter of indifference as regards man's salvation. We learn therefore without surprise that hostility to St. Paul's teaching was not quite extinct in Jewish circles at the end of the 2nd century. But at that date the attempt to impose circumcision on Gentiles had been long abandoned as hopeless. In the account of St. Peter's preaching given in the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies, which of all extant documents represent to us anti-Paulinism in its strongest form, Peter's converts are always merely baptized, not circumcised; nor is there any trace in the story that Clement himself, the hero of the romance, was ever circumcised. It is evident how early must be the date of a document written when the admissibility of an uncircumcised person to the Church was the burning question of the day.

When the document is recognised to be as early as the time when St. Paul was in activity, there is no temptation to look for any other authorship for it than that which itself claims. But even if we left out of sight the consideration that the Epistle deals with a controversy which must have ceased to be disputed long before St. Paul was dead, it makes such a revelation of the feelings and character of the writer that a critic makes an exhibition of incompetence if he fancies that the St. Paul whom this letter presents to us is no real person, but the imaginary creation of a disciple of a later generation.

What the letter discloses as to the circumstances under which it would seem to have been written is, that the persons addressed had been originally heathen (iv. 8), and had been converted by St. Paul at a time when his bodily weakness might have seemed likely to interfere with his usefulness; that he had notwithstanding been most successful in his preaching to them, and had been regarded by them with the warmest affection (iv. 13-15); that these converts had accepted from St. Paul a Gospel which taught that faith in Christ was the one necessary and sufficient condition for salvation; that after St. Paul's departure other teachers had come among them, claiming to speak with higher authority than his, namely, with that of the original Apostles, and that they had been successful in largely persuading the Galatians that St. Paul's teaching was imperfect, and that faith in Christ alone would not suffice for their salvation unless they were also circumcised and observed the other precepts of the Mosaic Law. Now we may pronounce it unlikely that a later Paulinist would invent such a history as that of a revolt from the Apostle of his first converts; but quite impossible that he should so succeed in giving adequate expression to the feelings of surprise, grief, and indignation with which St. Paul received the news of the defection of his disciples.

This letter has points of contact with two other of the Epistles ascribed to St. Paul, which, though in many respects unlike each other, have such features in common with this that we may confidently say that all are the work of the same author, and that we cannot reject one without rejecting all three. The polemic of the Epistle to the Galatians divides itself into two principal parts: (a) the writer vindicates his apostolic authority, claiming to be entirely independent of those who had been Apostles before him, not being indebted to them either for his knowledge of the Gospel which he preached, or for his apostolic commission, but having received them by direct revelation from Jesus Christ; (b) he expounds the principles on which he resisted the inculcation of the necessity of circumcision, showing that the enforcement of the Mosaic Law as obligatory was subversive of the whole Gospel which he taught. Now, the Epistle to the Romans contains a quite similar exposition of principles, not only akin to that given in the Epistle to the Galatians in its general line of argument, but so full of verbal coincidences with it that we may safely conclude not only that the two Epistles are the work of the same author, but also that the composition of the two could not have been separated by any great interval of time. But it would seem that St. Paul's apostolic authority was not disputed by those to whom the Epistle to the Romans was addressed; for that Epistle contains nothing corresponding to the section in the Epistle to the Galatians which asserts and justifies St. Paul's claim to apostleship. In the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, on the other hand, the controversial exposition of the non-necessity of circumcision is entirely wanting, nor are there nearly so many verbal coincidences with the Epistle to the Galatians as in the Epistle to the Romans. But it has close affinity with the Epistle to the Galatians in all that regards the personal relations of St. Paul with his disciples. In both cases the Apostle addresses children in the faith, who owed their knowledge of the Gospel to himself, and whom he regards with a father's affection; and in both cases he is disappointed by finding that his love is but coldly returned, and that newly-arrived teachers threaten to supersede him in his converts' esteem. The letters written under these circumstances prove their own genuineness by making a revelation of the character of the writer, beyond the skill of any forger to produce. The letters show the writer to have been a proud man to whom self-assertion and self-vindication are altogether distasteful, and one of such warm affections as to feel acutely pained that the necessity of asserting his rightful claims should have arisen from the defection of disciples whom he loved and from whom he had deserved more confidence. The identity of character exhibited in the letters to the Corinthian and to the Galatian Churches is even a stronger proof of common authorship than coincidence in forms of expression.

Although the internal evidence for the genuineness of these letters is decisive on the grounds already stated, there are some other considerations that it is worth while to mention.

(1.) We have a note of early date in the fact that so much of the Epistle to the Galatians is taken up with an assertion of St. Paul's independent authority. With the multiplication of Churches claiming him as their founder, his authority ceased to be disputed within the pale of the Christian Church; nay, from a very early period he came to be spoken of as the Apostle, a title which no doubt he owed to the fact that his letters soon ceased to be the exclusive property of the several Churches to which they were addressed, and became the manual of apostolic instruction used in the public reading of widely separated Churches. It is true that the Pseudo-Clementine writings show that there was a small body of persons calling themselves Christians (though reckoned by the bulk of Christians as outside their community) who did not recognise St. Paul's authority; but these counted St. Paul, not only as no Apostle, but as a deceiver and an enemy. The polemic in the Epistles to the Galatians and Corinthians is not directed against such a view as this, but only labours to show that St. Paul was entitled to claim perfect equality with the elder Apostles. The controversy, therefore, concerning St. Paul's apostleship, in the form in which we find it in the Epistle to the Galatians, is like the controversy concerning circumcision, one which could only have been disputed in the very earliest age of the Church.

(2.) An argument may be founded on the agreement between the attitude towards Judaism and the Old Testament held by the Churches which claim St. Paul for their founder, and that presented in the Epistles under consideration. Any one who studies the history of the rise of Christianity out of Judaism must be struck by the paradox that there should be such complete continuity between the two religions and yet such an entire break between them. All the rites and institutions on which the Jews prided themselves, as placing them on a higher level than the surrounding Gentiles, are abandoned; the wall of separation between Jew and Gentile is altogether thrown down, yet the authority of the great Jewish lawgiver is kept unimpaired, and the sacred books which ordain the Jewish institutions are held in the highest reverence. Now among those who, in the 2nd century, resisted the obligations of Judaism, there was a disposition to take a less favourable view of the older religion. The great majority of the Gnostic sects rejected the Old Testament altogether, and even denied that the God of the Jews was the same as He by whom Jesus had been sent. In the system of Marcion hostility to Judaism received its fullest development, and assumed the form which gained the widest acceptance. In one of the oldest of the Christian documents not received into the Church's Canon, the epistle which bears the name of Barnabas, though the authority of the Old Testament is fully acknowledged, yet the Jewish rites are rejected, not merely as not now binding on Christians, but as never having been binding on the Jews themselves. They are represented as having adopted them through a misunderstanding of the Divine precepts, under the influence of an evil angel. The fact that the opinion concerning the Old Testament which was held by the Pauline Churches is that which we hold ourselves, ought not to prevent us from seeing how singular, and even inconsistent, it must have appeared when it was first put forward. It must have seemed strange that men should side with the Jews in opposing those who impugned the Divine authority of the Old Testament, and yet refuse to regard the institutions which it ordained, as binding on them. We are bound to account historically for the wide acceptance in the Christian Church of such a view. We have the explanation at once if we acknowledge the genuineness of the group of Epistles of which that to the Galatians is one. For it would then appear that the Pauline Churches but followed the teaching of their founder, who, in the very letters in which he resisted most strenuously the attempt to impose Jewish ordinances on Gentiles, yet fully acknowledged the authority of the Jewish Scriptures, and quoted them more largely than in any other writings ascribed to him. The historical problem remains without solution if we reject these Epistles.

But perhaps more has been said than was necessary in defence of the genuineness of the Epistle to the Galatians and of the other three Epistles (Romans and the two Corinthians) which must stand or fall with it. The arguments urged against these Epistles by extreme followers of Baur have no force except as ad hominem; and though they may prove successfully that it is inconsistent to accept these Epistles and reject those to the Philippian and the First to the Thessalonians, yet those who cannot accept both of Baur's decisions will generally choose to adopt the first rather than the second.

II. Persons addressed.—The Epistle to the Galatians differs from the rest of Paul's Epistles to Churches, in being addressed, not, like those, to the Church of some leading city, but to the Churches of a district; and in the article GALATIA it is explained that there is an ambiguity in this word which may denote either the geographical district of Galatia, or the Roman province of that name, which included besides a good deal of adjacent territory. We turn, then, to the Acts of the Apostles in order to discover whether the history therein contained enables us to determine the question.

Now, although the Book of the Acts is in accordance with the Epistle to the Galatians in the testimony which it bears to the existence in the very early Church of a controversy on the subject of circumcision which soon came to be forgotten, yet these two witnesses are clearly independent. We must presently discuss whether the variation between the accounts of St. Paul's history, as given in the Acts and as inferred from the Epistle to the Galatians, is such as to impair the credibility of either witness, but certainly the unlikeness is such that we can say with confidence that the author of either document could not possibly have seen the other. From the 2nd century downwards, St. Paul has been mainly known to the Christian world as the author of documents used in the public reading of the Church. To the writer of the Book of the Acts St. Paul is known only as an active missionary, and it is not so much as mentioned that he ever wrote a letter to a distant Church. Signs of acquaintance with any of the extant letters are very doubtful, and it may be pronounced as certain that the Epistle to the Galatians was not known to the author of the Acts. It is evident what an early date this obliges us to assign to the latter Book, viz. the time before St. Paul's Epistles had passed, from being the exclusive possession of the Churches to which they were severally addressed, into general Church use. It is needless to discuss the untenable hypothesis that the writer of the Epistle to the Galatians could have known the Book of the Acts.

In the account of St. Paul's first missionary journey given in Acts xiv. we are told of his having preached the Gospel in Antioch in Pisidia, in Iconium, in Derbe and Lystra, cities which belonged to the Roman province of Galatia. St. Luke never uses the word Galatia in speaking of these cities: on the contrary, he describes Derbe and Lystra geographically as cities of Lycaonia; but we must admit the possibility that St. Paul's use of language may have been different from St. Luke's.

If St. Paul visited Galatia proper, it must have been on his second missionary journey, recorded in Acts xvi.; but the very scantiest account is there given of the Apostle's labours in the Galatian district. It strengthens our belief in the reliance to be placed on the accuracy of St. Luke's history, when we find how silent he is as to occurrences at which he was not either actually present or had means of full information. He does give a pretty full account of St. Paul's first missionary journey: but there is good reason to think that St. Luke was a resident at Antioch, and he tells how St. Paul and St. Barnabas on their return gathered the Church of that city together and rehearsed all that God had done with them. But St. Luke was not St. Paul's companion in the first part of the Apostle's second missionary journey: for we find from his use of the pronoun "we" that he did not join the Apostle until his arrival at Troas (Acts xvi. 10). Accordingly, of all that previously took place on that tour he only relates one incident at length, and for his knowledge of that we can easily account. When St. Paul's company arrived at Troas, it included a member with whom St. Luke appears to have had no previous acquaintance, viz. Timothy. He would naturally inquire something as to the history of this new companion, and accordingly he relates how St. Paul on his visit to Derbe and Lystra had found this disciple and chosen him to be his travelling companion; but the details of St. Paul's work before he himself had joined him he does not attempt to record. What we learn is that on this visit St. Paul's work in Asia Minor began with Cilicia, and, it is natural to think, with Tarsus. Then, as has been just mentioned, we find St. Paul in Derbe and Lystra. We are next told that as St. Paul went through the cities he delivered the decrees which had been ordained by the Apostles and Elders at Jerusalem. We cannot say with absolute certainty that among these cities were Iconium and Antioch in Pisidia, for St. Luke does not expressly say so. But it is not likely that St. Paul would have been in such close neighbourhood of churches which he had founded on his previous tour, and omit to deliver to them the apostolic decrees. There was a reason for St. Luke's special mention of Derbe and Lystra because the call of Timothy had to be related. St. Luke next tells of the missionary party, that "they went through the Phrygian and Galatian country, having been hindered by the Holy Ghost from speaking the Word in Asia. And when they were come over against Mysia, they assayed to go into Bithynia, and the Spirit of Jesus suffered them not. And passing by Mysia they came down to Troas" (cp. Acts xvi. 6, 7, R. V.).

It appears from this that it had been St. Paul's original intention to travel westward from Antioch through the Roman province of Asia, meaning probably to reach the sea at Ephesus. We do not know in what way the Divine intimation was given which caused him to alter his course in a northerly direction, but we may reasonably conjecture that hindrances to his journey westward presented themselves which either he or some other prophetic member of the party instructed the rest to regard as providential guidance. We are tempted to connect with this the statement in Gal. iv. 13, the most obvious meaning of which is that St. Paul's work in the Galatian district arose out of an illness of his. Such an illness may have caused arrangements which had been made for his journey into Proconsular Asia to fall through (and possibly more than once). The question with which we are immediately concerned is, What was the country to which St. Paul next directed his course, and which St. Luke describes as the "Phrygian and Galatian country"? Renan concludes that because St. Luke next tells of St. Paul's being in Mysia, which lies far to the north-west of Antioch or Iconium, his journey must have been altogether in that direction, and that we cannot suppose him to have gone to Galatia proper, which would be much to the east of his way. But we have no right to assume, that when St. Paul's intention to go into Asia was frustrated, he at once determined to make for Mysia. He was evidently prepared to follow God's providential guidance, whithersoever it might lead him. We cannot tell what invitations to join their party he may have received from Jewish acquaintances proceeding in the Galatian direction, or what assurances of hospitable reception when they reached their destination, such as might indicate that this was where God had opened a door to him. All that St. Luke tells us is that St. Paul ultimately arrived on the borders of Mysia; but as to whether he reached that point by a direct or a circuitous route, he gives us no information.

Other biographers of St. Paul, influenced by the fact that he wrote an Epistle to the Galatians, and anxious to find a place in his history for a complete evangelization of Galatia, represent him as having been detained by illness, if not at Antioch in Pisidia, at Synnada, where the road to Asia branched off, and that he then travelled to Pessinus, the nearest town of Galatia proper. So far the suggested route corresponds sufficiently with St. Luke's narrative. But they go on to represent him as proceeding north-eastward from Pessinus to Ancyra, thence in the same direction to Tavium, and then of necessity back again to Ancyra and Pessinus. But certainly St. Luke's statement that "they went through the Phrygian and Galatian country, and came over against Mysia," is one from which we should never have gathered that we were to put a great loop on the course of St. Paul's travels, or think of him as having made a prolonged stay in Galatia. When we observe, moreover, that St. Luke carefully avoids saying that St. Paul went through "Galatia," not only in the verse already cited (xvi. 6), but also in the verse (xviii. 23) which describes another visit of St. Paul to the same region, and where again the phrase used is "the Galatian and Phrygian country," we are led to think of this phrase as meaning not so much Galatia proper as rather the country which was geographically Phrygia but politically Galatia. The result is that St. Luke's narrative does not warrant us to conclude with any certainty that St. Paul made any prolonged stay in Galatia proper, or did much work in founding Churches there; though if there be other evidence that he did, no presumption to the contrary arises from the silence of a narrative so concise as that in the Acts.

We turn therefore to St. Paul's Epistles, and first inquire what is meant by the "Churches of Galatia" (1 Cor. xvi. 1): "Concerning the collection for the saints, as I gave order to the Churches of Galatia, so also do ye." We are not entitled to conclude that because St. Luke, when historically relating the course of St. Paul's journeys, describes the places visited by their precise geographical designations, St. Paul may not have used the word Galatia in a wide sense when in want of a word to include all the Churches which he had founded in the Roman province of Galatia. In fact, if he had wished to include under one designation the Churches of Antioch, Iconium, Derbe and Lystra, together possibly with others in the adjacent district, it is hard to say what other term he could have used. There is, as we have said, no certain evidence that St. Paul founded Churches in Galatia proper; if he did, these of course would be included among the Churches of Galatia. But the question is, whether we are bound to understand St. Paul's use of the word as excluding all Churches save those of Galatia proper? Now it is not likely either that, when he was organizing a collection for the poor Christians of Jerusalem, he would omit to appeal to the Churches in the Galatian province with which his relations were so intimate, or that he would leave those Churches unmentioned when writing to Corinth. Thus the word as used in the Epistle to the Corinthians will very well bear the wider sense.

We turn then to its use in the inscription of the Epistle to the Galatians. There is some temptation to understand the word here too in the wider sense. The occasion of the Epistle was the temporary success of emissaries from the Pharisaic section of the Church at Jerusalem, who inculcated circumcision as necessary for all Christians. We know from the Acts that such teachers had gone to Antioch in Syria, and it is easy to believe that similar efforts were made elsewhere; but it is strange if the only place we hear of their success should be the most remote corner of Asia Minor that St. Paul ever reached. It is therefore a tempting supposition that the Jewish teachers starting from Antioch may have followed St. Paul's own course, and made converts in the Churches of Derbe, Lystra, Antioch, and Iconium, which he had founded. We could then understand the Apostle's passionate indignation on learning the falling away of men who had once held him in such love, that "if it had been possible they would have plucked out their own eyes and have given them to him." It may also be taken in favour of this hypothesis, that if we adopt a common interpretation of Gal. iv. 13, and understand the verse to imply that St. Paul's evangelization of the "Galatians" was owing to his having been detained by sickness in their country, we must suppose this sickness to have befallen St. Paul when it had been his intention to go to some other district. But we cannot with much probability imagine him to have gone into Galatia proper merely with such an intention, whereas it would harmonize well with the story in the Acts if we could apply the word "Galatians" to the people of the place where the road to Ephesus branched off, and where the Apostle was constrained, not improbably by illness, to abandon his intention of proceeding in that direction.

On the other hand, the strongest argument for believing the Apostle to have been in Galatia proper is his exclamation (iii. 1) "O foolish Galatians!"—a phrase which it is not easy to regard as used to people of different nationalities. There is no difficulty in imagining routes for St. Paul which would have brought him into Galatia proper. Thus he might have struck north from Iconium to Ancyra, or perhaps more probably from Synnada to Pessinus. With each of these Galatian cities Jews had commercial relations; so that it is easy to conceive that the Apostle might have received an invitation to visit either place, and equally to conceive that other Jews, advocates of the necessity of circumcision, might have followed in the same track. But all this is so purely matter of conjecture, that in the absence of any positive information from St. Luke we find ourselves unable to assert with any confidence that St. Paul was ever in Galatia proper.

We could not arrive at this negative conclusion if we attached much weight to explanations which have accounted for the suddenness of the Galatian abandonment of the Gospel as taught by St. Paul, by the fact that these people were largely of Celtic extraction,—a race proverbial for fickleness. It may be doubted whether Celts formed the predominant element in the Churches of Galatia, even taking that word to denote the specially Gallic country. Its population must have contained a great mixture of races. The native Phrygian element long survived; and the Consul Manlius on his invasion was welcomed by priests of Cybele. There long continued to be among them Gauls speaking their own language, for St. Jerome tells in the Preface to the second book of his Commentary on the Galatians that he himself recognised the language which he heard spoken there as the same that he had heard spoken at Trèves. But the name Gallograecia attests how powerful the Greek element had become, consisting partly no doubt of Gauls who had learned the language, but in a great measure also of the numerous Greek settlers who had taught it to them; and lastly, the Jewish element was, as already stated, by no means inconsiderable. It must have been among the Greeks and Jews that St. Paul's converts were made, and it may be doubted whether among the Christian converts there was any very large proportion of Celtic blood.

But it is more important to observe that men of different countries share in a common nature, and that people often make mistakes in fancying they see tokens of national peculiarity in what is but the result of the working of the common human nature. Thus Bishop Lightfoot thinks it worth while to point out that the Epistle to the Galatians enumerates among the "works of the flesh," drunkenness and revellings, and that drunkenness was a darling sin of Celtic peoples; that it condemns strife and vainglory, and that the Gauls were a very irritable people; that it exhorts to liberality in almsgiving, advice much needed by Gauls, who were proverbial for avarice. But if these indications could be accepted as proofs, they would establish that the Epistle to the Ephesians also was addressed to Gauls (see v. 18; iv. 31, 28). And the Corinthians, too, are convicted of Gallic fickleness; for they also, though St. Paul's children in the faith, largely transferred their allegiance to new teachers.

But it needs no theory as to the race extraction of St. Paul's converts to account for some change in their feelings towards him. When the Galatians were first converted, they knew no other Christian teacher than St. Paul; but they learned from him to recognise Jerusalem as the head-quarters of the religion, and they heard of the Twelve as having received apostleship from Christ Himself. No wonder that they were profoundly impressed when teachers came among them claiming to speak with the authority of the parent Church, and informing them that new conditions still must be complied with before they could be recognised as perfect Christians. Nor is it strange if, when they pleaded that St. Paul who had founded their Church had never insisted on these conditions, they were staggered at being told that St. Paul himself was but a new convert, and was not one whose authority could be set in opposition to that of the Apostles whom Christ had appointed.

With regard to the persons addressed, there remains still the question whether they were Jews or Gentiles; but it is plain from the whole drift of the Epistle that the writer had Gentiles principally in view. He protests (vi. 12) against those who would force circumcision on them, and declares (v. 2) that if they were circumcised Christ would profit them nothing. This clearly does not apply to men who, like himself, had been circumcised in infancy. And (iv. 8) he expressly speaks of the time when his readers, "not knowing God, did service to them which by nature are no gods." The phrase too "in mine own nation" (i. 14) implies that those whom he addressed were of a different nation. On the other hand, we may reasonably believe that the bulk of the Gentile converts had entered the Gentile Church through the road of Judaism. St. Paul's invariable practice was to commence his missionary work in each city by preaching in the Jewish synagogue or place of worship (Acts xiii. 14; xiv. 1; xvi. 13; xvii. 1, 10, 17; xviii. 4); and, as at Antioch in Pisidia (Acts xiii. 43) the first Gentile converts would always be made from among the "devout persons" who were in the habit of attending the Jewish worship. That reverence for the Old Testament which was common to both "Jews and proselytes," and was shared by St. Paul himself, would be taught by him to all the converts which he made. Consequently, though appeals to the Old Testament, as a book familiarly known and held in authority by all his readers, are frequent in the Epistle to the Galatians, this affords no ground for doubting the predominance of the Gentile element in the Galatian Churches.

III. Date of the Epistle.—The most generally accepted chronology of the part of St. Paul's life with which we are here concerned, is as follows:—The second missionary journey, in which the Apostle went through the "Phrygian and Galatian country," is assigned to the years 51 and 52; the third journey, in which he visited the same district again, to the year 54. Then succeed three years at Ephesus; shortly before leaving which place in 57, he writes the First Epistle to the Corinthians. From Ephesus he travels through Macedonia, and arrives at Corinth; before leaving which place in 58, he writes the Epistle to the Romans. For our present purpose it is immaterial whether we are wrong in accepting these dates as approximately correct, since we are concerned to determine, not in what year of our Lord the Epistle to the Galatians was written, but in what part of St. Paul's life.

In St. Paul's first missionary tour we read (Acts xiv.) of his having evangelized Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch; and it has been already explained that the Churches so formed might in a certain sense be described as Churches of Galatia. It has been suggested that, by thus understanding the phrase, we could account for the illness which led to the Apostle's work in Galatia, as resulting from injuries sustained by him when he was stoned in Lystra. If we could imagine the Epistle to the Galatians to have been written from Antioch after his return from his first tour, we could account for the absence in the letter of any reference to the conclusions come to at Jerusalem, as recorded in Acts xv. But the attempt to assign so early a date collapses in face of the mention in the Epistle (ch. ii.) of a visit made by St. Paul to Jerusalem, at least 14 years, perhaps 17 years, after his conversion. The visit, recorded in Acts xi. 30, took place before any of St. Paul's missionary journeys, and at a time when controversy concerning the necessity of circumcision is not likely to have arisen. St. Luke places it before the death of Herod; that is to say, before the year 44, and this would leave no room for the 14 or 17 years. We are therefore constrained to agree with the great majority of commentators in identifying the visit referred to in Gal. ii. with that recorded in Acts xv. This would oblige us to place the letter after A.D. 51; and on other grounds we have come to the conclusion that the Churches addressed had been formed on St. Paul's second missionary journey, A.D. 52. Thus, then, we have a limit in one direction to the date of the Epistle.

Expressions in the Epistle which have been used to fix the date more closely cannot be relied on as decisive. Thus it has been held that the words (i. 6) "I marvel that ye are so soon removed ["so quickly removing," R. V.] from him that called you into the grace of God," oblige us to assign the earliest possible date to the Epistle. But "soon" is an indefinite phrase, and the limits within which the date of the Epistle must lie are narrow; so that Paul might conceivably have spoken of the Galatian apostasy as rapid, even at the latest date we can assign to the letter.

On the other hand, the words (iv. 13) "how I preached the Gospel at the first" (τὸ πρῶτον) are translated in the Revised Version "the first time" or "the former time," and it has been inferred that St. Paul refers to two visits to Galatia; in other words, that his Epistle was written after his second visit. The argument is not absolutely decisive, because in view of the passages, John vi. 62, ix. 8, 1 Tim. i. 13, it must be admitted that τὸ πρῶτον need not necessarily mean, on the former of two occasions, but might mean simply "formerly." Yet, if we suppose the Epistle to have been written after the first visit and before the second, the period of which he is speaking could not have been more than a year or two previously, and τὸ πρῶτον is not a phrase which we should expect to be used in referring to it. Thus the presumption remains that the Epistle was written after the second visit. Another ambiguous passage bearing on the present question is (i. 8, 9): "though we or an Angel from heaven should preach unto you any Gospel other than that which you received, let him be anathema. As we have said before, so say I now again, If any man preach unto you any Gospel other than that which you received, let him be anathema." The question is, Do the words in v. 9, "as we have said before," refer merely to what has been said in v. 8, or do they refer to something said by word of mouth when the Apostle was in Galatia? Against the former supposition may be urged, that if the Apostle thought it necessary for greater emphasis to repeat a second time what he had said, we should expect him to speak rather more strongly the second time than the first. Thus, after he had bidden them not to receive any one who preached a different Gospel, we could understand his going on to say, "Yea, if even an Angel from heaven were to preach a different Gospel, let him be anathema." But there is something of an anticlimax when the "Angel from heaven" occurs in the first verse, "any one" in the second. Again, it is to be noted that after the opening salutation, in which "all the brethren that are with me" are included, St. Paul, in v. 6, uses the first person singular, I, and continues it throughout the Epistle. Therefore, if in v. 9 he were merely repeating what had been said in v. 8, we should expect him to say, "as I have said before." There are therefore grounds for considering the "we" of v. 9 to be really used in a collective sense, and for supposing that reference is made to a warning given by the missionary party when present in Galatia. If this be so, this warning is more likely to have been given on the second visit than on the first evangelization of the Church, at which time there would be no rival teachers against whom warning would be necessary.

In order to determine more accurately the place of the Epistle to the Galatians in the series of St. Paul's letters, it is necessary to compare it with other letters written about the same period, as we may judge from their exhibiting the Apostle's mind occupied with the same controversies.

The Epistle to the Romans.—This Epistle not only has coincidences with that to the Galatians in a number of phrases and statements common to both, but the exposition of the Apostle's reasons for resisting the imposition of circumcision as necessary to salvation is so much alike in the two that we might equally draw an account of these reasons from one or the other. The choice his readers had to make was whether they would seek for justification through the works of the Law or through faith in Christ. Now by the former method success was impossible. The Law demanded complete obedience. The conditions on which it offered life were stated in words of Moses, quoted in both Epistles (Gal. iii. 12, Rom. x. 5): "The man that doeth these things shall live in them." It pronounced a curse on all who came short of complete obedience: "Cursed is every one who continueth not in all things that are written in the Book of the Law to do them" (Gal. iii. 10). In point of fact no one, either Jew or Gentile, has succeeded in yielding this perfect obedience. The detailed proof of this occupies the first three chapters of the Epistle to the Romans. And the conclusion is given in almost identical words in the two Epistles: "By the works of the Law shall no flesh be justified" (Rom. iii. 20; Gal. ii. 16).

The Apostle does not content himself with the negative statement that justification could not be obtained through the Law of Moses; he shows that the Old Testament had pointed out a different way: "That no man is justified by the Law in the sight of God, it is evident, for 'The just shall live by faith'" (Gal. ii. 11; Rom. i. 17). And this way was the earlier. The covenant of promise was made with Abraham because of his faith. "Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness" (Rom. iv. 3; Gal. iii. 6). That promise was 430 years earlier than the giving of the Law to Moses, and could not be disannulled by an institution so much later (Gal. iii. 17). Nay, it was anterior to the institution of the rite of circumcision; for the statement that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness refers to an earlier period of Abraham's life, and he only received the sign of circumcision as a seal of the righteousness which he had had before he was circumcised (Rom. iv. 11).

But the promise made to Abraham was not to himself alone. It was to him and to his seed. That seed was Christ, and they are to be accounted the true seed of Abraham who are Christ's, and who have the faith of Abraham (Gal. ii. 16). For Abraham was not the father of the Jews only. It is written that he was to be the father of many nations; and so he was the father not of the circumcision only, but of all them that believe, circumcised or not (Rom. iv. 11). Nay, those Israelites after the flesh who were under bondage to the Mosaic Law, though they might be children of Abraham, were not heirs of the promises to Abraham. Abraham had two sons, the one by a bondmaid, the other by a free woman: the one born after the flesh, the other through the promise. As then, so now, he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit. But what saith the Scripture? "Cast out the bondmaid and her son, for the son of the bondmaid shall not be heir with the son of the free woman" (Gal. iv. 28-30).

But if it has been proved that the Law is ineffectual as a means of justification, does it follow that it was useless and not divinely instituted? Nay, there was a time when it had served an important use. The heir, as long as he is a child, is under subjection to tutors and governors appointed by the father. Such a tutor had the Law been to the heirs of promise. It had made them conscious of sin, and pronounced a curse on disobedience from which itself was powerless to deliver; and thus trained those who were under its tutorage to look for justification through faith in Christ, Who has redeemed us from the curse of the Law, being made a curse for us. This reconciliation of the rejection of the Mosaic Law with an acknowledgment of its excellence and of the uses which it served is common to Rom. vii. and Gal. iii. 21-26. And, lastly, the Apostle protests that the liberty to which his disciples were called must not degenerate into licence; teaching them, in words common to both Epistles, how the love which springs from faith in Christ secures the complete fulfilment of the Law, "For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself" (Gal. v. 14; Rom. xiii. 8-10).

Besides the general agreement in the exposition of theory, the two Epistles are full of coincidences in phrases and forms of expression. Notice has already been taken that the same passages from the Old Testament are quoted in both (Gen. xv. 5; Lev. xviii. 5; Ps. cxliii. 2; Heb. ii. 4); and it may be added that in both occurs the same formula of Old Testament citation, "what saith the Scripture?" (Rom. iv. 3; Gal. iv. 30.) and that in the quotation of Ps. cxliii. 2 there are variations from the LXX. in which both Epistles agree; viz., the phrase "the works of the Law" is introduced, and "no flesh" is substituted for "no man living."

We add two or three out of a great number of parallel passages :

Rom. viii. 14-17.

"For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God. For ye received not the spirit of bondage again unto fear; but ye received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit Himself beareth witness with our spirit that we are children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ."

Rom. vi. 6-8.

"Our old man was crucified with Him. . . . But if we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him."

Rom. vii. 4.

"Ye also were made dead to the Law . . . that we might bring forth fruit unto God."

Rom. vii. 23-25.

"I see a different law in my members, warring against the law of my mind. . . . I myself with the mind serve the law of God, but with the flesh the law of sin."

Rom. vii. 15.

"Not what I would, that do I practise; but what I hate, that I do."

It is needless to multiply quotations; for the proofs already alleged amount to a demonstration of the common authorship of the two Epistles. And writers are generally agreed that the Epistle to the Galatians must be the earlier of the two. This Epistle is a vehement argument struck out under the immediate needs of a pressing controversy; the other is a calm presentation of the same argument in a complete and systematic form. We may then take the year 58, to which the Epistle to the Romans is commonly assigned, as a lower limit to the date of the Epistle to the Galatians.

The great resemblance in phraseology between the Epistles gives us a right to infer that they could not have been separated by any long interval of time. This argument is not so strong as in the case of the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, which we otherwise know to have been written at the same time and sent by the same messenger, and where the nature of the topics is not such as to make it likely that the same thoughts would for a long time so occupy the writer's mind as to find expression in the same words. But as long as the controversy concerning circumcision was going on, the Apostle would be likely on different occasions to use the same arguments, and perhaps without much variety of expression. Still, when we observe

GAL. iv. 5-7.

"That we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts, crying, Abba, Father. So that thou art no longer a bond-servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir through God."

GAL. ii. 20.

"I have been crucified with Christ: yet I live; yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me"

GAL. ii. 19.

"For I through the law died unto the law, that I might live unto God."

GAL. v. 17.

"The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: for these are contrary the one to the other: that ye may not do the things that ye would."

what great variety of style there is in St. Paul's letters,—even in the four letters written while the controversy concerning circumcision was going on; how different these are from the Epistles to the Thessalonians, and these again from the Epistle to the Philippians, from the Epistles to the Colossians and Ephesians, and from the Pastoral Epistles,—it becomes hard to believe that long time could have passed over without producing more change of style and topics than we find between the Epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians.

There is no necessity to believe that the controversy concerning circumcision was of long duration: we can even see that it was dying out when the Epistle to the Romans was written. If the Epistle to the Galatians had been the only one to come down to us, the verse (v. 2) "If ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing," might lead us to think that the Apostle altogether condemned the observance of the Mosaic Law by Christians. Yet in the Epistle to the Romans (chs. xiv., xv.) we find the observance of Jewish distinctions of days and of meats treated as a matter of indifference, with regard to which it is a duty to be tolerant, and even to abstain from using our own liberty in such a way as to lead others to do what their consciences condemn, though in our eyes it might be innocent. On looking more closely at the Epistle to the Galatians, we find that what the Apostle condemns (ch. v.) is not the observance of Jewish ordinances, but the insisting on them as necessary to justification. To seek for justification in such a way was an abandonment of the only possible way of justification, that through faith in Christ; for if we attempted it by the Law we made ourselves debtors to observe the whole of it, an undertaking in which success must be impossible. But though the more tolerant attitude of the Epistle to the Romans is quite reconcilable with the doctrine of that to the Galatians, it would scarcely have been assumed until the strain of the conflict with the Judaizers had somewhat relaxed.

The First Epistle to the Corinthians.—On the other hand, that conflict appears hardly to have begun when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written. Considering the great variety of topics dwelt on in that letter, it is quite remarkable that that topic which was uppermost in the Apostle's thoughts when he wrote the Galatian letter is altogether in the background in the Corinthian letter. There are many traces that the Apostle's view of the way of salvation was at both times the same (1 Cor. i. 30; vi. 11; xv. 3, 56). In the Corinthian as well as in the Galatian letter he treats circumcision or uncircumcision as a matter of complete indifference as far as salvation is concerned (1 Cor. vii. 19; Gal. v. 6). But in the Corinthian letter this is taken for granted, and is not the subject of laborious argumentation: he is there occupied less with exposition of dogma than with questions of practical morality. It is true that St. Paul's authority at Corinth seems already to have suffered something from the rivalry of other teachers; but only because they were imagined to outshine him in eloquence or learning, and there is no trace that they differed from him in doctrine, seeing that he feels himself under no necessity to enter on the task of refutation. There is very little parallelism between 1 Corinthians and Galatians, beyond that between the verses (1 Cor. vii. 19; Gal. v. 6) just quoted, and the fact that in both Epistles the proverb is quoted, "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump" (1 Cor. v. 6; Gal. v. 9).

The Second Epistle to the Corinthians.—But parallels are extremely numerous between Galatians and the Second Epistle to the Corinthians; and the fact that the Galatian letter is so much more akin to the Second Corinthian letter than to the First, is a strong argument for placing it in order of time later than the First. During the interval between the two Corinthian letters the influence of teachers in that Church rival to St. Paul appears to have largely increased; for while in the First Epistle the Apostle contents himself with deprecating schisms, and protesting against making the reception of the Gospel depend on, the excellence of the human teachers who promulgated it, in the Second Epistle he finds himself under the necessity of vindicating his own authority, and comparing his claims on his disciples' regards with those of the teachers who had been put forward as his rivals. But the necessity of this self-vindication gives the Apostle much pain, and that chiefly on account of the contrast between the affection his disciples had formerly borne him and their present withdrawal of confidence. In the exhibition of the writer's pain at ill-returned affection we have the closest affinity between the Epistle to the Galatians and the Second to the Corinthians. In the former the Apostle recalls (iv. 15) how the Galatians had first received him as an Angel of God, when if it had been possible they would have plucked out their own eyes and have given them to him; in the latter (xii. 15) their distrust forces from him the bitter complaint, "The more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved." Other coincidences enumerated by Lightfoot, some of them very striking, are Gal. i. 6, 2 Cor. xi. 4; Gal. i. 9, 2 Cor. xiii. 2; Gal. i. 10, 2 Cor. v. 11; Gal. iii. 3, 2 Cor. viii. 6; Gal. iii. 13, 2 Cor. v. 21; Gal. iv. 17, 2 Cor. xi. 2; Gal. v. 15, 2 Cor. xi. 20; Gal. vi. 15, 2 Cor. v. 17.

In the Second Epistle to the Corinthians St. Paul relies entirely on his personal authority for suppressing the rivalry of other teachers, and does not give, as he does in the Epistle to the Galatians, an argumentative refutation of their teaching. Possibly he had received no full report of their teaching at the time when he wrote the former letter. But whereas in 1 Cor. the tendency of the Corinthians to form parties in their Church is merely rebuked, without any hint as to doctrinal differences between the parties, we find traces in 2 Cor. that the Apostle's most formidable rivals belonged to the Jewish section of the Church. We gather this from his appeal (xi. 22): "Are they Hebrews? so am I. Are they Israelites? so am I. Are they the seed of Abraham? so am I." And it seems not improbable that both in the case of the Churches of Corinth and of Galatia the rival teachers had come down with some mission from the Church of Jerusalem which authorized them to describe themselves as ἀπόστολοι. This title had been given among the Jews to emissaries sent to collect the Temple tribute, and we learn from the Didache that it continued to be used in the Christian society of representatives sent by one Church to another. In this sense the word occurs (2 Cor. viii. 23; Phil. ii. 25). If we suppose the rival teachers to have been able to claim this title, we have the explanation why the Apostle, in the opening of the Epistle to the Galatians, claims to be himself an Apostle, but one sent not by men, but by Jesus Christ Himself; and we may conjecture a reference to these teachers in those who are described (2 Cor. xi. 5, xii. 11) as οἱ ὑπερβίαν ἀπόστολοι. On the whole, then, we seem to have the most probable account of the origin of the Galatian letter by supposing that some little time after the Apostle had written the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, and while he was still uneasy as to the result of the attempts to undermine his authority at Corinth, his anxieties were brought to a climax by tidings that Judaizing emissaries had penetrated so far as to the remote Churches which he had founded in Galatia, who, disparaging his authority in comparison with that of the Apostles whom they claimed to represent, had succeeded in causing among those simple disciples a large defection from the Gospel which St. Paul had preached, of salvation through faith in Christ without the works of the Law. The actual letter well corresponds with what might have been written under the tumult of feelings excited by this intelligence.

Galatians and the Acts of the Apostles.—In the first two chapters of the Epistle to the Galatians, which contain the Apostle's vindication of his personal authority, he gives an autobiographical sketch of his previous history, differing in so many respects from the account given in the Acts of the Apostles, that we have already pronounced it to be impossible that the author of that Book could have seen the Galatian letter. But there are those who have contended that the discrepancies are so great that the account in the Acts cannot be accepted as truthful, and must be regarded as the dishonest attempt of a writer of the 2nd century to suppress the true history of early dissensions in the Church. But it is scarcely possible that a writer of the 2nd century could be so unacquainted with the Epistle to the Galatians as the author of the Acts manifestly is. And it is certainly inconsistent that objectors who hold no theory of verbal inspiration should apply different rules in their judgment of the New Testament Books and of other books of like character. If we had to compare the account given by a veteran statesman of transactions in which he had taken part fourteen years or more previously with an independent history of the same transactions written by a younger member of his party several years still later, it is likely enough that we should find discrepancies which we might attribute either to imperfect recollection in the one case or imperfect information in the other, yet feel no inclination to doubt either the authorship of either document or its importance to any one desirous to study the history of the period. For example, the authenticity of the Acts has been impugned because the Book makes no mention of St. Paul's retirement to Arabia, of which he tells in Gal. i. 17. But, in the parallel case we have imagined the fact that the younger writer appeared to be unacquainted with some incidents in the early life of his leader would not be felt as a reason for doubting his ability to give a trustworthy account of those public acts which came under the narrator's cognizance. On the other hand, the Acts (xi. 30) relate a visit to Jerusalem made by St. Paul and St. Barnabas as bearers of a money contribution, of which visit no mention is made in the Epistle to the Galatians. But in that Epistle the writer's object is to prove his independence of the elder Apostles, and for this purpose to tell how little in point of fact he had seen of them. Now it appears from the narrative in the Acts that the Apostles were absent from Jerusalem at the time of this visit, and that the contribution was handed not to them, but to "the Elders." If this were profane history, we should not trouble ourselves much to speculate how the two accounts were to be reconciled; whether it was that St. Paul thought it irrelevant to mention a very short visit to Jerusalem in which he had no interview with Apostles, or that he had even forgotten that visit when he was writing, or that the contribution, though entrusted to St. Paul and St. Barnabas, had actually been delivered by the latter.

Again, there seems every reason to believe that the visit to Jerusalem, of which St. Paul speaks in Gal. ii., is the same as that of which St. Luke tells in Acts xv.: but there are discrepancies. St. Paul says that he went up "by revelation," St. Luke that he went up by appointment of the brethren at Antioch: St. Luke only tells of a public meeting of the Church at Jerusalem, St. Paul of private consultation between himself and the elder Apostles. Yet there is no difficulty in receiving both accounts and regarding them as supplementary. We can accept the statement of St. Luke that St. Paul appeared in Jerusalem as commissioned by the Church of Antioch, and also St. Paul's own statement that it was by revelation the idea had been suggested to him that the way to put an end to the dissensions raised at Antioch by emissaries who claimed to speak with the authority of the Church at Jerusalem, was to send a deputation to the parent Church in order to ascertain whether that claim was well founded. It appears from Acts xv. 3 that in order that the report of the deputation might be above all suspicion "certain others" were joined on it with St. Paul and St. Barnabas. Again, we can readily believe on the authority of Gal. ii., that before the public meeting of which St. Luke tells, St. Paul had, as prudence would suggest, held a conference with the leading Apostles, and had come to an agreement with them as to the line that was to be taken. There would be nothing surprising if St. Luke were not acquainted with what had taken place in such private conference; and, on the other hand, St. Paul's words (Gal. ii. 2) do not exclude allusion to a conference with the Church generally, though it is most to his purpose to dwell on the sanction given to his course of action by the leading Apostles. Clearly discrepancies of the kind here noticed, though they would need to be carefully considered if we were discussing whether the inspiration granted to the sacred writers was such as to preclude the possibility of the smallest inaccuracy, and though the possibility of diversely reconciling them may leave room for doubt or difference of opinion as to some details of the history, yet afford no grounds for suspicion of the good faith of the narrator of either of the accounts we are comparing.

But the criticism which is really worth considering is that which, not content with striving to make capital out of small discrepancies, endeavours to show that the Book of the Acts entirely misrepresents St. Paul's method of preaching the Gospel and his relations to the elder Apostles. In the Acts St. Paul is represented as following the fixed rule of addressing himself to the Jews first, and never feeling himself at liberty to go to the heathen until the Jews have rejected him. In every city he comes to he makes his first visit to the Jewish synagogue, and only turns to the Gentiles when repulsed there (Acts xiii. 45, xviii. 6). Nor even do we find him adopting a different method at Athens (see Acts xvii. 17), where there were facilities for entering into direct discussion with heathen philosophers such as did not exist elsewhere. But we are told that "the real Paul" was from the first profoundly conscious of being distinctly Apostle to the heathen (Gal. i. 15), and would not hear of any distinction of Jew from Gentile, or any privilege of the former over the latter. Again, St. Paul is represented in the Acts as only solicitous to relieve the Gentiles from the yoke of submission to the Jewish Law, but as quite willing that that Law should be observed by those who were Jews by birth; nay, as observing it himself. He goes up to Jerusalem to attend the Jewish feasts (Acts xviii. 21, xx. 16); he circumcises Timothy (xvi. 3); he makes a vow and shaves his head at Cenchrea (xvii. 18); and he finally loses his liberty in consequence of having shown himself in the Temple joining in the offerings made by four other men who had a vow. But we are told that such concessions could never have been made by "the real Paul," who held that men even of Jewish birth ought not to observe the Law, circumcision and salvation being incompatible, for he had told his disciples that if they should be circumcised Christ should profit them nothing. Finally, the sermons ascribed to St. Paul in the Acts only treat of the Messiahship of Jesus and of the doctrine of the Resurrection, and are silent on the topic of which St. Paul's mind was full, viz. justification by faith without the works of the Law, while the language put in the mouth of St. Peter is thoroughly Pauline. And generally the representation given in the Acts of the friendly attitude of St. Peter and St. James towards St. Paul and his preaching is said to be incredible in view of what the Epistle to the Galatians reveals as to the hostility between St. Paul and the elder Apostles.

Now, if we had to admit the interpretation of the Epistle to the Galatians to be correct, which represents St. Paul as from the first conceiving his mission to be exclusively to the Gentiles, we should be forced to agree with the extreme critics of Baur's school, who, holding with their master that the representations in the Acts and in the Galatians are irreconcilable with each other, declare that the former are so much the more credible that if we have to reject one or other we must reject the latter. In fact the method of preaching ascribed to St. Paul by St. Luke, namely that of beginning by preaching in the Jewish synagogues, is exactly that which a Christian missionary might have been expected to adopt. Even if he had the conversion of Gentiles solely in view, it was in the synagogues that he would find Gentiles already convinced of the folly of polytheism, and acquainted with the Jewish prophecies, and thus prepared to follow the proof that these prophecies were fulfilled in Jesus. But it is not credible that one who loved his own nation so ardently as St. Paul (Rom. ix. 3) would make no effort for the conversion of at least some of them; and the rule of preaching ascribed to him in Acts xiii. 46, "It was necessary that the word of God should first be preached to you," is in perfect harmony with Rom. i. 16, "to the Jew first and also the Gentile." In any case, we can assert with certainty that the Gentile converts, addressed in the Galatian letter, had been made through the road of Judaism. They are all assumed to be well acquainted with the Old Testament and to acknowledge its authority, nor could the success with them of the Jewish inculcators of circumcision be credible if they had not been previously well affected towards Judaism. They were then exactly such converts as would have been made if St. Paul's method of preaching had been such as St. Luke describes.

Again St. Luke's account that St. Paul was led on to realize his commission as Apostle to the Gentiles only gradually, and through the providential leading of events, is far more credible than that he assumed this attitude at once on his conversion. Surely the transition to becoming a preacher from having been a persecutor of Jesus Christ was startling enough to fill one period of the Apostle's life, and we ought in all reason to allow him a considerable time to familiarize himself with his new position before expecting him to make a second change equally startling, that from having been a bigoted Jew to one who rejected all the rules of Judaism, and made no difference between circumcised and uncircumcised. If St. Paul had made this change at once, he would have found himself in a position of complete isolation and without a single sympathizer. But no one could less afford to dispense with sympathy than St. Paul. His Epistles reveal him as a man of the strongest affections, always accompanied in his missionary travels by a band of fellow-workers, unhappy when left alone by them, and, we may well believe, roused to the highest indignation against the Judaizers, through his strong affection for his Gentile converts, on whom it was proposed to lay an intolerable burden.

Again, it is a complete misunderstanding of the doctrine of St. Paul's Epistles to imagine that he censured the observance of Jewish rites by men of Jewish birth. His doctrine all through is that such observance is, as far as salvation is concerned, a thing indifferent; that compliance with national customs is not a duty and not a sin. Those who had not been circumcised need not be circumcised; those who had were not to obliterate the mark of circumcision (1 Cor. vii. 18). He himself (1 Cor. ix. 20) gives direct confirmation to St. Luke's account of his conduct, declaring that to the Jews he had become as a Jew, to those under the Law as under the Law, becoming all things to all men that he might by all means save some. It is quite intelligible that a man holding these principles should refuse to circumcise Titus when the rite was insisted on as a necessity, but be willing to circumcise Timothy, who by the mother's side was of Jewish birth, when his uncircumcision put a bar to his usefulness as a preacher of the Gospel. It may be added that no statement in the Acts is more trustworthy than that of the circumcision of Timothy, since, as we have already remarked, an attentive study of the whole section shows that St. Luke must have got his information from Timothy himself.

Lastly, with regard to St. Luke's report of St. Paul's preaching, surely no wise missionary to heathen would begin by entangling them in controversies internal to Christians. Men must be made to believe that Jesus was the Messiah and that He rose from the dead before they could be expected to take interest in the question whether or not he had included in his Gospel the condition of compliance with Mosaic ordinances. St. Luke's narrative might justly have been suspected if he had represented St. Paul as pursuing a different course in such sermons as he has reported. For St. Paul himself has named these two fundamental points as the essential conditions of salvation, "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. x. 9). Since the Epistle to the Galatians reports that James, Cephas, and John had acquiesced in St. Paul's mission to the heathen, no apology is necessary if St. Luke in his report of their public utterances represents them as in accordance with St. Paul.

The Council of Jerusalem.—Although St. Luke's narrative in Acts xv. admits of easy reconciliation with Gal. ii., there remains the difficulty that no mention is made in Galatians of the letter which St. Luke reports as sent to different Churches, stating the obligations to which it was agreed on at the Jerusalem conference that Gentiles should be subjected; and further that when St. Paul himself (1 Cor. viii. x.; Rom. xiv.) discusses the lawfulness of eating meat offered to idols, he completely disregards the injunctions of that apostolic letter. Here it must be owned that the Pauline Epistles enable us to correct the impression which the narrative in the Acts, if it stood alone, would convey. It has been common with Church writers to speak of the meeting related in Acts xv. as the "first general council;" and, one might thence infer, as having made ordinances binding on the Church in all times and all places. But in point of fact the prohibition against eating blood is not only obsolete among ourselves, but had become so in the time of St. Augustine (Cont. Faust. xxxii. 13), where he tells that those who were scrupulous in this matter were then only laughed at. And he explains the prohibition as one temporarily necessary when Jewish members of the Church were numerous, who could not join in a common meal with those that did not observe it, but as needless where Jewish Christians were scarcely to be found. Yet in the 2nd century this prohibition was observed, and probably derived its authority from this very chapter of the Acts. One of the Lyons martyrs of the year 177 (Euseb. H. E. v. i. 27), when questioned concerning the stock calumny that Christians at their meetings drank human blood, exclaimed, "How could we drink the blood of men, who do not think it lawful to drink the blood of beasts!" (see also Tert. Apol. 9.) The juxtaposition also in Rev. ii. 14, 20, of committing fornication and eating things sacrificed to idols, falls in completely with St. Luke's account, that an apostolic letter containing these two prohibitions in close sequence had been widely circulated. The letter itself, however, as given by St. Luke, is only addressed to the "brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch and Syria and Cilicia"; and it appears from St. Paul's Epistles that he did not think himself bound to give it a wider application. While he gladly accepted the relief from the necessity of circumcision which that letter gave to Gentile converts, he himself regarded the use of meat offered to idols as a thing in itself indifferent, and which only became unlawful on account of the scandal which it might cause.

We must be struck with the modernness of the Apostle's views on this subject. The opinions widely current at the time are most fully exhibited in the Pseudo-Clementine writings. They teach that food offered in an idol temple was taken possession of by the demon who really was the divinity there worshipped: that consequently that food became so changed in its character that any one who partook of it, whether he knew what had befallen it or not, was liable to be taken possession of by the same demon. These ideas passed into the Christian Church, and the benediction of food before use was felt by many to be not merely, as we regard it, an act of thanksgiving to God for His bounty, but also a protection against demonic power. Thus Gregory the Great in his Dialogues tells of a nun who in a garden inadvertently ate a lettuce without crossing herself, and so became possessed by a demon who chanced to be on the lettuce at the time (Dial. i. 4). To our feelings the advice given by St. Paul to his converts commends itself as what would naturally be given by a man wise and sensible as well as pious, and as not involving any matter of controversy. His advice in substance was, "Do not trouble yourself with anxious scrupulosity about the food you eat. Meat will not make you better or worse. If it has even been brought into the idol temple, it cannot communicate to you any pollution it may have received there. But if it appears that your partaking of these dedicated meats will be construed by your heathen hosts into homage or adherence to false gods; or if, though intending no such homage yourselves, you influence by your example brother Christians, not so well instructed as yourselves, to do what to their mind implies adherence to idolatry, then what had before been indifferent becomes unlawful." This advice takes for granted that meat offered to idols has not in itself the power of communicating pollution or causing injury to the recipient, and that, if we are bound to abstain, it is not for our own sake but for that of others. But, however readily we might grant this, it was no matter of course that it should be conceded in St. Paul's time. In fact the opposite theory is maintained in books written not long after his time by men of good natural gifts, well acquainted with the philosophy of their day, of varied knowledge and considerable intellectual acuteness. Our Lord however, when asked about certain foods supposed to be polluting, threw His answer into a pointed form well adapted to fix itself on the memory of the hearers: "Not that which goeth into the mouth, but that which cometh out of the mouth, defileth a man." Though St. Paul was not a personal hearer of our Lord, this maxim of His could scarcely have been unknown to him, and it may well have influenced the advice he gave his converts. Looking on the question in the light he did, it is intelligible that he would not care to extend the absolute prohibition of the Jerusalem conference further than to the Churches to which it was addressed, and that he would feel himself free to permit Christians elsewhere to use their liberty provided it were so done as to cause no hurt to others.

The Conflict with St. Peter.—Although it would be impossible in this article to discuss all the passages in the Epistle on which serious controversy has arisen, it would not be right to leave unnoticed a passage which has attracted so much attention as that (ii. 11 sq.) which reveals the fact that at one time two leading Apostles were at open variance with each other. Porphyry used it to undermine the credit of both Apostles, arguing that either St. Peter is convicted of ignorance of the religion which he professed to teach, or St. Paul of gross disrespect towards an elder Apostle. The Pseudo-Clementine romance of which St. Peter is the hero, regards opposition to him as only possible to have been made by an enemy; and though in referring to the transaction it suppresses St. Paul's name and substitutes that of Simon Magus, yet coincidences of language with the Epistle to the Galatians clearly show that St. Paul was intended. Clement of Alexandria appears to have felt that disagreement between Apostles was impossible; and he solved the difficulty by the hypothesis that Cephas, under which name the teacher rebuked by St. Paul is designated in the Galatians, was not Peter the Apostle, but only one of the seventy disciples (Luke x.). The arguments in favour of this view were that St. Peter had in the case of Cornelius eaten with men uncircumcised, and would be unlikely afterwards to be ashamed to act in the same way; that the Acts make no mention of any public difference between St. Paul and St. Peter; and that the words in Gal. ii. 13, "even Barnabas was carried away by their dissimulation," imply that the Cephas spoken of was a person inferior to St. Barnabas, since if St. Peter had been intended we should not have expected to read "not only Peter, but even Barnabas." However much such a solution had to recommend it to Church writers, it was found impossible to maintain it when it was fairly compared with the context in the Epistle. Origen then devised a new way of understanding the transaction, which for a couple of centuries or more held its ground in the East as the true explanation of what had taken place. Origen's work has been lost, but we have a full exposition of his theory in a sermon by St. Chrysostom on the passage. We can well adopt his account of the circumstances of the case. The Apostles in Judaea would not run the risk of disturbing the infant faith of their disciples by a premature pulling up of the practices in which they had been rooted from their earliest years. It was otherwise with St. Paul when he preached to the Gentiles, who had never been accustomed to such rules. Thus quite naturally St. Peter and his Churches in Judæa observed the Jewish practices; St. Paul and his Gentile converts did not. When St. Peter came down to Antioch, he naturally conformed to the practices which he found established there, as St. Paul conformed to Jewish practices when he went to Jerusalem. But when Jerusalem Jews came down to Antioch, St. Peter, not to shock their weak faith, went back to the mode of living which they had always known him to use; and then certain of the permanent members of the Church of Antioch were led to follow St. Peter's new example, and thus gave rise to the scene described in the Epistle. St. Chrysostom will not believe that there was any real disagreement between the Apostles; but he regards St. Paul's public rebuke and St. Peter's submission to it as a scene arranged between them in order that St. Peter might be justified in the eyes of the Jerusalem visitors. Just, he says, as those whose duty it is to collect taxes shrink from the odium attending the disagreeable task of pressing severely on their debtors, and have recourse to the expedient of getting their superiors publicly to press them for what they are bound to bring in, and to bitterly revile them for their remissness, so that they can then do their work without offence, it being plain to all that the rigour they exercise is forced on them and not their own choice. Thus we are to understand the scene between St. Peter and St. Paul as an arranged apology to excuse the former for a change in his course of action, which would have given great offence if supposed to be made altogether of his own choice.

St. Jerome, who adopts this theory, adds a more offensive illustration. He tells how often he had seen in the Roman law courts two counsel reviling each other with the utmost bitterness, who yet might be seen a little after out of court walking together the best possible friends. To this illustration St. Jerome added a more questionable defence of the lawfulness of temporary simulation; and it is not wonderful that this line of exposition grated harshly on the deep religious feeling of St. Augustine, whose correspondence with St. Jerome about this passage constitutes one of the most interesting specimens of patristic Biblical criticism. St. Augustine reduces the question to this: Is it better to maintain that the Apostle Paul wrote something that was not true or that the Apostle Peter did something that was not right? To say that St. Peter on this occasion did no wrong is to give the lie to St. Paul, who tells that "Peter walked not uprightly after the truth of the Gospel." And if we can imagine this statement of St. Paul to be false, we lose all confidence in the truth of any passage of Scripture.

The result of this controversy was to bring about a general agreement that there was a real difference of opinion between the Apostles, and that St. Paul was justified in rebuking St. Peter, not as erroneous in his doctrine, but as faulty in his practice. But it must be mentioned that the earliest Western writer who dealt with the passage had taken St. Peter's side. Marcion had justified his rejection of the authority of the elder Apostles by quoting St. Paul's accusation of St. Peter as having walked "not uprightly according to the truth of the Gospel;" and Tertullian, whose impulse in controversy always is to catch at the first weapon near at hand, replies: "True, but this was when St. Paul was still young in the faith, still uncertain whether he had run or might be still running in vain. His expostulation with Peter was but the outbreak of the zeal against Judaism of a new convert, which Paul himself retracted when he became older and had learned to become all things to all men, and even to the Jews to become a Jew" (Adv. Marc. i. 4). But when Tertullian recurs to the subject, he drops this apology, which is hardly consistent with the reverence for St. Paul which he always exhibits, and takes the usual ground that it was only St. Peter's practice which was faulty, and that no question of doctrine was involved.

Modern critics who contend that St. Peter's conduct manifests a real difference of doctrine from St. Paul, exhibit inability to enter into the feelings of the people of the time. Some help towards this is given by our knowledge of the caste system of our Indian Empire. Different views have been taken by missionaries as to whether they ought to tolerate the observance of caste by their converts, as a mere national custom, belonging to the secular sphere with which religion has no concern, or whether they should demand of their converts the abandonment of caste on pain of rejection or excommunication. Evidently the possibility of carrying out the former plan depends much on whether or not there is a mixture of races in the Church. In Palestine in the first age of Christianity the members of the Church were all Jews, and there seemed no reason why they should forsake their national customs. By compliance with them (if that can be called compliance which was not so much a concession to the feelings of others as a satisfaction to the feelings and prejudices in which they themselves had been brought up), Jews in Palestine, who believed in the Messiahship of Jesus, could preserve the friendship and esteem of their unconverted brethren. This, we are told, was the case with St. James the Just. But it was otherwise where races were mixed; and the Indian caste system enables us to understand the difficulties felt by a Christian Jew on finding himself obliged to mix with Gentiles as brethren and on the most intimate terms. A Jew like St. Paul, who quite cast off his national exclusiveness, would be looked on as having lost caste, and so would be regarded by unbelieving Jews as a renegade more deserving of hatred than a Gentile; while even Christian Jews could not conquer their dislike at such laxity, feeling towards it much as Queen Elizabeth and other non-Romanists did to a married priesthood. Feelings cannot be altered in a moment, and the heart will still revolt at what the intellect can give no good reason for condemning.

English residents abroad who have persuaded themselves that there is no harm in conforming to some foreign customs condemned by the code of English propriety, will still feel uncomfortable when their laxity comes under the eye of their own countrymen. And nothing can be more natural than that St. Peter, though convinced in theory that there was nothing wrong in his conforming to the practices of the Church of Antioch in associating with Gentiles, should feel much ashamed when detected in his laxity by visitors from Jerusalem. On the other hand, the natural effect of his conduct was that the Gentile converts, whom so great an Apostle pronounced to be unfit for his society, were put under strong temptation to do whatever might be necessary to raise themselves to the higher level; and this naturally drew strong remonstrance from St. Paul. But there is no reason to understand the "compulsion" spoken of in his question, "Why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" as of any other kind than that necessarily exercised by his practice and example. "have for the most part an independent value; the later are mere collections or digests of the labours of preceding writers." Greek: Of Origen's vast comm. on Galatians only three fragments remain in a Latin tr. of Pamphilus' Defence of him; but probably "all subsequent writers are directly or indirectly indebted to him to a very large extent." St. Chrysostom's com. (c. A.D. 390) is less homiletic and more continuous than his other treatises on the N. T., Eng. tr. in Library of the Fathers, Oxf. 1840. St. Jerome's com. (c. 387) was written in haste (Pref. to B. iii.), like most of his works, and is partly a digest of previous expositions. "Though abounding in fanciful and perverse interpretations, violations of good taste and good feeling, faults of all kinds, this is nevertheless the most valuable of all the patristic comm. on the Ep. to the Gal." St. Augustine's Expositio of the Ep. is thought to be all his own; but it does not rank among his best works. As a sample of later comm. that of Claudius of Turin (c. 815) may be taken. He professes merely to compare; and his choice is determined by his fondness for allegorical interpretation. Of the N. T. catenae that on Gal. alone is printed entire; Paris, 1542; *Bibl. GALBANUM (גלבנן, cheb'náh), one of the perfumes employed in the preparation of the sacred incense (Ex. xxx. 34). The similarity of the Hebrew name to the Greek γαλβάνη and the Latin Galbanum has led to the supposition that the substance indicated is the same. The galbanum of commerce is brought chiefly from India and the Levant. It is a resinous gum of a brownish yellow colour, and strong, disagreeable smell, usually met with in masses, but sometimes found in yellowish tear-like drops. The ancients believed that when burnt the smoke of it was efficacious in driving away serpents and gnats (Plin. xii. 56, xix. 58, xxiv. 13; Virg. Georg. iii. 415). But, though galbanum itself is well known, the plant which yields it has not been exactly determined. Dioscorides (iii. 87) describes it as the juice of an umbelliferous plant growing in Syria, and called by some μετάνιον (cp. i. 71). Kühn, in his commentary on Dioscorides (ii. p. 532), is in favour of the Ferula ferulago (L.), which grows in North Africa, Crete, and Asia Minor. According to Pliny (xii. 56) it is the resinous gum of a plant called stagonitis, growing on Mount Amanus in Syria; while the metopion is the product of a tree near the oracle of Ammon (xii. 49). The testimony of Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. ix. 7), so far as it goes, confirms the accounts of Pliny and Dioscorides. It was for some time supposed to be the product of the Bubon galbanum of Linnaeus, a native of the Cape of Good Hope. Don found in the galbanum of commerce the fruit of an umbelliferous plant of the tribe Silerinae, which he assumed to be that from which the gum was produced, and to which he gave the name of Galbanum officinale.* But his conclusion was called in question by Dr. Lindley, who received from Sir John Macneil the fruits of a plant growing at Durrood, near Nishapore, in Khorassan, which he named Opidia galbanifera, of the tribe Smyrneae. This plant has been adopted by the Dublin College in their Pharmacopoeia, as that which yields the galbanum (Pereira, Mat. Med. ii. pt. 2, p. 188). M. Buhse, in his Persian travels (quoted in Royle, Mat. Med. pp. 471, 472), identified the plant producing galbanum with one which he found on the Demawend mountains. It was called by the natives Khas-such, and bore a very close resemblance to the Ferula erubescens, but belonged neither to the genus Galbanum nor to Opidia. It is believed that the Persian galbanum, and that brought from the Levant, are the produce of different plants. But the question remains undecided.

If the galbanum be the true representative of the cheld'nah of the Hebrews, it may at first sight appear strange that a substance which, when burnt by itself, produces a repulsive odour, should be employed in the composition of the sweet-smelling incense for the service of the Tabernacle. We have the authority of Pliny that it was used, with other resinous ingredients, in making perfumes among the ancients; and the same author tells us that these resinous substances were added to enable the perfume to retain its fragrance longer. "Resina aut gummi adjiciuntur ad continendum odorem in corpore" (xiii. 2). Galbanum was also employed in adulterating the opobalsamum, or gum of the balsam plant (Plin. xii. 54). [W. A. W.]

GAL-EED (גַּלְעָד) = heap of witness; A. Bov-vds m'artus; Acerus testimonii Galaad. The name given to the heap which Jacob and Laban made on Mount Gilead, in witness of the covenant between them (Gen. xxxi. 47, 48; cp. vv. 23, 25). [GILEAD; JEGAR-SAHA-DUTHA.]

GAL'GALA (גַּלְגָּלָה; Galgala), the ordinary equivalent in the LXX. for Gilgal. In the E. V. it is named only in 1 Macc. ix. 2, as designating the direction of the road taken by the army of Demetrius, when they attacked Masaloth in Arbela—"the way to Galgala" (ὁδὸν τὴν εἰς Γάλγαλα). The army, as we learn from the statements of Josephus (Ant. xii. 11, § 1), was on its way from Antioch, and there is no reason to doubt that by Arbela is meant the place of that name in Galilee now surviving as Irbid.

* I have not been able to discover either Galbanum officinale or Opidia galbanifera growing in Syria. There is a specimen of the latter in the Herbarium at Cambridge from Northern Persia, which is probably the true home of the plant.—[H. B. T.]

[ARBELA.] The ultimate destination of the army was Jerusalem (1 Macc. ix. 3), and Galgala may therefore be either the upper Gilgal near Bethel, or the lower one near Jericho, as the route through the Ghor or that through the centre of the country was chosen (Ewald, Gesch. iv. 370). Josephus omits the name in his version of the passage. It is a gratuitous supposition of Ewald's that the Galilee which Josephus introduces is a corruption of Galgala; on the other hand, Galilee may be the correct reading in 1 Macc. ix. 2. [G.] [W.]

GALILAE'AN (Γαλιλαῖος; Galilaeus), an inhabitant of Galilee (Matt. xxvi. 69 in R. V. only; Mark xiv. 70; Luke xiii. 1, 2, xxii. 59, xxiii. 6; John iv. 45; Acts ii. 7; also in the Greek in Acts i. 11, v. 37). [W.]

GALILEE (Γαλιλαία). The Hebrew word גַּלְיָלָה, Galil, rendered "Galilee" (LXX. Γαλιλαία) in the O. T.—probably to keep up the correspondence with the N. T.—is derived from a root גַּלַּל "to roll." In the plural form, GELILOTH (A. V. "borders," "coasts;" R. V. "regions"), it occurs five times in the O. T., and is applied on each occasion to level or slightly undulating districts, such as Philistia and the Jordan Valley near Jericho. Galil would appear then to signify level or undulating ground, and was perhaps used in this sense in Josh. xx. 7, xxi. 32, 1 Ch. vi. 76, to indicate the plain in which Kadesh Naphtali was situated. At a later period the word was apparently used in a wider sense to denote a district. The "land of Galilee," which probably lay close to the borders of Hiram's kingdom, contained twenty cities (1 K. ix. 11-13); and, in 2 K. xv. 29, Galilee is mentioned as a distinct locality, whence the people were carried away captive to Assyria. The expression "Galilee of the nations," or "of the Gentiles" (גַּלְיָלָה לְכָל הָעַמִּים), Is. ix. 1; in Matt. iv. 15, Γαλιλαία τῶν ἐθνῶν; in 1 Macc. v. 15, Γαλιλαία ἀλλοφύλων), indicates a still more extended area; but it is by no means clear that it refers to a region with fixed geographical limits.

The northern tribes established themselves slowly in their possessions, and did not drive out the Canaanites, who continued to dwell amongst them (Judg. i. 30-33; iv. 2). Even under the monarchy the heathen element in the population was strong; the cities given by Solomon to Hiram must have been heathen cities; and Isaiah (ix. 1) uses the term "Galilee of the nations." After the people of Upper Galilee had been taken captive by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. xv. 29; Jos. Ant. ix. 11, § 1), the country was probably occupied by heathen, and there is no record of its having been re-settled by Hebrews after the return from the Captivity. The period at which Galilee was constituted a separate administrative district is uncertain, but it was possibly during the time of the Persian domination. It is first mentioned, with Judaea and Samaria, in the letter from Demetrius to Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Macc. x. 30; Jos. Ant. xiii. 2, § 3); and was then a toparchy, having approximately the same limits as the later district under the Herods. In Judith i. 8 there is an indication of the topographical division into Upper and Lower Galilee. At the commencement of the Asmonaeen revolt the number of Jews in Galilee must have been small. They took no part in the rebellion, and it was only after Judas Maccabaeus had established himself in Judaea, and had restored the Temple service, that the war spread to Galilee. The Galilaean Jews, being oppressed by the heathen amidst whom they lived, appealed to Judas for protection, and Simon Maccabaeus was sent to their assistance. After a successful campaign Simon returned to Judaea, taking with him the Jews he had rescued, "with their wives and their children, and all that they had" (1 Macc. v. 14, 15, 17, 20, 21, 23, 55; Jos. Ant. xii. 8, § 2). The object of this deportation was probably to strengthen the position of the insurgent Jews in the hill-period, Jews and Judaized Aramaeans formed a large majority of the population. In B.C. 47 Antipater, having been made procurator of Judaea by Julius Caesar, entrusted the government of Galilee to his son Herod (Jos. Ant. xiv. 9, § 2); and the district afterwards, B.C. 40, formed part of the dominion over which Herod was made king. On Herod's death, B.C. 4, Herod Antipas was made tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (Ant. xvii. 8, § 1), and he retained the government until his banishment in A.D. 39—a period that included the whole life of Christ (Luke xxiii. 7). Galilee now passed to Herod Agrippa I. (Ant. xviii. 7, § 2), who died suddenly, A.D. 44, at Caesarea; it was then placed under the Roman procurator of Judaea, and, with the exception of Tiberias, Tarichaeae, and a small adjoining district, which were given to Herod Agrippa II. (Ant. xx. 8, § 4), so remained until the outbreak of the final war in A.D. 66.

Galilee, in the time of Christ, was the most northern of the three districts into which Palestine west of the Jordan was divided (Luke xvii. 11; Acts ix. 31; Jos. B. J. iii. 3, § 1); and included, roughly speaking, the territories assigned to Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali. It was bounded on the S. by Samaria, and stretched from the foot of the Samaritan hills northwards to the river Leontes; on the W. it was separated from the sea by the territories of Ptolemais and Tyre, and on the E. it extended to the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee or Tiberias. Its limits were at one time close to Ptolemais (1 Macc. v. 55), Carmel once belonged to it (Jos. B. J. iii. 3, § 1), and according to the Talmudists (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, pp. 236, 240, 242) it embraced Caesarea Philippi, Gamala, and the country above Gadara. Josephus (B. J. iii. 3, § 1) divides Galilee into "Lower Galilee," which extended from Tiberias, on the E., to Zebulun, perhaps Sh'aili, on the W., and from Xaloth, Iksal, on the plain of Esdraelon, to Bersabe; and "Upper Galilee," which stretched northwards from Bersabe to Baca, on the Tyrian frontier, and from Meloth, perhaps M'ali, on the W., to Thella, near the Jordan. We learn, incidentally, that Lower Galilee extended as far as the village of Ginea, the modern Jenin, on the extreme southern side of the plain of Esdraelon (Ant. xx. 6, § 1; B. J. iii. 3, § 4); that Chabolo, Kabul, was on the confines of Ptolemais (Vit. 43); and that Arbela (Irbid) and Jotapata (Jef'at) were in Lower Galilee (Vit. 37; B. J. ii. 20, § 6). The Mishna (Sheb'uth, ix. 2) adds a third division, "the valley" or district of Tiberias; and defines Upper Galilee as the country beyond Kefr Hananiah, Kefr 'Anán, in which the sycamore does not grow, and Lower Galilee as the district, below that village, in which it flourishes. The division is a natural one, and easily understood, for, beyond Kefr 'Anán, the range of Jebel Jurrmuk rises, almost like a wall, for about 2,000 feet, and separates the rugged hills of Jebel Safed and the Belad Besharah from the rich open country to the south. The Mishna (Gittin, vii. 8) places Kefr Utheni, or Uthnai, perhaps Kefr Adán, N.W. of Jenin, on the frontier between Galilee and Samaria; and, according to Tal. Bab. Gittin, 7 b, Kezib (ex-Zib) was the last town of Galilee towards the north-west. Eusebius (OS, p. 256, 90) appears to call Upper Galilee "Galilee of country of Judaea. Under Jonathan Maccabaeus the power of the Asmonaeans rapidly increased and apparently extended over Galilee (Jos. Ant. xiii. 2, § 3; 4, § 9; 5, § 6). Jonathan defeated the generals of Demetrius at Kadash in Galilee (1 Macc. xi. 63-74; Jos. Ant. xiii. 5, § 6); and it was in Galilee that he fell into the fatal snare laid for him by Tryphon (1 Macc. xii. 47, 49; Jos. Ant. xiii. 6, § 2). Galilee formed part of the Jewish state founded by the Asmonaeans, and no doubt partook of the general prosperity under the rule of Hyrcanus. It was perhaps at this time that the Jews began to settle in Galilee; and the richness of the country and the facilities it offered for trade must have attracted large numbers of emigrants from the less fertile hills of Judaea, for, during the Herodian

Upper Galilee is a mountainous district, "the mount Naphtali" of the O. T. (Josh. xx. 7), parted from the lofty range of Mount Lebanon, of which it is a southern prolongation, by the deep ravine of the Leontes. The highland plateau is diversified by picturesque, deeply-cut valleys, small but rich upland plains, and steep hills, clad with brushwood, that often attain an altitude of over 3,000 feet, and culminate in Jebel Jermuk, 3,934 feet. It is in places well wooded with dwarf oak, intermixed with tangled shrubberies of hawthorn and arbutus; but it is above all "a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills" (Deut. viii. 7). On the E. the plateau ends with an abrupt descent to the Jordan valley, and the rich plain of Ard el-Kheit that borders the el-Hâleh Lake; and on the W. it gradually breaks down to the Phœnician plain. It was once covered with fruitful fields and vines; and its fruits were renowned for their great sweetness (Tal. Bab. Megilla, 6 a); and it is still well cultivated by a numerous and industrious population. The plateau is so cut up by an intricate system of valleys that no important trade routes could ever have crossed it, and communication must always have been difficult. The ancient main roads were: (1) from Tyre by Kul'at Mârân and Abriha to Dan and Caesarea Philippi; (2) from the Sea of Galilee up the Jordan Valley; and (3) from Safed by Kades, Kedesh Naphtali, and Hunîn to the bridge over the Leontes. On the plateau are the ruins of Kedesh (Josh. xx. 7, apparently the "Nephtali in Galilee" of Tobit i. 2); of Gischala, el-Jish, a city fortified by Josephus, and the last place in Galilee to hold out against the Romans (B. J. ii. 20, § 6; iv. 1, § 1; 2, §§ 1-5); and of several towns with large synagogues. The chief town is now Safed, which has a large population of Jews, and is one of the four holy Jewish cities of Palestine.

Lower Galilee is characterised by the number and richness of its plains, and is one of the most beautiful and fertile districts in Palestine. The soil is especially favourable to agriculture, and here and there are spots well wooded with oak and other trees. The hills sink down in graceful slopes to broad winding vales of the richest green; the outlines are varied, the colours soft; and the whole landscape is one of picturesque luxuriance. Renan describes it in glowing terms as "un pays très-vert, très-ombagé, très-souriant, le vrai pays du Cantique des cantiques et des chansons du bien-aimé" (Vie de Jésus, p. 43). The plains commence with that of er-Rameh, 1,250 feet above the sea, at the foot of Jebel Jermuk. To the south of this is the Sahel el-Buttauf, the "great plain of Asochis" (Jos. Vit. 41), from the eastern end of which there is a rapid descent to the plain of Gennessareth, celebrated alike for its beauty and the fruitfulness of its soil (B. J. iii. 10, § 8). Above Tiberias is the Sahel el-Ahna, with its rich volcanic soil; and, towards the southern extremity of the district, the hills fall rapidly to the great plain of Esdraelon, to enjoy which Issachar was content to become "a servant unto tribute" (Gen. xlix. 15). The blessings promised to Zebulun and Asher (Gen. xlix. 13, 20; Deut. xxiii. 18, 19, 24) seem to be inscribed on the features of the country; it is "a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil olive, and honey" (Deut. viii. 8). Josephus describes the soil of Galilee as "universally rich and fruitful, and planted with trees of all sorts, so that by its fruitfulness it invites even the most slothful to take pains in its cultivation" (B. J. iii. 3, §§ 2, 3). According to the Talmudists, the country for 16 miles round Sepphoris was fertile, "flowing with milk and honey" (Tal. Bab. Megilla, 6 a); and the fruits of Gennessareth were so luscious that they were not sent to Jerusalem at the time of Feasts, lest men should be tempted to go up to the Feasts for the sake of eating them (Tal. Bab. Pesachim, 8b). The productions of Galilee were of the most varied description; oil was plentiful (Jos. Vit. 13, 30; B. J. ii. 21, § 2); and the climate was so favourable to the growth of the olive-tree, that according to the Talmud it was easier to raise a forest of olive-trees in Galilee than a child in Judaea (Neubauer, Géog. du Tal. p. 180). At Achabara pheasants were raised; Arbela was noted for its cloth; Bethshean, "the gate of Paradise," for its linen, its olives, and its exuberant fertility; Capernaum and Chorazin were celebrated for their wheat, Safed for its honey, Shikmonah for its pomegranates, Sigona for its wine, and Kefr Hananiah for its pottery. The indigo plant was cultivated near Magdala; in the spring the ground was carpeted with flowers, and the vine, the fig, the walnut, the almond, the oleander, the myrtle, the balsam, the palm, and many other trees, shrubs, and aromatic plants flourished in this "garden that has no end" (Neubauer, pp. 180-240; Jos. B. J. iii. 3, §§ 2, 3; 10, § 8). The fisheries of the Sea of Galilee provided occupation for large numbers of fishermen; Tarichææ, "the salting station," supplied the best fish for salting (Strabo, xvi. 2, § 45); and the salt fish was sent to all parts of the country, especially to Jerusalem at the time of the great Feasts, when it was possibly sold outside the "Fish Gate." Lower Galilee was well provided with roads: one ran from Acre to er-Râmeh, and then, climbing the high hills, joined the road northwards from Safed through Upper Galilee; another ran from Acre by Sepphoris to Tiberias and the Jordan valley; and a third, over which grain was brought down from the fertile plains east of Jordan to the sea, crossed the great plain of Esdraelon to Jerzeel, and passed on by Scythopolis and Gadara to the Hawân. The great trade route that connected Egypt with Damascus and Syria entered Lower Galilee at Megiddo, and running on past the Sea of Galilee, crossed the Jordan at Jisr Benat Yakûb. No small portion of the commerce between the east and the west passed over these roads, of which one was known as the "way of the sea," the via maris of the Middle Ages, and added to the wealth of the district. The chief towns of Lower Galilee were Tiberias, Tarichææ, Sepphoris, Gabara, Gischala, Zebulun; the fortresses of Jotapata and Mount Tabor; and those mentioned in N. T. history, Nazareth, Cana, Capernaum, and Chorazin.

It is evident from the Gospels and also from Josephus, that, in the time of Christ, Galilee was densely populated and thickly covered with towns and villages. Josephus states that there were

204 cities and villages, the very least of which contained more than 15,000 inhabitants (Vit. 45; B. J. iii. 3, § 2); that on one occasion 100,000 armed men assembled in a single night (B. J. ii. 21, § 3); and that Herod Antipas had armour for 70,000 men in his armoury (Ant. xviii. 7, § 2). The Sea of Galilee was covered with ships and boats: Josephus collected 230 on one occasion at Tarichææ (B. J. ii. 21, § 8); and "the whole basin must have been a focus of life and energy; the surface of the lake constantly dotted with the white sails of vessels, flying before the mountain gusts, as the beach sparkled with the houses and palaces, the synagogues and the temples of the Jewish or Roman inhabitants" (Stanley, S. and P. p. 376). The numbers of Josephus are possibly exaggerated, but apart from these the extensive ruins at Tell Hüm, Kerázeh, and other places, and the numerous ruined synagogues, such as those at Kefer Birim, Meiron, &c., attest the former prosperity of the district. Jews and Arameans and others who had accepted the Law of Moses, formed a large majority of the population; but there were numbers of Greeks, Egyptians, Arabs, and Phœnicians intermingled with them (Jos. Vit. 6, 12; Strabo, xvi. 2, § 34). The people were industrious and enterprising, and engaged in agriculture and commerce. They were courageous and warlike, a heritage of olden times (Judg. v. 18), and regarded honour more than money (Tal. Jer. Ketuboth, iv. 14). Cowardice was never a failing of the Galilæans, who were inured to war from infancy (Jos. B. J. iii. 3, § 2); and during their last struggle with the Romans, they constantly showed a supreme contempt for death. The independent spirit of the Galilæans sometimes showed itself in armed opposition to the constituted authority (B. J. i. 16, § 5); and the people of Tiberias are described as being "by nature disposed to changes, and delighting in seditions" (Vit. 17). During the disorders that followed the death of Herod the Great, Judas, son of Hezekiah, raised some men and seized Sepphoris (Ant. xvii. 10, § 5). Judas the Galilæan, the founder of the sect of the Galilæans, who taught that God alone was Lord and Master, and that no one should submit to mortal men as masters, raised a revolt in Judæa, whilst Coponius was procurator (Acts v. 37; Jos. Ant. xviii. 1, §§ 1, 6; B. J. ii. 8, § 1). They were Galilæans, perhaps rebels, who were put to death by Pilate at the time of the sacrifice (Luke xiii. 1); and, at a later period, Galilee was the centre of the rebellion which ended in the capture and destruction of Jerusalem. Some of the most noted of the defenders of the Holy City during the last siege were Galilæans, as Eleazar, who perished at Masada, and John of Gischala. The Talmud (Neubauer, Géog. du Tal. p. 182) mentions certain differences between the religious ceremonies as practised in Galilee and Judæa; and it would seem, from Matt. xv. 1, where the Pharisees appear as emissaries from the dominant party of Jerusalem, that the Galilæans lacked the narrow prejudices of the people of Judæa, and maintained a certain independence in religious matters. They also differed in speech. A Galilæan was known by his accent, or dialect (Matt. xvi. 73; Mark xiv. 70; Acts ii. 7; Tal. Bab. Erubin, 53 a; Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 141), and appears in the Talmud as a lout or boor (Erubin, 53 b). There seems to have been a settled belief that Galilee could produce no prophet (John vii. 52); and the reputation of Nazareth may be inferred from the question, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (John i. 46). It is possible that Galilee was regarded as a subject or inferior district, by the descendants of the men who had risen and won their freedom under the Asmonæans, and that the Jews of Judæa and Jerusalem considered themselves superior to the Galilæans. But there is no evidence in the Bible or in Josephus to show that Galilee and the Galilæans were, as is sometimes stated, looked upon with contempt. That such feelings arose and were freely expressed at a later date, when Christianity was spreading amongst Jews and Gentiles, is very probable, for the new religion was often connected with the home of its Founder. The Emperor Julian is said to have called the Christians "Galilæans" in his edicts, in order to cast dishonour on them, and to have cried out on receiving his death-wound, "Galilæan! thou hast conquered!" (Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. iii. 8, 21, 25. The accounts about his death and of his last words are, however, very diverse. See Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. n.)

Galilee first acquired a world-wide interest through "Jesus the Galilæan" (Matt. xxvi. 69, R. V.). It was at Nazareth that the child Jesus "grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom;" and at Cana that He performed His first miracle (John ii. 11). It was the scene of the greater part of our Lord's private life and public acts; here were Capernaum, "His own city," in which He dwelt (Matt. iv. 13; ix. 1), and "the cities wherein most of His mighty works were done" (Matt. xi. 20); and here He showed himself to His disciples after His Resurrection (Matt. xxviii. 7, 16; John xxi. 1). The Apostles were also either by birth or residence chiefly Galilæans (Acts i. 11; ii. 7).

It may be remarked that the first three Gospels are chiefly taken up with our Lord's ministrations in Galilee; while the Gospel of St. John dwells more upon those in Judæa. The nature of our Lord's parables and illustrations was greatly influenced by the peculiar features and products of the country. The vineyard, the fig-tree, the shepherd, and the desert in the parable of the Good Samaritan, were all appropriate in Judæa; while the corn-fields (Mark iv. 28), the fisheries (Matt. xiii. 47), the merchants (Matt. xiii. 45), and the flowers (Matt. vi. 28), are no less appropriate in Galilee. After the destruction of Jerusalem Galilee became the chief seat of Jewish schools of learning, and the residence of their most celebrated Rabbins. The National Council or Sanhedrin was taken for a time to Jabneh in Philistia, but was soon removed to Sepphoris, and afterwards to Tiberias (Lightfoot, Opp. ii. p. 141). The Mishna was here compiled by Rabbi Judah Hakkodesh (c. A.D. 109-220); and a few years afterwards the Gemara was added (Buxtorf, Tiberias, p. 19). Remains of splendid synagogues still exist in many of the old towns and villages, showing that from the 2nd to the 7th century the Jews were as prosperous as they were numerous (PEF. Mem. vol. i.; Conder, Handbook to Bible, pp. 301-314; Porter, Handbook:

GALILEE, MOUNTAIN IN (Matt. xxviii. 16), where Jesus manifested Himself to His disciples after His Resurrection. The particular mountain referred to is unknown. It may possibly have been the "Mount of Beatitudes" (Matt. v. 1), or the high mountain of the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1). The view that it was one of the knolls on the ridge of Olivet is evidently wrong, for it is distinctly stated that the disciples went into Galilee. Some have supposed that St. Paul refers to this manifestation of Christ in 1 Cor. xv. 6. [W.]

GALILEE, SEA OF. [GENNESARETH.]

GALL, the representative in the A. V. of the Hebrew words mēréráh or méróráh, and rósh:
1. Mēréráh or méróráh (מֵרֵרָה or מֵרֹרָה; χολή; fel, amaritudo, viscera mea) denotes etymologically "that which is bitter"; see Job xiii. 26, "thou writest bitter things against me." Hence the term is applied to the "bile" or "gall" from its intense bitterness (Job xvi. 13; xx. 25); it is also used of the "poison" of serpents (Job xx. 14), which the ancients erroneously believed was their gall; see Pliny, N. H. xi. 37, "No one should be astonished that it is the gall which constitutes the poison of serpents."

2. Rósh (רֹשׁ or רֵיחַ; χολή, πικρία, ἄγρωσσις; fel, amaritudo, caput), generally translated "gall" by the A. V., is in Hos. x. 4 rendered "hemlock": in Deut. xxxii. 33, and Job xx. 16, rósh denotes the "poison" or "venom" of serpents. From Deut. xix. 18, "a root that beareth rósh" (margin "a poisonous herb"), and Lam. iii. 19, "the wormwood and the rósh," compared with Hos. x. 4, "judgment springeth up as rósh," it is evident that the Hebrew term denotes some bitter and perhaps poisonous plant, though it may also be used, as in Ps. lxxix. 21, in the general sense of "something very bitter." Celsius (Hierob. ii. pp. 46-52) thinks that hemlock (Conium maculatum) is intended, and quotes Jerome on Hosea in support of his opinion, though it seems that this commentator had in view the couch-grass (Triticum repens) rather than "hemlock." Rosenmüller (Bib. Bot. p. 118) is inclined to think that the Lolium temulentum best agrees with the passage in Hosea, where the rósh is said to grow "in the furrows of the field."

Other writers have supposed, and with some reason (from Deut. xxxii. 32, "their grapes are grapes of rósh"), that some berry-bearing plant must be intended. Gesenius (Thes. p. 1251) understands "poppies"; Michaelis (Suppl. Lex. Heb. p. 2220) is of opinion that rósh may be either the Lolium temulentum, or the Solanum ("night-shade"). Oedmann (Verm. Sam. pt. iv. c. 10) argues in favour of the Colocynth. The most probable conjecture, for proof there is none, is that of Gesenius: the capsules of the Papaveraceae may well give the name of rósh ("head") to the plant in question, just as we speak of poppy-heads. The various species of this family spring up quickly in corn-fields, and the juice is extremely bitter. At least nine species of poppy are found in Palestine: our corn-field red poppy (Papaver rhoeas) is as abundant and universal there as in Britain. The opium poppy (Papaver somniferum) is only there found cultivated. A steeped solution of poppy-heads may be "the water of gall" of Jer. viii. 14, unless, as Gesenius thinks, the רֹשׁ מֵרֵרָה may be the poisonous extract, opium; but nothing definite can be learnt.

The passages in the Gospels which relate the circumstance of the Roman soldiers offering our Lord, just before His crucifixion, "vinegar mingled with gall," according to St. Matthew (xxvii. 34), and "wine mingled with myrrh," according to St. Mark's account (xv. 23), require some consideration. The first-named Evangelist uses χολή, which is the LXX. rendering of the Heb. rósh in the Psalm (lxxix. 21) which foretells the Lord's sufferings. St. Mark explains the bitter ingredient in the sour vinous drink to be "myrrh" (οἶνος ἐσμυρρισμένος), for we cannot regard the transactions as different. "St. Matthew, in his usual way," as Hengstenberg (Comment. in Ps. lxxix. 21) remarks, "designates the drink theologically: always keeping his eye on the prophecies of the O. T., he speaks of gall and vinegar for the purpose of rendering the fulfilment of the Psalms more manifest. St. Mark again (xv. 23), according to his way, looks rather at the outward quality of the drink." Bengel takes quite a different view; he thinks that both myrrh and gall were added to the sour wine: "myrrha conditus ex more; felle adulteratus ex petulantia" (in Nom. Nov. Test. Matt. l. c.). Hengstenberg's view is far preferable; nor is "gall" (χολή) to be understood in any other sense than as expressing the bitter nature of the draught. As to the intent of the proffered drink, it is generally supposed that it was for the purpose of deadening pain. It was customary to give criminals just before their execution a cup of wine with frankincense in it, to which reference is made, it is believed, by the οἶνος καταρτίσεως of Ps. lx. 3; see also Prov. xxxi. 6. This, the Talmud states, was given in order to alleviate the pain. See Buxtorf (Lex. Talm. p. 2131), who thus quotes from the Talmud (Sanhed. fol. 43, 1): "Qui exit ut occidatur (ex sententia iudicis) potant eum grano thuris in poculo vini ut distrahatur mens ejus." Rosenmüller (Bib. Bot. p. 163) is of opinion that the myrrh was given to our Lord, not for the purpose of alleviating His sufferings, but in order that He might be sustained until the punishment was completed. He quotes from Apuleius (Metamorp. viii.), who relates that a certain priest "disfigured himself with a multitude of blows, having previously strengthened himself by taking myrrh." How far the frankincense in the cup, as mentioned in the Talmud, was supposed to possess soporific properties, or in any way to induce an alleviation of pain, it is difficult to determine. The same must be said of the οἶνος ἐσμυρρισμένος of St. Mark; for it is quite certain that neither of these two drugs in question, both of which are the produce of the same natural order of plants (Amyridaceae), is ranked among the hypnopoiotics by modern physicians. It is true that Dioscorides (i. 77) ascribes a soporific property to myrrh, but it does not seem to have been so regarded by any other author. Notwithstanding, therefore, the almost concurrent opinion of ancient and modern commentators that the "wine mingled with myrrh" was offered to our Lord as an anodyne, we cannot readily come to the same conclusion. Had the soldiers intended a mitigation of suffering, they would doubtless have offered a draught drugged with some substance having narcotic properties. The drink in question was probably a mere ordinary beverage of the Romans, who were in the habit of seasoning their various wines—which, as they contained little alcohol, soon turned sour—with various spices, drugs, and perfumes, such as myrrh, cassia, myrtle, pepper, &c. (Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Antiq., art "Vinum"). [W. H.]

GALLERY, an architectural term, describing the porticoes or verandahs which are not uncommon in Eastern houses. It is doubtful, however, whether the Hebrew words, so translated, have any reference to such an object. (1.) In Cant. i. 17 (A. V. and R. V. "rafters," A. V. marg. galleries), the word rāhīṭ (רָחִיט) means "panelling," or "fretted work," and is so understood in the LXX. and Vulg. (φάρμακα, laqueare). The sense of a "gallery" appears to be derived from the marginal reading rāhīṭ (רָחִיט, Keri), which contains the idea of "running," and so of an ambulatory, as a place of exercise: this sense is, however, rejected by most commentators. (2.) In Cant. vii. 6 (E. V. v. 5. A. V. "The king is held in the galleries"; R. V. "... held captive in the tresses thereof," i.e. of the hair), rāhīṭ is applied to the hair; the regularly arranged, flowing, locks being compared by the poet to the channels of running water seen in the pasture-grounds of Palestine. [HAIR.] (3.) In Ezek. xli. 15, 16; xlii. 3, 5, the word attīṭ (אֲטִיט, A. V. text and R. V. "gallery," A. V. marg. v. 15, several walks or walks with pillars: Cornill [in loco] has a different reading) seems to mean a pillar, used for the support of a floor. The LXX. and Vulg. give in xlii. 3 περίστρωτον and porticus, but a comparison of vv. 5 and 6 shows that the "galleries" and "pillars" were identical; the reason of the upper chambers being shorter is ascribed to the absence of supporting pillars, which allowed an extra length to the chambers of the lower story (see R. V.). The space thus included within the pillars would assume the corner of an open gallery. [W. L. B.]

GALLEY. [SHIP.]

GALLIM (גַּלִּים) = heaps, or possibly springs; Γαλλίμ [Is.]; Gallim, a place which is twice mentioned in the Bible:—(1.) As the native place of the man to whom Michal, David's wife, was given—"Phalti the son of Laish, who was from Gallim" (גַּלִּים, 1 Sam. xiv. 44). The LXX. has Β. Γομμιά, Α. Γαλλεί, Α*(?) Γαλλεί, and Josephus Γεθλά; but there is no clue either to the situation of the place. In 2 Sam. iii. 15, 16, where Michal returns to David at Hebron, her husband is represented as following her as far as Bahurim, i.e. on the road between the Mount of Olives and Jericho (cp. 2 Sam. xvi. 1). But even this does not necessarily point to the direction of Gallim, because Phalti may have been at the time with Ishbosheth at Mahanaim, the road from which would naturally lead past Bahurim. (2.) The name occurs again in the catalogue of places terrified at the approach of Sennacherib (Is. x. 30): "Lift up thy voice, O daughter (i.e. O inhabitant) of Gallim! attend, O Laish! poor Anathoth!" The other towns in this passage—Aiath, Michmash, Ramah, Gibeah of Saul—are all, like Anathoth, in the tribe of Benjamin, a short distance north of Jerusalem. It should not be overlooked that in both these passages the names Laish and Gallim are mentioned in connexion. Possibly the Ben-Laish in the former implies that Phalti was a native of Laish, that being dependent on Gallim.

Among the names of towns added by the LXX. to those of Judah in Josh. xv. 59, Galem (Γαλέμ, Α. Γαλλίμ) occurs, between Karem and Etheher. In Is. xv. 8, the Vulgate has Gallim for Eglaim, among the towns of Moab.

The name of Gallim has not been met with in modern times. Conder (PEF. Mem. iii. 20) proposes to identify it with Beit Jâla, near Rachel's Tomb, to the south of Jerusalem; but this is too far from the other towns mentioned in Is. x. 30. Eusebius, from hearsay (ἀγύρα), places it near Akkaron (Ekron). [G.] [W.]

GALLIO (Γαλλίων; Gallio), proconsul of Achaia when St. Paul was at Corinth, probably A.D. 53. "Proconsul" (ἀρχὴρωτος, A. V. deputy) was the title of the governor of senatorial provinces, and is therefore used by St. Luke of the governors of (1) Cyprus, Acts xiii. 7; (2) Asia, Acts xix. 38; and (3) Achaia, Acts xviii. 12. Achaia had been an imperial province, but was restored to the senate by Claudius (Suet. Claud. xxv.). [See ACHAIJA.] The description of Gallio as proconsul (R. V.) is therefore an important instance of St. Luke's historical accuracy.

When the Jews accused St. Paul, Gallio, without asking for his defence, dismissed the charge. Encouraged by the action of the proconsul, the Greek bystanders fell on Sosthenes (one of the accusers) and beat him in the precincts of the court. Gallio took no notice of this. The indifference ascribed to him in the words "Gallio cared for none of these things," is not an indifference to religious questions as such, but to the outbreak of Greek spite against the Jews. For another view of the incident, see Ewald, Hist. Isr. vii. p. 380. No stress must be laid on the words "the Greeks" (v. 17, A. V.) in determining the sense; for although probably correct as an explanation of "all" (πάντες), they have no right to stand in the text, and are omitted by R. V. [See SOSTHENES.]

Gallio belonged to a great literary family. He is known to Roman history as the brother of L. Annaeus Seneca, the tutor of Nero. His father, a famous professor of rhetoric, was a Spaniard from Corduba. His nephew Lucan has left us the great poem of the Pharsalia. Gallio's original name was Marcus Annaeus Novatus, and he took the names of Junius Gallio on adoption by L. Junius Gallio, a friend of his father's, and, like him, a great rhetorician. Gallio's brother Seneca speaks most affectionately of him. In a striking passage (Seneca, Nat. Quaest. iv. praef.) he describes the extraordinary charm of his disposition and manner, and the gentle firmness with which he always put aside flattery. There is nothing in the temperate words with which Gallio rejects the Jewish accusation which is inconsistent with this character. A Tertullus would have had no chance with him. Some writers (e.g. Kreyher, Seneca und seine Beziehungen zum Urchristenthum) have seen in Gallio's favour to St. Paul a link in the supposed connexion between St. Paul and Seneca; but see Bp. Lightfoot, Philippians,² "St. Paul and Seneca," p. 299. Gallio's conduct is only one among the many illustrations which the Book of the Acts collects to show the friendly, or at worst the impartial, attitude of the Roman authorities towards Christianity in its early days. Hausrath with some reason considers that the course taken by Gallio opened the way for the rapid and extraordinary growth of the Church of Corinth. The trial before Gallio was a crisis in its history. See his very full article "Gallio" in Schenkel's Bibel-Lex.

For other notices of Gallio in Roman literature, see Seneca, Ep. 104, where his residence in Achaia is mentioned, and Plin. N. H. xxxi. 33. For his character and Spanish origin, see Statius, Silvae, II. vii. 32. He was involved in the ruin of his brother Seneca under Nero, and though spared at first (Tac. Ann. xv. 73) perished later, probably by his own hand (Dio Cass. lxii. 25; and Euseb. Chron. Ol. 211). Wieseler uses what is known of Gallio as evidence to strengthen his system of chronology (Wieseler, Chron. Apost. Zeit. pp. 119-20).

GALLOWS. [PUNISHMENT.]

GAM'A-EL (B. Γάμηλος, A. Γαμαήλ; Ame-nus), 1 Esd. viii. 29. [DANIEL, 3.]

GAMA'LIEL (גמליאל) = God's recompense or care; Γαμαλιήλ; Gamaliel), son of Pedahzur; prince or captain (נשיא) of the tribe of Manasseh at the census at Sinai (Num. i. 10; ii. 20; vii. 54, 59), and at starting on the march through the wilderness (x. 23). [W. A. W.]

GAMA'LIEL (Γαμαλιήλ; Gamaliel: for the Hebrew equivalent, see preceding article), described in Acts v. 34 as "a Pharisee, a doctor of the Law, had in honour with all the people." This description exactly corresponds with that given in the Mishna of Rabban Gamaliel I., who died about A.D. 57, and was at the height of his influence at the time of the trial described in Acts v. He belonged to the milder and more liberal school of Hillel, whose grandson he is said to have been. Some of his decisions are quoted by Hamburger, Real Encyc. Talmud.; but though all on the side of relaxation, yet they relate to such trifling details that it is difficult to gain from them any picture of the man. They are more fully given in Jost, Geschichte d. Judenthums, i. 281 sq. However, the ascription to him (Hamburger, l. c.) of the following precepts, is of interest when we remember that he was the teacher of St. Paul, the Apoetle of the Gentiles (Acts xxii. 3). He is said to have taught that the poor of the heathen should share with Israelites the gleanings and the corn left standing in the corners of the fields; and that it was a duty for Israelites to inquire after their welfare, sustain them, visit their sick, and bury them. He is described as president of the Sanhedrin, but this is probably a late and untrustworthy tradition (see Schürer, Jewish People, Div. II. vol. i. p. 181); and in the narrative of Acts v. he appears as an ordinary member, though having great weight. The influence which enabled him to carry the Sanhedrin with him (Acts v. 40) is illustrated also by the proviso that a certain decision of the Sanhedrin passed in his absence should only have force if it obtained his approval (Edai-joth, 77, quoted by Hamburger). With the exaggeration of eulogy, it was said that at his death reverence for the Thora ceased, and the observance of the laws of purity and separation came to nought. He was the earliest teacher to whom the title of Rabban was given, a higher degree than Rab or Rabbi. His discourse in Acts v. 35-39 seems to regard the question of "this counsel" being from men or from God, as an open one, without betraying a leaning to one side or the other. Still the syntactical connexion of "let them alone," with the words "lest haply ye be found fighting against God," may be held to show an inclination to the Christian side, which is not inconsistent with the probable attitude of the Pharisees at this period as contrasted with the active persecuting zeal of the Sadducees. Ecclesiastical mythology has seized with its usual eagerness on this indication, and Clem. Recog. i. 65 represents him as a Christian. "He was secretly our brother in the faith, but by our advice kept his place among them," i.e. the Sanhedrin. It is unnecessary to follow here the development of this legend, so inconsistent with the honour in which he was held by Jewish tradition; but full references are given in Schürer, Jewish People, Div. II. vol. i. p. 364. Besides authorities already quoted, see Derenburg, Hist. et Geog. Pal. xv. [E. R. B.]

GAMES. Of the three classes into which games may be arranged,—juvenile, manly, and public,—the first two alone belong to the Hebrew life; the latter, as noticed in the Bible, being either foreign introductions into Palestine or the customs of other countries. With regard to juvenile games, the notices are very few. It must not, however, be inferred from this that the Hebrew children were without the amusements adapted to their age. The toys and sports of childhood claim a remote antiquity; and if the children of the ancient Egyptians had their dolls of ingenious construction, and played at ball (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i. 197 [1878]), and if the children of the Romans amused themselves much as those of the present day—

"Aedificare casas, postello adjungere mures, Ludere par impar, equitare in arundine longa"

(Hor. 2 Sat. iii. 247)—

we may imagine the Hebrew children doing the same, as they played in the streets of Jerusalem (Zech. viii. 5). The only recorded sports, however, are keeping tame birds (Job xli. 5; cp. Catull. ii. 1, Passer, deliciae meae puellae) and playing at marriages or funerals (Matt. xi. 16).

With regard to manly games, they were not much followed up by the Hebrews; the natural earnestness of their character and the influence of the climate alike indisposed them to active exertion. The chief amusement of the men appears to have consisted in conversation and joking (Jer. xv. 17; Prov. xxvi. 19). A military exercise seems to be noticed in 2 Sam. ii. 14, but the term under which it is described (Πῆψ) is of too general an application to enable us to form an idea as to its character: if intended as a sport, it must have resembled the G'erid, with the exception of the combatants not being mounted; but it is more consonant to the sense of the passage to reject the notion of sport and give sichék the sense of fencing or fighting (Thenius, Comm. in loc.). In Jerome's day the usual sport consisted in lifting weights as a trial of strength, as also practised in Egypt (Wilkinson, i. 207 [1878]). Dice are mentioned by the Talmudists (Mishna, Sanhedr. 3, 3; Shabb. 23, 2), probably introduced from Egypt (Wilkinson, ii. 424 [1878]); and if we assume that the Hebrews imitated, as not improbably they did, other amusements of their neighbours, we might add such games as odd and even, nora (the micare digitis of the Romans), draughts, hoops, catching balls, &c. (Wilkinson, i. 188 [1878]). If it be objected that such trifling amusements were inconsistent with the gravity of the Hebrews, it may be remarked that the amusements of the Arabians at the present day are equally trifling, such as blind man's buff, hiding the ring, &c. (Wellsted's Arabia, i. 160).

Public games were altogether foreign to the spirit of Hebrew institutions: the great religious Festivals supplied the pleasurable excitement and the feelings of national union which rendered the games of Greece so popular, and at the same time inspired the persuasion that such gatherings should be exclusively connected with religious duties. Accordingly the erection of a gymnasium by Jason, in which the discus was chiefly practised, was looked upon as a heathenish proceeding (1 Macc. i. 14; 2 Macc. iv. 12-14), and the subsequent erection by Herod of a theatre and amphitheatre at Jerusalem (Joseph. Ant. xv. 8, § 1), as well as at Caesarea (Ant. xv. 9, § 6; B. J. i. 21, § 8) and at Berytus (Ant. xix. 7, § 5),—in each of which a quinquennial festival in honour of Caesar was celebrated with the usual contests in gymnastics, chariot-races, music, and with wild beasts,—was viewed with the deepest aversion by the general body of the Jews (Ant. xv. 8, § 1).

The entire absence of verbal or historical reference to this subject in the Gospels shows how little it entered into the life of the Jews: some of the foreign Jews, indeed, imbibed a taste for theatrical representations; Josephus (Vita, 3) speaks of one Aliturus, an actor of farces (μυμολόγος), who was in high favour with Nero. Among the Greeks the rage for theatrical exhibitions was such that every city of any size possessed its theatre and stadium. At Ephesus an annual contest (ἀγὼν καὶ γυμνικὸς καὶ μουσικὸς, Thucyd. iii. 104) was held in honour of Diana, which was superintended by officers named Ἀσιάρχαι (Acts xix. 31; R. V. "chief officers of Asia"). [ASIAARCHÆ.] It is probable that St. Paul was present when these games were proceeding, as they were celebrated in the month of May (cp. Acts xx. 16; Conybeare and Howson's St. Paul, ii. 81). A direct reference to the exhibitions that took place on such occasions is made in the term θηριαμαχία (1 Cor. xv. 32). The θηριαμαχοί were sometimes professional performers, but more usually criminals (Joseph. Ant. xv. 8, § 1), who were exposed to lions and other wild beasts without any means of defence (Cic. Pro Sext. 64; Tertull. Apol. 9). Political offenders were so treated, and Josephus (B. J. vii. 3, § 1) records that no less than 2,500 Jews were destroyed in the theatre at Caesarea by this and similar methods. The expression as used by St. Paul is usually taken as metaphorical, both on account of the qualifying words κατ' ἄνθρωπον, the absence of all reference to the occurrence in the Acts, and the rights of citizenship which St. Paul enjoyed (cp. Evans in Speaker's Comm., Schnedermann in Strack u. Zöckler's Kjpf. Komm.). Certainly St. Paul was exposed to some extraordinary suffering at Ephesus, which he describes in language borrowed from, if not descriptive of, a real case of θηριαμαχία; for he speaks of himself as a criminal condemned to death (ἐπιθανάτιος, 1 Cor. iv. 9; ἀπόκριμα τοῦ θανάτου ἐσχάκαμεν, 2 Cor. i. 9), exhibited previously to the execution of the sentence (ἀπέδειξεν, 1 Cor. i. c.), reserved to the conclusion of the games (ἐσχάτους), as was usual with the theriomachi ("novissimos elegit, velut bestiariorum," Tertull. de Pudic. 14), and thus made a spectacle (θέατρον ἐνεστήθημεν). Lightfoot (Excerpta on 1 Cor. xv. 32) points to the friendliness of the Asiarchs at a subsequent period (Acts xix. 31) as probably resulting from some wonderful preservation which they had witnessed. Nero selected this mode of executing the Christians at Rome, with the barbarous aggravation that the victims were dressed up in the skins of beasts (Tac. Ann. xv. 44). St. Paul may possibly allude to his escape from such torture in 2 Tim. iv. 17. Cp. Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Ant. art. "Bestiarii."

St. Paul's Epistles abound with allusions to the Greek contests, borrowed probably from the Isthmian games, at which he may well have been present during his first visit to Corinth (Conybeare and Howson, ii. 206). These contests (ὁ ἀγὼν—a word of general import, the fight, as the R. V. has it, 2 Tim. iv. 7; 1 Tim. vi. 12) were divided into two classes, the pancratium, consisting of boxing and wrestling, and the pentathlon, consisting of leaping, running, quitting, hurling the spear, and wrestling. The competitors (ὁ ἀγωνιζόμενος, 1 Cor. ix. 25; ἐὰν ἀβλήῃ τις, 2 Tim. ii. 5) required a long and severe course of previous training (cp. σωματικὴ γυμνασία, 1 Tim. iv. 8), during which a particular diet was enforced (πάντα ἐγκρατεύεται, δουλαγέγων, 1 Cor. ix. 25, 27). In the Olympic contests these preparatory exercises (προγυμνάσματα) extended over a period of ten months, during the last of which they were conducted under the supervision of appointed officers. The contests took place in the presence of a vast multitude of spectators (περικείμενον νέφος μαρτύρων, Heb. xii. 1), the competitors being the spectacle (θέατρον=θέαμα, 1 Cor. iv. 9; θεαζόμενοι, Heb. x. 33). The games were opened by the proclamation of a herald (κηρύξας, 1 Cor. ix. 27), whose office it was to proclaim the name and country of each candidate, and especially to announce the name of the victor before the assembled multitude. Certain conditions and rules were laid down for the different contests, as, that no bribe be offered to a competitor: that in boxing the combatants should not lay hold of one another, &c.: any infringement of these rules (ἐὰν μὴ νομίμως ἀδύσῃ, 2 Tim. ii. 5) involved a loss of the prize, the competitor being pronounced disqualified (ἀδόκιμος, 1 Cor. ix. 27; indignus brabeo, Bengel). The judge was selected for his spotless integrity (ὁ δίκαιος κριτής, 2 Tim. iv. 8): his office was to decide any disputes (βραβεύεσθαι, Col. iii. 15; A. V. and R. V. "rule," R. V. marg. Gr. arbitrate) and to give the prize (τὸ βραβεῖον, 1 Cor. ix. 24; Phil. iii. 14), consisting of a crown (στέφανος, 2 Tim. ii. 5, iv. 8) of leaves of wild olive at the Olympic games, and of pine or, at one period, ivy at the Isthmian games. These crowns, though perishable (φθαρτόν, 1 Cor. ix. 25; cp. 1 Pet. v. 4), were always regarded as a source of unfeigned exultation (Phil. iv. 1; 1 Thes. ii. 19): palm branches were also placed in the hands of the victors (Rev. vii. 9). St. Paul alludes to two only out of the five contests, boxing and running, more frequently to the latter. In boxing (πυγμαχία; cp. pugetio, 1 Cor. ix. 26), the hands and arms were bound with the cestus, a band of leather studded with nails, which very much increased the severity of the blow, and rendered a bruise inevitable (ὄπισθίον, 1 Cor. i. c.; ὄπισθια = τὰ ὀπίσθον, 1 Cor. ix. 26), the hands and arms were bound with the cestus, a band of leather studded with nails, which very much increased the severity of the blow, and rendered a bruise inevitable (ὄπισθίον, 1 Cor. i. c.; ὄπισθια = τὰ ὀπίσθον, 1 Cor. ix. 26). The skill of the combatant was shown in so avoiding the blows of his adversary that they were expended on the air (οὐκ ὡς ἀέρα δέρον, 1 Cor. i. c.). The foot-race (δρόμος, 2 Tim. iv. 7, a word peculiar to St. Paul; cp. Acts xiii. 25, xx. 24, rendered "course" by A. V. and R. V.) was run in the stadium (ἐν σταδίῳ; A. V. and R. V. "race" [R. V. marg. Gr. race-course]; 1 Cor. ix. 24), an oblong area, open at one end and rounded in a semicircular form at the other, along the sides of which were the raised tiers of seats on which the spectators sat.

The Iacon.

The race was either from one end of the stadium to the other, or, in the διαυλος, back again to the starting-post. There may be a latent reference to the διαυλος in the expression ἀρχηγὸν καὶ τελειωτήν (Heb. xii. 2); Jesus being, as it were, the starting-point and the goal, the locus a quo and the locus ad quem of the Christian's course. The judge was stationed by the "goal" (R. V. σκοπὸν; A. V. "mark"; Phil. iii. 14), which was clearly visible from one end of the stadium to the other, so that the runner could make straight for it (οὐκ ὡς ἀόρατος, 1 Cor. ix. 26). St. Paul brings vividly before our minds the earnestness of the competitor, having cast off every encumbrance (ἄγκυρον ἀποθέμενοι πάντα), especially any closely-fitting robe (εὐπερίστατον, Heb. xii. 1; cp. Conybeare and Howson, ii. 543), holding on his course uninterruptedly (διάκω, Phil. iii. 12), his eye fixed on the distant goal (ἀφορῶντες, ἀπέβλεπε, Heb. xii. 2, xi. 26; ἀπὸ notat longe, Bengel), unmindful of the space already past (τὰ μὲν ὀπίσθον ἐπιλατῶμενος, Phil. i. c.), and stretching forward with bent body (ταῖς δὲ ἔμπροσθεν ἐπεκτεινόμενος), his perseverance (δι' ὑπομονῆς, Heb. xii. 1), his joy at the completion of the course (μετὰ χαρᾶς, Acts xx. 24), his exultation as he not only receives (ἔλαβον, Phil. iii. 12) but actually grasps (καταλάβω, "apprehend," in A. V. and R. V. Phil.; ἐπιλαβοῦ, 1 Tim. vi. 12, 19) the crown which had been set apart (ἀπόκειται, 2 Tim. iv. 8) for the victor. Cp. Dean Howson's 4th Essay on "The Metaphors of St. Paul" (Sunday Magazine, 1866-7). [W. L. B.]

GAMMA'DIMS (ΓΑΜΔΙΣ). This word occurs only in Ezek. xxvii. 11, where it is said of Tyre, "the Gammadims were in thy towers." A variety of explanations of the term (some obsolete, like the Vulg. Pygmaei; see first edit. of this work) have been offered. (1.) Some treat it as a geographical or local term; reading (a) ΓΑΜΔΙΣ (Gen. x. 2, Cappadocians; so Lagarde), or (b) ΓΑΜΔΙΣ (Gen. x. 18, a Canaanitish people; so Cornill). (2.) Others retain the present reading and give a more general sense to the word. Gesenius (Thesaur. p. 292) connects it with ΓΑΜΔ, a staff, whence the sense of brave warriors, hostes arborum instar caedentes; and Roediger supports the signification of warriors from the Syriac  (Add. ad Gesen.

Thes. p. 79). After all, the rendering in the LXX., φύλακες, furnishes the simplest explanation: and the Lutheran translation has followed this, giving Wächter. The following words of the verse—"they hanged their shields upon the walls round about"—are illustrated by one of the bas-reliefs found at Kouyunjik (see preceding cut). [W. L. B.] [F.]

GAMUL (ΓΑΜΟΥΛ) = weaned; B. δ Γαμούλ. A. Ἰαχέιν; Gamu), a priest; the leader of the 22nd course in the service of the sanctuary (1 Ch. xxiv. 17).

GAR (Γὰρ; Sasus). "Sons of Gar" are named among the "sons of the servants of Solomon" in 1 Esd. v. 34. There are not in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah any names corresponding to the two preceding and the six succeeding this name. The form of the name in the A. V. is derived from the Aldine text (see Speaker's Comm. in loco). [F.]

GARDEN (גַּרְדֵּן, גַּרְדֵּן; κήπος). Gardens in the East, as the Hebrew word indicates, are inclosures, on the outskirts of towns, planted with various trees and shrubs. From the allusions in the Bible we learn that they were surrounded by hedges of thorn (Is. v. 5), or walls of stone (Prov. xxiv. 31). For further protection lodges (Is. i. 8; Lam. ii. 6) or watch-towers (Mark xii. 1) were built in them, in which sat the keeper (גַּרְדֵּן, Job xxvii. 18) to drive away the wild beasts and robbers, as is the case to this day. Layard (Nin. & Bab. p. 365) gives the following description of a scene which he witnessed:—"The broad silver river wound through the plain, the great ruin cast its dark shadows in the moonlight, the lights of the lodges in the gardens of cucumbers flickered at our feet, and the deep silence was only broken by the sharp report of a rifle fired by the watchful guards to frighten away the wild boars that lurked in the melon beds." The scarecrow also was an invention not unknown (προβασκανιον, Bar. vi. 70).

The gardens of the Hebrews were planted with flowers and aromatic shrubs (Cant. vi. 2, iv. 16), besides olives, fig-trees, nuts, or walnuts (Cant. vi. 11), pomegranates, and others for domestic use (Ex. xxiii. 11; Jer. xxix. 5; Amos ix. 14). The quince, medlar, citron, almond, and service trees are among those enumerated in the Mishna as cultivated in Palestine (K'lainim, i. § 4). Gardens of herbs, or kitchen-gardens, are mentioned in Deut. xi. 10 and 1 K. xxi. 2. Cucumbers were grown in them (Is. i. 8; Bar. vi. 70), and probably also melons, leeks, onions, and garlic, which are spoken of (Num. xi. 5) as the productions of a neighbouring country. In addition to these, the lettuce, mustard-plant (Luke xiii. 19), coriander, endive, one of the bitter herbs eaten with the Paschal lamb, and rue, are particularised in the precepts of the Mishna, though it is not certain that they were all, strictly speaking, cultivated in the gardens of Palestine (K'lainim, i. §§ 2, 8). It is well known that, in the time of the Romans, the art of gardening was carried to great perfection in Syria. Pliny (ix. 16) says, "Syria in hortis operosissima est; indeque proverbium Græcia, 'Multa Syrorum olera;' and again (xii. 54) he describes the balsam plant as growing in Judæa alone, and there only in two royal gardens. Strabo (xvi. p. 763), alluding to one of these gardens near Jericho, calls it δ τοῦ βασιλέως παράδεισος. The rose-garden in Jerusalem, mentioned in the Mishna (Maaseroth, ii. § 5), and said to have been situated westward of the Temple-mount, is remarkable as having been one of the few gardens which, from the time of the Prophets, existed within the city walls (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. on Matt. xxvi. 36). They were usually planted without the gates, according to the gloss quoted by Lightfoot, on account of the fetid smell arising from the weeds thrown out from them, or from the manure employed in their cultivation.

The gate Gennath, mentioned by Josephus (B. J. v. 4, § 2), is supposed to have derived its name from the rose-garden already mentioned, or from the fact of its leading to the gardens without the city. It was near the garden-ground by the Gate of the Women that Titus was surprised by the Jews while reconnoitring the city. The trench by which it was surrounded cut off his retreat (Jos. B. J. v. 2, § 2). But of all the gardens of Palestine none is possessed of associations more sacred and imperishable than the garden of Gethsemane, beside the oil-presses on the slopes of Olivet. Eight aged olive-trees mark the site which tradition has connected with that memorable garden-scene, and their gnarled stems and almost leafless branches attest an antiquity as venerable as that which is claimed for them. [GETHSEMANE.]

In addition to the ordinary productions of the country, we are tempted to infer from Is. xvii. 10, that in some gardens care was bestowed on the rearing of exotics. To this conclusion the description of the gardens of Solomon in the Targum on Eccles. ii. 5, 6 seems to point: "I made me well-watered gardens and paradises, and sowed there all kinds of plants, some for use of eating, and some for use of drinking, and some for purposes of medicine; all kinds of plants of spices. I planted in them trees of emptiness (i.e. not fruit-bearing), and all trees of spices which the spectres and demons brought me from India, and every tree which produces fruit; and its border was from the wall of the citadel, which is in Jerusalem, by the waters of Siloah. I chose reservoirs of water, which behold! are for watering the trees and the plants, and I made me fish-ponds of water, some of them also for the plantation which rears the trees to water it."

In a climate like that of Palestine the neighbourhood of water was an important consideration in selecting the site of a garden. The nomenclature of the country has perpetuated this fact in the name Eng-gannim—"the fountain of gardens"—the modern Jenin (cp. Cant. iv. 15). To the old Hebrew poets "a well-watered garden," or "a tree planted by the waters," was an emblem of luxuriant fertility and material prosperity (Is. lviii. 11; Jer. xvii. 8, xxxi. 12); while no figure more graphically conveyed the idea of dreary barrenness or misery than "a garden that hath no water" (Is. i. 30). From a neighbouring stream or cistern were supplied the channels or conduits by which the gardens were intersected, and the water was thus conveyed to all parts (Ps. i. 3; Eccles. ii. 6; Eccles. xxiv. 30). It is matter of doubt what is the exact meaning of the expression "to water with the foot" in Deut. xi. 10. Niebuhr (Descr. de l'Arabie, p. 138) describes a wheel which is employed for irrigating gardens where the water is not deep, and which is worked by the hands and feet after the manner of a treadmill, the men "pulling the upper part towards them with their hands, and pushing with their feet upon the lower part" (Robinson, ii. 226). This mode of irrigation might be described as "watering with the foot." But the method practised by the agriculturists in Oman, as narrated by Wellsted (Trav. i. 281), answers more nearly to this description, and serves to illustrate Prov. xxi. 1: "After ploughing, they form the ground with a spade into small squares with ledges on either side, along which the water is conducted. . . . When one of the hollows is filled, the peasant stops the supply by turning up the earth with his foot, and thus opens a channel into another."

The orange, lemon, and mulberry groves which lie around and behind Jaffa supply, perhaps, the most striking peculiarities of Oriental gardens—gardens which Maundrell describes as being "a confused miscellany of trees jumbled together, without either posts, walks, arbours, or anything of art or design, so that they seem like thickets rather than gardens" (Early Trav. in Pal. p. 416). The Persian wheels, which are kept ever working, day and night, by mules, to supply the gardens with water, leave upon the traveller's ear a most enduring impression (Lynch, Exp. to Jordan, p. 441; Siddon's Memoir, p. 187).

The law against the propagation of mixed species (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 9, 11) gave rise to numerous enactments in the Mishna to ensure its observance. The portions of the field or garden, in which the various plants were sown, were separated by light fences of reed, ten palms in height, the distance between the reeds being not more than three palms, so that a kid could enter (Kūām, iv. §§ 3, 4).

The kings and nobles had their country-houses surrounded by gardens (1 K. xxi. 1; 2 K. ix. 27), and these were used on festal occasions (Cant. v. 1). So intimately, indeed, were gardens associated with festivity that horticulture and conviviality are, in the Talmud, denoted by the same term (cp. Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. אַרְיִסוֹת). It is possible, however, that this may be a merely accidental coincidence. The garden of Ahasuerus was in a court of the palace (Esth. i. 5), adjoining the banqueting-hall (Esth. vii. 7). In Babylon the gardens and orchards were inclosed by the city-walls (Layard, Vin. ii. 246). Attached to the house of Joachim was a garden or orchard (Sus. v. 4)—"a garden inclosed" (Cant. iv. 12)—provided with baths and other appliances of luxury (Sus. v. 15; cp. 2 Sam. xi. 2).

In large gardens the orchard (אֲרִיִסוֹת, aristos) was probably, as in Egypt, the inclosure set apart for the cultivation of date and sycamore trees, and fruit-trees of various kinds (Cant. iv. 13; Eccles. ii. 5). Schroeder, in the preface to his Thesaurus Linguae Armenicae, asserts that the word "parden" is of Armenian origin, and denotes a garden near or round a house, planted with herbs, trees, and flowers (see MV.¹¹). It is applied by Diodorus Siculus (ii. 10) and Berosus (quoted by Jos. Ant. x. 2, § 1) to the famous hanging gardens of Babylon. Xenophon (Anab. i. 2, § 7) describes the "paradise" at Celaenae in Phrygia, where Cyrus had a palace, as a large preserve full of wild beasts; and Aulus Gellius (ii. 20) gives "vivaria" as the equivalent of παράδεισος (cp. Philostratus, Vit. Apoll. Tyam. i. 38). The officer in charge of such a domain was called "the keeper of the paradise" (Neh. ii. 8).

The ancient Hebrews made use of gardens as places of burial (John xix. 41). Manasseh and his son Amon were buried in the garden of their palace, the garden of Uzza (2 K. xxi. 18, 26; ἐν τοῖς αὐτοῦ παράδεισος, Jos. Ant. x. 3, § 2). The retirement of gardens rendered them favourite places for devotion (Matt. xxvi. 36; John xviii. 1; cp. Gen. xxiv. 63). In the degenerate times of the monarchy they were selected as the scenes of idolatrous worship

(Is. i. 29; lxv. 3; lxvi. 17), and images of the idols were probably erected in them.

Gardeners are alluded to in Job xxvii. 18 and John xx. 15. But how far the art of gardening was carried among the Hebrews we have few means of ascertaining. That they were acquainted with the process of grafting is evident from Rom. xi. 17, 24, as well as from the minute prohibitions of the Mishna; * and the method of propagating plants by layers or cuttings was not unknown (Is. xvii. 10). Buxtorf says that אֲרִיסִין, 'Arisin (Mishna, Biccurim, i. § 2), were gardeners who tended and looked after gardens on consideration of receiving some portion of the fruit (Lev. Talm. s. v.). But that gardening was a special means of livelihood is clear from a proverb which contains a warning against rash speculations: "Who hires a garden eats the birds; who hires gardens, him the birds eat" (Dukes, Kabb. Blumenlese, p. 141).

The traditional gardens and pools of Solomon, supposed to be alluded to in Eccles. ii. 5, 6, are shown in the Wady Urtás (i.e. Hortus), about an hour and a quarter to the south of Bethlehem (cp. Jos. Ant. viii. 7, § 3). The Arabs perpetuate the tradition in the name of a neighbouring hill, which they call "Jebel-el-Fureidis," or "Mountain of the Paradise" (Stanley, Sin. & Pal. p. 166). Maundrell is sceptical on the subject of the gardens (Early Trav. in Pal. p. 457), but they find a champion in Van de Velde, who asserts that they "were not confined to the Wady Urtás; the hill-slopes to the left and right also, with their heights and hollows, must have been covered with trees and plants, as is shown by the names they still bear, as 'peach-hill,' 'nut-vale,' 'fig-vale,' &c. (Syria & Pal. ii. 27).

The "king's garden," mentioned in 2 K. xxv. 4, Neh. iii. 15, Jer. xxxix. 4, lii. 7, was near the pool of Siloam, at the mouth of the Tyropoeon, north of Bir Eyub, and was formed by the meeting of the valleys of Jehoshaphat and Ben Hinnom (Wilson, Lands of the Bible, i. 498).

* It was forbidden to graft trees on trees of a different kind, or to graft vegetables on trees or trees on vegetables (Kilaim, i. §§ 7, 8).

Josephus places the scene of the feast of Adonijah at En-rogel, "beside the fountain that is in the royal paradise" (Ant. vii. 14, § 4; cp. also ix. 10, § 4). [W. A. W.]

GA'REB (גָּרֵב; Γαρέβ), one of the heroes of David's army (2 Sam. xxiii. 38). He is described as the (A. V. "an") Ithrite; et ipse Jethrites, Vulg. This is generally explained as a patronymic = son of Jether, a family of Kirjath-jearim. It may be observed, however, that Ira, who is also called the Ithrite in this passage, is called the Jairite in 2 Sam. xx. 26, and that the readings of the LXX. vary in the former passage (see Swete in loco). These variations support the sense given in the Syriac Version, which reads in 2 Sam. xx. 26 גָּרֵבִי, i. e. an inhabitant of Jatir in the mountainous district of Judah (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Samuel, in loco). [W. L. B.] [F.]

GA'REB, THE HILL (גְּרֵב עֵלְיָם = scabbed, leprous, Ges., Fürst; Βουνοί Γαρέβ; collis Gareb), named only in Jer. xxxi. 39. A hill outside Jerusalem, mentioned next to "the gate of the corner" as a point on the boundary of the restored city in the latter times. From the context it must have been on the north side of Jerusalem, for the Prophet, in describing the limits of the city, commences at the N.E. (v. 38), and then goes round to the N. and N.W. (v. 39), and the S.W., S., and E. (v. 40). Possibly in Jeremiah's time it was the dwelling-place of the lepers (Lev. xiii. 46). Riehm (s. v.) places it to the S.W. of Jerusalem, and Graf, quoted by Riehm, identifies it with the hill which separated the valleys of Hinnom and Rephaim (Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16). Gesenius (Add. ad Thesaur. p. 80) thinks it may have been Bezetha. Ewald (Gesch. Christus, p. 485) identifies it with Golgotha. It is very possibly the hill above Jeremiah's grotto, outside the Damascus Gate, which is supposed by some authorities to be Golgotha, and near which there appears to have been, at an early period, a leper's hospital, and perhaps the houses of the lepers. GARIZ'IM (גְּרִיזִים, A. Γαριζελ; Gari-zin), 2 Macc. v. 23; vi. 2. [GERIZIM.]

GARLANDS (στεφάνια). The wreaths brought with oxen by the priest of Jupiter at Lystra, when the people were about to worship Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiv. 13). Priests, altars, victims, and votaries were all decked with them. Cp. Tertullian, de Corona, x.; and see Speaker's Comm. in loco. [F.]

GARLICK (גַּרְלִיץ, shūm; τὰ σκόρδα; allia; Arab. ثوم, thūm; Num. xi. 5) is mentioned

among the vegetables and good things of Egypt which the Israelites remembered with regret and murmuring at Taberah in the wilderness (Num. xi. 5). The cultivated garlic of Egypt is identical with our own Allium sativum, which is grown throughout the world, but especially in semi-tropical regions. Its importance as an article of food, or rather as a condiment, in Egypt, is shown by the statement of Herodotus (ii. 125), that an inscription on the Great Pyramid recorded that 1600 talents of silver were expended on radishes, onions, and garlic, for the workmen employed in its construction. The outer casing of the Pyramid having been long ago stripped off, there is now no means of proving or disproving the historian's statement, which, however, contains nothing improbable. The fondness of the Jews for garlic was proverbial among the ancients, and was cast in their teeth as a reproach. Rabbi Solomon, as quoted by Celsius, says: "Hoc proprium genti Ebraeae cacoëthes esse solet, ut comesto alio hircorum more incredibilem foetorem exhalant." Another commentator on the Talmud, Salomon Zevi, pleads in reply that the taste for garlic had come down from their ancestors in the wilderness, and that the Talmud had decided it to be a most wholesome food. Besides the cultivated garlic, no less than 36 species of this family of plants have been enumerated as found wild in various parts of Palestine (see MV.¹¹). The roots of all of them have the same character, but of many the blossoms are very handsome, pink as well as white, and a few exhale a very grateful perfume. [H. B. T.]

GARMENT. [DRESS.]

GARMITE, THE (הַגְּרִמִּית; LXX. [ed. Swete] is altogether different; Garmis). Keilah the Garmite, i. e. the descendant of Garem (see the Targum on this word), is mentioned in the obscure genealogical lists of the families of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 19). Keilah is apparently the place of that name; but there is no clue to the reason of the soubriquet here given it. [G.]

GARRISON. The Hebrew words so rendered in the A. V. are derivatives from the root nāsab, "to place, erect," which may be applied to a variety of objects. (1.) Maššab and maššabāh (מַשְׁבָּב, מַשְׁבָּחָה) undoubtedly mean "a garrison" (A. V. and R. V.), or fortified post (1 Sam. xiii. 23, xiv. 1, 4, 12, 15; 2 Sam. xxiii. 14). (2.) Nēšēb (נִשְׁבָּ) is also used for "a garrison" (A. V. and R. V. in 1 Sam. x. 5, xiii. 3; 1 Ch. xi. 16); but some prefer the sense of a "column" erected in an enemy's country as a token of conquest, like the stelae erected by Sesostris (Her. ii. 102, 106; cp. the LXX. ἀνδρόπη in 1 Sam. x. 5) and think that what Jonathan broke in pieces was a column which the Philistines had erected on a hill (1 Sam. xiii. 3). (3.) The same word is elsewhere taken to mean "officers" placed over a vanquished people (2 Sam. viii. 6, 14; 1 Ch. xviii. 13; 2 Ch. xvii. 2); but there seems no necessity for departing in these cases from the larger term "garrison" (A. V. and R. V.), if the translation "officers" be adopted in 1 K. iv. 17, 19. (4.) The A. V. translates by "garrisons" the מַצְבֹּת of Ezek. xxvi. 11, but the R. V. "pillars" (marg. Or. obelisks) expresses more accurately the reference to those monolithic pillars which were visible symbols or emblems of the presence of the deity. Thus Melcarth was worshipped at Tyre in the form of two pillars (Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, i. pp. 186 sq., 190-1), and the beautiful pillars of the Tyrian temples attracted the attention of Herodotus (ii. 44).

In the Book of the Acts a garrison evidently occupied the "castle" or barracks connected with the Tower of Antonia at Jerusalem (xxi. 34, 37). Its officer and soldiers were the means of rescuing St. Paul, and in its prison he found refuge. On very nearly the same site the present Turkish garrison stands. Some have thought that this garrison was Pilate's praetorium, and therefore the place where Jesus Christ was arraigned before the Roman governor.

In Acts xi. 32 the A. V. "the governor kept the city . . . with a garrison" is more correctly rendered by the R. V. "guarded (ἐφρουρεί) the city." See B. D., Amer. ed. [W. L. B.] [F.]

GASH'MU (גֹּשְׁמוֹ; Gossem), Neh. vi. 6. Assumed by all the lexicons to be a variation of the name of GESHEM (see cc. 1, 2). The words "and Gashmu saith" are omitted in BA., but occur in Σ^α-^αε, καὶ Γοσέμ εἶπεν. [F.]

GA'TAM (גַּתָּם; Γαθόμ [Gen.], B. Γωθόμ, A. Γαθόμ [Ch.]; Gatham, Gathan), the fourth son of Eliphaz the son of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11; 1 Ch. i. 36), and one of the "dukes" of Eliphaz (Gen. xxxvi. 16). Nothing is known about him. [F.]

GATE. 1. נָחַץ, from נָחַץ, to divide, Gesen. p. 1458; πόλη; porta, introitus. 2. פֶּתַח from פָּתַח, to open, Ges. p. 1138; θύρα, πόλη; ostium, a "doorway." 3. חָצַיִת, a vestibule or gateway; ἀλλή, σταθμός; limen, postes. 4. נְרִי, Chald., only in Ezra and Daniel; ἀλλή, θύρα; ostium, fores. 5. נֶדֶר, from נָדַר, to hang down; Gesen. p. 339, a door; θύρα; valva, ostium, fores, the "door" or valve.

The gates and gateways of Eastern cities anciently held, and still hold, an important part, not only in the defence, but in the public economy of the place. They are thus sometimes taken as representing the city itself (Gen. xxii. 17, xxiv. 60; Deut. xii. 12, xvi. 5; Judg. v. 8; Ruth iv. 10; Ps. lxxxvii. 2, cxiii. 2). Among the special purposes for which they were used may be mentioned—1. As places of public resort, either for business, or where people sat to converse and hear news (Gen. xix. 1, xiii. 10, xxxiv. 20, 24; 1 Sam. iv. 18; 2 Sam. xv. 2, xviii. 24; Ps. lxxix. 12; Neh. viii. 1, 3, 16; Shaw, Trav. p. 207). 2. Places for public deliberation, administration of justice, or of audience for kings and rulers, or ambassadors (Deut. xvi. 18, xxi. 19, xxv. 7; Josh. xx. 4; Judg. ix. 35; Ruth iv. 1; 2 Sam. xix. 8; 1 K. xxiii. 10; Job xxix. 7; Prov. xxii. 22, xxiv. 7; Jer. xvii. 19, xxxviii. 7; Lam. v. 14; Amos v. 12; Zech. viii. 16; Polyb. xv. 31). Hence came the usage of the word "Porte" in speaking of the government of Constantinople (Early Trav. p. 349). 3. Public markets (2 K. vii. 1; cp. Aristoph. Eq. 1243, ed. Bekk.; Neh. xiii. 16, 19). [CITIES.] In heathen towns the open spaces near the gates appear to have been sometimes used as places for sacrifice (Acts xiv. 13; cp. 2 K. xxiii. 8).

Regarded therefore as positions of great importance, the gates of cities were carefully guarded and closed at nightfall (Deut. iii. 5; Josh. ii. 5, 7; Judg. ix. 40, 44; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7; 2 Sam. xi. 23; Jer. xxxix. 4; Judith i. 4: see Rev. xxi. 25). They contained chambers over the gateway, and probably also chambers or recesses at the sides for the various purposes to which they were applied (2 Sam. xviii. 24; Layard, Nin. & Bab. p. 57, and note).

Assyrian Gates. (Layard.)

The gateways of Assyrian cities were arched or square-headed entrances in the wall, sometimes flanked by towers (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 388, 395, Nin. & Bab. 231, Mons. of Nin. Pt. 2, pl. 49; see also Assyrian bas-reliefs in Brit. Mus. Nos. 49, 25, 26). In later Egyptian times, the gates of the temples seem to have been intended as places of defence, if not the principal fortifications (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 409 [1878]). The doors themselves of the larger gates mentioned in Scripture were two-leaved, plated with metal, closed with locks and fastened with metal bars (Deut. iii. 5; Judg. xvi. 3; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7; 1 K. iv. 13; 2 Ch. viii. 5; Neh. iii. 3-15; Ps. cvii. 16; Is. xlv. 1, 2; Jer. xlix. 31). Gates not defended by iron were of course liable to be set on fire by an enemy (Judg. ix. 52).

The gateways of royal palaces and even of private houses were often richly ornamented. Sentences from the Law were inscribed on and above the gates, as in Mohammedan countries sentences from the Kurán are inscribed over doorways and on doors (Deut. vi. 9; Is. liv. 12; Rev. xxi. 21; Maundrell, E. T. p. 488; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 29; Rauwolf, Travels, Pt. iii. c. 10;

Ray, ii. p. 278). The principal gate of the royal palace at Ispahan was in Chardin's time held sacred, and served as a sanctuary for criminals (Chardin, vii. 368), and petitions were presented to the sovereign at the gate (see Esth. iv. 2, and Herod. iii. 120, 140). The gateways of Nimrod and Persepolis were flanked by colossal figures of animals.

The gates of Solomon's Temple were very massive and costly, being overlaid with gold and carvings (1 K. vi. 34, 35; 2 K. xviii. 16). Those of the Holy Place were of olive-wood, two-leaved, and overlaid with gold; those of the Temple of fir (1 K. vi. 31, 32, 34; Ezek. xli. 23, 24). Of the gates of the outer court of Herod's temple, nine were covered with gold and silver, as well as the posts and lintels, but the outer one, the Beautiful Gate (Acts iii. 2), was made entirely of Corinthian brass, and was considered far to surpass the others in costliness (Joseph. B. J. v. 5, § 3). This gate, which was so heavy as to require twenty men to close it, was unexpectedly found open on one occasion shortly before the close of the siege (Joseph. B. J. vi. 5, § 3; c. Ap. 9).

The figurative gates of pearl and precious stones (Is. liv. 12; Rev. xxi. 21) may be regarded as having their types in the massive stone doors which are found in some of the ancient houses in Syria. These are of single slabs several inches thick, sometimes 10 feet high, and turn on stone pivots above and below (Maundrell, Early Trav. p. 447; Shaw, p. 210; Burckhardt, Syria, pp. 58, 74; Porter, Damascus, ii. 22, 192; Ray, Coll. of Trav. ii. 429).

Egyptian doorways were often richly ornamented. The parts of the doorway were the threshold (שׁוּבַת, Judg. xix. 27; πρόθυρον, limen) the sideposts (מִנְיָוֶה; σταθμοί; uterque postis), the lintel (שׁוּבַת; φλῆ, superliminare, Ex. xii. 7). It was on the lintel and side-posts that the blood of the Passover lamb was sprinkled (Ex. xii. 7, 22). A trace of some similar practice in Assyrian worship seems to have been discovered at Nineveh (Layard, Nin. ii. 256).

The camp of the Israelites in the desert appears to have been closed by gates (Ex. xxxii. 27).

The word "door" in reference to a tent expresses the opening made by turning up the cloths in front of the tent, or dispensing with them altogether, and the tent is then supported only by the hinder and middle poles (Gen. xviii. 2; Burckhardt, Notes on Bed. i. 42; Robinson, ii. 571).

In the Temple this duty was discharged by Levites; and in the houses of the wealthier classes, and in palaces, persons were especially appointed to keep the door (2 K. xii. 9, xxv. 18; 1 Ch. ix. 18, 19; Esth. ii. 21; Jer. xxxv. 4; מְבַרְכֵי; θυρωροί, πυλωροί; portarii, janitores). In the A. V. these are frequently called "porters," a word which has now acquired a different meaning. The chief steward of the household in the palace of the Shah of Persia was called chief of the guardians of the gate (Chardin, vii. 369). [CURTAIN; HOUSE; TEMPLE.] [H. W. P.]

GATH (גַּת; Γέθ [1 Sam.], Josephus Γίττα), one of the five Philistine strongholds (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 17). The name is usually rendered "wine press" (cp. Joel iv. 13; Neh. xiii. 15; Lam. i. 15), an abbreviated form of גַּת־בַּיַּד, according to Gesenius (Lex.). The ethnic form is גַּתִּי, "Gittite" (2 Sam. vi. 10, &c.); in the feminine, גַּתִּיָּה (Ps. viii. 1, &c.). In Arabic the name might be expected to survive as Jett or Jennata, but no site is known in the required position bearing such a name; and the position of Gath is still a matter of uncertainty. The generally accepted view is that advocated by Dr. Porter in 1857 and by others, which places this stronghold at the important fortress of Tell es-Sâfi, north of Beit Jibrin (see PEF. Mem. ii. p. 415, sheet 16). According to Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 22) Gath was in the territory of Dan and in the vicinity of Jamnia. It is not enumerated in the geographical chapters of the Book of Joshua as belonging to any tribe in particular, and in one passage (Josh. xi. 22) it appears to have remained unconquered in the hands of the Anakim. In the time of David it was still an important Philistine fortress, the native place of the giant Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 4). After the battle in the Valley of Elah (Wâdy Surrâr) the Philistines fled "by the way to Shaaraim ('gates') even unto Gath and unto Ekron." This expression seems to agree with the passage from Josephus already quoted, in placing Gath near the northern limits of the Philistine region, and Gath is enumerated next to Ekron in an earlier passage (1 Sam. vi. 17; cp. 2 Sam. i. 20). Obed-edom the Gittite (2 Sam.

vi. 10) was no doubt a native of Gath, but there is nothing to show that he was a Philistine. The Gittites who followed David from Gath (2 Sam. xv. 18) are mentioned with the Pelethites and Cherethites, who appear also to have come from Philistia, but of whose nationality nothing is known. Achish, king of Gath in David's earlier days (1 Sam. xxi. 10), bears a name perhaps not Semitic, and having no known Semitic derivation—a remark which applies to other Philistine names as well. His father's name was Maoch (1 Sam. xxvii. 2, 3) or Maachah (1 K. ii. 39), and he was still independent in Solomon's time. Whether the Philistine Gath was the city taken by Hazael, king of Syria (2 K. xii. 17), may be doubtful, though not improbable. According to 1 Ch. xviii. 1, David himself took Gath, but his conquest, like those of many other monarchs, Assyrian or Egyptian, had little effect on the permanent history of the town. In the corresponding passage in Samuel (2 Sam. viii. 1; see Wellhausen in loco) Metheg-Ammah stands instead of Gath. Rehoboam is said to have fortified Gath (2 K. xi. 8) with other cities on the borders of his kingdom. These works are not mentioned in the parallel passage in Kings (1 K. xii. 21). Uzziah "brake down the wall of Gath" (2 Ch. xxvi. 6) when pushing his conquests over Philistia; but Amos, writing in the same reign (Amos vi. 2), still speaks of Gath as a Philistine city. In the later prophets (Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5, 6), when Philistine cities are enumerated Gath is not among them. It may have been ruined in the later invasions from Babylon, or by the Persians, but during the days of the Hebrew kings it was always a thorn in the side of Israel.

The references to Gath in monumental records are as yet few and doubtful. In the list of towns in Palestine conquered by Thothmes III. about 1600 B.C. one bears the name Kenetu (No. 93), but this may be the modern Jennata, much further south; No. 63 Jenet is Keft Jennis, which is again too far north; No. 70 Jenet is more possibly Gath. In the time of Amenophis IV., about 1450 B.C., a city named Gimti is noticed in one of the letters from Tell Amarna, and in an inscription of Sargon's it is connected with Ekron. It is mentioned in the above letter with Gedor and Keilah, and may perhaps, as Delitzsch supposes, be Gath. It appears to have been a place of importance, since the "forces of the city of Gimti" were commanded by a prince who successfully drove out the Egyptian garrison. Such notices, however, do not aid us to fix the exact site. Nor is it certain that the true site was known in the time of Eusebius. In the Onomasticon, however (OS. p. 254, 20), he states that Gath was 5 miles from Eleutheropolis, on the way to Diospolis. Jerome (OS. p. 159, 15) adds nothing to this, but in another work (Com. ad Mic. i., in Reland, Pal. ii. p. 286) he says that Gath was still a large village, on the way from Eleutheropolis to Gaza. We may suspect that Gazara, or Gezer, should here stand for Gaza, in which case Jerome's notice would agree with that of Eusebius, which he accepts in translating in the Onomasticon. Under the head of Gath-Rimmon (Γεθρεμμών), Eusebius (OS. p. 255, 38) speaks of the town so called in Dan as being 12 miles from Diospolis (Lydda) on the way to Eleutheros polis. If the same site is intended, the distance from Eleutheropolis to Diospolis is made to be 17 Roman miles in all. The true distance is 24 English miles; but as this route is not one of the great Roman highways, it is possible that we have to deal with mere estimates of distance. There is no remarkable site 5 Roman miles north of Eleutheropolis, Tell es-Sâfi being 7 English miles distant from the site of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin). Thus, though the indications favour the usually accepted site, there is no absolute identification, as yet, of Gath. The Onomasticon (*OS.*² p. 255, 73) makes a false distinction between the Philistine stronghold and the Gath to which the Ark was taken from Ashdod (1 Sam. v. 8) on the way to Ekron. This site is said by Eusebius, and by his translator Jerome, to be between Antipatris (Râs el 'Ain) and Jammia (Yebna)—a vague indication, but one which does not agree with the site already more carefully defined. The authors of the Onomasticon (*OS.*² p. 255, 76) add that there was "another place called Geththim," perhaps meaning Gittaim (Neh. xi. 33).

The site at Tell es-Sâfi is remarkably strong and important. A white chalk cliff stands up on the south 300 feet above the open valley of Elah, and nearly 700 feet above the Mediterranean. The modern village is on the top with a sacred place outside. The name تل الصافي signifies "white (or shining) hill,"* and the cliff is conspicuous at a considerable distance. The houses are of mud; the water supply is from a well in the valley to the north. A few foundations with drafted stones remain, being traces of the important mediaeval castle of Blanchegarde (Alba Specula), which was erected in 1144 A.D. by Fulke of Anjou. It was dismantled by Saladin (Will. of Tyre, xv. 25), and had four towers of equal size. It is mentioned as a castle in 1191 A.D. (Itin. Ric. IV. xxiii. xxxii.), when three hundred Saracens formed the garrison. If this identification of Gath be correct, it seems to have long retained its importance. A good account of the site is given by Robinson (Bib. Res. ii. pp. 29-32). El Mukaddasi (11th cent. A.D.) says the place had a governor of its own. Yâkût (14th cent.) also speaks of it as an important place (see Le Strange, Palestine under Moslems, pp. 41, 544). No antiquities of importance have, however, as yet been found at the site. [C. R. C.]

GATH-HEPHER or GITTAH-HEPHER (גַּת הַחֶפְרָה, 2 K. xiv. 25). The second spelling, (גַּת הַחֶפְרָה) (Josh. xix. 13), is merely the locative case of the name, and is correctly changed to Gath-hepher in the R. V. The name is usually translated "vine press of the pit." This town was on the border of Zebulun and Naphtali, and was the home of Jonah. The site is not identified in the Onomasticon, but Jerome (Comm. on Jonah, quoted by Reland, Pal. ii. p. 786) places it in the second mile from Saphorim, or Diocaesarea, on the road to Tiberias. He says it was a small village where the tomb of Jonah was still shown. Benjamin of Tudela (12th cent.) also says that the tomb of Jonah was shown in his time near Sepphoris (Early Travels in Pal. p. 89); and Isaac Chelo (14th cent.) says that the modern name of Gath-hepher in his time was Mesh-had (Carmoly, Itin. p. 256): it was then a small place, inhabited by a few poor Moslems, but he appears to confound it with Kefr Kenna, where he says that a mosque covered the tomb of Jonah, one of the seven prophets buried in Palestine whose tombs were known. In the Talmud (Tal. Jer. Shebiith, vi. 1; Neubauer, Géog. du Tal. p. 201) it is apparently the same site that is mentioned as גַּת, in connexion with Sepphoris (cp. Bereshith Rabba, 98), as a place standing high, and apparently 3 miles distant.

* In literary notices of this town it is always spelt تل الصافية; but the name as taken down from the peasantry omits the last letter, which is not a radical.

There is no doubt that these references all point to the present village el Mesh-had (PEF. Mem. i. pp. 363, 367, sheet vi.), where one of several supposed tombs of Jonah is still venerated. It is now a small village with a Makâm, or sacred place, surmounted by two domes, and with a population of some 300 Moslems. Sepphoris (Seffûrieh) is about 2½ English miles to the west; Kefr Kenna is half a mile to the north-east. The tomb of Neby Yunis stands high (1250 feet above the Mediterranean), overlooking the plain on the north. Robinson (Bib. Res. ii. p. 350) adopts the traditional view as possible. The site is of great importance as defining the boundary of Zebulun. [C. R. C.]

GATH-RIMMON (גַּת רִמּוֹן), "wine press of the pomegranate," according to Gesenius (Lex.), but perhaps connected with the name of Rimmon, "high" (cp. Gesenius s. v.). There are two places so called in the Bible.

1. A city in the territory of Dau (Josh. xxi. 24; 1 Ch. vi. 69), situated in the vicinity of Bene Berak and Jehud (Josh. xix. 45) or north-east of Joppa. It is with this town that the Onomasticon (*OS.*² p. 255, 58) identifies a village 21 miles south of Lydda [GATH]. The site is quite unknown.

2. A city of Manasseh west of Jordan (Josh. xxi. 25). The LXX. reads Βαβθαῦ or Bethshean, and in the parallel passage (1 Ch. vi. 70) we read Bileam. There is thus great uncertainty as to the text. Within the limits of the tribe of Manasseh we have the name of Rimmon at the village of Kefr Rummân, north of Shechem, and of Gath at Jett, an important site on the edge of the Sharon plain, where the main valley, running N.W. from Shechem, debouches into the lowlands. This latter is probably the Gitta which, according to Justin Martyr, was the home of Simon Magus, but its identity with Gath-rimmon is purely a matter of conjecture (see PEF. Mem. ii. 163-201; and for Kefr Rummân, ii. 45). The site of Jett is the only one known in Southern Palestine, where the name Gath appears to survive. [C. R. C.]

GAZA (גַּזָּא; Γάζα; Arabic, غزة, Ghûzzeh, "strong" or "fortified," Gesenius, Lex. In Deut. ii. 23, 1 K. iv. 24, and Jer. xxv. 20, the A. V. reads AZZAH, which the R. V. corrects into accordance with the general spelling. In cuneiform texts the name is spelt with a guttural, which may be pronounced kh or gh. There is no certainty as to the early pronunciation, since the two sounds which in Arabic are represented by ع and غ are represented by only a single letter [W] in the Hebrew and Phœnician alphabets, down to a very late date; but the exact sound does not affect the radical meaning). One of the most important cities in Palestine, the frontier fortress on the Egyptian highway, and in all ages a place of great strength, barring the road to the south. It is mentioned in Genesis (x. 19) as the limit of the Canaanite territory, and frequently as one of the five great Philistine cities. The latest Biblical notice is in Acts (viii. 26); and both in monumental and classical history the name is familiar. It was the limit of Hebrew conquest (Josh. x. 41), but was apparently not at first reduced, as the Anakim survived in it (xi. 22), though assigned as one of the provincial capitals to Judah (xv. 47). It was taken by the Hebrews in the next generation after Joshua (Judg. i. 18), though in Samson's time (Judg. xvi. 1, 21) it was in the hands of the Philistines. Perhaps it may have been lost during the Midianite incursions (Judg. vi. 4). In David's time it was a Philistine fortress (1 Sam. vi. 17). Hezekiah smote the Philistines as far as Gaza (2 K. xviii. 8). An Egyptian conquest of the city is mentioned by Jeremiah (xlvii. 1, 5), and Amos in earlier times speaks of its approaching desolation (i. 6, 7), but it survived in Zephaniah's time (ii. 4), and Zechariah yet later speaks of it as an inhabited city (ix. 5). Its position on one of the main trade routes along the shore secured its prosperity, in spite of constantly recurring sieges and demolitions. In the N. T. Gaza is mentioned (Acts viii. 26) as reached by a road through deserts, and the region round it has always been very deficient in water supply—a fact which added considerably to its importance.

The earliest account on monuments of this city is found in one of the recently discovered Tell Amarna letters, written by a local governor to the king of Egypt, probably about 1450 B.C. The city was then held by Egypt—probably about the time of the earlier Judges; but the letter speaks of a revolt apparently in favour of the 'Abiri' or "Hebrews" (see PSBA. June 1889, p. 345): "The city of Gaza, belonging to the king, which is on the shore of the sea westwards of the cities of Gath and Carmel (of Judah), fell away to Urgi and to the men of the city of Gath" (Gimti). The Egyptian governor appears to have been taken captive, since the same letter (now in the Boulak Museum) states that he was then "in his house in the city of Gaza." About a century later Gaza is also mentioned in the Travels of a Mohar, at a time when Rameses II. had re-established Egyptian supremacy, during the days of Canaanite oppression under Sisera. The possession of Gaza was always that of a secure base for advance into Palestine; and it appears to have been almost always in the power of Egypt, until that power was overthrown by the Babylonians. We have, however, no account of any siege by Nebuchadnezzar, or by Darius, on their way to Egypt. The city may have surrendered, or have been simply guarded by the invaders. Cambyse is said to have stored his treasures there (Pomp. Mela, i. 11); and according to Arrian (Exped. Alex. ii. 26) the city resisted Alexander the Great for five months, and was finally taken by storm, the men being slain and the women and children sold as slaves, while a new population was taken from the surrounding country. It subsequently acknowledged the sway of the Greek kings of Egypt and of Syria in turn: it was fortified by Bacchides, its environs burned by Jonathan the Hasmonean, and the town itself taken by his successor Simon (1 Macc. xi. 61, 62, xiii. 43; Josephus, Ant. xiii. 5, § 5). Simon imposed the Law on its inhabitants. Other passages (1 Macc. ix. 52, xiv. 7, xv. 28, xvi. 1) which speak of Gazara have been wrongly supposed to refer to Gaza, when in fact Gezer is clearly intended. Strabo is apparently incorrect in supposing Gaza to have remained in ruins in the times succeeding Alexander's siege (xvi. 2, 30), other notices of which occur in Quintus Curtius (4, 6), Plutarch (Alex. ch. 25), Josephus (Ant. xi. 8, §§ 3, 4), as noted by Robinson (Bibl. Res. ii. p. 41). About 96 B.C. Alexander Jannæus destroyed the town after a year's siege (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 13, § 3, and xiv. 5, § 3). It was restored by the Roman general Gabinius, and given to Herod the Great by Augustus, and after his death assigned to Syria (Ant. xv. 7, § 3, and xvii. 11, § 4). The Jews in rebellion against Florus laid it in ruins (Wars. ii. 18, § 1), but it recovered after the fall of Jerusalem, and coins of Titus, Adrian, and later emperors were struck at Gaza (Rel. Pal. pp. 788, 797). The notices of Gaza by later classical writers are extracted by Reland, but do not add materially to our information. Pliny speaks (vi. 28) of the trade routes from Petra and Palmyra which met at this frontier city. Arrian (lib. ii.) makes the distance from the sea to be 20 stadia. The surrounding country, he says, was sandy, and the sea shallow. The city itself was large and placed on a hill with a strong wall. This account clearly refers to the present site of the town, although the distance is slightly overstated, the city being 2 English miles from the shore. Gaza had a small port called the Majuma of Gaza, or in the Greek of Julianus $\lambda\mu\acute{\nu}\epsilon\nu\alpha\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \Gamma\acute{\alpha}\zeta\eta\varsigma$. The word Majuma is apparently a corruption of an Aramaic word (מַיְמָה) and signifies a "seaside" place, but the Greek term was very early adopted among the Jews (in Greek or Roman times) as a designation for the small ports, or rather landing-places, near cities on the Palestine coast, and it survives in the modern Arabic El Mineh (المينة), applied to the ruins at the present landing-place. Sozomen (Hist. v. 3; cp. Reland, Pal. p. 791) mentions this port or Limen of Gaza as called Majuma in Constantine's time, and as containing a population favourable to Christianity. The distance between the two he also gives as 20 stadia. Several other writers quoted by Reland (Eusebius; Marco Diacono, Vita S. Porphyrii, &c.) notice the shore town as distinct from the city itself. According to Eusebius, a Bishop Silvanus of Gaza was martyred in 285 A.D. under Diocletian; and of other Bishops enumerated, no less than six appear, down to 536 A.D., subscribing their names in councils (Euseb. H. E. 8, 13; cp. Rob. Bib. Res. ii. p. 41). In later times there appear to have been Bishops both of the town and of the Majuma (cp. Reland, Pal. ii. p. 209). In the Onomasticon (*OS.*² p. 252, 62) we learn that the city was important in the 4th cent. A.D. (est usque hodie insignis civitas Palestinæ are the words of Jerome's translation), and in the Talmud it is mentioned as still given to idolatry in the same ages (Tal. Jer. Abodah Sarah, i. 4; Tal. Bab., same treatise, 11 b; Neubauer, Géog. Tal. p. 68), but inhabited nevertheless by Jews. That pagan idolatry long survived in Gaza we learn from the Life of St. Porphyry, who is said in 406 A.D. to have been made Bishop, and instructed to demolish the temples, funds being granted by Eudoxia, wife of the Emperor Arcadius, for the erection of a church. There were at this time eight temples to the gods in Gaza; and if this account is correct, they must have been recently restored, since Jerome (Comm. in Esa. xvii. 3; cp. Robinson, Bib. Res. ii. 42) speaks of the destruction, in his own time, of the temple of Marnion, and apparently of the building of an earlier church. The eight deities are said to have been Venus, Apollo, Proserpine, Hecate, the Sun, Fortune, and Juno, with Marnas, who was the chief deity and who is compared to the "Cretan Jove."^a His name is usually translated "our lord," and it is possible that the great statue of Jupiter, discovered some twelve years ago near Gaza and now in the Constantinople Museum, represents Marnas (see Corder's Syrian Stone Lore, p. 287, for a drawing of this statue, which is 15 feet high): the temple of Marnas is said to have been circular, with two rows of pillars. Gaza does not seem to have been frequently visited by the early pilgrims, although the trade relations of its population rendered them favourable to visitors. Antoninus in the 6th cent. A.D. speaks of Gaza and its Majuma as a mile apart. He calls the city magnificent and delightful, its inhabitants most respectable, eminent for all kinds of liberality, and friendly to pilgrims (ch. xxxiii.). In the 9th century Bernard the Wise speaks of the richness of the town, which meantime had fallen into the hands of the Moslems, having been conquered by Abu Bekr, the first Khalif in 634 A.D. At the close of the 8th century (796 A.D.) it had, however, been desolated during civil wars among the Arabs. It appears always to have recovered rapidly from its misfortunes. In 985 A.D. El Mukaddasi speaks of the city as containing a beautiful mosque, a monument of Omar, and the tomb of Hâshem, Muhammad's father. In the struggles between the Moslem rulers of Egypt and Syria, the possession of Gaza was always very important; and after the conquest of Jerusalem by the Franks, Gaza with Ascalon formed the bulwarks of Egypt against the Christians. In 1152 A.D. the Franks erected a fortress on the hill, which was then apparently deserted, and so cut the communication of Egypt with Ascalon; the fortress was entrusted to the Templars (Will. of Tyre, xvii. 12). Saladin vainly attacked this fortress in 1170 A.D., but it surrendered after the fatal day of Hattin in 1187 (Will. of Tyre, xv. 21, and Boha ed Din); it was entered by king Richard, according to Robinson (Bib. Res. ii. p. 43), but, if so, soon retaken; and great Christian defeats occurred in its vicinity in 1239 and 1244 A.D. In the following century Sir John Maundeville speaks of the town as "a gay and rich city, and as very fair and full of people." The Arab historians and geographers often refer to Gaza, but their notes, as in most other cases, are brief. Ibn Haukal (10th cent.) speaks of the city as a great market for the Hejjâz, and as the place where the Khalif Omar obtained his early wealth. In the 13th century, however, Abu el-Feda speaks of it as a city only of medium size, with a small castle and gardens. In another century it had again become prosperous, with many mosques, as noted by Ibn Batûta (Le Strange, Palestine under Moslems, p. 442). This short review of its history suffices to show that, from the earliest times to our own, the geographical position of the town has secured a constantly returning prosperity, in spite of continual assaults from the north and south, and also in spite of the absence of a port. Its trade was always a caravan trade, and the products of Arabia came to it (through Petra) as well as those of Palestine and of Egypt. It remains the starting-place for the journey to Egypt across the desert, which Babylonians, Persians, Greeks, and later warriors accomplished along the same narrow track, which was also followed by Napoleon in 1799, on his way to and from Syria.

Modern Gaza is one of the chief cities of Palestine, and the largest frontier town on the side of Egypt. A full account is given in the Memoirs of the Survey of Western Palestine (iii. 234, 235, 248-251). The town itself occupies the greater part of the isolated hill, which rises 180 feet above the sea and 60 to 100 feet above the surrounding plain. The site is almost as large as that of the city of Jerusalem, but is not fully occupied on the north. Considerable scattered suburbs occur on each side on the lower ground. The greater part of the houses are of mud and wood. There are no city walls, but great mounds visible on the sides of the hill mark the site of ancient fortifications, the date and character of which are at present unknown in default of excavation. They may perhaps belong to Crusading or even later times. On the south, near the quarantine building, the name Bâb ed Dârîn is given to a road crossing, preserving probably the name of the "Gate of Darum," named from the Crusading fort of Darum (now Deir el-Belâh) on the road to Egypt. The population of Gaza is believed to be about 18,000 souls, the large majority being Moslems, with some 200 Greek orthodox Christians. About a century ago the Samaritans, who then also resided in Egypt, had a synagogue in Gaza,

^a Marna was also in Egyptian a word for "Lord" (Pierret, Vocab. p. 195). In Gaza he was the rain-giving god. There was a place in the town called Tetramphodos, "the cross roads;" and here stood the altar and nude statue of Venus, before which lamps were lighted and incense offered by women. The statue answered by dreams those about to marry, as the worshippers stated (Vita Porph.).

but they have now died out, and the Jewish population is small. A few missionaries and government officials, in charge of the telegraph, &c., form the only European element. The town is divided into four quarters, called—(1) The quarter "of the Steps" on the west, (2) "of the Prison" on the north, (3) "of the mud houses" on the east, (4) "of the olives" on the south. The town is surrounded with beautiful gardens. A few palms occur, and figs, olives, lentils, apricots, mulberries, melons, cucumbers, and dates are grown, with a little cotton. The bazaar provides the Arab nomads of the south with clothing, soap is manufactured, and on the west are potteries, where a black pottery, similar to that used in very early times, is made. The place is reported very healthy, on account of its dry desert air. The sand dunes steadily encroach on the west and south over the cultivated ground. The water supply is from Beiyârahs, or deep wells like those of Jaffa, of which there are many in the gardens. The names of fifteen of these were collected by the Survey party. On the north a long avenue of very ancient olives extends for about 4 miles to the next villages, and the site generally is picturesque and truly Oriental, being little spoiled by the sordid Levantine imitations of Western civilisation, found in parts more frequented by tourists. The costume of the natives is Egyptian rather than Syrian—as is noticeable in other Philistine towns; and the early population succeeding the Avites (cp. Deut. ii. 23) was also Egyptian, for the Philistines—according to the Book of Genesis—were of Egyptian derivation, though of what stock is as yet uncertain (x. 14); while, as already seen, the Egyptians still held Gaza in the 14th cent. B.C. and probably much later.

The principal buildings in Gaza are the Serai

or Government office, and the mosques. There are five lofty minarets on the hill. The great mosque is the Crusading Church of St. John Baptist, and there is a second large mosque with several smaller. The shrine of 'Aly el Merwân is the traditional prison, or tomb, of Samson (Judg. xvi. 30), and is on the east side of the town. It appears to be a modern building. The tomb of Hâshem, father of Muhammad (already noticed), is shown near the brow of the hill on the north-west. There is also a Greek church in Gaza, which contains two Byzantine columns, and appears to be ancient. A register therein preserved is said by the priests to be a thousand years old. On the south side of the town is an isolated hillock called El Muntâr, "the watch tower," and now crowned with a shrine sacred to a certain 'Ali. It is surrounded by a Moslem cemetery, and is traditionally the place to which Samson carried the gates of Gaza (cp. Judg. xvi. 3), though it is doubtful whether this agrees with the expression "before Hebron." The hill is about 270 feet above sea-level at the top.

The ruined site at El Mineh representing the Majuma of Gaza is north-west of the town on the shore; it bears the name El Kishâni ("the painted tiles"). It now consists of gardens, with a few wells, surrounded by a bank; but is clearly the site of a small town. Marble slabs and other fragments have here been dug up by the peasantry. In the plain, rather more than a mile to the east of the town, is an ancient race-course, called Meidân ez Zeid, said to have been made by the Saracens some 700 years ago. The corners are marked by pillars, stolen from the headstones of Christian graves. On two of these there are Greek inscriptions, which appear to be of the Byzantine age, cut on the grey granite. One is the epitaph of the son of Domesticus, set up by his father. The other contains the words of Psalm xxiv. 1, "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof," with the name of Deacon Alexander, who "faced" some "monument" with stone in "February 640" (no doubt of the Christian era). Both were found by the Rev. W. D. Pritchett in 1875 and 1877 respectively. The distance between these goals was 1,000 b'aa, or about 2,000 yards east and west. With the exception of the great statue of Jupiter already noticed, these are the oldest remains as yet found at Gaza. The Church of St. John was built in the latter half of the 12th century, and is a fine and massive specimen of Crusading work. The west door is remarkably fine, with pointed arches. The church had a nave and two aisles, with clerestory windows to the nave. A slab with a representation of the golden candlestick and a short Greek text is built in to the wall of this clerestory. The apses have been destroyed, and the building much injured by the Moslems. An inscription of Kalawūn (13th cent. A.D.) occurs over the courtyard door; and a later text over the Mihrab, by Musa Pasha, dates 1074 A.H. Small pottery figures (Teraphim), like those common in Phoenicia and Cyprus, have been discovered at Gaza; but are not of necessity very ancient, though certainly specimens of the native pagan art, common to the whole of Syria. It is possible that very interesting discoveries might here result from excavation on the hill-side, but very ancient remains cannot be expected to survive on the surface. Gaza is the capital of the Turkish province bearing the same name, and subject to the Jerusalem governor. [C. R. C.]

GAZ'ARA (ἡ Γάζα and τὰ Γάζα; Gazara), a place frequently mentioned in the wars of the Maccabees, and of great importance in the operations of both parties. Its first introduction is as a stronghold (ὄχυράμα), in which Timotheus took refuge after his defeat by Judas, and which for four days resisted the efforts of the infuriated Jews (2 Macc. x. 32-36). One of the first steps of Bacchides, after getting possession of Judaea, was to fortify Bethsura and Gazara and the citadel (ἀκρά) at Jerusalem (1 Macc. ix. 52; Jos. Ant. xiii. 1, § 3); and the same names are mentioned when Simon in his turn recovered the country (1 Macc. xiv. 7, 33, 34, 36, xv. 28; Jos. B. J. i. 2, § 2). So important was it, that Simon made it the residence of his son John as general-in-chief of the Jewish army (1 Macc. xiii. 53; xvi. 1, 19, 21).

There is every reason to believe that Gazara was the same place as the more ancient GEZER or GAZER, now Tell Jezzer. The name is the same as that which the LXX. use for Gezer in the O. T.; and, more than this, the indications of the position of both are very much in accordance. As David smote the Philistines from Gibeon to Gezer, so Judas defeated Gorgias at Emmaus and pursued him to Gazera (1 Macc. iv. 15). Gazara also is constantly mentioned in connexion with the sea-coast—Joppa and Jamnia (xv. 28, 35; iv. 15), and with the Philistine plain, Azotus, Adasa, &c. (iv. 15; vii. 45; xiv. 34). [GEZER.] [G.] [W.]

GAZATHITES, THE (Γαζαῖται, accur. "the Azzathite;" τῶν Γαζαίων; Gazæos; R. V. Gazites, Josh. xiii. 3; the inhabitants of GAZA. Elsewhere the same name is rendered GAZITES in the A. V.

GAZELLE. By this word the Revisers have rendered גַּזְלֵי, גַּזְלֵי, gəzī, gəzīyāh, in the text of the Pentateuch, and in the margin elsewhere. The A. V. everywhere renders the Hebrew by "roe," or "roebuck;" LXX. δορκάς, δόρκωρ, δορκάδιον; Vulg. caprea, damula; Arab.

طَبِي, ṭabī. There can be no question as to the accuracy of the Revisers' translation; the Hebrew and Arabic names being identified by Arabic writers with غزال, ghazāl, the gazelle, and the names being frequently interchanged in poetry. The gazelle is by far the most abundant of all the antelope tribes in Palestine, as it is along the whole of North Africa and South-Western Asia. Its flesh was much esteemed among the Jews: "The unclean and the clean may eat thereof, as of the roebuck" (Lev. R. V. "gazelle"), and as of the hart" (Deut. xii. 15, 22, &c.). Its venison was among the delicacies of Solomon's table: "harts, and gazelles, and roebucks, and fatted fowls" (1 K. iv. 23, R. V.). But the gazelle is more frequently mentioned in Scripture as an emblem of loveliness, grace, gentleness, and swiftness: "swift as the roes upon the mountains" (1 Ch. xii. 8). Its beauty rendered it a favourite term of admiration in love: "My beloved is like a roe or a young hart" (Song ii. 9, v. 17, and viii. 14). "Thy breasts are like two young roes that are twins" (Song iv. 5). Asahel, the brother of Joab, "was as light of foot as a wild roe." To the present day, the black-eyed gazelle supplies the Arab poet with his favourite similes for the fair object of his admiration. Naturally the word, as expressive of beauty, became a favourite female name, "Tabitha" in its Aramaic form, or "Dorcas" in its Greek rendering (Acts ix. 36).

The common gazelle of Palestine is the Gazella dorcas (Pall.), and is the only species west of the Jordan. It is the only wild animal of the chase which an ordinary traveller is pretty certain to meet with. Small herds of gazelle are to be found in every part of the country, and when water is scarce they congregate at their favourite drinking places in large numbers. I have seen a herd of about 100 at the southern end of the Jebel Usdum, south of the Dead Sea, where they had congregated to drink at 'Ain Beida (i.e. the white spring), the only fresh spring within several miles. Though generally considered an inhabitant of the deserts and the plains, the gazelle appears to be everywhere at home. It shares the rocks of Engedi with the wild goats; it dashes over the wide expanse of the desert beyond Beersheba; it canters in single file under the monastery of Marsaba. I have found it in the glades of Carmel, before they were ruthlessly stripped to make charcoal; it often springs from its leafy covert behind Mount Tabor, and screens itself under the thorn bushes of Gennesaret. Among the grey hills of Galilee we still find "the roe upon the mountains of Bethel," and I have seen a little troop of gazelles feeding on the Mount of Olives, close to Jerusalem itself. In the open ground it is the wildest of game, and can scarcely ever be captured; but, once in cover or among trees, it is very easily approached. The Arabs capture it generally by concealing themselves near the well-known watering places. In the rocky districts the hunters lie in wait in the sides of the steep ravines, down which the gazelles are known to pass. The Druses of the Hauran contrive decoy enclosures, with pitfalls in which they sometimes capture a whole herd. But the horseman of the desert despises these devices, and the true Arab sheikh will only pursue the gazelle with the Persian greyhound, or the falcon, or with both conjointly. If the greyhound be alone, the roe often "delivers itself from the hand of the hunter." If falcons are used alone, generally two are thrown off, the birds employed being the saker (Falco saker, Gm.). The birds do not attempt to seize their victim, but repeatedly swoop at its head, and so arrest its speed till the horseman can come up. If falcons and greyhound are used together, the poor animal can scarcely ever escape, as the birds repeatedly swoop at it until the dog comes up and seizes it. Dean Stanley was much interested by seeing the peasants chasing the gazelle in the valley of Ajalon, i.e. "of stags," proving the appropriateness of the name down to the present day.

A different species of gazelle is found in Gilead and on the wide plains and deserts eastward, which has generally been considered to be the Gazella arabica, Ehrenb. It is larger than the common species, and of a darker fawn colour on the back, and is known as the Ariel gazelle. It extends from Syria across Persia as far as Scinde. The Persian Gazella subquitturosa and Gazella Bennetti are distinct. Sir Victor Brooke, after examining my specimens from Gilead, whilst agreeing that they are distinct from Gazella dorcas, is inclined to believe that they are of another race differing from the Ariel gazelle of South Arabia, and more nearly approaching the western species. But the different races or species of gazelle are very numerous and difficult to discriminate. [H. B. T.]

GA'ZER (גַּזְרִי; Gazer), 2 Sam. v. 25 [גַּזְרִי]; 1 Ch. xiv. 16 [B. גַּזְרָא, N. -ar, A. -גַּזְרָא]. The same place as GEZER, the difference arising from the emphatic Hebrew accent; which has been here retained in the A. V., though disregarded in several other places where the same form occurs. [GEZER.] From the uniform practice of the LXX., both in the O. T. and the books of Maccabees, Ewald infers that the original form of the name was Gazer; but the punctuation of the Masorets is certainly as often the one as the other. (Ewald, Gesch. ii. 427, note.) [G.] [W.]

GAZERA. 1. (T. τὰ Γάζερα, A. Γάζερα; Joseph. τὰ Γάζερα; Gezeron, Gazara), 1 Macc. iv. 15; vii. 45. The place elsewhere given as GAZARA.

2. (B. Καζέρδ, A. Γαζέρδ; Gaze), one of the "servants of the Temple," whose sons returned with Zerobabel (1 Esd. v. 31). In Ezra and Nehem. the name is GAZZAR.

GA'ZEZ (גַּזְזִי = shearer; BA. δ Γεζούε; Gezez), a name which occurs twice in 1 Ch. ii. 46: (1) as son of Caleb by Ephah, his concubine; and (2) as son of Haran, the son of the same woman: the second is possibly only a repetition of the first. At any rate there is no necessity for the assumption of Houbigant, that the second Gazer is an error for Jahdai. In some MSS. and in the Peshitto the name is given as Gazen. The Vat. LXX. omits the second occurrence.

GA'ZITES, THE (גַּזִּיטִּים; τοῖς Γαζαίσις; Philisthüm), inhabitants of Gaza (Judg. xvi. 2). Elsewhere given as GAZATHITES.

GAZ'ZAM (גַּזְזָם, ? = the devourer; Γαζζέμ [Ezra], Γηζζέμ [Neh.]; Gazzam, Gezem). The Bene-Gazzam were among the families of the Nethinim who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 48; Neh. vii. 51). In 1 Esd. the name is altered to GAZERA.

GE'BA (גֵּבָא, often with the definite article, = the hill; Γαβὰδ [usually]; Gabaē, Gabee, Gabaa, Geba), a city of Benjamin, with "suburbs," allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi. 17; 1 Ch. vi. 60). It is named amongst the first group of the Benjamite towns, and was apparently near the north boundary (Josh. xviii. 24). Here the name is given as GABA, a change due to the emphasis required in Hebrew before a pause; and the same change occurs in Ezra ii. 26, Neh. vii. 30 and xi. 31, 2 Sam. v. 25, 2 K. xxiii. 8; the last three of these being in the A. V. (and all in the R. V.) Geba. In one place Geba is used as the northern landmark of the kingdom of Judah and Benjamin, in the expression "from Geba to Beersheba" (2 K. xxiii. 8), and also as an eastern limit in opposition to Gazer (2 Sam. v. 25; Γαβδω). In the parallel passage to this last, in 1 Ch. xiv. 16 the name is changed to Gibeon. During the wars of the earlier part of the reign of Saul, Geba was held as a garrison by the Philistines (1 Sam. xiii. 3), but they were ejected by Jonathan—a feat which, while it added greatly to his renown, exasperated them to a more overwhelming invasion. Later in the same campaign we find it referred to in order to define the position of the two rocks which stood in the ravine below the garrison of Michmash, in terms which fix Geba on the south and Michmash on the north of the ravine (1 Sam. xiv. 5, Γαβὰέ; the A. V. has here Gibeah; R. V. correctly Geba). Exactly in accordance with this is the position of the modern village of Jeb'a, which stands picturesquely on the top of its steep terraced hill, on the very edge of the great Wady Succint, looking northwards to the opposite village, which also retains its old name of Mükhmas (PEF. Mem. iii. 9, 94; Guérin, Judée, iii. 68). The names, and the agreement of the situation with the requirements of the story of Jonathan, make the identification certain; and it is still further confirmed by the invaluable list of Benjamite towns visited by the Assyrian army on their road through the country southward to Jerusalem, which we have in Is. x. 28-32; where the minute details—the stoppage of the heavy baggage (A. V. "carriages"), which could not be got across the broken ground of the wady at Michmash; then the passage of the ravine by the lighter portion of the army, and the subsequent bivouac

("lodging," יָלַן = rest for the night) at Geba on the opposite side—are in exact accordance with the nature of the spot. Standing as it does on the south bank of this important waddy—one of the most striking natural features of this part of the country—the mention of Geba as the northern boundary of the lower kingdom is very significant. Thus commanding the pass, its fortification by Asa (1 K. xv. 22, Βουβός; 2 Ch. xvi. 6) is also quite intelligible. It continues to be named with Michmash to the very last (Neh. xi. 31).

Geba is probably intended by the "Gibeah-in-the-field" of Judg. xx. 31, to which its position is very applicable. [GIBEAH, 6.] The "fields" are mentioned again as late as Neh. xii. 29.

It remains to notice a few places in which, from the similarity of the two names, or possibly from some provincial usage,* "Geba" is perhaps used for "Gibeah." These are:—(1.) Judg. xx. 10: here the A. V. and R. V., probably anxious to prevent confusion, have "Gibeah." (2.) Judg. xx. 33: "the meadows," or more probably "the cave of Geba." In this case A. V. has "Gibeah," and R. V. "Maareh-Geba," marg. the meadow of Geba or Gibeah. The meaning seems to be that the "liers in wait" were concealed in the cave or caves of Geba, and brake forth when the men of Benjamin had been drawn away from Gibeah (cp. sv. 33, 36, 37). For the existence of caves at Jeb'a, see PEF. Mem. iii. 9. Owing to the word occurring here at a pause, the vowels are lengthened, and in the Hebrew it stands as Gāba. (3.) 1 Sam. xiii. 16: here the A. V. has altered the name, whilst R. V. retains the reading "Geba." Josephus (Ant. vi. 6, § 2) has Γαβαδν, Gibeon, in this place; for which perhaps compare 1 Ch. viii. 29, ix. 35.

2. The Geba (B. Γαβαλ, A. Γαυβα, N. Γαυβδν), named in Judith iii. 10, where Holofernes is said to have made his encampment—"between Geba and Scythopolis"—must be the place of the same name, Jeb'a, on the road between Samaria and Jenin, about 3 miles from the former (Rob. i. 440; PEF. Mem. ii. 155). The Vulgate has a remarkable variation here—venit ad Idumaeos in terram Gabaa. [G.] [W.]

GE'BAL (גֵּבַל, G'bal, from גֵּבַל, gābal, to twist; thence גֵּבּוּל, gēbūl, a line; thence جبل, Gebal, a line of mountains as a natural boundary; in Ps., A. Γεβαλ, NB. Ναυβαλ; Gebal: in Ezek. βιβλιος, Giblii), a proper name, occurring in Ps. lxxxiii. 7 (Vulg. lxxxii.) in connexion with Edom and Moab, Ammon and Amalek, the Philistines and the inhabitants of Tyre. The mention of Assur, or the Assyrian, in the next verse, is with reason supposed to refer the date of the composition to the latter days of the Jewish kingdom. It is inscribed moreover with the name of Asaph. Now, in 2 Ch. xx. 14, it is one of the sons or descendants of Asaph, Jahaziel, who is inspired to encourage Jehoshaphat and his people, when threatened with invasion by the Moabites, Ammonites, and others from beyond the sea, and from Syria (as the LXX. and Vulg.: it is unnecessary here to go into the obscurities and varieties of the Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic Versions). It is impossible therefore not to recognise the connexion between this Psalm and these events; and hence the contexts both of the Psalm and of the historical records will justify our assuming the Gebal of the Psalms to be one and the same city with the Gebal of Ezekiel (xxvii. 9), a maritime town of Phoenicia, and not another, as some have supposed, in the district round about Petra, which is by Josephus, Eusebius, and St. Jerome called Gebalene. Jehoshaphat had, in the beginning of his reign, humbled the Philistines and Arabians (2 Ch. xvii. 9, 10), and still more recently had assisted Ahab against the Syrians (ibid. ch. xviii.). Now, according to the poetic language of the Psalmist, there were symptoms of a general rising against him: on the south, the Edomites, Ishmaelites, and Hagarenes; on the south-east, Moab and north-east Ammon; along the whole line of the western coast (and, with Jehoshaphat's maritime projects, this would naturally disturb him most: see 2 Ch. xx. 36) the Amalekites, Philistines, and Phoenicians, or inhabitants of Tyre, to their frontier town Gebal, with Assur, i.e. the Syrians or Assyrians, from the more distant north. It may be observed that the Ashurites are mentioned (v. 6) in connexion with Gebal no less in the prophecy than in the Psalm. But, again, the Gebal of Ezekiel was evidently no mean city. From the fact that its inhabitants are written "Giblians" in the Vulg., and "Biblians" in the LXX., we may infer their identity with the Giblites, spoken of in connexion with Lebanon by Joshua (xiii. 5), and that of their city with the "Biblus" (or Byblus) of profane literature—so extensive that it gave name to the surrounding district (see a passage from Lucian, quoted by Reland, Paest. lib. i. c. xlii. p. 269). It was situated on the frontiers of Phoenicia, somewhat to the north of the mouth of the small river Adonis, so celebrated in mythology (cp. Ezek. viii. 13). Meanwhile the Giblites, or Biblians, seem to have been pre-eminent in the arts of stone-carving (1 K. v. 18) and ship-calking (Ezek. xxvii. 9); but, according to Strabo, their industry suffered greatly from the robbers infesting the sides of Mount Lebanon. Gebal or Gubal is frequently mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions; its king, Sibitti-bahali, paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser II.; under Sen-nacherib its king was Urumelik; and under Esarhaddon, Mili-asapa (Schrader, Die Keilinschriften u. d. A. Test. p. 185). Eaylus, king of Byblus, joined the Macedonian fleet, with his vessels, after the town was taken by Alexander (Arrian, Anab. ii. 15, § 8; 20, § 1). Pompey not only destroyed the strongholds from whence these pests issued, but freed the city from a tyrant (Strabo, xvi. 2, 18). Some have confounded Gebal, or Biblus, with the Gabala of Strabo, just below Laodicea, and consequently many leagues to the north, the ruins and site of which, still called Jebileh, are so graphically described by Maundrell (Early Travellers in Pales. by Wright, p. 394). By Moroni (Dizion. Eccles.) they are accurately distinguished under their respective names. Finally, Biblus became a Christian see in the patriarchate of Antioch, subject to the metropolitan see of Tyre (Reland, Paest. lib. i. p. 214 sq.). It shared the usual vicissitudes of Christianity in these parts; and even now furnishes episcopacy with a title. It is called Jebūil by the Arabs, thus reviving the old Biblical name (Dict. Gk. and Rom. Geog., s. v.

Byblos). Extensive excavations were carried out in and near Jebeil, by M. Renan, who discovered numerous tombs and sarcophagi, the substructions of a large temple, perhaps that of Adonis, and many interesting Phœnician remains (Mission de Phénicie, pp. 153-359).

GEBALITES, 1 K. v. 18 (R. V.). [GEBAL-]

GE'BER (גִּבְרִי = a strong man), a name occurring twice in the list of Solomon's commissariat officers, and there only. 1. (BA. Γαβέρ; Bengaber). The son of Geber (Ben-Geber) resided in the fortress of Ramoth-Gilead, and had charge of Havoth-Jair and the district of Argob (1 K. iv. 13). Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 3) gives the name as Γαβάρης. 2. (Γαβέρ, B. omits; Gaber). Geber the son of Uri had a district south of the former—the "land of Gilead," the country originally possessed by Sihon and Og, probably the modern Belka, the great pasture-ground of the tribes east of Jordan (1 K. iv. 19). The conclusion of this verse as rendered in the A. V. and R. V. (text) is to some unsatisfactory—"and he was the only officer which was in the land"—when two others are mentioned in vv. 13 and 14. A more accurate interpretation is, "and one officer who was in the land" (R. V. marg.), that is, a superior (גִּבְרִי), a word of rare occurrence, but used again for Solomon's "officers" in 2 Ch. viii. 10) over the three. Josephus has ἐπὶ δὲ τοῦτων εἰς πάλιν ἄρχων ἀποδείκνυτο, the πάλιν referring to a similar statement just before that there was also one general superintendent over the commissaries of the whole of Upper Palestine. [G.] [W.]

GE'BIM (גִּבִּימִי), with the article, = probably the ditches; the word is used in that sense in 2 K. iii. 16, and elsewhere; Γιββίμ; Gabim), a village north of Jerusalem, in the neighbourhood of the main road, and apparently between Anathoth (the modern Andata) and the ridge on which Nob was situated, and from which the first view of the city is obtained. It is named nowhere but in the enumeration by Isaiah of the towns whose inhabitants fled at Sennacherib's approach (x. 31). Judging by those places the situation of which is known to us, the enumeration is so orderly that it is impossible to entertain the conjecture of either Eusebius (Γιββίμ, Gabin, *OS.*² p. 256, 2; p. 162, 5), who places it at Geba, 5 miles north of Gophna; or of Schwarz (p. 131), who would have it identical with Gob or Gezer: the former being at least 10 miles north, and the latter 20 miles west, of its probable position. The site is unknown, but it may perhaps be el-'Aisawiyeh, on the eastern slope of the ridge of Olivet. [G.] [W.]

GEDALIAH (גְּדַלְיָהּ and גְּדַלְיָהּ, i.e. Gedaliahu = Jah is great; Γοδολιας; Godolias). 1. GEDALIAH, the son of Ahikam (Jeremiah's protector, Jer. xxvi. 24), and grandson of Shaphan the secretary of king Josiah. After the destruction of the Temple, B.C. 588, Nebuchadnezzar departed from Judea, leaving Gedaliah with a Chaldaean guard (Jer. xl. 5) at Mizpah, a strong (1 K. xv. 22) town, 6 miles N. of Jerusalem, to govern, as a tributary (Joseph. Ant. x. 9, § 1) of the king of Babylon, the vine-dressers and husbandmen (Jer. lii. 16) who were exempted from captivity. Jeremiah joined Gedaliah; and Mizpah became the resort of Jews from various quarters (Jer. xl. 6, 11), many of whom, as might be expected at the end of a long war, were in a demoralized state, unrestrained by religion, patriotism, or prudence. The gentle and popular character of Gedaliah (Joseph. Ant. x. 9, §§ 1, 3), his hereditary piety (Rosenmüller in Jer. xxvi. 24), the prosperity of his brief rule (Jer. xl. 12), the reverence which revived and was fostered under him for the ruined Temple (xli. 5), fear of the Chaldaean conquerors, whose officer he was,—all proved insufficient to secure Gedaliah from the foreign jealousy of Baalis king of Ammon, and the domestic ambition of Ishmael, a member of the royal family of Judah (Joseph. Ant. x. 9, § 3). This man came to Mizpah with a secret purpose to destroy Gedaliah. Gedaliah, generously refusing to believe a friendly warning which he received of the intended treachery, was murdered, with his Jewish and Chaldaean followers, two months after his appointment. After his death, which is still commemorated in the Jewish Calendar (Prideaux, Commemoratio, anno 588; Zech. vii. 19; Friedländer, Text Book of the Jewish Religion, p. 33) as a national calamity, the Jews in their native land, anticipating the resentment of the king of Babylon, gave way to despair. Many, forcing Jeremiah to accompany them, fled to Egypt under Johanan (see Stanley, Hist. of the Jewish Church, ii. Lect. xl.; Milman, Hist. of the Jews,⁴ i. 403). 2. GEDALIAHU; a Levite, one of the six sons of Jeduthun who played the harp in the service of Jehovah (1 Ch. xiv. 3 [B. om.], 9 [A. Γοδολλας, B. Γαλοιδ]). 3. GEDALIAH; a priest in the time of Ezra (Ezra x. 18 [BA. Γαδαειδ, N. Γαλαειδ]). [JOANANUS.] 4. GEDALIAHU; son of Pashur (Jer. xxxviii. 1; N. Γολλας), one of those who caused Jeremiah to be imprisoned. 5. GEDALIAH; grandfather of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1). [W. T. B.] [F.]

GED'DUR (B. Κεδδούρ, A. Γεδδούρ; Geddu), 1 Ed. v. 30. [GAHAR.]

GED'EON (Γεδεών; Geddon). 1. The son of Raphaim; one of the ancestors of Judith (Judith viii. 1). The name is omitted in B⁸. 2. The Greek form of the Hebrew name GIDEON (Heb. xi. 32); retained in the N. T. by A. V. (R. V. "Gideon") in company with Elias, Eliseus, Osee, Jesus (= Joshua), and other Grecised Hebrew names, to the confusion of the ordinary reader.

GEDER (גְּדֵר = wall; A. Γαδέρ, B. Ἄσσει; Gader). The king of Geder was one of the thirty-one kings who were overcome by Joshua on the west of the Jordan (Josh. xii. 13), and mentioned in that list only. Being named with Debir, Hormah, and Arad, Geder was evidently in the extreme south: this prevents our identifying it with Gedor (Josh. xv. 58), which lay between Hebron and Bethlehem; or with hag-Gederah in the low country (xv. 36). It is possible, however, that it may be the Gedor named in connexion with the Simeonites (1 Ch. iv. 39). [G.] [W.]

GEDERAH (גִּדְרָה, with the article = the sheepcote; Γῆδρα; Gedera), a town of Judah in the Shefelah or lowland country (Josh. xv. 36), mentioned next after ADITHAIM, Hadiatheh. It is probably the Gedour (Γεδούρ) of Eusebius, which was in his time called Gedrus (Γεδρούς), and was 10 miles from Diospolis (Lydda) on the road to Eleutheropolis (OS. p. 254, 39). This place is now Kh. Jedireh, 9 Eng. miles south of Lwid (PEF. Mem. iii. 43). The name (if the interpretation given be correct), and the occurrence next to it of one so similar as GEDEROTHAIM, seem to point to a great deal of sheepbreeding in this part. [G.] [W.]

GEDERATHITE, THE (גִּדְרָתִי; B. δ Γαδραθειεῖς, N. δ Γαδρά, A. δ Γαδρωθί; Gaderothites), the native of a place called Gederah, but not of that in the Shefelah of Judah, for Josabab the Gederathite (1 Ch. xii. 4) was one of Saul's own tribe—his "brethren of Benjamin" (v. 2). It is now apparently the village Jedireh, near el-Jib, Gibeon (PEF. Mem. iii. 9). [G.] [W.]

GEDERITE, THE (גִּדְרִי; B. δ Γεδωπειρῆς, A. δ Γεδάρ; Gederites), i.e. the native of some place named Geder or Gederah. Baal-hanan the Gederite had charge of the olive and sycamore groves in the low country (Shefelah) for king David (1 Ch. xxvii. 28). He possibly belonged to GEDERAH, a place in this district, the very locality for sycamores. [G.] [W.]

GEDEROTH (גִּדְרוֹת = sheepcotes, but in Ch. with the article; in Ch. B. Γαληρώ, A. Γαδρωθ, in Josh. Γεδδάρ; Gideroth, Gaderoth), a town in the Shefelah or low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 41; 2 Ch. xxviii. 18). It is not named in the same group with GEDERAH and GEDEROTHAIM in the list in Joshua, but with Beth-dagon, Dayún, Naahmah, Ná'aneh, and Makkedah, el-Mughár. Sir C. Warren proposes to identify it with Katrah, the CEDRON of 1 Macc. xv. 39, which is close to el-Mughár (PEF. Mem. ii. 410). [G.] [W.]

GEDEROTHAIM (גִּדְרוֹתַיִם = two sheepfolds; Gedorathaim), a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 36), named next in order to Gederah. The LXX. render it καὶ αὐτὰ λέγεις αὐρήν. [GEDERAH.] [G.] [W.]

GEDO'R (גִּדְרָה = a wall; Gedor). 1. (B. Γεδώρ, A. Γεδάρ), a town in the mountainous part of Judah, named with Halhul, Bethzur, and Maarath (Josh. xv. 58), and therefore a few miles north of Hebron. It seems to be the place Γῆδρα, Gaddera, described by Eusebius and Jerome (OS. p. 254, 37; p. 160, 30) as being in the boundaries of Jerusalem (Aelia), near the Terebinth, and there called Γιδρά, Gadora. It is now probably represented by Kh. Jedúr, which lies to the north of Beit Súr, Bethzur, and about 2 miles west of the road from Hebron to Bethlehem (Robinson, Bib. Res. iii. 283; PEF. Mem. iii. 313).

2. The town—apparently of Benjamin, and, if so, perhaps Jedireh—to which "Jeroham of Gedor" belonged, whose sons Joelah and Zebadiah were among the mighty men, "Saul's brethren of Benjamin," who joined David in his difficulties at Ziklag (1 Ch. xii. 7). The name has the definite article to it in this passage (גִּדְרוֹתַיִם; oi tou Gedárho). If this be a Benjamite name, it is very probably connected with

3. (Γεδούρ; in 1 Ch. viii. 31, B. Δούρ; in ix. 37, B.N. Γεδούρ.) A man among the ancestors of Saul; son of Jehiel, the "father of Gibeon" (1 Ch. viii. 31; ix. 37).

4. The name occurs twice in the genealogies of Judah—1 Ch. iv. 4 and 18—in both shortened to גִּדְרָה; Γεδάρ. In the former passage Penuel is said to be "father of Gedor," while in the latter Jered, son of a certain Ezra by his Jewish wife (A. V. "Jehudijah," R. V. "the Jewess"), has the same title. In the Targum, Jered, Gedor, and other names in this passage are treated as being titles of Moses, conferred on him by Jehudijah, who is identified with the daughter of Pharaoh.

5. In the records of the tribe of Simeon, in 1 Ch. iv. 39, certain chiefs of the tribe are said to have gone, in the reign of Hezekiah, "to the entrance of Gedor, unto the east side of the valley" (גִּדְרוֹתַיִם), in search of pasture-grounds, and to have expelled thence the Hamites, who dwell there in tents, and the Maonites (A. V. "habitations," R. V. Meunim). Simeon lay in the extreme south of Judah, and therefore this Gedor must be a different place from that noticed above—No. 1. If what is told in v. 42 was a subsequent incident in the same expedition, then we should look for Gedor between the south of Judah and Mount Seir, i.e. Petra. No place of the name has yet been met with in that direction. The LXX. (both MSS.) read Gerar for Gedor (ἔως τοῦ ἔλθειν Γεράρα); which agrees well both with the situation and with the mention of the "pasture," and is adopted by Ewald (i. 322, note). The "valley" (Gai, i.e. rather the "ravine"), from the presence of the article, would appear to be some well-known spot; but in our present limited knowledge of that district, no conjecture can be made as to its locality. Nachal (= wady), and not Gai, is the word elsewhere applied to Gerar [G.] [W.]

GEHA'ZI (גִּיזִי, of uncertain meaning; Γιεζί; Giezi), the servant or boy of Elisha. He was sent as the Prophet's messenger on two occasions to the good Shunammite (2 K. iv.); obtained fraudulently in Elisha's name money and garments from Naaman; was miraculously smitten with incurable but non-infectious leprosy; and was dismissed from the Prophet's service (2 K. v.). Later in the history he is mentioned as being engaged in relating to king Joram all the great things which Elisha had done, when the Shunammite whose son Elisha had restored to life appeared before the king, petitioning for her house and land of which she had been dispossessed in her seven years' absence in Philistia (2 K. viii.). [W. T. B.]

GEHEN'NA, the Greek representative of גִּהֵנוֹן, Josh. xv. 8, Neh. xi. 30 (rendered by B. Γαιέννα, A. Γαί'Οννύμ in Josh. xviii. 16); more fully, גִּהֵנוֹן בְּקִרְיָתָאֵם אוֹרְחֵיָא (2 K. xxiii. 10, 2 Ch. xxviii. 3, xxxiii. 6, Jer. xix. 2), the "valley of Hinnom," or "of the son" (usually), or "children (one reading of 2 K.) of Hinnom," a deep narrow glen to the S. of Jerusalem, where, after the introduction of the worship of the fire-gods by Ahaz, the idolatrous Jews offered their children to Molech (2 Ch. xxviii. 3, xxxiii. 6; Jer. vii. 31, xix. 2-6). In consequence of these abominations the valley was polluted by Josiah (2 K. xxiii. 10); subsequently to which it became the common lay-stall of the city, where the dead bodies of criminals, and the carcases of animals, and every other kind of filth were cast, and, according to late and somewhat questionable authorities, the combustible portions consumed with fire. From the depth and narrowness of the gorge, and perhaps its ever-burning fires, as well as from its being the receptacle of all sorts of putrefying matter, and all that defiled the holy city, it became in later times the image of the place of punishment (cp. The Book of Enoch, chs. xxvi., xxvii., with Dillmann and Schodde's notes in loco), "where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched;" in which the Talmudists placed the mouth of hell: "There are two palm-trees in the V. of H., between which a smoke ariseth; . . . and this is the door of Gehenna" (Talmud, quoted by Barclay, City of Great King, p. 90; Lightfoot, Centur. Chorograph. Matt. proem. ii. 200. Cp. Riehm, HWB., and Hamburger, RE. s. nn. "Hölle," "Hinnom"; Weber, System d. altsynag. Paläst. Theologie, p. 326 sq. [and Index s. v.]).

In this sense the word is used by our blessed Lord, Matt. v. 29, 30, x. 28, xxiii. 15, 33; Mark ix. 43, 45; Luke xii. 5: and with the addition τοῦ πυρός, Matt. v. 22, xviii. 9; Mark ix. 47; and by St. James, iii. 6. [HINNOM, VALLEY OF; TOPHET.] [E. V.] [F.]

GELI'LOTH (גִּלְיָלוֹת) = circuit; B. Γαλιλαῖθ, A. Ἀγαλλιῶθ, as if the definite article had been originally prefixed to the Hebrew word; ai tsumalos), a place named among the marks of the south boundary line of the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 17). The boundary went from Enshemesh towards Geliloth, which was "over against" (בְּרֵיב) the ascent of Adummim. In the description of the north boundary of Judah, which was identical at this part with the south of Benjamin, we find Gilgal substituted for Geliloth, with the same specification as "over against" (בְּרֵיב) the ascent of Adummim (Josh. xv. 7). The name Geliloth never occurs again in this locality, and it therefore seems probable that Gilgal is the right reading. Many glimpses of the Jordan valley are obtained through the hills in the latter part of the descent from Olivet to Jericho, along which the boundary in question appears to have run; and it is very possible that, from the ascent of Adummim, Gilgal appeared through one of these gaps in the distance, "over against" the spectator, and thus furnished a point by which to indicate the direction of the line at that part.

But though Geliloth does not again appear in the A. V., it is found in the original bearing a peculiar topographical sense. The following extract from the Appendix to Dean Stanley's S. & P. (1st edit.), § 13, contains all that can be said on the point:—"This word is derived from a root גָּלַל, 'to roll' (Gesen. Thes. p. 287 b). Of the five times in which it occurs in Scripture, two are in the general sense of boundary or border: Josh. xiii. 2, 'All the borders of the Philistines' (βρια); Joel iii. 4, 'All the coasts of Palestine' (R. V. Philistia) (Γαλιλαία ἀλλοφύλων); and three specially relate to the course of the Jordan: Josh. xxii. 10, 11, 'The borders of Jordan' (in xxii. 10, B. Γάλαγα τοῦ Ἰορδάνου; in v. 11, B. Γαλαῶδ τ. 'I.; in v. 10, 11, A. Γαλιλαῶδ τ. 'I.); Ezek. xlvii. 8, 'The east country' (εἰς τὴν Γαλιλαίαν). In each case R. V. renders by region or regions. It has been pointed out in ch. vii. p. 278, note, that this word is analogous to the Scotch term 'links,' which has both the meanings of Geliloth, being used of the snake-like windings of a stream, as well as with the derived meaning of a coast or shore. Thus Geliloth is distinguished from Ciccar, which will rather mean the circle of vegetation or dwellings gathered round the bends and reaches of the river."

It will not be overlooked that the place Geliloth, noticed above, is in the neighbourhood of the Jordan. [G.] [W.]

GEMAL'LI (גִּמְלָלִי); B. v. 13 Γαμαλ, A. Γαμαλί; Gemalli, the father of Ammiel, who was the "ruler" (Nasi) of Dan, chosen to represent that tribe among the spies who explored the land of Canaan (Num. xiii. 12).

GEMAR'AH (גִּמְרִי'אֵה) = Jehovah hath completed; Γαμαρίας; Gumarias. 1. Son of Shaphan the scribe, and father of Michaiah. He was one of the nobles of Judah, and had a chamber in the house of the Lord, from which (or from a window in which, Prideaux, Michaelis) Baruch read Jeremiah's alarming prophecy in the ears of all the people, B.C. 606 (Jer. xxxvi.). Gemariah with the other princes heard the Divine message with terror, but without a sign of repen- tance; though Gemariah joined two others in intreating king Jehoiakim to forbear destroying the roll which they had taken from Baruch.

2. Son of Hilkiah, being sent B.C. 597 by king Zedekiah on an embassy to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon, was made the bearer of Jeremiah's letter to the captive Jews (Jer. xxix.). [W. T. B.]

GEMS. [STONES, PRECIOUS.]

GENEALOGY (Γενεαλογία), literally the act or art of the γενεαλόγος, i.e. of him who treats of birth and family, and reckons descents and generations. Hence by an easy transition it is often (like ιστορία) used of the document itself in which such series of generations is set down. In Hebrew the term for a genealogy or pedigree is מִסְפָּר הַיְיָוִת וּמִסְפָּר הַדִּבְרֹת, "the book of the generations," Greek Venet. γενήσεις; and because the oldest histories were usually drawn up on a genealogical basis, the expression often extended to the whole history, as is the case with the Gospel of St. Matthew, where "the book of the generation of Jesus Christ" includes the whole history contained in that Gospel. So Gen. ii. 4, "These are the generations of the heavens and of the earth," seems to be the title of the history which follows (see Delitzsch [1887] and Dillmann^a in loco). Gen. v. 1, vi. 9, x. 1, xi. 10, 27, xxv. 12, 19, xxxvi. 1, 9, xxxvii. 2, are other examples of the same usage, and these passages seem to mark the existence of separate histories from which the Book of Genesis was compiled. Nor is this genealogical form of history peculiar to the Hebrews, or the Semitic races. The earliest Greek histories were also genealogies. Thus the histories of Acusilaus of Argos and of Hecataeus of Miletus were entitled Γενεαλογίαι; and the fragments remaining of Xanthus, Charon of Lampsacus, and Hellenicus, are strongly tinged with the same genealogical element,* which is not lost even in the pages of Herodotus. The frequent use of the patronymic in Greek; the frequency of particular races, as Heraclides, Alcmaeonidae, &c.; the lists of priests and kings, and conquerors at the Games, preserved at Elis, Sparta, Olympia, and elsewhere; the hereditary monarchies and priest-hoods, as of the Branchidae, Eumolpidae, &c., in so many cities in Greece and Greek Asia; the division, as old as Homer, into tribes, φρατρίαι and γένη, and the existence of the tribe, the gens and the familia among the Romans; the Celtic clans, the Saxon families using a common patronymic, and their royal genealogies running back to the Teutonic gods,—these are among the many instances that may be cited to prove the strong family and genealogical instinct of the ancient world. Coming near to the Israelites, it will be enough to allude to the hereditary principle, and the vast genealogical records of the Egyptians, as regards their kings and priests, and to the passion for genealogies among the Arabs, mentioned by Layard and others, in order to show that the attention paid by the Jews to genealogies is in entire accordance with the manners and tendencies of their contemporaries. In their case, however, it was heightened by several peculiar circumstances. The promise of the land of Canaan to the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob successively, and the separation of the Israelites from the Gentile world; the expectation that Messiah would spring from the tribe of Judah; the exclusively hereditary priesthood of Aaron with its dignity and emoluments; the long succession of kings in the line of David; and the whole division and occupation of the land upon genealogical principles by the tribes, families, and houses of fathers, gave a deeper importance to the science of genealogy among the Jews than perhaps any other nation. We have already noted the evidence of the existence of family memoirs even before the Flood, to which we are probably indebted for the genealogies in Gen. iv., v.; and Gen. x., xi., &c. indicate the continuance of the same system in the times between the Flood and Abraham. But with Jacob, the founder of the nation, the system of reckoning by genealogies (שְׁבִיטֵיהֶם, or in the language of Moses, Num. i. 18, שְׁבִיטֵיהֶם) was much further developed. In Gen. xxxv. 22–26, we have a formal account of the sons of Jacob, the patriarchs of the nation, repeated in Ex. i. 1–5. In Gen. xlvi. we have an exact genealogical census of the house of Israel at the time of

Jacob's going down to Egypt. The way in which the former part of this census, relating to Reuben and Simeon, is quoted in Ex. vi., where the census of the tribe of Levi is all that was wanted, seems to show that it was transcribed from an existing document. When the Israelites were in the wilderness of Sinai, in the second month of the second year of the Exodus, their number was taken by Divine command, "after their families, by the house of their fathers," tribe by tribe, and the number of each tribe is given "by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, by their polls" (Num. i., iii.). This census was repeated thirty-eight years afterwards, and the names of the families added, as we find in Num. xxvi. According to these genealogical divisions they pitched their tents, and marched, and offered their gifts and offerings, and chose the spies. According to the same they cast the lots by which the troubler of Israel, Achan, was discovered, as later those by which Saul was called to the throne. Above all, according to these divisions, the whole land of Canaan was parcelled out amongst them. But then of necessity that took place which always has taken place with respect to such genealogical arrangements, viz. that by marriage, or servitude, or incorporation as friends and allies, persons not strictly belonging by birth to such or such a family or tribe were yet reckoned in the census as belonging to them, when they had acquired property within their borders, and were liable to the various services in peace or war which were performed under the heads of such tribes and families. Nobody supposes that all the Cornelii, or all the Campbells, sprang from one ancestor, and it is in the teeth of direct evidence from Scripture, as well as of probability, to suppose that the Jewish tribes contained absolutely none but such as were descended from the twelve patriarchs.^b The tribe of Levi was probably the only one which had no admixture of foreign blood. In many of the Scripture genealogies, as e.g. those of Caleb, Joab, Segub, and the sons of Rephaiah, &c., in 1 Ch. iii. 21, it is quite clear that birth was not the ground of their incorporation into their respective tribes. [BECHER; CALEB.] However, birth was, and continued to be throughout their whole national course, the foundation of all the Jewish organisation, and the reigns of the more active and able kings and rulers were marked by attention to genealogical operations. When David established the Temple-services on the footing which continued till the time of Christ, he divided the priests and Levites into courses and companies, each under the family chief. The singers, the porters, the trumpeters, the players on instruments, were all thus genealogically distributed. In the active stirring reign of Rehoboam, we have the work of Iddo concerning genealogies

^b Jul. Africanus, in his Ep. to Aristides, expressly mentions that the ancient genealogical records at Jerusalem included those who were descended from proselytes, and γεωραι, as well as those who sprang from the patriarchs. The registers in Ezra and Nehemiah include the Nethinim, and the children of Solomon's servants.

(2 Ch. xii. 15). When Hezekiah re-opened the Temple, and restored the Temple-services which had fallen into disuse, he reckoned the whole nation by genealogies. This appears from the fact of many of the genealogies in Chronicles terminating in Hezekiah's reign [AZARIAH, 13], from the expression "So all Israel were reckoned by genealogies" (1 Ch. ix. 1), immediately following genealogies which do so terminate, and from the narrative in 2 Ch. xxxi. 16-19 proving that, as regards the priests and Levites, such a complete census was taken by Hezekiah. It is indicated also in 1 Ch. iv. 41. We learn too incidentally from Prov. xxv. that Hezekiah had a staff of scribes, who would be equally useful in transcribing genealogical registers, as in copying out Proverbs. So also in the reign of Jotham king of Judah, who among other great works built the higher gate of the house of the Lord (2 K. xv. 35), and was an energetic as well as a good king, we find a genealogical reckoning of the Reubenites (1 Ch. v. 17), probably in connexion with Jotham's wars against the Ammonites (2 Ch. xxvii. 5). When Zerubbabel brought back the Captivity from Babylon, one of his first cares seems to have been to take a census of those that returned, and to settle them according to their genealogies. The evidence of this is found in 1 Ch. ix., and the duplicate passage Neh. xi.; in 1 Ch. iii. 19; and yet more distinctly in Neh. vii. 5 and xii. In like manner Nehemiah, as an essential part of that national restoration which he laboured so zealously to promote, gathered "together the nobles, and the rulers and the people, that they might be reckoned by genealogy" (Neh. vii. 5, xii. 26). The abstract of this census is preserved in Ezra ii. and Neh. vii., and a portion of it in 1 Ch. iii. 21-24. That this system was continued after their times, so far at least as the priests and Levites were concerned, we learn from Neh. xii. 22; and we have incidental evidence of the continued care of the Jews still later to preserve their genealogies in such passages of the apocryphal books as 1 Macc. ii. 1-5, viii. 17, xiv. 29, and perhaps Judith viii. 9, Tob. i. 1, &c. Passing on to the time of the birth of Christ, we have a striking incidental proof of the continuance of the Jewish genealogical economy in the fact that when Augustus ordered the census of the empire to be taken, the Jews in the province of Syria immediately went each one to his own city, i.e. (as is clear from Joseph going to Bethlehem the city of David) to the city to which his tribe, family, and father's house belonged. So that the return, if completed, doubtless exhibited the form of the old censuses taken by the kings of Israel and Judah.

Another proof is the existence of our Lord's genealogy in two forms as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke. [GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.] The mention of Zacharias, as "of the course of Abia," of Elisabeth, as "of the daughters of Aaron," and of Anna the daughter of Phanuel, as "of the tribe of Aser," are further indications of the same thing. And this conclusion is expressly confirmed by the testimony of Josephus in the opening of his Life. There, after deducing his own descent, "not only from that race which is considered the noblest among the Jews, that of the priests, but from the first of the 24 courses" (the course of Jehoiarib), and on the mother's side from the Ammonean sovereigns, he adds, "I have thus traced my genealogy, as I have found it recorded in the public tables" (ἐν ταῖς δημοσίαις δέλοις ἀναγεγραμμένην); and again (contr. Apion. i. § 7), he states that the priests were obliged to verify the descent of their intended wives by reference to the archives kept at Jerusalem; adding that it was the duty of the priests after every war (and he specifies the wars of Antiochus Epiph., Pompey, and Q. Varus) to make new genealogical tables from the old ones, and to ascertain what women among the priestly families had been made prisoners, as all such were deemed improper to be wives of priests. As a proof of the care of the Jews in such matters he further mentions that in his day the list of successive high-priests preserved in the public records extended through a period of 2,000 years. From all this it is abundantly manifest that the Jewish genealogical records continued to be kept till near the destruction of Jerusalem. Hence we are constrained to disbelieve the story told by Africanus concerning the destruction of all the Jewish genealogies by Herod the Great, in order to conceal the ignobleness of his own origin. His statement is, that up to that time the Hebrew genealogies had been preserved entire, and the different families were traced up either to the patriarchs, or the first proselytes, or the γυσιόται or mixed people. But that on Herod's causing these genealogies to be burnt, only a few of the more illustrious Jews who had private pedigrees of their own, or who could supply the lost genealogies from memory, or from the Books of Chronicles, were able to retain any account of their own lineage—among whom he says were the Desposyni, or brethren of our Lord, from whom was said to be derived the scheme (given by Africanus) for reconciling the two genealogies of Christ. But there can be little doubt that the registers of the Jewish tribes and families perished at the destruction of Jerusalem, and not before. Some partial records may, however, have survived that event, as it is probable, and indeed seems to be implied in Josephus's statement, that at least the priestly families of the Dispersion had records of their own genealogy. We learn too from Benjamin of Tudela, that in his day the princes of the Captivity professed to trace their descent to David, and he also names others, e.g. R. Calonymos, "a descendant of the house of David, as proved by his pedigree" (i. 32), and R. Eleazar Ben Tsemach, "who possesses a pedigree of his descent from the prophet Samuel, and knows the melodies which were sung in the Temple during its existence" (ib. p. 100, &c.). He also mentions descendants of the tribes of Dan, Zebulun, and Naphtali, among the mountains of Khasvin, whose prince was of the tribe of Levi. The patriarchs of Jerusalem, so called from the Hebrew אבות ישראל, claimed descent from Hillel, the Babylonian, of whom it is said that a genealogy, found at Jerusalem, declared his descent from David and Abital. Others, however, traced his descent from Benjamin, and from David only through a daughter of Shephatiah* (Wolf, H. B. iv. 380). But however tradition may have preserved for a while true genealogies, or imagination and pride have coined fictitious ones, it may be safely affirmed that, after the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jewish genealogical system came to an end. Essentially connected as it was with the tenure of the land on the one hand, and with the peculiar privileges of the houses of David and Levi on the other, it naturally failed when the land was taken away from the Jewish race, and when the promise to David was fulfilled, and the priesthood of Aaron superseded, by the exaltation of Christ to the right hand of God. The remains of the genealogical spirit among the later Jews (which might of course be much more fully illustrated from Rabbinical literature) has only been glanced at to show how deeply it had penetrated into the Jewish national mind.⁴ It remains to be said that just notions of the nature of the Jewish genealogical records are of great importance with a view to the right interpretation of Scripture. Let it only be remembered that these records have respect to political and territorial divisions, as much as to strictly genealogical descent, and it will at once be seen how erroneous a conclusion it may be, that all who are called "sons" of such or such a patriarch, or chief father, must necessarily have been his very children. Just as in the very first division into tribes Manasseh and Ephraim were numbered with their uncles, as if they had been sons instead of grandsons (Gen. xlviii. 5) of Jacob, so afterwards the names of persons belonging to different generations would often stand side by side as heads of families or houses, and be called the sons of their common ancestor. For example, Gen. xvi. 21 contains grandsons as well as sons of Benjamin [BELAH], and Ex. vi. 24 probably enumerates the son and grandson of Assir as heads, with their father, of the families of the Korhites. And so in innumerable instances. If any one family or house became extinct, some other would succeed to its place, called after its own chief father. Hence of course a census of any tribe drawn up at a later period, would exhibit different divisions from one drawn up at an earlier. Compare, e.g., the list of courses of priests in Zerubbabel's time (Neh. xii.) with that of those in David's time (1 Ch. xxiv.).⁵ The same principle must be borne in mind in interpreting any particular genealogy. The sequence of generations may represent the succession to such or such an inheritance or headship of tribe or family, rather than the relationship of father and son.⁶ Again, where a pedigree was abbreviated, it genealogies is given in a note to p. 32 of Asher's Benj. of Tudela, ii. 6.

⁶ "The term 'son of' appears to have been used throughout the East in those days, as it still is, to denote connexion generally, either by descent or succession" (Layard's Nin. & Bab. p. 615). The observation is to explain the inscription "Jehu the son of Omri."

would naturally specify such generations as would indicate from what chief houses the person descended. In cases where a name was common the father's name would be added for distinction only. These reasons would be well understood at the time, though it may be difficult now to ascertain them positively. Thus in the pedigree of Ezra (Ezra vii. 1-5), it would seem that both Seraiah and Azariah were heads of houses (Neh. x. 2); they are both therefore named. Hilkiah is named as having been high-priest, and his identity is established by the addition "the son of Shallum" (1 Ch. vi. 13); the next named is Zadok, the priest in David's time, who was chief of the sixteen courses sprung from Eleazar, and then follows a complete pedigree from this Zadok to Aaron. But then as regards the chronological use of the Scripture genealogies, it follows from the above view that great caution is necessary in using them as measures of time, though they are invaluable for this purpose whenever we can be sure that they are complete. What seems necessary to make them trustworthy measures of time is, either that they should have special internal marks of being complete, such as where the mother as well as the father is named, or some historical circumstance defines the several relationships, or that there should be several genealogies, all giving the same number of generations within the same termini. When these conditions are found, it is difficult to overrate the value of genealogies for chronology. In determining, however, the relation of generations to time, some allowance must be made for the station in life of the persons in question. From the early marriages of the princes, the average of even 30 years to a generation will probably be found too long for the kings.⁷

Another feature in the Scripture genealogies which it is worth while to notice is the recurrence of the same name, or modifications of the same name, such as Tobias, Tobit, Nathan, Mattatha, and even of names of the same signification, in the same family. This is an indication of the carefulness with which the Jews kept their pedigrees (as otherwise they could not have known the names of their remote ancestors); it also gives a clue by which to judge of obscure or doubtful genealogies.

The Jewish genealogies have two forms, one giving the generations in a descending, the other in an ascending scale. Examples of the descending form may be seen in Ruth iv. 18-22, or 1 Ch. iii.; of the ascending, 1 Ch. vi. 33-43 (A. V.), Ezra vii. 1-5. The descending form is expressed by the formula A begat B, and B begat C, &c.; or, the sons of A, B his son, C his son, &c.; or, the sons of A, B, C, D; and the sons of B, C, D, E; and the sons of C, E, F, G, &c. The ascending is always expressed in the same way. Of the two, it is obvious that the descending scale is the one in which we are most likely to find collateral descents, inasmuch as it implies that the object is to enumerate the heirs of the person at the head of the stem; and if direct heirs failed at any point, collateral ones would have to be inserted. In all cases too where the original document was preserved, when the direct line failed, the heir would naturally place his own name next to his immediate predecessor, though that predecessor was not his father, but only his kinsman. Whereas in the ascending scale there can be no failure in the nature of things. But neither form is in itself more or less fit than the other to express either proper or imputed filiation.

Females are named in genealogies when there is anything remarkable about them, or when any right or property is transmitted through them. See Gen. xi. 29, xxii. 23, xxv. 1-4, xxxv. 22-26; Ex. vi. 23; Num. xxvi. 33; 1 Ch. ii. 4, 19, 35, 50, &c.

The genealogical lists of names are peculiarly liable to corruptions of the text, and there are many such in the Books of Chronicles, Ezra, &c. Jerome speaks of these corruptions having risen to a fearful height in the LXX: "Sylvam nominum quas scriptorum vitio confusa sunt." "Ita in Graec. et Lat. Codd. hic nomen liber vitiosus est, ut non tam Hebraea quam barbara quaedam et Sarmatica nomina conjecta arbitrandum sit." "Saepe tria nomina, subtractis è medio syllabis, in unum vocabulum cogunt, vel . . . unum nomen . . . in duo vel tria vocabula dividunt" (Praefat. in Paralip.). In like manner the lists of high-priests in Josephus are so corrupt, that the names are scarcely recognisable. This must be borne in mind in dealing with the genealogies. See Schürer, Gesch. d. Jüd. Volkes, ii. 166 sq.

The Bible genealogies give an unbroken descent of the house of David from the Creation to the time of Christ. The registers at Jerusalem must have supplied the same to the priestly and many other families. They also inform us of the origin of most of the nations of the earth, and carry the genealogy of the Edomitish sovereigns down to about the time of Saul. Viewed as a whole, it is a genealogical collection of surpassing interest and accuracy. Cp. Rawlinson's Herodot. i. ch. 2; Burrington's Geneal. Tab.; Selden's Works, passim; Benj. of Tudela's Itin., [A. C. H.]

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

The New Testament gives us the genealogy of but one person, that of our Saviour. The priesthood of Aaron having ceased, the possession of the land of Canaan being transferred to the Gentiles, and there being under the N. T. dispensation no difference between circumcision and uncircumcision, Barbarian and Scythian, bond and free, there is but One Whose genealogy it concerns us as Christians to be acquainted with, that of our Lord Jesus Christ. Him the prophets announced as the seed of Abraham and the son of David, and the Angel declared that to Him should be given the throne of His father David, that He might reign over the house of Jacob for ever. His descent from David and Abraham being therefore an essential part of His Messiahship, it was right that His genealogy should be given as a portion of Gospel truth. Considering, further, that to the Jews first He was manifested and preached, and that His descent from David and Abraham was a matter of special interest to them, it seems likely that the proof of His descent would be one especially adapted to convince them; in other words, that it would be drawn from documents which they deemed authentic. Such were the genealogical records preserved at Jerusalem. [GENEALOGY.] And when to the above considerations we add the fact that the lineage of Joseph was actually made out from authentic records for the purpose of the civil census ordered by Augustus, it becomes morally certain that the genealogy of Jesus Christ was extracted from the public registers. Another consideration adds yet further conviction. It has often excited surprise that the genealogies of Christ should both give the descent of Joseph, and not of Mary. But if these genealogies were those contained in the public registers, it could not be otherwise. In them Jesus, the son of Mary, the espoused wife of Joseph, could only appear as Joseph's son (cp. John i. 45). In transferring them to the pages of the Gospels, the Evangelists only added the qualifying expression "as was supposed" (Luke iii. 23, and its equivalent, Matt. i. 16).

But now to approach the difficulties with which the genealogies of Christ are thought to be beset. These difficulties have seemed so considerable in all ages as to drive commentators to very strange shifts. Some, as early as the second century, broached the notion, which Julius Africanus vigorously repudiates, that the genealogies are imaginary lists designed only to set forth the union of royal and priestly descent in Christ. Others on the contrary, to silence this and similar solutions, brought in a Deus ex machinâ, in the shape of a tradition derived from the Desposyni, in which by an ingenious application of the law of Levirate to two uterine brothers, whose mother had married first into the house of Solomon, and afterwards into the house of Nathan, some of the discrepancies were reconciled, though the meeting of the two genealogies in Zerubbabel and Salathiel is wholly unaccounted for. Later, and chiefly among Protestant divines, the theory was invented of one genealogy being Joseph's, and the other Mary's; a theory in direct contradiction to the plain letter of the Scripture narrative, and leaving untouched as many difficulties as it solves. The fertile invention of Annius of Viterbo forged a book in Philo's name, which accounted for the discrepancies by asserting that all Christ's ancestors, from David downwards, had two names. The circumstance, however, of one line running up to Solomon, and the other to Nathan, was overlooked. Other fanciful suggestions have been offered; while infidels, from Porphyry downwards, have seen in what they call the contradiction of St. Matthew and St. Luke a proof of the spuriousness of the Gospels; and critics like Professor Norton, a proof of such portions of Scripture being interpolated. Others, like Alford, content themselves with saying that solution is impossible, without further knowledge than we possess. But it is not too much to say that after all, in regard to the main points, there is no difficulty at all, if only the documents in question are dealt with reasonably, and after the analogy of similar Jewish documents in the O. T.—and that the clues to a right understanding of them are so patent, and so strongly marked, that it is surprising that so much diversity of opinion should have existed. The following propositions will explain the true construction of these genealogies:—

1. They are both the genealogies of Joseph, i.e. of Jesus Christ, as the reputed and legal son of Joseph and Mary. One has only to read them to be satisfied of this. The notices of Joseph as being of the house of David, by the same Evangelists who give the pedigree, are an additional confirmation (Matt. i. 20; Luke i. 27, ii. 4, &c.); and if these pedigrees were extracted from the public archives, they must have been Joseph's.

2. The genealogy of St. Matthew is, as Grotius most truly and unhesitatingly asserted, Joseph's genealogy as legal successor to the throne of David, i.e. it exhibits the successive heirs of the kingdom ending with Christ, as Joseph's reputed son. St. Luke's is Joseph's private genealogy, exhibiting his real birth, as David's son, and thus showing why he was heir to Solomon's crown. This is capable of being almost demonstrated. If St. Matthew's genealogy had stood alone, and we had no further information on this subject than it affords, we might indeed have thought that it was a genealogical stem in the strictest sense of the word, exhibiting Joseph's forefathers in succession, from David downwards. But immediately we find a second genealogy of Joseph—that in St. Luke's Gospel—such is no longer a reasonable opinion. Because if St. Matthew's genealogy, tracing as it does the successive generations through the long line of Jewish kings, had been Joseph's real paternal stem, there could not possibly have been room for a second genealogy. The steps of ancestry coinciding with the steps of succession, one pedigree only could in the nature of things be proper. The mere existence therefore of a second pedigree, tracing Joseph's ancestry through private persons, by the side of one tracing it through kings, is in itself a proof that the latter is not the true stem of birth. When, with this clue, we examine St. Matthew's list, to discover whether it contains in itself any evidence as to when the lineal descent was broken, we fix at once upon Jechonias, who could not, we know, be literally the father of Salathiel, because the word of God by the mouth of Jeremiah had pronounced him childless. It had also declared that none of his seed should sit upon the throne of David, or rule in Judah (Jer. xxii. 30). The same thing had been declared concerning his father Jehoiakim in Jer. xxxvi. 30. Jechonias therefore could not be the father of Salathiel, nor could Christ spring either from him or his father. Here then we have the most striking confirmation of the justice of the inference drawn from finding a second genealogy, viz. that St. Matthew gives the succession, not the strict birth; and we conclude that the names after the childless Jechonias are those of his next heirs, as also in 1 Ch. iii. 17. One more look at the two genealogies convinces us that this conclusion is just; for we find that the two next names following Jechonias, Salathiel and Zerubbabel, are actually taken from the other genealogy, which teaches us that Salathiel's real father was Neri, of the house of Nathan. It becomes therefore perfectly certain, that Salathiel of the house of Nathan became heir to

David's throne on the failure of Solomon's line in Jechonias, and that as such he and his descendants were transferred as "sons of Jechoniah" to the royal genealogical table, according to the principle of the Jewish Law laid down in Num. xxvii. 8–11. The two genealogies then coincide for two, or rather for four generations, as will be shown below. There then occur six names in St. Matthew which are not found in St. Luke; and then once more the two genealogies coincide in the name of Matthan or Matthat (Matt. i. 15; Luke iii. 24), to whom two different sons, Jacob and Heli, are assigned, but one and the same grandson and heir, Joseph the husband of Mary, and the reputed father of Jesus, Who is called Christ. The simple and obvious explanation of this is, on the same principle as before, that Joseph was descended from Joseph, a younger son of Abiud (the Juda of Luke iii. 26), but that, on the failure of the line of Abiud's eldest son in Eleazar, Joseph's grandfather Matthan became the heir; that Matthan had two sons, Jacob and Heli; that Jacob had no son, and consequently that Joseph, the son of his younger brother Heli, became heir to his uncle, and to the throne of David. Thus the simple principle that one Evangelist exhibits that genealogy which contained the successive heirs to David's and Solomon's throne, while the other exhibits the paternal stem of him who was the heir, explains all the anomalies of the two pedigrees, their agreements as well as their discrepancies, and the circumstance of there being two at all. It must be added that not only does this theory explain all the phenomena, but that that portion of it which asserts that Luke gives Joseph's paternal stem receives a most remarkable confirmation from the names which compose that stem. For if we begin with Nathan, we find that his son, Mattatha, and four others, of whom the last was grandfather to Joseph, had names which are merely modifications of Nathan (Matthat twice, and Mattathias twice); or if we begin with Joseph, we shall find no less than three of his name between him and Nathan: an evidence, of the most convincing kind, that Joseph was lineally descended from Nathan in the way St. Luke represents him to be (cp. Zech. xii. 12).

3. Mary, the mother of Jesus, was in all probability the daughter of Jacob, and first cousin to Joseph her husband.* So that in point of fact, though not of form, both the genealogies are as much hers as her husband's.

But besides these main difficulties, as they have been thought to be, there are several others which cannot be passed over in any account, however concise, of the genealogies of Christ. The most startling is the total discrepancy between them both and that of Zerubbabel in the O. T. (1 Ch. iii. 19–24). In this last, of seven sons of Zerubbabel not one bears the name, or anything like the name, of Rhesa or Abiud. And of the next generation not one bears the name, or anything like the name, of Eliakim or Joanna, which are in the corresponding generation in St. Matthew and St. Luke. Nor can any subsequent generations be identified. But this difference will be entirely got rid of, and a remarkable harmony established in its place, if we suppose Rhesa, who is named in St. Luke's Gospel as Zerubbabel's son, to have slipped into the text from the margin. Rhesa is in fact not a name at all, but it is the Chaldee title of the princes of the Captivity, who at the end of the second, and through the third century after Christ, rose to great eminence in the East, assumed the state of sovereigns, and were considered to be of the house of David (see preceding article, p. 1143). These princes then were exactly what Zerubbabel was in his day. It is very probable therefore that this title, רֶשָׁא, rēshā, should have been placed against the name of Zerubbabel by some early Christian Jew, and thence crept into the text. If this be so, St. Luke will then give Joanna, Ἰωαννάς, as the son of Zerubbabel. But Ἰωαννάς is the very same name as Hananiah, חַנַּנְיָהוּ, the son of Zerubbabel according to 1 Ch. iii. 19. [HANANIAH.] In St. Matthew this generation is omitted. In the next generation we identify Matthew's Ab-jud (Abiud), אַבְיָהוּדָא, with Luke's Juda, in the Hebrew of that day יְהוּדָא (Jud), and both with Hodaiah, הוֹדְיָהוּ, of 1 Ch. iii. 24 (a name which is actually interchanged with Juda, יְהוּדָא, Ezra iii. 9; Neh. xi. 9, compared with Ezra ii. 40; 1 Ch. ix. 7), by the simple process of supposing the Shemaiah, שֵׁמַיָּהוּ, of 1 Ch. iii. 22 to be the same person as the Shimei, שִׁמְיָהוּ, of v. 19: thus at the same time cutting off all those redundant generations which bring this genealogy in 1 Ch. iii. down some 200 years later than any other in the Book, and long after the close of the Canon.

The next difficulty is the difference in the number of generations between the two genealogies. St. Matthew's division into three fourteens gives only 42, while St. Luke, from Abraham to Christ inclusive, reckons 56; or, which is more to the point (since the generations between Abraham and David are the same in both genealogies), while St. Matthew reckons 28 from David to Christ, St. Luke reckons 43, or 42 without Rhesa. But the genealogy itself supplies the explanation. In the second tessarodecade, including the kings, we know that three generations are omitted—Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah—in order to reduce the generations from 17 to 14: the difference between these 17 and the 19 of St. Luke being very small. So in like manner it is obvious that the generations have been abridged in the same way in the third division to keep to the number 14. The true number would be one much nearer St. Luke's 23 (22 without Rhesa), implying the omission of about seven generations in this last division. Dr. Mill has shown that it was a common practice with the Jews to distribute genealogies into divisions, each containing some favourite or mystical number, and that, in order to do this, generations were either repeated or left out. Thus in Philo the generations from Adam to Moses are divided into two decades and one hebdomad, by the repetition of Abraham. But in a Samaritan poem the very same series is divided into two decades only, by the omission of six of the least important names (Vindication, pp. 110–118).

Another difficulty is the apparent deficiency in the number of the last tessarodecad, which seems to contain only 13 names. But the explanation of this is, that either in the process of translation, or otherwise, the names of Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin have got confused and expressed by the one name Jechonias. For that Jechonias, in v. 11, means Jehoiakim, while in v. 12 it means Jehoiachin, is quite certain, as Jerome saw long ago. Jehoiachin had no brothers, but Jehoiakim had three brothers, of whom two at least sat upon the throne, if not three,^b and were therefore named in the genealogy. The two names are very commonly considered as the same, both by Greek and Latin writers, e.g. Clemens Alex., Ambrose, Africanus, Epiphanius, as well as the author of 1 Esd. (i. 37, 43), and others. Irenaeus also distinctly asserts that Joseph's genealogy, as given by St. Matthew, expresses both Joiakim and Jechonias. It seems that his identity of name has led to some corruption in the text of very early date, and that the clause Ἰεχωίας δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰεχωϊαν has fallen out between αὐτοῦ and ἐπὶ τῆς μετ. Βαβ., in v. 11. The Cod. Vat. (B.) contains the clause only after Βαβυλῶνος in v. 12, where it seems less proper (see Alford's G. T.; and Westcott and Hort in loco).

The last difficulty of sufficient importance to be mentioned here is a chronological one. In both the genealogies there are but three names between Salmon and David—Boaz, Obed, Jesse. But, according to the common chronology, from the entrance into Canaan (when Salmon was come to man's estate) to the birth of David was 405 years, or from that to 500 years and upwards. Now for about an equal period, from Solomon to Jehoiachin, St. Luke's genealogy contains 20 names. Obviously therefore either the chronology or the genealogy is wrong. But it cannot be the genealogy (which is repeated four times over without any variation), because it is supported by eight other genealogies,^c which all contain about the same number of generations from the Patriarchs to David as David's own line does: except that, as was to be expected from Judah, Boaz, and Jesse being all advanced in years at the time of the birth of their sons, David's line is one of the shortest. The number of generations in the genealogies referred to is 14 in five, 15 in two, and 11 in one, to correspond with the 11 in David's line. There are other genealogies where the series is not complete, but not one which contains more generations. It is the province therefore of Chronology to square its calculations to the genealogies. It must suffice here to assert that the shortening the interval between the Exodus and David by about 200 years, which brings it to the length indicated by the genealogies, does in the most remarkable manner bring Israelitish history into harmony with Egyptian, with the traditional Jewish date of the Exodus, with the fragment of Edomitish history preserved in Gen. xxxvi. 31–39, and with the internal evidence of the Israelitish history itself. following pedigree will exhibit the successive generations as given by the two Evangelists:—

Thus it will be seen that the whole number of generations from Adam to Christ, both inclusive, is 74, without the second Cainan and Rhesa. Including these two, and adding the name of GOD, Augustine reckoned 77, and thought the number typical of the forgiveness of all sins in Baptism by Him Who was thus born in the 77th generation, alluding to Matt. xviii. 22; with many other wonderful speculations on the hidden meaning of the numbers 3, 4, 7, 10, 11, and their additions and multiplications (Quaest. Evang. lib. 11). Irenaeus, who probably, like Africanus and Eusebius, omitted Matthat and Levi, reckoned 72 generations, which he connected with the 72 nations into which, according to Gen. x. (LXX.), mankind was divided, and so other Fathers likewise.

For an account of the different explanations that have been given, both by ancient and modern commentators, the reader may refer to the elaborate Dissertation of Patritius in his 2nd vol. De Evangelis; who, however, does not contribute much to elucidate the difficulties of the case. The opinions advanced in the foregoing article are fully discussed in the writer's work on the Genealogies of our Lord Jesus Christ; and much valuable matter will be found in Dr. Mill's Vindication of the Geneal., and in Grotius' note on Luke iii. 23. Other treatises are, Gomarus, De Geneal. Christi; Hottinger, Dissert. duae de Geneal. Christi; G. G. Voss, De J. Chr. Geneal.; Yardley, On the Geneal. of J. Chr., &c. [A. C. H.]

GENERATION. 1. Abstract.—time, either definite or indefinite. The primary meaning of the Heb. גֵּנֶזֶת is revolution; hence period of time: cp. περίοδος, εἰσπραξις, and annus. From the general idea of a period comes the more special notion of an age or generation of men, the ordinary period of human life. In this point of view the history of the word seems to be directly contrasted with that of the Latin saeculum; which, starting with the idea of breed or race, acquired the secondary signification of a definite period of time (Censorin. de Die Nat. c. 17).

In the long-lived Patriarchal age a generation seems to have been computed at 100 years (Gen. xv. 16; cp. v. 13 and Ex. xii. 40; see Delitzsch [1887] and Knobel's note in Dillmann's on Gen. l. c.); the later reckoning, however, was the same which has been adopted by other civilised nations, viz. from thirty to forty years (Job xlii. 16). For generation in the sense of a definite period of time, see Gen. xv. 16; Deut. xxiii. 3, 4, 8, &c.

As an indefinite period of time:—for time past, see Deut. xxxii. 7, Is. lviii. 12; for time future, see Ps. xlv. 17, lxxii. 5, &c.

2. Concrete:—the men of an age, or time. So generation = contemporaries (Gen. vi. 9;

Is. liii. 8; see Lowth ad loc.; Gen. Lex.; better than "aeterna generatio," or "multitudo creditura." Cp. the commentaries of Delitzsch⁴ and Dillmann⁵); posterity, especially in legal formulae (Lev. iii. 17, &c.); fathers, or ancestors (Ps. xlix. 19; Rosenm. Schol. ad loc., and modern comm.; cp. 2 Ch. xxxiv. 28). Dropping the idea of time, generation comes to mean a race, or class of men: e.g. of the righteous (Pa. xiv. 5, &c.); of the wicked (Deut. xxxii. 5; Jer. vii. 29, where "generation of his wrath" = against which God is angry).

In A. V. of N. Test. three words are rendered by generation:—

γένεσις, γεννήματα, γενεά.

γένεσις, properly generatio; but in Matt. i. 1

βίβλος γενέσεως = תולדות אברהם = a genealogical scheme.

γεννήματα, pl. of γέννημα, Matt. iii. 7, &c., A. V. generation; more properly brood, as the result of generation in its primary sense.

γενεά in most of its uses corresponds with the Heb. גֵּוֹל.

For the abstract and indefinite, see Luke i. 50, Eph. iii. 21 (A. V. "ages," R. V. "generations" [see R. V. marg.]), future: Acts xv. 21 (A. V. "of old time," R. V. "from generations of old"), Eph. iii. 5 (A. V. "ages," R. V. "generations"), past.

For concrete, see Matt. xi. 16.

For generation without reference to time, see Luke xvi. 8, "in their generation," i.e. in their disposition, "indoles, ingenium, et ratio hominum," Schleusner; Trench, "in worldly things" (Notes on the Parables, in loco); Speaker's Comm. "in relation to their kindred"; Nösgen, "their contemporaries" (Strack u. Zückler's Köpf. Komm. in loco). Matt. i. 17, "all the generations;" either concrete use, sc. "familiae sibi invicem succedentes;" or abstract and definite, according to the view which may be taken of the difficulties connected with the genealogies of our Lord. [GENEALOGY.] [T. E. B.] [F.]

GENES'ARETH. In this form the name appears in the edition of the A. V. of 1611, in Mark vi. 53 and Luke v. 1, following the spelling of the Vulgate. In Matt. xiv. 34, where the Vulg. has Genesar, the A. V. originally followed the Received Greek Text—Genesaret. The oldest MSS. have, however, Γεννησαρέτ in each of the three places. [GENNESARET.]

GENESIS (Γένεσις, from the LXX. rendering of ii. 4a, ἀρχὴ ἢ βίβλος γενέσεως οὐρανοῦ καὶ γῆς: called by the Jews, like the other Books of the Pentateuch, from its first word, Πεντάτευχ. Bērēshith), the first Book in the great historical series, Gen.—2 Kings, or, more immediately, in the Hexateuch (Gen.—Josh.).

§ 1. The general aim of the Hexateuch is to describe in their origin the fundamental institutions of the Theocracy (the civil and ceremonial law), and to trace from the earliest past the course of events which issued ultimately in the establishment of Israel in Canaan. The Book of Genesis comprises the introductory period of this history, embracing the lives of the ancestors of the Hebrew nation, and ending with the death of Joseph in Egypt,—the close of the term of migration and the beginning of the period during which the clan that accompanied Jacob into Egypt grows insensibly into a nation. It recounts the fortunes of the Patriarchs as they were handed down by tradition; it represents them as patterns, in that remote age, of a higher faith among mankind, and as providentially commissioned to be the founders of a community inspired by the principles of a true religion, and destined ultimately to become the cradle of a faith that should embrace the world. It shows us ABRAHAM, privileged to be the "Friend of God," migrating from the distant east, and entering Canaan as his adopted home, treated by the native princes with honour and respect, and receiving from God promises of an august future for his descendants. It shows us ISAAC, living a quieter, less eventful life, but otherwise re-enacting the experiences of his father. It describes next the chequered career of JACOB; the ruse by which he wrests the supremacy from Esau; his strange contest with Laban; his return, an altered man, after the wrestling at Peniel; the reunion, so little expected, with his sons in Egypt. We trace the hand of Providence in the vicissitudes which befel JOSEPH; and the circumstances are related which made Egypt for a while the home of the ancestors of Israel. In the course of the narrative many points interesting to a later age are incidentally noticed and explained: for example, local antiquities (e.g. xvi. 14; xix. 22; xxi. 31; xxiii.; xxvi. 33; xxviii. 19; xxxi. 47; xxxvi. 24, &c.), current proverbs or customs (x. 9; xvii.; xxii. 14; xxviii. 22; xxxii. 32 [Heb. 33]; xlvii. 26), the contrasted character or condition of neighbouring nations (ix. 25-7; xvi. 12; xvii. 20 sq.; xix. 37 sq.; xxv. 23 sqq.; xxvii. 27-9, 39, 40; xlviii. 19). And in ch. xlix. the political character, or geographical position, of the tribes of Israel is prefigured in their father's blessing.

§ 2. To recount, however, the ancestry of Israel alone would leave an unsatisfactory blank in the picture; the place occupied by it among other nations must also be defined. Accordingly the line of its ancestors is traced back beyond Abraham to the first appearance of man upon earth; and by means of a genealogical scheme, developed sometimes with surprising minuteness, the degree of affinity uniting the principal nations known to the Hebrews, to one another, and to Israel is indicated. Thus to the History of the Patriarchs in particular, chs. xii.—i., is prefixed, chs. i.—xi., a general view of the Early History of Mankind, from the Creation inclusive, explaining the presence of evil in the world (ch. iii.), sketching the beginnings of civilization (ch. iv.), accounting for the existence of separate nations (ch. x., xi. 1-9), and determining the position occupied by the Hebrews among them (x. 1, 21, 22; xi. 10-26).

§ 3. The framework into which the whole is cast is marked by the recurring formula These are the generations (lit. begettings) of The phrase is strictly one proper to genealogies, implying that the person to whose name it is prefixed is of sufficient importance to mark a break in the genealogical series, and that he and his descendants will form the subject of the record which follows, until another name is reached prominent enough to form the commencement of a new section. By this means the Book of Genesis is articulated as follows:—

- Chs. 1.-iv.* (Creation; Fall of man; Progress of invention in the line of Cain to Lamech).
 „ v. 1^b-vi. 8 (Adam and his descendants, through Seth, to Noah).
 „ vi. 9-ix. 29 (History of Noah, and of his sons, till their father's death).
 „ x. 1-xi. 9 (Sons of Noah, and nations sprung from them).
 „ xi. 10-26 (Line of Shem to Terah).
 „ xi. 27-xxv. 11 (Terah and his descendants, Abram and Lot).
 „ xxv. 12-18 (Ishmael and Arab tribes claiming descent from him).
 „ xxv. 19-xxxv. 29 (Life of Isaac, with history of his sons till Isaac's death).
 „ xxxvi. 1-43 (Esau and his descendants, with a digression, et c., 20-30, on the aboriginal inhabitants of Edom).
 „ xxxvii. (see v. 2)-l. (Life of Jacob subsequent to Isaac's death, and history of his sons to death of Joseph).*

To this scheme the narrative of Genesis is accommodated. The attention of the reader is fixed upon Israel, which is gradually disengaged from the nations with which it is at first confused: at each stage in the history, a brief general account of the collateral branches having been given, they are dismissed, and the narrative is limited more and more to the immediate line of Israel's ancestors. Thus after ch. x. all the descendants of Noah disappear, except the line of Shem (xi. 10 sqq.): after xxv. 18 Ishmael disappears, and Isaac only remains: similarly after ch. xxxvi. Jacob alone is left. The same method is adopted in the intermediate parts: thus xix. 30-38 the relation to Israel of the collateral branches of Moab and Ammon is explained: xxii. 20-24 (family of Abraham's brother Nahor), xxv. 1-4 (children of Keturah), those of other kindred tribes.

A similar plan governs the promises and blessings given to, or by, the Patriarchs: they become gradually more definite, and their scope is progressively narrowed. Addressed first in general terms to Adam, they are repeated to Noah, then limited to Shem among his descendants, afterwards brought down to Jacob, till finally among his sons the promise of royalty is bestowed upon Judah alone. They may be grouped in two series, which, however, whether taken separately or together, exhibit in this respect the same principle. Thus (a) i. 28-30; ix. 1-7; xvii. 6-8; xxviii. 3 sq.; xxxv. 11 sq. (quoted, xlvi. 3): (b) iii. 15; ix. 26; xii. 1-3 (Abraham: also xiii. 14-17; xv. 5, 13-16; xviii. 18; xxii. 15-18); xxvi. 2-5, 24 (Isaac); xxvii. 27-29; xxviii. 13-15 (Jacob); xlix. 10 (Judah).

The unity of plan thus established (and traceable in numerous other details) has been long recognised by critics: the hypothesis that the Book of Genesis is a collection of "fragments" belongs to the infancy of criticism.

§ 4. Unity of plan, however, is not synonymous with unity of structure. The Book of Genesis shows clear marks of the one, but not of the other. Like the rest of the Pentateuch, and indeed like the historical Books generally, it is composed of distinct documents or sources, which a later editor or redactor has welded together into a continuous whole, subordinating them to the aim with which he wrote, but leaving them in the main with their distinctive literary and other characteristics unchanged. Although (for reasons which will appear) there are points which remain, and probably will continue to remain, uncertain, the fundamental distinctions between these documents or sources have been ascertained by critics, and the general limits of each determined, with sufficient clearness to enable us to picture, at least approximately, the process by which the Pentateuch assumed its present shape. The question of the relative date of its several component parts is discussed in the art. PENTATEUCH: we shall confine ourselves here to an indication of the general grounds upon which—in the Book of Genesis in particular—the distinction of sources is inferred, and an exposition of the structure of the Book as analysed by the best and most recent critics.

§ 5. When the Pentateuch is read attentively, two facts amongst others attract the reader's notice: (1) the same event is doubly recorded; (2) the style and language in different sections vary. In Genesis we have thus a double narrative of the origin of man upon earth, i. 1-ii. 4 a, and ii. 4 b-25. It is true, ii. 4 b sqq. might apparently be regarded as merely a more detailed account of what is described succinctly in i. 26-30; but a more attentive examination reveals differences which preclude the supposition that both sections are the work of the same hand. It is clear that in ch. ii. the order of creation is 1. man (v. 7), 2. vegetation (v. 9; cp. v. 5), 3. animals (v. 19),^d 4. woman (v. 21 sq.). The separation made between the creation of woman and man is, indeed, fairly explicable upon the hypothesis that ii. 4 b sqq. describes in detail what is stated summarily in i. 27 b; but the order in the other cases forms part of a progression evidently intentional on the part of the narrator here, and as evidently opposed to the order indicated in ch. i. (vegetation, animals, man). Not only, however, are there material differences between the two narratives: they differ also in form. The style of i. 1-ii. 4 a is unornate, measured, precise, and particular phrases frequently recur; that of ii. 4 b sqq. is freer and more varied; the recurring phrases are less marked, and not the same as those of i. 1-ii. 4 a. Ch. xix. 29, again, where it stands, interrupts the narrative and repeats the substance of et c. 1-25: the presumption, hence derived, that it is a briefer account of the same event, incorporated from another source, is confirmed by the style, which resembles that of other sections similarly distinguished from the narrative in which they are embedded.* In chs.

* The formula is here applied metaphorically to "heaven and earth," and stands at ii. 4 a. Elsewhere it always relates to what follows: inasmuch as in this place it can scarcely refer to ii. 4 b sqq. (for this narrative is silent as to the Heavens), it must refer exceptionally to what precedes. Perhaps, as some critics have conjectured, it originally stood as the superscription to i. 1, and owes its present position to the compiler of the Book of Genesis.

^b The formula here is slightly different: "This is the book (or roll) of the generations," &c.

^c The formula occurs next in Num. iii. 1 (of Aaron and Moses): see also Ruth iv. 18; 1 Ch. i. 29 (all).

^d The rendering had formed is against idiom.

* Observe God, Jehovah having been regularly used

xxi. 31 and xxvi. 33 we have two explanations of the origin of the name Bearshoba; xxviii. 19 and xxxv. 15, two of the name Bethel; xxxii. 28 and xxxv. 10, two of Israel; xxxii. 3 and xxxiii. 16, Esau is described as already resident in Edom, while in xxxvi. 6, 7 his settlement there is attributed to causes which could only have come into operation subsequently. In the narrative of the Deluge vi. 9-13 is a duplicate of vi. 5-8, and vii. 1-5 of vi. 18-22, the latter with the difference that of every clean beast seven are to be taken into the ark, while in vi. 19 two of every sort indiscriminately are prescribed: there are also accompanying differences of phraseology.^f Even the genealogies exhibit two distinct types (below, § 10, I., note). Other sections conspicuously distinguished both by phraseology and manner of treatment are ix. 1-17, xvii., xxiii.: where, as in these cases, the differences are at once numerous, recurrent, and systematic, they may be regarded as conclusive evidence that the narratives in which they occur are not the work of one and the same author.

§ 6. The sections homogeneous in style and character with i. 1-ii. 4 recur at intervals to the close of Joshua, and, when disengaged from the rest of the narrative and read consecutively, are found to constitute a tolerably complete whole, containing a systematic account of the origines of Israel, marked by definite literary characteristics, prominent amongst which is the use of God rather than Jehovah (till Ex. vi. 3), written in the unornate style of an annalist, displaying a methodical regard for chronological data which entitles it to be regarded as the framework of our present Hexateuch, and treating with particular minuteness the regulations for sacrifice and other ritual institutions (Sabbath, circumcision, passover, tabernacle, priesthood, feasts, &c.) of the ancient Hebrews. From these several characteristics the source in question (or its author) has been differently styled the Book of Origins^g (Ewald), the Elohist (Hupfeld, Bleek, &c.), the Annalistic narrator (Schrader), the "Grundschrift" (Tuch, Nöldeke), the Priests' Code (Wellhausen, Kuenen, Deltzsch). Of these designations the last is in strictness applicable only to the legal parts; these, however, form such a distinctive and central element, that it may not unsuitably be extended so as to embrace the entire source; and it may be represented conveniently, for the sake of brevity, by the letter P.^h before (e.g. vs. 13, 14, 16, 24), and remembered (see viii. 1; Ex. ii. 22): also notice the general statement that Lot dwelt in "the cities of the Plain," as in xiii. 12 (P), which would fall naturally from a writer compiling a summary account of the occurrences, but hardly so from one who had just before named repeatedly Sodom as the particular city in which Lot was dwelling.

^f See the art. ΠΕΝΤΑΤΕΥΧΗ (by the present Bishop of Worcester), ii. 776 (1st ed. of this Dict.) where what has been stated above is further illustrated.

^g Ursprünge — Ewald's rendering of the Heb.

תולדות ("generations"): see his Hist. of Israel, i. pp. 74-96.

^h Dillmann uses the letter A. Wellhausen uses Q (so Deltzsch), on account of the four (Quatuor) covenants described in it (with Adam, i. 28-30; Noah, ix. 1-17; Abraham, xvii.; Israel, Ex. vi. 2 sqq.). But the first of these is not strictly a covenant, but a blessing.

§ 7. In Genesis, as regards the limits of P, there is virtually no difference of opinion amongst critics. It embraces i. 1-ii. 4 a (creation of heaven and earth, with God's rest upon the Sabbath);—v. 1-28, 30-32 (line of Adam's descendants through Seth to Noah);—vi. 9-22; vii. 6, 7-9 (in parts), 11, 13-16 a, 18-21, 24; viii. 1-2 a, 3 b-5, 13 a, 14-19; ix. 1-17, 28, 29 (the Flood and the subsequent covenant with Noah);—x. 1-7, 20, 22, 23, 31, 32 (sons of Japheth, Ham, and Shem¹);—xi. 10-26 (descendants of Shem to Terah);—xi. 27, 31, 32; xii. 4 b-5; xiii. 6, 11 b-12 a; xvi. 1 a, 3, 15, 16 (history of Abram to birth of Ishmael);—xvii. (circumcision); xix. 29 (destruction of the cities of the Plain);—xxi. 1 b, 2 b-5 (birth of Isaac);—xxiii. (purchase of cave of Machpelah);—xxv. 7-11 a (death of Abraham);—xxv. 12-17 (descendants of Ishmael);—xxv. 19, 20, 26 b; xxvi. 34, 35; xxvii. 46-xxviii. 9 (history of Isaac: Esau's wives: reason why Jacob goes to Paddan-aram);—xxix. 24, 29; xxxi. 18 b; xxxiii. 18 a; xxxiv.^a 1, 2 a, 4, 6, 8-10, 13-18, 20-24, 25 (partly), 27-29; xxxv. 9-13, 15, 22 b-29 (return of Jacob from Paddan-aram to Shechem: his sons' refusal to sanction intermarriage with the Shechemites: change of name at Bethel: death of Isaac);—xxxvi. [in the main¹] (history of Esau);—xxxvii. 1-2 a (to Jacob); xli. 46; xlii. 6-27; xlvii. 5-6 a,^m 7-11, 27 b-28; xlviii. 3-6; xlix. 1 a, 28 b, 29-33; i. 12, 13 (history of Joseph). The passages present an outline of the antecedents, and patriarchal history, of Israel, in which only important occurrences—such as the Creation, the Flood, the covenants with Noah and Abraham—are described with minuteness, but which is sufficient to form an introduction to the systematic view of the theocratic institutions which it was the main object of the author of this source to exhibit. A few omissions are apparent (e.g. that of the events of Jacob's life in Paddan-aram, presupposed by xxii. 18, and probably others); but these may be naturally ascribed to the redactor, who, in combining P with his other source, gave a preference not unfrequently to the fuller and more picturesque narrative of the latter. Only very seldom does the language of P appear to have been modified by the redactor: thus in xvii. 1, xxi. 1 b, Jehovah has been substituted for Elohim; in xlvi. 8-27 also slight modifications appear to have been made by him. As a rule, however, the language of the narrator is unchanged; and many of the peculiarities of his style are apparent even in a translation. His language is that of a jurist rather than a historian: it is circumstantial, formal, and precise; a subject is developed methodically, and completeness of detail, even at the risk of some repetition, is regularly observed: sentences cast

^a As read in LXX., viz.: "And Jacob and his sons came into Egypt to Joseph, and Pharaoh king of Egypt heard of it. And Pharaoh spake unto Joseph, saying, Thy father and thy brethren are come unto thee: behold, the land of Egypt is before thee; in the best of the land make thy father and thy brethren to dwell." Then follows v. 7. Cp. below, § 10, IV., n. 3.

in the same type constantly recur.^a Particular formulæ are repeated with great frequency, especially such as articulate the progress of the narrative,^b or note the orderly observance of prescribed forms. The author pays consistent attention to numbers, chronology, and other statistical data. A love of system governs his whole treatment of the history. These peculiarities become even more marked in those portions of the subsequent Books of the Hexateuch which belong to the same source.

§ 8. It may be worth while here to anticipate an objection that may be felt. It has been said that the sections which have been designated by P, when compared with other parts of the narrative, betray differences of style which argue a difference of authorship. As many of these sections consist of brief formal notices, the differences, it may be thought, could be accounted for by the not unreasonable hypothesis that one and the same author, having to make such formal notices, adopted spontaneously a similar style throughout. It is true that, did the sections in question consist solely of such notices, the explanation suggested would be a plausible one; when, however, we find sections, often of considerable length, dealing with varied subject-matter, occurring not in Genesis merely, but throughout the Hexateuch, and marked uniformly by the same distinctive and stereotyped phraseology, it cannot be accepted as adequate. It should be added, to preclude a not unfrequent misconception, that the use of God (till Ex. vi. 3) instead of Jehovah, is but one feature in the style of P, not, in fact, more conspicuous than many others, which regularly accompany it.^c

§ 9. Is, however, what remains, after the separation of P, homogeneous in structure? It would appear not. Especially from ch. xx. onwards, the narrative exhibits marks of composite structure; and the component parts, though not differing from one another in diction or style so widely as either differs from P, and being so welded together that the lines of demarcation between them cannot frequently be fixed with certainty, seem nevertheless, in their broader outlines, to be distinctly recognisable. Thus xx. 1-17 is distinguished by the use of God, while in chs. xviii.-xix. (except xix. 29 P), and in the similar narrative xii. 10-20, Jehovah is regularly employed. The same phenomenon is repeated, xxi. 6-31, xxii. 1-13, and elsewhere, noticeably in xl.-xliii., xlv. For such a variation in consecutive and similar chapters it is difficult to find a satisfactory explanation except diversity of authorship: where it occurs, it is moreover often accompanied by differences of representation, which point to the same conclusion. At the same time, the fact that Elohim is not here attended by the other criteria of P's style, forbids our assigning the sections thus characterised to that source. An independent source must therefore be postulated: and in fact all critics who have examined carefully the text of Genesis have satisfied themselves that the parts which remain after the separation of P, consist of excerpts from two narratives covering in the main the same ground, but independent of each other, which have been welded together into a single whole. One of these sources, from its use of the name Jahweh,^d is now generally designated by the letter J: the other, which has just been alluded to and which uses chiefly the name Elohim, is denoted by E. The composite work thus produced may be referred to by the double letters JE.^e The precise manner in which these two sources were combined together has been disputed, and can hardly be said to be entirely certain; but critics generally agree with Wellh., who supposes that it was effected by the independent hand of a compiler. The method usually followed by the compiler was to extract an entire narrative, without appreciable alteration, from either of these sources, as the plan of his work required (e.g. xx. 1-17 from E; xxiv. from J); sometimes, however, it would seem as if in a narrative derived as a whole from one source particular notices borrowed from the other were incorporated, and sometimes a narrative appears to be composed of elements derived from each in nearly equal proportions. Occasionally the compiler appears to have introduced slight additions of his own. In order to gain an intelligent insight into the redactor's method, the reader should be careful to fix his attention on the main source followed in each section, treating mentally the passages incorporated in it as subordinate.^f

^a As v. 6-8, 9-11, 12-14, &c.; xi. 10-11, 12-13, &c.; xli. 4 b, xvi. 16, xvii. 24, 25, xxi. 5, xxv. 20, xli. 46 a, Ex. vii. 7; &c.

^b As i. 5 b, 8 b, 13, &c.; x. 5 [see Q.P.B.], 20, 31, 32, xxv. 16, xxxvi. 40, &c.

^c Undoubtedly Jehovah and God express different aspects of the Divine nature; but the theory of Kell (Kell, § 33) and others, that a sense of this distinction ruled the choice in each case, will be felt, if the passages are examined in detail, to be artificial and inadequate. Even were the case otherwise, the other variations would still remain unexplained. The statement in the Speaker's Commentary, i. p. 28 a, that the peculiarities of the Elohist phraseology "have been greatly magnified, even if they exist at all," is not in accordance with the facts. See the present writer's Introduction to the Literature of the O. T. (1891), pp. 122-123.

^d In passages, viz. in which the Divine name is used absolutely. Where it has to be qualified by a genitive, or possessive pronoun (as "God of Abraham," "thy God"), Elohim is naturally used quite freely in J, the personal name Jahweh, as is well known, not admitting of being thus qualified.

^e This is the nomenclature introduced by Wellhausen and now generally adopted (e.g. by Deltzsch). The author of the original source J is often called by Wellhausen the Jahvist, the author of E the Elohist, and the compiler who united the two the Jehovist (a name which combines the letters of JAHWEH with the vowels of EIOHM). But it is preferable to employ symbols exclusively, using J, E, P, to denote indifferently the documents or their authors. Dillmann uses B and C for E and J respectively.

§ 10. The analysis of JE, as accepted generally by critics at the present day (including in most cases Delitzsch), is exhibited in the following series of tables; the notes appended indicate—so far as the available space will permit—the general nature of the grounds upon which it rests. Minor differences of opinion and unimportant redactional additions are disregarded; but the more important cases in which the criteria are indecisive, and in which consequently opinion is not unanimous, have usually been noted. E cannot be recognised with certainty before ch. xx. (or perhaps ch. xv.).

The rest belongs to P (§ 7), or, in a few subordinate passages, is the work of the compiler. On the question whether the parts here assigned to J are perfectly homogeneous, it must suffice to refer to Dillmann (ed. 1886), pp. 88-90, 128, 199 sq., with the references there given. In J the line of Seth has been preserved imperfectly (iv. 25 sq.); the compiler having preferred the genealogy in the form in which it was given by P (v. 1-28, 30-31), only incorporating v. 29 from J (notice the difference in style of this verse from the rest of ch. v., and the similarity in form to iv. 25, 26, as well as the reference to iii. 16 sq.). The names in these two chapters are borrowed, it is plain, from ancient popular tradition: in J this tradition is exhibited in its more primitive form; in P it has been divested of every feature in any way suggestive of what was mythical, and reduced to little more than a list of names and chronological data. In reading ch. iv. (J), it is difficult not to be reminded of the Phœnician narrative of Sanconiathon (preserved in the Greek translation of Philo of Byblus*), where, in a very similar style, the origin of various institutions and inventions is connected similarly with a series of prehistoric names. The Hebrew and Phœnician narratives are both, it would seem, derived from the same cycle of old Semitic tradition.

In the account of the Flood, the main narrative is that of P, which has been enlarged by the addition of elements derived from J. Here, however, the elements contributed by J form a tolerably complete narrative, though there are omissions: e.g. between vi. 8 and vii. 1, of the instructions for making the ark, in place of which the compiler has preferred the account in P; and between vii. 5 and viii. 6 the extracts from J for a similar reason do not form an entirely complete narrative. The distinguishing characteristics of the two accounts are well exhibited by Delitzsch (p. 164 sq.): each is marked by a series of recurring features which are absent from the other, and by which it is connected with other sections of the Book belonging respectively to the same source. There are, moreover, differences of detail in the two narratives: thus the distinction between clean and unclean animals is peculiar to J; and while in J the entire duration of the Flood is 40 + (7 + 7 + 7) = 61 days (vii. 4, 12, 17; viii. 6, 10 [¹“other seven days,” implying seven between v. 7 and v. 9], 12). in P it extends over a year and 11 days (vii. 11; viii. 14). The form which the tradition took in Babylonia should be compared,² though it cannot be maintained that the Biblical accounts are simply borrowed thence. In the Babylonian account (which on the whole has greater affinities with the narrative of J than with that of P), the duration is “6 days and 7 nights” + 7 days.

In ix. 20-27, some critics are of opinion that the form has been modified, and that in the original narrative Canaan, not Ham, was the author of the misdeed. Certainly the existing text (v. 22, compared with v. 25) presents a difficulty which has not been satisfactorily explained.

On ch. x. the masterly analysis of Wellhausen should be read. The scheme of P may be learnt from the passages ascribed to him in § 7: here, as elsewhere, his plan is, having dealt first with the collateral branches, to dismiss them, and so to pass on to the line which leads directly to Israel. Thus xi. 10 sq. is the natural sequel in P to x. 22-23. The parts of ch. x. not ascribed to P exhibit a different style: contrast e.g. v. 21, 25, 26 with v. 22, 23. V. 21, 22 are the opening words of two parallel accounts (P and J respectively) of the descendants of Shem; v. 24, 25 are J's account of Eber and Peleg, parallel to P's in xi. 14-16 (cp. iv. 25, 26 J, beside v. 2-8 P). Notices in J of the nations descended from Noah have thus been combined by the final redactor with the more systematic scheme of P.

On xi. 28-30, cp. Budde [§ 14], pp. 220-223, who shows that the genealogies of J are cast in a different mould from those of P, and points out the similarities of expression in iv. 17-26; x. 8-19, 21, 24-30; xix. 37 sq.; xxii. 20-24; xxv.

1-6 (e.g. אֲבִי [not הוֹלִידָךְ, which is used by P] of the father, אֲבִיךָ [so besides only Judg. viii. 21], the father of . . . , &c.).

(Aug. 1888) superseded by Die Genesis mit äusserer Unterscheidung der Quellenschriften übersetzt, von E. Kautsch und A. Socin (ed. 2, 1891). In this very convenient volume, by the use of different kinds of type, the literary structure of the Book is exhibited with great distinctness to the eye. Another work of similar character, but more elaborate, is B. W. Bacon's The Genesis of Genesis (Hartford, U.S.A., 1892). It should, however, be recollected in using either of these books (cp. below, § 12) that the distribution of parts between J C E can frequently not claim more than a relative probability.

The verses enclosed in parentheses appear to be due to the compiler of JE. The parts not included in the Table belong to P, with the exception of ch. xiv., which seems to have been taken from an independent source.

² Chs. xx.-xxii. form a long section, with the exception of very few verses, entirely from E. The predominance of God will be noticed; the neighbouring J-sections have regularly Jehovah.

⁵ In xxvi. 1 the words "beside . . . to Abraham" have probably been added by the compiler. Vv. 3b-5 (on grounds of style: see Delltzech) appear to have been expanded or re-cast by the compiler. The same may have been the case with xxii. 15-18 (cp. Dillm.).

² In ch. xxviii. the main narrative is E; vv. 13-16 being, as it seems (cp. the similar promise in xii. 14-16; xii. 3), introduced from the parallel narrative of J. V. 17 connects with v. 12. It is probable that in the original context יָבֹקֵץ in v. 13 meant by him (i.e. by Jacob): cp. R. V. marg., and (for the Hebrew) xviii. 2.

⁴ In the narrative of the separation of Jacob and Laban (xxx. 25 sq.), it is to be observed that the two sources give a different account of the understanding with Laban, and of the manner in which Jacob evaded it (so Del.). At the same time, as it seems, each account contains notices incorporated by the compiler from the parallel narrative (see Dillm. or Del.; also Bacon, Hebraica, vii. 226 sqq.).

⁵ In xxxi. 45 sq. there seem to be two accounts of the covenant between Jacob and Laban (notice that the terms of the covenant in v. 50 differ from those in v. 52), which have been combined by the compiler of JE, with slight additions or glosses.

⁴ In the main, probably; but the two narratives cannot here be disengaged with certainty.

The grounds of the analysis of the history of Joseph must be sought in the Commentaries, or (more briefly) in the writer's Introduction, p. 16 sq. Stated generally, they consist partly in the fact that the representation in different parts of the narrative varies, partly in the occurrence of short, isolated notices, not harmonising properly with the context in which they are now found, but presupposing different circumstances, and hence derived presumably from a different source (cp. Delitzsch, p. 437).

In ch. xlix. the blessing of Jacob is of course incorporated by J from some earlier, independent source. It may have been in circulation either as a separate piece, or as part of a collection of national poetry.

§ 11. The sections attributed to J are justly admired as exhibiting the perfection of Hebrew historical style. In ease, fluency, and grace, they are unsurpassed: everything is told with precisely the amount of detail that is needed: picturesque and graphic, the narrative never lingers; the reader's interest is at once awakened, and sustained to the end. The contrast with the style of P is complete: compare for example ch. xvii. with chs. xviii.-xix., or ch. xxiii. with ch. xxiv. J's narrative is moreover pervaded by a fine vein of ethical and psychological discrimination; and the traditions which the author recounts become in his hands the vehicle of deep theological truths. His narrative is also instinct with a warm sense of Israel's noble spiritual possessions, and is elevated by a lofty and vivid consciousness of the august future reserved for it (see the series of promises, quoted in § 3: in a, belonging to P, the outlook is limited to Israel itself, its position as a medium of extending salvation to the world being disregarded). The style of E is nearly equal to that of J, but does not perhaps display quite the same power or delicacy of touch. Such material differences as it exhibits, when compared as a whole with J, will be noticed under the article PENTATEUCH.

§ 12. That P and JE form two clearly definable, independent sources is a conclusion that may be accepted without hesitation. As regards the analysis of JE, the criteria are fewer and less definite; and no doubt the same confidence that the points of demarcation have been rightly assigned, cannot in all cases be felt. But the indications that the narrative is not homogeneous seem unmistakable; and the uncertainty which sometimes exists as to the exact limits of the sources employed will be seen to be not greater than is natural, when it is considered that the differences between them are less numerous and prominent than in the case of P, and that the compiler appears to have made it his aim to unite them as effectually as possible into an organic whole. But it is right to distinguish between degrees of probability, and to recollect that that which attaches to the distinction of J and E is seldom so great as that attaching to the distinction of P from JE, and that there are passages of JE in the analysis of which (as critics themselves universally admit)^v certainty is not attainable.

§ 13. As regards the process by which the Book of Genesis reached its present form, the opinions of critics differ. Dillmann supposes that the compiler to whom the Book owes its present form found J, E, and P as three distinct documents, which he combined together, making such omissions and modifications as were necessary. But this would be a complicated work for a single author to accomplish: J and E, moreover, appear to be welded together more intimately than either is with P. Hence the view of Wellhausen and others is more probable, that the combination was effected in two stages: first, J and E were united together; afterwards, the whole thus formed (JE) was combined with P by another hand. The method followed in the combination of J and E has been indicated above (§ 9). The compiler who united JE with P adopted P as his framework, and fitted JE into it, making in either such omissions as were necessary in order to avoid needless repetition, and incorporating ch. xiv. from a special source, but otherwise making little or no change except such redactional adjustments as the unity of his work required. Thus he naturally assigned i. 1-ii. 3 the first place, at the same time (perhaps) removing ii. 4a from its original position as superscription to i. 1, and placing it where it now stands. In appending next from J the narrative of Paradise, he changed (as it seems) Jahveh into Jahveh Elohim, for the purpose of identifying expressly the Author of life in ii. 4b-iii. 24, with God, the Creator, in i. 1-ii. 4a. Still following J, he incorporated from it the history of Cain and his descendants, but rejected the list of Seth's descendants ^v See e.g. Wellh. Comp. pp. 32, 35, 37; Kuenen, Hex. § 8. 5; Kautsch and Socin (ed. 2), pp. xi. (cp. xlii.), 58, 88.

(which J must clearly have contained), except the first two names, and the etymology of Noah, in favour (v. 1-28, 30-32) of the genealogy and chronological details of P. In vi. 1-ix. 17 he combines into one the double narrative of the Flood, preserving, however, more from both the parallel accounts than was usually his practice, and in parts slightly modifying the phraseology. The close of Noah's life (ix. 28 sq.) from P naturally follows the incident ix. 20-27 from JE. Ch. x., the Table of nations, embodies particulars taken from both sources; it is succeeded by the account in JE of the dispersion of mankind (xi. 1-9). The history of Israel's ancestors is now resumed. Ch. xi. 10-26 carries on the line from Shem to Terah, from P: xi. 27-32 states particulars respecting Terah's family, especially Abram, derived partly from P, partly from JE, and necessary as an introduction to the fuller details of Abram's life, which follow in ch. xii., &c. Mutatis mutandis, a similar method was followed by him in the rest of the Book. The narrative of Genesis, though composite, is constructed in accordance with a definite plan, to which the final compiler (who is the true "author" of the book in its existing form) has accommodated all the details which he has introduced.

GENNESAR, WATER OF (τὰ ὕδατα τὰ Γεννησάρη; aqū Genesar), 1 Macc. xi. 67: cp. Ant. xiii. 5, § 7. [GENNESARET, SEA OF.]

GENNESARET, LAND OF (ἡ γῆ Γεννησάρη; terra Genesur, terra Genesareth). After the miracle of feeding the five thousand, our Lord and His disciples crossed over the lake of Gennesaret and "came into the land of Gennesaret," or (R. V.) "came to the land unto Gennesaret" (Matt. xiv. 34; Mark vi. 54). It is generally believed that this term was applied to the fertile crescent-shaped plain on the western shore of the lake, extending from Khân Mînyeh on the north to the steep hill behind Mejdel on the south, and called by the Arabs el-Ghuweir, "the little Ghor." The description given by Josephus (B. J. iii. 10, § 8) would apply admirably to this plain. He says that along the lake of Gennesaret there extends a region of the same name, of marvellous nature and beauty. The soil was so rich that every plant flourished, and the air so temperate that trees of the most opposite natures grew side by side. The hardy walnut, which delighted in cold, grew there luxuriantly: there were the palm-trees that were nourished by heat, and fig-trees and olives beside them, that required a more temperate climate. Grapes and figs were found during ten months of the year. The plain was watered by a most excellent spring, called by the natives Capharnaum, which was thought by some to be a vein of the Nile, because a fish was found there closely resembling the coracinus of the lake near Alexandria. The length of the plain along the shore of the lake was thirty stadia, and its breadth twenty. Making every allowance for the colouring given by the historian to his description, and for the neglected condition of el-Ghuweir at the present day, there are still left sufficient points of resemblance between the two to justify their being identified. The length of the plain from 'Ain et-Tineh to Mejdel is 3 miles, or, if the small adjoining plain of et-Tâbghah be included, 3½ miles; and its greatest breadth is 1½ miles. There are two springs: the 'Ain et-Tineh, near Khân Mînyeh, which is close to the lake, and only a few inches above its level; and the 'Ain el-Mudawwarah, "Round Fountain," which is about half a mile from the lake, and one mile from Mejdel. Three streams issuing from W. 'Amîd, W. er-Rubûdiyeh, and W. el-Ilamâm, cross the plain and help to fertilise it. The 'Ain et-Tineh, from its low level and slight head of water, could never have been utilised for irrigation; and the "Round Fountain," from its position and size, could only have irrigated a very small portion of the plain. Neither of these fountains could therefore have been the Capharnaum of Josephus, which is said to have watered the plain throughout (ὑδροτέρα). This could, however, have been effected by the waters of 'Ain et-Tâbghah, which were carried into the plain, by a remarkable aqueduct, at an altitude sufficient to irrigate it throughout its whole extent. This spring, the largest in Galilee, rises to the surface with great force in the plain of et-Tâbghah, about half a mile from Gennesaret, and, wherever Capernaum may be placed, is almost certainly the fountain called by Josephus Capharnaum. At the northern extremity of the plain, el-Ghuweir, are the mounds of Mînyeh, and at its southern end is Mejdel, Magdala; and on the shore of the lake are several mounds of rubbish, and on the slope of the hills, which rise somewhat abruptly, are shapeless ruins, all perhaps marking the sites of some of those towns and villages in which Christ taught. The soil of the plain, enriched by the scourings of the basaltic hills, is surprisingly fertile; and the shore, fringed by a thick jungle of thorn and oleander in which birds of brilliant plumage find a home, is broken into bays of exquisite beauty. Burckhardt tells us that the pastures of Khân Mînyeh are proverbial for their richness (Syria, p. 319); and the fertility and beauty of the plain have been remarked upon by nearly every traveller (see Stanley, S. & P. ch. x.; Robinson, iii. 282 sq.; Thomson, L. and B. p. 347 sq.; Wilson, Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 350; Guérin, Galilée, i. 207; Sepp, ii. 232).

In the Journal of Classical and Sacred Philology (ii. 290-308) Mr. Thrupp has endeavoured to show that the land of Gennesaret was not el-Ghuweir, but the fertile plain el-Batihah, on the north-eastern side of the lake. The dimensions of this plain and the character of its soil and productions correspond with the description given by Josephus of the land of Gennesaret; but it is very swampy near the lake, and has no spring corresponding to the Capharnaum of Josephus. It is also perfectly clear, from an examination of the narrative in the Gospels, that Capernaum (which was certainly west of Jordan) and Gennesaret were close together on the same side of the lake. [CAPERNAUM; BETHSAIDA.]

Additional interest is given to the land of Gennesaret, or el-Ghuweir, by the probability that its scenery suggested the parable of the Sower. It is admirably described by Dean Stanley: "There was the undulating corn-field descending to the water's edge. There was the trodden pathway running through the midst of it, with no fence or hedge to prevent the seed from falling here and there on either side of it, or upon it; itself hard with the constant tramp of horse and mule and human feet. There was the 'good' rich soil, which distinguishes the whole of that plain and its neighbourhood from the bare hills elsewhere descending into the lake, and which, where there is no interruption, produces one vast mass of corn. There was the rocky ground of the hillside protruding here and there through the corn-fields, as elsewhere through the grassy slopes. There were the large bushes of thorn—the 'Nabk,' that kind of which tradition says that the Crown of Thorns was woven—springing up, like the fruit-trees of the more inland parts, in the very midst of the waving wheat" (S. & P. p. 426).

[W. A. W.] [W.]

GENNESARET, SEA OF (ἡ θάλασσα Γεννησάρη, Luke v. 1), one of the names of the well-known SEA OF GALILEE (Matt. iv. 18; Mark vii. 31; John vi. 1) or SEA OF TIBERIAS (John vi. 1), a sweet-water lake through which the river Jordan flows. The name has been thought to be connected with the older title, SEA OF CHINNERETH or of CHINNEROTH (Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xii. 3), and with the town of that name (Josh. xix. 35), but this is uncertain, nor is it known certainly that Chinneroth is a Semitic word. The "plains south of Chinneroth" (Josh. xii. 3) are probably those surrounding the Jordan south of the lake. According to Gesenius (Lex.), the Hebrew form of the name Gennesaret would be גִּנְנֶסְרֵת. In Talmudic notices (cp. Neubauer, Géog. Tal. p. 215), the name is spelt גִּנְיֶסְרֵת or גִּנְיֶסְרֵת and identified with Kinnereth (Tal. Jer. Megillah, i. 1). The Midrash (Beresith Rabba, ch. 98) translates Gennesaret "Prince's Garden," which would be the natural rendering in both Hebrew and Assyrian. The fruits of this region were much prized in the times when the writers in question were living near the lake (2nd to 5th cent. A.D.) The Rabbis applied the Bible words "blessing of God" to this region (Siphre, end). The region, though not often mentioned in the Bible, was famous for its fertility, and well known not only to Josephus (see especially Wars, iii. 10, § 8), but also to classic writers (Strabo, xvi.; Pliny, v. 16; Ptol. v. 15), and in every succeeding age it has been a place of pilgrimage, and its natural productions have been described by Moslem as well as by Christian authors.

Sea of Gennesaret or Galilee.

Josephus describes the shores of the lake, within a century of the time when it was the scene of many incidents in the life of Christ, and before the time when Tiberias on its shores became the seat of the Sanhedrin, and the centre of Jewish life, after the destruction of Jerusalem. He gives the dimensions of the lake as 140 furlongs by 40, and speaks of the sweet water and numerous fish. The land of Gennesaret near the lake was fertile, and many trees—such as the walnut, palm, fig, and olive—grew near the shores. Vines also were cultivated, the air was of good temperature, and the plain was watered by the spring of Capernaum. Titus, at the time of which Josephus is speaking, had constructed a fleet on the lake, for the attack of Tarichaeae at the south end of the same; and although at the present time there are only one or two boats on the lake, there were ships on its waters in the 10th and 12th centuries A.D.

The lake lay between the territory of Manasseh in Bashan and of Naphtali west of Jordan, as has been shown by the recent discovery of certain towns of Naphtali on the plateau west of Tiberias. The Talmudic commentators say the same (Tal. Bab. Baba Kama, 81 b, quoted by Reland, Pal. i. p. 259), and in the same treatise (80 b) fishing in the waters of the Tiberias (ימה של טבריה) is noticed. Pliny (v. 16) gives a short but clear account (quoted by Reland, Pal. i. p. 440) under the name Lake of Genesera. He makes it 16 miles long and 6 miles wide. On the east he says were Julias and Hippos; on the south Tarichaeae, whence the lake itself was sometimes named; on the west Tiberias, with salubrious hot springs. In Ptolemy's geography it is also called Τιβέριος Ἰλμυρ.

The lake is a natural basin, pear-shaped and surrounded with limestone cliffs, except on the north and north-west, where steep slopes lead down from the mountains of Naphtali, and from the plains of Lower Galilee, respectively. A narrow strip of flat ground occurs on either side, and on the north-west enlarges into the small plain of Gennesaret, now only tilled in a few patches and covered with brushwood, measuring 3 miles by 1½ mile, and watered by the springs in the western hills and by the "Round Fountain" (Ain el Madouarah) in the plain itself. The soil is a rich basaltic loam. [GENNESARET, LAND OF.] The north shore of the lake is rocky, and indented with small coves. The plain of the Batihah, east of the Jordan, at the north-east corner of the lake, is larger than that of Gennesaret, measuring about 3 miles along the shore, with an extreme width of 1½ mile. It is very swampy, with a rich basaltic soil, and watered by several streams, that of Wady Hejaj being larger than either of the Gennesaret streams (Sir C. W. Wilson, Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 368). The name of the ruin of Mes'adiyeh in this plain may be thought to preserve that of Bethsaida Julias, though not at the ancient site [see BETHSAIDA]. A considerable cultivation is described in this plain by Robinson (Bib. Res. ii. 411), similar to that of the Gennesaret vale, and the nomad Arab tribes here possess large herds of buffaloes. The Jordan enters the lake on the north, and has there formed a small delta. The greatest depth of water in the concave basin, according to the measurements of Lieut. Lynch, is 165 feet (Report, p. 15; cp. Rob. Bib. Res. ii. 417). The average height of the plateau east of the lake is about 1200 feet above the Mediterranean, and that on the west about 1000 feet. The level of the lake itself is 680 feet below that of the Mediterranean, as determined by a line of levels run by the surveyors of Palestine. The cliffs are precipitous and rugged, but the scenery of the lake is somewhat featureless, and not so wild as that of the Dead Sea. Its more picturesque effects are due to the colours of the sunset or of the storm. The general colouring in summer is white or dusky brown, but in spring the vegetation covers the slopes with green. On the north the ground is strewn with basaltic debris. The actual length is $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles north and south by 8 miles at its widest part east and west. The cultivation on the shores has much decreased.* In the plain of Gennesaret corn and indigo are grown; there are a few palms at Kefr Arjib, east of the lake, near Magdala and Tiberias, and a grove at the south end of the lake. Robinson (Bib. Res. ii. 388) mentions maize, wheat, barley, millet, tobacco, melons, grapes, gourds, cucumbers, and a few vegetables, the melons being especially fine; rice was also grown (p. 402). The greater extent of shore is now however wild, the ground covered in spring with gigantic thistles and, near the springs, with oleanders. The papyrus is also found in the swampy ground, where some of the springs run into the lake. The waters are still full of fish of various kinds, resembling bream and perch, and the famous coracinus or sheat fish, to which Josephus refers. These fish, caught in nets or by poisoning bread crumbs with bichloride of mercury, are fully described by Dr. Tristram (PEF. Mem. and Nat. Hist. of the Bible, p. 285); they resemble the Nile fishes, and are found also in the Jordan. The shoals are very numerous, and fourteen species have been identified, two of which are very common, viz. Chromis Nilotica and Clarias macrocanthus:

Sea of Gennesaret or Galilee, with the village of Magdala.

three other species of the African genus Hemichromis seem to be peculiar to the lake. The coracinus or sheat fish is the second of those named, and is said to occur in the Round Fountain as well as in the lake. Mediæval

* Sugar-canes are mentioned by El Mukaddasi (10th cent. A.D.) at Tiberias, with palm-trees and the nabk fruit, as well as manufactures of carpets, paper, and cloth. There were then boats on the lake. The climate was considered unhealthy; the hot baths were, however, much reputed for the cure of skin diseases. In the 12th century there were mills near Magdala, and the owners had fishing rights in the lake (Cod. Dipl. 1, No. 156). Tiberias was then a walled town and capital of the district.

legends as to these fishes occur in several tractates, but are more curious than valuable.

The chief inhabited site is the town of Tiberias, founded (or rebuilt) by Herod Antipas. South of this are the famous hot springs, which probably mark the site of HAMMON (1 Ch. vi. 76), or HAMMATH (Josh. xix. 35); the distance from Tiberias is only $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles. The springs have an average temperature of 137° Fahr., and are said to have greatly increased in temperature and in volume at the time of the great earthquake of Safed in 1837.

At the south end of the lake towards the west and close to the Jordan outlet was Tarichææ, the ruins of which still exist, almost surrounded with water, at Kerak.

On the slopes further west was Sinnabris (Senn-en-nabrah), mentioned by Josephus in connexion with the Jordan (Wars, iii. 9, § 7; iv. 8, § 2). On the east shore Gamala (el Hosn) stood on the cliffs, and Hippos (Súsieh) has recently been fixed at a ruin 2 miles east of the lake shore, and a mile west of Fik (Aphék). Further north a small ruined mound, called Kersu, on the narrow plain at the foot of the slopes, is supposed to mark the city of the GERBESENES (Matt. viii. 28; cp. Mark v. 1). Chorazin, on the slopes north of the Sea of Galilee, is a well-known site, but opinion differs as to CAPERNAUM. Some writers, following Robinson, place it close to the "Figtree Spring" at the ruin of Mínyeh, near the little cliff, pierced by an ancient cutting at the north end of the plain of Gennesaret, near the shore. This opinion seems to gather support from mediæval Jewish tradition. Other authors accept the Christian tradition, which since the 4th century has always placed Capernaum at Tell Hüm. Between these two sites, which are 2½ miles apart, are the five fine springs called Et Tábyhah, with ruined mills, and a reservoir whence they were fed. This appears to be the Migdol Tseboia of the Talmud, "the dyer's tower" (Tal. Jer. Taanith, iv. 8: cp. Neubauer, Géog. Tal. p. 217). It is possible that the curious water towers at this site, and at Magdala, may have had some connexion with the art of dyeing, which was a common Jewish occupation in later times.

The sites so noticed are ruinous, but in the plain of Gennesaret there is a small hamlet containing three or four families of Algerines, who till the plain. It is called Abu Shúshch, from its sacred shrine. It does not appear to be an ancient site. At the south end of the plain is Mejidel (Magdala), a mud village of about 80 inhabitants, with palms and ruined mills, and cultivation to the north.

The population of Tiberias is reckoned only at 2,000 to 3,000 souls, including the Jews (about 200), the Christians, and the Moslems. Thus the decay of cultivation in this region is no doubt mainly due to decay in population. The existence of ruins of no less than nine small towns, on or near the shore, is evidence of the former prosperity of the region. The climate is now extremely hot in summer and mild in winter, owing to the depression and to the surrounding rocks; but if we may judge from the frequent notice of fevers and other diseases among the population of this region, which recur in the Gospel narratives, the climate cannot have been very different in the time of Christ from that of our times, although irrigation and cultivation may have decreased the power of the malarin, now prevalent in the swampy ground near the springs.

The vicinity of the lake is subject to sudden storms, such as are mentioned in the Gospels (Matt. viii. 24, xiv. 24; Mark iv. 37, vi. 48; Luke viii. 23; John vi. 18), blowing down from the western gorges. These occur in spring and early summer, as well as in autumn and winter, and are sometimes induced by the great heat in the lake basin. Such a storm has been described by Sir Charles Wilson (Recor. of Jerus. p. 340), in a series of papers which give the fullest extant account of the whole lake. The region surrounding the lake is also subject to earthquakes, and the hot springs of Tiberias and Gadara, together with the basalt fields north and west of the valley, are evidence of volcanic forces which are still working beneath the surface, and which in pre-historic times were very powerful. Monumental notices of the Sea of Galilee are confined to the slight reference in the Travels of a Mohar (or Egyptian official), who in the 14th century B.C. appears to have reached its shores from the west, and to have travelled down to the Jordan valley past Tarichæae. The region lay apart from the main highways of war and commerce, and its most prosperous period was perhaps in the 2nd century A.D., when the Jews gathered round the famous school of the Mishnaic Rabbis, and when synagogues and other buildings were erected in the towns on the shore. The earliest inscriptions in Greek and in Hebrew, found in the vicinity, belong to this peaceful period, and the opinion of architectural authorities attributes the well-known synagogues of Tell Hüm, Chorazin, and others to this age. The earliest remains are, however, the scattered dolmens on the hills to the north, and the old stone circle (Ahjar en-Nasára) on the plateau to the west—relics probably of Canaanite idolatry. The traditional scenes of various events in the life of Christ shown near the lake, have not been continuously fixed at any site, and vary in different ages. They cannot, therefore, be considered to possess authority.^b [C. R. C.]

GENNE'US (T. Γενναῖος, A. Γεννέος; Gen-naeus), father of Apollonius, who was one of several generals (στρατηγῶν) commanding towns in Palestine, who molested the Jews while Lysias was governor for Antiochus Eupator (2 Macc. xii. 2). Luther understands the word as an adjective (γενναῖος = well-born), and has "des edlen Apollonius."

GENTILES. I. Old Testament.—The Hebrew גוֹי in sing. = a people, nation, body politic; in which sense it is applied to the Jewish nation amongst others. In the pl. it acquires an ethnographic and also an invidious meaning, and is rendered in A. V. by Gentiles and Heathen.

גוֹיִם, the nations, the surrounding nations, foreigners as opposed to Israel (Neh. v. 8). In Gen. x. 5 it occurs in its most indefinite sense = the far-distant inhabitants of the Western Isles (see Dillmann⁵ and Delitzsch [1887]), without the slightest accessory notion of heathenism or barbarism. In Lev., Deut., Ps. the term is applied to the various heathen nations with which Israel came into contact; its meaning grows wider in proportion to the wider circle of the national experience, and more or less invidious according to the success or defeat of the national arms. In the Prophets it attains at once its most comprehensive and its most hostile view: hostile in presence of victorious rivals, comprehensive with reference to the triumphs of a spiritual future (cp. Schultz,⁴

^b A legend current among Jews and Moslems predicts that Messiah will rise from the Sea of Gennesaret. It bears a curious resemblance to the old Persian legend of a future prophet who is to be born in a legendary lake in the East.

Altest. Theologic, p. 745 sq., and [with caution] Cheyne, The Origin of the Psalter, p. 291 sq. and notes).

Notwithstanding the disagreeable connotation of the term, the Jews were able to use it, even in the plural, in a purely technical, geographical sense. So Gen. x. 5 (see above); Is. ix. 1. In Gen. xiv. 1, Josh. xii. 23, גִּזְרֵי is by R. V. and most moderns taken as the name of a land, "Goiim" (cp. Delitzsch and Dillmann³ on Gen. l. c., though Dillmann² prefers "nations," in Josh. l. c.).

For "Galilee of the Gentiles," cp. Matt. iv. 15 with Is. ix. 1, where the A. V. and R. V. (text) read "Galilee of the nations." In Heb. גִּזְרֵי הַגּוֹיִם means the "circle of the Gentiles;" קַר הַגּוֹיִם, גִּזְרֵי הַגּוֹיִם, hag-Galil; whence the name Galilee was applied to a district which was largely peopled by the Gentiles, especially the Phoenicians.

II. New Testament.—1. The Greek ἔθνος in sing. means a people or nation (Matt. xxiv. 7; Acts ii. 5, &c.), and even the Jewish people (Luke vii. 5, xxiii. 2, &c.; cp. ἡβ, supr.). It is only in the pl. that it is used for the Heb. גִּזְרֵי, heathen, Gentiles (cp. ἔθνος, heathen, ethnic): in Matt. xxi. 43 ἔθνη, "nation," alludes to, but does not directly stand for, "the Gentiles." As equivalent to Gentiles it is found in the Epistles of St. Paul, but not always in an invidious sense (e.g. Rom. xi. 13; Eph. iii. 1, 6).

2. Ἕλληνας, John vii. 35, ἡ διασπορά τῶν Ἑλλήνων, "the Jews dispersed among the Gentiles" (R. V. "the Dispersion among [margin of] the Greeks"); Rom. iii. 9, Ἰουδαίους καὶ Ἕλληνας, "Jews and Gentiles" (R. V. "Greeks").

The A. V. is not consistent in its treatment of this word; sometimes rendering it by Greek (Acts xiv. 1, xvii. 4; Rom. i. 16, x. 12), sometimes by Gentile (Rom. ii. 9, 10, iii. 9; 1 Cor. x. 32), inserting Greek in the margin. The R. V. translates it always "Greek" (see Thoms, Concordance to the R. V. of the N. T., s. n.). The places where Ἕλληνας is equivalent to Greek simply (as Acts xvi. 1, 3) are much fewer than those where it is equivalent to Gentile. The former may probably be reduced to Acts xvi. 1, 3, xviii. 17; Rom. i. 14. The latter use of the word seems to have arisen from the almost universal adoption of the Greek language. Even in 2 Macc. iv. 13, Ἑλληνισμὸς appears as synonymous with ἀλλοφυλισμὸς (cp. vi. 9); and in Is. ix. 12 the LXX. renders גִּזְרֵי הַגּוֹיִם by Ἕλληνας; and so the Greek Fathers defended the Christian faith πρὸς Ἕλληνας, and καθ' Ἕλληνας. [GREEK; HEATHEN.] [T. E. B.]

GENU'BATH (גִּנְבָּת; Γενυβάθ; Genubath), the son of Hadad, an Edomite of the royal family, by an Egyptian princess, the sister of Tahpenes, the queen of the Pharaoh who governed Egypt in the latter part of the reign of David (1 K. xi. 20; cp. v. 16). Genubath was born in the palace of Pharaoh, and weaned by the queen herself; after which he became a member of the royal establishment, on the same footing as one of the sons of Pharaoh. The fragment of Edomite chronicle in which this is contained is very remarkable, and may be compared with that in

Gen. xxxvi. Genubath is not again mentioned or alluded to. The meaning of the name has been variously traced to an Egyptian source, and is given as "curly" or "the Southern" or "the Pūnite" (PBSA. x. 372). [F.]

GE'ON (Γηών; Gehon), i.e. GIHON, one of the four rivers of Eden; introduced, with the Jordan, and probably the Nile, into a figure in the praise of wisdom (Ecclus. xxiv. 27). This is merely the Greek form of the Hebrew name, the same which is used by the LXX. in Gen. ii. 13.

GERA (גֵּרָא; ? = little weight; Γηρά), one of the "sons," i.e. descendants, of Benjamin, enumerated in Gen. xlvi. 21, as already living at the time of Jacob's migration into Egypt. He was son of Bela (1 Ch. viii. 3). [BELA.] The text of this last passage is very corrupt; and the different Geras there named seem to reduce themselves into one,—the same as the son of Bela. Gera, who is named in Judg. iii. 15 as the ancestor of Ehud, and in 2 Sam. xvi. 5 as the ancestor of Shimei who cursed David [BECHER], is probably also the same person. Gera is not mentioned in the list of Benjaminite families in Num. xxvi. 38-40: of which a very obvious explanation is that at that time he was not the head of a separate family, but was included among the Belaites; it being a matter of necessity that some of Bela's sons should be so included, otherwise there could be no family of Belaites at all. Dr. Kalisch has some long and rather perplexed observations on the discrepancies in the lists in Gen. xlvi. and Num. xxvi., and specially as regards the sons of Benjamin. But the truth is that the two lists agree very well so far as Benjamin is concerned. For the only discrepancy that remains, when the absence of Becher and Gera for the list in Num. is thus explained, is that for the two names אֶחִי and רֹשׁ (Ehi and Rosh) in Gen., we have the one name אֶחִירָם (Ahiram) in Num. If this last were written אֶחִירָם, as it might be, the two texts would be almost identical, especially if written in the Samaritan character, in which the shin closely resembles the mem. That Ahiram is right we are quite sure, from the family of the Ahi-ramites, and from the non-mention elsewhere of Rosh, which in fact is not a proper name. [ROSH.] The conclusion therefore seems certain that אֶחִירָם אֶחִירָם in Gen. is a mere clerical error [Delitzsch (1887) and Dillmann³ leave the matter untouched], and that there is perfect agreement between the two lists. This view is strengthened by the further fact that in the word which follows Rosh, viz. Mupim, the initial m is an error for sh. It should be Shupim, as in Num. xxvi. 39; 1 Ch. vii. 12. The final m of Ahiram, and the initial sh of Shupim, have thus been transposed. To the remarks made under BECHER, it should be added that the great destruction of the Benjamites recorded in Judg. xx. may account for the introduction of so many new names in the later Benjaminite lists of 1 Ch. vii. and viii., of which several seem to be women's names. GERAH. [MEASURES.]

GERA'R (גֵּרָר; Γεραρά. The name is rendered "sojourning" by Simonis, and "water-

pots" by Gesenius, Lex.; the modern Arabic name of the site is خربة أم جَرار, apparently "ruin of the pottery maker" [Khurbet Umm Jerrâr], from جَرَّة, pl. جَرَار, "a water-pot."

There is much pottery at the site. It is, however, doubtful if this is the original meaning of the Hebrew name. Gerar is first mentioned (Gen. x. 19) with Gaza as being on the S.W. border of Palestine; then as a place where Abraham "sojourned" (גָּר), apparently after he had "dwelt" (שָׁבַח) in the Negeb or "dry" country, between Kadesh and Shur (Gen. xx. 1). At this time it was the abode of Abimelech, the Philistine king (Gen. xxvi. 1), and Isaac dwelt in Gerar (v. 6) and sowed corn, and dug again wells in the valley (נַחַל, "a torrent bed") of Gerar, which had been previously dug (חָפַר) by Abraham (v. 18), to which he gave the names ESEK and SITNAH, "contention" and "enmity." His further retreat from the pastoral lands of the Philistines was to Rehoboth and Beersheba. In a later age we read that Asa, after defeating the Ethiopians (Cushites) at Mareshah (in Wady Sâfeh or Zephathah, close to Beit Jibrin), pursued them to Gerar (2 Ch. xiv. 13, 14). Yet later we find the Gerrerhians, or people of Gerar, mentioned as defining the limit of the power of Judas Maccabaeus on the south (2 Macc. xiii. 24). In most of the Biblical passages the Samaritan Version reads "Ascalon" for Gerar, and the Arabic الخلوصة

(Khalûsâ; or Elusa: cp. Reland, Pal. ii. p. 805), showing that the ancient site of Gerar was unknown to these copyists. The Targum of Jonathan also substitutes Arad. Nevertheless the name was known to Josephus (Ant. i. 12, § 1; viii. 12, § 1), and the Onomasticon in the 4th cent. A.D. refers to Gerara as being 25 miles south of Eleutheropolis, in the region called Geraritica, beyond Daroma. Geraritica seems to be noticed in the Talmud (גְּרָרִיקוֹן, Tal. Jer. Shebith, vi. 1; Midrash Bereshith Rabba, ch. 46; Targ. Jon. on Gen. xx. 1; Neubauer, Geog. Tul. p. 65) as an unhealthy region near the "river of Egypt." It was inhabited by Gentiles, excepting the Jews at Gaza. Sozomen (Hist. lib. vi. 32, quoted by Reland, Pal. ii. p. 805) says that there was a large monastery and a very great torrent at Gerar. With exception of the distance given by Eusebius, these indications are not very exact, but they all agree in pointing to the region S.E. of Gaza, on the way to the Negeb or "dry" land south of Beersheba, and on the border of the Egyptian desert, in the S.E. corner of the Philistine country. This is exactly where the ruined site (Khurbet Umm Jerrâr) has been found, on the right bank of the great torrent-bed of Wady Ghuzzeb, which flows N.W. to fall into the sea about 4 miles south of Gaza. The distance from this site of Gerar to Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin) is actually 30 English miles; but this may be considered as approximately representing the estimated distance in the Onomasticon. There are no stone wells such as occur at Beersheba, but water is easily obtained by digging Hufeiyir, "pits," in the torrent-bed. These are easily filled in and require to be redug, thus not only illustrating the redigging of Abraham's wells by Isaac, but preserving the same word, used in the Hebrew narrative, for "digging" the shallow water-pits for the flocks, necessitated by the fact that the water flows beneath the surface of the shingly bed of the torrent. The ruins consist of a large mound, the site of a good-sized town: about a dozen cisterns or granaries of rubble, with domed roofs, exist among the débris; a few fragments of glass and tesserae were observed, and on the sides of the torrent-bed a thickness of six or ten feet of broken pottery, half buried. The pottery is hard and red, and probably not very ancient. The country round is a pastoral plain, with water only in the great courses which run down from Beersheba, by Gerar, to the sea. The region generally is much like that round Beersheba, and well fitted for the pastoral nomadic life of the Hebrew patriarchs; yet not incapable of producing a crop of corn such as Isaac reaped. The life of the neighbouring Arabs—mainly pastoral, yet not without some attempt at agriculture—represents that of the Patriarchs (see Mem. Survey West Pal. iii. 389). [C. R. C.]

GER'ASA (Γέρασα; Arab. Jerâsh, جرّاش).

This famous town is not mentioned in the Bible, but in Mark v. 1 the R. V. reads "Gerasenes" for the "Gadarenes" of the A. V., referring to the inhabitants of the district of which Gerasa was the capital. This change is made on the authority of the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS. and Codex Bezae. In Matt. viii. 28 the Sinaitic MS. reads "Gazarenes" for "Gadarenes." There was evidently a confusion made by copyists between Gadara and Gerasa, and Origen points out (see Reland, Pal. ii. p. 806) that the latter is too far from the Sea of Galilee to be the site intended in the Gospel, although the reading in the majority of the MSS. known to him appears to have been Gerasenes in Matt. viii. 28. The meaning of the name is probably "plain" or "pasture" (see Gesen. Lex.), and there are several sites in Palestine east and west of Jordan where it recurs as Jerâsh in the modern nomenclature of ruined sites.

The earliest historic notice of Gerasa is found in Josephus in the time of Alexander Jannaeus, about 85 B.C. (Wars, i. 4, § 8). Marching from Pella near the Jordan valley, the Hasmonean king penetrated S.E. to this remote town, already a strong place, and built a triple siege-work round it, taking it finally by assault. In the time of Josephus the town marked the limits of Peraea, or the country beyond Jordan on the side of the desert (Wars, iii. 3, § 3). In the Talmudic writings Gerash (גְּרָשׁ) is made equivalent to Gilead (Midrash on Samuel, ch. xiii.; Neubauer, Geog. Tul. p. 250). The city was well known in the 4th cent., and Jerome (O.S. p. 158, 29, s. v. Gergasi) calls it urbs insignis Arabiae. It had risen from its ashes in the 2nd century A.D.—the time of its greatest prosperity—after having been set on fire by Lucius Annus during the war of Vespasian against the Jews (Wars, iv. 9, § 1). The Jews themselves (Wars, ii. 18, § 1) had wasted this region just before the war in revenge for the massacres at Caesarea, and the population is called "Syrian" by Josephus, being no doubt Aramean.* Pliny appears to refer to Gerasa in the form Galasa, as now read (r. 18), in enumerating towns of the region of Gilead and Bashan; and Epiphanius (Adr. Haeres. book ii.) speaks of the spring in the city of Gerasa of Arabia. Stephanus (Ethnic.) says that it belonged to the region of the fourteen cities (perhaps meaning Decapolis) in Syria, and was the home of Ariston Rhetor. Iamblichus, who mentions it with Bostra, says it was colonised by the veterans of Alexander the Great. Jerome (ad Obad. 1) says that the region of Gerasa was the ancient Gilead (cp. Reland, Pal. ii. 806). Coins of Gerasa are said by Reland to exist, bearing the legend ΑΡΤΕΜΙΣ ΤΥΧΗ ΓΕΡΑΣΩΝ, showing the worship of Artemis in the temple here erected in the 2nd century A.D. The town however became Christian, and its bishops attended the Great Councils of the Church. In the 10th century El Mukaddasi speaks of the region Jebel Jarāsh as being full of villages in trade relation with Tiberias. Baldwin II. early in the 12th century (1121 A.D.) besieged Jarras, and the chronicler speaks of its strong site and the mighty masonry of its walls. William of Tyre, describing this siege, makes the distance a few miles (leagues) from the Jordan (Hist. xii. ch. 16); the town was then fortified by a garrison sent by the Sultan of Damascus; but as the latest buildings in Gerasa belong to the Byzantine period, it would appear never to have been inhabited by any settled Moslem population. In the 13th century Yākūt, who had not seen it, describes the site as once a mighty city, but "now a total ruin." A river however turned several mills, and the mountains round contained many villages. Jerash, he says, had been conquered in the time of Omar (Le Strange, Pal. under Moslems, p. 462). The importance of Gerasa is, however, attested by its ruins rather than by any historic notices of the site. In respect of these Roman remains it is perhaps the most interesting example in Syria of the great works of the Antonines (140-180 A.D.), presenting even more variety than Palmyra, and being also more purely Roman. Surpassing Philadelphia and Gadara, and laying before our eyes the complete plan of a Roman colonial city, with no later additions save a church close to the great Temple, it stands as it was left by the shock of earthquake or after the fierce assault of the followers of Omar.

The site is on the uplands of Gilead, 18 miles east of the Jordan and 5 miles north of the Jabbok, at an elevation of about 1700 feet above the Mediterranean, near the border of the Syrian desert. The town lies across a flat valley with low hills of grey limestone, the summits of which are occupied by the walls on the east and west. A perennial brook in a sunken bed divides the town into two unequal portions, the largest to the west, and flows south in a bright stream, with a cascade close to the south wall. The course is surrounded with oleanders, but the hills are bare, with a little scrub of oak and mastic in places. Corn is also grown on the slopes by the villagers of Sāf, the nearest inhabited place. Approaching from the south, scattered sarcophagi, a triumphal arch, and a great basin 230 yards by 100 yards, surrounded with tiers of stone seats, are first seen. This latter structure is the naumachia or circus for naval contests, once filled from the stream. The city gate is a quarter of a mile to the north. The area of the walls, which are traceable on all sides with six gates, has been over-estimated: according to Kiepert's plan, it is not quite 3,000 yards, enclosing a polygon. Within the walls the main street of columns runs parallel to the stream on the west; the circular forum or peribolos being on the south, close to a theatre and a temple. The great temple occupies the western slope near the centre of the western quarter. A second theatre exists further north; and a third temple, east of the stream, in the N.E. corner of the town. A basilica or judgment hall faces the great temple, east of the main street; and north of this, close to the stream, are the baths. Two main streets run across the stream, that from the basilica having a bridge with ruts carefully cut for chariot wheels. Another large public building stands in the east quarter, near the stream, between the two streets. The size of the buildings may be judged from that of the pillars of the southern temple, which are 38 feet in height and 4½ in diameter. In the basilica is a fine red granite pillar shaft, which must have been brought from Egypt or from Sinai. The site was carefully explored by Burckhardt, who copied most of the inscriptions. Of these ten are known, one having the name of Antonius. As usual in Syria, the Romans have used the Greek language and character. Two texts near the ruined foundations of the church (immediately south of the great temple) are of special interest, as they refer to the establishment of Christianity and the discontinuance of the pagan worship. The shorter is a memorial of a certain 'Αεθλοφόρος or "victor"—a term which is sometimes applied to Christian champions or martyrs—named Theodorus. "His body," says the poet, "is in the earth, but his soul in the wide heaven." This text is in hexameters and marked with the Cross: the date is probably about the 5th century A.D. The second and longer text, in 13 hexameter lines, was carved by a priest named Aeneas (see translation in Conder's Palestine, 1889, p. 181), and relates that the clouds of darkness having been dispelled by the grace of God, the sign of the Cross has been substituted for the evil odour of the sacrifices formerly offered here. The region round Jerash was one of the earliest to accept Christianity, but the text above mentioned is the most important yet discovered in connexion with the abolition of pagan rites in Syria. Gerasa was no doubt an important trading centre, communicating with the Haurān, and with the southern cities of Gilead as well as with the west. It shared the fate of all the cities east of Jordan, and ceased to be inhabited when the Arabs overthrew the Byzantine power. The best accounts are in Burckhardt's and

* Since, in the passage referring to the attack by Amnius, Jericho is said to have been held by the Romans, it does not seem necessary to adopt Reland's reading, Γαζα (Gezer) for Gerasa; but the criticism is worthy of notice.

Buckingham's Travels. It was visited by the present writer in 1882, but would repay a more complete exploration than has yet been attempted. [C. R. C.]

GERGESE'NES, Matt. viii. 28. [GADARA.]

GERGESI'TES, THE (of Γεργεσαίος; Vulg. omits), Judith v. 16. [GIRGASHITES.]

GERIZIM (גֵּרִיזִים; Γαριζίν). The name is doubtfully translated by Gesenius "Mount of the Gerizites," but cannot well be connected with the tribe of Girzites (otherwise Gezrites or people of Gezer) in Philistia (1 Sam. xxvii. 8). The root גֵּרַץ in Hebrew and Arabic means "to cut off" or "separate;" and since no definite article is used, the term may refer rather to the features of the mountain than to any ethnical name: compare the Arabic جَزْر, "barren land" or "unwatered." The ruggedness of Gerizim suggests that the true meaning is Ebal and Gerizim.

"mountain of the barren places." The position of Ebal and Gerizim is defined, with unusual detail, in the first passage in which the name occurs (Deut. xi. 30; R. V.): "Are they not beyond Jordan, behind (or in the western parts of) the way of the going down of the sun, in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the Arabah ('plain' or 'desert') over against the Gilgal, near the plains (or terebinths) of Moreh?" Yet this account has been understood by Eusebius and Jerome to refer to a site near Jericho. It is notable, however, that the extreme horizon ("behind the sunset") is clearly intended as viewed from the region east of Jordan, whence the two mountains are almost hidden by the chain to their immediate east. This would not agree with any site in or near the Jordan valley. The blessing was to be set (or "given forth") on Gerizim, though the altar, according to the Hebrew Version, was to be built on (or at) Ebal (Deut. xxvii. 4, 12). The tribes were to stand half on one mountain and half on the other. According to the Samaritans, who charge the Jews with altering the text, the altar was to be erected on (or "at") Gerizim, the "mount of the blessing." It is not however to be supposed that the summits of the mountains are intended, for in the passage which records the ceremony (Josh. viii. 33) the tribes are said to have stood "in front" (לפני) of either mountain, probably on the lower slopes, which are separated by a distance of only half a mile. Much that has been written as to the difficulty of hearing the words spoken by the priests standing between the two divisions of the people, is quite unnecessary, in view of the precise meaning of the Hebrew words. The natural amphitheatre of hill-slopes is well fitted for the retention of the voice, but no unusual clearness of the air marks the spot, nor is any such required by the Bible account. The space is sufficient for a large national assembly, and the phonetic difficulty is only that which is found in every open-air assembly.

The clearest notice of the position of Gerizim is found in a later passage (Judg. ix. 7), when Jotham addressed the men of Shechem from the top of the mountain. In the New Testament also (John iv. 20, 21), the Samaritan woman, speaking at Jacob's well, clearly refers to Gerizim as the mountain close by, where the Samaritans worshipped. It is therefore to be regarded as certain that the mountain south of the vale of Shechem is that called Gerizim in the Bible.

The question whether Gerizim is the mountain intended in Genesis (xxii. 2) as the scene of Abraham's sacrifice of his son is quite distinct. It is described as in the "land of Moriah" (מוריה), which has been connected with the Moreh near Shechem (Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xi. 30), which was either a "plain" (A. V.) or a group of "oaks" or terebinths (R. V.); but it should be noticed that Moriah was the name of the Temple hill (מוריה), according to the author of the Second Book of Chronicles (iii. 1), and Josephus believed that the Temple mountain was the scene of this sacrifice (Ant. i. 13, § 2). The Samaritan tradition identifies it with Gerizim, and Dean Stanley (S. & P. p. 235) has argued in favour of this view. The distance from Beersheba does not absolutely forbid such an identification, since Gerizim can be seen at some considerable distance (Gen. xxii. 4); but there appears to be no very conclusive reason for preferring the Samaritan to the Jewish tradition on this point.

The summit of Gerizim was probably a sacred place at a very early period, like the summits of many other mountains in Palestine—such as Carmel, Olivet, &c.; but we have no account of any temple or altar on the mountain in the Bible. Josephus states that Sanballat, the Horonite, allied by marriage to the high-priest Jaddua, built for his son-in-law, Manasseh, a temple on Gerizim (Ant. xi. 8, § 4); but the difficulty arises that Josephus dates this event in the time of Alexander the Great, whereas the Sanballat of the O. T. lived in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. xiii. 28), nearly a century earlier; and however old Sanballat may have been, the two accounts can hardly be reconciled. The whole of Josephus' account of the Samaritan history is marked by strong prejudice; but he clearly identifies Gerizim as the mountain near Shechem (Ant. xi. 8, § 6). In a later passage (Ant. xiii. 3, § 4) the dispute before Ptolemy Philometor, between Jews and Samaritans, as to the comparative antiquity of their temples, is narrated. The peculiar views of Eusebius and Jerome as to the position of Gerizim and Ebal were also probably due to Jewish influence. In the Onomasticon (OS. p. 253, 79; 158, 4) they identify these mountains with two hills near Jericho, and reject the Samaritan statement that they were near Shechem, with the words sed vehementer errant; which, however, applies to themselves. That their view was not generally received is clear, since the Bordeaux Pilgrim in the same century places Gerizim at Shechem; and this is also always the view of every pilgrim or chronicler who mentions the mountain later. Eusebius himself (Praep. Evang. ix. 22) quotes lines from Theodotus which accurately describe the true position. Procopius of Caesarea, describing the works of Justinian on the mountain, also places it near Shechem (De Aedif. v. 7).

In conclusion of the question as to the Samaritan temple, it is remarkable that, in the Gospel, no allusion is made to its existence. The fathers are merely said to have worshipped "in this mountain" (John iv. 20). As, however, John Hyrcanus, in 129 B.C., made an expedition into Samaria, where he is said to have caused the temple on Gerizim to be deserted (Ant. xiii. 9, § 1, 10, § 2; Wars. i. 2, § 6), it is possible that it may have been in ruins in the time of Christ. The coins of Neapolis are believed to represent a temple on Gerizim, but Robinson has expressed his doubt (Bib. Res. ii. p. 293) whether more than an altar existed on the mountain. During the war against Vespasian (Josephus, Wars. iii. 7, § 32) the Samaritans endeavoured to resist the Romans on Gerizim, but the latter held apparently the springs at the foot of the mountain, and the defenders submitted, worn out by heat and want of water and of food. In 474 A.D. the Emperor Zeno built the church still to be seen on the summit, to which Justinian added a fortress in the next century. This church was seized by the Samaritans under the leadership of a woman in 529 A.D., the third year of Justinian's reign, but a cruel retribution fell on the rioters, and it appears that for a time all access to the mountain was denied them.

The Samaritan accounts of their history are all unfortunately very late, being written in the Middle Ages. Gerizim was the centre of their faith, round which were clustered many traditional sites. Joseph's tomb, Jacob's well, the sepulchres of Joshua and of the sons of Aaron were all near to the mountain, on which in all ages, from the time when they became a distinct sect, they appear to have shown the site of Abraham's sacrifice, and to have held their Passover feast. Here, too, they believed that Joshua set up the Tabernacle, and afterwards built a temple. The site of Bethel was also shown as early as the 4th century A.D. on the mountain, and is still so placed by the Samaritans. The Samaritan "Book of Joshua" is a legendary work of the 13th cent. A.D. (Juynboll, Leyden, 1848), founded on earlier materials. It cannot be relied on except in so far as it shows Samaritan beliefs. According to this work, written in Arabic, all Israel gathered thrice a year on Gerizim, where a temple was erected (ch. xxiv.), on the altar of which only could sacrifices be made (ch. xxxviii.). On Gerizim, in the time of the Judges, the sacred vessels were hidden in a cave (ch. xlii.), where the Samaritans believe them still to lie hid. In the days of the Persians the re-erection of this temple was permitted, the Jews were defeated in their contention in favour of Jerusalem, and repented, all Israel worshipping on Gerizim (ch. xlv.). Alexander the Great acknowledged Gerizim to be the true centre of worship (ch. xlii.); Hadrian brought the brazen doors of the Jerusalem Temple to the shrine which he built on Gerizim (ch. xlvii.). At this time many of the sacred books were lost. The Romans placed a guard on the mountain, and a magic bird of brass warned them of the approach of any Samaritan (ch. xlviii.); this appears to have been destroyed in a riot under Baba Rabba (ch. l.). Among the articles of Samaritan belief (see Nutt, Samaritan Hist. p. 67), the sanctity of Gerizim is one of the most distinctive. It is regarded as the abode of God on earth, the home of eternal life, "the Mount of Blessings," "the Everlasting hill," "the Stone of Israel": above it is Paradise; here Adam and Seth raised altars, and seven steps led to Noah's altar; here were the "twelve stones" on which the Law was inscribed, the high-priest's house, and the cave of Makkedah. Gerizim, they say, is the highest mountain in the world (though Ebal is 200 feet higher), and Gerizim alone was not covered by the Flood.

Among mediæval writers Benjamin of Tudela is one of the very few who describe the Samaritans. He mentions an altar on Gerizim (in 1163 A.D.), where they offered sacrifice, made from the stones taken by Israel from Jordan. The mountain, he says, was rich in wells and orchards (which applies only to its N.W. slopes), whereas Ebal was barren, which applies to the southern side of the mountain. Sir John Maundeville (1322) speaks of the sacrifices, and of the tradition of Abraham's sacrifice. Maundrell (1697 A.D.) speaks of "a small temple or place of worship," and of the Samaritan assertion that Joshua's altar was built on Gerizim. He also regards the latter as more fruitful than Ebal. The other Jewish pilgrims whose itineraries are known refer only in a cursory manner to the mountain. According to Crusading tradition, both Dan and Bethel were on or near Gerizim, and the calves set up by Jeroboam stood on the mountain, or on Ebal and Gerizim (Marino Sanuto, 14th cent.); but these opinions have no historic value. If any temple was really built on Gerizim, it would appear to have been an

The fullest account of Gerizim is to be found in the Memoirs of the Survey of Western Palestine (vol. ii. sheet xi. pp. 168-9, 187-93), as explored in 1866, 1872, 1875, and 1882. The mountain is one of the highest in Palestine south of Galilee, rising to a small plateau, half a mile in length north and south, and presenting steep slopes on the north and east, while long spurs run out on the other sides—the whole forming a remarkable block of rugged limestone, which, as seen from the western plains or from the plateau east of Jordan, is conspicuous among the surrounding mountains. The extreme height is 2,800 feet above the Mediterranean, and about 1200 above the vale of Shechem, which lies to the north, dividing Gerizim from Ebal, while on the east is the plain of El Mukhna ("the camp") stretching to the hills on the east, which hide the Jordan valley. This plain is often identified with Moreh (already mentioned), and the border of Ephraim appears to have run along its west side at the foot of Gerizim. The mountain consists of hard and very rough limestone, the lower part dolomitic, the upper of nummulitic beds, found also on Ebal, but not common in Palestine, except at considerable elevations. There are two excellent springs on the east, near the foot of the slope, and on the north is the 'Ain Balâta (to be noticed later), and further west, beneath the lower spur, the fine fountain called Râs el 'Ain. Near the northern springs occur gardens with olives, figs, pomegranates, and cactus, which are picturesque in contrast with the utter barrenness of the rocks which rise above them. A peculiar knoll, north of the main summit, is clearly artificial, in part at least. The white marl, which overlies the dolomite, appears at the foot of Gerizim on the south-east. The plain to the east, and the vale of Shechem, present a contrast to the mountain, being very fertile and well cultivated, and the springs and gardens of Shechem itself are celebrated among Syrians.

The view from the summit is one of the most extensive and remarkable in Palestine (see Tent Work in Palestine, chap. ii.). On the north it is blocked by the superior height of Ebal; beneath are seen the buildings and gardens of Shechem. On the east the hills of Gilead appear; above the nearer tops east of the plain of the Mukhna. On the south are the mountains round Shiloh. On the west a large part of the plain of Sharon appears, beyond the foot hills, which are dotted with olive-groves and villages, and the Mediterranean forms the horizon beyond the yellow sand dunes. Caesarea can be seen on this side, and further north the hills beyond Samaria and the distant range of Carmel.

One of the most remarkable sites connected with Gerizim is "the Mosque of the pillar" (Jami'a el 'Amûd) at the foot of the mountain, half a mile from the village of Balâta. There appears to have been a sacred Samaritan shrine in this vicinity, known in later times as "the Holy Oak" or "the Tree of Grace"—possibly the oak of Moreh already mentioned. The name Balâta is perhaps a corruption of this title (Ballût, "oak"), since Jerome (OS. p. 140, 15) speaks of Balanus as the "oak of Shechem" (Judg. ix. 6), and as near Joseph's tomb. This was the place where Abimelech was proclaimed, at the foot of the holy mountain, and the Samaritan tradition appears to connect the site with the oak by the "sanctuary of Jehovah" (Josh. xxiv. 26), and with the oak mentioned yet earlier in the story of Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 6). The name "Mosque of the pillar" no doubt commemorates the pillar, or "erect stone," beside which the Shechemites made their king under the oak; but this shrine cannot be the site of Joshua's altar "at" Ebal, unless we take the Samaritan view as to the alteration of the text, and suppose that the sanctuary was really at the foot of Gerizim.

Immediately north of the summit of the mountain are the ruins of Lózech or Luz—the place where the Samaritans celebrate the Passover. This name is also of some antiquity. Samaritan tradition makes it the site of Bethel, where Jacob dreamed. In the Onomasticon it is mentioned as Luz near Shechem (OS. p. 167, 14). The ruins consist merely of dry stone walls, with the trench for roasting the Paschal lambs, a large stone on which the high-priest stands, and places for boiling water and skinning the sacrifice. The Holy Rock of the Samaritans is a limestone stratum on the very summit, overlooking the eastern slope. It trends naturally to the northwest, and has a pit or cave on this side, over which the Tabernacle is believed to have stood. The rock measures 50 feet either way, with a low dry-stone fence to mark its limits. There is a well-marked artificial "cup hollow" in this rock, such as so frequently occur at pre-historic sanctuaries or "earth-fast rocks." It is said to mark the site of the laver in the court of the Tabernacle.* East of the rock are the "seven steps" (of Noah's altar or of Adam's descent from Eden), and on the south-east corner of the plateau forming the summit of the mountain is a small trench in the rock—the supposed site of Abraham's altar. The "twelve stones" are rudely-shaped blocks in a foundation wall of three or four courses. They are not of great size, and the date of the platform so formed is uncertain. There are many small praying places, fenced with stones, round the sacred rock, but no clear indications of any important building.

The Christian ruins near the north end of the plateau include Zeno's octagonal church, with an apse to the east, and six side chapels with smaller apses; round which church rises Justinian's square fortress—180 feet N. and S. by 230 feet E. and W.—formed of drafted masonry, such as was used in Byzantine times. A modern shrine on the north-east tower of the fortress is called Sheikh Ghánim, or, by the Samaritans, the tomb of Shechem ben Hamor. North of the fortress is a reservoir, 120 feet by 60 feet, to supply water, there being none on the summit: this also is Byzantine work. Procopius says that the church was dedicated to the Virgin, and was fortified in consequence of the Samaritan attack upon it: the original wall round it was a mere dry stone fence, but the fort of Justinian rendered it impregnable. The artificial knoll—perhaps a Roman guard station—has already been noticed: a vallum protected it on the side of the summit, and a strong building, 53 feet square, stood on the knoll.

To the Arab population Gerizim is known only as Jeb-el Tór, a common name for isolated summits. To the Samaritans it is best known as "the Mount of the Blessing." [C. R. C.]

GERIZITES, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8. [GERZITES.]

GERRHENIANS, THE (ἔθνος τῶν Γερρηνῶν, A. Γερρηνῶν; ad Gerrenos), named in 2 Macc. xiii. 24 only, as one limit of the district committed by Antiochus Eupator to the government of Judas Maccabaeus, the other limit being Ptolemais (Accho). To judge by the similar expression in defining the extent of Simon's government in 1 Macc. xi. 59, the specification has reference to the sea-coast of Palestine, and, from the nature of the case, the Gerrhenians, wherever they were, must have been south of Ptolemais. Grotius seems to have been the first to suggest that the town Gerrhon or Gerra was intended, which lay between Pelusium and Rhinocolura (Wady el-'Arish). But it has been pointed out by Ewald (Geschichte, iv. 365, note) that the coast as far north as the latter place was at that time in possession of Egypt, and he thereon conjectures that the inhabitants of the ancient city of GERAR, S.E. of Gaza, the residence of Abraham and Isaac, are meant. In support of this Grimm (Kurzj. Handb. ad loc.) mentions that at least one MS. reads Γερρηνῶν, which would without difficulty be corrupted to Γερρηνῶν.

It seems to have been overlooked that the Syriac Version (early, and entitled to much respect) has Gázár (ܓܳܙܳܪܳܐ). By this may be intended either (a) the ancient GEZER, now Tell Jezzer, S.E. of er-Ramleh; or (b) Gaza, which sometimes takes that form in these books. In the latter case the government of Judaea would contain the whole coast of Palestine; and this is most probably correct. [G.] [W.]

intended either (a) the ancient GEZER, now Tell Jezzer, S.E. of er-Ramleh; or (b) Gaza, which sometimes takes that form in these books. In the latter case the government of Judaea would contain the whole coast of Palestine; and this is most probably correct. [G.] [W.]

GERSHOM (in the earlier books גֵּרְשֹׁם, in Ch. generally גֵּרְשֹׁם). 1. (in Ex. Γηρσῶμ; in Judg. xxx. B. Γηρσῶμ, and A. Γηρσῶμ; Joseph. Ἰήσος; Gersom, Gersan.) The first-born son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex. ii. 22; xviii. 3). The name is explained in these passages as if גֵּרְשָׁם (Gērshām) = "a stranger there," in allusion to Moses' being a foreigner in Midian—"For he said, I have been a stranger (Gēr) in a foreign land." This signification is adopted by Josephus (Ant. ii. 13, § 1), and also by the LXX. in the form of the name which they give—Γηρσῶμ; but according to Gesenius (Thes. p. 306b), its true meaning, taking it as a Hebrew word, is "expulsion," from a root גָּרַשׁ, being only another form of GERSHON (see also Fürst, Handb.). The circumcision of Gershom is probably related in Ex. iv. 25. He does not appear again in the history in his own person, but he was the founder of a family of which more than one of the members are mentioned later. (a.) One of these was a remarkable person—"Jonathan the son of Gershom," the "young man the Levite," whom we first encounter on the way from Bethlehem-Judah to Micah's house at Mount Ephraim

* The Samaritan Chronicle, however (Journal Asiatique, Dec. 1869, p. 435), places the site of the Tabernacle and temple at Luz.

(Judg. xvii. 7), and who subsequently became the first priest to the irregular worship of the tribe of Dan (xviii. 30, B. Γησρόμ; A. Γερσώμ). The change of the name "Moses" in this passage, as it originally stood in the Hebrew text, to "Manassen," as it now stands both in the Text and the A. V. (R. V. has "Moses"; marg. Manasseh), is explained under MANASSEH. (h.) But at least one of the other branches of the family preserved its allegiance to Jehovah, for when the courses of the Levites were settled by king David, "the sons of Moses the man of God" received honourable prominence, and SHEBUEL, chief of the sons of Gershon, was appointed ruler (לְרִאשׁוֹן) of the treasures (1 Ch. xxiii. 15-17; xxvi. 24-28).

2. The form under which the name GERSHON—the eldest son of Levi—is given in several passages of Chronicles, viz. 1 Ch. vi. 16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71; xv. 7. The Hebrew is almost alternately גֶּרְשׁוֹן and גֶּרְשֹׁן; the LXX. have different renderings of the name; B. Γερσών, A. Γησρόν; Vulg. Gerson and Gerson.

3. (גֶּרְשֹׁן; BA. Γησρόμ; Gersom.) The representative of the priestly family of Phinehas, among those who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 2). In Esdras the name is GERSON. [G.] [W.]

GERSHON (גֶּרְשׁוֹן; in Gen. Γησρόν, in other books uniformly Γερσών; and so also A. with three exceptions; Joseph. Ant. ii. 7, § 4, Γησρόμης), the eldest of the three sons of Levi, born before the descent of Jacob's family into Egypt (Gen. xlvi. 11; Ex. vi. 16). But though the eldest born, the families of Gershon were outstripped in fame by their younger brethren of Kohath, from whom sprang Moses and the priestly line of Aaron.* Gershon's sons were LIBNI and SHIMI (Ex. vi. 17; Num. iii. 18, 21; 1 Ch. vi. 17), and their families were duly recognised in the reign of David, when the permanent arrangements for the service of Jehovah were made (1 Ch. xxiii. 7-11). At this time Gershon was represented by the famous Asaph "the seer," whose genealogy is given in 1 Ch. vi. 39-43, and also in part, sv. 20, 21. The family is mentioned once again as taking part in the reforms of king Hezekiah (2 Ch. xxix. 12, where it should be observed that the sons of Asaph are reckoned as distinct from the Gershonites). At the census in the wilderness of Sinai the whole number of the males of the Bene-Gershon was 7,500 (Num. iii. 22), midway between the Kohathites and the Merarites. At the same date the efficient men were 2,630 (iv. 40). On the occasion of the second census the numbers of the Levites are given only in gross (Num. xxvi. 62). The sons of Gershon had charge of the fabrics of the Tabernacle—the coverings, curtains, hangings, and cords (Num. iii. 25, 26; iv. 25, 26); for the transport of these they had two covered wagons and four oxen (vii. 3, 7). In the encampment their station was behind (לְאַחֵר) the Tabernacle, on the west side (Num. iii. 23). When on the march, they went with the Merarites in the rear of the first body of three tribes—Judah, Issachar, Zebulun—with Reuben behind them. In the apportionment of the Levitical cities, thirteen fell to the lot of the Gershonites. These were in the northern tribes—two in Manasseh beyond Jordan; four in Issachar; four in Asher; and three in Naphtali. All of these are said to have possessed "suburbs," and two were cities of refuge (Josh. xxi. 27-33; 1 Ch. vi. 62, 71-76). It is not easy to see what special duties fell to the lot of the Gershonites in the service of the Tabernacle after its erection at Jerusalem, or in the Temple. The sons of Jeduthun "prophesied with a harp," and the sons of Heman "lifted up the horn," but for the sons of Asaph no instrument is mentioned (1 Ch. xxv. 1-5). They were appointed to "prophecy" (that is, probably, to utter or sing inspired words, נְבִיאִים), perhaps after the special prompting of David himself (xxv. 2). Others of the Gershonites, sons of Laadan, had charge of the "treasures of the house of God, and over the treasures of the holy things" (xxvi. 20-22), among which precious stones are specially named (xxix. 8).

* See an instance of this in 1 Ch. vi. 2-15, where the line of Kohath is given, to the exclusion of the other two families.

In Chronicles the name is, with two exceptions (1 Ch. vi. 1, xxxiii. 6), given in the slightly different form of Gershom [GERSHOM, 2]. See also GERSHONITES. [G.] [W.]

GERSHONITES, THE (גֶּרְשׁוֹנִיתִים, i.e. the Gershunnite; B. δ Γερσών, δ Γερσώνι; vii. Γερσώνι; A. [sometimes] Γησρόν), the family descended from GERSON or GERSHOM, the son of Levi (Num. iii. 21, 23, 24; iv. 24, 27; xxvi. 57; Josh. xxi. 33; 1 Ch. xxiii. 7; 2 Ch. xxix. 12).

"THE GERSHONITE," as applied to individuals, occurs in 1 Ch. xxvi. 21 (Laadan), xxix. 8 (Jehiel). [G.]

GERSON (Γησρόν; Gersomus), 1 Esd. viii. 29. [GERSHOM, 3.]

GERZITES, THE (גֶּרְזִיתִים or גֶּרְזִיָּה [Gen. Theo. p. 301], the Girzite, or the Gerzizite; B. omits, A. τὸν Γερζαῖον; Gerzi and Gerzi, but in his Quæst. Hebr. Jerome has Getri; Syr. and Arab. Godola), a tribe who with the Geshurites and the Amalekites occupied the land between the south of Palestine* and Egypt in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xxvii. 8). They were rich in Bedawi treasures—"sheep, oxen, asses, camels, and apparel" (v. 9; cp. xv. 3; 1 Ch. vi. 21). The name is not found in the text of the A. V., but only in the margin (R. V., on the other hand, has "Girzites" in the text and Girzites in the margin). This arises from its having been corrected by the Masorets (Ḳori) into GIZRITES, which form our translators have adopted in the text. The change is supported by the Targum, and by A. as above. There is not, however, any apparent reason for relinquishing the older form of the name, the interest of which lies in its possible connexion with that of Mount Gerizim. In the name of that ancient mountain we have perhaps the only remaining trace of the presence of this old tribe of Bedawin in Central Palestine. They appear to have occupied it at a very early period, and to have relinquished it in company with the Amalekites, who left their name attached to a mountain in the same locality (Judg. xii. 15), when they abandoned that rich district for the less fertile but freer South. Other tribes, as the Avvim and the Zemarites, also left traces of their presence in the names of towns of the central district (see AVVIM, and p. 395, n. *).

* The LXX. (B) has rendered the passage referred to as follows:—καὶ ἰδοὺ ἡ γῆ κατακείτο ἀπὸ ἀνηκότων (? = גֶּרְזִיתִים) ἢ ἀπὸ Γελαμοῦ ὄρου (A. Γελαμοῦρος), περιχιμένον καὶ ὡς γῆς Αἰγύπτου. The word Galamosour may be a corruption of the Hebrew meolam . . . Shurah (? = גֶּרְזִיתִים + שִׁרָה, A. V. "of old . . . to Shur"). Some cursive MSS. read Τελάμ (גֶּרְזִיתִים) for גֶּרְזִיתִים, a place in the south-east of Judah (Josh. xv. 24), which bore a prominent part in a former attack on the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 4); and this reading is more satisfactory (cp. Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. i. c.).

The connexion between the Gerizites and Mount Gerizim appears to have been first suggested by Gesenius. It has been since adopted by Stanley (S. & P. p. 237, note). Gesenius interprets the name as "dwellers in the dry, barren country." [GERIZIM.] [G.] [W.]

GE'SEM, THE LAND OF (γη Γεσέμ; terra Jesse), the Greek form of the Hebrew name GOSHEN (Judith i. 9; Syr. Goshen).

GE'SHAM (גֶּשָׁם, i.e. Geshan, of uncertain meaning; B. Σαρῳπ, A. Γησώμ; Gesan), one of the sons of JAHDAI, in the genealogy of Judah and family of Caleb (1 Ch. ii. 47). Nothing further concerning him has been yet traced. The name, as it stands in our present Bibles, is a corruption of the A. V. of 1611, which has, accurately, Geshan (so R. V.).

GE'SHEM and GASH'MU (גֶּשֶׁם; once, גֶּשָׁם, Neh. vi. 6; Γῆσαμ; Gossem), an Arabian, mentioned in Neh. ii. 19 and vi. 1, 2, 6, who, with "Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite," opposed the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem. Geshem, we may conclude, was an inhabitant of Arabia Petraea, or of the Arabian Desert, and probably the chief of a tribe which, like most of the tribes on the eastern frontier of Palestine, was, in the time of the Captivity and the subsequent period, hostile to the revival of the Jewish nation. Geshem, like Sanballat and Tobiah, seems to have been one of the "governors beyond the river," to whom Nehemiah came, and whose mission "grieved them exceedingly, that there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel" (Neh. ii. 10); for the wandering inhabitants of the frontier doubtless availed themselves largely, in their predatory excursions, of the distracted state of Palestine, and dreaded the re-establishment of the kingdom; and the Arabians, Ammonites, and Ashdodites are recorded to have "conspired to fight against Jerusalem," and to stop the work of fortification. The endeavours of these confederates and their failure are recorded in chs. ii., iv., and vi. The Arabic name corresponding to Geshem cannot easily be identified. G'asim (جاسم) is one of very remote antiquity; and G'ashum (جاشوم) is the name of an historical tribe of Arabia Proper; the latter may more probably be compared with it, although neither is identical in form. As regards the two Hebrew forms, Geshem is uninflected; Gashmu corresponds to the Arabic nominative case (supposing that the Hebrew text of Neh. vi. 6 is sound).

[E. S. P.] [C. J. B.]

GESHU'R (גֶּשׁוּר; Γεσσοῦρ [al. Γεδοῦρ]; Jessur. Gesenius translates the word as bridge, Arabic جسر, but the root also means "daring"), an independent kingdom of the Geshurites (see next article) in David's time (2 Sam. iii. 3; xiii. 37, 38; xiv. 23, 32; xv. 8; 1 Ch. iii. 2). It was close to Aram or Syria (2 Sam. xv. 8), and Talmi, its king, was Absalom's grandfather. To Geshur he fled after the murder of Amnon, and the LXX. adds that it was the country of (his mother) Maachah, as appears also from the earlier passage. It appears to have been the region now called Jeidūr (جيدور), the plain south of Hermon and east of the Jordan, usually supposed to be the later ITURAEA (Luke iii. 1): on the borders of David's kingdom and of Syria. [C. R. C.]

GESHURI and GESHU'RITES (גֶּשׁוּרִי; Jos. Ant. vi. 13, § 10, Ξεππίραι). Two nations of this name appear to be mentioned. (1.) The inhabitants of Geshur above noticed, who would appear to be the later Ituraeans (Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5, xiii. 2, 11, 13; 1 Ch. ii. 23).

They appear in the earliest passage cited to have remained independent beyond the possessions of the tribe of Manasseh, and to have dwelt near ARGOB and MAACHAH. They had probably (Josh. xii. 5) been also independent of Og, king of Bashan. If this tribe is to be understood in Josh. xiii. 2, they were not conquered by Joshua (see vs. 11 and 13), and remained as a mingled people who, according to the First Book of Chronicles (ii. 23), were subdued by Jair. The relations of the Hebrews to these border tribes appear, from a number of passages, to have constantly fluctuated, and the original population was never rooted out.

(2.) A tribe mentioned in the south with the Amalekites (1 Sam. xxvii. 8 [B. Γεσσεῖ, A. Γεσσεῖ; Gessuri]) and the Gezrites. These three peoples are said to have been aborigines on the south border of Palestine, near the desert of Shur. It is quite possible that they were a division of the northern tribe (No. 1), and that this division is intended in Josh. xiii. 2, though not in vs. 11, 13 of the same chapter. [C. R. C.]

GETHER (גֶּתֶר; Γεθερ; Gether), the third of the four sons of Aram (Gen. x. 23). In 1 Ch. i. 17 he and his brothers are briefly included with their father among the "sons" of Shem. No satisfactory trace of the people sprung from this stock has been found. The theories of Bochart and others, which rest on improbable etymologies, are without support; while the suggestions of Carians (Jerome), Bactrians (Joseph. Ant.), and the جر أمّنة, the G'arāmīkah (Saad.), are not better founded (see Bochart, Phaleg, ii. 10, and Winer, s. v.). Kautzsch suggests that the four Aramean peoples are named according to their local situation, proceeding from north to south. Thus Uz in S. Syria is mentioned first; then comes Hül, perhaps to the north of the Sea of Galilee (cp. Lake Hüleh); between which and Mash, which he connects with Mount Masius, south of the Upper Tigris, we must place Gether, i. e. somewhere between Damascus and the Euphrates or even beyond it—a sufficiently vague determination. But in 1 Ch. i. 17 the fourth name is not Mash, but Meshech (so also LXX. Gen. x. 23), i. e. the Mushki or Muski of Assyrian annals, who lay to the north-east of Cappadocia in Lesser Armenia (Schrader, KAT. p. 84).

4 F

The Arabs write the name غَاثِر (Ghâthir);

and, in the mythical history of their country, it is said that the (probably aboriginal) tribes of Thamûd, Tasm, Jadi, and Ad (the last, in the second generation, through 'Ud) were descended from Ghâthir (Caussin, Essai, i. 24, 28; Abul-Fida, Hist. Anteiisl. p. 16. Sale's Prelim. Disc. and the authorities there cited). See ARABIA, ARAM, and NABATHAENS. [E. S. P.] [C. J. B.]

GETHSEMANE (Γῆ, gath, a "wine-press," and שֶׁמֶן, shemen, "oil;" Γεθσημανε, or more generally Γεθσημανί), a small "farm," as the French would say, "un bien aux champs" (χωριον, = ager, praedium; or as the Vulgate, villa; A. V. "place;" R. V. marg. an enclosed piece of ground; Matt. xxvi. 36; Mark xiv. 32), situated across the brook Kedron (John xviii. 1), and perhaps near the foot of Mount Olivet (Luke xxiii. 39). There was a "garden," or rather orchard (κῆπος), attached to it, to which the olive, fig, and pomegranate doubtless invited resort by their "hospitable shade." And we know from the Evangelists St. Luke (xxii. 39) and St. John (xviii. 2) that our Lord oftentimes resorted thither with His disciples. According to Josephus, the suburbs of Jerusalem abounded with gardens and pleasure-grounds (παρὰ τείχεος, B. J. vi. 1, § 1; cp. v. 3, § 2). Now, with the exception of those belonging to the Greek and Latin convents, hardly the vestige of a garden is to be seen. There is indeed a favourite spot, half a mile or more to the north, on the same side of the continuation of the valley of the Kedron, the property of a wealthy Turk, where the Muhammadan ladies sometimes pass the day with their families, their bright-flowing costume forming a picturesque contrast to the stiff sombre foliage of the olive-grove beneath which they cluster. But Gethsemane has not come down to us as a scene of mirth; its inexhaustible associations are the offspring of a single event—the Agony of the Son of God on the evening preceding His Passion. Here emphatically, as Isaiah had foretold, and as the name imports, were fulfilled those dark words, "I have trodden the wine-press alone" (lxiii. 3; cp. Rev. xiv. 20, "the wine-press . . . without the city"). "The period of the year," writes Mr. Greaswell (Harm. Diss. xlii.), "was the Vernal Equinox: the day of the month about two days before the full of the moon—in which case the moon would not be now very far past her meridian; and the night would be enlightened until a late hour towards the morning"—the day of the week Thursday, or rather, according to the Jews, Friday—for the sun had set. The time, according to Mr. Greaswell, would be the last watch of the night, between our 11 and 12 o'clock. Any recapitulation of the circumstances of that ineffable event would be unnecessary; any comments upon it unseasonable.

A modern garden, enclosed by a wall, in which are some old olive-trees, said to date from the time of Christ, is now pointed out as the Garden of Gethsemane. It is on the left bank of the Kedron, about 730 feet from the east wall of the city, and immediately south of the road, from St. Stephen's Gate to the summit of Olivet, which separates it from the "Grotto of the Agony" and the "Tomb of the Virgin." This garden is, there is little reason to doubt, the spot alluded to by Eusebius when he says (OS. p. 248, 18), that Gethsemane was at the Mount of Olives, and was then a place of prayer for the faithful; and which Jerome more distinctly defines as being at the foot of the Mount of Olives, and as having a church built over it (OS. p. 130, 22). The Bordeaux Pilgrim (i. d. 333) mentions a stone at the place where Judas betrayed Christ, which was to the left of the road up the Mount of Olives, and about a stone's-throw from the tombs of Isaiah and Hezekiah (Itin. Hierosol.). Theodosius (c. A. D. 530) also mentions the place of betrayal (De Situ T. S. xi.). A broken column from 20 to 30 paces south of the entrance to the garden is now shown as the place of betrayal; the tombs of Isaiah and Hezekiah are those of Zechariah and Absalom. Cyril of Jerusalem, Antoninus, Arculfus, and nearly all later pilgrims mention Gethsemane, so that the chain of tradition is almost unbroken. S. Silvia (A. D. 379-88) gives an interesting account of the service at Gethsemane, during the night of Thursday and early morning of Good Friday: and of the procession from the garden to the cross (Per. ad Loca Sancta). Whether the traditional site be the true one or not is a more difficult question. There is no tradition earlier than the first half of the fourth century; and Robinson suggests (i. 346) that the spot may have been fixed upon during the visit of Helena to Jerusalem A. D. 326, when the places of the Crucifixion and Resurrection were supposed to be identified. He also seems inclined to the view that Gethsemane was higher up the Mount of Olives than the present site (i. 347, note), which must have been close to the Roman road to Jericho, and not a place that is likely to have been selected for frequent retirement from the crowded streets of Jerusalem. This view is also taken by Thomson (L. & B. p. 634). The close proximity of the present garden to the brook Kedron is, however, considered by some to be an argument in its favour (Stanley, S. & P. p. 455). Falkener (Proc. Soc. Bib. Archaeol. June 1887) places Gethsemane on the right bank of the Kedron, beneath the city wall, but this seems inconsistent with the Bible narrative.

Against the contemporary antiquity of the olive-trees, it has been urged that Titus cut down all the trees round about Jerusalem; and certainly this is no more than Josephus states in express terms (see particularly B. J. vi. 1, § 1, a passage which must have escaped Mr. Williams, Holy City, ii. 437, 2nd edit., who only cites v. 3, § 2, and vi. 8, § 1). Besides, the 10th legion, arriving from Jericho, were posted about the Mount of Olives (v. 2, § 3; and cp. vi. 2, § 8), and, in the course of the siege, a wall was carried along the valley of the Kedron to the fountain of Siloam (v. 10, § 2). The probability therefore would seem to be, that they were planted by Christian hands to mark the spot: unless, like the sacred olive of the Acropolis (Bahr, ad Herod. viii. 55), they may have reproduced themselves. They are not mentioned by any of the earlier pilgrims. Maundrell (Early Travellers in P., by Wright,

Gethsemane (as it was in 1841, and before it was enclosed and fenced round as it is now).

p. 471) and Quaresmius (Elucid. T. S. lib. iv. per. v. ch. 7) appear to have been the first to notice them, not more than three centuries ago; the former arguing against, and the latter in favour of, their reputed antiquity: but nobody reading their accounts would imagine that there were then no more than seven or eight, the locality of Gethsemane being supposed the same. Parallel claims, to be sure, are not wanting in the cedars of Lebanon, which are still visited with so much enthusiasm: in the terebinth, or oak of Mamre, which was standing in the days of Constantine the Great, and even worshipped (Vales. ad Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 53), and the fig-tree (Ficus elustica) near Nerbudda in India, which native historians assert to be 2,500 years old (Patterson's Journal of a Tour in Egypt, &c., p. 202, note). Still more appositely there were olive-trees near Linternum 250 years old, according to Pliny, in his time, which are recorded to have survived to the middle of the tenth century (Nouveau Dict. d'Hist. Nat. Paris, 1846, vol. xxix. p. 61). Descriptions of the traditional Garden of Gethsemane, with its chapels and "holy places," will be found in Porter, Hand-book, and Baedeker-Socin, Pal. and Syria.

GE-U-EL (גֵּזְעֵל), = the greatness of God, Sam. גֵּזְעֵל; Γουδιθα; Guel), son of Machi; ruler of the tribe of Gad, and its representative among the spies sent from the wilderness of Paran to explore the Promised Land (Num. xiii. 15).

GE'ZER (גֵּזֵר), = a precipitous place, in pause גֵּזֵר; Γαζέρ, Γεζέρ, Γάζης, Γαζάρα, Γαζήρα; Gazer), an ancient city of Canaan, whose king, Horam, or Elam, coming to the assistance of Lachish, was killed with all his people by Joshua (Josh. x. 33; xii. 12). The town, however, is not said to have been destroyed; it formed one of the landmarks on the south boundary of Ephraim, between the lower Beth-horon and the Mediterranean (xvi. 3), the western limit of the tribe (1 Ch. vii. 28; Jos. Ant. v. 1, § 22). It was allotted with its suburbs to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 21; 1 Ch. vi. 67); but the original inhabitants were not dispossessed (Judg. i. 29); and even down to the reign of Solomon the Canaanites, or (according to the LXX. addition to Josh. xvi. 10) the Canaanites and Perizzites, were still dwelling there, and paying tribute to Israel (1 K. ix. 16). At this time it must in fact have been independent of Israelite rule, for Pharaoh had burnt it to the ground and killed its inhabitants, and then presented the site to his daughter, Solomon's queen. But it was immediately rebuilt by the king (v. 17); and though not heard of again till after the Captivity, yet it played a somewhat prominent part in the later struggles of the nation. [GAZARA.]

Ewald (Gesch. iii. 280; cp. ii. 427) takes Gezer and Geshur to be the same, and sees in the destruction of the former by Pharaoh, and the simultaneous expedition of Solomon to Hamath-zobah in the neighbourhood of the latter, indications of a revolt of the Canaanites, of whom the Geshurites formed the most powerful remnant, and whose attempt against the new monarch was thus frustrated. But this can hardly be supported.

In one place Gob is given as identical with Gezer (1 Ch. xx. 4; cp. 2 Sam. xxi. 18). Josephus (Ant. vii. 12, 2) agrees with 1 Ch. xx. 4. Gezer is named as the last point to which David's pursuit of the Philistines extended

(2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Ch. xiv. 16*), and as the scene of at least one sharp encounter (1 Ch. xx. 4). It was naturally strong, and occupied an important position on the outskirts of the Philistine territory (Γαζάρη τῆν τῆς Παλαιστίνων χώραν ὑπάρχουσαν, Jos. Ant. viii. 6, § 1; cp. vii. 4, § 1). By Eusebius it is mentioned (*O.S. p. 254, 14) as being 4 miles northward (ἐν Βορραιοῖς) from Nicopolis ('Amwās). Strabo (xvi. 2, § 29) mentions it under the name Gadaris (Γαδάρης), and says that the Jews had appropriated it to themselves. It is possible that Gazara should be read for Gadara in Jos. Ant. xiv. 5, § 4; B. J. i. 8, § 5, and that Gezer and not Gadara was the seat of the Sanhedrin. This view derives some support from the evidence that Gezer was an important Jewish city during the Maccabean period.

The site of Gezer was discovered at Tell Jezer, close to the village of Abu Shushah, by M. Clermont-Ganneau, in 1870. It is situated on a swell of the low hills, about 4 miles W.N.W. of 'Amwās; and the tomb of Sheikh Muhammad el-Jezari which surmounts the mound is a conspicuous landmark, and a prominent object to the right of the road from Jaffa to Jerusalem. The view from the ruins over the rich plain of Philistia is extremely fine, and the site is an admirable one for a fortified city. The terrace walls of the Tell are of large blocks of unhewn stone, and there is much broken pottery scattered over the surface. There are the remains of an aqueduct and pool, numerous rock-hewn tombs, a large number of wine-presses, an ancient quarry, and a large cave hollowed in the soft rock. The identity of Gezer with Tell Jezer was confirmed by the discovery of two bilingual inscriptions on the face of the rock, containing the Greek word AAKIOY (perhaps Hilkiah) in characters of the classical epoch, followed by גֵּזֵר in Hebrew letters of ancient square form. The latter M. Ganneau translates "the limit of Gezer," the name of the town being written as it is in the Bible; and he connects the Alkios of the text with a certain Alkios, son of Simon, whose name occurs on a sarcophagus found at Lydda. The inscriptions are perhaps of the late Maccabean period, and may possibly define the Sabbatic boundary; they are about 5,600 ft. from the centre of the Tell (PEF. Mem. ii. 428-439). M. Ganneau has also shown that Tell Jezer is the celebrated Mons Gisardus, or Mont Gisart, which is so frequently mentioned in the histories of the Crusades, and which gave its name to one of the noble families of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem (Recueil d'Archéologie Orientale, p. 351 sq.).

From the occasional occurrence of the form Gazer, and from the LXX. Version being almost

* In these two places the word, being at the end of a period, has, according to Hebrew custom, its first vowel lengthened, and stands in the text as Gaser, and in these two places only the name is so transferred to the A. V. But, to be consistent, the same change should have been made in several other passages, where it occurs in the Hebrew: e.g. Judg. i. 29; Josh. xvi. 3, 10; 1 K. ix. 16, &c. It would seem better to render the Hebrew name always by the same English one, when the difference arises from nothing but an emphatic accent.

uniformly Gazera or Gazer, Ewald infers that this was really the original name. [G.] [W.]

GEZRITES, THE (גִּזְרִי, accur. the Gizrite; τῶν Γεζριῶν; Gezri). The word which the Jewish critics have substituted in the margin of the Bible for the ancient reading, "the Gerizite" (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), and which has thus become incorporated in the text of the A. V. If it mean anything—at least that we know—it must signify the dwellers in Gezer. But GEZER was not less than 50 miles distant from the "south of Judah, the south of the Jerahmeelites, and the south of the Kenites," the scene of David's inroad; a fact which stands greatly in the way of our receiving the change. [GEZRITES, THE.] [G.] [W.]

GIAH (גִּיָּה; Gai; vallis), a place named only in 2 Sam. ii. 24, to designate the position of the hill Ammah—"which faces Giah by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon." No trace of the situation of either has yet been found, but they must have been to the east of Gibeon. By the LXX. the name is read as if גִּיָּה, i.e. a ravine or glen; a view also taken in the Vulgate. [AMMAH.]

GIANTS. The frequent allusion to giants in Scripture, and the numerous theories and disputes which have arisen in consequence, render it necessary to give a brief view of some of the main opinions and curious inferences to which the mention of them leads.

1. They are first spoken of in Gen. vi. 4, under the name Nephilim (נְפִלִים; LXX. γίγαντες; Aquil. ἐπιπτόρες; Symm. Βαίαι; Vulg. gigantes; Onk. גִּיָּהִים; Luther, Tyrannen). The etymology of the word is obscure. Some derive it from נָפַל (= "marvellous"), or, from נָפַל, either in the sense to throw down, or to fall (= fallen angels, Jarchi, cp. Is. xiv. 12; Luke x. 18). Others give it the meaning "heroes irruentes" (Gesén), or collapsi (by euphemism, Boettcher, de Inferis, p. 92, or unnaturally born [31v.¹¹]); but certainly not "because men fell from terror of them" (as R. Kimchi). That the word means "giant" is clear from Num. xiii. 32, 33, and is confirmed by גִּיָּהִים, the Chaldee name for "the aery giant" Orion (Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 31; Is. xiii. 10; Targ.), unless this name arise from the obliquity of the constellation (Gen. of Earth, p. 35).

But we now come to the remarkable statement about the origin of these Nephilim in Gen. vi. 1-4 (cp. Delitzsch [1887] and Dillmann¹ in loco. See also Kurtz, Die Ehen der Söhne Gottes, &c., Berlin, 1857; Ewald, Jahr. 1854, p. 126; Govett's Isaiah Unfulfilled; Faber's Many Mansions, J. of Soc. Lit. Oct. 1858, &c.) We are told that "there were Nephilim in the earth," and that "afterwards" (καὶ μετ' ἐκεῖνο, LXX.) the "sons of God" mingling with the beautiful "daughters of men" produced a race of violent and insolent Gibborim (גִּבּוֹרִים). This latter word is also rendered by the LXX. γίγαντες, but we shall see hereafter that the meaning is more general. It is clear, however, that no statement is made that the ing the usual derivation (נָפַל), and explaining it to mean "fallen spirits," the Nephilim seem to be identical with the "sons of God;" but the verse before us militates against this notion as much as against that which makes the Nephilim the same as the Gibborim, viz.: the offspring of wicked marriages. This latter supposition can only be accepted if we admit either (1) that there were two kinds of Nephilim,—those who existed before the unequal intercourse, and those produced by it (Heidegger, Hist. Patr. xi.), or (2) by following the Vulgate rendering, postquam enim ingressi sunt, &c. But the common rendering seems to be correct, nor is there much probability in Aben Ezra's explanation, that אַחֲרָיוֹן ("after that") means אַחֲרֵי הַמַּבּוּל (i.e. "after the deluge"), and is an allusion to the Anakim.

The genealogy of the Nephilim then, or at any rate of the earliest Nephilim, is not recorded in Scripture, and the name itself is so mysterious that we are lost in conjecture respecting them.

2. The sons of the marriages mentioned in Gen. vi. 1-4 are called Gibborim (גִּבּוֹרִים, from גִּבּוֹר, to be strong), a general name meaning powerful (ὄβρισταί καὶ πάντος ὑπεροπτα καλοῦ, Joseph. Ant. i. 3, § 1; γῆς παίδες τῶν νοῦν ἐκβιβδάσαντες τοῦ λογί(σθαι) κ.τ.λ., Philo, de Gigant. p. 270; cp. Is. iii. 2, xlix. 24; Ezek. xxxii. 21). They were not necessarily giants in our sense of the word (Theodoret, Quaest. 48). Yet, as was natural, these powerful chiefs were almost universally represented as men of extraordinary stature. The LXX. render the word γίγαντες, and call Nimrod a γίγας κτυπητός (1 Ch. i. 10); Augustine calls them Staturosi (de Civ. Dei, xv. 4); Chrysostom, ἤρωες εὐμηκεῖς; Theodoret, παμμεγεθεῖς (cp. Bar. iii. 26, εὐμεγεθεῖς, ἐπιστόμμοιο πόλεμοι).

But who were the parents of these giants; who are "the sons of God" (בְּנֵי הָאֱלֹהִים)?

The opinions are various. (1) Men of power (viol δυναστευόντων, Symm. Hieron. Quaest. Heb. ad loc.; בני שְׁלֹמֹנִי, Onk.; בני יִרְבֵּינָא, Samar.; so too Selden, Vorst, &c.): cp. Ps. ii. 7, lxxxii. 6, lxxxix. 27; Mic. v. 5, &c. The expression will then exactly resemble Homer's Διογενεῖς βασιλῆες, and the Chinese T'ian-tseu, "son of heaven," as a title of the Emperor (Gesén. s. v. גִּבּוֹר). But why should the union of the high-born and the low-born produce offspring unusual for their size and strength? (2) Men with great gifts, "in the image of God" (Ritter, Schumann). (3) Cainites arrogantly assuming the title (Paulus); or (4) the pious Sethites (cp. Gen. iv. 26; Maimon. Mor. Neboch. i. 14; Suid. s. vv. Σῆθ καὶ μαιγαυλάς; Cedren. Hist. Comp. p. 10; Aug. de Civ. Dei, xv. 23; Chrysost. Hom. 22, in Gen.; Theod. in Gen. Quaest. 47; Cyril. c. Jul. ix. &c.). A host of modern commentators catch at this explanation, but Gen. iv. 26 has probably no connexion with the subject. Other texts quoted in favour of the view are Deut. xiv. 1, 2; Ps. lxxxiii. 15; Prov. xiv. 26; Hos. i. 10; Rom. viii. 14, &c. Still the mere antithesis in the verse, as well as other considerations, tend strongly against this gloss, which indeed is built on a foregone conclusion. Compare however the Indian notion of the two races of men, Suras and Asuras (children of the sun and of the moon, Nork, Bramm. und Rabb. p. 204 sq.), and the Persian belief in the marriage of Djemshid with the sister of a dev, whence sprang black and impious men (Kalisch, Gen. p. 175). (5) Worshipers of false gods (παῖδες τῶν θεῶν, Aq.), making יְצִי = "servants" (cp. Deut. xiv. 1; Prov. xiv. 26; Ex. xxxiii. 1; Deut. iv. 28, &c.). This view is ably supported in Genesis of Earth and Man, p. 39 sq. (6) Devils, such as the Incubi and Succubi. Such was the belief of the Cabbalists (Valesius, de S. Philosoph. cap. 8). That these beings can have intercourse with women St. Augustine declares it would be folly to doubt, and it was the universal belief in the East. Mohammed makes one of the ancestors of Balkis queen of Sheba a demon, and Damir says he had heard a Mohammedan doctor openly boast of having married in succession four demon wives (Bochart, Hieroz. i. p. 747). Indeed the belief still exists (Lane's Mod. Eg. i. chs. x., xi.). (7) Closely allied to this is the oldest opinion, that they were angels (ἄγγελοι τοῦ Θεοῦ, LXX., for such was the old reading, not υἱοί, Aug. de Civ. Dei, xv. 23; so too Joseph. Ant. i. 3, § 1; Phil. de Gig. ii. 358; Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 7, § 69; Sulp. Sever. Hist. Script. in Orthod. l. i. &c.: cp. Job i. 6, ii. 1; Ps. xxix. 1, Job iv. 18). The rare expression "sons of God" certainly means angels in Job xxxviii. 7, i. 6, ii. 1; and that such is the meaning in Gen. vi. 4 also, was the most prevalent opinion both in the Jewish and early Christian Church.

It was probably this very ancient view which gave rise to the spurious book of Enoch, and the notion quoted from it by St. Jude (v. 6), and alluded to by St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 4; cp. 1 Cor. xi. 10, Tert. de Virg. Vel. 7). According to this book, certain angels, sent by God to guard the earth ('Εγγήγοροι, φύλακες), were perverted by the beauty of women, "went after strange flesh," taught sorcery, finery (umina lapillarum, circulos ex aure, Tert., &c.), and being banished from heaven had sons 3,000 cubits high, thus originating a celestial and terrestrial race of demons—"Unde modo vagi subvertunt corpora multa" (Commodian Instruct. III. Cultus Daemonum), i.e. they are still the source of epilepsy, &c. Various names were given at a later time to these monsters. Their chief was Leuixas, and of their number were Machsael, Aza, Schemchozai, and (the wickedest of them) a goat-like demon Azael (cp. Azazel, Lev. xvi. 8; and for the very curious questions connected with this name, see Bochart, Hieroz. i. p. 652 sq.; Rab. Eliezer, cap. 23, Bereshith Rab. ad Gen. vi. 2; Sennert, de Gigantibus, iii.).

Against this notion (which Hävernack calls "the silliest whim of the Alexandrian Gnostics and Cabbalistic Rabbis") Heidegger (Hist. Patr. l. c.) quotes Matt. xxiii. 30, Luke xxiv. 39, and similar testimonies. Philastrius (adv. Haeres. cap. 108) characterises it as a heresy, and Chrysostom (Hom. 22) even calls it τὸ Βλάσφημα ἐκείνο. Yet St. Jude is explicit, and the question is not so much what can be, as what was believed. The Fathers almost unanimously accepted these fables, and Tertullian argues warmly

(partly on expedient grounds!) for the genuineness of the book of Enoch. The angels were called 'Εγγήγοροι, a word used by Aq. and Symm. to render the Chaldee ܘܢܘܢ (Dan. iv. 13 sq.; Vulg. Vigil; LXX. εἶρ; Lex. Cyrilli, ἄγγελοι ἢ ἄγγυνοι; Fabric. Cod. Pseudepigr. v. T. p. 180), and therefore used, as in the Zend-Avesta, of good guardian Angels, and applied especially to Archangels in the Syriac liturgies (cp. ܘܢܘܢ, Is. xxi. 11), but more often of evil angels (Castelli, Lex. Syr. p. 649; Scalig. ad Euseb. Chron. p. 403; Gesen. s. v. ܘܢܘܢ). The story of the Egregori is given at length in Tert. de Cult. Fem. i. 2, ii. 10; Commodianus, Instruct. iii.; Lactant. Div. Inst. ii. 14; Testam. Patriarc. c. v., &c. Every one will remember the allusions to the same interpretation in Milton, Par. Reg. ii. 179—

"Before the Flood, thou with thy lusty crew, False-titled sons of God, roaming the earth,
Cast wanton eyes on the daughters of men,
And coupled with them, and begat a race."

The use made of the legend in some modern poems cannot sufficiently be reprobated.

We need hardly say how closely allied this is to the Greek legends which connected the ἄγρια φύλα γιγάντων with the gods (Hom. Od. vii. 205; Pausan. viii. 29), and made δαίμονες sons of the gods (Plat. Apolog. ἡμίθεοι; Cratyl. § 32). Indeed the whole heathen tradition resembles the one before us (Cumberland's Synchroniatho, p. 24; Hom. Od. xi. 306 sq.; Hes. Theog. 185, Opp. et D. 144; Plat. Rep. ii. § 17, 604 E; de Legg. iii. § 16, 805 A; Ovid, Metam. i. 151; Luc. iv. 593; Lucian, de Deâ Syr., &c.; cp. Grot. de Ver. i. 6); and the Greek translators of the Bible make the resemblance still more close by introducing such words as θεόμαχοι, γηγενεῖς, and even Τίτῆνες, to which last Josephus (l. c.) expressly compares the giants of Genesis (LXX. Prov. ii. 18; Ps. xviii. 2; 2 Sam. v. 18; Judith xvi. 5). The fate too of these demon-chiefs is identical with that of heathen story (Job xxvii. 5; Sir. xvi. 7; Bar. iii. 26–28; Wisd. xiv. 6; 3 Macc. ii. 4; 1 Pet. iii. 19).

These legends may therefore be regarded as distortions of the Biblical narrative, handed down by tradition, and embellished by the fancy and imagination of Eastern nations. The belief of the Jews in later times is remarkably illustrated by the story of Amodeus in the book of Tobit. It is deeply instructive to observe how wide and marked a contrast there is between the incidental allusion of the sacred narrative (Gen. vi. 4) and the minute frivolities or prurient follies which degrade the heathen mythology, and repeatedly appear in the groundless imaginings of the Rabbinic interpreters. If there were fallen angels whose lawless desires gave birth to a monstrous progeny, both they and their intolerable offspring (it is implied) were destroyed by the Deluge, which was the retribution on their wickedness, and they have no existence in the baptized and renovated earth.

Before passing to the other giant-races we may observe that all nations have had a dim fancy that the aborigines who preceded them, and the earliest men generally were of immense stature. Berossus says that the ten antediluvian kings of Chaldea were giants, and we find in all monkish historians a similar statement about the earliest possessors of Britain (cp. Hom. Od. x. 119; Aug. de Civ. Dei. xv. 9; Plin. vii. 16; Varr. ap. Aul. Gell. iii. 10; Jer. on Matt. xxvii.). The great size decreased gradually after the Deluge (2 Ead. v. 52-55). That we are dwarfs compared to our ancestors was a common belief among the Latin and Greek poets (Il. v. 302 sq.; Lucret. ii. 1151; Virg. Æn. xii. 900; Juv. xv. 69), although it is now a matter of absolute certainty from the remains of antiquity, reaching back to the very earliest times, that in old days men were no taller than ourselves. On the origin of the mistaken supposition there are curious passages in Natalis Comes (Mytholog. vi. 21) and Macrobius (Saturn. i. 20).

The next race of giants which we find mentioned in Scripture is

3. THE REPHAIM, a name which frequently occurs, and in some remarkable passages. The earliest mention of them is the record of their defeat by Chedorloamer and some allied kings at Ashteroth Karnaim (Gen. xiv. 5). They are again mentioned (Gen. xv. 20), their dispersion recorded (Deut. ii. 10, 20), and Og the giant king of Bashan said to be "the only remnant of them" (Deut. iii. 11; Josh. xii. 4, xiii. 12, xvii. 15). Extirpated however from the east of Palestine, they long found a home in the west, and in connexion with the Philistines, under whose protection the small remnant of them may have lived, they still employed their arms against the Hebrews (2 Sam. xxi. 18 sq.; 1 Ch. xx. 4). In the latter passage there seems however to be some confusion between the Rephaim and the sons of a particular giant of Gath, named Rapha. Such a name may have been conjectured as that of a founder of the race, like the names Ion, Dorus, Teut, &c. (Boettcher, de Inferis. p. 96, n.; Rapha occurs also as a proper name, 1 Ch. vii. 25, viii. 2, 37). It is probable that they had possessed districts west of the Jordan in early times, since the "valley of Rephaim" (κοιλὰς τῶν Τιτάνων, 2 Sam. v. 18, 1 Ch. xi. 15, Is. xvii. 5; κ. τῶν γιγάντων, Joseph. Ant. vii. 4, § 1), a rich valley S.W. of Jerusalem, derived its name from them.

That they were not Canaanites is clear from there being no allusion to them in Gen. x. 15-19. They were probably one of those aboriginal peoples to whose existence the traditions of many nations testify, and of whose genealogy the Bible gives us no information. The few names recorded have, as Ewald remarks, a Semitic aspect (Geschich. des Volkes Isr. i. 311); but from the hatred existing between them and both the Canaanites and Hebrews, some suppose them to be Japhethites, "who comprised especially the inhabitants of the coasts and islands" (Kalisch on Gen. p. 351. Cp. Dillmann* in loco).

𐤓𐤓𐤓 is rendered by the Greek Versions very variously (Ραφαῖμ, γίγαντες, γιγανεύς, θεόμαχοι, Τιτάνες, and ἰατροί; Vulg. Medici; LXX. Ps. lxxxvii. 10; Is. xxvi. 14, where it is confused with 𐤓𐤓𐤓; cp. Gen. i. 2, and sometimes νεκροί, τεθνηκότες, especially in the later Versions). In A. V. the words used for it are "Rephaim," "giants," and "the dead." That it has the latter meaning in many passages is certain (Ps. lxxxviii. 10; Prov. ii. 18, ix. 18, xxi. 16; Is. xxvi. 19, 14). The question arises, how are these meanings to be reconciled? Gesenius gives no derivation for the national name, and derives "𐤓 = mortui, from 𐤓𐤓, sanavit, and the proper name Rapha from an Arabic root signifying "tall," thus seeming to sever all connexion between the meanings of the word, which is surely most unlikely. Masius, Simonis, &c., suppose the second meaning to come from the fact that both spectres and giants strike terror (accepting the derivation from 𐤓𐤓, remisit, "unstrung with fear," R. Bechai on Deut. ii.); Vitranga and Hiller from the notion of length involved in stretching out a corpse, or from the fancy that spirits appear in more than human size (Hiller, Syntag. Herm. p. 205; Virg. Æn. ii. 772, &c.). J. D. Michaelis (ad Lowth, De sacr. poesi Hebr. p. 466) endeavoured to prove that the Rephaim, &c., were Troglodytes, and that hence they came to be identified with the dead. Passing over other conjectures, Boettcher sees in 𐤓𐤓 and 𐤓𐤓 a double root, and thinks that the giants were called 𐤓𐤓𐤓 (linguefacti) by an euphemism; and that the dead were so called by a title which will thus exactly parallel the Greek καμόντες, κεκμηκότες (cp. Buttmann, Lezil. ii. 237 sq.). His arguments are too elaborate to quote (but see Boettcher, pp. 94-100). An attentive consideration seems to leave little room for doubt that the dead were called Rephaim (as Gesenius also hints) from some notion of Sheol being the residence of the fallen spirits or buried giants. The passages which seem most strongly to prove this are Prov. xxi. 16 (where obviously something more than mere physical death is meant, since that is the common lot of all); Is. xvi. 14, 19, verses difficult to explain without some such supposition; Is. xiv. 9, where the word 𐤓𐤓𐤓 (οἱ ἄφραγτες τῆς γῆς, LXX.), if taken in its literal meaning of goats, may mean evil spirits represented in that form (cp. Lev. xvii. 7); and especially Job xxvi. 5, 6, "Behold the gyantes (A. V. 'dead things') grown under the waters" (Douay Version), where there seems to be clear allusion to some subaqueous prison of rebellious spirits, like that in which (according to the Hindoo legend) Vishnu, the water god, confines a race of giants (cp. πυλάρχος, as a title of Neptune, Hes. Theog. 732; Nork, Brammin. und Rabb. p. 319 sq.). [OG; GOLIATH.]

Branches of this great unknown people were called Emim, Anakim, and Zuzim.

4. EMIM (𐤓𐤓𐤓; LXX. Ὀμμίν, Ἴμμαίοι), smitten by Chedorloamer at Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen. xiv. 5), and occupying the country afterwards held by the Moabites (Deut. ii. 10), who gave them the name 𐤓𐤓𐤓, "terrors." The word rendered "tall" may perhaps be merely "haughty" (ισχύοντες). [EMIM.]

5. ANAKIM (𐤓𐤓𐤓). The imbecile terror of the spies exaggerated their proportions into something superhuman (Num. xiii. 28, 33), and their name became proverbial (Deut. ii. 10; ix. 2). [ANAKIM.]

6. ZUZIM (𐤓𐤓𐤓), whose principal town was Ham (Gen. xiv. 5), and who lived between the Arnon and the Jabbok, being a northern tribe of Rephaim. The Ammonites, who defeated them, called them 𐤓𐤓𐤓 (Deut. ii. 20 sq., which is however probably an early gloss).

We have now examined the main names applied to giant-races in the Bible, but except in the case of the first two (Nephilim and Gibborim) there is no necessity to suppose that there was anything very remarkable in the stature of these nations, beyond the general fact of their being finely proportioned. Nothing can be built on the exaggeration of the spies (Num. xiii. 33); and Og, Goliath, Ishbi-benob, &c. (see under the names themselves), are obviously mentioned as exceptional cases. The Jews, however (misled by supposed relics), thought otherwise (Joseph. Ant. v. 2, § 3).

No one has yet proved by experience the possibility of giant races, materially exceeding in size the average height of man. There is no great variation in the ordinary standard. The most stunted tribes of Esquimaux are at least four feet high, and the tallest races of America (e.g. the Guayaquilists and people of Paraguay) do not exceed six feet and a half. It was long thought that the Patagonians were men of enormous stature, and the assertions of the old voyagers on the point were positive. For instance, Pigafetta (Voyage Round the World, Pinkerton, xi. 314) mentions an individual Patagonian so tall, that they "hardly reached to his waist." Similar exaggerations are found in the Voyages of Byron, Wallis, Carteret, Cook, and Forster; but it is now a matter of certainty from the recent visits to Patagonia (by Winter, Capt. Snow, &c.), that there is nothing at all extraordinary in their height.

The general belief (until very recent times) in the existence of fabulously enormous men, arose from fancied giant-graves (see De la Valle's Travels in Persia, ii. 89), and above all from the discovery of huge bones, which were taken for those of men, in days when comparative anatomy was unknown. Even the ancient Jews were thus misled (Joseph. Ant. v. 2, § 3). Augustine appeals triumphantly to this argument, and mentions a molar tooth which he had seen at Utica a hundred times larger than ordinary teeth (de Civ. Dei, xv. 9). No doubt it once belonged to an elephant. Vives, in his commentary on the place, mentions a tooth as big as a fist which was shown at St. Christopher's. In fact this source of delusion has only been dispelled in modern times (Sennert, de Gigant. passim; Martin's West. Islands, in Pinkerton, ii. 691). Most bones which have been exhibited have turned out to belong to whales or elephants, as was the case with the vertebra of a supposed giant, examined by Sir Hans Sloane in Oxfordshire.

On the other hand, isolated instances of monstrosity are sufficiently attested to prove that beings like Goliath and his kinsmen may have existed. Columella (R. R. iii. 8, § 2) mentions Navius Pollio as one, and Pliny says that in the time of Claudius Caesar there was an Arab named Gabbaras, nearly ten feet high, and that even he was not so tall as Pusio and Secundilla in the reign of Augustus, whose bodies were preserved (vii. 16). Josephus tells us that, among other hostages, Artabanus sent to Tiberius a certain Eleazar, a Jew, surnamed "the Giant," seven cubits in height (Ant. xviii. 4, § 5). Nor are well-authenticated instances wanting in modern times. O'Brien, whose skeleton is preserved in the Museum of the Coll. of Surgeons, must have been eight feet high, but his unnatural height made him weakly. On the other hand, the blacksmith Parsons, in Charles II.'s reign, was seven feet two inches high, and also remarkable for his strength (Fuller's Worthies, Staffordshire).

GIANTS, VALLEY OF THE (Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16). [REPHAIM, VALLEY OF.]

GIB'BAR (גִּבְבָּר; B. Ταβέρ, A. Γαβέρ; Gōd-bar), Bene-Gibbar, to the number of ninety-five, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 20). In the parallel list of Nehemiah (vii. 25) the name is given as GIBEON.

GIB'BETHON (גִּבְתֹּן = a height; B. Βεγεθών, Γεθεδών, A. Γαβαθών, Γαβεθών; Gabathon), a town allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), and afterwards given with its "suburbs" to the Kohathite Levites (xxi. 23). Being, like most of the towns of Dan, either in or close to the Philistines' country, it was no doubt soon taken possession of by them; at any rate they held it in the early days of the monarchy of Israel, when king Nadab "and all Israel," and after him Omri, besieged it (1 K. xv. 27; xvi. 15, 17). What were the special advantages of situation or otherwise which rendered it so desirable as a possession for Israel are not apparent. In the Onomasticon (*OS.*² p. 255, 52) it is quoted as a small village (πολιχνη) called Gabe, in the 17th mile from Caesarea. This must, however, be wrong, as the territory of Dan did not extend northwards beyond the Wady Kanah. Conder has suggested Kibbiéh, to the S.W. of Tibneh, as a possible identification (PEF. Mem. ii. 297).

GIB'EA (גִּבְעָה = a hill; B. Γαββά, A. Γαββα; Gabaa). Sheva, "the father of Macbenah" and "father of Gibe," is mentioned with other names, unmistakably those of places and not persons, among the descendants of Judah (1 Ch. ii. 49; cp. v. 42). This would seem to point out Gibeah (which in some Hebrew MSS. is Gibeah; see Burrington, i. 216) as the city GIBEAH in Judah. The mention of Madmannah (v. 49; cp. Josh. xv. 31), as well as of Ziph (v. 42) and Maon (v. 45), seems to carry us to a locality considerably south of Hebron. [GIBEAH, I.] On the other hand, Madmannah recalls Madmenah, a town named in connexion with Gibeah of Benjamin (Is. i.

31), and therefore lying somewhere north of Jerusalem.

GIB'EAH (גִּבְעָה), derived according to Gesenius [Theo. pp. 259, 260] from a root, גִּבַּע, signifying to be round or humped: cp. the Latin gibbus, Eng. gibbous; the Arabic جبل, jebel, a mountain, and the German Gipfel. A word employed in the Bible to denote a "hill"—that is, an eminence of less considerable height and extent than a "mountain," the term for which is הר, har. For the distinction between the two terms, see Ps. cxlviii. 9; Prov. viii. 25; Is. ii. 2, xl. 4, &c. In the Historical Books gibeah is commonly applied to the bald rounded hills of Central Palestine, especially in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (Stanley, App. § 25). Like most words of this kind, it gave its name to several towns and places in Palestine—which would doubtless be generally on or near a hill. They are—

1. GIBEAH (Γαβὰ; Gabaa), a city in the mountain-district of Judah, named between Cain and Timnah, and in the same group as Maon and the Southern Carmel (Josh. xv. 57; and cp. 1 Ch. ii. 49, &c.). Robinson (ii. 6, 16), Tobler (Dritte Wanderung, p. 157), and Conder (PEF. Mem. iii. 25) suggest its identification with Jeb'a, about 7 miles W.S.W. of Bethlehem. This place is apparently the village named Gabatha, which is mentioned in the Onomasticon (*OS.*² p. 255, 67) as containing the monument of Habakkuk the prophet, and lying 12 miles from Eleuthero-polis. It cannot therefore be the place intended in Joshua, since that would appear to have been to the S.E. of Hebron, near where Carmel and Maon are still existing. The site is therefore yet to seek (cp. Dillmann² on Josh. i. c.).

2. GIBEATH (גִּבְעָת; LXX., see below; Gabaath). This is enumerated among the last group of the towns of Benjamin, next to Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 28). It is sometimes taken to be the place which afterwards became so notorious as "Gibeah-of-Benjamin" or "of-Saul." But this, as we shall presently see, was about 4 miles north of Jerusalem, near Gibeon and Ramah, with which, in that case, it would have been mentioned in v. 25. The name being in the "construct state"—Gibeath and not Gibeah—may it not belong to the following name Kirjath, and denote the hill adjoining that town, or, according to Schwarz (pp. 102, 103), the title of one place, "Gibeath-Kirjath"? The obvious objection to this proposal is the statement of the number of this group of towns as fourteen, but this is not a serious objection, as in these catalogues discrepancies not unfrequently occur between the numbers of the towns, and that stated as the sum of the enumeration (cp. Josh. xv. 32, 36; xix. 6, &c.). In this very list there is reason to believe that Zelah and ha-Eleph are not separate names, but one. The lists of Joshua, though in the main coeval with the division of the country, must have been often added to and altered before they became finally fixed as we now possess them.* It is possible that Kirjath may be identical with Kirjath-jearim, and that the latter part of the name has been omitted by copyists at some very early period. Such an omission is apparently indicated by the readings of the LXX. (B. Γαβαθηαρεμ; A. Γαβαθ και πόλις Ιαρμ) and some Hebrew MSS. [KIRJATH]. In this case Gibeath might denote the hill on which the Ark rested in the time of Saul (see below, No. 3). The objection to this view is that Kirjath-jearim is enumerated as a city of Judah (Josh. xv. 60). Major Conder (PEF. Mem. iii. 43) proposes to place Gibeath at Jib'a, 3 miles north of Kuryet el-'Enab, which he identifies with Kirjath. A more likely site would be Kh. el-Jubeiah, to the right of the road from Kuryet el-'Enab to Jerusalem, and near Kustul. Sepp (ii. 11) identifies Gibeath with Gibeah of Benjamin; and Riehm (s. v. Gibeā, 3) and Dillmann² incline to the same view.

3. (גִּבְעָת); B. ἐν τῷ βουνῷ, A. ἐν βουνῷ; in Gabaa.) The place in which the Ark remained from the time of its return by the Philistines till its removal by David (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; cp. 1 Sam. vii. 1, 2). The name has the definite article, and in 1 Sam. vii. 1 it is translated "the hill." (See No. 2 above.)

4. GIBEAH-OF-BENJAMIN. This town does not appear in the lists of the cities of Benjamin in Josh. xviii. (1.) We first encounter it in the tragical story of the Levite and his concubine, when it brought all but extermination on the tribe (Judg. xix. xx.). It was then a "city" (רֶשֶׁת), with the usual open street (רֹחַב) or square (Judg. xix. 15, 17, 20), and containing 700 "chosen men" (xx. 15), probably the same whose skill as slingers is preserved in the next verse. Thanks to the precision of the narrative, we can gather some general knowledge of the position of Gibeah. The Levite and his party left Bethlehem in the "afternoon"—when the day was coming near the time at which the tents would be pitched for evening. It was probably between 2 and 3 o'clock. At the ordinary speed of Eastern travellers they would come "over against Jebus" in two hours, say by 5 o'clock, and the same length of time would take them an equal distance, or about 4 miles, to the north of the city on the Nāblus road, in the direction of Mount Ephraim (xi. 13, cp. 1). The Levite proposed to lodge at Ramah or Gibeah; the latter being apparently the nearest to Jerusalem; and when the sudden sunset of that climate, unaccompanied by more than a very brief twilight, made further progress impossible, they "turned aside" from the beaten track to the town where one of the party was to meet a dreadful death (Judg. xix. 9-15). Later indications of the story seem to show that a little north of the town the main track divided into two—one, the present Nāblus road, leading up to Bethel, the "house of God," and the other taking to Gibeah-in-the-field (xx. 31), possibly the present Jeb'a. Below the city probably—about the base of the hill which gave its name to the town—was the "cave" of Gibeah," in

* For instance, Beth-marcaboth, "house of charlots," and Hazar-susah, "village of horses" (Josh. xix. 5), would seem to date from the time of Solomon, when the traffic in these articles began with Egypt.

ᵇ מַעְרָה, A. V. "meadows of Gibeah," taking the word as Ma'arah, an open field (Stanley, App. § 19); the LXX. transfers the Hebrew word literally, Μαπααυαβέ; the Syriac has ܡܟܘܘܢܐ = cave. The Hebrew word for cave, Me'arah, differs from that which the liers in wait concealed themselves until the signal was given* (xx. 33).

During this narrative the name is given simply as "Gibeah," with a few exceptions; at its introduction it is called "Gibeah which belongeth to Benjamin" (xix. 14, and so in xx. 4). In xx. 10 we have the expression "Gibeah of Benjamin," but here the Hebrew is not Gibeah, but Geba—גֵּבָא. The same form of the word is found in xx. 33, where the meadows, or cave, "of Gibeah" should be "of Geba." Josephus, in describing the route of the Levite, apparently makes Gibeah (Γαβὰ) 20 stadia from Jerusalem (Ant. v. 2, § 8); but too much reliance should not be made on this statement, for he gives, at the same time, the distance from Bethlehem to Jerusalem as 30 instead of 40 stadia.

The natural inference from the above story is, that Gibeah and Ramah were not far from the road leading northwards from Jerusalem, and some 4 or 5 miles from that place. The site of Ramah, er-Râm, about 5½ miles from Jerusalem and ½ mile east of the road, is well known; and Gibeah must be looked for somewhat nearer to Jerusalem—perhaps at Kh. Râs et-Tawîl (PEF. Mem. iii. 124) or Tell el-Fûl (iii. 158), which are respectively 4 miles and 3 miles from Jerusalem, and ¾ mile and ½ mile east of the road. The suggestion that Jeb'a, Geba, 6½ miles from Jerusalem and 2½ miles east of the road, is the Gibeah referred to is untenable, though it may be intended in Judg. xx. 33. Jerome (Ep. S. Paulæ, vi.) apparently places Gibeah on the direct road from Gibeon to Jerusalem.

(2.) We next meet with Gibeah of Benjamin during the Philistine wars of Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam. xiii. xiv.). It now bears its full title. The position of matters seems to have been this:—The Philistines were in possession of the village of Geba, the present Jeb'a on the south side of the Wady Suweinit. In their front, across the wady, which is here about a mile wide, and divided by several swells lower than the side eminences, was Saul in the town of Michmash, the modern Mukhmâs, and holding also "Mount Bethel;" that is, the heights on the north of the great wady—Deir Dican, Burkah, et-Tell, as far as Baitin itself. South of the Philistine camp, and between 2 and 3 miles to its rear, was Jonathan, in Gibeah-of-Benjamin, with a thousand chosen warriors (xiii. 2). The first step was taken by Jonathan, who drove out the Philistines from Geba, by a feat of arms which at once procured him an immense reputation. But in the meantime it increased the difficulties of Israel, for the Philistines (hearing of their reverse) gathered in prodigious strength, and, advancing with an enormous armament, pushed Saul's little force before them out of Bethel and Michmash, and down the Eastern passes to Gilgal, near Jericho in the Jordan valley (xiii.

adopted in the A. V. only in the vowel-points; and there seems a certain consistency in an ambush concealing themselves in a cave, which in an open field would be impossible. On the other hand, the expression "round about" in v. 29 seems inconsistent with the theory of a cave; and more suitable to an ambush concealed in standing corn, or by inequalities in the ground. The R. V. reads "Maareh-geba" in the text, and "the meadow of Geba" in the margin.

* Josephus, Ant. v. 2, § 11.

4, 7). They then established themselves in Michmash, formerly the head-quarters of the Philistines, north, west, and east (v. 17, 18). If; nothing could dislodge Jonathan from his main stronghold in the south. As far as we can disentangle the complexities of the story, he soon relinquished Geba, and retired with his little force to Gibeah, where he was joined by his father,⁴ with Samuel the prophet and Ahiah the priest, who, perhaps remembering the former fate of the Ark, had brought down the sacred Ephod* from Shiloh. These three had made their way up from Gilgal, with a force sorely diminished by desertion to the Philistine camp (xiv. 21) and flight (xiii. 7)—a mere remnant (κατάλειμμα) of the people following in the rear of the little band (LXX.). Then occurred the feat of the hero and his armour-bearer. In the stillness and darkness of the night they descended the hill of Gibeah, crossed the intervening country to the steep terraced slope of Jeb'a, and threading the mazes of the ravine below climbed the opposite hill, and discovered themselves to the garrison of the Philistines just as the day was breaking.⁵

No one had been aware of their departure, but it was not long unknown. Saul's watchmen in Gibeah were straining their eyes to catch a glimpse in the early morning of the position of the foe; and as the first rays of the rising sun on their right broke over the mountains of Gilead, and glittered on the rocky heights of Michmash, their practised eyes quickly discovered the unusual stir in the camp; they could see "the multitude melting away, and beating down one another." The muster-roll was hastily called to discover the absentees. The oracle of God was consulted, but so rapidly did the tumult increase that Saul's impatience would not permit the rites to be completed, and soon he and Ahiah (xiv. 36) were rushing down from Gibeah at the head of their hungry warriors, joined at every step by some of the wretched Hebrews from their hiding-places in the clefts and holes of the Benjaminite hills, eager for revenge, and for the recovery of the "sheep, and oxen, and calves" (xiv. 32), equally with the arms, of which they had been lately plundered. So quickly did the news run through the district that—if we may accept the statements of the LXX.—by the time Saul reached the Philistine camp his following amounted to 10,000 men: on every one of the heights (βαμῶθ) of the country the people rose against the hated invaders, and before the day was out there was not a city even of Mount Ephraim to which the struggle had not spread. [JONATHAN.]

⁵ 1 Sam. xiv. 3. In v. 18 the Ark is said to have been at Gibeah; but this is in direct contradiction to the statement of vii. 1, compared with 2 Sam. vi. 3, 4, and 1 Ch. xiii. 3; and also to those of the LXX. and Josephus at this place. The Hebrew words for Ark and ephod—אֲרוֹן and אֵפֹד—are not very dissimilar, and may have been mistaken for one another (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 46, note; Stanley, p. 205).

The only indications of position in the above narrative are that Gibeah and Geba were distinct places (xiii. 2, 3; xiv. 2, 5, in R. V.), and that Saul's watchmen in Gibeah could see the commotion in the Philistine army at Michmash. If Gibeah of Benjamin were in the position suggested in (1), it must have been between 4 and 5 miles from Michmash,—a distance at which it would be difficult, though not perhaps impossible, with the assistance of the rays of the rising sun, for a trained eye to distinguish an unusual movement in a large army. May we not, however, suppose that the watchmen were the usual outposts or scouts, 2 or 3 miles in front of Gibeah; and that they kept up communication with Saul by means of swift "runners"? In this case there would be no difficulty in placing Gibeah at or near Tell el-Fül. The actual distances from Mukhmás are, Jeb'a, 2 miles; Kh. Rás et-Tauil, 4 miles; and Tell el-Fül, 5 miles. Josephus (Ant. vi. 6, §§ 1-3) does not distinguish between Gibeah and Geba.

(3.) As "Gibeah of Benjamin," this place is referred to in 2 Sam. xxiii. 29 (cp. 1 Ch. xi. 31), and as "Gibeah" it is mentioned by Hosea (v. 8; ix. 9; x. 9), but it does not again appear in the history. It is, however, almost without doubt identical with

5. GIBEAH-OF SAUL (גִּבְעַת שָׁאֻל); the LXX. do not recognise this name except in 2 Sam. xxi. 6, where they have Γαβαῖν Σαούλα, Gabaath Saulis, and Is. x. 29, πόλις Σαούλα, elsewhere simply Γαβαῖα or Α. Γαβαθά. This is not mentioned as Saul's city till after his anointing (1 Sam. x. 26), when he is said to have gone "home" (Hebr. "to his house," as in xv. 34) to Gibeah, ("to which," adds Josephus (Ant. vi. 4, § 6), "he belonged." In the subsequent narrative the town bears its full name (xi. 4), and the king is living there, still following the avocations of a simple farmer, when his relations of Jabesh-Gilead beseech his help in their danger. His Ammonite expedition is followed by the first Philistine war, and by various other conflicts, amongst others an expedition against Amalek in the extreme south of Palestine. But he returns, as before, "to his house" at Gibeah-of-Saul (1 Sam. xv. 34). Again we meet with it, when the seven sons of the king were hung there as a sacrifice to turn away the anger of Jehovah (2 Sam. xxi. 6*). The name of Saul has not been found in connexion with any place of modern Palestine, but it existed as late as the days of Josephus, and an allusion of his has fortunately given a clue to the position of the town. Josephus (B. J. v. 2, § 1), describing Titus's march from Caesarea to Jerusalem, gives his route as through Samaria to Gophna, thence a day's march (usually 10 miles) to a valley "called by the Jews the Valley of Thorns, near a certain village called Gabathsaulé (Γαβαθασαούλη), distant from Jerusalem about 30 stadia." Here he was joined during the night (§ 3) by the legion from Emmaus (Nicopolis), which would naturally come up the road by Beth-horon and Gibeon, the same that still falls into the road from Gophna to Jerusalem about half a mile north of Tell el-Fül. The junction of the two roads is exactly 10 Roman miles from Jufna, Gophna, and 30 stadia from Jerusalem; and it is just the position that an army advancing on Jerusalem and expecting reinforcements by the Beth-horon road might be expected to take up. Hereabouts then must have been the "Valley of Thorns," perhaps W. ed-Dumm, west of the road, or W. el-Háfí, to the east of it; and "Gabathsaulé," which may have been either Tell el-Fül or Kh. Rás et-Tauil, respectively 25 and 32 stadia from Jerusalem. The agreement between the positions of Gibeah of Benjamin and Gibeah of Saul is complete, and there seems every reason to suppose that the two places are identical.

The position assigned to Gibeah, as also the identification of Geba with Jeb'a, is fully supported by Is. x. 28-32, where we have a specification of the route of Sennacherib from the north through the villages of the Benjamite district to Jerusalem. Commencing with Ai, to the east of the present Beitin, the route proceeds by Mukhmás across the "passages" of the Wády Succinit to Jeb'a on the opposite side; and then by er-Rám and Tell el-Fül, villages actually on the present road, to the heights north of Jerusalem, from which the city is visible. Gallim, Madmenah, and Gebim, none of which have been yet identified, must have been, like Anathoth (Andáta), villages on one side or the other of the direct line of march. The only break in the chain is Migron, which is here placed between Ai and Michmash, while in 1 Sam. xiv. 2 it appears to have been 5 or 6 miles south, at Gibeah. One explanation that presents itself is, that in that uneven and rocky district the name "Migron" ("precipice") would very probably, like "Gibeah," be borne by more than one town or spot. [MIGRON.]

In 1 Sam. xxii. 6, xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1, "Gibeah" doubtless stands for G. of Saul.

Dr. Robinson (i. 577-79) was the first to identify Gibeah of Benjamin, or of Saul, with Tell el-Fül, though it was partly suggested by a writer in Stud. u. Kritiken. He has been followed by Stanley, Tristram, Porter, Geikie, Sepp, Riehm, and Baedeker-Socin. On the other hand, Knobel, Thénien, Manchot in Schenkel's Bib. Lex., Schwarz, and Conder identify Gibeah with Geba, Jeb'a. Conder argues, from Judg. xx. 31, 1 Sam. xiv. 2, xxii. 6, that Gibeah was a district having Geba as a capital (PEFQy. Stat. 1877, pp. 104, 105; 1881, p. 89). It seems clear, however, especially from Is. x. 29, that they were distinct places. Birch (PEFQy. Stat. 1882) suggests Kh. Adaseh, 2 miles E. of El-Jib, Gibeon, as a site for Gibeah, but this place is apparently ADASA.

6. GIBEAH-IN-THE FIELD (גִּבְעַת בְּשָׂדֵה; Γαβαῖα ἐν ἀγρῶ; Gabaá), named only in Judg. xx. 31, as the place to which one of the "highways" (תְּרֵזֶן) led from Gibeah-of-Benjamin,

* This is a fair inference from the fact that the wives of 400 out of the 600 Benjamites who escaped the massacre at Gibeah came from Jabesh-Gilead (Judg. xxi. 12).

† The word in this verse rendered "hill" is not gibeah but har, i.e. "mountain" (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Samueel, in loco).

† The words in 1 Sam. xxii. 6 may either be translated "in Gibeah, under the tamarisk tree on the height," as in R. V. marg., or it may imply that Ramah was included within the precincts of the king's city. [RAMAH.]

—“of which one goeth up to Bethel, and one to Gibeath-in-the-field.” Sadeh, the word here rendered “field,” is applied specially to cultivated ground, “as distinguished from town, desert, or garden” (Stanley, App. § 15). Cultivation was so general throughout this district, that the term affords no clue to the situation of the place. It is, however, remarkable that the north road from Jerusalem, shortly after passing Tell el-Fül, separates into two branches, one running on to Beitfn (Bethel), and the other diverging to the right to Jeb'a (Geba). The attack on Gibeah came from the north (cp. xx. 18, 19, and 26, in which “the house of God” is really Bethel), and therefore the divergence of the roads was north of the town. In the case of Gibeah-of-Benjamin we have seen that the two forms “Geba” and “Gibeah” appear to be convertible, the former for the latter. If the identification now proposed for Gibeah-in-the-field be correct, the case is here reversed—and “Gibeah” is put for “Geba.”

The “meadows of Gaba” (גִּבְעָה; A. V. Gibeah, R. V. Geba; Judg. xx. 33) have no connexion with the “field,” the Hebrew words being entirely different. As stated above, the word rendered “meadows” is probably accurately “cave.” [Geba, p. 1177, n. b.]

7. There are several other names compounded of Gibeah, which are given in a translated form in the A. V., probably from their appearing not to belong to towns. These are:—

(1.) The “hill of the foreskins,” R. V. marg. Gibeath ha-araloth (Josh. v. 3), between the Jordan and Jericho; it derives its name from the circumcision which took place there, and seems afterwards to have received the name of GILGAL.

(2.) The “hill of Phinehas,” R. V. marg. Gibeah of Phinehas, in Mount Ephraim (Josh. xxiv. 33). Schwarz (H. L. p. 118), who is followed by Sepp (ii. 53) and Conder (PEF. Mem. ii. 288), identifies it with 'Auertah, near Nâblus, where the tombs of Phinehas and Eleazar are shown. Guérin (Judée, iii. 37) and Riehm (s. v.) place it at Jibia, 3 miles north of Kuryet el-Enab.

(3.) The hill of Moreh (Judg. vii. 1).

(4.) The hill of God—Gibeath ha-Elohim (1 Sam. x. 5); one of the places in the route of Saul, which is so difficult to trace. In rv. 10 and 13, it is apparently called “the hill” and “the high place.”

(5.) The hill of Hachilah (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1).

(6.) The hill of Ammah (2 Sam. ii. 24).

(7.) The hill Gareb (Jer. xxxi. 39).

In addition to those enumerated above, Josephus (B. J. iii. 3, § 1) mentions a Gibeah as adjoining Carmel, and as having the sobriquet “city of horsemen” (Γαβὰ ἵππων πόλις), because it was the residence of certain horsemen dismissed by Herod. This place is now called Jeb'a (PEF. Mem. ii. 42). [G.] [W.]

GIBEATH, Josh. xviii. 28. [GIBEAH, 2.]

GIBEATHITE, THE (גִּבְעָתִיתִי; ὁ Γαβαθῖτος; Gabaathites), i.e. the native of Gibeah (1 Ch. xii. 3); in this case Shemaah, or “the Shemaah,” father of two Benjamites, “Saul’s brethren,” who joined David.

GIBEON (גִּבְעוֹן, i.e. “belonging to a hill;” Γαβαὼν, Joseph. Γαβαῖς; Gabaon), one of the four cities of the Hivites, the inhabitants of which made a league with Joshua (ix. 3–15), and thus escaped the fate of Jericho and Ai (cp. xi. 19). It appears, as might be inferred from its taking the initiative in this matter, to have been the largest of the four—“a great city, like one of the royal cities”—larger than Ai (x. 2). Its men too were all practised warriors (Gibborim, גִּבּוֹרִים). Gibeon lay within the territory of Benjamin (xviii. 25), and with its “suburbs” was allotted to the priests (xxi. 17), of whom it became afterwards a principal station. Occasional notices of its existence occur in the Historical Books, which are examined more at length below; and after the Captivity we find the “men of Gibeon” returning with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 25: in the list of Ezra the name is altered to Gibbar), and assisting Nehemiah in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 7). In the post-biblical times it was the scene of a victory by the Jews over the Roman troops under Cestius Gallus, which offers in many respects a close parallel to that of Joshua over the Canaanites (Joseph. B. J. ii. 19, § 7; Stanley, S. & P. p. 212).

The situation of Gibeon has fortunately been recovered with as great certainty as any ancient site in Palestine. The traveller who pursues the northern camel-road from Jerusalem, turning off to the left beyond Tell el-Fül, on that branch of it which leads westward to Jaffa, finds himself, after crossing one or two stony and barren ridges, in a district of a more open character. The hills are rounder and more isolated than those through which he has been passing, and rise in well-defined mamelons from broad undulating valleys of tolerable extent and fertile soil. This is the central plateau of the country, the “land of Benjamin;” and these round hills are the Gibeahs, Gebas, Gibeons, and Ramahs, whose names occur so frequently in the records of this district. Retaining its ancient name almost intact, el-Jib stands on the northernmost of a couple of these mamelons, just at the place where the road to the sea parts into two branches, the one by the lower level of the Wady Suleiman, the other by the heights of the Beth-horons, to Gimzo, Lydda, and Joppa. The road passes at a short distance to the north of the base of the hill of el-Jib. The strata of the hills in this district lie much more horizontally than those further south. With the hills of Gibeon this is peculiarly the case, and it imparts a remarkable precision to their appearance, especially when viewed from a height such as the neighbouring eminence of Neby Samuil. The natural terraces are carried round the hill like contour lines; they are all dotted thick with olives and vines, and the ancient-looking houses are scattered over the flatish summit of the mound. On the east side of the hill is a copious spring, which issues in a cave excavated in the limestone rock, so as to form a large reservoir, whence a rock-hewn passage led to the surface of the hill above (PEFQy. Stat. 1890, p. 23). In the trees farther down are the remains of a pool or tank of considerable size; probably, says Dr. Robinson, 120 feet by 100, i.e. of rather smaller dimensions than the lower pool at Hebron. This is doubtless the "pool of Gibeon" at which Abner and Joab met together with the troops of Ishbosheth and David, and where that sharp conflict took place which ended in the death of Asahel, and led at a later period to the treacherous murder of Abner himself. Here or at the spring were the "great waters (or the many waters, גְּבִעוֹן הַמַּיִם)" of Gibeon,"^b at which Johanan the son of Kareah found the traitor Ishmael (Jer. xli. 12). Round this water also, according to the notice of Josephus (ἐπὶ τῆσι πηγῇ τῆς πόλεως οὐκ ἔπαυθεν, Ant. v. 1, § 17), the five kings of the Amorites were encamped when Joshua burst upon them from Gilgal. The "wilderness of Gibeon" (2 Sam. ii. 24)—the Midbar, i.e. rather the waste pasture-grounds—must have been to the east, beyond the circle or suburb of cultivated fields, and towards the neighbouring swells, which bear the names of Jedireh and Bir Nebala. Such is the situation of Gibeon, fulfilling in position every requirement of the notices of the Bible, Josephus, Eusebius, and Jerome. Its distance from Jerusalem by the main road is as nearly as possible 6½ miles; but there is a more direct road reducing it to 5 miles.

(1.) The name of Gibeon is most familiar to us in connexion with the artifices by which its inhabitants obtained their safety at the hands of Joshua, and with the memorable battle which ultimately resulted therefrom. This transaction is elsewhere examined, and therefore requires no further reference here. [JOSHUA; BETH-HORON.]

(2.) We next hear of it at the encounter between the men of David and of Ishbosheth under their respective leaders, Joab and Abner (2 Sam. ii. 12-17). The meeting has all the air of having been premeditated by both parties, unless we suppose that Joab had heard of the intention of the Benjamites to revisit from the distant Mahanaim their native villages, and had seized the opportunity to try his strength with Abner. The details of this disastrous encounter are elsewhere given. [JOAB.] The place where the struggle began received a name from the circumstance, and seems to have been long afterwards known as the "field of the strong men." [HELKATH-HAZZURIM.]

(3.) We again meet with Gibeon in connexion with Joab; this time as the scene of the cruel and revolting death of Amasa by his hand (2 Sam. xx. 5-10). Joab was in pursuit of the rebellious Sheba the son of Bichri, and his being so far out of the direct north road as Gibeon may be accounted for by supposing that he was making a search for this Benjamite among the towns of his tribe. The two rivals met at "the great stone which is in Gibeon"—some old landmark now no longer recognisable, at least not recognised—and then Joab repeated the treachery by which he had murdered Abner, but with circumstances of a still more revolting character. [JOAB.]

It is remarkable that the retribution for this crowning act of perfidy should have overtaken Joab close to the very spot on which it had been committed. For it was to the Tabernacle at Gibeon (1 K. ii. 28, 29; cp. 1 Ch. xvi. 39) that Joab fled for sanctuary when his death was pronounced by Solomon, and it was while clinging to the horns of the brazen Altar there that he received his deathblow from Benaiah the son of Jehoiada (1 K. ii. 28, 30, 34; and LXX. v. 29).

(4.) Familiar as these events in connexion with the history of Gibeon are to us, its reputation in Israel was due to a very different circumstance—the fact that the Tabernacle of the congregation and the brazen Altar of burnt-offering were for some time located on the "high place" attached to or near the town. We are not informed whether this "high place" had any fame for sanctity before the Tabernacle came there; but if not, it would have probably been erected elsewhere. We only hear of it in connexion with the Tabernacle, nor is there any indication of its situation in regard to the town. Dean Stanley has suggested that it was the remarkable hill of Nebv Samwell, the most prominent and individual eminence in that part of the country, and to which the special appellation of "the great high-place" (1 K. iii. 4; גְּבִעוֹן הַגָּדוֹל)

וְהַגָּדוֹל) would perfectly apply. And certainly, if "great" is to be understood as referring to height or size, there is no other hill which can so justly claim the distinction (Sinai and Pal. p. 216). But the word has not always that meaning, and may equally imply eminence in other respects, e.g. superior sanctity to the numerous other high places—Bethel, Ramah, Mizpeh, and Gibeah—which surrounded it on every side. The main objection to this identification is the distance of Nebv Samwell from Gibeon—more than a mile—and the absence of any closer connexion therewith than with any other of the neighbouring places. The most natural position for the high place of Gibeon is the twin mount immediately south of el-Tib—so close as to be all but a part of the town, and yet quite separate and distinct. The testimony of Epiphanius, by which Dean Stanley supports his conjecture, viz. that the "Mount of Gabaon" was the highest round Jerusalem (Adv. Haereses, i. 394), should be received with caution, standing as it does quite alone, and belonging to an age which, though early, was marked by ignorance, and by the most improbable conclusions.

To this high place, wherever situated, the "Tabernacle of the congregation"—the sacred tent which had accompanied the children of Israel through the whole of their wanderings—had been transferred from its last station at Nob.^o The exact date of the transfer is left in uncertainty. It was either before or at the time when David brought up the Ark from Kir-

^o The various stations of the Tabernacle and the Ark, from their entry on the Promised Land to their final deposition in the Temple at Jerusalem, will be examined under TABERNACLE. Meantime, with reference to the above, it may be said that though not expressly stated to have been at Nob, it may be conclusively inferred from the mention of the "shewbread" (1 Sam. xxi. 6). The "ephod" (v. 9) and the expression "before Jehovah" (v. 6) prove nothing either way. Josephus throws no light on it.

^b Both here and in 1 K. iii. 4, Josephus substitutes Hebron for Gibeon (Ant. x. 9, § 6; viii. 2, § 1).

jath-jearim, to the new tent which he had pitched for it on Mount Zion, that the original tent was spread for the last time at Gibeon. The expression in 2 Ch. i. 5, "the brazen Altar he put before the Tabernacle of Jehovah," at first sight appears to refer to David. But the text of the passage is disputed, and the authorities are divided between $\text{D}\bar{\text{E}}$ = "he put," and $\text{D}\bar{\text{W}}$ = "was there" (R. V.). Whether king David transferred the Tabernacle to Gibeon or not, he certainly appointed the staff of priests to offer the daily sacrifices there on the brazen Altar of Moses, and to fulfil the other requirements of the Law (1 Ch. xvi. 40), with no less a person at their head than Zadok the priest (v. 39), assisted by the famous musicians Heman and Jeduthun (v. 41).

One of the earliest acts of Solomon's reign—it must have been while the remembrance of the execution of Joab was still fresh—was to visit Gibeon. The ceremonial was truly magnificent: he went up with all the congregation, the great officers of state—the captains of hundreds and thousands, the judges, the governors, and the chief of the fathers—and the sacrifice consisted of a thousand burnt-offerings (1 K. iii. 4). And this glimpse of Gibeon in all the splendour of its greatest prosperity—the smoke of the thousand animals rising from the venerable altar on the commanding height of "the great high place"—the clang of "trumpets and cymbals and musical instruments of God" (1 Ch. xvi. 42) resounding through the valleys far and near—is virtually the last we have of it. In a few years the Temple at Jerusalem was completed, and then the Tabernacle was once more taken down and removed. Again "all the men of Israel assembled themselves" to king Solomon, with the "elders of Israel," and the priests and the Levites brought up both the Tabernacle and the Ark, and "all the holy vessels that were in the Tabernacle" (1 K. viii. 3; Joseph. Ant. viii. 4, § 1), and placed the venerable relics in their new home, there to remain until the plunder of the city by Nebuchadnezzar. The introduction of the name of Gibeon in 1 Ch. ix. 35, which seems so abrupt, is probably due to the fact that the preceding verses of the chapter contain, as they appear to do, a list of the staff attached to the "Tabernacle of the congregation" which was erected there; or if these persons should prove to be the attendants on the "new tent" which David had pitched for the Ark on its arrival in the city of David, the transition to the place where the old tent was still standing is both natural and easy. For the present state of Gibeon, see PEF. Mem. iii. 10, 94, and Guérin, Judée, i. 385-391 [G.] [W.]

GIBEONITES, THE ($\text{D}\bar{\text{W}}\text{D}\bar{\text{W}}\text{D}\bar{\text{W}}$; oi Gabaeonitai; Gabaonitae), the people of Gibeon, and perhaps also of the three cities associated with Gibeon (Josh. ix. 17)—Hivites; and who, on the discovery of the stratagem by which they had obtained the protection of the Israelites, were condemned to be perpetual bondmen, hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the house of God and Altar of Jehovah (Josh. ix. 23, 27). Saul appears to have broken this covenant, and in a fit of enthusiasm or patriotism to have killed some and devised a general massacre of the rest (2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, 5). This was expiated many years after by giving up seven men of Saul's descendants to the Gibeonites, who hung them or crucified them "before Jehovah"—as a kind of sacrifice—in Gibeah, Saul's own town (v. 4, 6, 9). At this time, or at any rate at the time of the composition of the narrative, the Gibeonites were so identified with Israel, that the historian is obliged to insert a note explaining their origin and their non-Israelite extraction (xxi. 2). The actual name "Gibeonites" appears only in this passage of 2 Sam. [NETHINIM.]

Individual Gibeonites named are (1) ISMAIAH, one of the Benjamites who joined David in his difficulties (1 Ch. xii. 4); (2) MELATIAH, one of those who assisted Nehemiah in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 7); (3) HANANIAH, the son of Azur, a false prophet from Gibeon, who opposed Jeremiah, and shortly afterwards died (Jer. xxviii. 1, 10, 13, 17). [G.] [W.]

The Gibleites are again named (though not in the A. V.) in 1 K. v. 18 ($\text{D}\bar{\text{W}}\bar{\text{B}}\bar{\text{L}}\bar{\text{T}}$; B. om., A. of $\text{B}\bar{\text{i}}\bar{\text{B}}\bar{\text{L}}\bar{\text{i}}\bar{\text{o}}$; Biblii), as assisting Solomon's builders and Hiram's builders to prepare the trees and the stones for building the Temple. That they were clever artificers is evident from this passage (cp. Ezek. xxvii. 9); but why the A. V. should have rendered the word "stone-squarers" is not obvious. Possibly they followed the Targum, which has a word of similar import in this place. R. V. correctly translates Gebalites. [G.] [W.]

of Solomon" who returned to Judaea in the same caravan (Exra ii. 56, B. Γεδθά, A. Γεδθάλ; Neh. vii. 58, B. Γεδθά, A. Γεδθάλ). In 1 Esd. v. 32 this is given as ISDAEL.

GIDEON (גִּדְעוֹן, Ges. = a hever, i.e. a brave warrior; cp. Is. x. 33: Γεδέων; Gedeon), a Manassite, youngest son of Joash of the Abiezrites, an undistinguished family who lived at Ophrah (LXX. v. 11, Ἐφραθᾶ), which was probably a town of Manasseh not far from Shechem (Judg. vi. 15), although its exact position is unknown. He was the fifth recorded Judge of Israel, and for many reasons the greatest of them all. When we first hear of him he was grown up and had sons (Judg. vi. 11, viii. 20), and from the apostrophe of the Angel (vi. 12) we may conclude that he had already distinguished himself in war against the roving bands of nomadic robbers who had oppressed Israel for seven years, and whose countless multitudes (compared to locusts from their terrible devastations, vi. 5) annually destroyed all the produce of Canaan, except such as could be concealed in mountain fastnesses (vi. 2). It was probably during this disastrous period that the emigration of Elimelech took place (Ruth i. 1, 2). Some have identified the Angel who appeared to Gideon (φάσμα νεανίσκου μορφῆς, Jos. Ant. v. 6) with the prophet mentioned in vi. 8, which will remind the reader of the legends about Malachi in Origen and other commentators. Paulus (Exeg. Conserv. ii. 190 sq.) endeavours to give the narrative a subjective colouring, but rationalism is of little value in accounts like this. When the Angel appeared, Gideon was thrashing wheat with a flail (ἐκάρτε, LXX.) in the wine-press, to conceal it from the predatory tyrants. After a natural hesitation he accepted the commission to be a deliverer, and learnt the true character of his visitant from a miraculous sign (vi. 12-23); and, being reassured from the fear which first seized him (Ex. xx. 19; Judg. xiii. 22), he built the altar Jehovah-shalom, which existed when the Book of Judges was written (vi. 24). In a dream the same night he was ordered to throw down the altar of Baal and cut down the Asherah (A. V. "grove") upon it [ASHERAH], with the wood of which he was to offer in sacrifice his father's "second bullock of seven years old," an expression in which some see an allusion to the seven years of servitude (vi. 25; cp. v. 1). Perhaps that particular bullock is specified because it had been reserved by his father to sacrifice to Baal (Rosenmüller, Schol. ad loc.), for Joash seems to have been a priest of that worship. Bertheau can hardly be right in supposing that Gideon was to offer two bullocks (Richt. p. 115). At any rate the minute touch is valuable as an indication of truth in the story (see Ewald, Gesch. ii. 498, and note). Gideon, assisted by ten faithful servants, obeyed the vision, and next morning ran the risk of being stoned; but Joash appeased the popular indignation by using the common argument that Baal was capable of defending his own majesty (cp. 1 K. xviii. 27). This circumstance gave to Gideon the surname pressive of Baal's impotence. Winer thinks that this irony was increased by the fact that גִּדְעוֹן (see MV.¹¹) was a surname of the Phœnician Hercules (cp. Movers, Phœniz. i. 434). We have similar cases of contempt in the names Sychar, Baal-zebul, &c. (Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. xii. 24). In consequence of this name some have identified Gideon with a certain priest Ἰερὸμβαλος, mentioned in Eusebius (Praep. Evang. i. 10) as having given much accurate information to Sanchoniatho the Berytian (Bochart, Phaleg, p. 776; Huetius, Dem. Evang. p. 84, &c.), but this opinion cannot be maintained (Ewald, Gesch. ii. p. 494; Gesen. s. v.). We also find the name in the form Jerubbesheth (2 Sam. xi. 21. Cp. Eabbaal, 1 Ch. viii. 33, with Ishbosheth, 2 Sam. ii. sq.). Ewald (p. 495, n.) brings forward several arguments against the supposed origin of the name.

2. After this begins the second act of Gideon's life. "Clothed" by the Spirit of God (Judg. vi. 34; cp. 1 Ch. xii. 18; Luke xiv. 49), he blew a trumpet; and, joined by "Zebulun, Naphtali, and even the reluctant Asher" (which tribes were chiefly endangered by the Midianites), and possibly also by some of the original inhabitants, who would suffer from these predatory "sons of the East" no less than the Israelites themselves, he encamped on the slopes of Gilboa, from which he overlooked the plains of Eadraelon covered by the tents of Midian (Stanley, Sin. & Pal. p. 243). Strengthened by a double sign from God (to which Ewald gives a strange figurative meaning, Gesch. ii. p. 500), he reduced his army of thirty-two thousand by the usual proclamation (Deut. xx. 8; cp. 1 Macc. iii. 56). The expression "let him depart from Mount Gilead" is perplexing (R. V. marg. renders go round about); Dathé would render it "to Mount Gilead,"—on the other side of Jordan; and Clericus reads גִּבְעָה, Gilboa; but Ewald is probably right in regarding the name as a sort of war-cry and general designation of the Manassites (see too Gesen. Thez. p. 804, n.). By a second test at "the spring of trembling" (now probably 'Ain Jalkood, on which see Stanley, p. 342), he again reduced the number of his followers to three hundred (Judg. vii. 5 sq.), whom Josephus explains to have been the most cowardly in the army (Ant. v. 6, § 3). Finally, being encouraged by words fortuitously overheard (what the later Jews termed the Bath Kol; cp. 1 Sam. xiv. 9, 10; Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr. ad Matt. iii. 14), in the relation of a significant dream, he framed his plans, which were admirably adapted to strike a panic terror into the huge and undisciplined nomad host (Judg. viii. 15-18). We know from history that large and irregular Oriental armies are especially liable to sudden outbursts of uncontrollable terror; and when the stillness and darkness of the night were suddenly disturbed in three different directions by the flash of torches and by the reverberating echoes which the trumpets and the shouting woke among the hills, we cannot be astonished at the complete rout into which the enemy were thrown. It must be remembered too that the sound of three hundred trumpets would make them suppose that a corresponding number of companies were attacking them.* For specimens of similar stratagems, see Liv. xxii. 16; Polyæn. Strateg. ii. 37; Frontin. ii. 4; Sall. Jug. 99; Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, p. 304; Journ. As. 1841, ii. 516 (quoted by Ewald, Rosenmüller, and Winer). The custom of dividing an army into three seems to have been common (1 Sam. xi. 11; Gen. xiv. 15), and Gideon's war-cry is not unlike that adopted by Cyrus (Xen. Cyr. iii. 28). He adds his own name to the war-cry, as suited both to inspire confidence in his followers and strike terror in the enemy. His stratagem was eminently successful, and the Midianites, breaking out into their wild peculiar cries, fled headlong "down the descent to the Jordan," to the "house of the Acacia" (Beth-shitta) and the "meadow of the dance" (Abel-meholah), but were intercepted by the Ephraimites (to whom notice had been sent, vii. 24) at the fords of Beth-barah, where, after a second fight, the princes Oreb and Zeeb ("the Raven" and "the Wolf") were detected and slain,—the former at a rock, and the latter concealed in a wine-press, to which their names were afterwards given. Meanwhile the "higher sheykhs, Zeba and Zal-munna, had already escaped," and Gideon (after pacifying—by a soft answer, which became proverbial—the haughty tribe of Ephraim, viii. 1-3) pursued them into eastern Manasseh, and, bursting upon them in their fancied security among the tents of their Bedouin countrymen [see KARKOR], won his third victory, and avenged on the Midianitish emirs the massacre of his kingly brethren whom they had slain at Tabor (viii. 18 sq.). In these three battles only fifteen thousand out of one hundred and twenty thousand Midianites escaped alive. It is indeed stated in Judg. viii. 10, that one hundred and twenty thousand Midianites had already fallen: but here, as elsewhere, it may merely be intended that such was the original number of the routed host. During his triumphal return Gideon took signal and appropriate vengeance on the coward and apostate towns of Succoth and Peniel. The memory of this splendid deliverance took deep root in the national traditions (1 Sam. xii. 11; Pa. lxxxiii. 11; Is. ix. 4, x. 26; Heb. xi. 32).

3. After this there was a peace of forty years, and we see Gideon in peaceful possession of his well-earned honours, and surrounded by the dignity of a numerous household (viii. 29-31). It is not improbable that, like Saul, he had owed a part of his popularity to his princely appearance (Judg. viii. 18). In this third stage of his life occur alike his most noble and his most questionable acts, viz. the refusal of the monarchy on theocratic grounds, and the irregular consecration of a jewelled ephod, formed out of the rich spoils of Midian, which proved to the Israelites a temptation to idolatry, although it was doubtless intended for use in the worship of Jehovah. Gesenius and others (Theo. p. 135;

* It is curious to find "lamps and pitchers" in use for a similar purpose at this very day in the streets of Cairo. The Zabit or Agha of the police carries with him at night, "a torch which burns soon after it is lighted, without a flame, excepting when it is waved through the air, when it suddenly blazes forth: it therefore answers the same purpose as our dark lantern. The burning end is sometimes concealed in a small pot or jar, or covered with something else, when not required to give light" (Lane's Mod. Eg. i. ch. iv.).

Bertheau, p. 133 sq.) follow the Peshitto in making the word Ephod here mean an idol, chiefly on account of the vast amount of gold (1700 shekels) and other rich material appropriated to it. But it is simpler to understand it as a significant symbol of an unauthorised worship.

Respecting the chronology of this period, little certainty can be obtained. Making full allowance for the use of round numbers, and even admitting the improbable assertion of some of the Rabbis that the period of oppression is counted in the years of rest (c. Rosenmüller on Judg. iii. 11), insuperable difficulties remain. If, however, as has been suggested by Lord A. Hervey, several of the judgements really synchronise instead of being successive, much of the confusion vanishes. For instance, he supposes (from a comparison of Judg. iii., viii., and xii.) that there was a combined movement under three great chiefs, Ehud, Gideon, and Jephthah, by which the Israelites emancipated themselves from the dominion of the Moabites, Ammonites, and Midianites (who for some years had occupied their land), and enjoyed a long term of peace through all their coasts. "If," he says, "we string together the different accounts of the different parts of Israel which are given us in that miscellaneous collection of ancient records called the Book of Judges, and treat them as connected and successive history, we shall fall into as great a chronological error as if we treated in the same manner the histories of Mercia, Kent, Essex, Wessex, and Northumberland, before England became one kingdom" (Genealog. of our Lord, p. 238). It is now well known that a similar source of error has long existed in the chronology of Egypt.

GIDEONI (גִּדְוֹנִי), or once גִּדְוֹנִי; B. [usually] Γαδεωνι, AF. [usually] Γαδεωνι; Ge-deonis). Abidan, son of Gideon, was the chief man of the tribe of Benjamin at the time of the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 11; ii. 22; vii. 60, 65; x. 24).

GID'OM (גִּדְוֹם; Γεδών, A. Γαλαδ), a place named only in Judg. xx. 45, as the limit to which the pursuit of Benjamin extended after the final battle of Gibeah. It would appear to have been situated between Gibeah (Tell el-Fûl) and the cliff Rimmon (probably Rummon, about 3 miles E. of Bethel); but no trace of the name, nor yet of that of Menuchah, if indeed that was a place (Judg. xx. 43; A. V. "with ease." R. V. "at their resting place"—but see margin), has yet been met with. The reading of A., "Gilead," can hardly be taken as well founded. In the Vulgate the word does not seem to be represented. [G.] [W.]

GIER EAGLE. The rendering in A. V. of גִּרְעָם, rāchām, גִּרְעָמָה, rāchāmāh, in Lev. xi. 18 and Deut. xiv. 17, the only passages where the name occurs: Arab. رَحْمَة, racham, rachamah; R. V. "vulture." All authorities are unanimous in identifying rāchām with the well-known Egyptian vulture, or "Pharaoh's hen," as it is often called in the East, Neo- phron percnopterus (L.). The Revisers' translation is undoubtedly preferable to that of the A. V. But it is unfortunate that the name "vulture" is applied in our language to birds so widely different in appearance and character as the Griffon and the Neophron. The LXX. in Leviticus give κόβνος, "swan;" and in Deut. πορφύρεον, "purple water-hen," Porphyrio caceruleus. Vand., in which they are followed by the Vulgate. But both of these seem to be mere random guesses of writers who had no knowledge of the subject, and have no justification, etymological or other. The name gier-eagle is a compound of the German word for vulture, Geier, and eagle; than which a more inappropriate name could hardly be found for the un-eaglelike Neophron. This bird holds an important place in the Arab pharmacopœia, and is also the subject of many wonderful tales. In spite of its repulsive habits—for it feeds exclusively on putrid carrion and ordure—or perhaps because of its consequent value as a scavenger, it is greatly respected by all Orientals: its Turkish name is Ach bobba, "white father," in respectful allusion to its white plumage. Everywhere in the East it is protected. Though more abundant in tropical countries than elsewhere, its range is very extended. In Africa it is found from the Cape to Morocco and Egypt, and through Southern Europe and the warmer parts of Asia to Ceylon. (The Indian bird has however been distinguished as Neophron ginginianus, Lath., but the differences are very ing the village dunhills with perfect unconcern. Excepting over a carcass, rarely more than two are ever seen together. The Egyptian vulture does not acquire its adult plumage until it is two years old. The young bird has a dappled brown plumage, and in this plumage it has been captured in England.

The Revisers, while substituting "vulture" for "gier eagle," as the translation of râchân, have unfortunately transferred this latter word to דַּרְפֵּן, peres, the "lammergeyer" of naturalists, the "ossifrage" of the A. V. [H. B. T.]

GIFT. The giving and receiving of presents has in all ages been not only a more frequent, but also a more formal and significant proceeding in the East than among ourselves. It enters largely into the ordinary transactions of life: no negotiation, alliance, or contract of any kind can be entered into between states or sovereigns without a previous interchange of presents: none of the important events of private life—betrothal, marriage, coming of age, birth—take place without presents: even a visit, if of a formal nature, must be prefaced by a present. We cannot adduce a more remarkable proof of the important part which presents play in the social life of the East, than the fact, that the Hebrew language possesses no less than fifteen different expressions for the one idea. Many of these expressions have specific meanings: for instance, minchah (מִנְחָה) applies to a present from an inferior to a superior, as from subjects to a king (Judg. iii. 15; 1 K. x. 25; 2 Ch. xvii. 5): mas'eth (מַסֵּעַת) expresses the converse idea of a present from a superior to an inferior, as from a king to his subjects (Esth. ii. 18); hence it is used of a portion of food sent by the master of the house to guests whom he wishes to honour (Gen. xliii. 34; 2 Sam. xi. 8): nisseth (נִשֵּׁת) has very much the same sense (2 Sam. xix. 42): beracah (בְּרָכָה), literally a "blessing," is used where the present is one of a complimentary nature, either accompanied with good wishes, or given as a token of affection (Gen. xxxiii. 11; Judg. i. 15; 1 Sam. xxv. 27, xxx. 26; 2 K. v. 15); and again, shochad (שׂוֹחָד) is a gift for the purpose of escaping punishment, presented either to a judge (Ex. xxiii. 8; Deut. x. 17) or to a conqueror (2 K. xvi. 8). Other terms, as mattan (מָתַן), were used more generally. The extent to which the custom prevailed admits of some explanation from the peculiar usages of the East: it is clear that the term "gift" is frequently used where we should substitute "tribute," or "fee." The tribute of subject states was paid not in a fixed sum of money, but in kind, each nation presenting its particular product—a custom which is frequently illustrated in the sculptures of Assyria and Egypt; hence the numerous instances in which the present was no voluntary act, but an exaction (Judg. iii. 15–18; 2 Sam. viii. 2, 6; 1 K. iv. 21; 2 K. xvii. 3; 2 Ch. xvii. 11, xxvi. 8); and hence the expression "to bring presents" = to own submission (Ps. lxxviii. 29, lxxvi. 11; Is. xviii. 7). Again, the present taken to a prophet was viewed very much in the light of a consulting "fee," and conveyed no idea of bribery (1 Sam. ix. 7, cp. xii. 3; 2 K. v. 5, viii. 9): it minute.) It is a handsome bird on the wing, with white body and tail and black pinions. It respectfully follows but never consorts with the noble griffons, and is often seen high up in the air, sailing below them. Its long, feeble, and slightly curved bill, and its weak feet and claws, separate it widely from the true vultures, eagles, and all other birds of prey, with which it is never classed by the Orientals. In Palestine it is only a summer visitant, arriving from the south in April, and remaining till October. It is scattered everywhere in pairs over the country, nesting low down in the cliffs, and heaping up in some conspicuous spot an enormous structure of sticks, turf, bones, rags, pieces of sheepskin, and whatever else the neighbourhood of a village may supply. It is fearless, and from long experience seems to have confidence in man, visit-was only when false prophets and corrupt judges arose that the present was prostituted, and became, instead of a minchah (as in the instances quoted), a shochad, or bribe (Is. i. 23, v. 23; Ezek. xxii. 12; Micah iii. 11). But even allowing for these cases, which are hardly "gifts" in our sense of the term, there is still a large excess remaining in the practice of the East: friends brought presents to friends on any joyful occasion (Esth. ix. 19, 22), those who asked for information or advice to those who gave it (2 K. viii. 8), the needy to the wealthy from whom any assistance was expected (Gen. xliii. 11; 2 K. xv. 19, xvi. 8), rulers to their favourites (Gen. xlv. 22; 2 Sam. xi. 8), especially to their officers (Esth. ii. 18; Joseph. Ant. xii. 2, § 15), or to the people generally on festive occasions (2 Sam. vi. 19). On the occasion of a marriage, the bridegroom not only paid the parents for his bride (A. V. and R. V. "dowry"), but also gave the bride certain presents (Gen. xxxiv. 12; cp. Gen. xxiv. 22), while the father of the bride gave her a present on sending her away, as is expressed in the term shilluchim (שִׁלּוּחִים, 1 K. ix. 16): and again, the portions of the sons of concubines were paid in the form of presents (Gen. xxv. 6).

The nature of the presents was as various as were the occasions: food (1 Sam. ix. 7, xvi. 20, xxv. 18), sheep and cattle (Gen. xxxii. 13-15; Judg. xv. 1), gold (2 Sam. xviii. 11; Job xlii. 11; Matt. ii. 11), jewels (Gen. xxiv. 53), furniture and vessels for eating and drinking (2 Sam. xvii. 28); delicacies, such as spices, honey, &c. (Gen. xxiv. 53; 1 K. x. 25, xiv. 3); and robes (1 K. x. 25; 2 K. v. 22), particularly in the case of persons inducted into high office (Esth. vi. 8; Dan. v. 16; cp. Herod. iii. 20). The mode of presentation was with as much parade as possible; the presents were conveyed by the hands of servants (Judg. iii. 18), or still better on the backs of beasts of burden (2 K. viii. 9), even when such a mode of conveyance was unnecessary. The refusal of a present was regarded as a high indignity, and this constituted the aggravated insult noticed in Matt. xxii. 11, the marriage robe having been offered and refused (Trench, Notes on the Parables, in loco). No less an insult was it, not to bring a present when the position of the parties demanded it (1 Sam. x. 27). [W. L. B.]

G'IHON (גִּיחֹן; ADE. Γηών; Gehon). 1. The second river of Paradise (Gen. ii. 13). The name does not again occur in the Hebrew text of the O. T.; but in the LXX. it is used in Jer. ii. 18, as an equivalent for the word Shichor or Sihor, i.e. the Nile, and in Ecclus. xxiv. 27 (E. V. "Geon"). All that can be said upon it will be found under EDEN, p. 849.

2. (גִּיחֹן, and in Ch. גִּיחֹן; B. Γειών, A. Γιών; Gihon.) A place near Jerusalem, memorable as the scene of the anointing and proclamation of Solomon as king (1 K. i. 33, 38, 45). From the terms of this passage, it is evident that it was at a lower level than the city—"bring him down (וְהוֹרִדְתֶּם) upon (עַל) Gihon"—"they are come up (וַיַּעֲלֵה) from thence." With this agrees a later mention (2 Ch. xxxiii. 14; Γιδών), where it is called "Gihon-in-the-valley," the word rendered valley being nachal (נַחַל). In this latter place Gihon is named to designate the direction of the wall built by Manasseh—"without the city of David, on the west side of Gihon, in the valley, even to the entering in at the fish-gate." It is not stated in any of the above passages that Gihon was a spring; * but the only remaining place in which it is mentioned suggests this belief, or at least that it had given its name to some water—"Hezekiah also stopped the upper source or issue [נַחַל, from נָצַץ], to rush forth; incorrectly "watercourse" in A. V.] of the waters of Gihon" (2 Ch. xxxii. 30; A. Γιών, B. Ζειών). Josephus also writes (Ant. vii. 14, § 5) of "the fountain called Gihon."

The following facts may be noticed in regard to the occurrences of the word.

1. Its low level; as above stated.
2. The expression "Gihon-in-the-valley;" where it will be observed that nachal ("torrent" or "wady") is the word always employed for the valley of the Kedron, east of Jerusalem—the so-called Valley of Jehoshaphat; ge ("ravine" or "glen") being as constantly employed for the Valley of Hinnom. In this connexion the mention of Ophel (2 Ch. xxxiii. 14) with Gihon should not be disregarded.
3. The Targum of Jonathan, and the Syriac and Arabic Versions, have Shiloha, i.e. Siloam (Arab. Ain-Shiloha), for Gihon in 1 K. i.; so also Procop. Gaz. Scholca in 2 Par. xxxii. Γηών τὸν Σιλωάμ οὕτως καλεῖ. In Chronicles they agree with the Hebrew text in having Gihon. In the Mishnah (Pesachim iv. 9) Siloam is called Gihon, and a Christian tradition to the same effect is given by Theodoret as cited by Reland (Pal. p. 859). If Siloam be Gihon, then
4. The omission of Gihon from the very detailed catalogue of Neh. iv. is explained.

It is possible that two different places are intended by "Gihon" and "Gihon in the valley;"—the former being Siloam, or the end of the conduit which, before the construction of the rock-hewn tunnel, carried the waters of the Fountain of the Virgin to the lower Pool of Siloam, and "Gihon in the valley" the Fountain of the Virgin itself. This view agrees with the statements of Josephus that Adonijah's feast took place "near the fountain that was in the king's paradise" (Ant. vii. 14, § 4), that is, Enrogel or the Fountain of the Virgin; and (14, § 5) that Solomon was anointed at "the fountain called Gihon" (τὴν πηγὴν τὴν λεγομένην Γιών),—probably Siloam, which Josephus elsewhere (B. J. v. 4, §§ 1, 2; 9, § 4) calls a spring.

The position of the "upper spring of the waters of Gihon," which Hezekiah stopped and brought "straight down to (R. V. "on") the west side of the city of David," is one of the most difficult questions connected with the topography of Jerusalem. The most natural identification would be the Fountain of the Virgin,

* It has been suggested (Dr. Chaplin in PEPQy. Stat. 1890, p. 124) that the true derivation of Gihon is not גִּיחֹן, giah, "to burst forth," but גִּיחֹן, gahan, "to bow down," to prostrate oneself, and that the term was originally applied, not to the fountain, but to the canal which brought the water from the fountain.

in the Kedron valley; but the Siloam tunnel through which the waters of that spring flow down to the upper Pool of Siloam, near the southern extremity of the eastern hill, can scarcely be said to have conveyed them to or on the west side of the city of David. On the other hand, the description in 2 Ch. xxxii. 30 would apply perfectly to the waters of a spring, north of the Damascus Gate, carried southward by the very ancient conduit that entered the city near "the Quarries," and apparently followed the west face of the eastern hill upon which the city of David stood. There is, however, no known spring near the head of the valley that runs down through the centre of Jerusalem, and it is doubtful whether the aqueduct in question derived its supply from a spring or a reservoir. The conduit which appears to have connected the Birket Mamilla with the "Low Level Aqueduct" and the reservoirs in the Temple enclosure, might also be described as carrying water down "to" the west side of the city of David; but there is no trace or tradition of the existence of a spring near that pool. [JERUSALEM. Water Supply.]

The two pools Birket Mamilla and Birket es-Sultan, in the "valley of Hinnom," appear as the "Upper" and "Lower" Pools of Gihon in the map of Marino Sanuto (A.D. 1310), and these titles have been adopted by many succeeding writers, including Robinson, Tobler, and others in the present century. The valley of Hinnom appears to have been first called the "valley of Gihon" in the last century (A.D. 1738, Jonas Korte, Plan). In the 12th century, the "Hill of Evil Counsel," south of Jerusalem, was called "Mount Gihon," and regarded as the place at which Solomon was anointed king (John of Würzburg, xv.; William of Tyre, viii. 4; Thietmar, p. 19, &c.). In 1283, the hill N.W. of Jerusalem was called "Mount Gihon," according to Brocardus (viii. 9); and this tradition appears to have gradually replaced the older one, which had not quite died out in the 15th century (F. Fabri, i. 427).

The spring of Gihon is identified with the Fountain of the Virgin by Furrer, Riehm, Sepp, Bædeker-Socin, Conder, &c.; it is placed north of the Damascus Gate by Fergusson, Williams, Barclay, De Saulcy, &c.; and near the Birket Mamilla by Robinson, Thomson, Tobler, &c.

GILALAI (גִּלְאִי), probably = גִּלְיָאִי [Ges.]; A. Γελαΐ, Bk. omit; Galulai [v. 35], one of the party of priests' sons who played on David's instruments at the consecration of the wall of Jerusalem, in the company at whose head was Ezra (Neh. xii. 36).

GILBO'A (גִּלְבּוֹא', ? = the bubbling fountain, Ges.). The name of the mountain ridge which bounds the great plain of Lower Galilee [ESDRAELON] on the east. The name may be derived from the important spring, 'Ain Jâlûd, at the foot of the mountain to the north, or from one of the other springs which also rise from its lower slopes on the east, or from the spring well on the mount itself. The name survives at the village of Jelbôn (جلبون), on the southern part of the range. Here Saul encamped (1 Sam. xxviii. 4) near Jezreel, at the N.W. end of the range, opposite the Philistines at Shunem, and his defeat occurred on the mountain itself (ch. xxxi. 1, 8; 2 Sam. i. 6). In the "Song of the Bow" (2 Sam. i. 21) a curse is pronounced on the "mountains of Gilboa," that there should be "no dew nor rain upon you, nor fields for heave offerings," on account of Saul's death (cp. 2 Sam. xxi. 12, and 1 Ch. x. 1, 8). Josephus represents Saul as being hemmed in on the mountain (Ant. vi. 14, § 7), probably from the west; and escape down the rugged eastern slopes would have been very difficult. The site of the mountain and of the village (Γελοβοῦς, Gelbus) was known to Eusebius and Jerome (*OS.*² p. 256, 82; p. 161, 15) as 6 miles from Scythopolis (Beisân). Gilboa is not often mentioned by later writers, though its site was not forgotten. William of Tyre (xxii. 26) mentions it as having Jezreel to the west; and Marino Sanuto (14th cent.) gives it the same position. Among Jewish travellers Benjamin of Tudela (12th cent.) speaks of its barrenness, and says it was called Jelbôn by the Christians. Rabbi Uri of Biel, in the 16th century, says that dew and rain never fell there—clearly referring to the curse in the "Song of the Bow."

The Gilboa ridge runs north for 4½ miles from the saddle at Wâdy Shubâsh, which may be said to be its limit, passing Jelbôn, a small village west of the watershed. The highest point is at Sheikh Burkin, 1696 feet above the Mediterranean. Here the range curves round N.W., and runs to Jezreel (4 miles), where it abuts on the Plain of Esdraelon, and on the valley north of Jezreel. The elevation at El Mazâr, 2½ miles S.E. of Jezreel, is 1318 ft. above the sea, whence the shed falls rapidly, being only 400 feet above the sea at Jezreel itself. The great plain to the west has an average elevation of 300 feet above the Mediterranean, so that the apparent height of Gilboa from the west is about 1000 to 1400 feet. On the east it towers more than 2,000 feet above the Jordan valley. On the north it is precipitous, with curiously contorted strata. On the east the slopes are extremely steep, with cliffs in places. On the west the spurs run out with gentler slopes into the plain. The southern part is very rugged, of hard grey dolomitic limestone. This is, however, covered on the west and north by the soft white chalk, whence the name Râs Shebân, "the hoary head," applied to one of the knolls on the ridge. The range generally is now known as Jebel Fukû'a, from the large village of Fukû'n, which stands among its olives on the west slope, 1500 feet above the sea, where the range begins to curve. The mountain is barren and waterless on its upper slopes, but at Jelbôn there is a spring well of perennial water, whence perhaps the old name of Gilboa was derived. At the eastern foot there are fine springs at the ruin Mujedd'a, 125 feet below the Mediterranean; and further north, at about the same level, is 'Ain el 'Asy—a very large spring of thermal water (80° Fahr.) in a pool 100 yards long, 20 yards wide, and 20 feet deep, issuing from a low cliff. On the north there are two other famous springs, also 120 feet below sea-level, east of Jezreel, feeding the stream which flows east between them to the Jordan, and watering Bethshean. The southern, from a cave in the precipices of Gilboa, is called 'Ain Jalūd ("Goliath's Spring"), and in 300 A.D. the Bordeaux Pilgrim incorrectly makes it the scene of David's conquest of the giant. It is the 'Ain Jalūd of Boha ed Din (Life of Saladin). The pool is 50 yards long, muddy and sulphurous, but the spring itself is clear and sweet; the depth is 8 to 10 feet. The northern spring, 'Ain Tub'ain, is the Tubania of the Middle Ages (Will. of Tyre, xxii. 27), which Robinson confuses with the preceding. It was believed to have been miraculously supplied with fish for the benefit of the Christian army fighting Saladin. Both springs still contain fish. 'Ain Tub'ain is smaller than 'Ain Jalūd, and its waters have a reddish tinge.

The lower slopes of Gilboa to the west have several olive groves, and corn is grown in the soft ground. In the rougher part to the south a scrub of inastic, arbutus, dwarf oak, and hawthorn covers the rocks. The summit is very bare, but thyme, mint, and cistus grow on the ledges. The soil is in parts (especially to the north of Jelbón) a basaltic debris, which is fertile. The vine was once grown near Jezreel, as noticed in the Bible (1 K. xxi.) and as attested by the remains of rock-cut wine-presses. The contrast between the barren ridge and the rich valleys on each side is sufficiently notable.

Near the village of Deir Ghuzāleh, near the west foot of Gilboa, a curious rude stone monument was found in 1872, resembling the dolmens of Galilee and of Eastern Palestine. This is probably a relic of prehistoric times. There are nine villages on the slopes of Gilboa, namely: (1) Jelbón, on the south, as already noticed; (2) Fuk'á, possibly the Aphek to which the Philistines advanced (1 Sam. xxix. 1), turning Saul's strong position near the "fountain in Jezreel," which was no doubt the 'Ain el Meiyeteleh—a clear spring below the town; (3) El Masar (or El Wezr), a stone hamlet on the watershed inhabited by Dervishes; (4) Zer'in or JEZREEL; (5) Beit Kād, a small mud village 687 feet above the sea, on the west slopes; (6) Deir Ghuzāleh, a similar village 738 feet above the sea, further north; (7) Arrāneh, close to the plain, further north, probably the Reggan or Rangan which Josephus mentions (Ant. vi. 14, § 1), as the Philistine camp "near Shunem"; (8) Sundela, a still smaller hamlet higher up (502 feet above the sea); and (9) Nūris, a little hamlet hidden among the northern precipices, 600 feet above the valley. This last, in the Middle Ages, belonged to the Abbey of Mount Tabor. Several other villages are found in the rough country at the south end of the chain. With the exception of Jelbón and Jezreel they all depend on cisterns or deep wells for water. One of Jacob's sons is traditionally believed to be buried at el Mazār ("the place of pilgrimage").

The above sketch is abstracted from the writer's account of his explorations on the mountain in 1872-4 (PEF. Mem. vol. ii. sheet ix. pp. 75, 79-88, 90, 91). Mujeddá, as there explained, appears to be the probable site of Megiddo, at the foot of Gilboa towards the east. [C. R. C.]

GIL'EAD (גִּלְעָד; Γαλαάδ; modern Arabic جبل جلعاد, Jebel Jil'ad). The geographic name is written with the article in Hebrew; the personal name, and the patronymic גִּלְעָדִי, occur in Num. xxvi. 29, 30; Judg. xi. 1, 2, xii. 7; 1 Ch. v. 14. The meaning is "rugged," but in Gen. xxxi. 21 it is connected with GALEED

(גִּלְעָד, "mound of witness;" cp. Gesen. Lex.): the region east of the Jordan Valley, between the plains of Bashan and the deserts of Moab, coinciding with the territory of the tribe of Gad. The great gorge of the Hieromax (Yermák) is its natural boundary on the north; the plateau south of Rabbath Ammon appears to be its southern limit; on the east it extends to the Syrian desert, and on the west to the Jordan Valley. It is divided into two districts by the valley of the Jabbok (Zerká): the northern, comprising about 600 square miles, is the modern Jebel 'Ajlún; the southern, about 400 square miles in area, is now called the Belka or "waste" land. The name occurs very frequently in the Bible (more than eighty references are given) as Mount (גִּלְעָד) Gilead and land or country (גִּלְעָד) of Gilead, and sometimes as "The Gilead" only. It was famous as a pastoral region, and also as producing balm and other aromatic plants; and is one of the most picturesque and well-watered regions of the Hebrew land. The northern part still contains many villages, and is cultivated, but the southern is almost entirely in the possession of nomadic tribes, with very little cultivation and only one inhabited town (es-Salt), though corn is grown in the level tracts.

Mount Gilead is first noticed (Gen. xxxi. 21-25) as crossed by Jacob from Mizpeh (Sif) to Mahanaim (Mukmah). Thence came the Ishmaelites, bearing gums, balm, and cistus (Gen. xxxvii. 25). Jazer, on its border, and the "land of Gilead," were good pasture-lands (Num. xxxi. 1). It already was filled with cities which had belonged to the Amorites (cc. 26, 29, 31), whose cattle also fell a prey to the Hebrews (Deut. ii. 35, 36; cp. iii. 10). The Ammonites dwelt on the east side of Gilead, apparently as far north as the Jabbok (Deut. iii. 16). Ramoth in Gilead was a city of refuge (Deut. iv. 43). In Deut. xxxiv. 1 we find the words "all Gilead unto Dan," which are difficult to explain. According to the geographical chapters of the Book of Joshua (xii. 2) half Gilead, as far north as the Jabbok, belonged to Sihon the Amorite, whose capital was beyond its limits at Heshbon. The northern half was ruled by Og, whose capital was at Ashtaroth Carnaim (Tall Ashterah) in Bashan. It became the heritage of the tribe of Gad, though some of the families of Manasseh appear also to have held lands in its northern parts (Josh. xiii. 11). The border was at Jazer (c. 25), and Manasseh extended even as far south as Mahanaim (Mukmah) in Gilead (vv. 30, 31; cp. xvii. 5, 6). Ramoth, however, belonged to the tribal territory of Gad (xx. 8), and Mahanaim was a city of Gilead, also in the territory of Gad (xxi. 38). The tribes took possession after the conquest of Western Palestine (xxii. 9, 13, 15, 32), and in Judges (v. 17) Gilead appears to be synonymous with the Hebrews of the east. In Gilead were the Havoth Jair or "villages of Jair," the Gileadite judge (Judg. x. 4); but the Amorites still dwelt there (c. 8), and the Ammonites attacked the "princes of Gilead" (v. 17, 18). "Gilead begat Jephthah" "the Gileadite" (Judg. xi. 1), who fled to Tob (probably Taiyibeh) near Gadara, whence he was summoned to assist the "elders of Gilead" attacked on the south by the Ammonites (v. 5), meeting them at Mizpeh (Sáf), north of the scene of conflict (v. 10, 11), whence he advanced towards the Ammonite capital (v. 29), driving them south into Moab, and returning to his house at Mizpeh (v. 33, 34). The Aroer mentioned in this passage was apparently the place so named close to Rabbath-ammon. The concord between the Hebrews of the east and west was, according to this narrative, no longer maintained, and the men of Ephraim, raiding to the north-east, were caught at the upper fords of the Jordan in Northern Gilead (Judg. xii. 4, 5, 7); but subsequently the Gileadites are said to have joined the rest of Israel in worship at Mizpeh near Jerusalem (xx. 1). Gilead remained faithful to the house of Saul (2 Sam. ii. 9), but after the death of Ishbosheth accepted David's rule, when Rabbath-ammon had been conquered by Joab. Here David found a refuge at Mahanaim, and Absalom camped in Gilead (2 Sam. xvii. 26, 27) in the wood of Ephraim (xviii. 6), which was probably one of the oak woods south-west of es-Salt. Joab's census of David's dominions included Gilead (xxiv. 6), but did not apparently include Bashan [see GESHUR]. In the time of Solomon Gilead was divided into two provinces, of which the northern had its capital at Ramoth, and the southern at Mahanaim (1 K. iv. 13, 14, 19). From Tishbe in Gilead came Elijah (1 K. xvii. 1). In Ahab's reign the Syrian king of Damascus seized Ramoth-gilead, where Ahab met his death in attempting to regain the city (1 K. xxii.). All Gilead and Moab then passed into the power of the Syrians (2 K. x. 33), and in the 8th century B.C. Tiglath-pileser, the Assyrian monarch, conquered this region (2 K. xv. 29). The men of Gad had already been oppressed, in Omri's time, by Meshah king of Moab, as stated on the Moabite Stone. The number of cities possessed by Jair in Gilead is stated in 1 Ch. ii. 22 to have been twenty-three; "he expression "father of Gilead" (v. 21) may perhaps be taken as a territorial title, like others in the Bible.

The Assyrian tablets supply a gap in the history of Gilead after this period, for the region is not further noticed in the history of the later Hebrew kings. In the reign of Manasseh (see Cylinder A of Assur-bani-pal), about 650 B.C., there was a great inroad of Arab tribes from the south, joined by the Nabatheans near Petra. They conquered Edom, Moab, Beth-Ammon, the Hauran, and Zobah (near Damascus), and clearly therefore overran Gilead. Assur-bani-pal with his army set out from Nineveh, crossed the Tigris and the Euphrates, and advanced some 700 miles. They came to "the lofty country, they passed through the forests of which the shadow was great and strong, and with vines, a road of mighty woods." Thence they entered a desert, and, after punishing the Arabs who had fled back to the Nabatheans, they returned on the road to Damascus. This account would seem to apply to no other region than Gilead, which has always been celebrated for its forests. The petty kings of Moab, Ammon, and Gilead were at this time subject to Assyria, and with intervals of revolt remained so subject till the Babylonians and Persians succeeded to the power of the kings of Nineveh. The Hebrew population probably became much mingled with the other stocks, and some were carried captives even as early as the time of Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch. v. 6), as in the case of the Gileadite prince of the tribe of Reuben. The cattle of the Israelites multiplied, and were pastured in Gilead as far east as the "desert of Euphrates" (v. 9, 16), but the attacks of the Hagarites had commenced even in the time of Saul (v. 10), and the settled population suffered, as they still do, from the raids of the desert Arabs, to which the tribes west of Jordan were less exposed, after the establishment of the kingdom. Gilead was famous for its warriors in David's time (1 Ch. xxvi. 31), and is claimed as Hebrew territory in the Psalms (lx. 7, cviii. 8). The flocks of goats "couching on the slopes of Mount Gilead" are mentioned in the Song of Songs (iv. 1, vi. 5), as a simile of the colour of the hair of the Egyptian bride. Jeremiah (viii. 22) speaks of the medicinal balm of Gilead, already noticed in Genesis (cp. xxii. 6 and xlvi. 11): the Gileadites were apparently pagans in this later period (Jer. l. 19; Ezek. xlvii. 18; Hos. vi. 8, xii. 11). The Ammonite attacks are mentioned by Amos (i. 3, 13) as early as the 9th century B.C. In Obadiah (c. 19) Gilead is given to Benjamin. In Micah (vii. 14) its flocks are again mentioned. In Zechariah the return of Israel to Gilead is promised (x. 10). These various notices give a fairly continuous history of the region down to the Persian period, and show the pastoral character of the country, and also its settled condition at a very early period.

After the revolt of Judas Maccabaeus a successful raid was made into Gilead and Bashan, with the object however of gathering in the Jewish population to more secure regions west of Jordan (1 Macc. v. 9 sq.; Josephus, Ant. xiii. 14, § 2; Wars, i. 4, § 3). The Jews had fled before the heathen of Gilead, to Dathema, and were shut up in Gileadite cities (1 Macc. v. 27). Judas Maccabaeus, assisted by the Nabatheans (v. 25), attacked Bashan, but "turned aside" to Maspha—perhaps Mizpeh of Gilead—whither he took by assault (p. 35). After various successes he then returned with the Jews from the east (v. 45) to Bethshean and to Jerusalem. Gilead, though conquered by Alexander Jannaeus (1st cent. B.C.), was retaken by the king of Arabia (Ant. xiii. 14, § 2), after the expedition in which tribute had been for a time imposed (Wars, i. 4, § 3). In the time of Christ little is known of Gilead, but some of its northern towns belonged to the region of Decapolis. Vespasian sent Lucius Annius into this region, who took Gerasa [see GERASA] during the great war preceding the destruction of Jerusalem. The most prosperous age in the history of this region appears to have been the Antonine period (140–180 A.D.), when several Roman cities were built, such as Gadara, Capitolias, Gerasa, and Philadelphia; and though fresh Arab tribes colonised Gilead and Bashan soon after, the ruins of the country and the list of bishoprics show that this prosperity continued after the establishment of Christianity, and until the invasion of Gilead by the Moslems under Omar. The Crusaders also appear to have established themselves in this region, which paid tribute to Baldwin I. as early as A.D. 1118. Baldwin II in A.D. 1121 conquered it, and advanced beyond Gerasa towards Bostra. Two strongholds were built, one near Ajlûn in the northern district (called Kal'at er-Rabad), one in the south at es-Salt; and the pilgrim road to Mecca was commanded by these, and by the great castle of Kerak in Moab. The region was known as "Oultre Jourdan," and was attacked by Saladin on his way to Kerak. Since the fall of the Christian kingdom little is known of its history. Its population decayed, and the great Arab tribes became supreme, until within the last half-century, when they were reduced to pay taxes by the Turks. The inaccessibility of the position of Gilead, and its exposure to raids from the desert, remain its chief drawbacks, though the climate is healthy, the country fertile and picturesque, and better watered and wooded than the rest of Palestine.

The Gilead mountains are little more than the edge of the great eastern plateau which extends to the Euphrates. Viewed from the west, they form a chain rising more than 4,000 feet above the Jordan valley, with extremely steep slopes; viewed from the east, the highest tops are not more than about 500 feet above the level of the plateau, which may be said to have an average level of 3,000 feet above the Mediterranean towards the south, sinking northwards to the plains of Bashan about 1,000 feet lower. The highest point in Gilead is Jebel Osh'a, just north of es Salt, determined trigonometrically by the Palestine surveyors as 3,597 feet above the Mediterranean. Some of the ridges to the S.E. are nearly as high. Jebel Osh'a (the probable site of Penuel) commands one of the most extensive views in Palestine (see Conder's Heth and Moab, ch. vi.), and far wider than that, so celebrated, which may be commanded from Nebo in clear weather. East of this mountain is the circular basin of the Buke'a (on the west side of which stood Mahanaim), which is only 2,000 feet above the Mediterranean. North of the Jabbok the general elevation is less than on the south. Jebel Hakart, west of Reimûn (Ramoth-gilead), is estimated barometrically at 3,480 feet; and Jebel Kufhafah, further north, close to the great pilgrim road on the watershed—the true eastern limit of Gilead—is about 3,430 feet. A very fine view is obtained from Ka'at er Rabad on a conical point near Ajlûn, about 2,700 feet above the Mediterranean. Yet further north El Mazar stands up 2,830 feet, but the general elevation is not above 2,000 feet; and the Jordan valley is here only about 500 feet below the Mediterranean (except in the river-bed itself), so that the ascent is here reduced to 2,500 feet.

The geological formation is the same as that of Western Palestine, but the underlying sandstone, which does not appear west of Jordan, forms the base slopes of the chain of Moab and Gilead, and is traceable as far as the Jabbok. It is covered in part by the more recent white marls which form the curious peaks of the foot hills immediately above the Jordan valley; but reaches above them to an elevation of 1,000 feet above the Mediterranean on the south, and forms the bed of the Buke'a basin, further east and 1,000 feet higher. Above this lies the hard impervious Dolomitic limestone, which appears in the rugged grey hills round the Jabbok, and in Jebel Ajlûn, rising on an average 1500 feet above the sandstone, and forming the bed of the copious springs. It also dips towards the Jordan valley; and the water from the surface of the plateau, sinking down to the surface of this formation, bursts out of the hill-slopes on the west in perennial brooks. It was from the ruggedness of this hard limestone that Gilead obtained its name. Above this again is the white chalk of the desert plateau, the same found in Samaria and Lower Galilee, with bands of flint or chert in contorted layers, or strewn in pebbles on the surface. Where this formation is deep the country is bare and arid, supplied by cisterns and deep wells. Thus the plateau becomes desert, while the hill-slopes abound in streams and springs, and for this reason Western Gilead is a fertile country, and Eastern Gilead a wilderness.

The perennial streams are numerous. The main drains are the river Jabbok in the centre of the region, and the Hieromax in its deep gorge, with rugged precipices on the extreme north.

Here in 634 A.D. the Moslems won their great victory over the forces of the Romans, which left them the masters of Syria. The Jabbok, rising in the clear springs at Rabbath-ammon, but sinking at intervals in its bed of boulders, flows north at first; and turning suddenly west, reinforced from the great Zerka springs near the pilgrim road, it breaks down in an open and picturesque glen, flowing into the Jordan. The western valleys are clothed with thick woods of oak, and on the higher slopes the Aleppo pine is conspicuous. The glades of some of these valleys—such as Wady Hamûr, east of Ramoth-gilead, and Wady Sîr, which runs S.W. of Rabbath-ammon, by the ruined palace of Hyrcanus—present some of the most beautiful sylvan scenery in Syria, superior to that of the Lebanon. The rocky ground is covered with flowers, of which the phlox, cistus, and narcissus are the commonest, with bushes of styrax, hawthorn, mastic, and arbutus, the slopes hidden with hanging woods of oak. One such wood—perhaps the Wood of Ephraim—occurs south of es-Salt, and those of the Jebel Ajlûn are equally dense and beautiful. The rugged upper slopes are dotted with scrub, chiefly of mastic bushes. The desert plateau is diversified with clumps of the white broom (the juniper of the Bible): along the courses of the streams the dark oleander, with its flame-coloured blossoms, attains to the size of a small oak, and canes form a brake in the lower ground, where also the tamarisk and the lotus flourish, though the palm is rarely found. The region is still mainly pastoral, great flocks of goats being fed on the slopes, while the desert camels are driven in wild droves on the plateau, are used only for their milk (and on feast days for their flesh), and are never saddled or bridled. Here alone in Syria can the true nomad life of the Arab be studied, and even the settled population, in dress and manner, approach closely to the Bedu.

Gilead was famous in Pliny's time, as in that of the early Patriarchs, for its balm (tsori), but the tree which bore it has been variously identified with the Zakkûm, or thorny lotus (Balanites Aegyptiaca), the home of which is in the Jordan valley, with the pistachio or sticky mastic, which grows on the mountains (not the true pistachio), and with the opobalsanum or true balm-tree, not now known in Gilead, but found near Mecca. The Ishmaelites (as already noted) also brought from Gilead the nechoth ("spicery"), which has been thought to be the styrax or mock orange, still frequently found in the glades of Gilead, or more probably the gum tragacanth or astragalus, which is equally common. They also traded in "myrrh" (lôt),—an incorrect translation, generally agreed to be the gum of the Cistus ladaniferus, a beautiful flower, like the dog rose in appearance, still common on these hills. It is a sure note of the accuracy of that picture of early Hebrew society which is drawn in the Book of Genesis, that the products so noted are those native to Gilead, while monumental records carry back the trading relations of Syria and Mesopotamia with Egypt many centuries earlier than the age of Joseph.

The ruins of Gilead mostly belong to the Roman and Byzantine, to the early Arab and Crusading periods; but in certain centres near ancient sites, especially at Rabbath-ammon, Sûf (Mizpeh), and the mouth of the Jabbok glen, great groups of dolmens, similar to those of Bashan, Moab, and Galilee, have survived—pre-historic monuments of the Amorites and Rephaim. At Rabbath-ammon there are tombs of the Hebrew age, Roman temples, theatres and baths, and early Moslem mosques. Gerasa, Gadara, and Capitolias (Beit er-Rás) present us with the relics of cities built in the 2nd century A.D., and every ruined town presents well-carved masonry, sarcophagi, and inscriptions of the 4th and 5th centuries of our era, to which later builders have added little, beyond the two Crusading castles already noticed, and a few later minarets and mosques. In the steep ravines the cells of anchorites, and solitary monasteries, are found, and in unexpected nooks great Roman tomb towers and rock-cut sepulchres, with well-carved bas-reliefs and classic tracery. The unfinished palace of Hyrcanus ('Arák el Emír), with its gigantic masonry, carved lions, and Aramaic text on the rock wall of its cave stables and granaries, is one of the most interesting sites. It is dated 176 B.C., and is almost unique in architectural history, as is also the beautiful kiosque at Ammán of the Persian or early Arab period (for these ruins in Southern Gilead, see Memoirs of the Survey of Eastern Palestine). The modern villages, when not piled up from such ancient materials, are mainly mud hovels, or caves faced with stone walls.

The most interesting sites in the topography of Gilead are described under the names of GADARA, GERASA, and RABBATH-AMMON, but a few words may be added as to important places of various ages. Ramoth-gilead was probably situated not far west of Gerasa, near the edge of the plateau where the ancient ruins and tombs near the little mountain village of Reimún are still to be explored. This site, open to the incursions of the Syrians from the northern plains, could be reached by chariots up the open glen of the Jabbok. Mahanaim, the southern capital, probably stood on the west border of the Bukeia basin, where the name still survives as Mukhmah, near the Roman ruins and fine spring of El Básha—a site fully meeting the numerous requirements of the Old Testament notices. Jabesh-gilead was in the north, and the name survives in that of Wády Yábis, though the exact site is doubtful. Mizpeh, as already stated, was probably at Súf, N.E. of Gerasa, where a dolmen centre surrounds the home of Jephthah. Close to the Jordan valley is the secluded town of Pella (Fáhil), with its hot springs, famous in Talmudic accounts, and its fragmentary Christian inscriptions. North-west of Rabbath-ammon are the extensive Byzantine ruins of Jubeihah, on the plateau, marking the site of Jogbehah (Judg. viii. 11), to which Gideon pursued the Midianites. Jazer, the border town, is probably to be fixed at Beit Zer'ah, in the flat ground 4 miles N.E. of Heshbon. The towns of Gad (Josh. xiii. 25–27) included Aroer near Rabbath-ammon, Beth-aram and Beth-nimrah in the plain opposite Jericho, Succoth (Tell Der'ala, north of the Jabbok), and Zaphon (Amáta, near Gadara), with others already noticed. Among other notable places are to be reckoned Mezarib, at the sources of the Hieromax, one of the stations of the Háj, with its curious lake, warm spring, and Turkish castle; Irbid (Arbela), with its gigantic Roman masonry, the present seat of government of the Jebel Ajlún, though only now containing 300 inhabitants; Beit er-Rás (Capitolias), with remains of a pillared street, and Roman eagles, aqueducts, and baths; the village of Ajlún, with ancient olive-trees and gardens, and a population of 500 souls, three-fourths of whom are Christians; and Súf (Mizpeh), with three springs, and a stream turning several mills, and also rich in olive-trees. South of the Jabbok the only town is es-Salt (the Saltus Hieraticus of the Middle Ages, then the seat of a Bishop), which has a population of 6,000 souls, and is a government centre. It lies on the south slope of Jebel Osh'a, commanded by its Crusader-castle, and possesses a small bazaar.

The revenue of the Jebel Ajlún is said to be now only about £7,000 per annum, but cultivation is gradually increasing, even the 'Adwán Arabs sowing corn in the valleys; and with greater security the region might become as prosperous as in Roman times, when the population must have been very dense, and the great families very rich. The present population includes some 5,000 Arabs, of the 'Adwán and Beni Sakhr tribes, living in tents, and paying an uncertain poll-tax. The former possess flocks and cattle, but the latter have only camels. Both are tribes which came a few centuries ago from the Hejjaz, and subjugated the earlier Arabs. Since the 7th century B.C. this immigration from Arabia has continually brought fresh elements of pure Arab origin into Gilead, and little remains of the old Aramaic stock.

The principal works which treat of Gilead are the Travels of Burckhardt, Buckingham's Arab Tribes, Irby and Mangles' Travels, Selah Merrill's East of Jordan. For the southern region, see Conder's Heth and Moab, 1883, and Palestine, 1889, and Memoirs of the Survey of Eastern Palestine; also Le Strange, Ride through Ajlún, 1886, in Schumacher's Across the Jordan. L. Oliphant's Land of Gilead, 1880, contains a picturesque account of the whole region, but the antiquarian information is misleading. Tristram's work on Moab and his earlier Travels may also be consulted. Sir Charles Warren (PEF'Qy. Stat. and Underground Jerusalem) also visited Gilead, and Sir C. W. Wilson explored Gadara. The Jebel Ajlún has, however, not been surveyed as thoroughly as Moab, and is less perfectly known than Bashan. [C. R. C.]

GIL'EAD, MOUNT (Judg. vii. 3). According to Grätz and Bertheau, the reading should be "Gilboa," which would accord well with the narrative. If the reading is to be maintained, it is not impossible that this name, "the rugged," may have been applied to Gilboa [see GILBOA], and that it survives at 'Ain Jalúd, at the foot of the mountain, which is by some identified with the spring Harod, where (v. 1) Gideon was encamped. Grätz's reading "Endor" for "Harod" does not agree with his proposed emendation. [C. R. C.]

GIL'EADITES, THE (גִּלְעָדִים; Judg. xii. 4, 5, גִּלְעָדִים; Judg. xii. 4, 5, גַּלְאָדִים; Num. xxvi. 29, Γαλααδί, Β. Γαλααδί; Judg. x. 3, δ Γαλααδί; Judg. xi. 1, 40, xii. 7; 2 Sam. xvii. 27, xix. 31; 1 K. ii. 7; Ezra ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63, δ Γαλααδί-

A branch of the tribe of Manasseh, descended from Gilead. There appears to have been an old standing feud between them and the Ephraimites, who taunted them with being deserters. See Judg. xii. 4, which may be rendered, "And the men of Gilead smote Ephraim, because they said, Runagates of Ephraim are ye (Gilead is between Ephraim and Manasseh);" the last clause being added parenthetically. In 2 K. xv. 25 for "of the Gileadites" the LXX. have ἀπὸ τῶν τετρακοσίων; Vulg. de filiis Galaaditarum. [W. A. W.] [W.]

GIL'GAL (always with the article, גִּלְגָּל, but once; Γαλααλα [plural]; Galgala). By this name were called at least two, and probably three places in ancient Palestine.

1. (1.) The site of the first camp of the Israelites on the west of the Jordan, the place at which they passed the first night after crossing the river, and where the twelve stones were set up which had been taken from the bed of the stream (Josh. iv. 19, 20, cp. v. 3); where also they kept their first Passover in the land of Canaan (v. 10). It was in the "end of the east of Jericho" (בְּקֵצֵה הַמִּזְרָח; A. V. "in the east border of Jericho"), apparently on a hillock or rising ground (v. 3, cp. v. 9) in the Arboth-Jericho (A. V. "the plains"); that is, the hot depressed district of the Ghor which lay between the town and the Jordan (v. 10). Here the Israelites who had been born on the march through the wilderness were circumcised; an occurrence from which the sacred historian derives the name: "This day I have rolled away (galliothi) the reproach of Egypt from off you." Therefore the name of the place is called Gilgal^a to this day." By Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 11) it is said to signify "freedom" (ἐλευθερίων). The camp thus established at Gilgal remained there during the early part of the conquest (ix. 6; x. 6, 7, 9, 15, 43); and we may perhaps infer from one narrative that Joshua retired thither at the conclusion of his labours (xiv. 6, cp. v. 15). The manner in which Gilgal is mentioned, in Deut. xi. 30, in connexion with the "land of the Canaanites," in which were Ebal and Gerizim, apparently led Eusebius and Jerome (*OS*² p. 253, 1, 79; p. 158, 4, 14) to place those mountains in the Jordan valley near Jericho. [EBAL; GERIZIM.]

(2.) We again encounter Gilgal in the time of Saul, when it seems to have exchanged its military associations for those of sanctity. True, Saul, when driven from the highlands by the Philistines, collected his feeble force at the site of the old camp (1 Sam. xiii. 4, 7); but this is the only occurrence at all connecting it with war. It was now one of the "holy cities" (ἁγιασμένοι)—if we accept the addition of the LXX.—to which Samuel regularly resorted, where he administered justice (1 Sam. vii. 16), and where burnt-offerings and peace-offerings were accustomed to be offered "before Jehovah"

(x. 8, xi. 15, xiii. 8, 9–12, xv. 21); and on one occasion a sacrifice of a more terrible description than either (xv. 33). The air of the narrative all through leads to the conclusion that at the time of these occurrences it was the chief sanctuary of the central portion of the nation (see x. 8, xi. 14, xv. 12, 21). But there is no sign of its being a town; no mention of building, or of its being allotted to the priests or Levites, as was the case with other sacred towns, Bethel, Shechem, &c.

(3.) We again have a glimpse of it, some sixty years later, in the history of David's return to Jerusalem (2 Sam. xix.). The men of Judah came down to Gilgal to meet the king to conduct him over Jordan, as if it was close to the river (xix. 15), and David arrived there immediately on crossing the stream^b after his parting with Barzillai the Gileadite.

How the remarkable sanctity of Gilgal became appropriated to a false worship we are not told, but certainly, so far as the obscure allusions of Hosea and Amos can be understood (provided that they refer to this Gilgal), it was so appropriated by the kingdom of Israel in the middle period of its existence (Hos. iv. 15, ix. 15, xii. 11; Amos ix. 4, v. 5).

Beyond the general statements above quoted, the sacred text contains no indications of the position of Gilgal. Neither in the Apocrypha nor the N. T. is it mentioned. Later authorities are more precise, but unfortunately discordant among themselves. By Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 4) the encampment is given as 50 stadia, rather under 6 miles, from the river, and 10 from Jericho. In the time of Jerome the site of the camp, and the twelve memorial stones, were still distinguishable, if we are to take literally the expression of the Epit. Paulae (§ 14). The distance from Jericho was then 2 miles. The spot was left uncultivated, but regarded with great veneration by the residents: "locus desertus . . . ab illius regionis mortalibus miro cultu habitus" (*OS*² p. 159, 28). Theodosius (circ. A.D. 530) gives the distance from Jericho as 1 mile, and mentions the twelve stones, and the ager Domini, which was irrigated by water from the fountain of Elisha, 'Ain es Sultân (De Situ T. S. § xvi.). Antoninus (circ. A.D. 570) states that not far from Jericho there was a church in which were placed the twelve stones, and that the ager Domini was in front of the church (De Loc. Sanct. xiii.). When Arculf was there at the end of the 7th century, the place was shown at 5 miles from Jericho. A large church covered the site, in which the twelve stones were ranged. The church and stones were seen by Willibald, thirty years later, but he gives the distance as 5 miles from the Jordan, which again he states correctly as 7 from Jericho. Abbot Daniel (A.D. 1106) says that the church was dedicated to St. Michael, and was 1 verst, or two-thirds of a mile, from Jericho (Pil. xxxv.); Phocas (xxi.) places the church 6 miles from the Mt. of Temptation. The stones are mentioned by Thietmar,^c A.D. 1217, and lastly by Ludolf de Suchem a century later. Schwarz

^b Such is the real force of the Hebrew text (xix. 40).

^c According to this pilgrim, it was to these that John the Baptist pointed when he said that God was "able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham" (Thietmar, Perogr. 31).

^a This derivation of the name cannot apply in the case of the other Gilgals mentioned below. May it not be the adaptation to Hebrew of a name previously existing in the former language of the country?

(H. L. p. 99) mentions a hill near the Jordan which the Arabs called Gilgal; but the site was really discovered in 1865 by Herr Zachokke at Tell Jijûl, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the Jordan, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Eriha, Jericho (Beiträge zur Topog. d. westlichen Jordansau). There are here an old pool and a number of artificial mounds, to both of which the name Jijûlieh is attached; and the remains of an old building, possibly the church and monastery of St. Michael, erected on the spot where Joshua, according to tradition, saw the Archangel Michael (Josh. v. 13). A curious legend is attached to the ruins, connecting them with the capture of Jericho by Joshua (PEF. Mem. iii. 173, 191, 230; Ganneau in PEFQy. Stat. 1874, pp. 174–177; Sepp, ii. 147 sq.). In Judg. ii. 1, iii. 19, Micah vi. 5, Gilgal is apparently the well-known place in the Jordan valley.

2. This was certainly a distinct place from the Gilgal which is connected with the last scene in the life of Elijah, and with one of Elisha's miracles. The chief reason for believing this is the impossibility of making it fit into the notice of Elijah's translation. He and Elisha are said to "go down" (אָרַף) from Gilgal to Bethel (2 K. ii. 2), in opposition to the repeated expressions of the narratives in Joshua and 1 Samuel, in which the way from Gilgal to the neighbourhood of Bethel is always spoken of as an ascent, the fact being that the former is about 3,700 feet below the latter. Thus there must have been a second Gilgal at a higher level than Bethel, and it was probably that at which Elisha worked the miracle of healing on the poisonous pottage (2 K. iv. 38). Perhaps the expression of 2 K. ii. 1, coupled with the "came again" of iv. 38, may indicate that Elisha resided there. It is now, apparently, Jijûlta, a large village, on the top of a high hill, to the west of the main north road, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Bethel, leicita, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ m. from Shiloh, Seitân. The altitude of Jijûlta (2,441 ft.) is less than that of Bethel (2,890 ft.); but its appearance on the hills above the great Wady el-Jib is such as to give the impression of great height, and the descent into the valley may have led to the expression "going down" to Bethel. Van de Velde (Memoirs, p. 179), who appears not to have visited the place, estimated it to be 500 or 600 feet above Bethel; see also Guérin (Samarie, ii. 168). Jijûlta may also be the Beth-gilgal of Neh. xii. 29 (PEF. Mem. iii. 290).

3. The "KING OF THE NATIONS OF GILGAL," or rather perhaps, as in R. V., the "king of Goim in Gilgal" (מֶלֶךְ הַגּוֹיִם בְּגִלְגָל), is mentioned in the catalogue of the chiefs overthrown by Joshua (Josh. xii. 23). The name occurs next to DOR (v. 22) in an enumeration apparently proceeding southwards; and this agrees with the position in which Eusebius and Jerome place Gilgal. It was, in their day, a village called Galgulis (Γαλγούλις), 6 miles N. of Antipatris (OS. p. 254, 31; p. 159, 24); and this place is now Kalkilieh, $6\frac{1}{2}$ MP. north of Râs el-'Ain, Antipatris. The Gilgal of Josh. xii. 23 may however be Jijûlieh, a large mud village in the plain about 4 miles N. of Râs el-'Ain (PEF. Mem. ii. 289). What these Goim were has been discussed under HEATHEN. By that word (Judg.

iv. 2) or "nations" (Gen. xiv. 1) the name is usually rendered in the A. V., as in the well-known phrase "Galilee of the nations" (Is. ix. 1; cp. Matt. iv. 15). Possibly they were a tribe of the early inhabitants of the country, who, like the Gerizites, the Avim, the Zemarites, and others, have left only this faint casual trace of their existence there.

4. A Gilgal is spoken of in Josh. xv. 7, in describing the north border of Judah. In the parallel list (Josh. xviii. 17) it is given as GELILOTH, and under that word an attempt is made to show that Gilgal, i.e. the Gilgal near Jericho, is probably correct. [G.] [W.]

GIL'LOH (גִּלְלוֹה); B. omits, A. Γηλόω; in Sam. Γωλά), a town in the mountainous part of Judah, named in the first group, with Debir and Eah-temoh (Josh. xv. 51). Its only interest to us lies in the fact of its having been the native place of the famous Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 12), where he was residing when Absalom sent for him to Hebron, and whither he returned to destroy himself after his counsel had been set aside for that of Hushai (xvii. 23). The site is uncertain. Tobler (Drit. Wand. Map) identifies it with Beit Jâla, near Bethlehem; but this is too far to the north, and Conder suggests, with greater probability, Kh. Jâla, about 3 miles N.W. of Hulhûl, Halbul (PEF. Mem. iii. 313, 354). [G.] [W.]

GIL'ONITE, THE (גִּלְוֹנִי and גִּלְוֹנִי); B. Θεωνέι [xv.], Γελωνέιτος [xxiii.], A. Γελωνάιος [xv.], Γελωνίτης, i.e. the native of Giloh [as Shilohite, from Shiloh]: applied only to Ahithophel the famous counsellor (2 Sam. xv. 12; xxiii. 34). [G.] [W.]

GIM'ZO (גִּמְצוֹ), ? = place where sycamores grow; B. Γαλεζώ, A. Γαμαί(αί), a town which with its dependent villages (Hebr. "daughters") was taken possession of by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz (2 Ch. xviii. 18). The name—which occurs nowhere but here—is mentioned with Timnath, Socho, and other towns in the north-west part of Judah, or in Dan. It still remains attached to a large village between 2 and 3 miles S.W. of Lydda, south of the road between Jerusalem and Jaffa, just where the hills of the highland finally break down into the maritime plain. Jimzu is a tolerably large village, on an eminence, well surrounded with trees, and standing just beyond the point where the two main roads from Jerusalem (that by the Bethhorons, and that by Wady Suleiman), which parted at Gibeon, again join and run on as one to Jaffa. It is remarkable for nothing but some extensive corn magazines underground, unless it be also for the silence maintained regarding it by all travellers up to Dr. Robinson (ii. 249). [G.] [W.]

GIN, a trap for birds or beasts: it consisted of a net (גִּנ), and a stick to act as a springe (שִׁנְיָה); the latter word is translated "gin" in the A. V. and R. V. of Amos iii. 5, and the former in Is. viii. 14, the term "snare" being in each case used for the other part of the trap. In Job xl. 24 (A. V. marg.) the second of these terms is applied to the ring run through the nostrils of an animal. [W. L. B.]

GINATH (גִּנְיָת, ? = a garden; גִּנְיָת; Ginnethi), father of TIBNI, who after the death of Zimri disputed the throne of Israel with Omri (1 K. xvi. 21, 22).

GIN'NETHO (גִּנְנֶתְהוֹ, i.e. Ginnethoi, ? = a gardener; B. omits, NA. Γεννηθού; Genthon), one of the "chief" (שֹׁפְטֵי) = heads of the priests and Levites who returned to Judaea with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 4). He is doubtless the same person as GIN'NETHON (גִּנְנֶתְהוֹן; A. Γααννέθων, N. Gannethō, B. Γαννέθ; Genthon), a priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 6). He was head of a family, and one of his descendants is mentioned in the list of priests and Levites at a later period (xii. 16).

GIRDLE, an essential article of dress in the East, and worn both by men and women. The corresponding Hebrew words are: 1. גִּבְעוֹן or גִּבְעוֹנִית, which is the general term for a girdle of any kind, whether worn by soldiers (1 Sam. xviii. 4; 2 Sam. xx. 8; 1 K. ii. 5; 2 K. iii. 21), or by women (Is. iii. 24). 2. אֲזוּרָה, especially used of the girdles worn by men; whether by prophets (2 K. i. 8; Jer. xiii. 1), soldiers (Is. v. 27; Ezek. xxiii. 15), or kings in their military capacity (Job xii. 18). 3. מִצְבָּעֵי, used of the girdle worn by men alone (Job xii. 21; Ps. cix. 19; Is. xxiii. 10). 4. מִצְבָּעֵי, the girdle worn by the priests and state officers. In addition to these, מִצְבָּעֵי (Is. iii. 24. The etymology of the word is much disputed; see Dillmann^s in loco) is a costly girdle worn by women. The Vulgate renders it fascia pectoralis. It would thus seem to correspond with the Latin strophium, a belt worn by women about the breast. In the LXX, however, it is translated χιτῶν μεσοσθέρων, "a tunic shot with purple," and Gesenius has "buntes Feyerkleid" (cp. Schroeder, de Vest. Mul. pp. 137-8, 404. Dietrich [see MV.¹¹] connects it with the Targ. מִצְבָּעֵי, Oberkleid). The מִצְבָּעֵי mentioned in Is. iii. 20, Jer. ii. 32, were probably girdles (R. V. "sashes"), although both Kimchi and Jarchi consider them as fillets for the hair (A. V. "headbands"). In the latter passage the Vulgate has again fascia pectoralis, and the LXX. σπασθοδραμίσμ, an appropriate bridal ornament.

The common girdle was made of leather (2 K. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4), like that worn by the Bedouins of the present day, whom Curzon describes as "armed with a long crooked knife, and a pistol or two stuck in a red leathern girdle" (Monast. of the Levant, p. 7). In the time of Chardin the nobles of Mingrelia wore girdles of leather, four fingers broad and embossed with silver. A finer girdle was made of linen (Jer. xiii. 1; Ezek. xvi. 10), embroidered with silk, and sometimes with gold and silver thread (Dan. x. 5; Ber. i. 13, xv. 6), and frequently studded with gold and precious stones or pearls (Le Bruyn, Voy. iv. 170; cp. Virg. Æn. ix. 359). Morier (Second Journey, p. 150), describing the dress of the Armenian women, says, "They wear a silver girdle which rests on the hips, and is generally curiously wrought." The manufacture of these girdles formed part of the employment of women (Prov. xxxi. 24).

The girdle was fastened by a clasp of gold or silver, or tied in a knot so that the ends hung down in front, as in the figures on the ruins of Persepolis. It was worn by men about the loins, hence the expressions מִצְבָּעֵי אֲזוּרָה (Is. xi. 5); מִצְבָּעֵי אֲזוּרָה (Is. v. 27). The girdle of women was generally looser than that of the men, and was worn about the hips, except when they were actively engaged (Prov. xxxi. 17). Curzon (p. 58), describing the dress of the Egyptian women, says, "Not round the waist, but round the hips a large and heavy Cashmere shawl is worn over the yelek, and the whole gracefulness of an Egyptian dress consists in the way in which this is put on." The military girdle was worn about the waist; the sword or dagger was suspended from it (Judg. iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ps. xlv. 3). In the Nineveh sculptures the soldiers are represented with broad girdles, to which the sword is attached, and through which two or even three daggers in a sheath are passed. Q. Curtius (iii. 3) says of Darius, "Zona aurea muliebriter cinctus acinacem suspenderat, cui ex gemma erat vagina." Hence girding up the loins denotes preparation for battle or for active exertion. In times of mourning, girdles of sackcloth were worn as marks of humiliation and sorrow (Is. iii. 24, xxii. 12).

In consequence of the costly materials of which girdles were made, they were frequently given as presents (1 Sam. xviii. 4; 2 Sam. xviii. 11), as is still the custom in Persia (cp. Morier, p. 93). Villages were given to the queens of Persia to supply them with girdles (Xen. Anab. i. 4, § 9; Plat. Alc. i. p. 123).

They were used as pockets, as among the Arabs still (Niebuhr, Descr. p. 56), and as purses, one end of the girdle being folded back for the purpose (Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8): hence, zonam perdere, "to lose one's purse" (Hor. Epist. ii. 2, 40; cp. Juv. xiv. 297). Inkhorns were also carried in the girdle (Ezek. ix. 2).

The מִצְבָּעֵי, or girdle worn by the priests about the close-fitting tunic (Ex. xxviii. 39, xxxix. 29), is described by Josephus (Ant. iii. 7, § 2) as made of linen so fine of texture as to look like the slough of a snake, and embroidered with flowers of scarlet, purple, blue, and fine linen. It was about four fingers broad, and was wrapped several times round the priest's body, the ends hanging down to the feet. When engaged in sacrifice, the priest threw the ends over his left shoulder. According to Maimonides (de Vas. Sanct. c. 8), the girdle worn both by the high-priest and the common priests was of white linen embroidered with wool; but that worn by the high-priest on the day of Atonement was entirely of white linen. The length of it was thirty-two cubits, and the breadth about three fingers. It was worn just below the armpits to avoid perspiration (cp. Ezek. xlv. 18). St. Jerome (Ep. ad Fabiolam, de Vest. Sac.) follows Josephus. With regard to the manner in which the girdle was embroidered, the "needlework" (A. V.; מְעֻשָׂה, Ex. xxviii. 39; R. V. "the work of the embroiderer." See Knobel-Dillmann in loco) is distinguished in the Mishna from the "cunning-work" (A. V.; מְעֻשָׂה הַשֵּׁב, Ex. xxvi. 31; R. V.

“the work of the cunning workman”) as being worked by the needle with figures on one side only, whereas the latter was woven work with figures on both sides (Cod. Joma, c. 8). So also Maimonides (de Vas. Sanct. viii. 15). But Jarchi on Ex. xxvi. 31, 36 explains the difference as consisting in this, that in the former case the figures on the two sides are the same, whereas in the latter they are different. [EMBROIDERER.]

In all passages, except Is. xxii. 21, גִּרְגָּשִׁי is used of the girdle of the priests only, but in that instance it appears to have been worn by Shebna, the treasurer, as part of the insignia of his office; unless it be supposed that he was of priestly rank, and wore it in his priestly capacity. He is called “high-priest” in the Chronicon Paschale, p. 115 a, and in the Jewish tradition quoted by Jarchi in loco.

The “curious [A. V. marg. Or, embroidered] girdle” (גִּרְגָּשִׁי), Ex. xxviii. 8; R. V. “the cunningly woven band”) was made of the same materials and colours as the ephod; that is, of “gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen.” Josephus describes it as sewn to the breastplate. After passing once round, it was tied in front upon the seam, the ends hanging down (Ant. iii. 7, § 5). According to Maimonides, it was of woven work.

“Girdle” is used figuratively in Ps. cix. 5; Is. xi. 5: cp. 1 Sam. ii. 4; Ps. xxx. 11, lxx. 12; Eph. vi. 14. [W. A. W.]

GIR'GASHITES, THE (גִּרְגָּשִׁי), i.e., according to the Hebrew usage, singular—“the Girgashite;” in which form, however, it occurs in the A. V. but twice, 1 Ch. i. 14 and Gen. x. 16, in the latter THE GIRGASITE [R. V. Girgashite]; elsewhere uniformly plural, as above; R. V. uniformly singular: δ Γεργασαίος, and so also Josephus (Gergesacus), one of the nations who were in possession of Canaan before the entrance thither of the children of Israel. The name occurs in the following passages:—Gen. x. 16, xv. 21; Deut. vii. 1 (and xx. 17 in Samarit. and LXX.); Josh. iii. 10, xxiv. 11; 1 Ch. i. 14; Neh. ix. 8.* In the first of these “the Girgashite” is given as the fifth son of Canaan; in the other places the tribe is merely mentioned, and that but occasionally, in the formula expressing the doomed country; and it may truly be said in the words of Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 2) that we possess the name and nothing more; not even the more definite notices of position, or the slight glimpses of character, general or individual, with which we are favoured in the case of the Amorites, Jebusites, and some others of these ancient nations. The expression in Josh. xxiv. 11 would seem to indicate that the district of the Girgashites was on the west of Jordan; nor is this invalidated by the mention of “Gergesenes” in Matt. viii. 28 (Γεργασηνών in Rec. Text, and in a few MSS.—mentioned by Epi-phanus and Origen—Γεργασαίων), as on the east side of the sea of Galilee, since that name may indicate that some families of the tribe settled in this place after they were driven from Southern Palestine. A curious tradition is related in the Talmud of an appeal made by the Girgashites

* In Deut. iii. 19 (Gk. v. 14) the LXX. have B. Γαργασαί, B^a b² AF. Γαργασαί for the “Geshuri” of the Hebrew text.

to Alexander the Great during his stay in Palestine, for redress for the losses they had suffered from the Jews in consequence of their expulsion from Canaan. The appeal, however, was fruitless (Otho, Lex. Rab. 31). [G.] [W.]

GIRZITES, THE, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, R. V. [GERZITES.]

GISCHALA. [AHLAB.]

GIS'PA (גִּישְׁפָּא); BA. om., Ἰεσάφ; Gaspha, one of the overseers of the Nethinim, in “the Ophel,” after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 21). By N^o. the name appears to have been taken as a place. [F.]

GIT'TAH-HE'PHER, Josh. xix. 13. [GATH-HEPHER.]

GITTAIM (גִּתַּיִם), i.e. two wine-presses; B. Γεθθαι, A. Γεθθελυ; Gethaim, a place incidentally mentioned in 2 Sam. iv. 3, where the meaning appears to be that the inhabitants of Beeroth, which was allotted to Benjamin, had been compelled to fly from that place, and had taken refuge at Gittaim. Beeroth was one of the towns of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 17); and the cause of the flight of its people may have been (though this is but conjecture) Saul's persecution of the Gibeonites, alluded to in 2 Sam. xxi. 2. Gittaim is again mentioned in the list of places inhabited by the Benjamites after their return from the Captivity, with Anathoth, Hazor, Ramah, and other known towns of Benjamin to the N.W. of Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 33). The two may be the same; though, if the persecution of the Beerothites proceeded from Benjamin, as we must infer it did, they would hardly choose as a refuge a place within the limits of that tribe. Gittaim is the dual form of the word Gath, which suggests the Philistine plain as its locality. But there is no evidence for or against this.

Gittaim occurs in the LXX. Version of 1 Sam. xiv. 32—“out of Getthaim roll me a great stone.” But this is not supported by any other of the ancient Versions, which unanimously adhere to the Hebr. text, and probably proceeds from a mistake or corruption of the Hebrew word גִּתַּיִם; A. V. “ye have transgressed.” It further occurs in the LXX. in Gen. xxxvi. 35 and 1 Ch. i. 46, as the representative of AVITH, a change not very intelligible (see Dillmann's on Gen. i. c.), and equally unsupported by the other old Versions. [G.] [W.]

GITTITES. The inhabitants of Gath (2 Sam. vi. 10, 11; xv. 18, 19). Obed-edom and Ittai are named, and six hundred Gittites followed David from Gath. In the latter passage the LXX. renders the word “mighty men,” and is followed by Ewald and Thenius. There is nothing to show that these Gittites were Philistines, since there was probably no town in Palestine, in David's time, of which the population was unmixed [see GATH]. [C. R. C.]

GITTITH, or, more correctly, Haggittith, which appears as part of the first, or introductory, verses of Psalms viii., lxxxi., and lxxxiv., has produced an amusing, if somewhat unsatisfactory, search after hypotheses. The authors of the Septuagint evidently had in mind the Agadic tradition of the Rabbis, when they rendered 'Al-Haggittith by ὁπέρ τῶν ληψῶν (see later on), and are by no means alluded to by Ibn 'Ezra, as has been asserted, when he rejects the explanation of the "fablers, babblers, or idiots"

(מהבילים). The Targumist gives Gittith as a harp brought (viii. 1) or come (lxxxi. 1 and lxxxiv. 1) from Gath (of Philistia?). This explanation is not merely quoted by Kashi, but approved of by him, with the additional remark, that in Gath they were masters in constructing this instrument. He rejects the view of the Rabbis (Midrash Tehillim) that this title was an allusion to the heathen nations, which would be one day trodden down as grapes are trodden in a vat. Not that Rashi rejected the Rabbinic saying itself, which rests on the Bible (Is. lxiii. 2, 3); but he rejects the local application of it. He does so justly, since, as he says, contents and context give no evidence whatever for such an application. Rashi here, as in most other places, exhibits supreme good sense. Rab Se'adyah, the Gaon (Ewald, Ueber die Arabisch geschriebenen Werke Jüdischer Sprachgelehrten, i., Stuttgart, 1844, 8vo, on Ps. viii. 1), says that this Psalm got its name Gittith from having been given by David to the household of Obed-Edom the Gittite. This explanation is also given by Ibn 'Ezra (תנן הכוזביר נתן זה

למשפחות שוכר אדום הנתי, without, however, acknowledging his indebtedness to the Gaon; and between it and his own well-known theory (This is the beginning of a poem, &c.) he vacillates, with rather an inclination to the former exposition. Qimchi reproduces both these explanations, only consistently reversing their order, as he approves more of the second explanation (see Schiller-Szinessy, Qimchi on the Psalms, i., Cambridge and Leipzig, 1883, 8vo, p. 15). He inserts between the first and second explanations the interpretation of some anonymous authors, according to whom this Psalm was called Gittith because David both composed and recited it while at Gath in Philistia. This interpretation, if it were possible, would leave the headings of Psalms lxxxi. and lxxxiv. entirely unexplained. Now, on grounds both negative and positive, advanced in ALJELETH SHAHAR, ALAMOTH and AL-TASCHITH, one is constrained to explain Haggittith as the name of a music-band, dwelling in the Levitical Gath-Kimmon, and the director of which was Obed-Edom the Gittite (1 Ch. xv. 21). This theory would give a double reason for the name Haggittith. Obed-Edom did not merely excel as a music-director, but had harboured the Ark of God for three months, when David, after the catastrophe of Uzzah, was afraid to take it to Zion, his own city. For this act of piety and devotion the Lord had blessed Obed-Edom the Gittite, and the king had granted to this Levite the mastership over a music-corps, consisting for the most part of his own household, which should bear his name. [S. M. S.-S.]

GIZONITE, THE (הגזוני): BN. omit; A. δ Γουρί; Lucian, δ Γουρί: Gezonites). "The sons of Hashem the Gizonite" are named amongst the warriors of David's guard (1 Ch. xi. 34). In the parallel list of 2 Sam. xxiii. 32 the name appears as JASHEN. Gizon is not otherwise known, and the reading of Lucian, δ Γουρί, seems to point to גזנין, the name of a Naphtalite family (see Driver, Notes on Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. i. c.) [F.]

GIZRITES, THE, 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, R. V. margin. [GERZITES.]

GLASS (גלזית); θαλος; vitrum). The word occurs only in Job xxviii. 17, where in A. V. it is rendered "crystal," but in R. V. "glass." It comes from קִזִּי (to be pure), and according to the best authorities means a kind of glass which in ancient days was held in high esteem (J. D. Michaelis, Hist. Vitri apud Hebr.; and Hamberger, Hist. Vitri ex antiquitate eruta, quoted by Gesen. s. v.). Symmachus renders it κρύσταλλος, but that is rather intended by שִׁבְיָה (Job xxviii. 18, A. V. "pearls," LXX. γάβις, a word which also means "ice;" cp. Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 2), and קִרְרָה (Ezek. i. 22). Besides Symmachus, others also render it διαγυγή κρύσταλλος (Schleusner, Thesaur. s. v. θαλος), and it is argued that the word θαλος frequently means crystal. Thus the Schol. on Aristoph. Nub. 764 defines θαλος (when it occurs in old writers) as διαφανής λίθος ἑοικὼς ὄλαφ, and Hesychius gives as its equivalent λίθος τίμιος. In Herodotus (iii. 24) it is clear that θαλος must mean crystal, for he says, ἡ δὲ σφι πολλή καὶ εὐεργος ὀρύσσειται, and Achilles Tatius speaks of crystal as θαλος ὀρυγγύμνη (ii. 3; Baehr, On Herod. ii. 44; Heeren, Ideen, ii. 1, 335). Others consider גלזית to be amber, or electrum, or alabaster (Bochart, Hieroz. ii. ch. vi. 872); but modern criticism almost universally adopts the meaning glass (see MV.¹¹, Dillmann¹ in loco).

The Hebrews must have been aware of the invention of glass. There has been a violent modern prejudice against the belief that glass was early known to, or extensively used by, the ancients, but both facts are now certain. From paintings representing the process of glass-blowing which have been discovered at Beni-Hassan, and in tombs at other places, we know that the invention is at least as remote as the age of Osirtasen the First (perhaps a contemporary of Joseph), 3500 years ago. A bead as old as 1500 B.C. was found by Captain Hervey at Thebes, "the specific gravity of which, 25° 30', is precisely the same as that of the crown glass now made in England." Fragments too of wine-vases as old as the Exodus have been discovered in Egypt. Glass beads known to be ancient have been found in Africa, and also (it is said) in Cornwall and Ireland, which are in all probability the relics of an old Phoenician trade (Wilkinson, in Rawlinson's Herod. ii. 50, i. 475; Anc. Egypt. ii. 64, 65 [1878]). The art was also known to the ancient Assyrians (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 42), and a glass bottle was found in the N.W. palace of Nimroud, which has on it the name of Sargon, and is therefore probably older than B.C. 702 (Id. Nin. and Bab. pp. 197, 503). This is the earliest known specimen of transparent glass.

The disbelief in the antiquity of glass (in spite of the distinct statements of early writers) is difficult to account for, because the invention must almost naturally arise in making bricks or pottery, during which processes there must be at least a superficial vitrification. There is little doubt that the honour of the discovery belongs to the Egyptians. Pliny gives no date for his celebrated story of the discovery of glass from the solitary accident of some Phoenician sailors using blocks of natron to support their saucepans when they were unable to find stones for the purpose (H. N. xxxvi. 65). But this account is less likely than the supposition that vitreous matter first attracted observation from the custom of lighting fires on the sand, "in a country producing natron or subcarbonate of soda" (Rawlinson's Herod. ii. 82). It has been pointed out that Pliny's story may have originated in the fact that the sand of the Syrian river Belus, at the mouth of which the incident is supposed to have occurred, "was esteemed peculiarly suitable for glass-making, and exported in great

"permeate opaque glass with designs of various colours." Besides this, they could colour it with such brilliancy as to be able to imitate precious stones in a manner which often defied detection (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 25, 33, 75). This is probably the explanation of the incredibly large gems which we find mentioned in ancient authors; e.g. Larcher considers that the emerald column alluded to by Herodotus (ii. 44) was "du verre coloré, dont l'intérieur était éclairé par des lampes." Strabo was told by an Alexandrian glass-maker that this success was partly due to a rare and valuable earth found in Egypt (Beckmann, History of Inventions, "Coloured Glass." i. 195 sq., Eng. Transl.; also iii. 208 sq., iv. 54). Yet the perfectly clear and transparent glass was considered the most valuable (Plin. xxxvi. 26).

Some suppose that the proper name מִשְׁרֹפֹת מֵיִם ("burnings by the waters") contains an allusion to Sidonian glass-factories (Meier on Josh. xi. 8, xiii. 6), but it is much more probable that it was so called from the burning of Jabin's chariots at that place (Lord A. Hervey, On the Genealogies, p. 228), or from hot springs.

In the N. T. glass is alluded to as an emblem of brightness (Rev. iv. 6, xv. 2, xxi. 18). The three other places where the word occurs in the A. V. (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. iii. 18; Jas. i. 23), as also the word "glasses" (Is. iii. 23), are considered under MIRRORS.

Egyptian Glass Blowers. (Wilkinson.)

quantities to the workshops of Sidon and Alexandria, long the most famous in the ancient world" (Dict. of Gk. and Rom. Antiq. s. n. Vitrum, where everything requisite to the illustration of the classical allusions to glass may be found). Some find a remarkable reference to this little river (respecting which see Plin. H. N. v. 17, xxxvi. 65; Joseph. B. J. ii. 10, § 2; Tac. Hist. v. 7) in the blessing to the tribe of Zebulun, "they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand" (Deut. xxxiii. 19). Both the name Belus (Reland, quoted in Dict. of Geogr. s. v.) and the Hebrew word חול, "sand" (Calmet, s. v.), have been suggested as derivations for the Greek βάλος, which is however, in all probability, from an Egyptian root.

Glass was not only known to the ancients, but used by them (as Winckelmann thinks) far more extensively than in modern times. Pliny even tells us that it was employed in wainscoting (vitreae camerae, II. N. xxxvi. 64; Stat. Silv. i. ch. v. 42). The Egyptians knew the art of cutting, grinding, and engraving it, and they could even inlay it with gold or enamel, and MIRRORS. For, stranger to say, although the ancients were aware of the reflective power of glass, and although the Sidonians used it for mirrors (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 66), yet for some unexplained reason mirrors of glass must have proved unsuccessful, since even under the empire mirrors were universally made of metal, which is at once less perfect, more expensive, and more difficult to preserve (Dict. of Gk. and Rom. Antiq. s. n. Speculum). [F. W. F.]

GLEANING (עֲלִילוֹת) as applied to produce generally, עֲלִיץ rather to corn; see Lev. xix. 9, 10. The verbs are also used figuratively, Judg. xx. 45, and i. 7). The remarks under CORNER on the definite character of the rights of the poor, or rather of poor relations and dependants, to a share of the crop, are especially exemplified in the instance of Ruth gleaning in the field of Boaz. Poor young women, recognised as being "his maidens," were gleaning his field; and on her claim upon him by near affinity being made known, she was bidden to join them and not go to any other field; but for this, the reapers, it seems, would have driven her away (Ruth ii. 6,

8, 9). The gleanings of fruit trees, as well as of cornfields, was reserved for the poor. Hence the proverb of Gideon, Judg. viii. 2. Maimonides indeed lays down the principle (Constitutiones de donis pauperum, cap. ii. 1), that whatever crop or growth is fit for food, is kept, gathered all at once, and carried into store, is liable to that law. See for further remarks, Maimon. Constitutiones de donis pauperum, cap. iv. [H. H.]

GLEDE (גִּלְדֵי, ra'ah; גִּלְדֵי, ixion). The word occurs only in Deut. xiv. 13, and is translated "glede" in A. V. and R. V. In the parallel passage in Lev. xi. 14, גִּלְדֵי, da'ah, "vulture," is read. Gesenius therefore suggests that da'ah should be substituted also in Deut. If however גִּלְדֵי be correct, the name is derived from the bird's clearness of vision, and means "the far-seer." Our translators have distinguished between "kite" and "glede," though the names are often used synonymously in the South of England for the royal or red kite, Milvus iclinus, Sav., now all but extinct. But in the North of England, in Scotland and Ireland, "glede" is applied to the buzzard, which is probably therefore the bird intended by our translators. There are three species of buzzard in Palestine: the common buzzard, Buteo vulgaris, Leach, on the coast; B. desertorum, Daud., in the southern wilderness; and B. ferox (Gm.), the finest and largest of the genus, spread all over the country. [H. B. T.]

GNAT (גָּנָת) only occurs in Matt. xxiii. 24, "Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." A. V. But R. V. correctly—"which strain out the gnat and swallow the camel;" as in all the earlier Versions, Tyndall's, Cranmer's, and the Geneva: a proverbial expression, the gnat being looked on as one of the smallest of insects. The gnat of the East is better known to us as the "mosquito," one of the most irritating pests of all countries, and which in Palestine can only be escaped by sleeping on high ground, away from trees or water. Gnats belong to the order Diptera, genus Culex. All the species are characterised by having a long proboscis in a grooved sheath, from which the insect shoots its long slender lance into the skin. The larvae and pupae live in water, only emerging into the air when they leave the chrysalis. [H. B. T.]

GOAD. The equivalent terms in the Hebrew are (1) מִלְכָּה (Judg. iii. 31) and (2) דָּבָר (1 Sam. xiii. 21; Eccles. xii. 11). The explanation given by Jahn (Archaeol. i. 4, § 59; cp. MV.)¹ is that the former represents the pole, and the latter the iron spike with which it was shod for the purpose of goading, and may refer to anything pointed; and the tenor of Eccles. xii. requires rather the sense of a peg or nail, anything in short which can be fastened; while in 1 Sam. xiii. the point of the ploughshare is more probably intended. The former does probably refer to the goad (A. V. and R. V. "ox-goad"), the long handle of which might be used as a formidable weapon (cp. Hom. II. vi. 135), though even this was otherwise understood by the LXX. as a ploughshare (ἐν τῷ ἀροσφόδι): it should also be noted that the etymological force of the word is that of guiding (from גִּדְדָה, to teach) rather than goading (Saalschütz, Archaeol. i. 105). There are undoubted references to the use of the goad in driving oxen in Eccles. xxxviii. 25, and Acts xxvi. 14. The instrument, as still used in the countries of Southern Europe and Western Asia, consists of a rod about 8 feet long, brought to a sharp point and sometimes cased with iron at the head (Harmer's Observ. iii. 348). The expression "to kick against the goad" (Acts xxvi. 14, R. V.; A. V. "the pricks") was proverbially used by the Greeks for unavailing resistance to superior power (cp. Aesch. Agam. 1633, Prom. 323; Eurip. Bacch. 791). [W. L. B.]

GOAH, Jer. xxxi. 39, R. V. [GOATH.]

GOAT. 1. Of the Hebrew words which are translated goat and she-goat in A. V., the most common is גֵּז, 'aiz = Syr. حَاة, Arab. عَزْر, Phoen. &ca. The Indo-Germanic languages have a similar word in Sansk. ay'a = goat, ay'a = she-goat, Germ. geis or gems, Greek αἴξ, aiyōs. The derivation from גִּדְדָה, to be strong, points to he-goat as the original meaning, but it is also specially used for she-goat, as in Gen. xv. 9, xxxi. 38, xxxii. 14; Num. xv. 27. In Judg. vi. 19 גֵּזִים is rendered kid, and in Deut. xiv. 4 גֵּזִים is rendered the goat, but properly signifies flock of goats. גֵּזִים is used elliptically for goats' hair in Ex. xxvi. 7, xxxvi. 14, &c.; Num. xxxi. 20; and in 1 Sam. xix. 13.

2. גִּזְזִים, 'attūd, τράγοι, hirci, is the common word for the he-goat, which is the leader of the herd. All herds of goats, however small, have a leader, whose movements are followed by all the others. It occurs only in the plural and is rendered indifferently "goats" and "he-goats" in A. V. and R. V. It is used metaphorically for leaders of men: "Be as the he-goats before the flocks" (Jer. i. 8). "Even all the chief ones of the earth," marg. he-goats (Is. xiv. 9). "Mine anger is kindled against the shepherds, and I will punish the he-goats," i.e. "the leaders of the people" (Zech. x. 3, R. V.).

3. שֵׁטֶר, sā'ir, lit. "a hairy one" or "bristly one," is the word commonly used in the Pentateuch for the goat offered as sin offering, whether a full-grown animal or a kid.

4. טַיִשׁ, tayish, i.e. the butter or the striker, from טָשָׁה, tshā, "to strike" or "butt," a non-existent root; Arabic تَيْسٌ, tays, plur. تَيْسَاتٌ, tuyūs, "a he-goat." The word occurs in four passages only. In Prov. xxx. 31-2, R. V.: "Four things which are stately in going . . . the he-goat." The stately march of the he-goat before the herd, and his haughty bearing, as well as the dauntless stare with which he scrutinizes a stranger, are well known to all familiar with the East; and his name is still commonly used by the Arabs to express dignity of manner and bearing.*

* So the Alexandrian Version of the LXX. gives in Is. xiv. 9, τράγος ἡγούμενος αἰσίου. Cp. Theocritus, Id. viii. 49, ὁ τράγος, τὸν λευκὰν αἰγὰν ἄνερ; and Virg. Ecl. vii. 7, "Vir gregis ipse caper."

5. רֵעָה, pāphir, occurs only in 2 Ch. xxix. 21, Ezra vi. 17, and Dan. viii. 5, 8. It is derived from רָעָה, "to leap." In Daniel it is followed by רֵעָה, i.e. a he-goat of the goats, and is used as a figure of the Macedonian Empire: "Behold, an he-goat came from the west on the face of the whole earth" (v. 5).

Ἐριφος and ἐρπίδιον, i.e. "a young goat or kid," are translated "goats" in our Version (R. V. marg. kids). "Goat-skins" in Heb. xi. 37 are in the Greek ἐν αἰγείοις δέρμασιν.

There are several breeds of goats (Capra hircus, L.) in Palestine. The supposed wild original of the goat (Capra aegagrus, Gm.) is common in Armenia, the Caucasus, and North Long-eared Syrian Goat.

Persia; yet the goats of Syria exhibit a wider divergence than those of any other country, from the pristine type. In the Lebanon there is a very marked race, like the Welsh breed of goat, generally black and with short ears often erect. Very different from this is the common Syrian goat of the South (Capra mambrica, L.), with enormous pendent ears often hanging down below its nose, and stout recurved horns. These long ears are alluded to by Amos (iii. 12): "As the shepherd taketh out of the mouth of the lion two legs, or a piece of an ear." These goats are very large, with long hair, generally black. In fact, black is as much the rule with the Syrian goat as white with the English sheep. Another race is the mohair goat (Capra angorensis, L.), which is only a carefully selected breed of the other, generally white, and with very long silky hair. It is only reared in a few places in the north of the country. It is to this fine-haired goat probably that allusion is made in the Song of Songs iv. 1: "Thy hair is as a flock of goats that appear from ["lie along the side of," R. V.] Mount Gilead."

Goats formed an important item in the wealth of the Patriarchs, and were used for food and for sacrifice. In pastoral regions the goat may be said to be the complement of the sheep. The one browses where the other cannot feed, for the goat prefers brushwood and coarse herbage to the fine pasturage indispensable for the sheep. Thus on the downs of Arabia where no shrubs are to be found, there are no goats, and they are not mentioned among the possessions of Job. In the rich maritime plains their place is taken by horned cattle, for the luxuriant grasses are too succulent for their taste. But the southern wilderness, where there are many dwarf bushes, and the "hill-country" from Hebron up the centre of Western Palestine to the top of Lebanon, are of all others the best adapted for goats; and here from the earliest times they have been a chief source of wealth. Nabal, in the Negeb or South-land of Judah, had 3,000 sheep and 1,000 goats. Further north, the proportion of the latter would have been greater.

The sheep and goats are always seen together under the same shepherd, but they do not trespass on the domain of each other; nor seems there to be on either side any desire for more intimate acquaintance. The sheep, quietly wending their way along the lower slopes of the hillside, graze closely the tender herbage and fine grass; the goats, generally filing in long lines a little above them, skip from rock to rock, and browse the thymes and twigs of the dwarf shrubs. When folded together at night, they still gather in distinct groups; and round the well, while waiting for the troughs to be filled, they instinctively classify themselves separately. With all their economic value, the goats have been the cause of much of the bareness and the scarcity of spring rains in Palestine. Their constant browsing has precluded any chance of the restoration of the forests in any part of the country. They have extirpated many species of trees which once covered the hills, and which now are only to be found east of Jordan. The scarcity of fuel has tempted the villagers to cut down almost every tree of any size in the country, while the goats effectually keep down the seedlings. Until an enlightened Pasha intervened, there was great danger of the cedars of Lebanon becoming absolutely extinct with the decay of the few surviving patriarchs of the forest. Within the present century, after the ebony forests had been cut down in the island of St. Helena, the goats barked and destroyed all the younger trees until not a solitary plant of the species survives.

In all the districts where goats are kept their milk takes the place of cow's milk with us, and is used both fresh (called by the Arabs haleeb) and curdled (leben), and is also manufactured into cheese: "Thou shalt have goat's milk enough for thy food, for the food of thy household, and for the maintenance of thy maidens" (Prov. xxvii. 27). The herds are their wealth: "The goats are the price of the field" (Prov. xxvii. 26). A kid of the goats has always been the special dish for a visitor, or for a feast. To this day it is as it was in the time of Abraham: the sheikh presses the traveller to stay till a kid of the goats has been caught, slain, and cooked for his entertainment: "I pray thee, let us detain thee, until we shall have made ready a kid for thee" (Judg. xiii. 15). The lambs are more generally kept for the sake of their wool, and not slain until they have yielded at least one fleece; while a calf is too large and valuable to be slain except on some very great occasion. "Thou never gavest me a kid," complains the elder brother of the prodigal, "that I might make merry with my friends: but as soon as this thy son was come, . . . thou hast killed for him the fatted calf" (Luke xv. 29, 30).

The habits of the goat have afforded frequent illustrations in the teaching of our Lord. In the solemn description of the day of judgment, "He shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats" (Matt. xiv. 22). The traveller can watch the shepherd, when evening is coming on, carefully picking his way on the hill-side, as he cheerily calls and encourages the sheep who follow him quietly and in close order, on the beaten track towards the well-known cave where they will be folded till morning, secure from wolf or jackal. Higher up on the mountain-side, in looser order, gambolling and skipping from rock to rock, yet still keeping fairly in line with the sheep, come the goats; and then, when the cave has been reached, they leap down from the rocks above, as if simply to exhibit their agility. The shepherd then tells, first the sheep into one side of the cave, and next the goats into the other.

Goat's hair being, with the exception of the long silky fleeces of the Angora breed, much coarser than wool, is only employed, like camel's hair, in the weaving of coarse fabrics. The outer curtains of the Tabernacle in the wilderness were of goat's hair (Exod. xxxvi. 14). It was also used for stuffing cushions (1 Sam. xix. 13). Goat-skins were and are still a very important item in the economy of the East; for of these are made all the bottles that are used for the conveyance of water, wine, oil, and milk; earthenware jars being only for the storage of wine in cellars, or for the daily supply of water for domestic use. For a description of the manufacture of goat-skin bottles, see BOTTLE. [H. B. T.]

GOAT, SCAPE. [ATONEMENT, DAY OF.]

GOAT, WILD. Two Hebrew words are thus rendered in A. V. and R. V. (1) דִּבְיָאֵל, ye'el'im; τραγέλαφοι, ελαφοι; ibices: and fem. דִּבְיָאֵל, ya'dlāh, A. V. "roe," R. V. "doe;" Arab.

وعل, wa'l. The word is derived from the root על, "to climb;" and in the three passages where it occurs in the plural—1 Sam. xxiv. 2, Job xxxix. 1, and Ps. civ. 18—it is no doubt rightly translated "wild goat." The Translators seem to have rendered the feminine form by "roe" or "doe," as being more euphuistic where it is used as a term of endearment. The wild goat of North Arabia, Moab, and Palestine is Capra baden, Wagn. = Capra sinaitica, Ehrenb., بدن, baden, of the Arabs, and was well known to the Israelites in the wilderness and afterwards in their own land. It is still abundant in Sinai and Petra, not uncommon in Moab and the wilderness of Judaea, and lingers in Central Palestine from Jericho to Samaria. It was interesting to the present writer to find this graceful creature near the very fountain to which it gave name, Engedi, "the fountain of the kid," on the hills where it roamed of old, where David wandered to escape from Saul: "Saul took three thousand chosen men out of all Israel, and went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats" (1 Sam. xxiv. 2). We also obtained a young one alive near Jericho, and found a horn further north. In Moab we frequently saw them, and obtained four specimens. We have also found its teeth in the breccia of bone caverns in Lebanon, where possibly it still exists. The flesh is excellent eating, far superior to that of the gazelle, and is probably the venison which Esau went to hunt for his father in the wilderness of Judaea. The late Rev. F. W. Holland, who was well acquainted with the ibex in Mount Sinai, writes: "They are frequently shot by the Bedawee, who charge about six shillings for a full-grown one, and from eighteenpence to two shillings for a live young one. But they are very difficult to rear. I had three, but they all died; and one of the monks told me that the year before he had twenty, but had lost them all. The Baden being very shy and wary, keeping to the mountains, and also, from their colour, very difficult to be seen, are not often detected by travellers. and have therefore been supposed to be much more scarce than they really are. The kids, before they are able to accompany the old ones, are concealed by the mother under some rock, and apparently are only visited at night. I once caught a little one which ran out from under a rock, as I was climbing a mountain. The poor little creature had evidently heard me coming, and ran out, thinking I was its mother. The Arab who was with me was very anxious to wait near it till evening to shoot the old one, and he said there must be another kid close by, as two were always dropped at a birth; but we failed to find a second. Their warning cry is a shrill kind of whistle."

Like other members of this family, the Baden will drop from a great height and light upon its powerful horns without injury. The Sinaitic ibex is very distinct in appearance from the ibex of the Alps, of the Pyrenees, or of Candia, and still more from the large Himalayan ibex. It is smaller than the Alpine species, with longer but much finer and narrower horns; and is of a sandy colour, lighter than any of its congeners.

2. יָבֵן, 'akko; τραγέλαφος; tragelaphus; A. V. and R. V. "wild goat," in Deut. xiv. 5, where alone the word occurs. It appears to be connected with the Arabic عناق, 'anāh. There have been various conjectures as to the animal intended; some suggesting the Capreolus pygargus (Pall.), called Ahu by the Persians, from a fancied similarity in the names. But it is doubtful if this antelope was ever found so far West. Others have proposed the Passeng, Capra aegragrus, Cuv., the wild goat of the Caucasus and Taurid. It is far more probable that the A. V. is correct, and that the Capra boden is intended, more especially since it does not otherwise occur in the list in Deut., and yet must have been of all the animals of the chase by far the most familiar to Israel in the wilderness. [H. B. T.]

GO'ATH (גֹּאֵת); the LXX. seem to have had a different text, and read ἐκλεκτῶν λίθων; Goitha), a place in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and named, in connexion with the hill Gareb, only in Jer. xxi. 39. The name (which is accurately GOAH, as in R. V.) is derived by Gesenius from גֹּאֵת, "to low," as a cow (see, however, MV.¹¹). In accordance with this is the rendering of the Targum, which has for Goah, גֹּאֵת יְבֵן = the heifer's pool. The Syriac, on the other hand, has גֹּאֵת, terām'thā, "to the eminence." Owing to the presence of the letter ā in Goath, the resemblance between it and Golgotha does not exist in the original to the same degree as in English. [GOLGOTHA.]

The Prophet mentions Goah as one of the limits of the restored Jerusalem in the latter times; and he appears to describe a circuit of the city commencing at the tower of Hananeel, and going round by north to west, south, and east. In this case Goah would be either, following the Syriac Version, the hill on which the Russian convent stands, or, adopting the rendering of the Targum, a pool in or near the position of the Birkat Mamilla. [GAREB.] Renan (V. de J., p. 269, note 4) places Gareb and Goath to the N.W. of Jerusalem. [G.] [W.]

GOB (גֹּב, and גֹּב, perhaps = a pit or ditch; [v. 18] BA. Γέβ, [v. 19] B. Γόμ, A. Γόβ; Gob), a place mentioned only in 2 Sam. xxi. 18, 19, as the scene of two encounters between David's warriors and the Philistines. In the parallel account—of the first of these only—in 1 Ch. xx. 4, the name is given as GEZER; and this, as well as the omission of any locality for the second event, is supported by Josephus (Ant. vii. 12, § 2) and most modern critics. On the other hand, the LXX. and Syriac have Gath in the first case; and this appears to be borne out by the account of a third and subsequent fight, which all agree happened at Gath (2 Sam. xxi. 20; 1 Ch. xx. 6), and which, from the terms of the narrative, seems to have occurred at the same place as the others. The suggestion of Nob—which

Davidson (Hebr. Text) reports as in many MSS.,—is not admissible on account of the situation of that place. [G.] [W.]

GOBLET (גֹּבֵלֵת; κρατήρ; crater; joined with גֹּבֵלֵת to express roundness, Cant. vii. 2; Gesen. Thez. 22, 39; in plur. Ex. xxiv. 6; A. V. "basons," Is. xxii. 24; LXX. literally ἀγυαῖ; craterae; A. V. "cups"), a circular vessel for wine or other liquid. [BASIN.] [H. W. P.]

GOG. 1. (גֹּג; Γόγγ; Gog.) A Reubenite (1 Ch. v. 4); according to the Hebrew text, son of Shemaiah. The LXX., however, have a different text throughout the passage. 2. [MAGOG.] 3. In the Samarit. Codex and LXX. of Num. xxiv. 7, Gog is substituted for Agag.

GOLAN (גֹּלָן; Γαυλῶν), a city and a region. The name of the region survives in the Arabic جولان, Jaulān, the district east of Galilee. The city—capital of the district—is placed by

Herr Schumacher at Sahem el Jaulān (سحيم)

الجولان), 18 miles east of the lake, where the inhabitants hold a tradition that the site was once the chief city of the region (Across the Jordan, p. 92); it is not, however, within the present limits of the Jaulān, though this is not an important objection, especially as Golan was in Bashan (Deut. iv. 43; cp. Josh. xx. 28). With its suburbs it is assigned, in Josh. xxi. 27, to the Levites. The site in question is a large village, standing on the plateau 1400 feet above the level of the Mediterranean. Ruins of a church with sculptured crosses exist, and the place was evidently inhabited about the 3rd to the 6th century A.D. Eusebius speaks of Golan (Γαυλῶν) as a large village in Bashan in his own time (OS. p. 253, 75); cp. Josephus (Wars, i. 4, §§ 4 and 8). The district of Golan, called Gaulanitis by Josephus (Γαυλανίτις), was one of the four divisions into which ancient Bashan was divided in Roman times; the others being Auranitis (Haurān), Trachonitis (El Lejjah), and Batanaea (El Batein). Of these Gaulanitis was the western region, bounded on the south by the river Hieromax, and extending to the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan. On the east it adjoined the corn plains of the Hauran; on the north it reached to the region of Geshur (probably Ituraea) near Panaea (Wars, iii. 3, § 5). Josephus includes it in the kingdom of Og (Ant. iv. 5, § 3; cp. 7, § 4, and Wars, iii. 3, § 1). Sogana and Seleucia are mentioned in connexion with this region, the former in Upper Gaulanitis; while Gamala, near the Sea of Galilee, was in Lower Gaulanitis (Wars, iv. 1, § 1). Seleucia was at the Merom Lake, as here stated, and this passage shows the western and northern extent of the district. Other cities included in the limits were Hippos (Súsieh), Bethsaida Julias (probably ed Dikkeh, near et Tell), and Aphek (1 Kings xx. 23–25), which was the battle-ground of Benhadad, supposed to be Fik, east of the Sea of Galilee. It is described as in a mishtor or "plain," such as that of Gaulanitis. Hippos was one of the cities of the Decapolis. The region thus embraced an area of about 600 square miles.

The modern Jaulán is now divided into three regions,—Esh Shárah on the north, and further south the “eastern” and the “western” divisions. They are separated by the glen of the Nahr er Rukkad, a perennial stream flowing south to join the Hieromax. The east limit of the Jaulán is a parallel stream, 20 feet broad, called Nahr 'Allán; both streams are spanned by ruined bridges with pointed arches. The Jaulán is a plateau, rising northwards, and about 1500 feet above the Mediterranean on an average. The formation is basaltic—a field of lava covering the limestone, which appears in the ravines which intersect it. It is well watered, with fine springs and brooks, and cultivated round the villages; but the soil is covered with mounds of basalt rock, resembling ruined sites, and it does not possess the fine red soil of the Haurán, which is free from rocks. It is, however, an excellent pastoral region, especially to the north, where the Anazeh Arabs feed numerous flocks, and the grass is knee-deep in spring-time. Remains of forests are found to the south, and scattered terebinths on the plateau. On the north a curious volcanic chain runs parallel to the Jordan. It consists of the craters of extinct volcanoes, presenting a very ragged and picturesque sky-line, as seen from the valley. These are called Shafát Kutta, and the southernmost crater, called Tell Fáris, rises 800 feet above the plateau, which is here about 2,700 feet above the Mediterranean. It commands a fine view on all sides, to the rich corn plains of the Haurán on the east, and over the Jordan valley to the hills of Galilee on the west.

The northern district is mainly pastoral, very few inhabited places now remaining. The seat of a Kaimakam is placed on the north, at the decayed village of Kuneitrah, now possessing only a few stone huts, but in Burckhardt's time a khan, a mosque, and walls. Three thousand Circassians were here located about twelve years ago by the Sultan, to cultivate the country. This region was held by the Crusaders, and called the Land of Soethe—a corruption of the Arabic Suwád, meaning the “black land,” on account of the basaltic soil. Moslem historians apply the term more widely to the whole Jaulán (see Rey, Colonies Franques, p. 434). The region south of Esh Sharah, bordering on the Sea of Galilee, now contains very few hamlets. Among them the largest perhaps is Ekhisfa, which is mentioned in 900 A.D. by Yakúbi, and contains remains of a fort. Fik (Aphék) also presents ruins, including columns and Cufic texts. West of this are the remains of the great fortress of Gamala, on the cliffs above the lake (see Sir C. W. Wilson's account, Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 370). North-east of Fik is the large village of el 'Al, where a life-sized statue of a goddess with a quiver is preserved. This place was seized by the Franks in 1105 A.D., and a fortress built (cp. Rey, Col. Franques, p. 434), which still bears the name “Baldwin's Tower,” in the great valley 2 miles to the north. Immediately above the valley (Wády es Semakh) is a spur on the north covered with dolmens.

The eastern region of the Jaulán contains many ruined sites, and about a dozen inhabited villages. The ruins and inscriptions, and remains of a Roman road running east, prove that it was fully populated in the 2nd century, and down to the 6th century A.D. It has, indeed, never been entirely deserted. The highest point in the plateau, towards the north, is at the village Ghadír el Bustán, 1912 feet above sea-level. Three miles to the south, on the Roman road, the hamlet 'Am Dukkár consists of about thirty huts, but there are remains of a Roman town which appears to have had a temple. A fine stream supplies the site. On the north is a remarkable field of dolmens, such as occur in Moab and Gilead. They are called by the peasantry “graves of the children of Israel,” but appear more probably to be prehistoric remains of the original Amorite population. The bridge over which the Roman road crosses, at this point, was repaired in later times by the Franks or the Arabs. A little further south are the ruins of Kaukab, probably the Kokaba which was inhabited in very early Christian times by the Ebionites from Pella (Epiphanius, Haeres. xxx. 2, 18; xl. 1). Beit Akhár, yet further south, on the Nahr 'Allán, was also a Roman town in a strong position. Sahem el Jaulán, further east (the supposed site of Golan), is a large village with gardens and orchards and good water, but falling into decay. The ruins present sculptures like those of the Roman cities of the Haurán, and carved crosses show that these belong to Christian times. Esh Shejerrah, further south again, has a population of about 450 souls, with Roman ruins. El Ekseir, on the Hieromax, is the lowest inhabited place, 1145 feet above sea-level, with a fine perennial spring. Three miles to the north-west, on the same valley bank, is Beit Erry, which Seetzen identified with the Bathura (Bathpa) of Josephus, where Herod settled a Jewish population under a Jewish leader from Babylon (Ant. xvii. 2, § 2). 'Abdin, a hamlet of 150 souls, N.W. of the last, contains a mosque with a tower, and a Greek text has been found: there is a good spring, and the land is well cultivated. Kefr el Ma, on the right bank of the Nahr er Rukkad, is a flourishing village; among other remains is a curious bas-relief of Aesculapius, and what appears to be a Roman altar. Herr Schumacher identifies this site with the Alema (1 Macc. v. 26), where the Jews were shut up till rescued by Judas Maccabaeus: there is no improbability in this view. North-east of this, near Seisün (now ruined), there is another field of dolmens. These sites are the principal ones of interest as yet described, and it is thus clear that the Jaulán is not a desert, but a very fertile pastoral region, which has possessed a settled population from the earliest times. A full account will be found in Schumacher's Across the Jordan, 1886, and further information in the Rev. Selah Merrill's Reports (No. 4, American Palestine Exploration Society, January 1877). The region is also noticed in Burckhardt's Travels in Syria. [C. R. C.]

GOLD, the most valuable of metals, from its colour, lustre, weight, ductility, and other useful properties (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 19). Hence it is used as an emblem of purity (Job xxiii. 10) and nobility (Lam. iv. 1). There are six Hebrew words used to denote it, and four of them occur in Job xxviii. 15, 16, 17. These are—

1. זָהָב, the common name, connected with זָהָב (to be yellow), as gold, from gel, yellow.

Various epithets are applied to it: as, “fine”

(2 Ch. iii. 5), "refined" (1 Ch. xxviii. 18), "pure" (Ex. xxv. 11). In opposition to these, "beaten gold" (כֶּהָשָׁה) is probably mixed gold; LXX. ελατός; used of Solomon's shields (1 K. x. 16).

2. כֶּהָשָׁה (κειμήλιον), treasured, i.e. fine gold (1 K. vi. 20, vii. 49, &c.). Many names of precious substances in Hebrew come from roots signifying concealment, as כֶּהָשָׁה (Gen. xliii. 23, A. V. "treasure").

3. זָהָב, pure or native gold (Job xxviii. 17; Cant. v. 15; probably from זָבַב, to separate). Rosenmüller (Alterthumsk. iv. p. 49) makes it come from a Syriac root meaning solid or massy; but כֶּהָשָׁה (2 Ch. ix. 17) corresponds to זָהָב (1 K. x. 18). The LXX. render it by λίθος τιμιος, χρυσίον άπυρον (Is. xiii. 12; Theodot. άπεροθον: cp. Thuc. ii. 13; Plin. xxxiii. 19, obrussa). In Ps. cxix. 127, the LXX. render it τοπάσιον (A. V. "fine gold"); but Schleusner happily conjectures τὸ πάσιον, the Hebrew word being adopted to avoid the repetition of χρυσός (Theo. s. v. τόπασι; Hesych. s. v. πάσιον).

4. אֶרֶץ, gold earth, or a mass of raw ore (Job xxii. 24, άπυρον, A. V. "gold," R. V. "treasure"). The poetical names for gold are:—

1. אֶרֶץ (also implying something concealed); LXX. χρυσίον; and in Is. xiii. 12, λίθος πολυτελής. In Job xxxvii. 22, it is rendered in A. V. "fair weather," R. V. "golden splendour;" LXX. νέφη χρυσαυγούνα. (Cp. Zech. iv. 12.)
2. אֶרֶץ = "dug out" (Prov. viii. 10), a general name, which has become special, Ps. lxxviii. 13 (A. V. and R. V. "yellow gold"), where it cannot mean gems, as some suppose (Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 9). Michaelis connects the word chārūy with the Greek χρυσός.

Gold was known from the very earliest times (Gen. ii. 11). Pliny attributes the discovery of it (at Mount Pangæus), and the art of working it, to Cadmus (H. N. vii. 57); and his statement is adopted by Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. 363, ed. Pott.). It was at first chiefly used for ornaments, &c. (Gen. xxiv. 22); and although Abraham is said to have been "very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold" (Gen. xiii. 2), yet no mention of it, as used in purchases, is made till after his return from Egypt. Coined money was not known to the ancients (e.g. Hom. Ἱ. vii. 473) till a comparatively late period; and on the Egyptian tombs gold is represented as being weighed in rings for commercial purposes (cp. Gen. xliii. 21). No coins are found in the ruins of Egypt or Assyria (Layard's Nin. ii. 418). "Even so late as the time of David gold was not used as a standard of value, but was considered merely as a very precious article of commerce, and was weighed like other articles" (Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 115, 1 Ch. xxi. 25).

Gold was extremely abundant in ancient times (1 Ch. xxii. 14; 2 Ch. i. 15, ix. 9; Nah. ii. 9; Dan. iii. 1); but this did not depreciate its value, because of the enormous quantities consumed by the wealthy in furniture, &c. (1 K. vi. 22, x. passim; Cant. iii. 9, 10; Esth. i. 6; Jer. x. 9; cp. Hom. Od. xix. 55; Herod. ix. 82). Probably, too, the art of gilding was known extensively, being applied even to the battlements of a city (Herod. i. 98; and other authorities quoted by Layard, ii. 264).

The chief countries mentioned as producing gold are Arabia, Sheba, and Ophir (1 K. ix. 28, x. 1; Job xxviii. 16: in Job xxii. 24, the word Ophir is used for gold). Gold is not found in Arabia now (Niebuhr's Travels, p. 141), but it used to be (Artemidor. ap. Strab. xvi. 3, 18, where he speaks of an Arabian river ψήγμα χρυσοῦ καταφέρειν). Diodorus also says that it was found there native (άπυρον) in good-sized nuggets (βαλάρια). Some suppose that Ophir was an Arabian port to which gold was brought (cp. 2 Ch. ii. 7, ix. 10). Other gold-bearing countries were Uphaz (Jer. x. 9; Dan. x. 5) and Parvaim (2 Ch. iii. 6).

Metallurgic processes are mentioned in Ps. lxxvi. 10, Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; and in Is. xlvi. 6, the trade of goldsmith (cp. Judg. xvii. 4, הַיָּצִי) is alluded to in connexion with the overlaying of idols with gold-leaf (Rosenmüller's Minerals of Script. pp. 46–51). [HANDICRAFT.] [F. W. F.]

GOLDSMITH. [HANDICRAFT.]

GOL'GOTHA (Γολγοθᾶ; Golgotha), the Hebrew name of the spot at which our Lord was crucified (Matt. xxvii. 33; Mark xv. 22; John xix. 17). By these three Evangelists it is interpreted to mean the "place of a skull." St. Luke, in accordance with his practice in other cases (cp. Gabbatha, Gethsemane, &c.), omits the Hebrew term and gives only its Greek equivalent, κρανίον. The word Calvary, which in Luke xxiii. 33 is retained in the A. V. from the Vulgate, as the rendering of κρανίον, obscures the statement of St. Luke, whose words are really as in R. V.—"the place which is called 'the skull'"—not, as in the other Gospels, κρανίον, "of a skull," thus employing the Greek term exactly as they do the Hebrew one. This Hebrew, or rather Chaldee, term, was doubtless גולגולתא, Gulgoltā, in pure Hebrew תְּלֵלָה (see MV.¹¹), applied to the skull on account of its round globular form, that being the idea at the root of the word.

Two explanations of the name are given: (1) that it was a spot where executions ordinarily took place, and therefore abounded in skulls; but according to the Jewish law these must have been buried, and therefore were no more likely to confer a name on the spot than any other part of the skeleton. In this case too the Greek should be τόπος κρανίων, "of skulls," instead of κρανίον, "of a skull," still less "the skull" as in the Hebrew, and in the Greek of St. Luke. Or (2) it may come from the look or form of the spot itself, bald, round, and skull-like (the French Chaumont: Renan, T. de J. p. 269), and therefore a mound or hillock, in accordance with the common phrase—for which there is no direct authority—"Mount Calvary." Which-ever of these is the correct explanation—and there is apparently no means of deciding with certainly—Golgotha seems to have been a known spot. This is to be gathered from the way in which it is mentioned in the Gospels, each except St. Matthew^b having the definite article—"the place Golgotha"—"the place which is called a skull"—"the place (A. V. omits the article) called of, or after, a skull." It was "outside the gate," ἔξω τῆς πόλεως (Heb. xiii. 12: cp. Matt. xviii. 11; Lev. xxiv. 14; Num. xv. 35, 36; Deut. xvii. 5), but close to the city, ἐγγὺς τῆς πόλεως (John xix. 20); apparently near a thoroughfare on which there were passers-by (Matt. xxvii. 39; Mark xv. 29). This road or path led out of the "country" (ἀγρός: Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26). It was visible "from afar" (Mark xv. 40), or "afar off" (Luke xxiii. 49); and it may perhaps be inferred from a comparison of Matt. xxvii. 41, Mark xv. 29, with John xviii. 28, that it was within sight of the Temple. It was probably the ordinary spot for executions. Why should it have been otherwise? To those at least who carried the sentence into effect, Christ was but an ordinary criminal; and there is not a word to indicate that the soldiers in "leading Him away" went to any other than the usual place for what must have been a common operation. However, in the place (ἐν τῷ τόπῳ) itself—at the very spot—was a garden or orchard (κῆπος) within which was a new tomb, "wherein was never man yet laid."

* The Bordeaux Pilgrim is the first to call it Monticulus Golgotha (Itin. Hieros.); and it is possible that the term "Mount" originated in the artificial isolation of the rock at "Calvary" in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (Hayter Lewis, Churches of Constantine at Jerusalem, p. xlv. note).

These are all the indications of the nature and situation of Golgotha which present themselves in the N. T. Its locality in regard to Jerusalem is fully examined in the description of the city. [JERUSALEM.]

A tradition at one time prevailed that Adam was buried on Golgotha, that from his skull it derived its name, and that at the Crucifixion the drops of Christ's blood fell on the skull and raised Adam to life, whereby the ancient prophecy quoted by St. Paul in Ephes. v. 14 received its fulfilment—"Awake thou Adam that sleepest,"—so the old Versions appear to have run—"and arise from the dead, for Christ shall touch thee"—(ἐπιφάνσει for ἐπιφάνσει). See Jerome, Comm. on Matth. xxvii. 33, and the quotation in Reland, Pal. p. 860; also Epiphanius, Adv. Haer. xlvi. 5; Saeuwulf, in Early Travellers, p. 39; and the quotations from Basil, &c. in Mislin (ii. 304, 305). The skull commonly introduced in early pictures of the Crucifixion refers to this.

A connexion has been supposed to exist between GOATH and Golgotha, but at the best this is mere conjecture, and there is not in the original the same similarity between the two names—גול and גולגולת—which exists in their English or Latin garb, and which probably occasioned the suggestion. [G.] [W.]

GOLIATH (גִּלְיָת; Γολιάθ; Goliath), a famous giant of Gath, who "morning and evening for forty days" defied the armies of Israel (1 Sam. xvii.). He was possibly descended from the old Rephaim, of whom a scattered remnant took refuge with the Philistines after their dispersion by the Ammonites (Deut. ii. 20, 21; 2 Sam. xxi. 22). Some trace of this condition may be preserved in the giant's name, if it be connected with גלל, "to wander." Simonis, however, derives it from an Arabic word meaning "stout" (Gas. Thes. s. v.). His height was "six cubits and a span," which, taking the cubit at 21 inches, would make him 10½ feet high. But the LXX. and Josephus read "four cubits and a span" (1 Sam. xvii. 4; Joseph. Ant. vi. 9, § 1). This will make him about the same size as the royal champion slain by Antimenidas, brother of Alcaeus (ἀπολείποντα μίαν μόνον παχέων ἀπὸ πῦμων, ap. Strab. xiii. p. 617, with Müller's emendation). Even on this computation Goliath would be, as Josephus calls him, ἀνὴρ παμμεγεθέστατος—a truly enormous man.

The circumstances of the combat are in all respects Homeric; free from any of the puerile legends which Oriental imagination subsequently introduced into it,—as for instance that the stones used by David called out to him from the brook, "By our means you shall slay the giant," &c. (Hottinger, Hist. Orient. i. 3, p. 111 sq.; D'Herbelot, s. v. Gialut). The fancies of the Rabbis are yet more extraordinary. After the victory David cut off Goliath's head (1 Sam. xvii. 51; cp. Herod. iv. 6; Xenoph. Anab. v. 4, § 17; Niebuhr mentions a similar custom among the Arabs, Descr.; Winer, s. v.), which he brought to Jerusalem (probably after his accession to the throne, Ewald, Gesch. iii. 94), while he hung the armour in his tent.

The scene of this famous combat was the Valley of the Terebinth, between Shochoh and Azekah, probably among the western passes of Benjamin, although a confused modern tradition has given the name of 'An Jahlood (spring of Goliath) to the spring of Harod, or "trembling" (Stanley, p. 342; Judg. vii. 1). [ELAH, VALLEY OF.]

In 2 Sam. xxi. 19, we find that another Goliath of Gath, of whom it is also said that "the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam," was slain by Elhanan, also a Bethlehemite. St. Jerome (Quaest. Hebr. ad loc.) makes the unlikely conjecture that Elhanan was another name of David. The A. V. here interpolates the words "the brother of;" from 1 Ch. xx. 5, where this giant is called "Lahmi." This will be found fully examined under ELHANAN.

In the title of the Psalm added to the Psalter in the LXX. we find τῷ Δαυὶδ πρὸς τὸν Γολιάθ; and although the allusions are vague, it is perhaps possible that this Psalm may have been written after the victory. This Psalm is given at length under DAVID, p. 724. It is strange that we find no more definite allusions to this combat in Hebrew poetry; but it is the opinion of some that the song now attributed to Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1-10) was originally written in commemoration of David's triumph on this occasion (Thenius, Die Bücher Sam. p. 8: cp. Bertholdt, Eint. iii. 915; Ewald, Poet. Bücher des A. B. i. 111. Cp. Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam., p. 21).

By the Mohammedans Saul and Goliath are called Tālūt and G'ālūt (see Koran), perhaps for the sake of the homoioteleuton, of which they are so fond (Hottinger, Hist. Orient. i. 3, p. 28). Albulafia mentions a Canaanite king of the name G'alut (Hist. Antaislam. p. 176, in Winer, s. v.); and, according to Ahmed al Fassi, Gialout was a dynastic name of the old giant-chiefs (D'Herbelot, s. v. Falasthin). [GIANTS.] [F. W. F.]

^b St. Matthew, too, has the article in B.
^c But the Vulgate has de villa.

GOMER (גֹּמֶר; Γαμέρ; Gomer.) 1. The son of Japheth, and the father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gen. x. 2, 3). His name is subsequently noticed but once (Ezek. xxxviii. 6; Γομέρ) as an ally or subject of the Scythian king Gog. He is generally recognised as the progenitor of the early Cimmerians, though no longer as that of the later Cimbri and the other branches of the Celtic family, and of the modern Gael and Cymry (Delitzsch [1887] on Gen. i. c.). The Cimmerians, when first known to us, occupied the Tauric Chersonese, where they left traces of their presence in the ancient names, Cimmerian Bosphorus, Cimmerian Isthmus, Mount Cimmerium, the district Cimmeria, and particularly the Cimmerian walls (Her. iv. 12, 45, 100; Aesch. Prom. Vinc. 729), and in the modern name Crimea. They forsook this abode under the pressure of the Scythian tribes, and during the early part of the 7th century B.C. they poured over the western part of Asia Minor, committing immense devastation, and defying for more than half a century the power of the Lydian kings. They were finally expelled by Alyattes, with the exception of a few, who settled at Sinope and Antandrus. It was about the same period that Ezekiel noticed them (Assyr. Gimir), as acting in conjunction with Armenia (Togarmah) and Magog (Scythia). The connexion between Gomer and Armenia is supported by the tradition, preserved by Moses of Chorene (i. 11), that Gamir was the ancestor of the Haichian kings of the latter country. After the expulsion of the Cimmerians from Asia Minor, their name alone survived in a few geographical relics. Various other conjectures have been hazarded on the subject: Bochart (Phaleg, iii. 81) identifies the name on etymological grounds with Phrygia; Wahl (Asien, i. 274) and Lagarde (Armen. Send. § 448) propose Cappadocia, the Armenian name of which was Gamir (see MV.¹¹, Dillmann,³ and Delitzsch on Gen. i. c.).

2. The daughter of Diblaim, and concubine of Hosea (i. 3). [W. L. B.] [F.]

GOMOR'RAH (גֹּמֹרָה, 'Amōrah, perhaps = submersion, from גָּמַר, an unused root; in Arabic غممر, ghamar, is "to overwhelm with water;" Γομόρρα; Gomorra), one of the five "cities of the plain," or "vale of Siddim," that under their respective kings joined battle there with Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 2-8) and his allies, by whom they were discomfited till Abram came to the rescue. Four out of the five were afterwards destroyed by the Lord with fire from heaven (Gen. xix. 23-29). One of them only, Zoar or Bela, which was its original name, was spared at the request of Lot, in order that he might take refuge there. Of these Gomorrah seems to have been only second to Sodom in importance, as well as in the wickedness that led to their overthrow. What that atrocity was may be gathered from Gen. xix. 4-8. Their miserable fate is held up as a warning to the children of Israel (Deut. xxix. 23); as a precedent for the destruction of Babylon (Is. xlii. 19 and Jer. l. 40), of Edom (Jer. xlix. 18), of Moab (Zeph. ii. 9), and even of Israel (Amos iv. 11). By St. Peter in the N. T., and by St. Jude

(2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude, vv. 4-7), it is made "an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly," or "deny Christ." Similarly their wickedness rings as a proverb throughout the prophecies (e.g. Deut. xxxii. 32; Is. i. 9, 10; Jer. xxiii. 14; cp. Rom. ix. 29). Jerusalem herself is there unequivocally called Sodom, and her people Gomorrah, for their enormities; just in the same way that the corruptions of the Church of Rome have caused her to be called Babylon. On the other hand, according to the N. T., there is a sin which exceeds even that of Sodom and Gomorrah; that, namely, of which Tyre and Sidon, Capernaum, Chorazin, and Bethsaida were guilty, when they "repented not," in spite of "the mighty works" which they had witnessed (Matt. x. 15); and St. Mark has ranged under the same category all those who would not receive the preaching of the Apostles (vi. 11).

Gomorrah is first mentioned, with Sodom, Admah, and Zeboiim, as belonging to the Canaanites (Gen. x. 19); and next in connexion with the separation of Abram and Lot (Gen. xiii. 10). Its approximate geographical position is clear if no evidence but that of the earliest records contained in the Bible be accepted. The "cities of the plain" were in the Ciccar, or plain of Jordan, and were eastward of and visible from the heights between Bethel and Ai (Gen. xiii. 10-12). They must therefore have been situated in the Jordan valley, near the northern end of the Dead Sea (PEFQy. Stat. 1869-70, p. 125). A careful examination, by experienced geologists, of the country between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of 'Akabah, has shown that the opinion long current, that the overthrow of the cities was caused by the convulsion which formed the Dead Sea, and that they were submerged in the lake, is untenable. The country must have assumed its present form long before the advent of man upon the earth, and during the Pluvial period the Jordan valley was filled by a great lake, whose waters once stood about 1400 ft. above the present surface of the Dead Sea, and gradually subsided until they reached the level at which they now stand,—1292 ft. below the Mediterranean (Hull, PEF. Geological Memoir, and Mount Seir; Lartet, Essai sur la Géologie de la Palestine). The expression, "the vale of Siddim (the same is the Salt Sea)" (Gen. xiv. 3), would almost seem to indicate a knowledge of the former existence of the lake (cp. Jos. Ant. i. 9), though it must have shrunk very nearly to its existing dimensions long before Sodom and Gomorrah were overthrown. There can have been no permanent rise in the level of the water, such as that implied by the submergence of the cities, and the presence of water is not mentioned in the description of the catastrophe (Gen. xix.). The later passages speak of the district in which the cities were situated as being still visible, and this agrees with the statement of Josephus (B. J. iv. 8, § 4). Their destruction is expressly attributed to the brimstone and fire rained upon them from heaven (Gen. xix. 24; see also Deut. xxix. 23, and Zeph. ii. 9; also St. Peter and St. Jude before cited). And St. Jerome (*OS*² p. 148, 31) says of Sodom, "civitas impiorum divino igne consumpta juxta mare mortuum." The whole subject is ably handled by Cellarius (ap. Ugol. Thesaur. vii.

pp. dccxxxix.-lxxviii.), though it is not always necessary to agree with his conclusions. [SODOM.]

There is, perhaps, more to be said for the view, that the cities were at the south end of the Dead Sea. A town called Zoar is placed in this direction by Josephus (B. J. iv. 8, § 4) and by Eusebius (*OS.*² p. 261, 36; p. 299, 85); and the latter states that, in his time, it had a Roman garrison, and was to the south of Nimrim (*OS.*² p. 231, 13; p. 284, 32). The Arab geographers also place Sughar, or Zughar, "the city of Lot," at the south end of the Dead Sea (Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, pp. 286-292); and this place, the Sejer of the historians of the Crusades, is probably identical with the Zoar of Eusebius. There is, however, no necessary identity between the Zoar of Josephus, Jerome, the Arab geographers, and the Crusaders, and the Zoar of Lot; and there are good grounds for believing that they were not the same place [ZOAR]. The latest exponent of the above theory, M. Clermont-Ganneau, places Sodom at Udam; Zoar in the Ghor es-Saf; and Gomorrah at Ain Gharr, in the Arabah about 20 leagues south of the Dead Sea (PEFQy. Stat. 1886, 19-21: cp. Baedeker-Socin, Hbt. p. 288, Eng. ed.; Sepp, i. 813 sq.). The expression "plain of Jordan," so frequently used to indicate the position of Gomorrah and its companion cities, is quite incompatible with the view that they were at the south end of the Dead Sea; nor was this view generally adopted by the earlier pilgrims to Palestine. S. Silvia (circ. A.D. 385) places Segor (Zoar) and "the land of the Sodomites" close to Mount Nebo, and says that Segor, which then had a Bishop, was 6 miles from the Dead Sea (Per. ad L. S. pp. 41, 42). Antoninus (circ. 570) states that Segor was near the spot, 8 miles from Jordan, where Moses died, and that the Jordan fell into the Dead Sea below Sodom and Gomorrah (De L. S. x., xxiv.); and Theodosius (circ. 530) connects the two cities, and the pillar of Lot's wife, with the point at which the Jordan enters the lake (De Situ T. S. xviii., xix.). Arculf also speaks of the Southern Zoar as "Z. of Arabia," as if it were distinct from the Z. of Lot (De Loc. Sanct. ii. 16). Amongst mediaeval pilgrims Thietmar (Iter ad T. S.) places the cities east of Jordan.

Sir G. Grove appears to have been the first in modern times to point out [SODOM] that, according to the terms of the ancient history, the cities stood at the north end of the Dead Sea; and this view has been very generally accepted in this country and America (Hull, Mount Seir, p. 165; Dawson, Egypt and Syria, pp. 110-114; Conder, Heth and Moab, pp. 149, 150; Geikie, H. L. and the Bible, ii. 119; Merrill, East of Jordan, pp. 232 sq.; Harper, Bible and Modern Discovery, pp. 20 sq.). It seems clear, from the short time that it took Lot to reach Zoar (Gen. xix. 15, 23), that the cities were east of Jordan, and probably not far from the foot of the Moabite hills. Here at any rate are an old site called Tell esh-Shâghûr, which meets the requirements of Zoar and perhaps retains a trace of its name (PEF. Mem. East. Pal. p. 239); a Kh. Bel'ath, possibly the "Bala" of Eusebius (ib. p. 147); and a Wâdy 'Amr, close to the Dead Sea, in a very probable site for Gomorrah (ib. p. 252). It may be inferred from Gen. xix. 27, 28, that the overthrow of the cities was not accompanied by an earthquake or other violent convulsion of nature, and an interesting yet simple explanation of the manner in which they were destroyed has been suggested by Sir J. W. Dawson. He supposes that, at the time referred to, accumulations of inflammable gas and petroleum existed below the plain of Siddim, and that the escape of these through the opening of a fissure along the old line of fault might have produced the effects described—namely, a pillar of smoke rising up to heaven, burning bitumen and sulphur raining on the doomed cities, and fire spreading over the ground. The attendant phenomenon of the evolution of saline waters, implied in the destruction of Lot's wife, would be a natural accompaniment, as water is always discharged in such eruptions; and in this case it would be a brine thick with mud, and fitted to encrust and cover any object reached by it (Egypt and Syria, p. 112). [E. S. Ff.] [W.]

GOMORRHA, the manner in which the name GOMORRAH is spelt in the E. V. of the Apocryphal books and the N. Testament, following the Greek form of the word, Γομόρρα (2 Esd. ii. 8; Matt. x. 15; Mark vi. 11; Rom. ix. 29; Jude 7; 2 Pet. ii. 6).

GOPHER WOOD. Only once in Gen. vi. 14. The Heb. גֹּפְרִית 'גֹּפְרִית, "trees of Gopher," does not occur in the cognate dialects. The A. V. and R. V. have made no attempt at translation; Coverdale renders "Pyne trees;" the LXX. (ξύλα τεργύωνα) and Vulgate (igna laevigata)—elicited by metathesis of ג and ה (גֹּפְרִית=הֲרִי), the former having reference to square blocks, cut by the axe, the latter to planks smoothed by the plane—have not found much favour with modern commentators.

The conjectures of cedar (Ibn Ezra, Onk., Jonath. and Rabbins generally), wood most proper to float (Kimchi), the Greek κεδρελάκη (Jun., Tremell., Burt.), pine (Avenar., Munst.), turpentine (Castalio), are little better than gratuitous. The rendering cedar has been defended by Pelletier, who refers to the great abundance of this tree in Asia, and the durability of its timber.

The Mohammedan equivalent is sag, by which Herbelot understands the Indian plane-tree. Two principal conjectures, however, have been proposed:—1. By Is. Vossius (Diss. de LXX. Interp. c. 12) that גֹּפְרִית = רֶשֶׁת, resin; whence גֹּפְרִית 'גֹּפְרִית, meaning any trees of the resinous kind, such as pine, fir, &c. 2. By Fuller (Miscell. Sic. iv. 5), Bochart (Phaleg, i. 4), Celsius (Hierobot. pt. i. p. 328), Hass (Entdeckungen, pt. ii. p. 78), that Gopher is cypress, in favour of which opinion (adopted by Ges. Lex.) they adduce the similarity in sound of gopher and cypress (κυπάρος = γοφῆρος), the suitability of the cypress for ship-building, and the fact that this tree abounded in Babylonia, and more particularly in Adiabene, where it supplied Alexander with timber for a whole fleet (Arrian. vii. 161, ed. Steph.).

A tradition is mentioned in Eutychiuss (Annals. p. 34) to the effect that the Ark was made of the wood Sady, by which is probably meant not the ebony, but the Juniperus oxycedrus, a species of cypress (Bochart and Cels.; Rosenmüller, Schol. ad Gen. vi. 14, and Alterthumsk. vol. iv. pt. 1). [T. E. B.]

GOR'GIAS (Γοργίας), a general in the service of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. iii. 38, ἀνὴρ δυνατὸς τῶν φίλων τοῦ βασιλέως; cp. 2 Macc. viii. 9), who was appointed by his regent Lysias to a command in the expedition against Judaea B.C. 166, in which he was defeated by Judas Maccabaeus with great loss (1 Macc. iv. 1 sq.). At a later time (B.C. 164) he held a garrison in Jamnia, and defeated the forces of Joseph and Azarias, who attacked him contrary to the orders of Judas (1 Macc. v. 56 sq.; Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 6; 2 Macc. xii. 32). The account of Gorgias in 2 Macc. is very obscure. He is represented there as acting in a military capacity (2 Macc. x. 14, στρατηγὸς τῶν τόπων [?], hardly of Coele-Syria, as Grimm [l. c.] takes it), apparently in concert with the Idumaeans; and afterwards he is described, according to the present text, as "governor of Idumea" (2 Macc. xii. 32; cp. Zöckler), though it is possible (Grotius, Grimm, l. c.) that the reading is an error for "governor of Jamnia" (E. V. marg. Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 6, ὁ τῆς Ἰαμνείας στρατηγός). The hostility of the Jews towards him is described in strong terms (2 Macc. xii. 35, τὸν κατράτατον, E. V. "that cursed man"); and while his success is only noticed in passing, his defeat and flight are given in detail, though confusedly (2 Macc. xii. 34-38; cp. Joseph. l. c.).

The name itself was borne by one of Alexander's generals, and occurs at later times among the eastern Greeks. [B. F. W.]

GORTY'NA (Γόρτυνα; in classical writers, Γόρτυνα or Γορτύνη), a city of Crete, and in ancient times its most important city, next to Cnossus. The only direct Biblical interest of Gortyna is in the fact that it appears from 1 Macc. xv. 23 to have contained Jewish residents. [CRETE.] The circumstance alluded to in this passage took place in the reign of Ptolemy Physcon; and it is possible that the Jews had increased in Crete during the reign of his predecessor Ptolemy Philometor, who received many of them into Egypt, and who also rebuilt some parts of Gortyna (Strabo, x. p. 478). This city was nearly half-way between the eastern and western extremities of the island; and it is worth while to notice that it was near Fair Havens; so that St. Paul may possibly have preached the Gospel there, when on his voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii. 8, 9). Gortyna seems to have been the capital of the island under the Romans. For the remains on the old site and in the neighbourhood, see the Museum of Classical Antiquities, ii. 277-286, and Spratt, Travels and Researches in Crete. [J. S. H.] [W.]

GOSHEN. 1. (𐤂𐤏𐤔𐤍; Γεσέμ, Γεσέμ 'Αραβίας Γεσέν; Gessen; ΓΕΣΕΜ), a word of uncertain etymology, the name of a part of Egypt where the Israelites dwelt for the whole period of their sojourn in that country. It is usually called the "land of Goshen" (𐤂𐤏𐤔𐤍 𐤂𐤏𐤔𐤍), but also "Goshen" simply. It appears to have borne another name, 𐤂𐤏𐤔𐤍 𐤂𐤏𐤔𐤍, the "land of Rameses" (Gen. xlvii. 11). The first mention of Goshen is in Joseph's message to his father (Gen. xlv. 10), "Thou shalt dwelt in the land of Goshen, and thou shalt be near unto me." This shows that the territory was near the residence of the king. According to the Christian tradition as related by Syncellus, the king under whose reign Joseph was raised to his high position is said to have been Apophis (Apepi), known as one of the Hyksos or Shepherd kings. It is therefore near the cities which have preserved traces of the Hyksos that we are to look for the site of Goshen. These cities are Tanis and Bubastis, in the Eastern Delta, in both of which the name of Apophis has been discovered.

We have not much information in Scripture as to the nature and size of Goshen; however, when those scanty data are supplemented by recent discoveries, we may have a fair idea of what it was.

The second mention of the name of Goshen is in this passage (Gen. xlvii. 28, 29): "And Jacob sent Judah before him unto Joseph, to show the way before him unto Goshen; and they came into the land of Goshen. And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father unto Goshen." This shows clearly that Goshen was in the eastern part of Egypt, on the way from the capital, whatever it was, towards Palestine. In the first of these verses the Septuagint has an important variant: συναντήσας αὐτὸν καθ' Ἡρώων πόλιν εἰς γῆν Ῥαμεσσή. Thus the entrance into Goshen is said to be near Heropolis (v. ΠΙΤΙΟΜ), and the two names Goshen and Rameses are considered as equivalent. Their identity is confirmed in the next chapter (xlvii. 6), where Pharaoh says to Joseph, "In the best of the land make thy father and thy brethren to dwell, in the land of Goshen let them dwell;" while the execution of the order is related thus (v. 11): "And Joseph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a possession in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses, as Pharaoh had commanded."

The advice that Joseph gave his brethren as to their conduct towards Pharaoh further characterises the territory (Gen. xlvii. 33, 34): "And it shall come to pass, when Pharaoh shall call you, and shall say, What is your occupation? that ye shall say, Thy servants have been keepers of cattle from our youth even until now, both we and our fathers; that ye may dwell in the land of Goshen: for every shepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians." It was a land of pasture, particularly well adapted for shepherds bringing with them large flocks. This is the sense in which must be construed the expression "the best of the land." It does not mean the most fruitful, or the most productive, but the most favourable for the feeding of cattle.

The nearly unanimous tradition as to the exact site of Goshen has located it in the eastern part of the Delta, on the way to Palestine and Syria. Already the book of Judith mentions it with two places on the eastern frontier, and below Memphis (Judith i. 9: καὶ ταρπὰς καὶ Ῥαμεσσή καὶ πᾶσαν γῆν Γεσέμ, ἕως τοῦ λαβεῖν ἐπάνω Τάμεως καὶ Μέμφεως). The Arab authors generally assign as the site of Goshen localities at the entrance of the present Wady Tumeylât, the valley going towards the Red Sea, and where is now the Freshwater Canal. The two Arab translators of Genesis, Saadiah and Abou Saïd, employ invariably for Goshen the word Sadûr, which the two French scholars, Quatremère and Silvestre de Sacy, have determined to be a region about Abasaah, between the present cities of Zagazig, Belbeis, and Tell-el-Kebir. Makrizi points very nearly to the same place, when he says that Belbeis is the land of Goshen mentioned in the Pentateuch.

Belbeis, considered as the centre of the land of Goshen, already occurs in the narrative of the famous Rabbi Benjamin of Tudela in the 7th century, who says that the land of Goshen is the city of Bolair-Sabis (Belbeis), "a large city where there are three thousand Jews." This tradition lasted down to the 17th century, when the celebrated traveller Pietro della Valle visited Egypt. He describes Belbeis as an important place, where there are a few hieroglyphical inscriptions, and which is said by the Jews to be the land of Goshen. He adds that it is the more probable, as the place was on the way to Palestine, and must have been a district favourable to the grazing of cattle.

If the region around Belbeis was the original land of Goshen, it was certainly not sufficient to contain a large population; the Israelites must have spread to the north and south, and the name probably extended also with them. Therefore most of the authors, especially Ebers, have considered Goshen as being the land east of the Tanitic branch, as far as Memphis in the south; the present province of Sharkieh.

On (Heliopolis) is often mentioned as belonging to the land of Goshen. It occurs first in the Septuagint, in the passage (Ex. i. 11) which describes the persecution of the Israelites in Goshen, and which reads in Hebrew, "They built for Pharaoh store cities, Pithom and Raameses." Here the Greek Version adds to Pithom and Raameses a third city: "On, which is Heliopolis." Josephus endorses this view (Ant. Jud. ii. 188, ed. Niese), and, relating the arrival of Jacob in Egypt, says that "Pharaoh allowed him to dwell with his children in Heliopolis" (συνεχώρησεν αὐτῷ ἕν μετὰ τῶν τέκνων ἐν Ἡλιουπόλει). We shall see further that the connexion between Heliopolis and Goshen exists in the hieroglyphical inscriptions.

In the Septuagint the name Goshen is usually translated by Γεσὴν Ἀραβίας. Several authors since Cellarius have observed that this addition indicated that Goshen was situate in what was called under the Greek kings the nome of Arabia, mentioned by the geographer Ptolemy, and having as capital Phacusa. A confirmation of this view was found lately in the narrative of the pilgrimage of a woman to Egypt and the Holy Land made in the 4th century. This document speaks repeatedly of the nome and the city of Arabia as being the land of Goshen, terra Gesse.

Let us now turn to the hieroglyphical inscriptions. We find there that the nome which Brugsch has determined to be the nome of Arabia, the twentieth in the lists of Lower Egypt, contains a city and a region of the name of Kesen, sometimes abbreviated as Kes, which has generally been considered as the Egyptian equivalent of Goshen. This last form Kes is preserved in the second syllable of the word Phacusa, which thus is found to contain the radical of Goshen, as the Dutch scholar Van der Hardt had conjectured, at the end of the last century; the radical being preceded either by the Egyptian article pa, or by the word pa, which means "a house" or "a temple."

The ruins of the city of Kesem or Kes, Phacusa, lie under a village of recent date, called Saft el Henneh, about 6 miles east of Zagazig, and at the same distance from Belbeis. Until this century the place belonged to the province of which Belbeis was the capital, and this reminds us of the various traditions quoted above, assigning Belbeis as the site of Goshen.

The nome of Arabia was called in Egyptian Sopt, from the name of its god, a warlike divinity, taking various forms, the most ancient of which is a man wearing two feathers on his head and holding a sceptre. It is interesting to notice that the Arabiau nome is of late formation, and that it did not exist as an independent nome at the time of the 19th Dynasty. Under Seti I., the father of Rameses II., it still was part of the nome of Heliopolis, and was watered by its canal. Thus, when the Hebrews came and settled in Goshen, it was not an organised province occupied by an agricultural population; it was part of the marshland called the water of Ra, in which the city of Bailos (Belbeis) was situate. It could be given by the king to foreigners, without despoiling the native population. It must have been something very like the borders of the present Sharkieh, north of Fakoos, where the Bedouins have their camps of black tents and graze their large flocks of cattle. The name the water of Ra may have been the origin of Ain Shems, a name which is often found in connexion with the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt. There the small city of Bailos (Belbeis) was built, near which king Menephtah, who is considered to be the king of the Exodus, relates that he fought a great battle against foreign invaders. It is curious that, speaking of the region around it, he says, "that it was not cultivated, but left as pasture for cattle because of the strangers."

The excavations made in that part of the Delta have shown that Bubastis, the ruins of which exist near the city of Zagazig, was a large and important town, already under the Hyksos, and later under Rameses II. Apepi, the king of Joseph, certainly resided in that city, where he left important monuments; and the same must have been the case at least occasionally, under Rameses II. and Menephtah, judging from the size of their constructions there, and by the fact that Bubastis was the key of the road to Syria. If the kings resided there, in the immediate vicinity of Goshen, it makes the narrative of Scripture more intelligible, in shortening considerably the distance between Joseph and the settlement of his brethren; or between the king and the Hebrews, in the period preceding the Exodus.

In conclusion, we may say that the original land of Goshen, the land allotted to Jacob and his sons, was a territory between Tell-el-Kebir, Zagazig, and Belbeis: at that time it had no definite boundaries; but it extended with the increase of the inhabitants, and it applied to the eastern part of the Delta from the Tanitic branch to the desert and the Red Sea. This area coincided very much with what we should call the province of Sharkieh, and part of the Kalioubieh, as far as Heliopolis. This is the extent we may suppose it had at the time of the Exodus.

On Goshen may be consulted Ebers, Durch Gosen zum Sinai, Leipzig, 1881; Naville, Goshen and the Shrine of Saft el Henneh (Egypt. Explor. Fund, 5th Memoir), London, 1887; Brugsch, Steinschrift und Bibelwort, Berlin, 1891. [E. N.] 2. (𓂏𓂏); 𓂏𓂏; Gessen, Gosen.) The "land" or the "country (both 𓂏𓂏) of Goshen" is twice named as a district in Southern Palestine (Josh. x. 41, xi. 16). Its position is uncertain. From the first of these passages it would seem to have lain between Gaza and Gibeon, and therefore to be some part of the maritime plain of Judah; but in the latter passage, that plain—the Shefelah—is expressly specified in addition to Goshen (here with the article). In this place too the situation of Goshen—if the order of the statement be any indication—would seem to be between the "south" and the Shefelah (A. V. "valley"). The name may be old, and may retain a trace of early intercourse between Egypt and the south of the Promised Land. For such intercourse cp. 1 Ch. vii. 21.

3. A town of the same name is once mentioned in company with Debir, Socoh, and others, as in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 51). There is nothing to connect (Dillmann²) this place with the district last spoken of. It has not yet been identified. [G.] [F.]

GOSPELS.* The name Gospel (from god and spell, Ang.-Sax. good message or news, which is a translation of the Greek εὐαγγέλιον) is applied to the four inspired histories of the life and teaching of Christ contained in the New Testament. [MATTHEW; MARK; LUKE; JOHN.] It may be fairly said that the genuineness of these four narratives rests upon better evidence than that of any other ancient writings. They were all composed during the latter half of the first century: those of St. Matthew and St. Mark some years before the destruction of Jerusalem; that of St. Luke probably about A.D. 64; and that of St. John towards the close of the century. Before the end of the second century, there is abundant evidence that the four Gospels, as one collection, were generally used and accepted. Irenaeus, who suffered martyrdom about A.D. 202, the disciple of Polycarp and Papias,—who, from having been in Asia, in Gaul, and in Rome, had ample means of knowing the belief of various churches,—says that the authority of the four Gospels was so far confirmed that even the heretics of his time could not reject them, but were obliged to attempt to prove their tenets out of one or other of them (Contr. Haer. iii. 11, § 7). Tertullian, in a work written about A.D. 208, mentions the four Gospels, two of them as the work of Apostles, and two as that of the disciples of Apostles (apostolici); and rests their authority on their apostolic origin (Adv. Marcion. iv. ch. ii). Origen, who was born about A.D. 185 and died A.D. 253, describes the Gospels in a characteristic strain of metaphor as "the [four] elements of the Church's faith, of which the whole world, reconciled to God in Christ, is composed" (In Johan.) Elsewhere, in commenting on the opening words of St. Luke, he draws a line between the inspired Gospels and such productions as "The Gospel according to the Egyptians," "The Gospel of the Twelve," and the like (Homil. in Luc. iii. 932 sq.). Although Theophilus, who became sixth (seventh?) bishop of Antioch about A.D. 168, speaks only of "the Evangelists," without adding their names (Ad Autol. iii. 124, 125), we might fairly conclude with Gieseler that he refers to the collection of four, already known in his time. But from Jerome we know that Theophilus arranged the records of the four Evangelists into one work (Epist. ad Algas. iv. 197). Tatian, who died about A.D. 170 (?), compiled a Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Gospels. The Muratorian fragment (Muratori, Antiq. It. iii. 854; Routh, Reliq. S. vol. iv.), which, even if it be not by Caius and of the second century, is at least a very old monument of the Roman Church, describes the Gospels of St. Luke and St. John; but time and carelessness seem to have destroyed the sentences relating to St. Matthew and St. Mark. Another source of evidence is open to us, in the citations from the Gospels found in the earliest writers. Barnabas, Clemens Romanus, and Polycarp quote passages from them, but not with verbal exactness. The testimony of Justin Martyr (born about A.D. 99, martyred A.D. 165) is much fuller; many of his quotations are found verbatim in the Gospels of St. Matthew, St. Luke, and St. John, and possibly of St. Mark also, whose words it is more difficult to separate. The quotations from St. Matthew are the most numerous. In historical references, the mode of quotation is more free, and the narrative occasionally unites those of St. Matthew and St. Luke: in a very few cases he alludes to matters not mentioned in the canonical Gospels. Besides these, St. Matthew appears to be quoted by the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, by Hegesippus, Irenaeus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus. Eusebius records that Pantaenus found in India (the south of Arabia?) Christians who used the Gospel of St. Matthew. All this shows that long before the end of the second century the Gospel of St. Matthew was in general use. From the fact that St. Mark's Gospel has few places peculiar to it, it is more difficult to identify citations not expressly assigned to him; but Justin Martyr and Athenagoras appear to quote his Gospel, and Irenaeus does so by name. St. Luke is quoted by Justin, Irenaeus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus; and St. John by all of these, with the addition of Ignatius, the Epistle to Diognetus, and Polycrates. From these we may conclude that before the end of the second century the Gospel collection was well known and in general use. There is yet another line of evidence. The heretical sects, as well as the Fathers of the Church, knew the Gospels; and as there was the greatest hostility between them, if the Gospels had become known in the Church after the dissension arose, the heretics would never have accepted them as genuine from such a quarter. But the Gnostics and Marcionites arose early in the second century; and therefore it is probable that the Gospels were then accepted, and thus they are traced back almost to the times of the Apostles (Olshausen). Upon a review of all the witnesses, from the Apostolic Fathers down to the Canon appended to the Laodicean Council in 364, and that of the third Council of Carthage in 397, in both of which the four Gospels are numbered in the Canon of Scripture, there can hardly be room for any candid person to doubt that from the first the four Gospels were recognised as genuine and as inspired; that a sharp line of distinction was drawn between them and the so-called apocryphal Gospels, of which the number was very great; that, from the citations of passages, the Gospels bearing these four names were the same as those which we possess in our Bibles under the same names; that unbelievers, like Celsus, did not deny the genuineness of the Gospels, even when rejecting their contents; and, lastly, that heretics thought it necessary to plead some kind of sanction out of the Gospels for their doctrines: nor could they venture on the easier path of an entire rejection, because the Gospels were everywhere known to be genuine. Out of a mass of authorities the following may be selected:—Norton, On the Genuineness of the Gospels, 2 vols. London, 1847, 2nd ed.; Kirchofer, Quellensammlung zur Geschichte des N. T. Canons, Zürich, 1844; De Wette, Lehrbuch der hist.-krit. Einleitung, &c., 7th ed., Berlin, 1852; Hug's Einleitung, &c., Fosdick's [American] translation, with Stuart's Notes; Olshausen, Biblicher Commentar, Introduction, and his Echtheit der 4 Canon. Evangelien, 1823; Jer. Jones, Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the N. T., Oxford, 1798, 2 vols.; F. C. Baur, Krit. Untersuchungen über die Canon. Evangelien, Tübingen, 1847; Reuss, Geschichte des N. T.; Dean Alford's Greek Testament, Prolegomena, vol. i.; Rev. B. F. Westcott's History of N. T. Canon, London, 1859; Gieseler, Historisch-kritischer Versuch über die Entstehung, &c., der schriftlichen Evangelien, Leipzig, 1818.

On comparing these four Books one with another, a peculiar difficulty claims attention, which has had much to do with the controversy as to their genuineness. In the Fourth Gospel the narrative coincides with that of the other three in a few passages only. Putting aside the account of the Passion, there are only three facts which St. John relates in common with the other Evangelists. Two of these are, the feeding of the five thousand, and the storm on the Sea of Galilee (ch. vi.), which appear to be introduced in connexion with the discourse that arose out of the miracle related by St. John alone. The third is the anointing of His feet by Mary; and it is worthy of notice that the narrative of St. John recalls something of each of the other three: the actions of the woman are drawn from St. Luke, the ointment and its value are described in St. Mark, and the admonition to Judas appears in St. Matthew; and St. John combines in his narrative all these particulars. Whilst the three present the life of Jesus in Galilee, St. John follows him into Judaea; nor should we know, but for him, that our Lord had journeyed to Jerusalem at the prescribed feasts. Only one discourse of our Lord that was delivered in Galilee, that in the 6th chapter, is recorded by St. John. The disciple whom Jesus loved had it put into his mind to write a Gospel which should more expressly than the others set forth Jesus as the Incarnate Word of God: if he also had in view the beginnings of the errors of Cerinthus and others before him at the time, as Irenaeus and Jerome assert, the polemical purpose is quite subordinate to the dogmatic. He does not war against a temporary error, but preaches for all time that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God, in order that believing we may have life through His Name. Now many of the facts omitted by St. John and recorded by the rest are such as would have contributed most directly to this great design; why then are they omitted? The received explanation is the only satisfactory one, namely, that St. John, writing last, at the close of the first century, had seen the other Gospels, and purposely abstained from writing anew what they had sufficiently recorded. [JOHN.]

In the other three Gospels there is a great amount of agreement. If we suppose the history that they contain to be divided into sections, in 42 of these all the three narratives coincide, 12 more are given by St. Matthew and St. Mark only, 5 by St. Mark and St. Luke only, and 14 by St. Matthew and St. Luke. To these must be added 5 peculiar to St. Matthew, 2 to St. Mark, and 9 to St. Luke; and the enumeration is complete. But this applies only to general coincidence as to the facts narrated: the amount of verbal coincidence, that is, the passages either verbally the same, or coinciding in the use of many of the same words, is much smaller. "By far the larger portion," says Prof. A. Norton (Genuineness,² i. 240), "of this verbal agreement is found in the recital of the words of others, and particularly of the words of Jesus. Thus, in Matthew's Gospel, the passages verbally coincident with one or both of the other two Gospels amount to less than a sixth part of its contents; and of these about seven-eighths occur in the recital of the words of others, and only about one-eighth in what, by way of distinction, I may call mere narrative, in which the Evangelist, speaking in his own person, was unrestrained in the choice of his expressions. In Mark, the proportion of coincident passages to the whole contents of the Gospel is about one-sixth, of which not one-fifth occurs in the narrative. Luke has still less agreement of expression with the other Evangelists. The passages in which it is found amount only to about a tenth part of his Gospel; and but an inconsiderable portion of it appears in the narrative—less than a twentieth part. These proportions should be further compared with those which the narrative part of each Gospel bears to that in which the words of others are professedly repeated. Matthew's narrative occupies about one-fourth of his Gospel, Mark's about one-half, and Luke's about one-third. It may easily be computed, therefore, that the proportion or verbal coincidence found in the narrative part of each Gospel, compared with what exists in the other part, is about in the following ratios: in Matthew as one to somewhat more than two, in Mark as one to four, and in Luke as one to ten."

Without going minutely into the examination of examples, which would be desirable if space permitted, the leading facts connected with the subject may be thus summed up:—The verbal and material agreement of the first three Evangelists is such as does not occur in any other authors who have written independently of one another. The verbal agreement is greater where the spoken words of others are cited than where the facts are recorded; and greatest in quotations of the words of our Lord. But in some leading events, as in the call of the first four disciples, that of St. Matthew, and the Transfiguration, the agreement even in expression is remarkable: there are also narratives where there is no verbal harmony in the outset, but only in the crisis or emphatic part of the story (Matt. viii. 3=Mark i. 41=Luke v. 13, and Matt. xiv. 19, 20=Mark vi. 41-43=Luke ix. 16, 17). The narratives of our Lord's early life, as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke, have little in common; while St. Mark does not include that part of the history in his plan. The agreement in the narrative portions of the Gospels begins with the Baptism of John, and reaches its highest point in the account of the Passion of our Lord and the facts that preceded it; so that a direct ratio might almost be said to exist between the amount of agreement and the nearness of the facts related to the Passion. After this event, in the account of His burial and resurrection, the coincidences are few. The language of all three is Greek, with Hebrew idioms: the Hebraisms are most abundant in St. Mark, and fewest in St. Luke. In quotations from the Old Testament, the Evangelists, or two of them, sometimes exhibit a verbal agreement, although they differ from the Hebrew and from the Septuagint Version (Matt. iii. 3=Mark i. 3=Luke iii. 4. Matt. iv. 10=Luke iv. 8. Matt. xi. 10=Mark i. 2=Luke vii. 27, &c.). Except as to twenty-four verses, the Gospel of St. Mark contains no principal facts which are not found in St. Matthew and St. Luke; but he often supplies details omitted by them, and these are often such as would belong to the graphic account of an eye-witness. There are no cases in which St. Matthew and St. Luke exactly harmonize, where St. Mark does not also coincide with them. In several places the words of St. Mark have something in common with each of the other narratives, so as to form a connecting link between them, where their words slightly differ. The examples of verbal agreement between St. Mark and St. Luke are not so long or so numerous as those between St. Matthew and St. Luke, and St. Matthew and St. Mark; but as to the arrangement of events St. Mark and St. Luke frequently coincide, where St. Matthew differs from them. These are the leading particulars; but they are very far from giving a complete notion of a phenomenon that is well worthy of that attention and reverent study of the sacred text by which alone it can be fully and fairly apprehended.

These facts exhibit the three Gospels as three distinct records of the life and works of the Redeemer, but with a greater amount of agreement than three wholly independent accounts could be expected to exhibit. The agreement would be no difficulty without the differences; it would only mark the one Divine source from which they are all derived—the Holy Spirit, Who spake by the Prophets. The difference of form and style, without the agreement, would offer no difficulty, since there may be a substantial harmony between accounts that differ greatly in mode of expression, and the very difference might be a guarantee of independence. The harmony and the variety, the agreement and the differences, form together the problem with which Biblical critics have occupied themselves for a century and a half.

The attempts at a solution are so many, that they can be more easily classified than enumerated. The first and most obvious suggestion would be, that the narrators made use of each other's work. Accordingly Grotius, Mill, Wetstein, Griesbach, and many others, have endeavoured to ascertain which Gospel is to be regarded as the first; which is copied from the first; and which is the last, and copied from the other two. It is remarkable that each of the six possible combinations have found advocates; and this of itself proves the uncertainty of the theory (Bp. Marsh's Michaelis, iii. 172: De Wette, Handbuch, § 22 et sqq.). When we are told by men of research that the Gospel of St. Mark is plainly founded upon the other two, as Griesbach, Böhmer, and others assure us; and again, that the Gospel of St. Mark is certainly the primitive Gospel, on which the other two are founded, as by Wilke, Bruno Bauer, and others, both sides relying mainly on facts that lie within the compass of the text, we are not disposed to expect much fruit from the discussion. But the theory in its crude form is in itself most improbable; and the wonder is that so much time and learning have been devoted to it. It assumes that an Evangelist has taken up the work of his predecessor, and without substantial alteration has made a few changes in form, a few additions and retrenchments, and has then allowed the whole to go forth under his name. Whatever order of the three is adopted to favour the hypothesis, the omission by the second or third, of matter inserted by the first, offers a great difficulty; since it would indicate a tacit opinion that these passages are either less useful or of less authority than the rest. The nature of the alterations is not such as we should expect to find in an age little given to literary composition, and in writings so simple and unlearned as these are admitted to be. The replacement of a word by a synonym, neither more nor less apt, the omission of a saying in one place and insertion of it in another, the occasional transposition of events; these are not in conformity with the habits of a time in which composition was little studied, and only practised as a necessity. These general objections will be found to take a still more cogent shape against any particular form of this hypothesis: whether it is attempted to show that the Gospel of St. Mark, as the shortest, is also the earliest and primitive Gospel, or that this very Gospel bears evident signs of being the latest, a compilation from the other two; or that the order in the Canon of Scripture is also the chronological order—and all these views have found defenders at no distant date—the theory that each Evangelist only copied from his predecessor offers the same general features, a plausible argument from a few facts, which is met by insuperable difficulties as soon as the remaining facts are taken in (Gieseler, pp. 35, 36; Bp. Marsh's Michaelis, iii., Part ii., 171 sqq.).

The supposition of a common original from which the three Gospels were drawn, each with more or less modification, would naturally occur to those who rejected the notion that the Evangelists had copied from each other. A passage of Epiphanius has been often quoted in support of this (Hæres. 51, 6), but the $\xi\lambda\ \alpha\upsilon\tau\eta\varsigma\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \pi\eta\gamma\eta\varsigma$ no doubt refers to the inspiring Spirit from which all three drew their authority, and not to any earthly copy, written or oral, of His divine message. The best notion of that class of speculations which would establish a written document as the common original of the three Gospels, will be gained perhaps from Bishop Marsh's (Michaelis, vol. iii., Part ii.) account of Eichhorn's hypothesis, and of his own additions to it. It appeared to Eichhorn that the portions which are common to all the three Gospels were contained in a certain common document, from which they all drew. Niemeyer had already assumed that copies of such a document had got into circulation, and had been altered and annotated by different hands. Now Eichhorn tries to show, from an exact comparison of passages, that "the sections, whether great or small, which are common to St. Matthew and St. Mark but not to St. Luke, and at the same time occupy places in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark which correspond to each other, were additions made in the copies used by St. Matthew and St. Mark, but not in the copy used by St. Luke; and, in like manner, that the sections found in the corresponding places of the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, but not contained in the Gospel of St. Matthew, were additions made in the copies used by St. Mark and St. Luke" (p. 192). Thus Eichhorn considers himself entitled to assume that he can reconstruct the original document, and also that there must have been four other documents to account for the phenomena of the text. Thus he makes—

1. The original document.
2. An altered copy which St. Matthew used.
3. An altered copy which St. Luke used.
4. A third copy, made from the two preceding, used by St. Mark.
5. A fourth altered copy, used by St. Matthew and St. Luke in common.

As there is no external evidence worth considering that this original or any of its numerous copies ever existed, the value of this elaborate hypothesis must depend upon its furnishing the only explanation, and that a sufficient one, of the facts of the text. Bishop Marsh, however, finds it necessary, in order to complete the account of the text, to raise the number of documents to eight, still without producing any external evidence for the existence of any of them; and this, on one side, deprives Eichhorn's theory of the merit of completeness, and, on the other, presents a much broader surface to the obvious objections. He assumes the existence of—

1. A Hebrew original.
2. A Greek translation.
3. A transcript of No. 1, with alterations and additions.
4. Another, with another set of alterations and additions.
5. Another, combining both the preceding, used by St. Mark, who also used No. 2.
6. Another, with the alterations and additions of No. 3, and with further additions, used by St. Matthew.
7. Another, with those of No. 4 and further additions, used by St. Luke, who also used No. 2.

8. A wholly distinct Hebrew document, in which our Lord's precepts, parables, and discourses were recorded, but not in chronological order; used both by St. Matthew and St. Luke.

To this it is added, that "as the Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke contain Greek translations of Hebrew materials, which were incorporated into St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel, the person who translated St. Matthew's Hebrew Gospel into Greek frequently derived assistance from the Gospel of St. Mark, where he had matter in connexion with St. Matthew: and in those places, but in those places only, where St. Mark had no matter in connexion with St. Matthew, he had frequently recourse to St. Luke's Gospel" (p. 361). One is hardly surprised after this to learn that Eichhorn soon after put forth a revised hypothesis (Einleitung in das N. T., 1804), in which a supposed Greek translation of a supposed Aramaic original took a conspicuous part; nor that Hug was able to point out that even the most liberal assumption of written documents had not provided for one case, that of the verbal agreement of St. Mark and St. Luke, to the exclusion of St. Matthew; and which, though it is of rare occurrence, would require, on Eichhorn's theory, an additional Greek version.

It will be allowed that this elaborate hypothesis, whether in the form given it by Marsh or by Eichhorn, possesses almost every fault that can be charged against an argument of that kind. For every new class of facts a new document must be assumed to have existed; and Hug's objection does not really weaken the theory, since the new class of coincidences he mentions only requires a new version of the "original Gospel" which can be supplied on demand. A theory so prolific in assumptions may still stand, if it can be proved that no other solution is possible; but since this cannot be shown, even as against the modified theory of Grätz (Neuer Versuch, &c., 1812), then we are reminded of the Schoolman's caution, entia non sunt multiplicanda præter necessitatem. To assume for every new class of facts the existence of another complete edition and recension of the original work is quite gratuitous; the documents might have been as easily supposed to be fragmentary memorials, wrought in by the Evangelists into the web of the original Gospel; or the coincidences might be, as Grätz supposes, cases where one Gospel has been interpolated by portions of another. Then the "original Gospel" is supposed to have been of such authority as to be circulated everywhere; yet so defective as to require annotation from any hand, so little revered that no hand spared it. If all the Evangelists agreed to draw from such a work, it must have been widely if not universally accepted in the Church; and yet there is no record of its existence. The force of this dilemma has been felt by the supporters of the theory: if the work was of high authority, it would have been preserved, or at least mentioned; if of lower authority, it could not have become the basis of three canonical Gospels: and various attempts have been made to escape from it. Bertholdt tries to find traces of its existence in the titles of works other than our present Gospels, which were current in the earliest ages; but Gieseler has so diminished the force of his arguments, that only one of them need here be mentioned. Bertholdt ingeniously argues that a Gospel used by St. Paul, and transmitted to the Christians in Pontus, was the basis of Marcion's Gospel; and assumes that it was also the "original Gospel:" so that in the Gospel of Marcion there would be a transcript, though corrupted, of this primitive document. But there is no proof at all that St. Paul used any written Gospel; and as to that of Marcion, if the work of Hahn had not settled the question, the researches of such writers as Volkmar, Zeller, Ritschl, and Hilgenfeld, are held to have proved that the old opinion of Tertullian and Epiphanius is also the true one, and that the so-called Gospel of Marcion was not an independent work, but an abridged version of St. Luke's Gospel, altered by the heretic to suit his peculiar tenets (see Bertholdt, iii. 1208-1223; Gieseler, p. 57; Weisse, Evangelienfrage, p. 73). We must conclude then that the work has perished without record. Not only has this fate befallen the Aramaic or Hebrew original, but the translation and the five or six recensions. But it may well be asked whether the state of letters in Palestine at this time was such as to make this constant editing, translating, annotating, and enriching of a history a natural and probable process. With the independence of the Jews their literature had declined; from the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, if a writer here and there arose, his works became known, if at all, in Greek translations through the Alexandrine Jews. That the period of which we are speaking was for the Jews one of very little literary activity, is generally admitted; and if this applies to all classes of the people, it would be true of the humble and uneducated class from which the first converts came (Acts iv. 13; Jas. ii. 5). Even the second law (δευτερονόμιος), which grew up after the Captivity, and in which the knowledge of the learned class consisted, was handed down by oral tradition, without being reduced to writing. The theory of Eichhorn is only probable amidst a people given to literary habits, and in a class of that people where education was good and literary activity likely to prevail: the conditions here are the very reverse (see Gieseler's able argument, pp. 59 sq. [ep. p. 1223]).

Bibliography.—The English student will find in Bp. Marsh's Translation of Michaelis' Introd. to N. T. iii. 2, 1803, an account of Eichhorn's earlier theory and of his own. Veysie's Examination of Mr. Marsh's Hypothesis, 1808, has suggested many of the objections. In Bp. Thirlwall's Translation of Schleiermacher on St. Luke, 1825, Introduction, is an account of the whole question. Other principal works are, an essay of Eichhorn, in the 5th vol. Allgemeine Bibliothek der biblischen Literatur, 1794; the Essay of Bp. Marsh, just quoted; Eichhorn, Einleitung in das N. T., 1804; Gratz, Neuer Versuch die Entstehung der drei ersten Evang. zu erklären, 1812; Bertholdt, Histor.-kritische Einleitung in sämtliche kanon. und apok. Schriften des A. und N. T., 1812-1819; and the work of Gieseler, quoted above. See also De Wette, Lehrbuch, and Westcott, Introduction, already quoted; also Weisse, Evangelienfrage, 1856.

There is another supposition to account for these facts, of which perhaps Gieseler has been the most acute expositor. It is probable that none of the Gospels was written until many years after the day of Pentecost, on which the Holy Spirit descended on the assembled disciples. From that day commenced at Jerusalem the work of preaching the Gospel and converting the world. So sedulous were the Apostles in this work that they divested themselves of the labour of ministering to the poor, in order that they might give themselves "continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word" (Acts vi.). Prayer and preaching were the business of their lives. Now their preaching must have been, from the nature of the case, in great part historical; it must have been based upon an account of the life and acts of Jesus of Nazareth. They had been the eye-witnesses of a wondrous life, of acts and sufferings that had an influence over all the world: many of their hearers had never heard of Jesus, and many others had received false accounts of one whom it suited the Jewish rulers to stigmatize as an impostor. The ministry of our Lord went on principally in Galilee; the first preaching was addressed to people in Judaea. There was no written record to which the hearers might be referred for historical details, and therefore the preachers must furnish not only inferences from the life of our Lord, but the facts of the life itself. The preaching, then, must have been of such a kind as to be to the hearers what the reading of lessons from the Gospels is to us. So far as the records of apostolic preaching in the Acts of the Apostles go, they confirm this view. St. Peter at Caesarea, and St. Paul at Antioch, preach alike the facts of the Redeemer's life and death. There is no improbability in supposing that in the course of twenty or thirty years' assiduous teaching, without a written Gospel, the matter of the apostolic preaching should have taken a settled form. Not only might the Apostles think it well that their own accounts should agree, as in substance so in form; but the teachers whom they sent forth, or left behind in the Churches they visited, would have to be prepared for their mission; and, so long as there was no written Gospel to put into their hands, it might be desirable that the oral instruction should be as far as possible one and the same to all. It is by no means certain that the interval between the mission of the Comforter and His work of directing the writing of the first Gospel was so long as is here supposed: the date of the Hebrew St. Matthew may be earlier. [MATTHEW.] But the argument remains the same: the preaching of the Apostles would probably begin to take one settled form, if at all, during the first years of their ministry. If it were allowed us to ask why God in His providence saw fit to defer the gift of a written Gospel to His people, the answer would be, that for the first few years the powerful working of the Holy Spirit in the living members of the Church supplied the place of those records, which, as soon as the brightness of His Presence began to be at all withdrawn, became indispensable in order to prevent the corruption of the Gospel history by false teachers. He was promised as One Who should "teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever" the Lord had "said unto them" (John xiv. 26). And more than once His aid is spoken of as needful, even for the proclamation of the facts that relate to Christ (Acts i. 8; 1 Pet. i. 12): and He is described as a witness with the Apostles, rather than through them, of the things which they had seen during the course of a ministry which they had shared (John xv. 26, 27; Acts v. 32. Cp. Acts xv. 28). The personal authority of the Apostles as eye-witnesses of what they preached is not set aside by this Divine aid: again and again they describe themselves as "witnesses" to facts (Acts ii. 32, iii. 15, x. 32, &c.); and when a vacancy occurs in their number through the fall of Judas, it is almost assumed as a thing of course that his successor shall be chosen from those "which had companied with them all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out amongst them" (Acts i. 21). The teachings of the Holy Spirit consisted, not in whispering to them facts which they had not witnessed, but rather in reviving the fading remembrance, and throwing out into their true importance events and sayings that had been esteemed too lightly at the time they took place. But the Apostles could not have spoken of the Spirit as they did (Acts v. 32, xv. 28) unless He were known to be working in and with them and directing them, and manifesting that this was the case by unmistakable signs. Here is the answer, both to the question why was it not the first care of the Apostles to prepare a written Gospel, and also to the scruples of those who fear that the supposition of an oral Gospel would give a precedent for those views of tradition which have been the bane of the Christian Church as they were of the Jewish. The guidance of the Holy Spirit supplied for a time such aid as made a written Gospel unnecessary; but the Apostles saw the dangers and errors which a traditional Gospel would be exposed to in the course of time; and, whilst they were still preaching the oral Gospel in the strength of the Holy Ghost, they were admonished by the same Divine Person to prepare those written records which were hereafter to be the daily spiritual food of all the Church of Christ.* Nor is there anything unnatural in the supposition that the Apostles intentionally uttered their witness in the same order, and even, for the most part, in the same form of words. They would thus approach most nearly to the condition in which the Church was to be when written books were to be the means of edification. They quote the scriptures of the Old Testament frequently in their discourses; and as their Jewish education had accustomed them to the use of the words of the Bible as well as the matter, they would do no violence to their prejudices in assimilating the new records to the old, and in reducing them to a "form of sound words." They were all Jews of Palestine, of humble origin, all alike chosen, we may suppose, for the loving zeal with which they would observe the works of their Master and afterwards propagate His Name; so that the tendency to variance, arising from peculiarities of education, taste, and character, would be reduced to its lowest in such a body. The language of their first preaching was the Syro-Chaldaic, which was a poor and scanty language; and though Greek was now widely spread, and was the language even of several places in Palestine (Josephus, Ant. xvi. 11, § 4; Bell. Jud. iii. 9, § 1), though it prevailed in Antioch, whence the first missions to Greeks and Hellenists, or Jews who spoke Greek, proceeded (Acts xi. 20, xiii. 1-3), the Greek tongue, as used by Jews, partook of the poverty of the speech which it replaced; as, indeed, it is impossible to borrow a whole language without borrowing the habits of thought upon which it has built itself. Whilst modern taste aims at a variety of expression, and abhors a repetition of the same phrases as monotonous, the simplicity of the men and their language and their education, and the state of literature, would all lead us to expect that the Apostles would have no such feeling. As to this, we have more than mere conjecture to rely on. Occasional repetitions occur in the Gospels (Luke vii. 19, 20; xix. 31, 34), such as a writer in a more copious and cultivated language would perhaps have sought to avoid. In the Acts, the conversion of St. Paul is three times related (Acts ix., xxii., xxvi.), once by the writer and twice by St. Paul himself; and the first two harmonize exactly, except as to a few expressions and as to one more important circumstance (ix. 7 = xxii. 9)—which, however, admits of an explanation—whilst the third deviates somewhat more in expression, and has one passage peculiar to itself. The vision of Cornelius is also three times related (Acts x. 3-6, 30-32; xi. 13, 14), where the words of the Angel in the first two are almost precisely alike, and the rest very similar, whilst the other is an abridged account of the same facts. The vision of St. Peter is twice related (Acts x. 10-16, xi. 5-10), and, except in one or two expressions, the agreement is verbally exact. These places from the Acts which, both as to their resemblance and their difference, may be compared to the narratives of the Evangelists, show the same tendency to a common form of narrative which, according to the present view, may have influenced the preaching of the Apostles. It is supposed, then, that the preaching of the Apostles, and the teaching whereby they prepared others to preach, as they did, would tend to assume a common form, more or less fixed; and that the portions of the three Gospels which harmonize most exactly owe their agreement not to the fact that they were copied from each other, although it is impossible to say that the later writer made no use of the earlier one, nor to the existence of any original document now lost to us, but to the fact that the apostolic preaching had already clothed itself in a settled or usual form of words, to which the writers inclined to conform without feeling bound to do so; and the differences which occur, often in the closest proximity to the harmonies, arise from the feeling of independence with which each wrote what he had seen and heard, or, in the case of St. Mark and St. Luke, what apostolic witnesses had told him. The harmonies, as we have seen, begin with the baptism of John; that is, with the consecration of the Lord to His Messianic office; and with this event probably the ordinary preaching of the Apostles would begin, for its purport was that Jesus is the Messiah, and that as Messiah He suffered, died, and rose again. They are very frequent as we approach the period of the Passion, because the sufferings of the Lord would be much in the mouth of every one who preached the Gospel, and all would become familiar with the words in which the Apostles described it. But as regards the Resurrection, which differed from the Passion in that it was a fact which the enemies of Christianity felt bound to dispute (Matt. xxviii. 15), it is possible that the divergence arose from the intention of each Evangelist to contribute something towards the weight of evidence for this central truth. Accordingly, all the four, even St. Mark (xvi. 1+), who oftener throws a new light upon old ground than opens out new, mention distinct acts and appearances of the Lord to establish that He was risen indeed. The verbal agreement is greater where the words of others are recorded, and greatest of all where they are those of Jesus, because here the apostolic preaching would be especially exact; and where the historical fact is the utterance of certain words, the duty of the historian is narrowed to a bare record of them (see the works of Gieseler, Norton, Westcott, Weisse, and others already quoted [cp. p. 1219]).

* The opening words of St. Luke's Gospel, "Forasmuch as many have taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us, even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word," appear to mean that many persons who heard the preaching of the Apostles wrote down what they heard, in order to preserve it in a permanent form. The word "many" cannot refer to St. Matthew and St. Mark only; and if the passage implies an intention to supersede the writings alluded to, then these two Evangelists cannot be included under them. Partial and incomplete reports of the preaching of the Apostles, written with a good aim, but without authority, are intended; and, if we may argue from St. Luke's sphere of observation, they were probably composed by Greek converts.

That this opinion would explain many of the facts connected with the text is certain. Whether, besides conforming to the words and arrangement of the apostolic preaching, the Evangelists did in any cases make use of each other's work or not, would require a more careful investigation of details to discuss than space permits. Every reader would probably find on examination some places which could best be explained on this supposition. Nor does this involve a sacrifice of the independence of the narrator. If each of the three drew the substance of his narrative from the one common strain of preaching that everywhere prevailed, to have departed entirely in a written account from the common form of words to which Christian ears were beginning to be familiar, would not have been independence but wilfulness. To follow here and there the words and arrangement of another written Gospel already current would not compromise the writer's independent position. If the principal part of the narrative was the voice of the whole Church, a few portions might be conformed to another writer without altering the character of the testimony. In the separate articles on the Gospels it will be shown that, however close may be the agreement of the Evangelists, the independent position of each appears from the contents of his Book, and has been recognised by writers of all ages. It will appear that St. Matthew describes the kingdom of Messiah, as founded in the Old Testament and fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth; that St. Mark, with so little of narrative peculiar to himself, brings out by many minute circumstances a more vivid delineation of our Lord's completely human life; that St. Luke puts forward the work of Redemption as a universal benefit, and shows Jesus not only as the Messiah of the chosen people, but as the Saviour of the world; that St. John, writing last of all, passed over most of what his predecessors had related, in order to set forth more fully all that he had heard from the Master Who loved him, of His relation to the Father, and of the relation of the Holy Spirit to both. The independence of the writers is thus established; and if they seem to have here and there used each other's account, which it is perhaps impossible to prove or disprove, such cases will not compromise that claim which alone gives value to a plurality of witnesses.

Each Gospel has its own features, but the picture which they conspire to draw is one full of harmony. The Saviour they all describe is the same loving, tender guide of His disciples, sympathising with them in the sorrows and temptations of earthly life, yet ever ready to enlighten that life by rays of truth out of the infinite world where the Father sits upon His throne. It has been said that St. Matthew portrays rather the human side, and St. John the divine; but this holds good only in a limited sense. It is in St. John that we read that "Jesus wept;" and there is nothing, even in the last discourse of Jesus, as reported by St. John, that opens a deeper view of His divine nature than the words in St. Matthew (xi. 25-30) beginning, "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." All reveal the same divine and human Teacher; four copies of the same portrait, perhaps with a difference of expression, yet still the same, are drawn here, and it is a portrait the like of which no one had ever delineated before, or indeed could have done, except from having looked upon it with observant eyes, and from having had the mind opened by the Holy Spirit to comprehend features of such unspeakable radiance. Not only does this highest "harmony of the Gospels" manifest itself to every pious reader of the Bible, but the lower harmony—the agreement of fact and word in all that relates to the ministry of the Lord, in all that would contribute to a true view of His spotless character—exists also, and cannot be denied. For example, the Synoptists tell us alike that Jesus was transfigured on the Mount; that the shekinah of divine glory shone upon His face; that Moses the lawgiver and Elijah the prophet talked with Him; and that the Voice from heaven bare witness to Him. Is it any imputation upon the truth of the histories that St. Matthew alone tells us that the witnesses fell prostrate to the earth, and that Jesus raised them; or that St. Luke alone tells us that for a part of the time they were heavy with sleep? Again, one Evangelist, in describing our Lord's temptation, follows the order of the occurrences, another arranges according to the degrees of temptation, and the third, passing over all particulars, merely mentions that our Lord was tempted. Is there anything here to shake our faith in the writers as credible historians? Do we treat other histories in this exacting spirit? Is not the very independence of treatment the pledge to us that we have really three witnesses to the fact that Jesus was tempted like as we are? for if the Evangelists were copyists, nothing would have been more easy than to remove such an obvious difference as this. The histories are true according to any test that should be applied to a history; and the events that they select—though we could not presume to say that they were more important than what are omitted, except from the fact of the omission—are at least such as to have given the whole Christian Church a clear conception of the Redeemer's life, so that none has ever complained of insufficient means of knowing Him.

There is a perverted form of the theory we are considering which pretends that the facts of the Redeemer's life remained in the state of an oral tradition till the latter part of the second century, and that the four Gospels were not written till that time. The difference is not of degree but of kind between the opinion that the Gospels were written during the lifetime of the Apostles, who were eye-witnesses, and the notion that for nearly a century after the oldest of them had passed to his rest the events were only preserved in the changeable and insecure form of an oral account. But for the latter opinion there is not one spark of historical evidence. Heretics of the second century, who would gladly have rejected and exposed a new Gospel that made against them, never hint that the Gospels are spurious; and orthodox writers ascribe without contradiction the authorship of the Books to those whose names they bear. The theory was invented to accord with the assumption that miracles are impossible, but upon no evidence whatever; and the argument when exposed runs in this vicious circle:—"There are no miracles, therefore the accounts of them must have grown up in the course of a century from popular exaggeration; and as the accounts are not contemporaneous, it is not proved that there are miracles!" That the Jewish mind in its lowest decay should have invented the character of Jesus of Nazareth, and the sublime system of morality contained in His teaching—that four writers should have fixed the popular impression in four plain, simple, unadorned narratives, without any outbursts of national prejudice, or any attempt to give a political tone to the events they wrote of—would be in itself a miracle harder to believe than that Lazarus came out at the Lord's call from his four-days' tomb.

For a detailed harmony of the four Gospels the following works may be consulted:—Griesbach, Synopsis Evangeliorum, 1776; De Wette and Lücke, Syn. Evang. 1842; Rüdiger, Syn. Evang. 1829; Clausen, Quatuor Evang. Tabulae Synopticae, 1829; Greswell's Harmony and Dissertations, a most important work; the Rev. I. Williams On the Gospels; Theile's Greek Testament; and Tischendorf's Syn. Evang. 1854; besides the well-known works of Lightfoot, Macknight, Newcome, and Robinson. [W. T.]

SUPPLEMENT.

History of the Criticism of the Synoptic Gospels, 1863-1888.—The year 1863, in which the first edition of this Dictionary appeared, might be said to mark a turning-point in the history of Synoptic criticism. For some twenty years up to that date, in the land in which criticism generally was most active, the Tübingen School had been in the ascendant. This school owed its characteristics to the remarkable talent for speculative and historical combination possessed by its founder, F. C. Baur. At the basis of his criticism of the Gospels lay a comprehensive theory as to the history and development of Christianity in the first two centuries. Up to the middle of the second century the dominant form of Christianity was Ebionite or Judaizing. At the opposite pole to this lay the teaching of St. Paul. And out of the gradual reconciliation and combination of these two great opposing forces Catholic Christianity at last took its rise. Our present Gospels are the result of this historical process. They reflect and represent its course. We can still trace in them a number of distinct layers, as it were, of dogmatic tendency, deposited one after the other. What comes to us as history was really the clothing in narrative forms of ideas and doctrines. "The Evangelists," wrote Hasert, the so-called "Saxon Anonymus," in words adopted by Schwegler (Nachapost. Zeitalt. ii. p. 41), "were by no means the simple fisher-folk for which they have been taken, but they have a very delicate touch, and are in part extremely skilful and penetrating persons (tiefsinnige Geister). Not one little word in their writings, not even the most insignificant, has been chosen by them without the most deliberate intention and a very special object"—that object being, as the writer goes on to explain, the promotion of the views of that party in the Church to which each in turn belonged. As Baur and his followers took as their starting-point Ebionitism, it was natural that they should find the earliest stratum of evangelical composition in those documents which are historically associated with the Ebionite party. At the bottom of all came the Gospel according to the Hebrews and other kindred writings—the Gospel according to the Egyptians, and the Gospel according to Peter—of all of which only small fragments have come down to us. Latest in the group was our present St. Matthew—a composite work, in which the different elements were only roughly and imperfectly harmonized: one set of sayings which implied the permanence of the Mosaic Law and of the Temple-ritual appearing side by side with another which spoke of new wine in new bottles and distinctly recognised the admission of the Gentiles. Not dissimilar in its composite character, though rounded off by superior literary skill, was the Gospel which marked the corresponding approximation of parties from the Pauline side, our present St. Luke. Here, too, Ebionite and Pauline elements were combined, the latter preponderating and forming the groundwork of the Gospel: both elements were brought nearer to each other by mutual concessions. The process of reconciliation was completed in our present St. Mark, the last of all the documents on the Jewish-Christian side, but in which the interests of party shaded off into neutrality. This latest of the Gospels was really little more than a colourless epitome of the other two. By this time Catholic Christianity, or the union of modified Paulinism with modified Ebionitism, was fully established. The literary process occupied just the middle decades of the second century, extending from about the year 130 to 170. The canonical St. Matthew fell about the earlier date.

It will be seen that this was essentially a historical theory. Baur and Schweigler, who may be taken as its most thoroughgoing representatives, both paid considerable attention to the passages quoted from the writings of the second century as evidence for the use of our present Gospels; and such controversies as took place within the School, like that as to the relation of the canonical St. Luke to the Gospel used by Marcion, turned largely upon questions of this kind. But the foundation on which the theory rested was the assumed persistence of Ebionite or Judaizing Christianity within the Church, and the gradual amalgamation of its doctrines with those of Paulinism. The speculative, dogmatic reconstruction came first in order of time, and the literary criticism had to follow in its train. It was a theory impressed from above downwards. See especially for the above: Schweigler, Das nachapostolische Zeitalter, Tübingen, 1846; Baur, Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanonischen Evangelien, Tübingen, 1847.

It was against this method that the year 1863 brought a reaction. Not of course that the Tübingen theory had passed without opposition in its earlier stages. It always had a declared and uncompromising antagonist in Ewald. And the seeds of the theory which was to receive fuller development in the next period had already been laid simultaneously by Weiss and Wilke in 1838. But the publication of Holtzmann's Die Synoptischen Evangelien in 1863 was practically a new departure. Instead of approaching the inquiry from above, it approached it from below. It began, not with broad general conceptions, but with a close and searching examination of the language of the Gospels and of their relation to one another. And the method thus inaugurated has been followed by the majority of the more recent workers in this department of criticism. The influence of Baur has been felt far beyond the limits of his more immediate following, but for the last eight-and-twenty years the method principally in vogue has been the opposite of his, and its resources do not yet seem to be exhausted.

Subsequent History of the Tübingen Theory.—In tracing the history of this more recent period it will probably conduce to clearness of presentation if we take each of the competing theories separately. And first to follow the fortunes of the Tübingen theory of which we have just been speaking. From the first the Tübingen School had its right or more conservative wing. While Ritschl was revising and fundamentally modifying the whole theory of historical development put forward by Baur, Hilgenfeld was throwing back the dates assigned to the canonical Gospels, and in particular contending for the priority of St. Mark over St. Luke; Volkmar, Professor at Zürich, who in other respects cannot be called a conservative, was demonstrating the traditional view of the relation of Marcion to St. Luke. When the author of Supernatural Religion brought this latter controversy on to English ground, he felt himself compelled after a time to abandon his position. The originality of St. Luke therefore, in relation to Marcion, is one of the points on which scholars may be said to be generally agreed, unless the question is to be re-opened, as so many others have been, in Holland. The veteran Hilgenfeld has not relaxed his exertions, but has gone on maintaining his position against all comers. In his Introduction (Einleitung in d. N. T.), which came out in 1875, he formulates his views in some such way as this. The First Gospel, which, like Baur, he regards as a more or less radical recension of an older Gospel akin to the Gospel according to the Hebrews, he places very soon (ebbetw., Matt. xxiv. 29) after the destruction of Jerusalem. The Second Gospel follows in the early years of the reign of Domitian (81–96 A.D.). It is throughout dependent upon the first, with the addition of a Petrine tradition (p. 516). The association of this Gospel with St. Mark, as directly or indirectly responsible for its contents, is not without foundation. Its tendency is Petrine. The third Evangelist has used St. Matthew's Gospel in both its forms, and also the canonical St. Mark, besides the Gospel according to the Hebrews and other documents. His work was composed towards the end of Domitian's reign in the interests of Paulinism.

More upon the original lines of Baur, though with some recession in regard to dates, was the arrangement advocated in England by Dr. S. Davidson. The original Aramaic Gospel, which was really the work of St. Matthew, he would place between 60–70 A.D.; our present recension of it later; our third Gospel (not the work of St. Luke) about 110, and the second about 120 (Introduction to the N. T., 2nd ed., 1882).

On the extreme verge of the School, and representing its doctrines in their most moderate form, would stand Dr. Keim. Beginning life as a pupil of Baur, and inheriting his methods, he yet reduced Baur's conclusions in every direction within far more sober limits. Keim held that the First Gospel was in the main written about the year 66, in the time of feverish expectation which preceded the great catastrophe of the fall of Jerusalem. Some thirty years after that event it received some not extensive interpolations, which betray themselves as such by breaking the connexion of the narrative or bearing signs of later origin. The passages thus obliterated were Matt. i. 18–ii. 23; iii. 14, 15; viii. 11, 12; xxii. 1–14; xxv. 1–12; xxvii. 3–10, 19, 62–66; xxviii. 11–15 (Gesch. Jes. v. Naz. i. pp. 61–63). The author of these additions also revised and edited the whole. The Third Gospel Keim placed in the "times of the Gentiles" (Luke xxi. 24), i.e. about the year 90 A.D. The author, he thinks, had the First Gospel before him, not in its revised but in its original form; and he had besides a version of the Discourses later than that embodied in the First Gospel. Side by side with these documents, both of Jewish-Christian origin, he had others of a more Pauline character—one containing the Samaritan episodes and perhaps the sending of the Seventy, others which more directly breathed the spirit of the Pauline Gospel. Keim saw no reason to doubt the identity of the Evangelist with the companion of St. Paul. The last of the Synoptics, St. Mark, he assigned approximately to the year 100; and in regard to this he adhered to the view of Baur, that it was for the most part a cento made up from St. Matthew and St. Luke. What was not referable to these sources was derived from oral, or more probably written (Jewish-Christian) tradition. In the popular abridged edition of his larger work, which represents in some respects his later views, Keim moved forward the dates which he had assigned to the Gospels. The revision of St. Matthew was now circa 100 A.D.; St. Luke about the same date, the authorship by St. Paul's companion being abandoned; St. Mark about 120. At a still later date Keim showed a disposition to make concessions to his opponents, and to take up a position which he described as "more eclectic": "On the ground of renewed study of the passages in Papias and of the groups of discourse in Matt. and Luke," he was no longer prepared "to stand unconditionally in the way of the theory of two main documents, one containing chiefly discourse and the other narrative" (Aus dem Urchristenthum, Zürich, 1878, p. 30).

A truer representative of the old Tübingen tradition is Dr. C. Holsten of Heidelberg, though he too has very considerably modified the ground-conception of the history on which the Tübingen theory was based. Dr. Holsten's work on the Synoptic Gospels was published in two parts: the first, entitled Die drei ursprünglichen, noch ungeschriebenen Evangelien, came out in 1883; the second, Die Synoptischen Evangelien nach der Form ihres Inhaltes, in 1885. The first of these is a masterly sketch of the position of parties in the Christian Church at the period in which the Gospels were composed. It is the Tübingen theory stripped of its exaggerations, conformed to facts, and presented with great literary skill. On the basis of this investigation into the history of doctrine Dr. Holsten attempts in his second treatise to explain the growth of the Synoptic Gospels. The development of doctrine is the only factor which he recognises; and with its help he maintains the thesis in all its boldness that our present St. Mark is a direct and conscious transformation of our present St. Matthew, and the canonical St. Luke in like manner a direct and conscious transformation of its two predecessors. The First Gospel is Petrine, the Second and Third represent different shades of Paulinism. It is the old Tendenz-Kritik in its most logical and thoroughgoing form. Dr. Holsten is, however, careful to guard against the supposition that he uses it in any disparaging sense. He fully recognises the legitimacy of the Pauline conceptions, and he sees in the Gospels which embody that conception the spontaneous outcome of a deep and creative religious movement.

The second of these two treatises of Holsten's is as disputable as the first was instructive, and the scanty approval with which it has been received is significant as a sign of the times. The Tübingen theory suggested points of view which must not be lost sight of: it contained elements of truth which have passed into other systems. Doctrinal tendencies do leave their mark upon documents and enable us to fit them into their historical surroundings. But the Tübingen construction of history, though suggestive, was faulty; and the application of it as a hypothesis to account for the literary composition of the Gospels was to a large extent misplaced and wholly inadequate. Men like Hilgenfeld and Keim learnt as much from their opponents as from their teachers, and therefore still deserve a hearing; but the more pronounced forms of the Tübingen theory have had their day. The dates which they assigned to the Gospels were impossible: the recondite motives and diplomatic finesse which they attributed to their authors were an anachronism: and from the point of view of inductive criticism, their method was a ὕστερον πρότερον—it came to the study of the Gospel texts last instead of first; and it brought its solutions ready-made to the facts, instead of waiting for the facts, by classification and analysis, to point the way to their own solution.

The Hypothesis of Oral Tradition.—In strong contrast to the Tendenz-Kritik, which seeks a doctrinal motive for every literary variation, is the hypothesis which would base our Gospels, as we have them, directly and without the intervention of other documents on the oral tradition of the primitive Church. This hypothesis, first put forward in 1818 by Gieseler, during the last five-and-twenty years has had but few voices raised in its favour on the Continent. Godet and one or two Roman Catholic commentators (not including Schanz, the latest and probably the best among them) have been its chief representatives. During the same period in England it would have a better claim than any other to be considered the dominant theory. This is probably due in great measure to the wide-spread influence of Dr. Westcott, by whom the theory was adopted in his Introduction to the Study of the Gospels (1st ed. under the title Elements of the Gospel Harmony, a Norrisian Prize Essay, in 1851; 2nd ed. under its present title in 1860; 7th ed. 1888). The same theory was advocated by Abp. Thomson, both in the first edition of this Dictionary and in the introduction to Vol. I. of the Speaker's Commentary. Bp. Lightfoot gave it incidental support by arguing that the documents mentioned by Papias might well be our first two Gospels (Contemp. Rev., August 1875, reprinted in Essays on Supernatural Religion, p. 142 sq.). And it has been accepted by Dean Plumptre, Archdeacon Farrar, Dr. Lumbly, and many others.

It is not difficult to understand the attractions of this hypothesis, especially for an English mind. It accounts at once simply and naturally, and without having recourse to any hypercritical theorizing, for all the differences between the Gospels. And it has the great recommendation that on the Baconian principle, Hypotheses non fingo, it dispenses with the necessity for inventing any other documents than those which have actually come down to us. The objections to assuming an earlier St. Matthew than our present St. Matthew or an earlier St. Mark than our present St. Mark are stated especially by Dr. Salmon with great force (Introduction, pp. 86 sq., 5th ed.). On the other hand, there is much reason to doubt whether the German writers, like Weiss (Leben Jesu, i. p. 27), who are strongest in their condemnation of the oral theory, have really done justice to it. With all their learning and powers of analysis, it is perhaps a question whether the Germans do not come somewhat short in historical imagination. In reading many theories on the origin of the Gospels we do not seem to get clear of the nineteenth-century study or lecture-room. Yet Palestine in the time of Christ was something very different from these. The Jews at this time were essentially a people of tradition. The sayings of the Talmud were handed down for centuries from mouth to mouth before they were committed to writing. The Targums, or Aramaic paraphrases of the Old Testament Scriptures, repeated at the reading of the lessons in the synagogues, were forbidden to be set down in writing. Reader and interpreter followed each other alternately, and the interpreter was obliged to speak from memory: he was not allowed to consult a book. The earliest written Targums of which we hear date from the first century, and these were of Books like Job and Esther, which were not read in the public services. The Jews therefore were in the habit of transmitting orally long strings of connected sayings: the memory was constantly practised: written compositions were the exception, and oral transmission the rule.

Our own theologians have very rightly laid stress on this characteristic of Jewish life. And when it is urged against them that the original tradition would be in Aramaic and not in Greek, that too, at least on the negative side, is not so certain. The number of synagogues in Jerusalem was counted by hundreds (Edersheim, Life, &c., i. p. 119). Many of these, like the synagogues of the Libertines, Cyrenians, and Alexandrians in which St. Stephen disputed (Acts vi. 9), would be specially intended for the Greek-speaking Jews who came up as pilgrims to the feasts. It was just among these Greek-speaking Jews that the Christian propaganda was most successful; and it seems far from improbable that a special cycle of teaching would be arranged for their benefit. The foreign Jews more than the natives would need to have the picture of the words and acts of Christ set before them.

On all these grounds it would seem that a stronger case can be made out for the oral hypothesis than is often acknowledged. And yet even when due allowance has been made for them, it is still not clear that the hypothesis is adequate to account for the facts. If we put aside for the moment the differences between the three Synoptic Gospels and look only at the agreement, we shall find that that agreement is of the most thorough and searching kind. It is agreement (1) in the selection of incidents and sayings, (2) in their order, (3) in turns of phrase which an oral tradition, however close, would not be likely to preserve. A few words may be said on each of these points.

(1) Selection of Narratives.—We are often reminded that the Synoptic Gospels are even at best a very fragmentary record. The Ephesian editor of St. John was so impressed with the abundance of the facts to be recorded as to give utterance to the hyperbole that if all were written down "the world itself should not contain the books that should be written" (John xxi. 25). And yet the Synoptic Gospels, with all their repetitions, only fill a very slender volume. They themselves afford evidence enough that what they contain is not the whole—even in outline—but mere samples of the incidents in the life of Christ. They all alike refer to numbers of miracles of which they only particularise the same select few. They tell of the woe denounced upon Chorazin and Bethsaida for their unbelief in face of the wonders that had been wrought in them. And yet not one of the wonders wrought in these cities do they record. Scattered over the Synoptic Gospels there are divers hints of a Judaean ministry: and yet if we had had these Gospels alone, we should have had no direct intimation that our Lord during His public ministry had ever travelled southwards from Galilee. The Fourth Gospel throws into relief the omissions of the Synoptists: but the greater those omissions, the more remarkable is it that they should coincide in their choice of incidents to the extent they do.

(2) Order of Narratives.—Nor does the strength of the case lie only in the fact that the same incidents are chosen. The order in which they occur is a more or less artificial one; and yet that order is practically the same—at least the divergences are transparent enough to let the fundamental order be seen through them. There is a normal order of the incidents in the Synoptic Gospels which underlies all three, and is capable of being recovered. Much might be said on this head, which was made the special subject of a paper read at Oxford in 1886 by the Rev. F. H. Woods [since published in Studia Biblica, ii. 59 sq.]. It must suffice to refer to that paper here, or to the discussions in Holtzmann or Weiss.

(3) Coincidences of Language.—It is hard to believe that these coincidences in order are such as could be accounted for by the observance of a set type in preaching or catechetical instruction. And the difficulty is increased when we come to note the kind of coincidences which also occur in phraseology. We might well conceive that, even in an oral Gospel, "single phrases would be impressed with peculiar force," and that there would be a "recurrence of strange words in the same connexion in the different Evangelists, even when the construction of the sentence was changed" (Westcott, Introduction, p. 193, ed. 3). But the actual agreement in the Synoptics goes beyond this. It extends to phrases which are mere connecting links between the sections, and which are just of a kind that in a purely oral tradition would be the first to vary. It is easy to give examples. We may take for instance four of the first consecutive sections in St. Mark's Gospel.

Mark i. 16.

Καὶ παρῶν παρὰ τὴν θάλασσαν τῆς Γαλιλαίας εἶδεν Σίμωνα καὶ Ἀνδρέαν τὸν ἀδελφὸν Σίμωνος ἀμφιβάλλοντας ἐν τῇ θαλάσῃ ἦσαν γὰρ ἀλείτι.

Matt. iv. 18.

Περπατῶν δὲ παρὰ τὴν θάλασσαν τῆς Γαλιλαίας εἶδεν δύο ἀδελφοὺς, Σίμωνα τὸν λεγόμενον Πέτρον καὶ Ἀνδρέαν τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ, βάλλοντας ἀμφιβληστῶν εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν ἦσαν γὰρ ἀλείτι.

Observe especially the last clause, "for they were fishers." This might indeed be thought to be superfluous, and it would be so anywhere but in this naive and simple kind of composition. But in any case it is in a high degree improbable that two independent versions of a story orally repeated would not only both concur in introducing such a clause, but introduce it precisely at the same place. The conclusion seems almost inevitable that the two Evangelists are copying, not slavishly but freely, not as scribes but as historians, from a common document.

In the next section the coincidence is between St. Mark and St. Luke.

The next section belongs to the triple Synopsis:—

Mark viii. 14.

Και ἔβλεψεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν Πέτρον· καὶ εἶπεν αὐτῷ· βεβλημένη καὶ πυρέσσουσα.

Mark i. 29, 30.

Και εὐθὺς ἐκ τῆς συναγωγῆς ἐξελθόντες ἦλθον εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν Σίμωνος καὶ Ἀνδρίου μετὰ Ἰακώβου καὶ Ἰωάννου· ἡ δὲ πενθερὰ Σίμωνος κατεκετο πυρέσσουσα.

Luke iv. 38.

Ἀναστὰς δὲ ἀπὸ τῆς συναγωγῆς εἰσῆλθες εἰς τὴν οἰκίαν Σίμωνος· πενθερὰ δὲ τοῦ Σίμωνος ἦν συνεχόμενη πυρετῇ μεγάλῃ.

This is not one of the sections that we should choose to prove the dependence of the threefold narrative on a document rather than on tradition. For its proper appreciation it would require a systematic examination of the method and style of each of the three Evangelists. And yet it should be noticed how closely the steps in the narrative correspond—the synagogue; the house; the sick woman; her relationship to Peter; the nature of her sickness. We cannot perhaps say beforehand that an oral tradition would not preserve all these steps, but they are at least more easily explicable on the assumption of a common document. An exception is presented by the additions in St. Mark ("the house of Simon and Andrew, with James and John"). These would of course be quite as consistent with oral tradition. At the same time they do not cause any real difficulty when they come to be considered in connexion with the general relations of the three Gospels.

After describing the incident in Peter's house, the triple narrative proceeds:—

Matt. viii. 16.

Ὁσίως δὲ γενομένης προσήνεκον αὐτῷ θαυμασιωμένους κ.τ.λ.

Mark i. 32.

Ὁσίως δὲ γενομένης, ὅτε ἐδοῦ ὁ ἥλιος ἔφερον πρὸς αὐτὸν πάντας κ.τ.λ.

Luke iv. 40.

Δύοντος δὲ τοῦ ἡλίου ἅπαντες . . . ἦγαγον . . . πρὸς αὐτόν.

This passage raises a question with which we shall have to deal presently, viz. as to the relative priority or closeness to the original (whether oral or written) of the three Gospels. It has been actually suggested that St. Mark's double phrase, "at even"—"when the sun set," was a compound of which one part was taken from St. Matthew, the other from St. Luke; but Holtzmann very rightly replies to this that the mention of the sun setting is by no means so redundant as it may seem; the day being a Sabbath, the people would not be allowed to move their sick until sunset (Einleitung, p. 344). We may certainly discard the notion that St. Mark has pieced together two phrases that lay before him in different documents; but there is nothing at all unnatural in supposing that the other two Evangelists drawing independently of each other from a document like our St. Mark, the one chose one phrase and the other another. This is just what might be expected to happen under the circumstances, though it might happen equally well if the common basis was oral. The reason why the section is referred to here is as showing that not merely the substance of the narratives but even the introductory phrases and links of transition present strong features of identity. The four sections together were taken almost at random as an average specimen of the Synoptic narrative, and yet all yield evidence—the first two strong evidence—that the hypothesis of a written document will better account for the phenomena than the hypothesis of oral tradition.

No doubt the strongest point in the passages just quoted is the identical insertion by St. Matthew and St. Mark of the explanatory clause ἦσαν γὰρ ἄλλεῖς. One more striking example may be given of the same thing, from the narrative of the Betrayal.

Matt. xxvi. 47.

Καὶ ἐπὶ αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος ἰδοὺ Ἰούδας εἰς τῶν δώδεκα ἦλθεν καὶ μετ' αὐτοῦ ὄχλος πολὺς κ.τ.λ.

Mark xiv. 43.

Και εὐθὺς ἐπὶ αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος παραγίνεται Ἰούδας ὁ Ἰσκαριώτης, εἰς τῶν δώδεκα, καὶ μετ' αὐτοῦ ὄχλος κ.τ.λ.

Luke xxii. 47.

Ἐπὶ αὐτοῦ λαλοῦντος, ἰδοὺ ὄχλος, καὶ ὁ λεγόμενος Ἰούδας εἰς τῶν δώδεκα προήρχετο αὐτούς κ.τ.λ.

How is it that all three Evangelists must needs tell us precisely at this point that Judas was "one of the Twelve"? It is not that he had not been mentioned before, for he had been mentioned several times, and once with a coincidence similar to this of which we are speaking; for when his name occurs in the list of the Apostles all the Evangelists alike take occasion to stigmatize him as "the traitor" (Matt. x. 4 = Mark iii. 19 = Luke vi. 16). We should not be surprised if some one writer, seeking to heighten the guilt of Judas, had thought fit to remind us that he had been numbered among the Apostles; but when three together conspire to remind us of this at the very same juncture in the narrative, some more substantial explanation appears to be needed than is supplied by oral tradition.

Phenomena like these seem to drive us back upon the hypothesis of a common written document. But there is one passage which goes even further, and contains what can scarcely be called an equivocal allusion to that document itself. When they are recording the prognostication of the signs which are to precede the coming of the End, the first two Evangelists at least appear as if they were conscious that the observation of those signs was a matter of very pressing moment for their readers.

Ὅταν ὁὖν ἴδῃτε τὸ βδέλυμα
μα τῆς ἐρημίσεως τὸ ρηθὲν διὰ Δαυὶδ τοῦ προφήτου ἵσταν ἐν τόπῳ ἁγίῳ (ὁ ἀναγινώσκων νοεῖτω), τότε οἱ ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ φεγγήτωσαν κ.τ.λ.

Mark xiii. 14.

Ὅταν δὲ ἴδῃτε τὸ βδέλυμα
μα τῆς ἐρημίσεως ἑστηκότα ὅπου οὐ δεῖ (ὁ ἀναγινώσκων νοεῖτω), τότε οἱ ἐν τῇ Ἰου-δαίᾳ φεγγήτωσαν κ.τ.λ.

"Let him that readeth understand." "Him that readeth"—what? The two Evangelists of course mean, what they are writing. But they would hardly coincide in inserting the warning, in the same words, at exactly the same place in the sentence, unless it were suggested to them from without. But this external suggestion is not given by oral tradition: it is not "him that heareth," but "him that readeth." We seem to be shut up to the conclusion that both made use of a common written document from which the phrase was derived.

This written document then seems to be removed out of the category of fictitious entities, and therefore is proof against the satire which is sometimes directed against those who assume the existence of what appear to be such entities. It is true that the theory implies that a document, which might be described as a Gospel, has been lost. But other books which would otherwise have been included in the New Testament have been lost. This is certainly the case with at least one Epistle of St. Paul's (1 Cor. v. 9): and we have only to go to St. Luke's Preface to see that Gospels fared like Epistles. The wonder would really have been if all the writings of the apostolic age had come down to us. And not only is there room for apostolic writings to be lost, but there is also room for them to be transformed in the process by which they have reached us. Those who argue to the contrary do not sufficiently consider the peculiar conditions under which those writings arose. It is hard to divest ourselves of the associations of a literary age. We are apt to write and speak as if we supposed that there must have been always historians at hand to chronicle the appearance of every new composition. Anyone who has made a close study, e.g. of the Versions of the Bible, will know how erroneous such an idea would be. The great difficulty which besets the origin of the Gospels arises from the fact that they grew up, as it were, in the dark, and that their early history can only be recovered by analysis. They grew up, too, under conditions that have probably never been repeated. The primitive Christians, with extremely few exceptions, did not belong to the literary classes. The earliest written records were not composed by literary men; and those into whose hands they fell would not treat them as we treat books, least of all as we should treat the Bible. There was a sacredness about them no doubt, but the sacredness attached to the things recorded, not to the records. The chief desire of each individual would be to have a full collection of the facts; he would be far less careful where his facts came from. We have examples of the process from a time when it was rapidly waning in the interpolations which the so-called Western text (Cod. Bezae, the Old Latin, and the Old Syriac) admitted during the course of the second century. By the close of that century, the time of Irenaeus, the process was practically at an end. But it is uncritical to transfer the conditions of 160-200 A.D., or even those of the forty years preceding, to the latter half of the apostolic and the sub-apostolic age. When, therefore, the famous passages which Eusebius quotes from Papias describe the circumstances under which St. Matthew and St. Mark wrote their Gospels, it does not at once follow that the Gospels of which he is speaking are in all respects the same as those which we have now, or even those which Papias himself had. Papias probably did not ask himself the question whether they were or whether they were not. The tradition that reached him was a historical tradition, and came to him as a matter of history. It would be a further and distinct step to turn that history into an instrument of criticism, and see whether the accounts he heard of their origin corresponded exactly with the characteristics of the Gospels which he was in the habit of using. If any change, or accretion of changes, took place, it would be in that disturbed and obscure time which immediately followed the taking of Jerusalem. It would be a great chance if anyone consciously observed the change as it was being made, and a still greater that he should take note of it in writing, and that his note should be preserved. The earliest stages in the transmission of the New Testament Books, we may be sure from the nature of the case, would be of a very peculiar kind. They would not be copied mechanically by professional scribes, but they would be copied with a certain amount of freedom by persons who were not tied by professional scruples, and from no bad motive, but from a natural interest, made use of the MS. before them to place on record particulars which they had got from other sources. And the nearer we go back to the actual composition of the Books, the greater would the liberties taken with them be. Nor have we any guarantee that copies so treated would not come down to us. The tendency would be to preserve the fullest copy rather than the purest.

We are able then, if this reasoning holds, to approach the documentary hypothesis without prejudice, not only in itself, but even if in any of its forms it should involve some distinction between the Gospels mentioned by Papias and those which now bear the same names. We know from the express statement of St. Luke that there were many Gospels in his day. But it would surely be strange, and not the reverse, if these Gospels should have been existing side by side with our present St. Matthew and St. Mark, and yet that those two Gospels should be in no literary relation to them, but exclusively based upon oral tradition.

The Hypothesis of common Documentary Sources.—The way is now clear for the more direct discussion of this hypothesis. In Germany, as we have already said, it has had the field almost to itself during the period of which we are speaking. It has, however, taken a number of different and often complicated forms; and we shall perhaps best avoid the confusing effect of enumerating these if we first give a mere outline of the contributions that have been made to the study of the subject, reserving details, and then break up the problem into its parts and endeavour to show how each of these has been treated separately.

The threshold of the period is marked, as we began by saying, by the appearance of Dr. H. J. Holtzmann's Die Synoptischen Evangelien (Leipzig, 1863), a work following in the train of Weiss and Wilke (see above, p. 1218), but more thorough and searching than any that had preceded it. In his latest publication, the Einleitung in d. N. T. (1st ed. 1885, 2nd ed. 1887), Dr. Holtzmann has announced some changes of opinion which will be noted below. Within a year of Dr. Holtzmann's appeared another able treatise, also maintaining the documentary hypothesis, by Dr. C. Weizsäcker, Untersuchungen über die evangelische Geschichte, ihre Quellen und den Gang ihrer Entwicklung (Gotha, 1864). Dr. Weizsäcker, too, has recently had the opportunity of reviewing his previous work in Das Apostolische Zeitalter (Freiburg i. B., 1886). Of this also details will be given below. The articles "Evangelien," "Geschichtsquellen des N. T." in vol. ii., "Johannes" in vol. iii., and "Lukas," "Markus," "Matthäus" in vol. iv. of Schenkel's Bibel-Lexikon (Leipzig, 1869, 1871, 1872), were all written by Holtzmann; they were excellent summaries at the time when they were written, and are still by no means without their interest. In 1872 began a series of very solid and elaborate works by Dr. B. Weiss, developing in detail views to which he had previously given a general expression: Das Marcusevangelium, Berlin, 1872; Das Matthäusevangelium und seine Lucas-Parallelen, Halle, 1876; Das Leben Jesu, Berlin, 1882; Einleitung in das N. T., Berlin, 1886. Besides these more important works both Dr. Holtzmann and Dr. Weiss had written frequently in periodicals, in part contraverting the special views of each other. By the side of Weiss' Leben Jesu mention should be made of another book of the same kind and with the same title (Halle, 1885, 1st ed.; 1887, 2nd ed.), by Dr. Willibald Beyschlag. Dr. Beyschlag had been an eager student of the Synoptic problem, and had written articles upon it in the Studien u. Kritiken, of which he was joint editor. In the Introduction to his Leben Jesu he gave a summary of results which are much upon the same lines as those of Dr. Holtzmann, though obtained by independent study. The first introductory part of Die Lehre Jesu by Dr. H. H. Wendt (Göttingen) is really an elaborate treatise of nearly 350 pages, on the Gospels, and it has at least the merit of being based upon a very close analysis of the texts.

When we have mentioned Scholten in Holland (Het oudste Evangelie, 1868, with a German translation by Redepenning, Elberfeld, 1869; Het paulinisch Evangelium, 1870, also translated, Elberfeld, 1881), Renan in France (esp. Les Évangiles, Paris, 1877), and Dr. Edwin A. Abbott in England (art. "Gospels" in the Encyclopaedia Britannica), though the list might be considerably lengthened, we shall probably have mentioned the most important productions on this side of the question.

Let us first see what all these various works have in common before we proceed to consider the points on which they diverge. Two leading principles which it is believed that they all have more or less in common, are (1) the acceptance of the statements made by Papias; (2) the belief in the priority (at least for a great part of the Gospel) of St. Mark.

(1.) The Statements of Papias.—We might go further and say that in contradistinction to the upholders of oral tradition, the writers of whom we have been speaking are unanimously of opinion that whatever may be the case in regard to St. Mark, the Gospel attributed by Papias to St. Matthew was not our present Gospel, but an older document, of smaller extent, incorporated in that Gospel. This older document they regard as in the main a "collection of discourses," interpreting λόγια (lit. "oracles") in that sense. Now it must be admitted that Bp. Lightfoot proved in his article in the Contemporary Review (Aug. 1875) that the word does not necessarily bear this sense, and that it would fit just as well a mixed record of acts and discourses, like our Gospel. At the same time it must also be admitted that the word might have the more limited signification, or at least might be applied to a document of which this more limited description might be given. If the advocates of the document theory took the statement of Papias as their text, and argued from it downwards, their position would be untenable: it would at most amount to a possibility that might be true or might not. They have, however, pursued the more critical method of keeping their analysis of the texts distinct from their interpretation of Papias, and only combining the two because they are found at the end of the process to coincide. Papias then gives us two main documents,—a Gospel by St. Mark, which, if not our present Gospel, might be very like it, and a collection of discourses composed by St. Matthew. Of the more exact composition of each of these documents we shall have to speak immediately.

(2.) Priority of St. Mark.—By "priority" of St. Mark is meant here, either that our St. Mark came first of the three Synoptics in order of time, or that our St. Mark represents most nearly in the greater number of its parts the original Gospel which gave the framework to the others. This is the direct antithesis to the view of St. Augustine ("Marcus Mattheum subsecutus, tanquam pedisequus et brevior ejus videtur," De Cons. Ev. i. 2, § 4), and of the older Tübingen School which regarded St. Mark as a mere epitome of St. Matthew. The inversion of this view is due mainly to two arguments: (1) an examination of the order of the narratives in all three Gospels; (2) an examination of their language. (1) The position of the writers of whom we are speaking is based upon this main fact, that by assuming the order of the narratives observed by St. Mark it is not only possible but easy to explain the order of the other two Evangelists; while, on the other hand, by assuming the order either of St. Matthew or of St. Luke, we should be wholly unable to explain the order of the remaining Gospels. If we divide St. Mark's Gospel into three sections—(a) i. 1—iii. 6; (b) iii. 7—vi. 13; (c) vi. 14—xvi. 8—we shall find that in section a the order (but for some insertions on St. Luke's part) is practically identical with that of St. Luke, and that in section c the order is similarly identical with that of St. Matthew. Section b is more broken, but here too the order of St. Mark has alternately the support of one or other of the companion Gospels. The cases in which one or other of these Gospels diverges from the order of St. Mark are accounted for either by the general characteristics of the Gospel in question or by some particular feature in the portion of narrative which is transposed. This aspect of the subject has been worked out with great care by Mr. F. H. Woods in the paper mentioned above. It is not contended that the order of St. Mark, though in the main chronological, is so in all respects: some sections (according to Holtzmann, ii. 23—iii. 6, iv. 21—25, ix. 33—50, x. 2—31, xi. 23—26) show marks of artificial composition: but it is contended—and this is one of the concessions that the progress of criticism has brought into ever-clearer light—that the order of St. Mark represents the normal order of the Synoptic narratives. (2) A very similar conclusion holds good when the language of St. Mark is compared with the language of the other two Gospels. Here, too, St. Mark is found to be in the main the middle term which explains the parallel columns of the Synopsis. The proposition needs some restriction—we can only say "in the main." And yet there are large stretches of the Gospel in which the proof of it is overwhelming. When the language of the Synoptic parallels is analysed, it falls under four heads: (i.) points common to all three Gospels; (ii.) points common to St. Mark and either of the other two Gospels; (iii.) points common to St. Matthew and St. Luke against St. Mark; (iv.) points peculiar to each of the three Gospels. Now, putting aside the first and last of these heads, which prove nothing to our purpose, we observe at once that the second class far exceeds the third. Some very slight illustrations of what is meant may be gathered from the verses of the triple synopsis printed above. A few figures tabulated from the sections which follow next in order may help to make it clearer.

	Points common to all three Gospels.	Points common to St. Mark in turn with St. Matthew and St. Luke.	Points common to St. Matthew and St. Luke against St. Mark.
Healing of the Leper (Matt. viii. 1-4 = Mark i. 40-46 = Luke v. 12-16)	33	19 (8+11)	3
Healing of the Paralytic (Matt. ix. 1-8 = Mark ii. 1-12 = Luke v. 17-26)	55	45 (15+30)	11
Levi's Call and Supper (Matt. ix. 9-13 = Mark ii. 13-17 = Luke v. 27-32)	41	29 (19+10)	5
Fasting (Matt. ix. 14-17 = Mark ii. 18-22 = Luke v. 33-39)	46	47 (21+26)	8
Plucking the Ears of Corn (Matt. xii. 1-8 = Mark ii. 23-28 = Luke vi. 1-5)	41	33 (10+23)	8
Healing the Withered Hand (Matt. xii. 9-14 = Mark iii. 1-6 = Luke vi. 6-11)	20	48 (21+27)	5

The reader who wishes to pursue the subject further may be referred to Mr. Rushbrooke's sumptuous Synopticon (London, 1880, 1881), which is specially constructed to exhibit in detail the relation of the three Gospels to each other. He will also find a specimen printed in various types, with a convincing argument based upon it, in Dr. Abbott's art. "Gospels" in the Encycl. Brit., p. 790 sq. Some interesting statistics bearing on this point have been collected by Dr. Schaff (Apostolic Christianity, p. 596 sq.). The total number of words in St. Mark, including the last twelve verses, is 11,158: of these 2,651 are common to all three Gospels; 2,793 to St. Mark and St. Matthew; 1174 to St. Mark and St. Luke. The figures for St. Matthew and St. Luke (2,415) are not relevant to our purpose, as they include the Sermon on the Mount, &c., which are omitted by St. Mark (see Schürer, Theol. Literaturzeitung, 1883, p. 99, for the correction of a mistaken inference which Dr. Schaff draws from his data). It appears that more than half of the whole substance of St. Mark (6,618 words out of 11,158) has been absorbed into the other Gospels. It should be said that the belief in the priority of St. Mark—not necessarily in point of time, but in nearness to the common groundwork of the Synoptic Gospels, whatever that groundwork might be—is shared by defenders of the documentary hypothesis, like Holtzmann, Weiss, and their allies, with advocates of the oral theory, like Dr. Westcott, and with writers who adopt a half-way position between the parties, like Dr. Salmon. The opposition to it has come chiefly from the Tübingen school, and from those under Tübingen influences. It is, if not an assured result of criticism, yet rapidly becoming so.

Secondary Features in St. Mark.—The greater originality of St. Mark, speaking broadly and generally, has thus been, as it seems, triumphantly vindicated. And yet the claim is one that cannot be made without reserve. True as it is on the whole that St. Mark represents more nearly the groundstock of the tradition, he does not do so in every particular. In all the sections tabulated above, though the general preponderance was strong in favour of St. Mark, there was still a small residuum in which St. Matthew and St. Luke were agreed against him. Usually these were not of great moment: in the first of the above sections (The Leper) there were three, ἰδοὺ, Κύριε, εὐθὺς (for εὐθύς); in the second (The Paralytic) eleven, ἰδοὺ ἀγνίη, ἐπὶ κλίβανῳ, εἶπεν, κλίβανῳ, ἀπηλάθειν εἰς τὸν οἶκον αὐτοῦ, [εἰ]φοβήσῃσων, and so on. The persistent way in which small points of this kind kept recurring in each of the sections was remarkable. But the points were not always small. Occasionally whole sayings of a striking kind and certainly original were found to have dropped out from St. Mark while they were retained by St. Matthew: such as "Go not into any way of the Gentiles, and enter not into any city of the Samaritans; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. x. 5, 6). And if there was room to doubt whether St. Matthew was not here drawing from a peculiar source to which St. Mark had not access, there was a clearer case in regard to the omission of a saying like "I was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv. 24). It was natural that sayings which seemed to breathe so much of the old particularism should drop away when the wholesale admission of Gentiles was a fait accompli. But the retention of such sayings is a high testimony to the originality of the document in which they occur, and here the originality is on the side of St. Matthew, not of St. Mark. Besides these isolated dicta, there were some sections like those at the very beginning of his Gospel in which St. Mark did present the appearance of an abridgment.

This collection of points brings us to what is really one of the greatest difficulties in the whole Synoptic question—the secondary features in St. Mark. No theory could be said to be satisfactory until it accounted for these. We proceed to enumerate the principal hypotheses to which recourse has been had to account for them. These are—(i.) the hypothesis of an Ur-Marcus, or older form of the Gospel, nearly resembling our present form, but containing those features which have been lost in it; (ii.) the hypothesis that St. Luke had before him our present St. Matthew, and took from it those features which he has in common with it as against St. Mark; (iii.) the peculiar theory of Weiss, which will be more fully described below; (iv.) another theory, also suggested by Weiss and by others, but which does not seem as yet to have received very close attention; (v.) along with these solutions may be mentioned a fifth on somewhat peculiar lines by two English scholars.

(i.) The Ur-Marcus Hypothesis.—This was the hypothesis originally adopted by Holtzmann, and fully worked out by him in the book which we have taken as the starting-point of our survey. Something like it was also adopted independently by Weizsäcker in his Untersuchungen (1864). In the circle of those who held that there was a documentary basis for all these Synoptics it met with much approval. Perhaps one of its simplest forms is that which is put forward by Beyschlag in his Leben Jesu (1885). In describing this the opportunity may be taken to mention that many of those who fall back upon an Ur-Marcus still do not believe that even this is absolutely the oldest form of evangelical composition. Beyschlag himself would begin the series with the notes which Papias says were taken down by St. Mark from the preaching of St. Peter, in regard to which he takes the ὁ μὲντοι ράβει of Papias in its strictest sense. He supposes that they were mere jottings with no literary arrangement (Leben Jesu, p. 85). The date at which these were made he would put about the year

66. These Petrine notes were combined a year or two later with a specially Galilean tradition into the Protevangelium, a finished literary whole on the lines of our St. Mark, which gave the framework of their Gospels to both St. Matthew and St. Luke. This was still before the taking of Jerusalem. Soon after that event the Protevangelium, or Ur-Marcus, underwent a slight revision (e.g. the substitution of ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις in Mark xiii. 24 for the ἐθθῆαις of Matt. xxix. 29), and was so brought to its present shape. Now it is not rare in English books to find severe criticisms on this multiplication of documents with imaginary names—Ur-Marcus, Proto-Marcus, Deutero-Marcus, Protevangelium, and the like. The names are of course matters of pure indifference. The documents might as well be labelled A, B, and C, or X, Y, and Z. And the documents too themselves are hypothetical; but they are not therefore altogether imaginary. The assumption that there are such documents is merely the expression (which may be wrong, but cannot be known to be so until it has been thoroughly tested) of certain facts which are revealed by an analysis of our present Gospels. There are distinct layers in our present St. Mark. There is one layer that is earlier than our St. Matthew, and another that is later; one layer that is before the fall of Jerusalem, and another that is after it. To call these separate layers so many documents, or stages in the history of a document, is a step, but by no means a reckless one; and the only condition for the verification of the hypothesis is that it shall really account for all the facts.

The natural objection to the Ur-Marcus theory is, that it implies the existence of a Gospel which is so like our present Gospel without being identical with it. Under modern conditions such a thing hardly could exist. Under ancient conditions, in literary circles, and where the regular machinery of book production and propagation was at work, it would be rare. But the particular conditions under which the Gospels arose, as we have seen, did not come under these general laws. The changes that took place in them would probably fall within the sphere of transcription rather than of authorship. The fate of the first two or three copies would determine the fate of the book. This is not equivalent to saying that the Ur-Marcus hypothesis is proved; it is only a plea that it should not be dismissed in limine, as if it were incredible. It is one of the hypotheses which deserves renewed testing by systematic application to the text.

(ii.) The Hypothesis that the First Gospel was used by the Author of the Third.—A change has come over the attitude of many defenders of the Ur-Marcus theory. This change dates from the appearance of a work by E. Simons, Hat der dritte Evangelist den kanonischen Matthäus benutzt? (Bonn, 1881,) now unfortunately out of print, and not to be obtained in this country. Simons answered the question that he put to himself in the affirmative; and since he did so several leading critics have come round to or expressed the same opinion. So Holtzmann (Theol. Literaturzeitung, 1881, col. 182; Einleitung, p. 339), Weizsäcker (Apost. Zeitalter, 1886, p. 414), Wendt (Lehre Jesu, 1886, p. 193). Holtzmann's conversion had taken place from independent study before Simons' book appeared; Weizsäcker gives no details; Wendt appears to derive his view from Simons. It is obvious that the assumption that St. Luke had St. Matthew's Gospel before him at once gives a satisfactory solution of all the coincidences between them. It is, however, essential to this theory that it should be taken with the limitations which its cautious exponent has given to it. Simons only contends for a slight and incidental use of the First Evangelist's work by the Third. Directly and systematically he used St. Mark, indirectly and cursorily St. Matthew. It is as if he copied the one and was affected by an indistinct recollection of words and phrases in the other. This is a possible state of things: and only such very qualified use is consistent with the marked divergence which St. Luke presents in so many particulars from St. Matthew.

If the First Gospel had been throughout the work of an Apostle, then in any case St. Luke's procedure would hardly be intelligible, as he lays especial stress on the evidence of eye-witnesses; but he may have felt that the First Gospel, as it is, did not exclude a certain rivalry, or he may not have had a copy in his possession at the time of writing.

(iii.) Weiss' Theory.—Dr. B. Weiss still finds both the Ur-Marcus hypothesis and the hypothesis that St. Luke used the canonical Matthew inadmissible, and he still holds to a theory of his own to which there have been some approximations, but to which he does not seem to have won many converts (see, however, Expositor, 1891, p. 412). He maintains that the Second Evangelist not only had and used the Petrine tradition, but also the Matthaean collection of discourses mingled with narrative. The Gospel so constructed again became a main source of our present First Gospel, the author of which thus used the Matthaean document twice over, itself directly, and indirectly through St. Mark. In using it directly he at times preserved its language more closely than St. Mark had done. The cumbersome part of this theory is the double use which it involves of the same document; and it is open to the further objection, How did St. Mark come to leave out from his apostolic document just those discourses which were its most characteristic features? It ought, however, to be said that the theory that the Third Evangelist had seen the work of the First also involves the double use of a document—the Logia, once in its original form, and once as worked up in our St. Matthew.

(iv.) A modified Form of Weiss' Theory.—In his Leben Jesu, p. 45, Weiss presents his theory with what appears to be somewhat of a modification. He warns us that in speaking of the use by St. Mark of St. Matthew's collection he does not mean a formal collating in the ordinary sense of the term; he reminds us that St. Mark himself had his home in Jerusalem, and would often have heard the oral teaching of the Apostles before he became a companion of St. Peter and conceived the thought of writing a Gospel; something of what he set down would be due to these recollections, and they would lead him to refer to St. Matthew's work and enrich his own from it as soon as it appeared. We are tempted to ask if this last suggestion is necessary, and if the first part would not be better without it. Is it not enough to suppose that beside the Petrine notes St. Mark would also use the tradition of the Mother-Church, and that the superior details in the First Gospel are only the same tradition rather more correctly rendered? This would at least simplify the theory; but an opinion cannot be expressed upon either form of it until it is confronted verse by verse with the texts.

(v.) So far the solutions have either treated our St. Mark as itself an original document, or as nearly co-extensive with the common original of the Synoptic portions of the three Gospels; and the divergences from St. Mark have been explained as due in the main to literary considerations. In this way both the elements which are common to all three Gospels, and those which are common to St. Mark with either of the others, would alike form part of the original document. But another hypothesis was possible. It was possible to start not from the threefold coincidences and the twofold coincidences, but from the threefold coincidences alone. Dr. Edwin A. Abbott in his article in the Encyclopaedia Britannica adopted this alternative, and a somewhat similar solution of the question was worked out independently by Dr. Edersheim. [Dr. Edersheim's papers are not published, but permission was given by the author before his death for the use which is here made of their contents.] Both these scholars appear to have been influenced by the same argument, viz. by the observation that the threefold coincidence—"the triple tradition," as Dr. Abbott calls it—when detached from the rest of the context, gives by itself a tolerably continuous narrative. Dr. Abbott's "triple tradition" corresponds to Dr. Edersheim's "original document" ("O. D."); and a specimen of Dr. Abbott's reconstruction of this may be seen in the art. "Gospels" in Encl. Brit. vol. I. p. 793. If the result appears to the modern reader somewhat abrupt, disjointed, and obscure, Dr. Abbott urges that the Mishna was transmitted in a very similar fashion; he compares the short sentences of his tradition to a telegram which needs to be "expanded" before it can be understood; and he makes use in a most ingenious manner of this very obscurity and the differences of interpretation to which it gave rise as a means of accounting for some of the more marked deviations from the original text and from each other, in the three Gospels (Common Tradition of the Synopt. Gospels, p. xi. London, 1884). Dr. Edersheim's reconstruction of his "original document" does not differ widely from Dr. Abbott's, but in the further development of the two theories there is some divergence. Dr. Abbott agrees with the mass of the scholars who adopt the documentary hypothesis in regarding our St. Mark as the nearest representative of the common tradition, and he believes that the First and Third Evangelists have borrowed from this independently. Dr. Edersheim finds the common tradition often more faithfully preserved in St. Matthew, and he thinks that St. Luke had seen both St. Mark and St. Matthew. For a criticism (which is rather too caustic) on the reconstructed "triple tradition," the reader may be referred to Dr. Salmon's Introduction, p. 132 sq., 5th edit.

The Collection of the Logia.—If the secondary features in St. Mark are one of the "burning points" in the Synoptic question, the exact nature and extent of the Logia of St. Matthew is another. Even the existence of this document is not perhaps altogether proved, though there is a strong consensus upon the point in Germany. The assumption of it does not really rest upon a particular interpretation of the words of Papias, but is an independent result of analytic criticism which appears to coincide with, and to be confirmed by, those words. When on the one hand it was observed—as it could not fail to be observed—that the common matter in St. Matthew and St. Luke which they had over and above the main body of the Synoptic tradition shared by them with St. Mark consisted mainly of discourse, and when on the other hand there was the express statement of Papias that St. Matthew composed a collection of λόγια which, whatever the other uses of the word, would be at least an appropriate name for a collection of discourses, it was an obvious step to identify the common element of discourse in the First and Third Gospels with the document the existence of which was thus historically attested. And there was the further reason for this that it was improbable on a number of grounds (which are conveniently summarised by Bayschlag, p. 93), that the First Gospel in its present form, though even in this form a very primitive document, came directly from the hands of an Apostle. That being so, it was a simple and natural explanation of the ecclesiastical tradition which connects this Gospel with the name of St. Matthew, that it embodied the original apostolic work in so prominent and distinctive a manner.

But was the same apostolic work also used by St. Luke? The primâ facie view is no doubt that it was; nor is the presence of difficulties in the way of this supposition at once destructive of it. There is, for instance, such a difficulty almost at the outset in the Sermon on the Mount. Putting aside for a moment the divergence in the account by the two Evangelists of the circumstances under which the discourse was delivered, and putting aside the difference in extent of the two versions, is it probable that if the Third Evangelist had had before him the Beatitudes in the form in which we have them in St. Matthew he would have written as he did? Or if the First Evangelist had had them before him in the form in which they occur in St. Luke, would he have written as he did? The divergence seems to go beyond the usual degree of latitude in two independent transcriptions of the same text, nor does it seem that an adequate motive can be assigned for it. Something might be due to the fact that, as Bayschlag supposes, and as the consent of all the early authorities would lead us to expect, St. Matthew originally wrote in Aramaic, and the two Evangelists translated from this original independently: but a mere difference in translation will not resolve eight (or nine) Blessings into four Blessings and four Woes. If we must assume that both versions are derived from the same source, does it not seem almost necessary to suppose that some further step or steps intervened before they could reach their present form? The question must be left, for it is one that does not appear to have been grappled with quite so thoroughly as might be desired: and it is only a single example out of many. The difficulties which arise out of the order of the several discourses or sayings in the two Gospels have been dealt with more satisfactorily, though it would be too much to say that a full solution has been found. This however reminds us that, though progress may be slow, yet there has been progress. Wendt has recently made a bold attempt (Lehre Jesu, i. p. 50 sq.) to reconstruct not merely the outline, but the whole text of the original Logia from our two Gospels. It was more than could be hoped that such an attempt should be immediately successful. But aiming at a higher object is often the best way to attain a lower object; and the experiment can hardly fail to contribute to the furtherance of criticism. Though agreement has not yet been reached on a number of important questions relating to the Logia, there is at least a tendency to agreement on two points: (i.) It is coming to be now generally recognised that the First Evangelist has grouped together sayings that were not all really spoken on the same occasion (so in the Sermon on the Mount, at least in Matt. vii.). Holtzmann compares many of the sayings which belong to the Logia to "erratic blocks" which have travelled some way from their original position. He and others think that they are more often to be found in situ in St. Luke (e.g. Luke xii. 13-31; cp. Matt. vi. 25-33). The opposite view to Holtzmann's is held amongst others by Dr. Edersheim, whose reconstruction of the Logia is peculiarly interesting. He thought that it was a genuinely Jewish work, constructed after the manner of such works in five Pereqs or Sections, like the five books of the Law, or the five-fold division of the Psalter. These five Pereqs are identified with the five great masses of discourse in St. Matthew. The whole theory is attractive; but the difficulties will begin to be felt when it is sought to explain how the compact discourses of St. Matthew came to be dispersed into the scattered sayings that we find in St. Luke. (ii.) Another point on which critics are now more agreed than they were at the beginning of the period of which we have been speaking is, that though the Logia consisted of a number of more or less detached sayings, these sayings were often prefaced with brief historical introductions. What has been said on the meaning of the word λόγια will show that these were by no means excluded. Thus the way is prepared for Weiss, who would refer to the Logia not only narratives like the Healing of the Centurion's Servant—which are peculiar to St. Matthew and St. Luke—but others like the Healing of the Leper and of Jairus' Daughter, and the Sabbath controversies (Mark ii. 23 sq.), which are common to all three Gospels. This is part of the theory which has been previously referred to (p. 1226 above), and it has not as yet met with much acceptance.

This glance at the history of the Synoptic question is as far perhaps as we can go with profit in general terms. The one thing to be deprecated on this even more than on other questions, is the random use of generalities untested by facts. What has just been given does not profess to be more than a sketch in outline of the different solutions; it is not even a criticism of them, much less an attempt either to propose a new solution or defend an old one. That can only be done satisfactorily by going through the whole text verse by verse and word by word.

There are doubtless some who will be deterred by the multitude of divergent views which are held by critics. But it is a shallow argument, and one that ought not to be used, to point to the extent of this divergence as in itself proof that all the theories alike are wrong and a real solution impossible. No considerable scientific question has ever escaped without a tentative period; least of all a question of such extreme complexity and difficulty as the present. The impression that is made upon the mind of one who has studied the question mainly from without, and not as yet, except to a limited extent, in close detail from within, is that the complexity is not so great as to be never unravelled, and the difficulty not so great as to be never overcome.

Little by little, untenable hypotheses are being discarded; theories are formulated and brought to a precise issue, to which an affirmative or negative answer can be given; and as the issues are narrowed, the magnifying-glass of a close criticism is brought to bear upon them. When we remember all this, and when we take into account some wider considerations, the international character which theological study of all kinds is assuming, and the many and varied qualifications of those both in Europe and America who are engaged upon it, it does not seem too bold to prophesy that the end, if not exactly near, is not very distant, and that the twentieth century at least will not be far advanced before the long-sought solution is found.

Comparative Table of different Forms of the Documentary Hypothesis.—It only remains to attempt to give some idea of the relation in detail of these different theories to each other. The student, it is thought, must often wish for some means of comparing together the treatment of particular sections by the different critics; and an attempt is made to give him this, though it must be confessed only in a rough and approximate way. The task was one that it was difficult to carry out satisfactorily. In cases like those of Weiss and Wendt and Holtzmann's reconstruction of 1863, the data were sufficiently complete; but in the case of Weizsäcker and Bayschlag, where the treatment was less detailed, incidental and scattered statements had to be picked out and put together, and where such statements were wanting (though they might often be supplied by probable conjecture) it seemed best to leave a blank; nor can it be said that the examination of these writers has been exhaustive. It was also not found possible to represent in the tables all the restrictions and qualifications and variations in the assignment of position with which the criticism of the different sections is accompanied. The tables do not aim at giving more than a coup d'œil of the subject, with such limitations as appear to be inseparable from a coup d'œil; but it is hoped that it may prove of some use to those who desire to attack the problem at closer quarters. The sections are adapted from Holtzmann's Einleitung, pp. 355–361. A short preliminary account is given of each of the theories tabulated, with one or two details which may enable the English reader to judge of its distribution. It will be seen that most of the writers quoted are veterans who have given prolonged attention to the subject.

Holtzmann, Dr. H. J. (b. 1832), Professor at Strassburg. In his work on the Synoptic Gospels in 1863 Dr. Holtzmann held that the two main elements in the Synoptic composition were (1) an Ur-Marcus similar to but in some respects fuller than our present St. Mark; (2) a collection of Logia or discourses by the Apostle St. Matthew, worked up in both the First and the Third Gospels, and often preserved most faithfully in the latter. In his latest work, the Einleitung in das N. T. (1st ed. 1885), Dr. Holtzmann has announced some modifications of these views, due to the discussions in which he has been engaged in the interval. He now thinks that the Third Evangelist had the work of the First (our present St. Matthew) before him, "so that at least most of the reasons for distinguishing between an Ur-Marcus and our present Mark fall away." He also thinks that all the discourses in St. Luke are not necessarily to be referred to the Logia; that some of them have undergone still further redaction in St. Luke than in St. Matthew; and that the Logia may not have consisted purely of discourse, but that there may have been brief introductory narratives as a framework for the discourses. Dr. Holtzmann's changed views as to the dates of the completed Gospels will be noticed below. We are unfortunately without the materials for representing his present position in detail, and so have been obliged to fall back upon this earlier construction, which has now indeed come to have only a historical interest, but which in its day was the most solid attempt that had been made at the elucidation of the problem, and which still retains much of its suggestiveness. [Dr. Holtzmann's latest views are given in his concise commentary on the Synoptic Gospels (Die Synoptiker, Freiburg i. B., 1889).]

Weizsäcker, Dr. C. (b. 1822), Professor at Tübingen. Dr. Weizsäcker, like Dr. Holtzmann, has recently brought out a revised version of his original Untersuchungen über die evangelische Geschichte. Almost the same interval of time separates the two works: the Untersuchungen appeared in 1864, Das Apostolische Zeitalter in 1886. Here, however, the later work is full enough to allow us to use it directly. The characteristic feature in Dr. Weizsäcker's theory is, that he thinks that both the narrative-element and the discourse-element in the Gospels have gone through a greater number of stages and a longer development before reaching their final shape. According to Weizsäcker, smaller collections were made up into larger before the larger were made up in our present Gospels. He tries to distinguish these smaller collections, and we have endeavoured to reproduce these distinctions, which are not so arbitrary as one who approaches the subject from the outside may perhaps think them.

Weiss, Dr. B. (b. 1827), Professor at Berlin. In a long series of publications, enumerated above, Dr. Weiss has held steadily, and with but little modification, to his original idea: which is, that the Apostle St. Matthew wrote first a collection mainly of discourse, but with a slight amount of narrative appended; that St. Mark, having this before him, combined with it his recollections of the preaching of St. Peter, and that the work which he so produced lay before both the First and the Third Evangelists, who also had access to the original Matthaean collection. By "Oldest Gospel" Dr. Weiss means this collection; by "Petrine Gospel" he means the tradition derived by St. Mark from St. Peter. These two he takes to be the fundamental and primitive elements in our Gospels as we now have them; all three being composite in different proportions. Mention has been made of the slight modification which Dr. Weiss seems disposed to admit.

Wendt, Dr. H. H. (b. 1853), Professor at Heidelberg. As befits a younger scholar building upon the labours of his predecessors, Dr. Wendt has stated his views with great precision, though his object in writing was primarily to lay the foundation for a study in Biblical Theology (Die Lehre Jesu, 1886). He, too, seeks to analyse St. Mark's Gospel into the different groups of tradition of which it is composed; and he has also, as we have seen, made a bold attempt to reconstruct from the texts of St. Matthew and St. Luke the original Logia.

Beyschlag, Dr. Willibald (b. 1823), Professor at Halle. Dr. Beyschlag's views may be ascertained from an article in Studien und Kritiken for 1881, and from his Leben Jesu (1st ed. 1885; 2nd ed., which has been used here, 1887). He holds that the first nucleus of our Second Gospel consisted of the loose notes taken down by St. Mark of the teaching of St. Peter; that these were reduced to order by a Galilean Christian, who inserted the warning in Mark xiii. 14, and that the Protevangelium thus formed was afterwards edited, as we have it, for the use of the Church of Rome. Much about the same time with the Protevangelium, St. Matthew committed to writing his Logia, which were worked up doubly, on the basis of the Protevangelium, in our First and Third Gospels—in the latter perhaps from a different version of the Aramaic original. Of all the different forms that have been taken by the Two-Document hypothesis, this of Dr. Beyschlag's is perhaps the simplest and least complicated (see Table, pp. 1230-1236).

External History of the Gospels: Formation of the Canon.—Along with the inherent complexity of the phenomena, the other main source of difficulty is the scantiness of the literature which might throw light upon them. For the first hundred years of their existence—70-170 A.D.—the Gospels pass through a region which is only dimly and fitfully illuminated by extant documents. The Church, in Dr. Salmon's picturesque expression, "enters a tunnel," from which it only emerges in the time of Irenaeus. Hence a special importance attaches to every addition to the literature of the period. And the twenty-five years that we are chronicling happen to be singularly rich in such additions. We will first speak of the additions which have been made to the materials of our knowledge, then of the criticism which has gathered round those materials, and lastly we will try to sum up the results which seem to have been obtained.

Addition of New Materials.—The year 1863 is again marked by an event of importance. It was in this year that Tischendorf first gave to the world the complete text of the N. T. from the Sinaitic Codex, with the Epistle of Barnabas and fragments of the Greek Hermas (N. T. Sinaiticum sive N. T. cum epistola Barnabae et fragmentis Pastoris, Leipzig). This was the first time that the 4½ opening chapters of the Epistle of Barnabas had been published in the original Greek. The publication was important, as setting at rest the question as to the genuineness of ὡς γέγραπται introducing the much-debated quotation πολλοὶ κλητοί, ὄλγοι δὲ ἐκλεκτοί at the end of c. 4. Up to the finding of Cod. B there had been room to suppose that "sicut scriptum est" was an interpolation by the Latin translator. Something will be said as to the bearing of this on the history of the Canon of the Gospels below. The evidence of another Greek MS. was added in 1877, when Hilgenfeld utilised for his second edition of the Epistle the collations of the Constantinople MS. written in 1056, sent to him by Bryennius.

The accessions to the text of Hermas derive a present interest from the publication (or rather republication) of the concluding portion by Dräseke after Simonides (Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift, 1887, Heft 2, p. 172 sq.), and from its vindication by Hilgenfeld; but we are forbidden to go into this by the doubly dubious character of the text itself and of the allusions to the Synoptic Gospels in Hermas generally. [Simonides' text is now completely disposed of: see A Collation of the Athos Codex of the Shepherd of Hermas, by Dr. Spyr. P. Lambros, ed. by Mr. J. Armitage Robinson, Cambridge, 1888.]

We are treading on firmer ground in following the history of the writings attributed to Clement of Rome. The precious Constantinople MS. which contained the Greek text of Barnabas also contained the two so-called Epistles of Clement; and the concluding portions of both of these were published for the first time by Bryennius, Metropolitan of Serrae (now of Nicomedia), in 1875. Within a few months of the event the University of Cambridge became possessed of a Syriac version of the two Epistles which had hitherto been overlooked, although it had belonged to the distinguished Orientalist M. Jules Mohl. By the help of these new documents Bp. Lightfoot was able to supplement his previous edition and to revise the text of the whole in an Appendix which appeared in 1877. The added chapters of the First Epistle contained no quotations from the Gospels, but those of the Second Epistle (which is now proved to be, as it had been before suspected of being, really a Homily) were found to contain a number of important data, both for the history of the Canon in general and for that of the Gospels in particular. The Old Testament was called τὰ βιβλία: the New Testament, or such Books as the writer regarded as authoritative, οἱ ἀπόστολοι. If, on the one hand, it was clear that he used an apocryphal Gospel or Gospels, on the other he was found to cite the evangelical records not only as γραφή, but with the still more weighty formula ὁ Θεὸς λέγει. A word will be said on the significance of these phenomena presently.

While such were the fortunes of the Clementine Epistles, a more "epoch-making" work appeared, but for a time remained practically hidden,—the translation by Aucher and Moesinger of an Armenian version of a Commentary by Ephraem Syrus on a text which the editors rightly maintained to be that of the long-lost Diatessaron of Tatian. This did not indeed pass entirely unnoticed, but it did not attract by any means the attention which it deserved until the publication in 1881 of Part I. of Zahn's Forschungen zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons. Zahn devoted the whole of this volume to the Diatessaron, reconstructing and analysing its text, pointing out its relation to other authorities, tracing the history both of the Diatessaron and its author, and indeed doing all that an accomplished critic should do. The appearance of the veritable Diatessaron dispelled a number of myths or figments with which some rather hypercritical writers had surrounded it, and a solid and most important contribution was made to our knowledge of the history of the Gospels in the second century. This knowledge will be still further enhanced when the complete text is published of an Arabic version of the Diatessaron, of which a preliminary account was given by Father Ciasca in Pitra's Analecta Sacra, tom. iv. p. 465 sq., Paris, 1883. [Some sections have recently been published by De Lagarde in Mittheilungen, ii. 30 sq., and suffice to disappoint the expectations which the version had excited. It is found to be based upon the Peshitto: in other words, the Diatessaron was adapted to the text of the current Arabic N. T., just as in Cod. Fuldensis it was adapted to the Vulgate. See further Hemphill, Diat. of T. (Dublin, 1888); Rendel Harris (Cambridge, 1890); Sellin in Zahn's Forschungen, iv. 225 sq. (Erlangen and Leipzig, 1891).]

In the next part of his Forschungen, which appeared in 1883, Zahn was less fortunate. He sought to recover a document which would only have been second in importance to the Diatessaron, viz. a Commentary by Theophilus of Antioch, which, if genuine, would have been written about 180 A.D. But though Zahn himself adheres to his opinion, or at most only admits interpolations in the work which he put forward, it is not too much to say that critical opinion on the whole has been unfavourable to the claim which he made for it.

Bryennius published the contents of his precious MS. by instalments, and early in the year 1884 the world was startled to find itself in the possession of a new document belonging in all probability to the sub-apostolic age. The echoes of this discovery are still around us, and more need not be said about the history of the Didaché. The bearings of it upon the Canon of the Gospels are similar to those of other documents of the same date, and will be treated with them in the general summary.

A word of mention is due here to the discovery by Mommsen in the Phillippe Library at Cheltenham of a stichometrical list of the Books of O. T. and N. T. and of the writings of Cyprian. This list was published by Mommsen soon after its discovery in Hermes, vol. xxi. p. 142 sq. under the heading Zur lateinischen Stichometrie. It has the advantage of being definitely dated: the MS. is of the tenth century, but it contains amongst other matter a note pointing to the year 359 as the time of its composition, and there is nothing to prevent the extension of this date to the list. It would thus rank next to the Muratorian Fragment among the Latin lists, and it has the Gospels in a peculiar order,*—Matthew, Mark, John, Luke, which deserves appreciation among other phenomena of the same kind. [On this list see Studia Biblica, iii. 217 sq., and Zahn, Gesch. d. Kan. ii. 143 sq.]

History of Criticism.—It was natural that discoveries like these should give an impulse to criticism, though in some important instances criticism was not first stirred by them. The activity has been greatest in the latter half of the period over which our survey extends. It would be out of place here to attempt to notice all the books relating to the Canon, or all the criticism of the newly-discovered documents that falls within this period. But a few words may be said in regard to discussions bearing directly upon the use of the Gospels. These may be regarded as grouping themselves round certain central points: (1) the use of the Gospels by the early Gnostics; (2) the elaborate controversy covering the whole period of the formation of the Canon of the Gospels, raised by Supernatural Religion; (3) the discussions as to the genuineness of the Commentary attributed to Theophilus of Antioch; (4) the discussions as to the Didache.

For the reasons above mentioned, the last two need not detain us. Enough to say that in the controversy about the supposed Commentary of Theophilus, the protagonists were Dr. Theodor Zahn and Dr. Adolf Harnack; and that the principal works bearing on the controversy were Part II. of Zahn's Forschungen (Erlangen, 1883); Vol. 1, Part IV. of Gebhardt and Harnack's Texte u. Untersuchungen (Der angebliche Evangeliencommentar des Theophilus von Antiochien, Leipzig, 1883); and a reply by Zahn in an appendix to the next part of the Forschungen (Supplementum Clementinum, p. 198 sq., Erlangen, 1884). A short account of the controversy was given in an essay published in Studia Biblica, p. 89 sq. (Oxford, 1885). In regard to the Didache, there have of course been discussions and differences of opinion, but only to a slight degree affecting the use of the Gospels.

The two other discussions have been of greater moment for our particular subject. If our inquiry had included St. John, we should have had to add a third in order to take special note of the admirable monograph on the External Evidences for the Authorship of the Fourth Gospel (Boston, 1880) by the late Dr. Ezra Abbot; and the equally admirable articles, much to the same effect, by Prof. James Drummond in the Theological Review, Oct. 1875, and April and July 1877, with two articles, tending to qualify the results obtained, by Dr. Edwin A. Abbott in the Modern Review, July and October 1882; the bulky but fantastic volume by Thoma, Die Genesis des Johannes-Evangeliums (Berlin, 1882), on the same side, and a brief criticism by Dr. Salmon (Introduction, p. 78 sq.). All these deal primarily with the Fourth Gospel, which does not come within our present purview. The use of St. John is the main question in connexion with the Gnostics, but the other Gospels are also involved in a minor degree. The most important point is in regard to Basilides, who wrote about the year 125. There is no doubt that the account of the Basilidian systems by Hippolytus (Refut. omn. Haer. vii. 20-27) contains direct quotations from St. Luke and St. John. The question is, Are these quotations made by Basilides himself or by his disciples? Mr. Matthew Arnold answers confidently, "by Basilides himself;" and the same answer is given by Dr. Ezra Abbot and a number of other scholars against the opposition of Hilgenfeld, Lipsius, and others, including now Holtzmann (Einl. p. 133). The most important discussion of the subject—all the more important because it is not dealing directly with the use of the canonical Books—is that by Dr. Hort in art. "Basilides," Dict. of Christ. Biog. i. 270 sq. This article does not appear to be known to Dr. Holtzmann. Dr. Hort also is of opinion that the eight chapters of Hippolytus represent the teaching of Basilides himself. (For other literature, see Ezra Abbot, Authorship, §c. p. 87: it should perhaps be mentioned that the series was first opened in two directly apologetic treatises by Tischendorf, Wann worden unsere Evang. verfasst? Leipzig, 1865 sq., and Hofstede de Groot, Basilides am Ausgange d. Apost. Zeitalters als erster Zeuge für Aller u. Autorität d. N.T.lichen Schriften, Leipzig, 1868.) The use of the Gospels in the other great Gnostic school, that of Valentinus, has been treated by Heinrici in Die Valentinianische Gnosis u. die heil. Schrift (Berlin, 1871). A summary, with negative leanings, may be found in Holtzmann, Einleitung, p. 133 sq. (cp. Weiss, Einl. p. 58).

In England by far the most agitating controversy arose out of the publication in 1874 of the work entitled Supernatural Religion, the able and learned but strongly biased author of which still remains unknown. This controversy certainly stirred the depths of the English mind, and led to a great re-awakening of the critical spirit. It is needless to say that the leading part in it was borne by Dr. (since Bp.) Lightfoot in a series of articles in the Contemporary Review (Jan., Feb., May, Aug., Oct. 1875; Feb., Aug. 1876; May, 1877). Other works on the same side were: Westcott On the Canon, pref. to 4th ed. 1874; Sanday, Gospels in the Second Century, London, 1876 (out of print); Sadler, The Lost Gospel and its Contents, London, 1876; Baring-Gould, Lost and Hostile Gospels, London, 1874. Mention should also be made of an eminently clear and impartial work by Mr. E. B. Nicholson (now Bodley's Librarian) on The Gospel according to the Hebrews (London, 1879). The author of Supernatural Religion took up a number of very untenable positions, but there are some amongst those who opposed him who have cause to be grateful to him for sending them back to the detailed study of the texts.

Results.—A pledge has been given that an attempt should be made to sum up the results which seem to emerge from the foregoing retrospect of the research and criticism of a quarter of a century. The means hardly exist for giving to such a summing up a strictly objective character; it must needs take a subjective colour from the mind through which it passes. The warning is necessary that what follows must no longer be taken as a statement of acknowledged facts, but simply as an individual opinion. This applies especially to what is said under the first head: in regard to the later periods a consensus appears to be gradually forming.

We may map out the period which the Gospels traversed in the process of becoming canonical into four nearly equal sections: (1) the close of the apostolic age, A.D. 60-90; (2) the age of Papias and the apostolic Fathers, A.D. 90-140; (3) the age of Justin and Tatian, A.D. 140-170; (4) the age of Irenaeus and Clement of Alexandria, A.D. 170-200.

(1.) The Apostolic Age; or Age of the Composition, fixing of the literary form, and first transcription, of the Gospels. If the view here expressed is not mistaken, all four Gospels were written within this period. The only portion that perhaps falls outside it would be the editorial notes of the Ephesian elders which they added in sending out the Gospel of St. John. The groundstock of the Synoptic Gospels—not only the Logia and Mark-Gospel of Papias, but also by far the greater part of the special documents or traditions used by the First and Third Evangelists—took their shape before the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. That date marks the centre of a period of very considerable activity (Luke i. 1). The Gospel of St. Luke, as a whole, lies beyond it, about the year 80. The Gospel according to St. Matthew was compounded into a shape very nearly resembling the present a short time before it: εὐθὺς in Matt. xxiv. 29 appears to mark the date not only of the particular document, but of the whole of which that document forms a part. The Gospel of St. Mark (by a process which further investigation is needed to define more exactly) also reached a shape not far removed from the present, about the same time. But the first copies of these Gospels fell into the hands probably of disciples, men of simple and unsophisticated character, who were not bound by any strict ideas as to the duty of copyists to preserve exact diplomatic accuracy. They did not hesitate to alter a word here or a word there, sometimes to give it greater point (as in Matt. xxii. 7, "The king was wroth, and sent his armies, and burnt up their city"), sometimes to prevent possible misunderstanding (as in Mark xiii. 24, ἐν ἐκείναις ταῖς ἡμέραις for εὐθὺς), perhaps even adding short supplementary bits of narrative that reached them through oral tradition. Nor can we confine this process entirely to the first copyists: it went on even into the second century. Its dying embers are seen in the additions which are found in the documents of the Western text (e.g. the moving of the waters and the paragraph of the adulteress in St. John); perhaps also in some (e.g. the interpolation in Matt. xxvii. 49, and several of those in Luke xxiv.) which are characteristic of other lines of transmission. All that took place was perfectly bonâ fide, though not strictly in accordance with our modern rules or with the ideal standard of what is permissible and what is not permissible in copyists. Irenaeus knew better when he inserted his famous adjuration, to those who copied his work, to compare carefully what they wrote with the original, and see that it was properly corrected (Eus. H. E. v. 20). But Irenaeus belonged to a different class, and possessed a higher degree of culture than the first transmitters of the text. With them the state of things was similar to that which St. Augustine describes (though perhaps with less justice) in regard to the origin of the Latin versions: "Ut enim cuique primis fidei temporibus in manus venit codex Graecus et aliquantulum facultatis sibi utriusque linguae habere videbatur, ausus est interpretari." Any one who knew how to write thought himself fit to copy a Gospel, and copied it often for his own use, not without slight glosses or amplifications. But these were made, as it were, with the pen on the paper, not with any recondite idea of furthering the interests of sect or party, though it would be only natural that the writer's own opinions should at times affect the turn of a sentence or the choice of a phrase. All this time, though the contents of the Gospels were greatly valued, there was no idea of a special sacredness attaching to the particular words. The first step on the way to this was when the Gospels came to be read in church. We know that from the very first Christian writings were read in this way. Thus St. Paul gives a special charge that 1 Thess. was to be "read before all the brethren," and in like manner that the Epistle to Colossae should be read "in the Church of the Laodiceans" and the Epistle to Laodicea at Colossae. Nor was a writing of this kind read once and then put on the shelf or laid up among the archives. It was brought out repeatedly and read for the edification of those present. This is clearly expressed in the well-known words of Dionysius at Corinth, in which, acknowledging the letter which had just been received from the Church of Rome, he says: "To-day we have kept the Lord's holy day, in which we read your letter, and we shall be able constantly (ἀεὶ ποτε) to read it, and derive admonition from it as we do from the former letter written to us by Clement." It appears that it does not at once follow from this church-reading that a book was regarded as what we call "canonical." The letter of Clement to the Corinthians was, it is true, one of those which were tentatively put upon a canonical level in certain Churches, but no such claim was ever made for the Epistle of Soter, of which Dionysius is more immediately speaking. We must beware of carrying back our own hard and fast lines into this primitive age. The distinction between sacred and secular was not clearly marked as it is with us: not so much that the sacred was secularized as that the secular was hallowed: χρησισμὸν, a favourite word, is the common term which covers both. We must not, therefore, infer at once that because the Gospels (or rather Gospels sine artic.) were read in church that they were therefore from the first upon the same footing with the Old Testament Scriptures. The earliest direct evidence that we have for the solemn public reading of the Gospels is in Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 67); but it was manifestly an established practice in his day, and no doubt goes back much further. We may, indeed, ask whether a trace of it is not even to be found in the δ ἀναγνώσκων νοεῖσθε of the ground-document of the Synoptics. It would be too much to say positively that this implied public reading; but there are so many indications of this (compare πρόσχε τῆ ἀναγνώσει coupled with τῆ παρακλήσει and τῆ διδασκαλίᾳ, 1 Tim. iv. 13) that we can well imagine the reader, as the signs of the catastrophe of Jerusalem were beginning to thicken, turning, as if with an aside, to his assembled hearers, and warning them to take the words to heart. We can believe that the author of the ground-document himself intended this use to be made of them. But again it would be a mistake to apply any such conclusion too systematically: "vigour and rigour" are the last things that are in place in dealing with this early time. The different Gospels were written under different circumstances and with different objects: St. Luke's, for instance, was intended for the private perusal of a single illustrious convert. Nor must we suppose that there was any jealous exclusion of the other documents which he mentions in favour of what afterwards became the canonical Three.

(2.) The Age of Papias and the Apostolic Fathers, A.D. 90-140.—The conditions which have just been described may, it is thought, furnish a clue to some of the difficulties which beset this next period. (i.) There will no longer be any real difficulty in the γράψαι of Barnabas applied to a text from St. Matthew. We shall have no need to have recourse to the very forced assumption that the author is referring not to St. Matthew, but to a really different text from 4 Ezra. That assumption criticism has by this time entirely discarded. But we must remember that the idea of γραφή was elastic, and that the use of this word does not at once and alone confer a higher authority upon St. Matthew than a still more explicit appeal in Jude 14 confers upon the Book of Enoch, or than the use of equally strong expressions in 2 Clement confers upon the Gospel according to the Egyptians. (ii.) We shall also be prepared to understand the phenomena of the evangelical quotations in this period. They are seldom exact; in particular they often show a fusing of different passages, and especially a fusing of expressions from St. Matthew and St. Luke; and though these expressions are sometimes distinctive of either Gospel, they are not of that decisive kind which we find in Justin Martyr, but minor and secondary. One thing is clear—that the writers were not transcribing our Gospels with the MS. before them. There was no reason why they should do so in the very incidental way in which their quotations are introduced. The fusing that has taken place is especially of such a kind as comes through quoting from memory. It is the sort of freedom that we ourselves use in quoting familiar sayings, though somewhat greater, as these were not learnt by rote from printed books. (iii.) For all through this period there was still at work a living and active oral tradition. The passage where Papias lays stress on this (Euseb. H. E. iii. 39) is of course one of the commonplaces of criticism. But it is clear that Papias by no means stood alone. The substance of the Gospels lay in the brain of the writers of this period as a confused product of a number of different things; of oral tradition, catechesis, public reading and private study; and it came out often in the same confusion, reminiscences of apocryphal Gospels being at times mixed with those of the canonical. The distinction of "apocryphal" and "canonical" was only beginning to exist, and that in a half-unconscious way. (iv.) But a real beginning was being made. Another step in this direction was being taken. It is seen in the heightened significance which was coming to attach—not even yet exactly to the Gospels, but—to the evangelical sayings, which are more and more on a level with the O. T. The transition is clearly seen in the places where a written authority for the "words of the Lord" is referred to. Thus in the Didaché: Christians are to pray, ὡς ἐκέλευσεν ὁ Κύριος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ αὐτοῦ (8, 2); they are to live κατὰ τὸ δόγμα τοῦ εὐαγγελίου: and in 2 Clem. c. 8, λέγει γὰρ ὁ Κύριος ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ (see Weiss, Einl. p. 41, n. 3). The authority of the spoken word passed over to the written word. A characteristic name marks the transition: τὰ λόγια is now no longer confined to the Scriptures of the O. T., it is used for the written or unwritten tradition of the N. T. We have it in Papias (Euseb. H. E. iii. 39); we have it in Polycarp (Ad Phil. c. 7); we have it in 2 Clem. c. 13. In the last two examples the reference is to written Gospels; in the first probably to the written and oral tradition combined. It is significant that the λόγοι of which the Evangelists so often speak (ὅτε συνειδέσαν τοὺς λόγους τούτους) should now have acquired the heightened and impressive name of λόγια. Cp. Weizsäcker, Apost. Zeitalt. p. 387.

(3.) The Age of Justin and Tatian, A.D. 140-170.—There was still the distinction to be drawn between recognised and unrecognised Gospels. The Homily of Clement, as we have seen, quotes both indifferently; so, too, does Ignatius; so, it used to be alleged, does Justin. There can be no antecedent objection to the view that Justin used an apocryphal Gospel. The author of the Homily ascribed to Clement was his contemporary, and what one might do the other might do. The question is only as to the fact whether the evidence warrants us in believing that Justin used another Gospel or Gospels besides the canonical. Our three Synoptics Justin used so largely that a full outline of the evangelical history, with the characteristic features of each clearly marked, has several times been constructed from his writings (Hilgenfeld, Evangelium Justin's, p. 101 sq.; Westcott, Canon, pp. 102 sq., 107 n., ed. 5; Sanday, Gospels in Second Century, pp. 91 sq., 118 sq.). There remain, however, a few details (e.g. the Magi coming "from Arabia," the fire on Jordan at the Baptism, the making of "ploughs and yokes") which are not found in our canonical Gospels; and our choice lies between supposing that these come from some apocryphal source, and regarding them as merely free embellishments of the narrative, similar to those which are often found in the Western texts, or inferential additions by Justin himself. The balance of opinion is now, as it would seem, somewhat in favour of the latter alternative: so Dr. Edwin Abbott, Encycl. Brit. p. 817; Weiss, Einl. p. 42 sq.; not however Holtzmann, Einl. p. 118. Tatian is upon much the same footing as Justin. If he made any use of an apocryphal Gospel, and it is perhaps too much to say positively that he did not (see Zahn, p. 241 sq.), his use of this bore a quite infinitesimal proportion to his use of the canonical Gospels.

(4.) The Age of Irenaeus and Clement of Alexandria, A.D. 170–200.—The four Gospels were thus gradually fenced off from other writings of the same kind. The date at which the process was complete varied somewhat in different localities. The last stage before the final is represented by Clement of Alexandria, who quotes from Julius Cassianus, a Docetic Gnostic, a passage from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, adding the remark that the saying in question is not found in the four received Gospels (ἐν τοῖς παραδεδομένοις ἡμῖν τέτταρον εὐαγγελίοις), but in the Gospel according to the Hebrews. From this it would seem that though he reserves a paramount authority for the Gospels recognised by the Church, he did yet allow a certain authority to the apocryphal Gospel. The incident illustrates the process by which the restriction of the Gospel to our present four took place. From early days, as we have seen—probably as far back as A.D. 125 at least—the Gospels were appealed to by the Gnostics; they were treated like Scriptures, and mystical interpretations were put upon them. This at once invested them with an authoritative character. The Catholic party met their opponents partly by contesting their interpretations, partly by a watchful care that the number of authoritative Gospels should not be increased. A process of criticism went on, which we cannot quite describe as unconscious, though it has left no record of itself in history. The cause of this silence is to be sought not merely in the scarcity of documents, but in the nature of the process itself. It came before the synodal action of the Church was fully organised, and it was due rather to the personal direction of the ἡγούμενοι or προστάται of the ἐκκλησιῶν forming and guiding the opinion of their communities. That there must have been something of a struggle is implied in the gradual elimination of books which Papias and Ignatius and 2 Clement had freely quoted. But so far as the Gospels are concerned, this struggle hardly seems to extend beyond the space between Basilides and Tatian. The first public recognition of the Church's verdict is found in the Muratorian Fragment; but by that time the process has entered upon its last stage. In Irenaeus it is complete—so complete that the steps by which the result had been gained were forgotten. Irenaeus regards it as a fundamental axiom, an unalterable law of the spiritual world, that there should be four Gospels and no more. These, though fourfold in form, are one in substance; the same Spirit inspires them; it is no longer the consent of the Church on which they rest, but they are themselves "the pillar and buttress (στόλος καὶ στήριγμα) of the Church, and that which breathes into it the breath or spirit of life." There may be some slight difference in the rate of progress in different Churches—at Alexandria, for instance, the dividing-line would appear to fall between Clement and Origen, and in Asia Minor there was a (limited) opposition to the Fourth Gospel—but the position of Irenaeus was never afterwards seriously questioned. The Canon of the Gospels, in the fullest sense of the word, is established.

Inferences to be drawn from the Order of the Gospels.—There is one more point to which allusion may perhaps be made, though this too cannot claim to rest on general consent, and indeed does not seem to have engaged the attention of scholars. By the time of Irenaeus the order of the Gospels is well defined. The same order appears in the Muratorian Fragment, in Irenaeus, Origen, Gregory Nazianzen, Athanasius, Jerome, Augustine, Rufinus, Cassiodorus, with the great mass of later Greek writers and MSS. The order which competed most directly with this is the Western order: St. Matthew, St. John, St. Luke, St. Mark. This is the order of the Codex Bezae, and of the leading texts of the Old Latin, Codd. Vercellensis, Veronensis, Palatinus, Brixianus, Corbeiensis II., Monacensis, Dublinensis (Usserianus). This was the order of a copy of the Gospels which was said five centuries after his time to have belonged to Hilary (Gregory, Proleg. p. 137). It is also inferred that St. Luke followed St. John in the Gospels of Lucifer Calaritanus (Harnack, Theol. Literaturzeit. 1886, p. 176). The order in which Cyprian ranges his quotations in the Testimonia varies too much for a certain inference to be drawn from it. The stichometry in Cod. Claromontanus, which goes back to a great antiquity, was a similar order to that of the Western documents, except that St. Mark is placed before St. Luke. A single very important Old Latin MS., Cod. Bobiensis (h), places St. Matthew after St. Mark at the end of the volume. The MSS. of the Egyptian versions have the common order, but the vocabularies, both Memphitic and Thebaic, very frequently have the order St. John, St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke (Lightfoot op. Scriverer, Introd. pp. 390, 399, ed. 3). The order in the Curetonian Syriac—St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. John, St. Luke—was unique until the discovery of Mommsen's list, which coincides with it [but see note on p. 1237]. The list itself, as we have seen, was probably drawn up about the year 359, but it may well represent an earlier arrangement. The noticeable point in all this is the variety which is seen to exist in the oldest forms of the oldest Versions—the Latin, Egyptian, and Syriac, especially the Latin and Syriac. Does not the inference lie near at hand that these Versions were made before there was any accepted order, at the very time when the Gospels were first beginning to be collected in a single volume, and when different books were made up in different ways? We could not, of course, speak confidently if the order of the Gospels stood alone, but many other phenomena point to the same conclusion. [The evidence bearing upon the order of the Gospels is conveniently collected by Gregory, Proleg. to ed. 8 of Tischendorf's N. T., Leipzig, 1884; Baethgen, in an admirable monograph on the Curetonian Syriac (Evangelienfragmente, Leipzig, 1885), is inclined to place it in the third century, but the arguments which he adduces are capable of another interpretation.]

It is carrying speculation a little further if we also assign to the same period another important change in the outward form of the Gospels — viz., their transference from the papyrus roll to the vellum codex. For Christian literature in general the date of this transference seems to be the middle of the fourth century, when Jerome tells us that Euzoius, Bishop of Caesarea, “took pains to renew on parchment the library of Origen and Pamphilus, which had begun to wear out.” (“Corruptam jam bibliothecam Origenis et Pamphili in membranis instaurare conatus est,” De Vir. Ill. cxiii.) But just as we hear of law books on vellum considerably before this date, so also would this be the case with the Christian Scriptures, as with Books that were much used and in which durability of material was a necessity. So long as the Books remained in the roll-form, there would hardly be a fixed order. The rolls were smaller in size, and it is not probable that there would be more than one Gospel in a single volumen. The four volumes would be put together in a single reüxos or case (forming a “Tessarateuch” by the side of the Mosaic “Pentateuch”), but there would be no special distinction of order. But as soon as the codex took the place of the roll, the four Gospels would be written continuously, and a regular order would come to be observed.

Dates assigned to the Gospels. — The reader may wish to have, in conclusion, some means of obtaining a general view of the influence of these various critical investigations, internal and external, on the dates which have been assigned to the Gospels, and the kind of relation into which they are brought with the facts of the history. A double tendency will be observable: on the one hand, from the time of Baur and Schweigler onwards, a steady pushing back of the extravagant chronology which characterised the Tübingen School at its outset; and on the other hand, in recent days, something of an advance on the part of critics like Dr. Holtzmann and Dr. Weizsäcker, whose first opinions were decidedly conservative. A mistaken inference might be drawn from this last fact as to the real state of things in Germany. Of the younger theologians there are few, so far as the present writer’s knowledge extends, who have expressed themselves on the Synoptic question; but the best of them (and among these it is a pleasure to name F. Loofs, J. Gloel, J. Hausleiter, A. Eichhorn, and J. M. Usteri^b) have shown a combination of openness of mind with sobriety and soundness of judgment which is full of promise for the criticism of the future. The tendency to bring down the composition of the Third Gospel to the end of the first century or beginning of the second, is in part due to the opinion which became widely diffused about 1873–1878, that the author knew and made use of the Antiquities of Josephus. The arguments in favour of this contention are fully stated in Keim, Aus dem Urchristenthum, pp. 1–27; on the other side is the weighty dissent of Schürer (Hilgenfeld’s Zeitschrift, 1876, p. 574).

The literature of the period covered by our survey has been given with what will probably be thought sufficient completeness, so that any further enumeration of authorities would seem to be unnecessary. A word of special acknowledgment should, however, be given to the excellent Einleitung of Dr. Holtzmann, a work studded with condensed information, which it was hopeless to think of emulating. The similar volume by Dr. B. Weiss is also a very conscientious piece of work, but it has been less often consulted.

Further History of Synoptic Criticism, 1888–1891.—The tendency of the most recent criticism has been in much the same direction as that described above. The two most conspicuous exceptions would be the Rev. J. J. Halcombe’s Historic Relation of the Gospels (London, 1889), which would invert the usual theory by making St. John’s Gospel written first, and the other Gospels, with St. Matthew at their head, supplementary to it; and a work which has come into the writer’s hands as he is sending this to press, Dr. C. F. Nösgen’s Geschichte d. Neutestl. Offenbarung (Munich, 1891), which goes back to Gieseler’s hypothesis and finds the common basis of the Synoptic Gospels in oral tradition. Nösgen thinks that the statement of Papias about ^b Two of these, alas, and those by no means the least promising, Gloel and Usteri, were removed by death in 1891.

St. Matthew refers to an older and smaller work by the Apostle, which was not formally translated in writing, but which every one who possessed sufficient knowledge of Aramaic made what he could of for himself. This earlier work, he thinks, was afterwards incorporated in the larger Greek Gospel by the same Evangelist, and, when it had thus done its work, passed into disuse and perished. Apart from these two books, the general set of the tide has been in favour of the "Two-Document" hypothesis. The most noticeable points would be as follows:—

(1) The publication in Studia Biblica, vol. ii., of the essay by Mr. F. H. Woods, mentioned above (p. 1220), "On the Origin and Mutual Relation of the Synoptic Gospels." The scope of this essay is not quite so large as its title might seem to imply: it does not cover the whole problem, but is confined to an extremely close and searching examination of the order of Synoptic narratives, resulting in the conclusion that the fundamental order for all three Gospels is that of our present St. Mark. On this subject it is likely to remain the standard treatise for some time to come. Another argument to the same general effect is supplied by Dr. Paul Ewald in Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage (Leipzig, 1890). Against the view that the common foundation of our Gospels is to be sought in oral tradition, Dr. Ewald urges, in addition to the usual arguments, this: that if there was such a stereotyped oral tradition, we must conceive of it as arising in the Mother Church at Jerusalem; but if so, how can we account for the absence from it of all those special elements which are found in the Gospel of St. John—and not in the Gospel alone, but also with greater or less clearness distributed over a number of sub-Apostolic and even Apostolic writers? From this it seems to follow that the common foundation in question was not the work of the Mother Church; that it was not an oral tradition spread over a number of persons at all; but that its one-sidedness shows it to be the work of a single individual. Dr. Ewald infers that the statement of Papias respecting "Notes" put together by St. Mark from the preaching of St. Peter well suits the case, and is the most probable explanation of the phenomena. He thinks that our present St. Mark differs but little from the original Gospel; Mark i. 1–3, vii. 24–viii. 26, xvi. 9–20, being the only additions. Another writer of importance, who will be shortly mentioned in another connexion, Dr. A. Resch, follows Weiss in supposing that our St. Mark is a combination of the original Notes from the Preaching of St. Peter with large extracts from the Matthaean Logia. He appears to go farther than any other recent writer in regarding our present Second Gospel as of composite origin (Agrapha, p. 28); but his views on this subject have not yet been fully explained.

(2) All the writers last mentioned, together with others both in England and on the Continent (Rev. A. Wright, Composition of the Four Gospels, London and New York, 1890; Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, The Synoptic Gospels, London, 1890; Th. H. Mandel, Kephas, der Evangelist, Leipzig, 1889), agree in postulating as the second main source of the Synoptic Gospels, the Logia, a collection primarily of discourses by

St. Matthew. The more exact determination of this document is, however, a matter of extreme difficulty, and can hardly be said to have made much progress since the courageous attempt of Wendt noted in the former part of this article. The most valuable observations on this branch of the subject are probably those of Dr. P. Ewald. (i.) He argues against what may be almost called the prevailing tendency, to go for the reconstruction of the Logia to St. Luke rather than to St. Matthew, pointing out in particular that the section Luke ix. 51–xviii. 14 cannot well be taken as a representative section of the Logia, both because of the absence from more than half of it of Matthaean parallels, and also because of its peculiar linguistic character, which is more in agreement with that of the Evangelist himself than with that which is otherwise distinctive of the Logia. As this section shows several points of contact with Southern Galilee (Luke ix. 51 sq., x. 29 sq., xiii. 1 sq., 22, and perhaps 31 sq., xvii. 11 sq.; cp. also vii. 11 sq.), Dr. Ewald thinks that it was derived (orally?) from a native of that district, who joined our Lord while He was travelling through it (Hauptproblem, &c., p. 238, note). (ii.) He observes further that in the parts which are common to St. Luke with St. Matthew there are great differences in the closeness of the parallelism—sometimes almost complete identity for two or three verses together, and sometimes as great divergence. The former cases Dr. Ewald would regard as examples of the manner in which the Evangelist would naturally treat the documents to which he had access; the latter as evidence of the disturbing effect produced by the presence of more than one source (written or oral) for the paragraph in question (ut sup. pp. 216–226).

(3) So far the criticism of the recent past has only been a continuation of that which was in vogue throughout the preceding period, but a new avenue seemed to be opened by the publications of Dr. Resch. The most considerable of these appeared in vol. v. of Gebhardt and Harnack's Texte und Untersuchungen under the title Agrapha: Aussercanonische Evangelienfragmente (Leipzig, 1889). This was accompanied by a number of detached essays, especially in Luthardt's Zeitschrift f. kirchl. Wissenschaft u. kirchl. Leben for 1888 and succeeding years, and is to be followed by a further volume, Aussercanonische Paralleltexzte zu den Evangelien (see Theol. Literaturblatt, 1889, col. 370). Dr. Resch has begun with the most elaborate collection ever yet made of sayings not found exactly in our present Gospels, but quoted by the Fathers or otherwise preserved, which appear to possess any real claim to have been actually spoken by our Lord. And the characteristic part of his theory is that he believes that many of these sayings were not merely derived from oral tradition or from any later form of Gospel, but from the oldest of all the documents which ever went by that name, the original Logia of St. Matthew. So far back does he throw this primitive Gospel (which he believes to have been written not in Aramaic but in Biblical Hebrew) that he finds numerous traces of it in the writings of St. Paul from 1 Thessalonians (A.D. 52) onwards. The importance of this contention is obvious. It is, however, by no means certain that Dr. Resch has proved his point. He writes with something of the sanguine spirit of a discoverer, and there can be little doubt that the list of sayings put forward as original will need considerable pruning. It is noticeable, however, that in the assumption of a Semitic Gospel older than the Epistles of St. Paul Dr. Resch does not stand alone. A similar view has been put forward quite independently in this country by Prof. J. T. Marshall: see his series of articles in the Expositor for June 1890 and the first half-year of 1891. Prof. Marshall differs from Dr. Resch in maintaining that the language of this oldest Gospel was not Biblical Hebrew but the current Aramaic of our Lord's time. In this he seems to hold the more probable view; and his articles are distinguished by care and orderly method, though it is necessary to add that the validity of many of the linguistic arguments employed is questioned by Semitic scholars. All these questions must be regarded as still sub judice.

(4) Special mention ought to be made of the great work on the Canon by Theodor Zahn, Geschichte d. Neutestl. Kanons (Erlangen and Leipzig, vol. i. 1888, 1889; vol. ii. part 1, 1890). The second volume contains an extremely full and close discussion of the early lists of the Canonical Books (the Muratorian Fragment, Mommsen's list, the Claromontane Catalogue, &c.). At the end of the volume is an examination, equally thorough, of the numbering and order of the Canonical Books and of the Biblical Stichometries (cp. Stud. Bibl. iii. 222 sq., 233 sq., 259 sq., 261 sq., 307 sq., and the articles in Class. Rev. referred to on p. 1237 above). Parallel to this work is the series of Forschungen zur Gesch. d. Neutestl. Kanons, of which a fourth volume has just appeared under the joint editorship of Hausleiter and Zahn. This discusses, amongst other things, the Arabic Diatessaron. The appearance of the first instalment of Zahn's History called forth a prompt, if not hasty, criticism from Harnack (Das Neue Testament um das Jahr 200, Freiburg i. B., 1889), to which Zahn at once replied (Einige Bemerkungen, &c. Erlangen and Leipzig, 1889), though leaving his later issues to speak for themselves. Jülicher followed with a lengthy review in Theol. Literaturzeitung (1889, col. 163 sq.) in a sense similar to Harnack's. These mutual criticisms, however unpleasant for those concerned in them, all contribute to clearness of ideas and exactness of statement. In these respects Zahn's original statement may have been somewhat wanting, but in any case his volumes, which have so far followed each other in quick succession, are an extraordinary monument of diligence and learning.

This brief retrospect has been itself of the nature of a bibliography. For fuller details on the present position of the Synoptic problem, reference may be made to a series of articles in the Expositor, Feb.-June, 1891. [W. S.—Y.]

GOTHOLI'AS. Josias, son of Gotholias (Γοθολίω; Gotholias), was one of the sons of Elam who returned from Babylon with Ezra (1 Esd. viii. 33). The name is the same as ATHALIAH, with the common substitution of the Greek G for the Hebrew guttural Ain (cp. Gomorrah, Gaza, &c.). This passage compared with 2 K. xi. 1, &c., shows that Athaliah was both a male and female name.

GOTHONIEL (ΒΑΝ^α Γοθονιήλ, נ^א. Γοθονίου, i.e. Othniel; Gothoniel), father of Chabris, who was one of the governors (ἄρχοντες) of the city of Bethulia (Judith vi. 15).

GOURD (ἰῆγ^α, kikāyōn, only in Jonah iv. 6-10; κολοκύνθη; hedera; Arab. يقطين yaktin). A difference of opinion has long existed as to the plant which is intended by this word. The argument is as old as St. Jerome, whose rendering hedera was impugned by St. Augustine as a heresy! In reality St. Jerome's rendering was not intended to be critical, but rather as a kind of pis aller necessitated by the want of a proper Latin word to express the original. Besides, he was unwilling to leave it in merely Latinised Hebrew (kikayon), which might have occasioned misapprehensions. St. Augustine, following the LXX. and Syr. Versions, was in favour of the rendering gourd, which was adopted by Luther, the A. V., R. V. (text), &c. In St. Jerome's description of the plant called in Syr. karo, and Punic el-keroa, Celsius recognises the Ricinus palma-Christi (R. V. marg.), or Castor-oil plant (Hierobot. ii. 273 sq.; Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 293, 623).

The Ricinus palma-Christi is extremely common in all the eastern countries of the Mediterranean, in Persia, India, and China. The present writer has found it in great abundance on the banks of the Euphrates. The strongest argument in favour of the Ricinus is the supposed derivation of the Hebrew word used in Jonah from the Egyptian name of the Ricinus or Castor-oil plant, kiki.

Cp. Herod. ii. 94. The Arabic name is الخروع 'al-khirca'. Of the identity of kiki and 'al-khirca' with Ricinus, the Castor-oil tree, there can be no question; and the Egyptian word became Hebraized. The Talmud speaks of castor oil as יֶזֶבֶת וְיֶזֶבֶת, and Dioscorides (iv. 64) calls the oil made from the κρότων or kiki, kikionon elaiou. But we have not yet seen any convincing argument to identify these names with the kikāyōn of Jonah. The etymological argument is doubtless strong, but there are practical reasons which incline us the other way. The Ricinus is rather a shrub than a tree, and has large palmate leaves with serrated lobes, and upright spikes of blossom. It is not a tree used for shade, being of a straggling growth, though a man might creep for shelter underneath it. Now Niebuhr observes that the Jews and Christians at Mosul (Nineveh) maintained that the tree which sheltered Jonah was not 'al-khirwa' but "el-kerra", a sort of gourd. This revival of the Augustinian rendering has been defended by J. E. Faber (Notes on Harmer's Observations, &c. i. 145). And it must be confessed that the evidently miraculous character of the narrative in Jonah deprives the Palma-Christi of any special claim to identification on the ground of its rapid growth and decay, as described by Niebuhr. The gourd, on the contrary, meets all the conditions of the problem. We are expressly told that Jonah "made him a booth;" and not till after it was made, did God prepare the kikāyōn to cover it. This is exactly what a climbing gourd would do, but not what a Ricinus could effect. No one who knows the plant can conceive its casting shade over an existing arbour. But this is exactly what the gourd would do. The fragile lodge of green boughs set up by Jonah would, as soon as the foliage withered, leave him exposed to the scorching rays. Then the tendrils of the gourd would seize the framework, and rapidly the plant with its large leaves would cover the whole arbour. In all warm climates the gourd is used for shade and for covering trellis-work. So rapid is its natural growth, that it is commonly said to grow an inch in an hour. In the gardens about Sidon and Damascus the present writer has seen many a trellised gourd shading a summer-house. But it withers as rapidly as it springs up; and a very slight injury to the slender stem, the gnawing of its bark by a snail, or a blast of wind, will shrivel every leaf and leave the fruit hanging from the naked foot-stalks, a type of desolation. The "worm that God prepared" might be one of these snails, which could bark and thus destroy the whole plant instantaneously. The gourd is of the Melon family, Lagenaria vulgaris, D. C., Arab.

قرع, kar', el-kerra' of the Syrians, and is grown chiefly for the use made of its fruit, when emptied of the seeds, as bottles. [H. B. T.]

GOURDS, WILD (תַּבְּרָבָה, pakka'ōth; τολύπη ἀγρία [= ἀγρία κολοκύνθη, Suid.]; Colocynthisides agri; A. V. and R. V., "wild gourds," in 2 K. iv. 39). The Hebrew name is derived from תַּבְּרָבָה, "to split or burst open." The same word with the masculine termination, תַּבְּרָבָה, is applied to certain ornamental carvings in Solomon's temple, and is there translated "knops," A. V., and R. V. marg. gourds (1 K. vi. 18, &c.). In the passage from 2 K., we read: "Elisha came to Gilgal, and there was a dearth in the land . . . And one went out into the field to gather herbs, and found a wild vine (תַּבְּרָבָה), and gathered thereof wild gourds his lap full, and came and shred them into the pot of pottage: for they knew them not. So they poured out for the men to eat. And it came to pass, as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out and said, O thou man of God, there is death in the pot. And they could not eat thereof." Many conjectures have been hazarded as to the fruit intended, and pages have been written by Celsius, Gesenius, and others for and against various claimants. Cucumis prophetarum, L., the globe cucumber, has been suggested. Ecballium elaterium, L., the squirting cucumber, has found still stronger advocacy from the derivation of the Hebrew word, signifying "that which bursts;" and, as is well known, the squirting cucumber bursts and shoots out its seeds when touched. These plants are common in Palestine. But the ancient Versions support the colocynth (Cárulus colocynthis, L.). The incidents in the narrative quoted seem to point beyond question to the colocynth. Elisha had come down to the Jordan valley from his ordinary residence among the hills of Benjamin. Now in the hill-country the globe cucumber and the squirting cucumber are common weeds by the wayside and in the fields, and would certainly be known by the gatherer, the prophet's follower from the upper country. The colocynth, which is not unlike the globe cucumber in general appearance, on the contrary is not found in the hills or cultivated land, but is exceedingly common on the hot sands by the coast, and on the sands round the Dead Sea. It abounds about Jijili, the ancient Gilgal. What more natural than that the man gathering herbs should mistake it for the globe cucumber, which is harmless and edible when cooked. The squirting cucumber, though slightly bitter, is not nauseous, nor does it have any resemblance to the other plants of the family. The man, we are told, gathered the fruit from a wild vine. This is exactly what the colocynth plant would be called, from its palmate vine-shaped leaves and its tendrils, just as the word "vine" is applied in the dialects of the West Indies and the United States as a generic term for creeping plants with tendrils—grape-vine, pumpkin-vine, melon-vine, &c. The fruit is very beautiful to look at, of the size and colour of an orange, but smooth and glossy. A stranger from the upper country would be attracted at once by the beautiful appearance of the fruit, and would eagerly gather it as a wild melon. But when the pottage was tasted! The repulsive bitterness of the drastic colocynth will not be forgotten by any one who has tasted it. Both at Gilgal and in the sandy flats in front of Engedi we found the colocynth covering a great extent of ground, and it is also found on volcanic sands in other hot countries.

Another argument in favour of the colocynth is the use of the same word to describe some carved ornaments in Solomon's Temple. The shape of the colocynth would suggest a graceful ornament, which could scarcely have been adapted from the shape of the other fruit suggested. On reviewing the whole question, we may look on the identification of the colocynth as all but indisputable. [H. B. T.]

GOVERNOR. This English word is the representative of no less than ten Hebrew and four Greek words. To discriminate between them is the object of the following article.

1. מִשְׁפָּחָא, 'allūph, the chief of a tribe or family, מִשְׁפָּחָא, 'elep (Judg. vi. 15 [A. V. and R. V. "family"]; R. V. marg. thousand]; Is. lx. 22 [A. V. and R. V. "a thousand"]; Mic. v. 1 [Heb.; A. V. and R. V., v. 2, "thousands," R. V. marg. families]), and equivalent to the "ruler of a thousand" of Ex. xviii. 21, or the "head of a thousand" of Num. i. 16 (R. V. marg. families). It is the term applied to the "dukes" of Edom (Gen. xxvi. 15, &c.). The LXX. have retained the etymological (see MV.¹¹) significance of the word in rendering it by χλιμαρχος in Zech. ix. 7, xii. 5, 6 (cp. מִשְׁפָּחָא, from מִשְׁפָּחָא). The usage in other passages seems to imply a more intimate relationship than that which would exist between a chieftain and his fellow-clansmen, and to express the closest friendship. 'Allūph is then "a guide, director, counsellor" (Ps. lv. 13 [A. V. "guide," R. V. "companion"]; Prov. ii. 17 [A. V. "guide," R. V. "friend," marg. guide]; Jer. iii. 4 [A. V. and R. V. "guide," R. V. marg. companion]), the object of confidence or trust (Mic. vii. 5 [A. V. and R. V. "guide," R. V. marg. familiar friend]).

2. מְשִׁיבֵי, chōshēh (Judg. v. 9 [R. V. and A. V. "governor"]), and 3. מְשִׁיבֵי, m'chōshēh (Judg. v. 14 [R. V. and A. V. "governor"]), denote a ruler in his capacity of lawgiver [R. V. marg. Judg. v. 14] and dispenser of justice (Gen. xlix. 10 [A. V. "lawgiver," and R. V. marg., R. V. text "ruler"]; Prov. viii. 15 [a verb="to decree," A. V. and R. V.]; cp. Judg. v. 14 with Is. x. 1).

4. מְשִׁיבֵי, mōshēh, a "ruler" considered especially as having power over the property and persons of his subjects; whether his authority were absolute, as in Josh. xii. 2 of Sihon, and in Ps. cv. 20 of Pharaoh; or delegated, as in the case of Abraham's steward (Gen. xxiv. 2), and Joseph as second to Pharaoh (Gen. xlv. 8, 26; Ps. cv. 21). The "governors of the people" in 2 Ch. xxiii. 20 appear to have been the king's body-guard (cp. 2 K. xi. 19).

5. מְשִׁיבֵי, nāgīd, is connected etymologically with מְשִׁיבֵי and מְשִׁיבֵי, and denotes a prominent personage, whatever his capacity. It is applied to a king as the military and civil chief of his people (2 Sam. v. 2 [A. V. "captain," R. V. "prince," marg. leader], vi. 21 [A. V. "ruler," R. V. "prince"]; 1 Ch. xxix. 22 [A. V. "chief governor," R. V. "prince," marg. leader]), to the general of an army (2 Ch. xxxii. 21 [A. V. and R. V. "leaders"]), and to the head of a tribe (2 Ch. xix. 11 [A. V. and R. V. "ruler"]). The heir-apparent to the crown was thus designated (2 Ch. xi. 22 [A. V. "ruler," R. V. "the prince"]) as holding a prominent position among the king's sons. The term is also used of persons who fulfilled certain offices in the Temple, and is applied equally to the high-priest (2 Ch. xxxi. 13, A. V. and R. V. "ruler," cp. v. 10) as to inferior priests (2 Ch. xxxv. 8, A. V. and R. V. "rulers") to whose charge were committed the treasures and the dedicated things (1 Ch. xxvi. 24 [A. V. and R. V. "ruler"]), and to Levites appointed for special service (2 Ch. xxxi. 12 [A. V. and R. V. "ruler"]). It denotes an officer of high rank in the palace, the lord high chamberlain (2 Ch. xxviii. 7 [A. V. "governor," R. V. "ruler"]), who is also described as "over the household" (1 K. iv. 6), or "the governor of his house" (1 K. xviii. 3, A. V.; R. V. "over the household"). Such was the office held by Shebna, the scribe, or secretary of state (Is. xxii. 15), and in which he was succeeded by Eliakim (2 K. xviii. 18). It is perhaps the equivalent of οικονόμος, Rom. xvi. 23, and of ἑποστάρχης, 1 Esd. vii. 2 (cp. 1 Esd. i. 8).

6. מְשִׁיבֵי, nāsī. The prevailing idea in this word is that of elevation. It is applied to the chief of the tribe (Gen. xvii. 20 [A. V. and R. V. "prince"]; Num. ii. 3 [A. V. "captain," R. V. "prince"], &c.), to the heads of sections of a tribe (Num. iii. 32 [A. V. "chief over the chief," R. V. "prince of the princes"], vii. 2 [A. V. and R. V. "princes"]), and to a powerful sheyk (Gen. xxiii. 6 [A. V. and R. V. "prince"]). It appears to be synonymous with 'allūph in 2 Ch. i. 2, מְשִׁיבֵי = מְשִׁיבֵי (cp. 2 Ch. v. 2). In general it denotes a man of elevated rank. In later times the title was given to the president of the great Sanhedrin (Selden, De Synedriis, ii. 6, § 1).

7. מְשִׁיבֵי, pechāh, is probably a word of Assyrian origin (see Schrader and Fried. Delitzsch in MV.¹¹ Others give it a Pers. origin). It is applied in 1 K. x. 15 [A. V. and R. V. "governors"] to the petty chieftains who were tributary to Solomon (2 Ch. ix. 14 [A. V. and R. V. "governors"]); to the military commander of the Syrians (1 K. xx. 24 [A. V. and R. V. "captains," R. V. marg. governors]), the Assyrians (2 K. xviii. 24 [A. V. and R. V. "captains"]), the Chaldeans (Jer. li. 23 [A. V. "captains," R. V. "governors"]), and the Medes (Jer. li. 28 [A. V. "captains," R. V. "governors"]). Under the Persian viceroys, during the Babylonian Captivity, the land of the Hebrews appears to have been partitioned out among "governors" (מְשִׁיבֵי, pachōth) inferior in rank to the satraps (Ezra viii. 36 [A. V. and R. V. "governors"]), like the other provinces which were under the dominion of the Persian king (Neh. ii. 7, 9 [A. V. and R. V. "governors"]). It is impossible to determine the precise limits of their authority, or the functions which they had to perform. They formed a part of the Babylonian system of government, and are expressly distinguished from the מְשֻׁבֵּטִים, sgānim (Jer. li. 23, 28 [A. V. "rulers," R. V. "deputies"]), to whom, as well as to the satraps, they seem—if the order of the words be significant of rank—to have been inferior (Dan. iii. 2, 3, 27); as also from the מְשֻׁבֵּטִים, sarim (Esth. iii. 12, viii. 9), who, on the other hand, had a subordinate jurisdiction. Sheshbazzar, the "prince" (מֶלֶךְ, melek, Ezra i. 8) of Judah, was appointed by Cyrus "governor" (מְשֻׁבֵּטִים) of Jerusalem (Ezra v. 14), or "governor of the Jews," as he is elsewhere designated (Ezra vi. 7), an office to which Nehemiah afterwards succeeded (Neh. v. 14, A. V. and R. V. "governor;" cp. xii. 26) under the title of Tirshatha (Ezra ii. 63 [A. V. and R. V. marg. governor]; Neh. viii. 9). Zerubbabel, the representative of the royal family of Judah, is also called the "governor" of Judah (Hag. i. 1), but whether in consequence of his position in the tribe or from his official rank is not quite clear. Tatnai, the "governor" beyond the river, is spoken of by Josephus (Ant. xi. 4, § 4), under the name of Sisines, as ἑταίρος of Syria and Phoenicia (cp. 1 Esd. vi. 3); the same term being employed to denote the Roman proconsul or proprætor as well as the procurator (Jos. Ant. xx. 8, § 1). It appears from Ezra vi. 8 that these governors were entrusted with the collection of the king's taxes; and from Neh. v. 18, that they were supported by a contribution levied upon the people, which was technically termed "the bread of the governor" (cp. Ezra iv. 14). They were probably assisted in discharging their official duties by a council (Ezra iv. 7, vi. 6). In the Peshitto Version of Neh. iii. 11, Pahath Moab is not taken as a proper name, but is rendered "chief of Moab"; and a similar translation is given in other passages where the words occur, as in Ezra ii. 6, Neh. vii. 11, x. 14. The "governor" beyond the river had a judgment-seat at Jerusalem, from which probably he administered justice when making a progress through his province (Neh. iii. 7).

8. מְשֻׁבֵּטִים, pākid, denotes simply a person appointed to any office. It is used of the officers proposed to be appointed by Joseph (Gen. xli. 34 [R. V. and A. V. marg. overseers]); of Zebul, Abimelech's lieutenant (Judg. ix. 28, A. V. and R. V. "officer"); of an "officer" of the high-priest (2 Ch. xxiv. 11), of "overseers" (A. V. and R. V.) inferior to the nāgid (2 Ch. xxxi. 13 compared with v. 12), or pākid nāgid (Jer. xx. 1); and of a priest or Levite of high rank (Neh. xi. 14, 22 [A. V. and R. V. "overseer"]). The same term is applied to the eunuch "set over" the men of war (2 K. xxv. 19; Jer. lii. 25), and to an "officer" appointed for especial service (Esth. ii. 3). In the passage of Jer. xx. above quoted the word possibly foreshadows the duties of the captain of the Temple guard mentioned in Acts iv. 1, v. 2, and by Josephus (B. J. vi. 5, § 3).

9. מְשֻׁבֵּטִים, shallit, a man of authority. Applied to Joseph as Pharaoh's prime minister (Gen. xliii. 6 [A. V. and R. V. "governor"]); to Arioch, the "captain" of the guard, to the king of Babylon (Dan. ii. 15), and to Daniel as third in rank under Belshazzar (Dan. v. 29 [A. V. and R. V. "the third ruler," R. V. marg. rule as one of three]).

10. שָׂר, sar, a chief, in any capacity. The term is used equally of the general of an army (Gen. xxi. 22 [A. V. "chief captain," R. V. "captain"]), or the commander of a division (1 K. xi. 24; xvi. 9 [A. V. and R. V. "captain"]), as of the governor of Pharaoh's prison (Gen. xxxix. 21 [A. V. and R. V. "keeper"]), and the "chief" of his butlers and bakers (Gen. xl. 2), or herdsmen (Gen. xlvii. 6 [A. V. and R. V. "rulers over my cattle"]). The chief officer of a city, in his civic capacity as "governor" (A. V. and R. V.), was thus designated (1 K. xxii. 26; 2 K. xxiii. 8). The same dignitary is elsewhere described as "over the city" (Neh. xi. 9, A. V. and R. V.). In Judg. ix. 30 sar (A. V. and R. V. "ruler of the city") is synonymous with pākid in v. 28 (A. V. and R. V. "officer"), and with both pākid and nāgid in 1 Ch. xxiv. 5. מְשֻׁבֵּטִים, sārē hammēdinōth, the "princes of provinces" (1 K. xx. 14), appear to have held a somewhat similar position to the "governors" under the Persian kings.

11. ἑθναρχος, 2 Cor. xi. 32—an officer of rank under Aretas, the Arabian king of Damascus. It is not easy to determine the capacity in which he acted. The term is applied in 1 Macc. xiv. 47, xv. 1, to Simon the high-priest, who was made general and ethnarch of the Jews, as a vassal of Demetrius. From this the office would appear to be distinct from a military command. The jurisdiction of Archelaus, called by Josephus (B. J. ii. 6, § 3) an ethnarchy, extended over Idumæa, Samaria, and all Judæa, the half of his father's kingdom, which he held as the Emperor's vassal. But, on the other hand, Strabo (xvii. 13), in enumerating the officers who formed part of the machinery of the Roman government in Egypt, mentions ethnarchs apparently as inferior both to the military commanders and to the nomarchs, or governors of districts. Again, the prefect of the colony of Jews in Alexandria (called by Philo γενναρχος, lib. in Flacc. § 10) is designated by this title in the edict of Claudius given by Josephus (Ant. xix. 5, § 2). According to Strabo (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7, § 2) he exercised the prerogatives of an ordinary independent ruler. It has therefore been conjectured that the ethnarch of Damascus was merely the governor of the resident Jews, and this conjecture receives some support from the parallel narrative in Acts ix. 24, where the Jews alone are said to have taken part in the conspiracy against the Apostle. But it does not seem probable that an officer of such limited jurisdiction would be styled "the ethnarch of Aretas the king;" and as the term is clearly capable of a wide range of meaning, it was most likely intended to denote one who held the city and district of Damascus as the king's vassal or representative.

12. ἡγεμών, the procurator of Judæa under the Romans (Matt. xxvii. 2, &c.). The verb is employed (Luke ii. 2) to denote the nature of the jurisdiction of Quirinus over the imperial province of Syria.

13. οικονόμος (Gal. iv. 2), a steward; apparently entrusted with the management of a minor's property.

14. ἀρχιτέλειος, John ii. 9, A. V. and R. V. "the ruler of the feast." It has been conjectured, but without much show of probability, that this officer corresponded to the συμποσί-αρχος of the Greeks, whose duties are described by Plutarch (Sympos. Quaest. 4), and to the arbiter bibendi of the Romans. Lightfoot supposes him to have been a kind of chaplain, who pronounced the blessings upon the wine that was drunk during the seven days of the marriage feast. Again, some have taken him to be equivalent to the τραπέζοποιός, who is defined by Pollux (Onom. vi. 1) as one who had the charge of all the servants at a feast, the carvers, cup-bearers, cooks, &c. But there is nothing in the narrative of the marriage feast at Cana which would lead to the supposition that the ἀρχιτέλειος held the rank of a servant. He appears rather to have been on intimate terms with the bridegroom, and to have presided at the banquet in his stead. The duties of the master of a feast are given at full length in Ecclus. xxiv. (xxxii.).

15. In James iii. 4, the A. V. renders εὐθύνας by "governor" (gubernator). The R. V. "steersman" expresses the meaning intended more clearly.

In the Apocryphal books, in addition to the common words ἀρχων, δεσπότης, στρατηγός, which are rendered "governor," we find ἐπιστάτης (1 Esd. i. 8; Judith ii. 14), which closely corresponds to רִבְּזָה; ἐπαρχος used of Zerubabel and Tatnai (1 Esd. vi. 3, 29, vii. 1), and προστάτης, applied to Sheshbazzar (1 Esd. ii. 12), both of which represent פְּרָשָׁה; ἑποστάτης (1 Esd. vii. 2) and προστάτης τοῦ ἱεροῦ (2 Macc. iii. 4), "the governor of the Temple" = רִבְּזָה (cp. 2 Ch. xxxv. 8); and σατράπης (1 Esd. iii. 2, 21), "a satrap," not always used in its strict sense, but as the equivalent of στρατηγός (Judith v. 2, vii. 8). [W. A. W.] [F.]

GO'ZAN (גֹּזָן; Γωζάν; Gozan; Assyr. Guzana) is mentioned (1 Ch. v. 26) as the place where there was a river—"the river of Gozan"—which river seems, in 2 K. xvii. 6 and xviii. 11 (if we omit the on supplied by the R. V.)—to be the Habor (Khabour); see also 2 K. xix. 12 = Is. xxvii. 12.

Gozan was the tract to which the Assyrian kings Pul or Tiglath-pileser (III.) and Shalmaneser, or possibly Sargon, carried away the Israelites (Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh) captive. It has been identified with many different tracts of country, but is probably the Gauzanitis (Γαυζανίτις) of Ptolemy (Geograph. v. 18), and is regarded by some as being the Mygdonia of other writers (Strab., Polyb., &c.), by the adding of the Semitic formative z and the common change of z into d. As it was the tract watered by the Habor (Ἀβόρρα or Χαβόρας), the modern Khabour, the great Mesopotamian affluent of the Euphrates, and as it is mentioned in 2 K. xix. 12 (= Is. xxxvii. 12) in connexion with Reseph and the Beni-Eden, it must have lain between the Tigris and the Euphrates. Sir

H. Layard (Nineveh and Babylon, pp. 269–313) describes the region as one of remarkable fertility. In the Septuagint translation Alae and Abor (Halab and Habor) are both given as rivers of Gozan (4 K.—2 K. xvii. 6); but this is apparently a misunderstanding, as is indicated by the next chapter (v. 11), where the singular, river, is used, and refers to Habor only.

According to the Assyrian geographical lists, Gozan lay between Tushan and Nasibina (Nisibis), and is mentioned as a city; from which fact it is to be inferred, that the name Gozan was afterwards extended to the district in which it was situated. When in the hands of the Assyrians, it was placed under the authority of an Assyrian governor, who, as one of the higher officers of the realm, was from time to time appointed Eponym. Those who acted in this capacity were Mannu-ki-Aššur (794 B.C., reign of Rammanu-nirari), Bur-Sagale (763 B.C., reign of Aššur-danan), and Bêl-Harran-bêla-ušur (727 B.C., reign of Tiglath-pileser III.). A revolt took place there in the year 759 B.C. (13th year of Aššur-danan). [T. G. P.]

GRABA (Γράβα = Ἀργαβά; Armacha), 1 Esd. v. 29. [HAGABA.] As is the case with many names in the E. V. of the Apocryphal books, it is not obvious whence our translators got the form they have here employed—without the initial A, which even the corrupt Vulgate retains. In Ezra ii. 45 the name is given as Hagabah.

GRAPE. [VINE.]

GRASS. Four Hebrew words are thus rendered in A. V. and R. V. (1) נֶשֶׁךְ, dêshe, from the root נָשַׁךְ, "to spring up;" Arab.

وَدَس vads; LXX. χλόη, χότρος, πόα, βοτάνη; V. herba. It is the word most commonly used for grass, as distinguished from רִבְּזָה, châšîr, "fodder," and from עֵשֶׂב, "herbs," i.e. herbage for cattle as distinguished from herbs eaten by man. Thus, in Gen. i. 11, 12, "Let the earth bring forth grass (dêshe), the herb (êšeb) yielding seed." Gesenius defines the word as comprising grasses, which have no seed obvious to the careless observer, and all the small herbage which springs up in meadows.

(2) רִבְּזָה, châšîr; LXX. χότρος, πόα, βοτάνη; V. herba. More accurately "fodder," from a root signifying "to be green." It is evidently a generic term, including whatever grows in pastures suitable for the food of cattle. In Prov. xxvii. 25, Is. xv. 6, it is translated "hay," which it is not, in our sense of the term; but rather the meadow grass when fully ripe. As the herbage rapidly fades under the parching heat of Palestine, it has supplied an image of the brevity of human life (Is. xl. 6, 7; Ps. xc. 5) and of the fleeting nature of human fortune (Job viii. 12; Ps. xxxvii. 2). Châšîr, like its Greek equivalent χότρος, primarily signified an enclosure, hence an enclosed space for cattle to feed in, and finally the food itself of the cattle.

(3) עֵשֶׂב, "herb;" Chald. ܐܫܒܐ, ܐܫܒܐ, ʾisbâ, "herb." Generally translated "herb," but in twenty passages "grass." It is identical with the Arabic عشب, "herb," and is frequently used for garden herbs and vegetation eaten by man, in contrast with déshe. But in other passages, as in Deut. xi. 15, it expresses the pasturage of cattle; and elsewhere is rendered by the "grass of the field" and the "grass of the mountain," i.e. herbage generally.

(4) דָּבָר, yèrek, is once rendered "grass" (Num. xxii. 4). It literally signifies "green," and is used for herbage exactly as the German das Grüne, and is also applied to the foliage of trees. In the N. T. "grass," wherever it occurs, is the rendering of the Greek χόρτος.

In a country with such various climates and soils as Palestine, there is great variety in the natural grasses. Yet there are very few meadows like those of our moister and more equable climate. Two hundred and sixteen distinct species have been described from that country by M. Boissier and others. They may be divided into three groups: those of the hill-country, of the sea-coast plains, and of the basin of the Jordan and the Dead Sea. (1) The grasses of the hill-country, i.e. of the bare downs of Southern Judaea, or the Negeb, and of the barer hills of Central Palestine, are for the most part identical with the species of Northern Africa, Spain, and Arabia, with a considerable admixture of Mediterranean species in the northern part. They are nearly all perennial, short and close, springing up almost suddenly after the rains, and continuing but a short time, leaving scarcely a trace above ground. (2) The grasses of the coast plain, of Central Galilee, and of Gilead are chiefly of the Mediterranean and South European species, including not a few British species, tall and luxuriant in spring, forming a rank meadow for a short time, and then, after the seed has ripened, sending up a finer after-grass under the dried stems, and so affording pasturage more or less throughout the year. This after-grass is alluded to in Amos vii. 1: "In the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth; and, lo, it was the latter growth after the king's mowings." (3) The grasses of the Jordan valley are very peculiar, most unlike those of the hills, not compact or forming turf, but coarse and loose, shooting up luxuriantly in early spring, then rapidly seeding and dying down, scorched and burnt up at once, and leaving for the rest of the year no trace of their existence above ground, save the withered and straggling stems from which the seeds and their sheath have long been shaken. They are for the most part Arabian and Egyptian desert kinds, but include also species found in India, as Sorghum vulgare, and in South Africa, as Pennisetum cenchroides.

The short seasonal existence of all these grasses has supplied the writers of Scripture with the imagery above referred to, on the transitory character of man's life; which has a force scarcely perceived in our moist Northern climate. "Smitten and withered like grass" is a comparison perpetually before the mind of Psalmist and Prophet. Our verdure, on the contrary, is almost perpetual, and in winter our meadows are not colourless like theirs. But let a traveller ride over the downs of Bethlehem in February, one spangled carpet of green, and brilliant flowers; and again in May, when all traces of verdure are gone; or let him push his horse through the tall solid growth of lucernes and grasses in the valley of the Jordan in early spring; and then return and gallop across a brown, cracked, hard-baked plain, as the writer has done, in June, with only here and there the withered stems of grasses and thistles to tell that life had ever existed there, and the Scripture imagery will come home to him with tenfold power. The grass has withered, the beauty is gone, the flower is faded: a brown desert has taken the place of a brilliant garden. [H. B. T.]

GRAVE. [BURIAL.]

GREAVES (קַמָּחָה). This word occurs in the A. V. and R. V. in 1 Sam. xvii. 6 only, in the description of the equipment of Goliath—"he had greaves of brass upon his legs." It appears to be derived from a root signifying "brightness," as of a star (see Gesenius and Fürst). Its ordinary meaning is a piece of defensive armour which reached from the foot to the knee, and thus protected the shin of the wearer. This was the case with the κρημνίς of the Greeks, which derived its name from its covering the κρημν, i.e. the part of the leg above named. The Mischah of the above passage is usually taken in the same sense, though the word is not in either the dual or plural number, but is singular. All the old Versions, including Josephus, give it the meaning of a piece of armour for the leg—some even for the thigh. [G.] [W.]

GREECE, or Hellas, as it was called by its inhabitants, was the country which occupies the easternmost of the three peninsulas that project southwards into the sea from the continent of Europe. In respect to its conformation it presents some marked points of contrast with the other two: for while Spain is characterised by its broad area, divided into sections by parallel chains of mountains running from east to west, so that Strabo has aptly compared it to a bull's hide (ii. 5, § 27); and Italy presents a long, unbroken coast-line, but little diversified with bays and harbours; Greece is distinguished both by the extraordinary variety of its outline, and by the irregularity of its surface. In these respects, also, it differs from the countries in its immediate neighbourhood. The Balkan peninsula, as it is called in modern times—that is, the entire district south of the Haemus range and the mountain chains which form a link between it and the Alps—is composed in its northern portion, in the provinces of Thrace, Macedonia, and Illyria, of undulating ground, alternating with level plains and ill-defined mountain masses, the latter of which are closely compacted together on the side towards the Adriatic Sea. But as we advance further south and approach the Aegean, the character of the ground changes and becomes at once more definite and more varied. The mountains now group themselves into distinct chains, with well-marked summits and delicate outlines, and the coasts are indented with innumerable inlets, which penetrate far into the land, and are themselves subdivided into minute creeks and harbours. These features are traceable in Epirus, Thessaly, and the seaboard of Macedonia; but they are much more striking in the districts to the south of these, which were inhabited by races more strictly Hellenic in their origin—in Locris, Phocis, Boeotia, and Attica; and, above all, in that country which was the culminating point in the structure of the entire peninsula, the Peloponnese. To trace these points somewhat more in detail: the main chain of mountains, which runs through the country from north to south, halfway between the Aegean and the Adriatic, in its northern portion bore the name of Scardus, but further south, where it separates Thessaly from Epirus, that of Pindus. From this, at various points, transverse ranges radiate, as, for instance, the Cambunian mountains to the north of Thessaly, terminating in Mount Olympus, at right angles to which, along the sea-coast, is formed the chain of Ossa and Pelion. But it is the southern extremity of Pindus that forms the birthplace of those mountains which are most intimately associated with the classical history of Greece. Here, at the south-western angle of Thessaly, the parallel ranges of Othrys and Oeta diverge toward the east, and the Aetolian mountains to the south-west; while the most lineal descendants of the main chain are those which, taking a south-easterly course, are successively known by the famous names of Parnassus in Phocis, and Helicon in Boeotia, after which, as Cithaeron and Parnes, they separate the last-named country from Attica, throwing off spurs southwards in Aegaleos and Hymettus which bound the plain of Athens. Then follow the mountains of the Peloponnese, which have a separate organisation of their own, forming a massive barrier in the north of Arcadia, which throws up the conspicuous summits of Cyllene, Aroanius, and Erymanthus; while towards the south run down the lofty chains of Parnon, Taygetus, and Lycæum. As regards their elevation, Mount Olympus reaches nearly 10,000 feet; but with this single exception the chief mountains range from 8,000 to 3,000 feet, and among these there are at least twenty-five whose names are familiar to our ears. Many of them are covered with snow during several months of the year; and this feature, together with their number and beauty of form, tends to produce scenery of an exquisite character. Again, to turn to the coast-line, we find that the further the Greek peninsula advances towards the south, the more varied is its outline and the more deeply it is indented by the sea. At three points, in particular, the continent is contracted by inlets which penetrate into it from the two sides: first, to the south of Thessaly and Epirus, where the Malic advances to meet the Ambracian gulf; secondly, where the former of these two pieces of water, in the neighbourhood of Thermopylae, faces the inmost angle of the Crissæan bay under Delphi; and thirdly, where the Corinthian and Saronic gulfs are only separated by the narrow dam of the Isthmus. Besides the bays that have now been mentioned, the Peloponnese is deeply penetrated by three gulfs,—the Argolic, the Laconian, and the Messenian. The numerous small headlands which project into these still further increase the length of the coast-line, and form a multiplicity of tiny harbours, of which the Piræus is a familiar example. It is owing to this that the sea is rarely absent from views of Greece, and that sea and land seem to be equally component elements of the country: in the Peloponnese, for example, there are few of the mountains from which the sea is not visible either on one side or on the other. Nor must we omit to notice the islands, whether those of the western or those of the eastern sea. These conspicuous objects, following one another in long succession, present the appearance of mountain chains half submerged in the water: and this in some cases they were; as, for instance, the northern Cyclades—Andros, Tenos, and Myconos—which are a continuation of the ridge that intersects Euboea; and the western islands of the same group—Ceos, Cythnos, Seriphos, and Siphnos, which bear a similar relation to the mountains of Attica. By crossing from one to another of these it was comparatively easy to pass from Greece both to Asia Minor and to the southern extremity of Italy.

In speaking of Greece in connexion with the Bible, it is necessary to lay stress on these points, because they exercised great influence on the character of the Greek people, who were appointed to bear an important part in the preparation of the world for the reception of the Gospel. To pass over for the moment what may be called the external influences of Greece on the world at the time of Christ's coming, in respect of language and of social agencies and political organisation, by means of which the spread of Christianity was facilitated, and the instruments of its development were prepared: the Greeks exercised a great internal or subjective influence in this respect; and that in two different ways. In the first place, the speculations of Greek philosophy proved up to what limit the human mind could advance, independently of Revelation, in the investigation of morals and religion. The Greeks, beyond all other nations of antiquity, performed the office which St. Paul describes, of "seeking the Lord, if haply they might feel after Him and find Him;" and the result of their seeking was to show that "the world by wisdom knew not God." In their case also it was proved, that after a disruption had taken place between the cultivated intelligence of the people and their traditional religion, the highest sanctions of good living failed, and a depravation of morals was the result. As Neander expresses it (Church History, vol. i. p. 7; Bohn's edit.), "There was as yet no salt to preserve the life of humanity from decomposing, or to restore to purity what was passing into decomposition." Secondly, in order that Christianity might become the universal religion, it was necessary that it should assimilate whatever good and noble forces there were at work in the world, and should be able to sympathise with, and employ for its own purposes, whatever tends to elevate human nature; and thus the Greeks, by cultivating the higher civilisation in the various branches of science and art, supplied an element necessary to full religious development, which was wanting in Judaism. Now the peculiar nature of Hellenic culture, and the extraordinary richness of its growth, was due to the combined influences of race and country,—to the character and intellect of the Greek people, together with the conformation of the land which they inhabited, and to the remarkable correspondence between the two. These influences and this correspondence are especially traceable in the most marked features of the Greek mind as seen in its products,—its independence, its many-sidedness, and its temperateness. The first of these, independence—the same characteristic which in the political history of Greece shows itself alike in resistance to foreign domination and in incapacity for combination on the part of the states at home—was fostered by the presence of the mountains and the sea, by the inspiring and elevating associations of the two, and by the close contact of the home-loving life of the mountaineer with the changeful occupations of the seafaring man. Many-sidedness and versatility naturally arose in a country where a variety of objects were continually presenting themselves to the eye; where land and water, plain and mountain, snow-clad peaks and fertile valleys, bright uplands and dark ravines, were endlessly intermingled. And the absence of any objects of colossal magnitude, the moderate elevation of the mountains, the land-locked bays and island-studded seas, suggested the idea of limitation; while the delicacy of the outlines, and the harmonious grouping of the various features in the views, inspired a feeling for symmetry and the love of beauty. From the combination of these proceeded that moderation, and that balanced tone of mind, which are the secret of the good taste and the good judgment of the Greeks. Such influences would have been thrown away on a people incapable of appreciating them, but found a peculiarly congenial soil in the Hellenic mind.

A comparison of the geographical position of Greece with that of Palestine is instructive, both in respect of the resemblances and the contrasts which it presents. In the smallness of the area which they occupy the two countries have a marked point of likeness. The sarcasm of the unbeliever, which was aimed at Palestine, that so limited a district could not have changed the fortunes of mankind, would apply with almost equal force to Greece. If, on the one hand, the Holy Land, from Mount Hermon and the sources of the Jordan in the north to the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, extends over only two degrees and a half of latitude; on the other, the whole length of Greece, from the northernmost corner of Thessaly to the promontory of Taenarum, is comprised within four degrees. The part of the country, especially, on which its fame chiefly depends—that which lies to the south of Mount Othrys—is remarkably limited in extent; from this point onward the breadth of the continent contracts, and its area is lessened by the numerous bays and gulfs which encroach upon the land. Similarly in respect of the proximity in which places of world-wide fame stand to one another—if in Palestine the traveller is surprised at passing in the course of a few hours from Hebron by Bethlehem to Jerusalem, he is not less astonished at finding that the sites of Nauplia, Tiryns, Mycenæ, and Argos can easily be visited in a single day, and that by sea a short run before a favouring wind takes him across from the Piræus to Aegina, and thence to Epidaurus on the coast of Argolis. But here the correspondence between the two countries ceases, and a strong contrast presents itself in the isolation of the one and the accessibility of the other. Palestine, hemmed in, as it was, between the desert and the sea, and bordered by a long and almost harbourless shore, was the fitting home for a people set apart, among whom the truths of morality and religion were to receive a special and independent development. Greece, on the other hand, both from its situation and the conformation of its territory, was, so to speak, a naturally receptive country, and was suited to hand on the torch of civilisation to Western lands. Lying on the confines of Asia and Europe, it occupied a position in many respects similar to that of England at the present day: it was the natural point of communication between the old world and the new; all the arts, the ideas, and the movements which passed from the east to the west must necessarily pass through it; and it was in the power of its inhabitants to modify and recast whatever was transmitted from the one to the other. The islands, which followed one another in irregular chains, and were separated only by narrow spaces of sea—especially the Cyclades and the islands adjacent to them in the middle of the Aegean, and those which bound that sea towards the south, Crete, Casos, Carpathos, and Rhodes—served as stepping-stones to facilitate the approach to Greece, and lessened the dangers of a voyage in the infancy of navigation. The conspicuous headlands offered points to steer for, and the innumerable harbours both provided a refuge in case of danger and encouraged the export and import trade. It is also to be remarked that these features of the country are much more conspicuous on its eastern than on its western side, for the principal bays, promontories, and island-chains face in the direction of Asia. Italy and Greece, on the other hand, may be described as standing back to back to one another, for the western shores of Greece offer but few harbours, while the districts of Italy on which its future development was destined to depend—Campania, Latium, and Etruria—opened not on the Adriatic, but on the Tyrrhenian Sea. The result of this was, that Greek civilisation was not passed on to Italy until it had reached something like maturity.

It was through the Phœnicians that the Greeks first came into contact with the Semitic race. That people were attracted to Greece by the purple trade, for the purple-mussel was found at several points near the shores of that country. Thus by way of the lower line of islands just mentioned they reached the Læconian gulf, where they established one of their principal factories on the island of Cranæ, close to the port of Gythium. Similarly by the southern Cyclades they made their way to Hermione at the extremity of Argolis, which was famed for its purple, and from that point they advanced on the one side to Nauplia, on the other to Corinth. The purple-mussel appears on the coins of the last-named city, and Sisyphus, its local hero, was said to have been father of Porphyryon,—that is, the purple trade; and to have founded the worship of Melicertes,—that is, the Tyrian Melcarth. It was by means of these strangers that the principal arts of life were introduced into Greece,—in particular the alphabet and weights and measures. At a later period numerous traces of their presence remained. Among the leading Greek divinities Heracles and Aphrodite were of Phœnician origin, and the latter goddess obtained her name of Cythera from her worship having been first established on the island of Cythera, which was one of the head-quarters of their fisheries. Among the trees of Greece, the date-palm was introduced by them, as its name φοίνιξ testifies; and also the pomegranate, which Aphrodite was said to have planted in Cyprus, and the cypress. Phœnician names of places survived, whether derived from ordinary words, as Samos, for "a height," or from names of deities, as Astyra, which occurs in several places, from Astarte, and Makaria from Makar (= Melkar-t), the Phœnician Heracles. Recent archaeological discoveries tend also to show that many of the features which are found in the earliest Greek art are due to Phœnician influence.

Of direct communication, however, between the Hebrew and Greek peoples during the period over which the O. T. Scriptures extend, there is no evidence [but see p. 710, col. 2]. It is not intended to be implied by this statement that they were wholly ignorant of one another's existence. It is highly probable that the name Javan, which occurs in the Hebrew prophets from the time of Joel onwards (Joel iii. 6; Is. lxi. 19; Ezek. xvii. 13, &c.), is the same as Ίάων or Ionian, and signified the Greeks at large, just as Ίδοίτες did in the mouth of a Persian (Aesch. Pers. 178, 563; Aristoph. Acharn. 104); and for the same reason, viz. that the Ionians were that branch of the Greek race with which they were most familiar. The passage from Joel just referred to, which speaks of the Phœnicians as selling the children of Judah to the sons of Javan, and that from Ezekiel, in which Javan is represented as selling the persons of men to the Tyrians, imply that through the slave-market the two peoples may have been able to learn something of one another; and this is corroborated by passages to the same effect from Homer and Herodotus (Hom. Od. xv. 427-429; Herod. i. 1), which speak of persons being kidnapped for slaves from Syria to Greece and vice versa. In Egypt also, whether through the Ionian mercenaries, who from an early period were employed in the service of the Egyptian monarchs, or through the Greek traders, who were settled in that country, especially at the emporium of Naucratis, some communication may have taken place between them. But this amounts to little more than conjecture; and on the side of the Greeks there is hardly any trace of acquaintance with the Jews as a separate people, for the Σύροι Παλαιστίνων of Herodotus (iii. 5) would include all the nationalities of that region, and the city of Cadytis, which he there mentions, is much more probably Gaza than Jerusalem: and though, when the same writer speaks elsewhere (ii. 104) of the Syrians of Palestine as having borrowed the custom of circumcision from the Egyptians, the Jews seem to be referred to, it is not likely that this information was obtained at first-hand, or with definite knowledge of their separate existence. The same thing in all probability is true of his mention of the defeat of Josiah by Pharaoh-necho at Megiddo as an overthrow of the Syrians at Magdolos (ii. 159).

It was through Alexander the Great that the influence of Greece was directly brought to bear upon Palestine, and that those causes began to operate through which Greek civilisation contributed to promote the reception of the Gospel. Alexander himself visited Jerusalem after the siege of Tyre, and Josephus has left us an account (Ant. xi. 8, § 5) of his respectful treatment of the high-priest and of the Jewish religion on that occasion. That great prince, whom history has been apt to regard as the type of an ambitious youth, in accordance with Juvenal's line,— was in reality the noblest specimen of a far-seeing conqueror, for everywhere it was a part of his policy to follow up his victories by the establishment of civil institutions, and to inaugurate a system which should promote commerce and a community of interests among the various peoples of his empire. In this respect he has been more fairly judged by the natives of Asia, for even at the present day, from the Mediterranean to the Indus, the name of Alexander is ranked with that of Solomon, as representing the most famous of sovereigns. In pursuance of this design, he inaugurated the system, which was subsequently carried out more fully by his successors, of establishing Greek cities throughout Western Asia. Of the extent of this clear evidence is found in the frequency with which the names of Alexandria, Seleucia, Antiochia, Ptolemais, and others of a similar origin, appear in Asia Minor and Syria, and even as far east as Bactria. In doing this he seems to have anticipated and provided against the dismemberment of his empire, which took place at his death, for the organisation which he set on foot was independent of its unity. By this means the seeds of Greek civilisation were scattered broadcast over this continent, and the Greek language became a means of general communication. The importance of this last point cannot be overrated, for in all ages the multiplicity of languages presents one of the most formidable obstacles to missionary enterprise. But what Arabic has been to Northern Africa since the Mahometan invasion of that country, that Greek was to Western Asia during and subsequently to the Macedonian period—the language of commerce and cultivation, and an instrument of intercourse between races separated from one another by diversity of speech. To how great a degree this influence had operated in certain districts, we can see from the familiar use of Greek in Palestine at the period of our Lord's ministry. At the same time the effect produced by Greek modes of thought and Greek philosophy on the Jewish mind, owing to the contact of the two peoples, was pregnant with important results for religion. In particular, the acquaintance with these subjects which St. Paul had obtained in the schools of Tarsus enabled that Apostle to expound the doctrines of the Gospel in such a manner as would commend it to intelligent Gentiles; and also, by the definiteness of statement derived from this source, Christianity was prevented from becoming a mystical theosophy, or being otherwise assimilated to Oriental religions. In Egypt also, where the newly-founded city of Alexandria became the most lasting memorial of the author of this revolution, the same contact produced other and not less remarkable effects, to which we can but briefly allude. Here it was that the Septuagint Version arose, with all the incalculable influence which it was to exercise both on the Jewish and the Christian Church. Here, by the contact of Platonic with Jewish teaching, the belief in the immortality of the soul was developed into fuller consciousness, as is seen especially in the Book of Wisdom. Here the Sibylline oracles were invented, by the agency of which fragments of Hebrew belief passed into the literature of Rome. Here, too, originated the allegorical system of interpretation, which was destined to affect much Christian theology (see Stanley's Jewish Church, iii. Lect. 47; Bigg, The Christ. Platonists of Alexandria).

"Unus Pellaeo Juveni non sufficit orbis" (x. 168)—

In conclusion we must not overlook the greatest of all the advantages which Greece has conferred on the cause of religion, viz. that it has provided in the Greek language, and especially in the peculiar form which it assumed in Hellenistic Greek, the most fitting of all vehicles for recording and transmitting the facts and doctrines of Christianity. Of the surpassing excellences of that language there is no need to speak, for they are universally recognised; but the merits of the Greek of the Septuagint and the New Testament have not been so fully acknowledged. Yet it is not hard to see, that a form of speech so nicely adapted to the peculiarities of the Greek mind as the classical tongue was not well suited for general reception, and that a religion which was to embrace the world required a less artistic instrument for its diffusion. This was supplied by the Hellenistic language, which is simpler in its modes of expression, and therefore more easily intelligible to ordinary minds; for which reason, also, that which is written in it is more readily translatable into other languages. To this it may be added that its more analytic form causes it to be more nearly allied to modern languages, so that it possesses an element of permanence as well as of universality. [H. F. T.]

GREEK LANGUAGE. [HELLENISTIC; LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.]

GREYHOUND. The translation in the text of the A. V. and R. V. (Prov. xxx. 31) of the Hebrew words מִתְנַיִם יָרִיב (zarzir moth-nāyim), i.e. "one girt about the loins." But R. V. margin gives war-horse, probably a better rendering, as stateliness and majesty of gait, which seem to be intended to be illustrated rather than speed, are exemplified in the horse rather than in the greyhound (cp. Strack in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Komm. in loco). The LXX. (A.) has the following curious interpretation, ἀλέκτωρ ἐμπεριπατῶν ἐν θηλείαις ἐβύχος, i.e. "a cock as it proudly struts amongst the hens." Somewhat similar is the Vulgate, gallus succinctus humbos, and Coverdale's "a cock ready to fight." Various are the opinions as to what animal "comely in going" is here intended. Some think "a leopard," others "an eagle," or "a man girt with armour," or "a zebra," &c. Gesenius (Thes. p. 435), Schultens (Comment. ad Prov. l. c.), Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 684), Rosenmüller (Schol. ad Prov. l. c., and Not. ad Bochart l. c.), Fuller (Miscell. Sac. 5, 12), support the rendering of a "war-horse girt with trappings."

But, later, Maurer (Comment. Gram. in Vet. Test. l. c.) decides unhesitatingly in favour of "a wrestler," when girt about the loins for a contest. He refers to Buxtorf (Lex. Chald. Talm. p. 692) to show that zarzir is used in the Talmud to express "a wrestler," and thus concludes: "Sed ne opus quidem est hoc loco quanquam minime contemnendo, quum accinctum esse in neminem magis cadat quam in luctatorem ita ut haec significatio certa sit per se." It is certainly possible that Maurer is correct. The grace and activity of the practised athlete agrees well with the notion conveyed by the expression, "comely in going;" and the suitability of the Hebrew words, zarzir moth-nāyim, is obvious to every reader. Yet the reading of the text of A. V. and R. V. is not impossible (cp. Delitzsch in loco). The Persian greyhound is the one race of dogs, besides the pariah, which has been known for ages in Syria and the neighbouring countries, and is very highly prized for the chase of the gazelle and other desert antelopes. It is a beautiful creature, larger than our greyhound, with long silky hair on the ears, and a long pendent fringe of the same along the tail. [W. H.] [H. B. T.]

GROVE. A word used in the A. V., with two exceptions, to translate the Hebrew Asherah (אֲשֵׁרָה). This term is examined under its own head (p. 257), where it is observed that almost all modern interpreters agree that an idol or image of some kind must be intended, and not a grove, as our Translators render, following the version of the LXX. (ἄσος) and of the Vulgate (lucus). This is evident from many passages, and especially from 2 K. xxiii. 6, where we find that Josiah "brought out the Asherah" (translated by our Version "the grove") "from the house of the Lord" (cp. also Judg. iii. 7; 1 K. xiv. 23, xviii. 19). In many passages the "groves" are grouped with molten and graven images in a manner that leaves no doubt that some idol was intended (2 Ch. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 3, 4; Is. xvii. 8). There has been much dispute as to what the Asherah was; but in addition to the views set forth under ASHERAH, we must not omit to notice a probable connexion between this symbol or image—whatever it was—and the sacred symbolic tree, the representation of which occurs so frequently on Assyrian sculptures, and is shown in the following woodcut. The connexion is ingeniously maintained by Mr. Ferguson in his Nineveh and Persopolis restored (pp. 299-304), to which the reader is referred.

The two exceptions noticed above are Gen. xxi. 33 and 1 Sam. xxii. 6 (margin), where "grove" is employed to render the word עֵשֶׁל, 'eshel, which in the text of the latter passage, and in 1 Sam. xxxi. 13, is translated "tree." In these three passages 'eshel should be translated "tamarisk" (R.V.), עֵשֶׁל being equivalent to the Arabic اثل, athl, "tamarisk." No less than six species of the Tamarisk family occur in Palestine. One (T. Jordanis) fringes nearly the whole course of the Jordan. Others are found on the coast, and in the deserts, and by the Dead Sea. All thrive, but in barren, sandy, and salt situations, where they sometimes reach such a size as to afford dense shade. The tamarisk is a graceful tree, with long feathery branches, clad with the minutest of leaves, and surmounted in spring with long spikes of pink blossom, which seem to envelope the whole tree in one gauzy sheet of colour. Below Jabesh-Gilead, where Saul and Jonathan were buried under such a tree, the tamarisk is still plentiful. Dr. Barth's mention of his camping under a tamarisk in Fezzan recalls Saul abiding under an 'eshel in Ramah (1 Sam. xxii. 6). It is now however generally recognised (among others, see Gesen. Thes. p. 50*b*; Stanley, S. & P. § 76, 3; pp. 142 note, 220 note, and passim), that the word 'elom, אֵלֹם, which is uniformly rendered by the A. V. "plain," signifies a grove or plantation. Such were the Elon of Mamre (Gen. xiii. 18, xiv. 13, xviii. 1); of Moreh (Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xi. 30); of Zaanaim (Judg. iv. 11) or Zaanaïm (Josh. xix. 33); of the pillar (Judg. ix. 6); of Meonenim (Judg. ix. 37); and of Tabor (1 Sam. x. 3). In all these cases the LXX. have δρῦς or βάλανος; the Vulgate—which the A. V. probably followed—vallis or convallis, in the last three however quercus.

In the religions of the ancient Semites and heathen world groves play a prominent part (cp. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites, i. Index s. n. "Trees"). Then altars only were erected to the gods. It was thought wrong to shut up the gods within walls, and trees were the first temples (Tac. H. N. xii. 2, Germ. 9; Lucian, de Sacrific. 10; see Carpzov. App. Crit. p. 332). From the earliest times groves are mentioned in connexion with religious worship (Gen. xii. 6, 7, xiii. 18; Deut. xi. 30; A. V. "plain"). Their high antiquity, refreshing shade, solemn silence, and awe-inspiring solitude, as well as the striking illustration they afford of natural life, marked them out as the fit localities, or even the actual objects of worship ("Lucos et in silentia ipsa adoramus" Plin. xii. 1; "Secretum luci . . . et admirato umbræ fidem tibi numinis facit," Sen. Ep. xli.; "Quo posses viso dicere Numen habet," Ov. Fast. iii. 295; "Sacra nemus accubet umbrâ," Virg. Georg. iii. 334; Ov. Met. viii. 743; Ezek. vi. 13; Is. lvii. 5; Hos. iv. 13). This last passage hints at another and darker reason why groves were opportune for the degraded services of idolatry; their shadow hid the atrocities and obscenities of heathen worship. The groves were generally found connected with temples, and often had the right of affording an asylum (Tac. Germ. ix. 40; Herod. ii. 138, Virg. Æn. i. 441, ii. 512; Sil. Ital. i. 81). Some have supposed that even the Jewish Temple had a τέμενος planted with palm and cedar (Ps. xcii. 12, 13) and olive (Ps. lii. 8). This is more than doubtful; but we know that a celebrated oak stood by the sanctuary at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 26; Judg. ix. 6; Stanley, S. & P. p. 142). We find repeated mention of groves consecrated with deep superstition to particular gods (Liv. vii. 25, xxiv. 3, xxxv. 51; Tac. Ann. ii. 12, 51, &c., iv. 73, &c.). For this reason they were stringently forbidden to the Jews (Ex. xxxiv. 13; Jer. xvii. 2; Ezek. xx. 28), and Maimonides even says that it is forbidden to sit under the shade of any green tree where an idol-statue was (Fabric. Bibl. Antiq. p. 290). Yet we find abundant indications that the Hebrews felt the influence of groves on the mind ("the spirit in the woods," Wordsworth), and therefore selected them for solemn purposes, such as great national meetings (Judg. ix. 6, 37) and the burial of the dead (Gen. xxxv. 8; 1 Sam. xxxi. 14). Those connected with patriarchal history were peculiarly liable to superstitious reverence (Amos v. 5, viii. 13), and we find that the groves of Mamre were long a place of worship (Sozomen, H. E. ii. 4; Euseb. Vit. Constant. 81; Reland, Palaest. p. 714). There are in Scripture many memorable trees; e.g. Allon-bachuth (Gen. xxxv. 8), the tamarisk in Gibeah (1 Sam. xxii. 6), the terebinth in Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 26, under which the Law was set up), the palm-tree of Deborah (Judg. iv. 5), the terebinth of enchantments (Judg. ix. 37), the terebinth of wanderers (Judg. iv. 11), and others (1 Sam. xiv. 2, x. 3, sometimes "plain" in A. V., Vulg. convallis).

This admiration for particular trees was among the heathen extended to a regular worship of them. "Tree-worship may be traced from the interior of Africa, not only into Egypt and Arabia, but also onward uninterruptedly into Palestine and Syria, Assyria, Persia, India, Thibet, Siam, the Philippine Islands, China, Japan, and Siberia; also westward into Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, and other countries; and in most of the countries here named it obtains in the present day, combined as it has been in other parts with various forms of idolatry" (Gen. of Earth and Man, p. 139). "The worship of trees even goes back among the Iraunians to the rules of Hom, called in the Zend-Avesta the promulgator of the old law. We know from Herodotus the delight which Xerxes took in the great plane-tree in Lydia, on which he bestowed golden ornaments, and appointed for it a sentinel in the person of one of the 'immortal ten thousand.' The early veneration of trees was associated with that of sacred fountains. In similar connexion with the early worship of nature among the Hellenic nations we read of the fame of the great palm-tree of Delos, and of an aged platanus in Arcadia. The Buddhists of Ceylon venerate the colossal Indian fig-tree of Anurah-depura; those of Japan the great pine-tree of Otzu . . . As single trees thus became objects of veneration from the beauty of their form, so did also groups of trees, under the name of 'groves of gods.' Pausanias (i. 21, § 9) is full of the praise of a grove belonging to the temple of Apollo at Grynion in Aeolis; and the grove of Colone is celebrated in the renowned chorus of Sophocles" (Humboldt, Cosmos, ii. 96, Eng. ed.). The custom of adorning trees "with jewels and mantles" was very ancient and universal (Herod. vii. 31; Aelian, V. H. ii. 14; Theocr. Id. xviii.; Ov. Met. viii. 723, 745; Arnob. adv. Gentes, i. 39), and even still exists in the East.

The oracular trees of antiquity are well known (H. xvi. 233; Od. v. 237; Soph. Trach. 754; Virg. Georg. ii. 16; Sil. Ital. iii. 11). Each god had some sacred tree (Virg. Ecl. vii. 61 sqq.). The Etrurians are said to have worshipped a palm, and the Celts an oak (Max. Tyr. Dissert. 38, in Godwyn's Mos. and Aar. ii. 4). On the Druidic veneration of oak-groves, see Pliny, H. N. xvi. 44; Tac. Ann. xiv. 30. In the same way, according to the missionary Oldendorp, the negroes "have sacred groves, the abodes of a deity, which no negro ventures to enter except the priests" (Prichard, Nat. Hist. of Man, pp. 525-539, 3rd ed.; Park's Travels, p. 65). So, too, the ancient Egyptians (Rawlinson's Herod. ii. 298). Long after the introduction of Christianity it was found necessary to forbid all abuse of trees and groves to the purposes of superstition (Harduin, Act. Concil. i. 988; see Orelli, ad Tac. Germ. 9). [F. W. F.]

GUARD. The Hebrew terms commonly used had reference to the special duties which the body-guard of a monarch had to perform.

1. Tubbäch (תבצח) originally signified "a cook;" and as butchering fell to the lot of the cook in Eastern countries, it gained the secondary sense of "executioner," and is applied to the body-guard of the kings of Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 36 [A.V. and R.V. text "captain of the guard," ditto marg. chief of the executioners]) and Babylon (2 K. xxv. 8; Jer. xxxix. 9, xl. 1; Dan. ii. 14 [A.V. and R.V. "captain of the guard" in all these passages]). [EXECUTIONER.]

2. Rās (רָס) properly means "a runner," and is the ordinary term employed for the attendants of the Jewish kings, whose office it was to run before the chariot (2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 K. i. 5), like the cursores of the Roman Emperors (Senec. Ep. 87, 126). That the Jewish "runners" superadded the ordinary duties of a military "guard" appears from several passages (1 Sam. xxii. 17; 2 K. x. 25, xi. 6; 2 Ch. xii. 10. Cp. A.V. and R.V. of these passages). It was their office also to carry despatches (2 Ch. xxx. 6, A.V. and R.V. "posts"). They had a guard-room set apart for their use in the king's palace, in which their arms were kept ready for use (1 K. xiv. 28; 2 Ch. xii. 11). [FOOTMAN.]

3. The terms mishmēreth (משמרת) and mishmār (משמר) express properly the act of watching, but are occasionally transferred to the persons who kept watch (Neh. iv. 9, vii. 3, xii. 9 [A.V. "watches," R.V. "wards"]; Job vii. 12). It is not necessary to suppose that the A.V. substituted mishmartō (משמרתו) for the present reading (משמרתו) in 2 Sam. xxiii. 23 or 1 Sam. xxii. 14. Benaiah was appointed "captain of the guard," as Josephus (Ant. vii. 14, § 4) relates, and not privy councillor: and the word משמר easily acquires that meaning (cp. *MV.*¹¹ and Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. on 1 Sam. xxii. 14). For his duties, see CAPTAIN. [W. L. B.] [F.]

GUD-GO'DAH (with the art. הַגִּדְגָּד; BA. Γαδγὰδ, F. Γαλγα'; Gadgad), Deut. x. 7. [HOR HAGIDGAD.]

GUEST. [HOSPITALITY.]

GUL'LOTH (גוללות = bubbings, a spring, plural of גלגל), a Hebrew term of unrequent occurrence in the Bible, and used only in two passages relating the same occurrence, to denote a natural object, viz. the springs added by the great Caleb to the south land in the neighbourhood of Debir, which formed the dowry of his daughter Achsah (Josh. xv. 19; Judg. i. 15). The springs were "upper" and "lower"—possibly one at the top and the other at the bottom of a ravine or glen; and they may have derived their unusual name from their appearance being different from that of the ordinary springs of the country. The root (גלגל) has the force of rolling or tumbling over, and perhaps this may imply that they welled up in that round or mushroom form which is not uncommon here, though apparently most rare in Palestine. The rendering of the Vat. LXX. (B.) is singular. In Josh. it has τὴν Βοθηαὲλς, and τὴν Γουαθλαδών, the latter doubtless a mere corruption of the Hebrew. The A. MS. follows more closely the Hebrew text (Γουαθαμαίμ . . Γουαλαθθ). In Judges both have λύτρωσις. The springs were apparently known in St. Jerome's day, for he particularly mentions Paula's visit to them, and her astonishment at them; magis mirabatur, &c. (Ep. Paul. xi.). An attempt has been made by Dr. Rosen to identify them with the 'Ain Nunkur or el-Unkur near Hebron (see Zeitschrift der D. M. G. 1857); but they are more probably the three remarkable groups of springs in the Seil ed-Dilbeh to the north of Eddh-Dhaheriyeh (PEF. Mem. iii. 302). [DEBIR.] [G.] [W.]

GU'NI (גוני) [see *MV.*¹¹]; B. Γωνί, δ Γωνί, A. Γωνί; (Guni). 1. A son of Naphtali (Gen. xlii. 24; 1 Ch. vii. 13), the founder of the family of the Gunites (Num. xxvi. 48). Like several others of the early Israelite names, Guni is a patronymic—"Gunite;" as if already a family at the time of its first mention (cp. Arodi, Hushim, &c.).

2. A descendant of Gad; father of Abdiel, a chief man in his tribe (1 Ch. v. 15).

GUNITES, THE (גֻּנִיתִים; δ Γουνί; Gunitae), the "family" which sprang from Guni, son of Naphtali (Num. xxvi. 48). There is not in the Hebrew any difference between the two names, of the individual and of the family.

GUR, THE GOING UP (מַעְלֵה גֹּר) = the ascent or steep of Gur, or the lion's whelp, or perhaps the inn or Khân, Ges. Thes. p. 275; ἢ τῷ ἀναβαίνειν Γαί; ascensus Gaver), an ascent or rising ground, at which Ahaziah received his deathblow while flying from Jehu after the slaughter of Joram (2 K. ix. 27). It is described as at (2) Ibleam, and on the way between Jezreel and Beth-hag-gan (A. V. "the garden-house"). As the latter is identified with tolerable probability with the present Jenin, and it may be inferred from the narrative that Ahaziah had not gone a very long distance before he was overtaken and wounded, we may conclude that the ascent of Gur was a hill between Jezreel and "the garden-house." Such a place there is midway between Zerin and Jenin, where the direct road between the two places passes over a spur upon which by the side of the road stands the village of Jelameh, perhaps Ibleam. By Josephus it is mentioned (Ant. ix. 6, § 3) merely as "a certain ascent" (ἐν τινὶ προσβάσει). Neither it nor Ibleam have yet been certainly recovered.

For the details of the occurrence, see JEHU. For other ascents, see ADUMMIM, ACRABIM, ZIZ. [G.] [W.]

GUR BA'AL (גֻּר בְּעַל) = the dwelling of Baal; ἢ ἑρπα; Gurbaal), a place or district in which dwelt Arabians, as recorded in 2 Ch. xxvi. 7. It appears from the context to have been in the country lying between Palestine and the Arabian peninsula; but no site has been assigned to it. The Targum reads רִיתְבִּין עֲרַבִּים—"Arabs living in Gerar"—suggesting גֻּר instead of גֻּר; but there is no further evidence to strengthen this supposition. [E. S. P.]

GUTTER, the A. V. translation of צִנּוֹר (in 2 Sam. v. 8; R. V. "watercourse"), a word the sense of which is not certain (see MV.¹¹), occurring in a passage "of which it is easier to say what it does not mean than what it does" (Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Samuel, in loco). [F.]

H

HA-AHASH-TA'RI (הַאֲחַשְׁתָּרִי), with the article, = the Ahashtarite [possibly of Persian signification, see MV.¹¹]; B. Ἀσθηπᾶν, A. Ἀσθηπᾶ; Ahashtari), a man, or a family, immediately descended from Ashur, "father of Tekoa" by his second wife Naarah (1 Ch. iv. 6). The name does not appear again, nor is there any trace of a place of similar name.

HABATAH (חַבְתָּיָה) = Jah hath hidden; B. Ἀβείδ, A. Ὀβάλᾶ (Ézra); B. Ἐβείδ. Ν. Ἀβείδ (Neh.); Hobia, Habia). Bene-Chabajah were among the sons of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, but whose genealogy being imperfect, were not allowed to serve (Ezra ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63). It is not clear from the passage whether they were among the descendants of Barzillai the Gileadite. In the lists of 1 Esdras the name is given as OBDA.

HABAKKUK, the eighth in order of the Minor Prophets. 1. The name חַבְקֻק, not found elsewhere in the O. T., means embrace or embracing. Jerome (Prol. in Abacuc) renders it amplexus; adding, "sive ut significantius vertamus in Graecum περιληψίς, id est amplexatio." The form Ἀμβακούμ (in some MSS. Ἀββακούμ) of the LXX. is derived from a different pronunciation, חַבְקֻק, or חַבְקֻק, by resolution of the doubled b into mb, and assimilation of the final consonant of the last syllable to the final consonant of the first syllable; unless indeed the change is due to an ancient corruption. The Latin forms are Ambacum, Abacuc, or Habacuc.

2. Nothing is known about the Prophet's life. From the specific title "the prophet" in chs. i. 1 and iii. 1, it has been inferred that he held a recognised official position as a Prophet; and the expression "on my stringed instruments" in the subscription to ch. iii. has been thought to indicate that he was a member of the Temple choir, and therefore a Levite, or possibly a priest. This agrees with the title prefixed to the Septuagint recension of Bel and the Dragon (Tischendorf, ii. p. 614; Fritzsche, Libri Apoc. Vet. Test. p. 86; Speaker's Comm. on the Apocrypha, ii. 350), ἐκ προφητείας Ἀμβακούμ υἱοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐκ τῆς φυλῆς Λευί: "from the prophecy of Ambacum the son of Jesus of the tribe of Levi."

Tradition makes up for the defects of history with various inconsistent and fantastic legends. According to one account, he was the son of the Shunammite woman who was restored to life by Elisha, an idea based on the connexion between the Prophet's name and the word "embrace" in 2 K. iv. 16. Another tradition saw in Hab. ii. 1 a reference to Is. xxi. 6, 8, and supposed the Prophet to be the sentinel set to watch for the fall of Babylon. According to Pseudo-Dorotheus (ap. Chron. Pasch. p. 150 c) and Epiphanius (de Vitis Proph.), he belonged to the tribe of Simeon, and was born at Beth-zocher, by which possibly Beth-zacharias, where Antiochus Eupator defeated Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. vi. 32, 33), is meant. On the approach of Nebuchadnezzar he fled to Ostracine on the way to Egypt, but returned on the departure of the Chaldaeans, and died and was buried in his native place two years before the return from the Captivity. His tomb was shown at Keilah in the time of Eusebius and Jerome (OS. p. 143, 19; p. 270, 33). Sozomen (H. E. vii. 29) relates that the graves of Habakkuk and Micah were made known to Zebennus Bishop of Eleutheropolis by Divine Revelation. But in the Middle Ages his tomb was shown at Chukkok, now Yakuh, two leagues S.W. of Safed. The best known legend about Habakkuk is that found in "Bel and the Dragon," v. 33 sq. He is there said to have been carried through the air by an Angel from Judaea to Babylon to feed Daniel, who had been thrown for the second time into the lions' den in the reign of Cyrus, with the dinner which he had prepared for his reapers. The story appears to have existed in the Midrashic literature at an early date (see Ball's "Introduction to Bel and the Dragon" in the Speaker's Comm. ii. 344 sq.). It is embellished by Dorotheus and Epiphanius, and is often referred to by the Fathers.

For a full collection of these traditions, see Delitzsch, De Habacuci prophetæ vita atque ætate, 1842.

3. Date.—Habakkuk belongs, together with Zephaniah and Jeremiah, to the Prophets of the Chaldaean period. The date of his ministry is not stated, but internal evidence fixes it within comparatively narrow limits.

(a) The empire of the Chaldeans has been established, and has grown with incredible rapidity. Their characteristics are well known. Their insatiable lust of conquest, their irresistible ferocity, their treachery, their wholesale deportations of conquered peoples, their pride, their drunkenness, their passion for magnificent buildings, their love of hunting, their idolatries, are all described in forcible language (i. 5-17; ii. 4-20). They are pressing forward in their career of conquest. It was in B.C. 625 that Nabopolassar, by an act of treachery, seized the throne, and established the independence of Babylon. This date then is the terminus a quo for Habakkuk's prophecy; but it cannot be placed so early, as time must be allowed for the vast development of the empire which has clearly taken place.

(b) On the other hand, the Chaldaean invasion of Judah, though imminent, appears to be still future. Ewald indeed maintains that "at the time of the prophecy of Habakkuk . . . the Chaldeans are in the Holy Land, cruelly trampling down everything with irresistible force" (Prophets, iii. 27); but this view rests on a misinterpretation of i. 2-4. There is no hint that Jerusalem has been taken. And if so, the prophecy must be placed shortly before, or immediately after, the great battle of Carchemish in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Riehm, B.C. 606; al. 605 or 604), in which Nebuchadnezzar defeated Pharaoh Necho, and secured the supremacy of Western Asia. If it was clear that the "incredible work" referred to in Hab. i. 5 meant the Chaldaean invasion of Judah, then the prophecy must have been published before the battle of Carchemish, for after that event such an invasion must have been foreseen by everyone. But if (with Delitzsch) the "incredible work" is explained to be the sudden rise of the terrible Chaldaean power, the prophecy may be placed between Carchemish and Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Judah. Some interval elapsed between these events, as the death of his father obliged Nebuchadnezzar to return to Babylon after the battle; but the proclamation of a fast in the ninth month of the fifth year of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxxvi. 9) was probably prompted by the advance of the Chaldaean army.

(c) The description of the internal condition of Judah in ch. i. 2-4 suits the reign of Jehoiakim. Jeremiah expressly charges him with crimes similar to those denounced by Habakkuk, and contrasts the just administration of his father Josiah (xxii. 13-19); and in other prophesies of the same period the desperate moral corruption of the nation is depicted. Cp. Jer. vii. 1 sq., xxv. 1 sq., xxvi. 1 sq.

(d) The whole tone of the prophecy reflects the period of reaction and corruption under Jehoiakim, and not the hopefulness of the temporary amendment under Josiah (2 K. xxiii. 18-20; xxiii. 25). The judgment is imminent and inevitable. The pressing question is how the faithful may be enabled to go through it without losing their faith.

These reasons seem to be fairly conclusive for fixing the date of Habakkuk's prophecy in the reign of Jehoiakim, not later than his sixth year (Driver, LOT, p. 316). The following arguments, however, are urged in favour of placing this prophecy in the reign of Josiah:—

(a) The position of Habakkuk in the series of the Minor Prophets appears to represent an early tradition that he preceded Zephaniah, who prophesied in the reign of Josiah. (b) Zeph. i. 7 is supposed to be partly borrowed from Hab. ii. 20. In favour of regarding Habakkuk as the original and Zephaniah as his imitator, it is urged that it is the habit of Zephaniah, like Jeremiah, to borrow freely; that in particular this verse is an obvious mosaic, pieced together from Hab. ii. 20, Joel i. 15, Is. xxxiv. 6, xliii. 3. Jeremiah's earlier prophecies, moreover, are thought to show traces of acquaintance with Habakkuk (cp. Jer. iv. 13, v. 6, with Hab. i. 8). (c) Habakkuk, it is said, belongs to the school of Isaiah, Zephaniah to that of Jeremiah. (d) The subscription to Hab. iii. implies that the Temple-service was being carried on, and that therefore the Book cannot be dated earlier than the twelfth year of Josiah, when the reformation was commenced (2 Ch. xxxiv. 3). Zephaniah, for various reasons, must be placed after the eighteenth year of Josiah. Habakkuk's ministry must therefore be placed between the twelfth and eighteenth years of Josiah. To the objection that Hab. i. 2-4 describes a state of things which is hardly conceivable under the rule of such a good king, it is answered that Jeremiah, even in his earlier prophecies, delivered from the thirteenth year of Josiah onward (ii.-vi.), and Zephaniah (i., iii. 1-6), both speak of the deep and widespread corruption of the people.

To these arguments it may be replied, that the Minor Prophets are certainly not arranged in a strict chronological order: that the 'argument from parallel passages' is a precarious one: that the modes of thought of two periods frequently overlap: that the precise evils described in Hab. i. 2-4 are really those of the reign of Jehoiakim rather than Josiah.

The arguments for placing Habakkuk in the reign of Josiah will be found stated with much fullness and ingenuity in Delitzsch's Commentary (1843); in more recent works, however, he inclines to place Habakkuk in the reign of Manasseh (O. T. Hist. of Redemption, 1881, p. 126; cp. Isaiah,⁴ 1889, p. 15), on the ground that the lament in i. 2 reflects the condition of affairs described in 2 K. xxi. 16.

So early a date as the reign of Manasseh is, however, clearly excluded by the fact that Habakkuk describes the Chaldaean empire as having already become the terror of the world, and the arguments for placing the prophecy in the reign of Josiah are inconclusive compared with those urged for placing it under Jehoiakim. On the other hand, the fact that the Chaldaean invasion does not appear to have actually reached Judah, excludes so late a date as the reign of Zedekiah.

4. Contents and plan.—The artistic arrangement and essential unity of the Book will best be shown by an analysis of the contents.* It falls into three main divisions.

a. Ch. i. The expostulation.—The Prophet expostulates with Jehovah for allowing wrong to triumph unrestrainedly in the land (i. 2-4)^b. Jehovah answers the Prophet's complaint, addressing at the same time the people whose sins call for punishment, by pointing to the marvellous rise and terrible character of the Chaldaeans, whom He has raised up to be His ministers of judgment (vv. 5-11). But the answer involves a fresh perplexity. How can the pure and holy God employ as His instruments these unscrupulous, pitiless, self-deifying invaders (vv. 12-17)?

b. Ch. ii. The judgment of the oppressors.—The Prophet pauses, waiting for an answer, and considering how he may defend his bold challenge of the Divine action (ii. 1). He is commanded to write the vision for all to read. Though it may be long deferred, its fulfilment will surely come in due time (vv. 2, 3). The oracle itself (v. 4)^c implies the destruction of the Chaldaeans, and promises the preservation of the righteous; and the thought enigmatically expressed in the first half of it is expanded in the rest of the chapter (vv. 5-20). The debauchery, the pride, the insatiable greed of the Chaldaeans will be their ruin; and the voices of their victims are heard heaping execrations on their oppressors, and exulting in their fall. The plunderers shall in their turn be plundered (vv. 6-8): their magnificent buildings bear witness to their crimes (vv. 9-11): the state founded on injustice will be destroyed, and make way for the kingdom of Jehovah (vv. 12-14): their savage triumph over the ruin of others will find appropriate punishment in their own utter disgrace; outraged nature will rise in judgment against them (vv. 15-17). Idols are vain: let all the earth keep silence before Jehovah, the living and true God (vv. 18-20).

c. Ch. iii. The Advent of the Deliverer.—

The Prophet has heard the announcement of the judgment impending over Israel, and the retribution ultimately in store for their proud oppressors. But he fears that the long delay which seems to be anticipated in ii. 2, 3 may be too severe a trial of faith, and he prays Jehovah to hasten His work, and shorten the time of chastisement (v. 2). The answer flashes upon him with the certainty of a sudden intuition. He beholds in all its terrible splendour the Advent of Jehovah for the deliverance of His people and the destruction of their enemies (vv. 3-15). The language in which it is described recalls the great manifestations of Jehovah in the past, at Sinai, at the Red Sea, at the Jordan, which are at once types and pledges of this great manifestation in the future.^d The Prophet is convulsed with terror at the sight, yet it teaches him calm resignation; and though in the day of the Chaldaean invasion the land may be utterly laid waste, he and the faithful few whom he represents will rejoice in Jehovah, Who is still the strength of His people, and will one day restore them to the possession of their own land (vv. 16-19).

From this analysis it will be seen that though "the prayer of Habakkuk" (ch. iii.) can be regarded as a separate piece, and was possibly intended for use in the Temple-worship, it is by no means a mere appendix, but an integral part of the Book, which is no mere aggregation of separate prophecies, but a carefully constructed and artistic work, from which no part can be detached without destroying its completeness. Though it can hardly be called an actual drama (Ewald, Prophets, iii. 32), its dramatic character is obvious. The dialogue in which the Prophet's questionings and Jehovah's answers are expressed, the bold expedient of summoning the victims of Chaldaean cruelty to pronounce the tyrant's doom, the magnificent scene which is the dénouement of the whole, as well as the representation of the successive stages in this providential government of the world, combine to give it this character.

5. Style.—Habakkuk was a poetical genius of the highest order. The first two chapters are rhythmical in form and poetical in expression: the third is a poem which challenges comparison with the noblest productions of Hebrew literature. "Great as Habakkuk is in thought, he is no less so in language and literary skill; he is the last Prophet belonging to the age preceding the destruction of Jerusalem who is master of a beautiful style, of powerful description, and an artistic power that enlivens and orders everything with charming effect" (Ewald, Prophets, iii. 32).

6. The purpose of Habakkuk's prophecy is to vindicate the righteousness of Jehovah in His government of the world, and thereby to offer comfort to the faithful Israelite in the impending time of distress. The problem of the Divine toleration of evil could not but press

* Stade (ZATW, 1884, pp. 154 sq.) maintains that Hab. i. 2-ii. 8 is the only part of the Book that belongs to the Chaldaean period. To this was added in post-exilic times a description of a heathen or heathenishly disposed enemy of the congregation, together with a prayer of the congregation for help in a time of extreme distress. But in our scanty knowledge of the post-exilic history, it is idle to attempt to determine the time at which the addition was made. The exegetical difficulties of ii. 8-20 may be admitted; but Stade's criticism is mere speculation, and creates more perplexities than it solves.

^b Ch. i. 2-4 certainly describes the prevailing corruption of Judah, and not the insolence of the Chaldaean conquerors already occupying the land. The announcement of the judgment in v. 5 sq. is necessarily preceded by a complaint about the sins which demand it.

^c If the "vision" was actually to be written on a tablet to be hung in some public place (cp. Is. viii. 1; xxx. 8), it must have been brief and significant; and it seems best to regard v. 4 only as the "vision," on which vv. 5-20 are a commentary, rather than to suppose that the "vision" includes the whole passage, vv. 4-20.

^d It is here assumed that the Imperfects of the original should be rendered by presents as in R. V. margin, and taken to represent the scene as it develops before the Prophet's mental vision. If, however, they are understood to refer to the past, as in A. V. and R. V. text, the general sense will not be substantially different. The recollection of the great deliverances of the past is offered as a ground of confidence for the future.

hardly upon the Prophet and his godly contemporaries, when they contemplated the social and religious corruption around them; and the solution that judgment was speedily to be executed upon the guilty nation seemed to involve a still worse perplexity, if the executioners of the Divine sentence were to be monsters of pride and violence. In spite of appearances, however, he can still appeal to the character of Jehovah (i. 12 sq.), and he is taught to understand that the eternal laws of right and wrong are still in force; that the arrogance of the Chaldeans has in it the germ of ruin, while the constancy of the just is a principle of life (ii. 4). And the sublime poem of ch. iii., appealing to the imagination as well as the reason, assures the faithful heart that God will manifest His sovereignty in the future no less victoriously than in the past.

7. Strong as is Habakkuk's originality, he yet shows his dependence upon earlier Books of the O. T. Cp. Hab. ii. 14 with Is. i. 9; Hab. iii. 3 with Deut. xxxiii. 2, Judg. v. 4, 5, Ps. lxxviii. 7, 8. That Hab. iii. 10-15 is related to Ps. lxxvii. 16-20 is evident, and Delitzsch after full investigation (Comm. pp. 119 sq.) decides that the Psalm is the original. But Ewald, Hupfeld, and Hitzig assign the priority to Habakkuk. (Cp. also Hab. iii. 19 with Ps. xviii. 33. For further parallels, see Delitzsch, p. 118 sq.)

8. N. T. quotations.—Hab. ii. 3b, 4, is quoted in Heb. x. 37, 38 (from the LXX., which does not agree with the Hebrew, and freely); and the latter half of v. 4 is twice quoted by St. Paul (Rom. i. 17; Gal. iii. 11). He does not, however, follow either the Heb. or the LXX. exactly, and he expands the truth implicitly contained in the words, giving them "a spiritual meaning and a general application." The word אֱמוּנָה is nowhere else in the O. T. rendered "faith," and denotes "firmness, constancy, trustworthiness," rather than the active principle of "faith." "But it will at times approach near to the active sense: for constancy under temptation or danger with an Israelite could spring only from reliance on Jehovah. And something of this transitional or double sense it has in the passage of Habakkuk ii. 4" (Bp. Lightfoot, Galatians, p. 154, whose notes should be consulted). Hab. i. 5 is also quoted by St. Paul in Acts xiii. 41, from the LXX., which differs from the Heb., and freely.

9. Literature.—Besides commentaries on the Minor Prophets generally, the best special commentary on Habakkuk is still that of Delitzsch (Leipzig, 1843), and an exhaustive examination of the traditions about the Prophet will be found in the same writer's De Habacuci Prophetæ vita atque actate Commentatio historico-isagogica cum diatriba de Pseudo-Dorothei et Pseudo-Epiphaniū vitis Prophetarum (Leipzig, 1842). A list of the older commentaries will be found in Rosenmüller's Scholia; additions to it in Delitzsch, p. xxiv. Later works are those of Gumpach (1860); Reinke (1870); Orelli (1888).

[A. F. K.]

HABAZINI'AH (חַבְצִינְיָה); ΒΝ. Χαβασειν; Habsania, apparently the head of one of the families of the RECHABITES: his descendant Jaazaniah was the chief man among them in the time of Jeremiah (Jer. xxxv. 3).

HAB'BACUC (אַבְבָּקוּם; Habacuc), the form in which the name of the prophet HABAKKUK is given in the Apocrypha (Bel, vv. 33-39).

HABERGEON (A.-S. healsbeorga), a coat of mail covering the neck and breast. The Hebrew terms are מַגָּן, יָרֵיב, and יָרֵיבֵי. The first, tachra (R. V. "coat of mail"), occurs only in Ex. xxviii. 32, xxxix. 23, and is noticed incidentally to illustrate the mode of making the aperture for the head in the sacerdotal me'il. It was probably similar to the linen corset (λινοθώραξ), worn by the Egyptians (Her. ii. 182, iii. 47) and the Greeks (Il. ii. 529, 830). The second, shiryāh, occurs only in Job xli. 26 [Heb. v. 18], and has been regarded as another form of shiryān (שִׁירְיָן), a "breastplate" (Is. lix. 17) but the context requires offensive rather than defensive armour (hence R. V. text "the pointed shaft," with Delitzsch* and Dillmann*). Shiryān, in fact, is the pausal form of the third, shiryōn; an article of defensive armour (1 Sam. xvii. 5; 2 Ch. xxvi. 14; Neh. iv. 10). HA'BOR (חַבְר); A. 'Aḅōp, B. 'Aḅōp and 'Aḅōp; Habor), one of the rivers mentioned in connexion with Gozan (2 K. xvii. 6, and xviii. 11), has been already shown not to be the Chebar or Chobar of Ezekiel [CHEBAR]. It is identified beyond all reasonable doubt with the famous affluent of the Euphrates, which is called Aborrhās ('Aḅōppās) by Strabo (xvi. 1, § 27) and Procopius (Bell. Pers. ii. 5), Aburas ('Aḅōpās) by Isidore of Charax (p. 4), Abora ('Aḅōpā) by Zosimus (iii. 12), and Chaboras (Χαḅōpās) by Pliny and Ptolemy (v. 18). The stream in question still bears the name of the Khabour. It flows from several sources in the mountain-chain, which in about the 37th parallel closes in the valley of the Tigris upon the south—the Mons Masius of Strabo and Ptolemy, at present the Kharēj Dagh. The chief source is said to be "a little to the west of Mardin" (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 309, note); but the upper course of the river is still very imperfectly known. The main stream was seen by Sir H. Layard flowing from the north-west as he stood on the conical hill of Koukab (about lat. 36° 20', long. 41°); and here it was joined by an important tributary, the Jeruŷer, which flowed down to it from Nisibis. Both streams were here fordable, but the river formed by their union had to be crossed by a raft. It flowed in a tortuous course through rich meads covered with flowers, having a general direction about S.S.W. to its junction with the Euphrates at Karhesia, the ancient Circesium. The country on both sides of the river was covered with mounds, the remains of cities belonging to the Assyrian period.

The Habor is mentioned by Tiglath-pileser I., king of Assyria, about 1120 B.C., who boasts of having killed ten mighty elephants in the land of Haran and on the banks of the Habor; and Aššur-našir-apli (885-860 B.C.), after crossing the Tigris, and subjugating the people on the banks of the river Harmiš, records that he continued his conquests on the banks of the Habor, passing afterwards towards the Euphrates (piāte ša nār Habur, "the mouths of the river Habor"); and, from the words used, it would seem that the waters of the river flowed into the Euphrates through several outlets. Elephants frequented the neighbourhood at that early period. [G. R.] [T. G. P.]

HACHALIAH (חַכְלִיָּה), of uncertain meaning; B. Χελαϊά, N.A. Ἀχαλία [i. 1], B.N. Ἀχελιά, A. Ἀχαλιά [x. 1]; Hechliá, Hahelia, Achelai, the father of Nehemiah (Neh. i. 1, 1.1).

HACHILAH, THE HILL (הַחִילָה), hill of darkness, Ges.: in 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, B.A. Ἐχλά; in xxvi. 1, B. Χελαΐθ, A. Ἀχιάδ: collis, and Gabaa, Hachila, a hill apparently situated in a wood* in the wilderness or waste land (חֲרִיבָה) in the neighbourhood of Ziph; in the fastnesses or passes of which David and his six hundred followers were lurking when the Ziphites informed Saul of his whereabouts (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; cp. rr. 14, 15, 18). The special topographical note is added, that it was "on the right (xxiii. 19, A. V. and R. V. "south") of the Jeshimon," or, according to xxvi. 1-3, "facing the Jeshimon" (פְּנֵי עַל, A. V. and R. V. "before"); that is, the waste barren district. On the first occasion, David, on the approach of Saul, appears to have removed to the wilderness of Maon, and then to have gone down^b to "the cliff" (xxiii. 25, הַסֵּל; R. V. "the rock") in the same midbar. On the second, David drew down from the hill into the lower ground (xxvi. 3). Saul advanced to the hill, and bivouached there by the side of the road (הַדֶּרֶךְ, A. V. and R. V. "way"), which appears to have run over the hill or close below it. It was during this nocturnal halt that the romantic adventure of the spear and cruse of water took place. In xxiii. 14 and xxvi. 13 this hill would seem (though this is not quite clear) to be dignified by the title of "the mountain" (הַהָר); in the latter, the A. V. has "an hill;" in both the article missed by the A. V. is emphasized in the R. V.). Ziph and Maon are now Tell ez-Zif and Tell M'ain, well-known places to the south of Hebron; and their "wildernesses" are apparently the desert tracts N. and S. of Wády el-W'ar, which for five miles of its course is a narrow gorge with precipitous sides. Major Conder has suggested that the hill Hachilah may be the long flat-topped ridge, Dhahret el-Kóláh, north of W. el-W'ar, which terminates in a high, narrow, and almost isolated hill (PEF. Mem. iii. 313). In this case "the rock" would be the precipice on the S. side of W. el-W'ar. The character of the country, which bears no traces of former cultivation or vegetation, is such as to render the former existence of a forest extremely improbable; and it seems not unlikely that the true reading has been preserved by the LXX. and Josephus. By Eusebius and Jerome (*OS.*² p. 261, 3; p. 153, 15), Echela is
