named as a village then standing; but the situation—7 miles from Eleutheropolis, i.e. on the N.W. side of Hebron—would be too far from Ziph and Maon; and as Reland has pointed out, they probably confounded it with Keilah (cp. *OS.*² p. 143, 19, "Ceilah;" and Reland, p. 745). [G.] [W.]

HACHMO'NI, SON OF, and THE HACHMO'NITE (1 Ch. xxvii. 32, xi. 11), both renderings—the former the correct one—of the same Hebrew words (חַכְמוֹנִי) = son of a Hachmonite: in 1 Ch. xxvii. 32, B. Ἀχαμεί, A. Ἀχαμανί; in 1 Ch. xi. 11, B. Ἀχαμανεί, N. Ἀχαμανί, A. -avi: Achamon). Two of the Bene-Hachmoni are named in these passages; JEHIEL in the former, and JASHOBEAM in the latter. Hachmon or Hachmoni was no doubt the founder of a family to which these men belonged: the actual father of Jashobeam was Zabdiel (1 Ch. xxvii. 2), and he is also said to have belonged to the Korhites (R. V. Korahites, 1 Ch. xii. 6), possibly the Levites descended from Korah. But the name Hachmon nowhere appears in the genealogies of the Levites. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 the name is altered to the Tahchemonite (R. V. See Driver in loco). See Kennicott, Diss. pp. 72, 82, who calls attention to the fact that names given in Chronicles with Ben are in Samuel given without the Ben, but with the definite article. [G.] [W.]

HADA'D (דָּאָד; Ἄδαδ, Apád, Ἀδάρ, Χοδδόν; Hadad). This name occurs frequently in the history of the Syrian and Edomite dynasties. It was originally the indigenous appellation of a deity among the Syrians (the Sun, according to Macrob. Saturnali. i. 23 [cp. Bähgen, Beitr. z. Semiten Religionsgeschichte, p. 66 sq.]; Plin. xxxvii. 11), though little is known of the etymology of the name or of the attributes of the god; and was thence transferred to the king, as the highest of early authorities, in the forms Hadad, Benhadad ("worshipper of Hadad"), and Hadadezer ("assisted by Hadad," Gesen. Thesaur. p. 218). The title appears to have been an official one for the kings of Damascus; and is so used by Nicolaus Damascenus, as quoted by Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, § 2), in reference to the Syrian king who aided Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 5). Josephus appears to have used the name in the same sense, where he substitutes it for Benhadad (Ant. ix. 8, § 7, compared with 2 K. xiii. 24). The name appears occasionally in the altered form Hadar (Gen. xxv. 15, xxxvi. 39, compared with 1 Ch. i. 30, 50).

1. The first of the name was a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Ch. i. 30). Of him nothing is known (see Delitzsch [1887] and Dillmann³ on Gen. i. c.).
2. (דָּרָד.) The second was a king of Edom, who gained an important victory over the Midianites on the field of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 35; 1 Ch. i. 46); the position of his territory is marked by his capital, Avith. [AVITH.]
3. (דָּרָד.) The third was also a king of Edom, with Pau for his capital (1 Ch. i. 50). [PAU.] He was the last of the kings: the change to the dukedom is pointedly connected with his death in 1 Ch. i. 51. [HADAR.]

* For the "wood," the LXX. of 1 Sam. xxiii. 19 have en tj καινή, reading חרש חרש. And so, too, Josephus.

^b The Hebrew exactly answers to our expression "descended the cliff:" the "into" in the text of the A. V. (R. V. "to") is derived from the LXX. eis and the Vulgate ad. See Jerome's explanation, ad petram, id est, ad interiorum locum, in his Quaest. Hebr. ad loc.

4. (777.) The last of the name was a member of the royal house of Edom (1 K. xi. 14 sq. In v. 17 it is given in the mutilated form of 777). In his childhood he escaped the massacre under Joab, in which his father appears to have perished, and fled with a band of followers into Egypt. Some difficulty arises in the account of his flight, from the words "they arose out of Midian" (v. 18): Thenius (Comm. in loco) surmises that the reading has been corrupted from 777 to 777, and that the place intended is Maon, i.e. the residence for the time being of the royal family (see other surmises in Klostermann in Strack u. Zöckler's Kyff. Komm. in loco). Pharaoh, the predecessor of Solomon's father-in-law, treated him kindly, and gave him his sister-in-law in marriage. After David's death Hadad resolved to attempt the recovery of his dominion: Pharaoh in vain discouraged him, and upon this he left Egypt and returned to his own country (see the addition to v. 22 in the LXX.). It does not appear from the text, as it now stands, how Hadad became subsequently to this an "adversary unto Solomon" (v. 14), still less how he gained the sovereignty over Syria (v. 25). The LXX., however, refers the whole of v. 25 to him instead of to Rezon, and substitutes for Aram. 777 (Syria), 'Eḏāmu (Edom). This may be said to reduce the whole to a consistent and intelligible narrative. Hadad, according to this account, succeeded in his attempt, and carried on a border warfare on the Israelites from his own territory. The substitution is, however, unsupported. Josephus (Ant. viii. 7, § 6) retains the reading Syria, and represents Hadad as having failed in his attempt on Idumaea, and then having joined Rezon, from whom he received a portion of Syria. If the present text be correct, the concluding words of v. 25 must be referred to Rezon, and be considered as a repetition in an amplified form of the concluding words of the previous verse. [W. L. B.] [F.]

HADAD-E'ZER (777) = Hadad is help; ḏ 'Aḏraa(ḏp), in both MSS. [2 Sam. viii. 3-12; 1 K. xi. 23], king of Zobah, defeated by David. The inscription on an Aramaic seal, and the Assyrian equivalent Dad'idri, prove incontestably that this, and not the reading Hadarezer (cp. LXX.), is right (see Bāthgen, Beitr. z. Semit. Religionsgeschichte, p. 67, and Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. in loco). [F.]

HADA'D-RIM'MON (777) (κοιτηδὸς βοῶνος; Adadremmon) is, according to the ordinary interpretation of Zech. xii. 11, a place in the valley of Megiddo, named after two Syrian idols, where a national lamentation was held for the death of king Josiah in the last of the four great battles (see Stanley, S. & P. ch. ix.) which have made the plain of Esdraelon famous in Hebrew history (see 2 K. xxiii. 29; 2 Ch. xxxv. 23; Joseph. Ant. x. 5, § 1). The LXX. translate the second word "pomegranate;" and the Greek commentators, using that version, see here no reference to Josiah. Jonathan, the Chaldee interpreter, followed by Jarchi, understands it to be the name of the son of king Tabrimon who was opposed to Ahab at Ramoth-gilead. But it has been taken for the place at which Josiah died by most interpreters since Jerome, who states (Comm. in Zuch.) that it was the name of a city which was called in his time Maximianopolis, and was not far from Jezreel. It is now usually identified with a village south of Megiddo, called Rummaneh (see Mühlau in Riehm's HWB. s. n.). See Wichmanshausen, De planctu Hadadr. in the Nov. Thes. Theol.-phil. i. 101. [W. T. B.] [F.]

HADAR (777); A. Χοδδᾶν, E. Χοδδᾶδ, D. Χαλδᾶ; Hadar, a son of Ishmael (Gen. xiv. 15), a misreading for in 1 Ch. i. 30 Hadad (777, Χοδδᾶν, Hadad). [HADAD, 1.] [F.]

2. (777), with a different aspirate to the preceding; A. 'Aḏḏ, D^{uu} 'Aḏḏ, D^{uu} E. Baḏḏ; Adar.) One of the kings of Edom, successor of Baal-hanan ben-Acor (Gen. xxxvi. 39). In the parallel list in 1 Ch. i. he appears as HADAD (3). [F.]

HADAR-E'ZER (777) = whose help is Hadar, Ges.; BA. 'Aḏraa(ḏp); Adarezer, son of Rehob (2 Sam. viii. 3); the king of the Aramite state of Zobar, who, while on his way to "establish his dominion" at the Euphrates, was overtaken by David, defeated with great loss both of chariots, horses, and men (1 Ch. xviii. 3, 4), and driven with the remnant of his force to the other side of the river (xix. 16). The golden weapons captured on this occasion (777, A. V. and R. V. "shields of gold"), a thousand in number, were taken by David to Jerusalem (xviii. 7), and dedicated to Jehovah. The foreign arms were preserved in the Temple, and were long known as king David's (1 Ch. xxiii. 9; Cant. iv. 4). [ARMS: Shélet.]

Not daunted by this defeat, Hadarezer seized an early opportunity of attempting to revenge himself; and after the first repulse of the Ammonites and their Syrian allies by Joab, he sent his army to the assistance of his kindred the people of Maachah, Rehob, and Iahtob (1 Ch. xix. 16; 2 Sam. x. 15, cp. v. 8). The army was a large one, as is evident from the numbers of the slain; and it was especially strong in horse-soldiers (xix. 18). Under the command of Shophach, or Shobach, the captain of the host (777), they crossed the Euphrates, joined the other Syrians, and encamped at a place called HELAM. The moment was a critical one, and David himself came from Jerusalem to take the command of the Israelite army. As on the former occasion, the rout was complete, seven hundred chariots were captured, seven thousand charioteers and forty thousand horse-soldiers killed, the petty sovereigns who had before been subject to Hadarezer submitted themselves to David, and the great Syrian confederacy was, for the time, at an end.

But one of Hadarezer's more immediate retainers, REZON ben-Eliadah, made his escape from the army, and, gathering round him some fugitives like himself, formed them into one of those marauding ravaging "bands" (777), which found a congenial refuge in the thinly peopled districts between the Jordan and the Euphrates (2 K. v. 2; 1 Ch. v. 18-22). Making their way to Damascus, they possessed themselves of the city. Rezon became king, and at once began to avenge the loss of his countrymen by the course of "mischief" to Israel which he pursued down to the end of Solomon's reign, and which is summed up in the emphatic words "he was an adversary (a 'Satan') to Israel" ... "he abhorred Israel" (1 K. xi. 23-25).

In the narrative of David's Syrian campaign in 2 Sam. viii. 3-12, this name is given as Hadad-ezer, and also in 1 K. xi. 23. But in 2 Sam. x., and in all its other occurrences in the Hebrew text as well as in the LXX. (both MSS.), and in Josephus, the form Hadazer is maintained. [G.] [W.]

HADA'SHAH (הַדָּשָׁה) = new [town]. Cp. the Phœnic and cuneiform parallels in MV.¹¹; B. 'Αδασά, A. -ά; Hadassa, one of the towns of Judah, in the Shefelah or maritime low-country, named between Zenan and Migdal-gad, in the second group (Josh. xv. 37 only). By Eusebius (*OS.*² p. 240, 6) it is erroneously identified with the ADASA of the Maccabæan history near Gophna. The site has not yet been discovered. [G.] [W.]

HADAS'SAH (הַדָּסָה) = myrtle; LXX. om.; Edissa, a name, probably the earlier name, of Esther (Esth. ii. 7). Gesenius (Theo. p. 366) suggests that it is identical with Ἀροσσα, the name of the daughter of Cyrus.

HADAT'TAH (הַדָּתָה) = new; LXX. omits; noaa). According to the A. V., one of the towns of Judah in the extreme south—"Hazor, Hadattah, and Kerioth, and Hezron," &c. (Josh. xv. 25); but the Masoretic accents of the Hebrew connect the word with that preceding it, as if it were (as in R. V.) Hazor-hadattah, i.e. New Hazor, in distinction from the place of the same name in v. 23. This reading is expressly sanctioned by Eusebius and Jerome, who speak (*OS.*² p. 238, 33; p. 125, 10) of "New Hazor" as lying in their day to the east of and near Ascalon (see also Reland, p. 708). But Ascalon, as Robinson has pointed out (ii. 34, note), is in the Shefelah, and not in the South, and would, if named in Joshua at all, be included in the second division of the list, beginning at v. 33, instead of where it is, not far from Kedesh. Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 370) has suggested its identification with Hadadah, a ruined watch-tower at the head of W. Zuceirah, S.W. of the Dead Sea. [G.] [W.]

HADES. [HELL.]

HA'DID (הַדִּיד), i.e. "sharp," possibly from its situation on some craggy eminence, Gesen. Theo. p. 446: in Ezra, B. Λοδαῖδ, A. Λοδωνλοδαῖδ; in Neh. vii. Λοδαῖδ, A. Λοδαῖδ; in Neh. xi. LXX. omits: Hadid, a place named, with Lod (Lydda) and Ono, only in the later books of the history (Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37, xi. 34), but yet so as to imply its earlier existence. In the time of Eusebius (*OS.*² p. 240, 4) a town called Aditha, or Adatha, existed to the east of Diospolis (Lydda). This was probably Hadid. About 3 miles east of Lydda stands a village called el-Hadithch, which is described by the old Jewish traveller Ben-Parchi as being "on the summit of a round hill," and identified by him, no doubt correctly, with

Hadid. See Zunz, in Asher's Benj. of Tudela, ii. 439. It is probably identical with ADITHAIM, and the ADIDA of the Maccabæan history (PEF. Mem. ii. 297). [G.] [W.]

HAD'LAI (הַדְּלָי) = resting; B. Χοδδ, A. Ἀδδῖ; Adali, a man of Ephraim; father of Amasa, who was one of the chiefs of the tribe in the reign of Pekah (2 Ch. xxviii. 12).

HADO'RAM (הַדּוֹרָם); Ὀδορρά [Gen.; LXX. om. in Ch.]; Aduram. 1. The fifth son of Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Ch. i. 21). His settlements, unlike those of many of Joktan's sons, have not been identified (cp. Dillmann³ on Gen. l. c.). Bochart supposed that the Adramitæe represented his descendants; but afterwards believed, as later critics have also, that this people was the same as the Chatramotitæe, or people of Hadramaut (Phaleg, ii. c. 17). [HAZARMAVETH.] Other conjectures may be seen in Delitzsch on Gen. l. c. [1887], or in MV.¹¹. [F.]

2. (הַדּוֹרָם); B. Ἰδορράμ, N. Ἰδορράμ, A. Δορράμ; Adoram, son of Tou king of Hamath. He was his father's ambassador to congratulate David on his victory over Hadazer king of Zobah (1 Ch. xviii. 10), and the bearer of valuable presents in the form of articles of antique manufacture (Joseph.), in gold, silver, and brass. In the parallel narrative of 2 Sam. viii. 10 sq. the name is given as Joram; but this being a contraction of Jehoram, which contains the name of Jehovah, is peculiarly an Israelite appellation, and we may therefore conclude that Hadoram is the genuine form of the name, a conclusion supported in part by the LXX. reading of 2 Sam. l. c. (BA. Ἰεδορράμ). By Josephus (Ant. vii. 5, 4) it is given as Ἀδώραμος.

3. (הַדּוֹרָם); B. Ἀδωνειράμ, A. Ἀδωράμ; Aduram.) The form assumed in Chronicles by the name of the intendant of taxes under David, Solomon, and Rehoboam, who lost his life in the revolt at Shechem after the coronation of the last-named prince (2 Ch. x. 18). He was sent by Rehoboam to appease the tumult, possibly as being one of the old and moderate party; but the choice of the chief officer of the taxes was not a happy one. His interference was ineffectual, and he himself fell a victim: "all Israel stoned him with stones that he died." In 1 K. iv. 6, v. 28, the name is given in the longer form of ADONIRAM, but in Samuel (2 Sam. xx. 24) as ADORAM; LXX., Ἀδωνειράμ. Adoniram is probably the true name, Hadoram being presumably a Hamathite name (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. l. c.). By Josephus, in both the first and last case, he is called Ἀδώραμος. [W. A. W.] [F.]

HAD-RACH (הַדְּרָח); Σεδράχ or Σεδράκ; Had-rach, a district of Syria, as appears from the context in the only passage where it is mentioned:—

"The burthen of Jahvah's word is upon the land of Hadrach,
And Damascus is the resting-place thereof:
For to Jahvah belongeth the people of Aram,
And (= as well as) all the tribes of Israel."

¹¹ Reading עַם אֲרָם (Amos i. 6) for עַין אֲרָם.

The numerous attempts of former scholars to identify the locality have been antiquated by Schrader's recognition of the name in the Assyrian inscriptions. It is there variously called the Land of Hatarakka, Hatarikka, and Hatarika; and is mentioned along with Damascus and Hamath, just as it is in Zech. ix. 1, 2, as well as with Zobah, Simyra, and Arka (see W.A.I. ii. 52, 46 b; iii. 10, No. 3. 34; Schrader's KGF. p. 122, and his KAT? pp. 453, 482, 484).

[C. J. B.]

HAG'AB (חַגְאָב = locust; Ἀγάβ; Hagab). Bene-Hagab were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 46). In the parallel list in Nehemiah, this and the name preceding it are omitted. In the Apocryphal Esdras (v. 30) it is given as AGABA.

HAGA'BA (חַגְאָבָה; Ἀγαβά; Hagaba). Bene-Hagaba were among the Nethinim who came back from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 48). The name is slightly different in form from HAGA'BAH (חַגְאָבָה; Ἀγαβά; Hagaba), under which it is found in the parallel list of Ezra ii. 45. In Esdras it is given as GRABA.

HAGAR (חַגָר; Ἀγάρ; Agar). An Egyptian slave of Sarah, and an inferior wife of Abraham, who, as the mother of Ishmael, is the reputed ancestress of the Ishmaelite Arab stocks. The oldest traditions about her, and the names of the twelve tribes that claimed descent from her, are preserved in Gen. xvi., xxi. 9-21, xxv. 12-18. As might be expected, her name finds its probable explanation not in Hebrew but in Arabic, where we have the root حَجَرَ, haj'ara, "to separate from one's friends or kindred," with the derivatives هَجْرَة, hig'rah, "separation," the well-known designation of Muhammad's historic departure from Mecca to Medinah; and حِجْر, Hag'ar, a province of Arabia on the Persian Gulf, which very possibly owes its name to ancient settlements of Hagarenes, or tribes descended from Hagar (Ps. lxxxiii. 6; 1 Ch. v. 10, 20; see Ewald, Hist. Isr. i. 315, n. 2, Eng. Trans.). This etymology harmonizes with the Biblical narratives of Hagar's flight from Sarah's tyranny, and her wanderings in the wilderness. But to derive the name of Hagar from that of her descendants the Hagarenes or Hagriles, seems gratuitous; while the opinion, recently advanced by a distinguished Arabist (Dr. Ignaz Goldziher), that Hagar is simply the noon-day sun, called poetically

الهاجرة, al-hag'irah, "the Flying One," is an arbitrary speculation. The sole meaning of that phrase, according to the native lexicographers (Kāmis, al-G'auhari, Ibn Mukarram), is "the period of the noon-day heat."

The story of Hagar, in all likelihood, preserves an historical memory of the separation of the Ishmaelite Arabs from their kinsfolk, who afterwards again divided into the peoples of Edom and Israel (so Kautzsch, ap. Riehm, H.W.B.). The fact that Hagar is a slave-wife, and of Egyptian birth, indicates that the Ishmaelite stocks were not of the purest strain of Abraham's blood, but crossed with foreign elements. In accordance with similar ideas, Arab historians have called the tribes of Ishmaelite origin

عرب مستعربة, 'Arab musta'ribah, "naturalized (literally, Arabized) Arabs," as opposed to the Joktanites, who are عرب عاربة

'Arab 'aribah, "Pure (literally, Arabian) Arabs."

Arab tradition (al-Baidāwī, al-Bagawī) relates that هاجر (Häg'ar) and Ishmael were taken by Abraham to Mecca, and abandoned there. The holy well Zamzam by the Caaba is the fountain that sprang up for the relief of Ishmael, the ancestor of the Prophet. The tribe of G'urhum allowed the fugitives to settle among them; and Ishmael allied himself with the G'urhumites by marrying a daughter of Modad, and adopting their speech and manners; so that his posterity were united with them into a single nation.

In the time of Jerome a local tradition pointed out Hagar's Well (OS? p. 135, 3). At present, a well in the Wādī al-Muwailih, at some distance to the south of Beersheba, and some chambers in the rock (Bait Hag'ar, "Hagar's House"), are connected with her name by the Bedawis (Robinson, Palestine, i. 315; Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, ii. 354; Ritter, xiv. 1086; Dillmann⁵ in loco).

St. Paul makes characteristic use of the story of Hagar, finding therein an allegory of the Two Covenants, but not necessarily, as some would have us think (Stanley; Riehm, H.W.B.), assuming a connexion between the Arabic term

حجر, haj'ar, "a stone," and the name Hagar (see Lightfoot, ad Gal. iv. 21-31). The allegorical application of the narrative is quite in the manner of the Rabbinical reasonings of the time. What is different is the new doctrine which the argument illustrates and enforces. It is the substance not the form, the spirit not the letter, that is essential here as elsewhere in the Scriptures. [C. J. B.]

HAGARENES, HAGARITES, HAGERITE, THE (חַגְרִי, חַגְרִי, חַגְרִי: B. τῶν Ἀγαρηῶν, οἱ Ἀγαρηῖται; A. τῶν Ἀγαρηῶν, οἱ Ἀγορηῖται, 1 Ch. v. 19, 20; B. δὲ Γαγληῖται, A. δὲ Ἀγαρηῖται, 1 Ch. xxvii. 31; B. οἱ Ἀγγαρῖνοι, B.T. Ἀγγαρῖνοι, Ps. lxxxiii. 6: Agarei, Agaricus, Agareni). One and the same people, or group of nomadic Arabian tribes, appears to be meant by these variant forms of the same gentile name, which, however, in Hebrew reduce themselves to two, viz. Hagri'im and the contracted Hagri'm (sing. Hagri). According to a notice of them preserved in 1 Ch. v. 10, 19, 20, as early as the time of Saul the Hagriles* were a nomadic people, rich in flocks and herds, whose pasture-grounds lay on the eastern border of Gilead; a territory from which they were expelled by the Israelite tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh, which held it until their own deportation by the Assyrians (734 B.C.: see 2 K. xv. 29). The fact that they were a pastoral people is incidentally confirmed by another notice from an ancient source, stating that "Jaziz the Hagerite," or rather Hagrite (יָזִיז הַחֲגֵרִיתִי), had the charge of David's flocks of sheep and goats (יָזִיז) : see 1 Ch. xxvii. 31.^b Hagrim, Hagriles, as the name of an Arab people, at once suggests that of Hagar, the mother of all Ishmaelite Arabs. It is hardly a strong objection to this comparison, supported as it is by linguistic equivalence and Jewish tradition,^c that the Hagrim seem to be distinguished from the Ishmaelites in Ps. lxxxiii. 6, of whom, in fact, they were a branch (Kautzsch op. Riehm, HWB.). Why may not one group of Hagrite Arabs have been known in antiquity as the Hagriles, par excellence? This would surely be no bar to recognising the claim of other Arabian stocks, known by special designations, to descent from Hagar through Ishmael.

Three other Arab peoples were allied with the Hagriles in the war of 1 Ch. v. 19; viz. Jetur,^d Naphish, and Nodab. These are, in all probability, the last three of the twelve tribes of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15), Nodab being either a correction or a corruption of Kedemah.^e

The position of Jetur, the modern G'eidūr, being known [ITURAEA], supplies another indication of the original seats of the Hagrim, which cannot have been very far off. They are probably identical with the 'Ayyaioi or Agrei of the classical geographers, whom Pliny (vi. 28) twice mentions among the peoples of Arabia; the second time, along with the Ammonii or Ammonites (Ps. lxxxiii. 6, 7). See also Eratosthenes in Strabo, xvi. p. 767, where they are mentioned with the Nabataeans, and Ptolemy, v. 19, where they appear as neighbours of the Batanaeans (E. of the Haurān), and Dionysius Periegetes, v. 956, where they are called 'Ayyēes. Gesenius, to whom these references are due (Thesaur. s. v. חַגְרִיתִי), identifies the

Hagriles with the people of حِجْر, Hagar, or الحِجْزَاءُ, Al-Ahsā, Lahsā, a province of Arabia

^b In 1 Ch. xl. 38, "Mibhar the son of Haggeri" [Heb. Hagri] is due to confusion of similar Heb. letters, and must be corrected, with Kennicott and most moderns, from 2 Sam. xxiii. 36 ("of Zohab; Bant the Gadite").

^c "The sons of Hagar" (οἱ υἱοὶ Ἀγάρ), Baruch iii. 23, may, as Kautzsch and others suppose, mean the Hagrim. They are mentioned along with Thalman and Merran, the latter being probably a misreading of Heb. Medan (Hitzig, Ewald). If Thalman represents Heb. Teman, the "sons of Hagar" are hardly in the right neighbourhood for the Hagrim. But the LXX. also use Thalman for Tema (Gen. xxv. 15); that is, تَيْمَاءُ, on the route between Madyān and Hag'ar on the Persian Gulf.

^d Instead of "with Jetur" of A. V. and R. V., the Heb. text has "and Jetur."

^e Heb. חַגְרִיתִי, Nodab; חַגְרִיתִי, Kedemah. An ill-written ח might be misread ח, and ח and ח are often indistinguishable in MSS. Kedemah is the reading of 1 Ch. i. 31.

on the Persian Gulf ('Die Landschaft Lachsa oder Hadsjar,' Niebuhr, Arabien, pp. 339-342).^f Considering the migratory habits of Arabian tribes, it seems likely enough that some portion of the Hagriles in ancient times may have wandered even so far to the south-east from their earlier seats. But the name is not uncommon elsewhere in Arabia. The Arab geographers mention places so called in Yemen, the Hig'az, and Hadhramaut. [C. J. B.]

HAGGAI, the tenth in order of the Minor Prophets.

1. The name (חַגַּי; Ἀγγαῖος; Aggaëus) is not borne by anyone else in the O. T.; but the similar names Haggi, Haggith, Haggiah are found. It is generally supposed to mean festivus, and may have been given him because he was born on a festival, perhaps on the Feast, that of Tabernacles.

2. Nothing is known of him beside the record of his brief ministry for about four months in the second year of Darius (u.c. 520), contained in his Book, and supplemented by two notices in the Book of Ezra, which couple his name with that of Zechariah, as colleagues in persuading the people to complete the restoration of the Temple (v. 1, vi. 14; cp. 1 Esd. vi. 1, vii. 3). In the absence of positive information it may plausibly be conjectured that he was one of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel and Joshua. Ewald would infer from ii. 3 that he was one of the few survivors who had seen the first Temple in its splendour. If so, he must have delivered his prophetic message in extreme old age, and left the younger Zechariah to continue the work he had begun (Pusey, Introd. to Haggai). The inference, however, is at best precarious: the words of ii. 3 seem rather to be addressed to a number of persons, of whom the Prophet himself was not one; and according to the traditions recorded by Pseudo-Dorotheus (ap. Chron. Pasch. 151 d) and Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vitis Prophetarum), Haggai was still a young man when he returned from Babylon to Jerusalem. They add that he lived to see the restoration of the Temple, and was buried with honour near the sepulchres of the priests. One Jewish tradition regards Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi as forming an intermediate link in the chain of tradition between the prophets and the "Great Synagogue;" another reckons them among the members of that body, though it is not supposed to have been founded until the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, and Ezra did not arrive in Jerusalem until sixty-two years after the date of Haggai's public ministry (see Carpzov's Introductio, and Meyer's Seder Olam, p. 1076 sq.). In St. Jerome's day a notion existed, probably among the Origenists, that Haggai was an angel in human form (Comm. on i. 13). It was based on a misinterpretation of ch. i. 13, the phrase "the LORD's messenger" (מַלְאֲכֵי יְהוָה) being identical with "the angel of the LORD" in Zech. i. 11,

^f The Arabic translator of the Psalms appears to have been of this opinion. In Ps. lxxxiii. 6 he has written الهاجرين, a gentilic noun from حِجْر according to Al-G'auhari, cited by Gesenius.

&c., and it seems to have had some currency, as Cyril of Alexandria thought it worth while to refute it in his Commentary.

3. The prophecies of Haggai are expressly stated to have been delivered "in the second year of Darius the king" (Hagg. i. 1, ii. 10; cp. Ezra iv. 24, v. 1, vi. 14). This can only mean Darius the son of Hystaspes, who reigned from B.C. 521 to B.C. 485. None who had seen the old Temple (Hagg. ii. 3) could have been alive in the time of Darius Nothus (B.C. 424-405). The date of Haggai's ministry is therefore fixed as the year B.C. 520. Sixteen or seventeen years had elapsed since the Return of the exiles under the leadership of Zerubbabel and Joshua, with an express commission from Cyrus to rebuild the Temple of Jehovah at Jerusalem (Ezra i. 2 sq.).

In the seventh month of the first year of the Return, the Altar was re-erected, the daily sacrifice restored, and the Feast of Tabernacles celebrated (Ezra iii. 1 sq.); and in the second month of the second year (535) the foundation of the Temple, for which preparations had already been made (Ezra i. 4 sq., ii. 68 sq.), was laid with solemn ceremonial amid general rejoicings, chequered only by the sorrow of the old men, who mournfully contrasted this insignificant beginning with the grandeur of the former Temple (Ezra iii. 8 sq.). The work had scarcely been commenced when the "people of the land," i.e. the mixed population inhabiting what had formerly been the Northern kingdom, expressed their desire to join in it (Ezra iv. 1 sq.). The acceptance of the offer would have imperilled the purity of the faith in the new community, and it was resolutely refused. The consequence of this refusal was active opposition. By intrigue or bribery they seem to have procured from the Persian court a decree inhibiting the Jews from proceeding with the building (Ezra iv. 4, 5). The work was at a standstill during the remainder of the reign of Cyrus, and during the reigns of Cambyses (B.C. 529-522) and Pseudo-Smerdis (B.C. 521). We have no further information about this period. The narrative in Ezra iv. 6-23, which at first sight appears to refer to it, is parenthetical, and relates the subsequent opposition to the building of the walls in the reigns of Ahasuerus, i.e. Xerxes (B.C. 485-465), and Artaxerxes I. Longimanus (B.C. 465-425). To identify the Ahasuerus of Ezra iv. 6 with Cambyses, and the Artaxerxes of Ezra iv. 7 with Pseudo-Smerdis, who only reigned for eight months, is unreasonable [EZRA].

But though history tells us no more than that "the work of the house of God ceased" in consequence of the opposition of external adversaries, we may infer from Haggai's prophecy that the opposition was not such as could not have been overcome by courage and resolution. He lays the blame entirely on the negligence and apathy of the people, and nowhere hints that circumstances had made progress impossible. Initial difficulties had paralysed their feeble energies; and though they had been able to rebuild their own houses and even to decorate them (Hagg. i. 4, 9), they had been reconciling themselves to the idea of existence without that Temple, which they had been commissioned by Cyrus and by their countrymen in exile to rebuild. Some deliberately excused their procrastination by affirming that the fitting time had not yet come (Hagg. i.

2). Chastisement was sent to arouse their consciences, and the warnings and exhortations of Haggai and Zechariah were given to recall them to a sense of their duty.

No doubt the accession of Darius offered a favourable opportunity for recommencing the work; and when, in the second year of his reign, Haggai began his ministry, a change of policy at the Persian court might well be hoped for. Nor was the hope disappointed. The work soon attracted the attention of Tattenai, the satrap of the trans-Euphratensian province, and Shethar-bozenai, the governor of Samaria. They came to Jerusalem, and challenged the Jews to produce their authority. They pleaded the edict of Cyrus, and the governors wrote to Darius, without, however (so it was providentially ordered), stopping the work in the meantime (Ezra v. 3 sq.). The edict of Cyrus was found among the archives at Ecbatana, and Darius sent orders to Tattenai and Shethar-bozenai not only to permit the work to continue, but to provide for the expenses out of the royal revenues, and to furnish materials for sacrifice (Ezra vi. 1 sq.). The work prospered, and the Temple was completed and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius (B.C. 516).

4. Such were the circumstances under which Haggai's ministry was exercised, and the results to which it led. His Book contains five addresses, delivered within a period of less than four months.

(1.) i. 1-11. The Prophet's first address was delivered on the first day of the sixth month (Elul=Aug.-Sept.), when the people would be collected for the Festival of the New Moon. In it he censures them for their selfish negligence in letting the Temple lie desolate, while they built luxurious houses for themselves. The drought and scarcity which they were suffering were the chastisement of their neglect. He exhorts them at once to repair their error and begin the work.

(2.) i. 12-15. The next section of the Book records the immediate effect of his words. On the twenty-fourth day of the same month the work was begun. The Prophet was expressly commissioned to deliver a brief but emphatic message of encouragement, conveying the assurance of God's approval and assistance. "I am with you, saith the LORD."

(3.) ii. 1-9. The Messianic Hope of the New Temple. The enthusiasm of the people seems to have flagged, and, as at the laying of the foundation-stone (Ezra iii. 12, 13), some depreciated the new Temple by comparing its insignificance with the glory of the Temple they had known. On the twenty-first day of the seventh month (Tisri), the seventh day of the Feast of Tabernacles, Haggai re-animated their spirits by a renewed assurance that God's Presence was with them, and by the prediction that through the accession and offerings of all nations the latter glory of the house would be greater than the former glory.

(4.) ii. 10-19. For two months Haggai was silent, and in this interval Zechariah began his ministry (Zech. i. 1); but on the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month he again addressed the people. He explains the cause of their disasters, and once more promises their removal. According to the ceremonial law, those who carried holy things could not communicate holiness, while those who were unclean communicated defilement. So the neglect to rebuild the Temple defiled the people and the land, nor could their offerings avail to counteract the pollution. Hence their disasters; but from this day forward they should be blessed.

(5.) ii. 20-23. The fifth and last prophecy, delivered on the same day as the preceding one, is addressed to Zerubbabel, as the ruler of the people and the representative of the house of David. It assures him that in the midst of the convulsions impending among the surrounding nations he will be preserved, and honoured with singular distinction as the chosen of Jehovah.

5. The style of Haggai is tame and prosaic; it lacks the grace and poetry of the earlier Prophets. It is no disrespect to say that he was not a brilliant literary genius. But he gave plain warnings and plain commands in strong, simple, and straightforward words. Emphatically he reiterates his message of warning, "Consider your ways," "consider" (i. 5, 7; ii. 15, 18); or of exhortation, "Be strong," separately addressed to prince and priest and people (ii. 4). The frequent questions give force and earnestness to his exhortations (i. 4, 9; ii. 3, 12, 13, 19); and touches of vivid description are not wanting (i. 6, 9; ii. 16). But his work is to be measured by the success of his mission, and not by the literary merits of his Book. Indeed, it is extremely probable that (as in the case of some other Prophets) no more than mere outlines and summaries were committed to writing, preserving only the pith and point of the discourses actually delivered.

The decay of the Hebrew language after the Return is marked by departures from the older usages and by awkwardnesses of expression (i. 6; ii. 6, 16, 17).

6. The importance of Haggai's work is sometimes in danger of being overlooked. It was a critical moment in the history of Israel. The scanty "remnant of the people" (i. 14) which had returned, disappointed perhaps at the non-fulfilment of the glowing prophecies of a glorious restoration, discouraged by weakness within and opposition without, were in imminent danger of coming to believe that the restoration of the Temple might safely be neglected. Yet the Temple was for the time the indispensable condition of the fulfilment of their national calling. Existence as an independent nation was no longer possible for them. Their religion must be for the future, as it should have been in the past, the bond of national union. The Temple was the sign, nay, the outward condition, of Jehovah's Presence in their midst. It was the visible symbol of the unity of their religion, the centre round which all the loose elements of the nation might rally. Haggai, seconded by his colleague, Zechariah, roused his countrymen to a sense of their duty, and saved the Jewish Church in a crisis of peril.

But his view was not limited to the present. (1.) In a truly "Messianic" prophecy* (ii. 7) he was inspired to foresee the true glory of the Temple in the accession of the nations, repeating the prophecies of Is. lx., lxi. The convulsions of nature and of the nations would but promote its glory, and in the midst of them all the Divine gift of peace would be found there.

(2.) The promise to Zerubbabel, made to him not as an individual, but as the worthy representative of the family of David, is also a Messianic prophecy. He was Jehovah's chosen servant, the type as well as the ancestor of Him in Whom the prophecies were to be fulfilled, and as such he receives a typical honour. In the destruction of the kingdoms of the world, he (and by implication his family and the nation which he represented) were to be preserved safely. He was to be made Jehovah's signet, not only a most prized possession in closest association with Him, but the sign and attestation of His words and acts (see Orelli, O. T. Prophecy, p. 424 sq.).

7. Other writings of Haggai.—It has been argued with much probability that a narrative written by Haggai is embodied in Ezra iii. 2-iv. 5, iv. 24-vi. 22 [EZRA].

The names of Haggai and Zechariah appear in the LXX. in the titles of Pss. cxxxvii. (cxxxviii.) (not in Cod. Sin.), cxlv.—cxlviii. (cxlvi.—cxlviii.); in the Vulgate in Pss. cxi., cxlv., cxlvi. (cxlvi.—cxlvii.). The unrevised Old Latin in Ps. lxi. (lxv.) curiously joins Jeremiah and Haggai; cp. the Peshitto Syriac in cxxv., cxxvi. (cxxvi., cxxvii.), cxlv.—cxlviii. (cxlvi.—cxlviii.). These titles cannot denote authorship, but may preserve a tradition that Haggai and Zechariah adopted these Psalms for use in the service of the Temple. There is a curious and obscure passage in Pseudo-Epiphanius, de Vitis Prophetarum, to the effect that "Haggai was the first to sing Alleluia there (at Jerusalem), . . . and Amen . . . Wherefore we say Alleluia, which is the hymn of Haggai and Zechariah."

8. There is a reference to Hagg. ii. 23 in Eccles. xlix. 11, and Hagg. ii. 6 is quoted in Heb. xii. 26.

9. Literature.—Beside the commentaries on the Minor Prophets in general may be mentioned among more recent works Köhler's very thorough Nachexilische Propheten, 1860; Reinke, Der Prophet Haggai, 1868; T. T. Perowne in Camb. Bible for Schools and Colleges, 1886. A full list of older works will be found in Rosenmüller: with continuation in Reinke, p. 37 sq. [A. F. K.]

HAG-GERI, R. V. HAGRI (חַגְרִי, i. e. a Hagarite; B. ʿAyapel, A. ʿArapai; Agarai). "MIBHAR, son of Haggeri," was one of the mighty men of David's guard, according to the catalogue of 1 Ch. xi. 38. The parallel passage—2 Sam. xxiii. 36—has "Bani the Gadite" (גַּדִּיתִּי). This Kennicott decides to have been the original, from which Haggeri has been corrupted (Dissert. p. 214. Cp. Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. in loco). The Targum has Bar Gedā (בַּר גְּדָא).

HAG'GI (חַגִּי) = festive: A. ʿAγγεις; in Numb., B. ʿAγγει, A. ʿAγγι: Haggi, Aggi), second son of Gad (Gen. xli. 16; Num. xxvii. 15), founder of the Haggites (חַגִּיִּתִּי). It will be observed that the name, though given as that of an individual, is really a patronymic, precisely the same as that of the family.

* It is hardly necessary to say that the reference of this passage to the personal Messiah, to which the Vulgate rendering, "veniet desideratus cunctis gentibus," has given wide currency, must be abandoned.

HAGGIAH (חַגִּיָּא; A. Ἀγγία, B. Ἀγία; Haggia), a Levite, one of the descendants of Merari (1 Ch. vi. 30).

HAGGITES, THE (חַגִּיָּתַי; B. ὁ Ἀγγεῖ, AF. -ί; Agitæ), the family sprung from Haggi, second son of Gad (Num. xxvi. 15; LXX. v. 22).

HAGGITH (חַגִּיָּתַי, ? = a dancer: Ἀγγίθ; A. Φεγγίθ, Ἀγίθ; B. Φεγγεῖθ, Ἀγγεῖθ; Joseph. Ἀγγίθη; Aggith, Haggith), one of David's wives, of whom nothing is told us except that she was the mother of Adonijah, who is commonly designated as "the son of Haggith" (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 K. i. 5, 11, ii. 13; 1 Ch. iii. 2). He was, like Absalom, renowned for his handsome presence. In the first and last of the above passages Haggith is fourth in order of mention among the wives, Adonijah being also fourth among the sons. His birth happened at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 2, 5) shortly after that of Absalom (1 K. i. 6; where it will be observed that the words [in A. V.] his mother are inserted by the translators). [G.] [W.]

HAGIA (Ἀγία; Aggia), 1 Esd. v. 34. [HATTIL.]

HAI, R. V. ΑΙ (ἄνθ = the heap of stones; Ἀγγαί; Hai). The form in which the well-known place AI appears in the A. V. on its first introduction (Gen. xii. 8, xiii. 3). It arises from the translators having in these places, and these only, recognised the definite article with which AI is invariably and emphatically accompanied in the Hebrew; or it may have come from the Vulgate, if Jer. xlix. 3 be not an exception (see the Comm.). In the Samaritan Version of the above two passages, the name is given in the first Amah, and in the second Cephrah, as if CEPHIRAH. [G.] [W.]

HAIR. The Hebrews were fully alive to the importance of the hair as an element of personal beauty, whether as seen in the "curled (R. V. "bushy") locks, black as a raven," of youth (Cant. v. 11), or in the "crown of glory" that encircled the head of old age (Prov. xvi. 31). The customs of ancient nations in regard to the hair varied considerably: the Egyptians allowed the women to wear it long, but kept the heads of men closely shaved from early childhood (Her. ii. 36, iii. 12; Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, see Index [1878]). The Greeks admired long hair, whether in men or women, as is evidenced in the expression καρηκομῶντες Ἀχαιοί, and in the representations of their divinities, especially Bacchus and Apollo, whose long locks were a symbol of perpetual youth. The Assyrians also wore it long (Herod. i. 195), the flowing curls being gathered together in a heavy cluster on the back, as represented in the sculptures of Nineveh. The Hebrews on the other hand, while they encouraged the growth of hair, observed the natural distinction between the sexes by allowing the women to wear it long (Luke vii. 38; John xi. 2; 1 Cor. xi. 6 sq.), while the men restrained theirs by frequent clippings to a moderate length. This difference between the Hebrews and the surrounding nations, especially the Egyptians, arose no doubt partly from natural taste, but partly also from legal enactments: clipping the hair in a certain manner and offering the locks was, according to the oldest Semitic usage, connected with religious worship. To sacrifice the hair of childhood, both in Arabia and Syria, was the preliminary to admission to the religious and social status of manhood (Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, i. 312). The Arabians practised a peculiar tonsure in honour of their god Orotal (Her. iii. 8, κείρονται περιτρόχαλα, περιφυρούντες τοὺς κροτάφους; see Robertson Smith, i. 307), and hence the Hebrews were forbidden to "round the corners (זָנָבִים, lit. the extremity) of their heads" (Lev. xix. 27), meaning the locks along the forehead and temples, and behind the ears. This tonsure is described in the LXX. by a peculiar expression, σισθή (= the classical σκάφισον), possibly derived from the Hebrew טִיִּצְצָ (cp. Bochart, Can. i. 6, p. 379. Fried. Delitzsch compares the Assyrian šisu; see Baer's ed. of Ezekiel, p. xv. sq.). That the practice of the Arabians was well known to the Hebrews, appears from the expression זָנָבִים טִיִּצְצָ, "that have the corners of their hair polled" (R. V.), by which they are described (Jer. ix. 26, xxv. 23, xlix. 32; see marginal translation of the A. V.). The prohibition against cutting off the hair on the death of a relative (Deut. xiv. 1) was probably grounded on a similar reason. In addition to these regulations, the Hebrews dreaded baldness, as it was frequently the result of leprosy (Lev. xiii. 40 sq.), and hence formed one of the disqualifications for the priesthood (Lev. xxi. 20, LXX.). [BALDNESS.] The rule imposed upon the priests, and probably followed by the rest of the community, was that the hair should be polled (מִצְצָ, Ezek. xlv. 20), neither being shaved nor allowed to grow too long (Lev. xxi. 5; Ezek. l. c.). What was the precise length usually worn, we have no means of ascertaining; but from various expressions—such as שָׁרֵף לְרֵגְלֵי, lit. to let loose the head or the hair (= solvere crines, Virg. Aen. iii. 65, xi. 35; demissos iugentis more capillos, Ov. Ep. x. 137) by unbinding the head-band and letting it go dishevelled (Lev. x. 6, R. V. "let not the hair of your heads go loose"), which was done in mourning (cp. Ezek. xxiv. 17); and again מִצְצָ לְרֵגְלֵי, to uncover the ear, previous to making any communication of importance (1 Sam. xx. 2, 12, xxii. 8, A. V. and R. V., margin), as though the hair fell over the ear—we may conclude that men wore their hair somewhat longer than is usual with us. The word שָׂרֵף, used as = hair (Num. vi. 5; Ezek. xlv. 20), is especially indicative of its free growth (cp. Knobel-Dillmann, Comm. in Lev. xxi. 10). Long hair was admired in the case of young men; it is especially noticed in the description of Absalom's person (2 Sam. xiv. 26), the inconceivable weight of whose hair, as given in the text (200 shekels; Lucian [LXX.], 100), has led to a variety of explanations (cp. Harmer's Observations, iv. 321); Josephus (Ant. vii. 8, § 5) adds, that it was cut every eighth day. The hair was also worn long by the body-guard of Solomon, according to the same authority (Ant. viii. 7, § 3, μηκίστας καθεμέντοι χείρας). The care requisite to keep the hair in order in such cases must have been very great, and hence the practice of wearing long hair was unusual, and only resorted to as an act of religious observance, in which case it was a "sign of humiliation and self-denial, and of a certain religious slovenliness" (Lightfoot, Exercit. on 1 Cor. xi. 14), and was practised by the Nazarites (Num. vi. 5; Judg. xiii. 5, xvi. 17; 1 Sam. i. 11), and occasionally by others in token of special mercies (Acts xviii. 18); it was not unusual among the Egyptians when on a journey (Diod. i. 18). [NAZARITE.] In times of affliction the hair was altogether cut off (Is. iii. 17, 24, xv. 2, xxii. 12; Jer. vii. 29, xlviii. 37; Amos viii. 10; Joseph. B. J. ii. 15, § 1), the practice of the Hebrews being in this respect the reverse of that of the Egyptians, who let their hair grow long in time of mourning (Herod. ii. 36), shaving their heads when the term was over (Gen. xli. 14); but resembling that of the Greeks, as frequently noticed by classical writers (e.g. Soph. Aj. 1174; Eurip. Electr. 143, 241). Tearing the hair (Ezra ix. 3) and letting it go dishevelled, as already noticed, were similar tokens of grief. [MOURNING.] The practice of the modern Arabs in regard to the length of their hair varies; generally the men allow it to grow its natural length, the tresses hanging down to the breast and sometimes to the head and neck against the violence of the sun's rays (Burckhardt's Notes, i. 49; Wellsted's Travels, i. 33, 53, 73). The modern Egyptians retain the practices of their ancestors, shaving the heads of the men, but suffering the women's hair to grow long (Lane's Modern Egypt, i. 52, 71). Wigs were commonly used by the latter people (Wilkinson, ii. 324, &c. [1878]), but not by the Hebrews: Josephus (Vit. § 11) notices an instance of false hair (περιβερὴ κόμη) being used for the purpose of disguise. Whether the ample ringlets of the Assyrian monarchs, as represented in the sculptures of Nineveh, were real or artificial, is doubtful (Layard's Nineveh, ii. 328). Among the Medes the wig was worn by the upper classes (Xen. Cyrop. i. 3, § 2).

The usual and favourite colour of the hair was black (Cant. v. 11), as is indicated in the comparisons to a "flock of goats" and the "tents of Kedar" (Cant. iv. 1, i. 5): a similar hue is probably intended by the purple of Cant. vii. 5, the term being broadly used (as the Greek πορφύρεος in a similar application = μέλας, Anacr. 28). A fictitious hue was occasionally obtained by sprinkling gold-dust on the hair (Joseph. Ant. viii. 7, § 3). It does not appear that dyes were ordinarily used; the "Carmel" of Cant. vii. 5 (R. V.) has been understood as = כַּרְמֵלִים (A. V. margin, crimson), but without good reason. Herod is said to have dyed his grey hair for the purpose of concealing his age (Ant. xvi. 8, § 1), but the practice may have been borrowed from the Greeks or Romans, among whom it was common (Aristoph.

Eccles. 736; Martial, Ep. iii. 43; Propert. ii. 18, 24, 26): from Matt. v. 36, we may infer that it was not usual among the Hebrews. The approach of age was marked by a sprinkling (כָּרַךְ, Hos. vii. 9; cp. a similar use of spargere, Propert. iii. 4, 24) of grey hairs, which soon overspread the whole head (Gen. xlii. 38, xlv. 29; 1 K. ii. 6, 9; Prov. xvi. 31, xx. 29). The reference to the almond in Eccles. xii. 5 is explained of the blossoms of that tree, as emblematic of old age: these blossoms turn to a snowy white before they fall from the tree (Wright, Ecclesiastes, p. 259). Pure white hair was deemed characteristic of the Divine Majesty (Dan. vii. 9; Rev. i. 14).

The chief beauty of the hair consisted in curls, whether of a natural or artificial character. The Hebrew terms are highly expressive: to omit the word לִשְׁמָר,—rendered "locks" in Cant. iv. 1, 3, vi. 7, and Is. xlvii. 2, but more probably meaning a veil (R. V.),—we have לִשְׁמָרִים (Cant. v. 11), properly pendulous flexible boughs (according to the LXX., ἀράρα, the shoots of the palm-tree), which supplied an image of the coma pendula; לִשְׁמָרִים (Ezek. viii. 3), a similar image borrowed from the curve of a blossom; לִשְׁמָרִים (Cant. iv. 9), a lock falling over the shoulders like a chain of ear-pendant (in uno crine colli tui, Vulg., which is better than the A. V. and R. V., "with one chain of thy neck"); לִשְׁמָרִים (Cant. vii. 5, A. V. "galleries," R. V. "tresses"), properly the channels by which water was brought to the flocks, which supplied an image either of the comæ fluens, or of the regularity in which the locks were arranged;

לִשְׁמָרִים (Cant. vii. 5), again an expression for coma pendula, borrowed from the threads hanging down from an unfinished woof; and lastly לִשְׁמָרִים מְסֻּבִּים (Is. iii. 24, A. V. and R. V. "well set hair"), properly plaited work, i.e. gracefully curved locks (see Delitzsch⁴ and Dillmann⁴ in loco). With regard to the mode of dressing the hair, we have no very precise information; the terms used are of a general character, as of Jezebel (2 K. ix. 30), לִשְׁמָרִים, i.e. she adorned her head; of Judith (x. 3), διέταξε, i.e. arranged (the E. V. has "braided," and the Vulg. discriminavit, here used in a technical sense in the reference to the discriminale or hair-pin); of Herod (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9, § 4), κεκοσμημένος τῇ συνθέσει τῆς κόμης; and of those who adopted feminine fashions (B. J. iv. 9, § 10), κόμας συνθετιζόμενοι. The terms used in the N. T. (πλέγμασιν, 1 Tim. ii. 9; ἐμπλοκῆς τριχῶν, 1 Pet. iii. 3) are also of a general character; Schleusner (Lex. s. v.) understands them of curling rather than plaiting. The arrangement of Samson's hair into seven locks, or more properly braids (תְּשׁוּבָה, from שָׁבַח, to interchange; σειπαι, LXX.; Judg. xvi. 13, 19), involves the practice of plaiting, which was also familiar to the Egyptians (Wilkinson, ii. 335 [1878]) and Greeks (Hom. Il. xiv. 176). The locks were probably kept in their place by a fillet as in Egypt (Wilkinson, l. c.).

Ornaments were worked into the hair, as practised by the modern Egyptians, who "aid to each braid three black silk cords with little ornaments of gold" (Lane, i. 71): the LXX. understands the term שֵׁנִים (Is. iii. 18, A. V. and R. V. "cauls"; R. V. marg. networks) as applying to such ornaments (ἀμπλόκια);

Egyptian Wigs. (Wilkinson.)

Schroeder (de Vest. Mul. Heb. cap. 2) approves of this, and conjectures that they were sun-shaped, i.e. circular, as distinct from the "round tires like the moon," i.e. the crescent-shaped ornaments used for necklaces; but the true meaning can hardly be said to be settled (see Delitzsch⁴ and Dillmann⁵). The Arabian women attach small bells to the tresses of their hair (Niebuhr, Voyage, i. 133). Other terms, sometimes understood as applying to the hair, are of doubtful signification (consult on each Delitzsch⁴ and Dillmann⁵), e.g. חֲרִיטִים (Is. iii. 22; acus; "crisping-pins"), more probably purses (R. V. "satchels"), as in 2 K. v. 23 ("bags"); קִשְׁרִים (Is. iii. 20, "head-bands"; R. V. "sashes"), bridal girdles, according to Schroeder and other authorities; פְּאָרִים (Is. iii. 20, discriminativa, Vulg., i.e. pins used for keeping the hair parted; cp. Jerome in Rufin. iii. cap. ult.), more probably turbans (R. V. "head-tires"). Combs and hair-pins are mentioned in the Talmud; the Egyptian combs were made of wood and double, one side having large and the other small teeth (Wilkinson, ii. 343 [1878]); from the ornamental devices worked on them we may infer that they were worn in the hair. With regard to other ornaments worn about the head, see HEAD-DRESS. The Hebrews, like other nations of antiquity, anointed the hair profusely with ointments, which were generally compounded of various aromatic ingredients (Ruth iii. 3; 2 Sam. xiv. 2; Ps. xxiii. 5, xlv. 7, xcii. 10; Eccles. ix. 8; Is. iii. 24); more especially on occasion of festivities or hospitality (Matt. vi. 17, xxvi. 7; Luke vii. 46; cp. Joseph. Ant. xix. 4, § 1, χρισάμενος μύροις τὴν κεφαλὴν, ὡς ἀπὸ συνουσίας). It is perhaps in reference to the glossy appearance so imparted to it that the hair is described as purple (Cant. vii. 5).

It appears to have been the custom of the Jews in our Saviour's time to swear by the hair (Matt. v. 36), much as the Egyptian women still swear by the side-lock, and the men by their beards (Lane, i. 52, 71, notes).

Hair was employed by the Hebrews as an image of what was least valuable in man's person (1 Sam. xiv. 45; 2 Sam. xiv. 11; 1 K. i. 52; Matt. x. 30; Luke xii. 7, xxi. 18; Acts xxvii. 34), as well as of what was innumerable (Ps. xl. 12, lxix. 4), or particularly fine (Judg. xx. 16). In Is. vii. 20, some writers consider the hair to represent the various productions of the field, trees, crops, &c.; like ὄρος κεκομημένον δλη of Callim. Dian. 41, or the humus comans of Stat. Theb. v. 502; but this interpretation is not in favour with Delitzsch⁴ or Dillmann⁵. Hair, "as the hair of women" (Rev. ix. 8), is taken by some to mean long and undressed hair, which in later times was regarded as an image of barbaric rudeness (Hengstenberg, Comm. in loco) [W. L. B.] [F.]

HA-KA'TAN (חֲקָטָן = the young or the small; B. Ἀκατάν, A. Ἀκκατάν; Eccetan). Johanan, son of Hakkatan, was the chief of the Bene-Azgad who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 12). The name is probably Katan, with the definite article prefixed. In the Apocryphal Esdras it is ACATAN.

HA-KOZ (חֲקֹז; B. ὁ Κῶς, A. Ἀκκῶς; Accos), a priest, the chief of the seventh course in the service of the sanctuary, as appointed by David (1 Ch. xxiv. 10). In Ezra ii. 61 (B. Ἀκούς, A. Ἀκκῶς) the name occurs again as that of a family of priests; though here the prefix is taken by our translators—and no doubt correctly—as the definite article, and the name appears as KOZ. The same thing also occurs in Neh. iii. 4 (B. Ἀκῶς, A. Ἀκκῶς), 21 (B. Ἀκῶβ, A. Ἀκκῶς). In Esdras, ACCOZ.

HAKU'PHA (חֲכֻפָּה, ? = bent; B. Ἀφεικά, A. Ἀκουφά [Ezra]; B. Ἀχειφά, N. Ἀκειφά, A. Ἀχιφά [Neh.]; Hacupha). Bene-Chakupha were among the families of Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53). In Esdras (v. 31) the name is given as ACIPHA.

HA'LAH (חֲלָה; Ἀλαί, Χαλδή; Halā), which has nothing to do with the Calah of Gen. x. 11 [CALAH], is referred to as one of the places where Shalmaneser or Sargon settled the Israelites from Samaria (2 K. xvii. 6; xviii. 11; cp. also 1 Ch. v. 26). Being mentioned with Habor, on the river of Gozan, it has been identified with the Chalcitis (Χαλκίτις) of Ptolemy (v. 18), placed by him between Anthemusia (cp. Strabo, xxvi. 1, § 27) and Gauzanitis [see GOZAN]. The Calachene mentioned by Strabo, upon the east side of the Tigris near Adiabene and the borders of Armenia, are regarded as lying too far north-eastwards; but it is worthy of notice that an Assyrian geographical list mentions, between Arbaḥa (Arrapachitis) and Raṣappa (Reseph), a city called Halahhu (=Halāhu), a name which corresponds perfectly with the Hebrew Halah, and may, therefore, be identified with it. Its exact position can hardly be determined. [T. G. P.]

HA'LAK, THE MOUNT (with the article, הַר הַלָּק = the smooth or bare mountain: in Josh. xi. B. 'Αγέλα, A. 'Αλάκ, F. 'Αλαάκ; in xii. B. Χελχά, A. 'Αλάκ, F. 'Αλάκ: pars montis), a mountain twice, and twice only, named as the southern limit of Joshua's conquests—"the Mount Halak which goeth up to Seir" (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7), but which has not yet been identified. It is apparently the mountain range on the east side of the 'Arabah, or one of the bare mountain summits in that range. The word which is at the root of the name (supposing it to be Hebrew), and which has the force of smoothness or baldness, has ramified into other terms, as Helkah, an even plot of ground, like those of Jacob (Gen. xxxiii. 19) or Naboth (2 K. ix. 25); cp. also Helkath has-gurim, the "field of the strong" (Stanley, S. & P., App. § 20). [G.] [W.]

HAL'HUL (הַלְחֻל; B. 'Αλουά, A. 'Αλοά; Halhu), a town of Judah in the mountain district, one of the group containing Bethzur and Gedor (Josh. xv. 58). Jerome, in the Onomasticon (under Elul, OS² p. 152, 7), reports the existence of a hamlet (villula) named "Alula," near Hebron.* The name still remains unaltered, attached to a large village, Hulhul, on a conspicuous hill a mile to the left of the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, nearly 4 miles from the latter. Opposite it, on the other side of the road, is Beit Sūr, the modern representative of Bethzur, and further to the north is Jedūr, the ancient Gedor. The site is marked by numerous rock-hewn tombs and by the ruins of walls and foundations, among which stands a dilapidated mosque bearing the name of Nebī Yūnis—the prophet Jonah (Rob. i. 216; P.E.F. Mem. iii. 329; Guérin, Judée, iii. 284 sq.). In a Jewish tradition quoted by Hottinger (Cippi Hebraici, p. 32) it is said to be the burial-place of Gad, David's seer. See the citations of Zunz in Asher's Benj. of Tudela (ii. 437, n.). [G.] [W.]

HALI (חַלִּי = nachlace; B. 'Αλέφ, A. (?) 'Οολεί; Chali), a town on the boundary of Asher, named between Helkath and Beten (Josh. xix. 25). Nothing is known of its situation. Schwarz (p. 191) compares the name with Chelmon, the equivalent in the Latin, of CYAMON in the Greek of Judith vii. 3. Guérin (Galilée, ii. 62) proposes to identify it with Kh. 'Alia, about 13 miles S.E. of Acre. [G.] [W.]

HALICARNASSUS ('Αλικαρνασος) in CARIA, a city of great renown, as being the birthplace of Herodotus and of the later historian Dionysius, and as embellished by the Mausoleum erected by Artemisia, but of no Biblical interest except as the residence of a Jewish population in the periods between the Old and New Testament histories. In 1 Macc.

xv. 23, this city is specified as containing such a population. The decree in Joseph. Ant. xiv. 10, § 23, where the Romans direct that the Jews of Halicarnassus shall be allowed τὰς προσευχὰς ποιεῖσθαι πρὸς τῇ θαλάσῳ κατὰ τὸ πάτριον ἔθος, is interesting when compared with Acts xvi. 13. This city was celebrated for its harbour and for the strength of its fortifications; but it never recovered the damage which it suffered after Alexander's siege in B.C. 334. A plan of the site is given in Ross, Reisen auf den Griech. Inseln (iv. 30). Many of the sculptures of the Mausoleum are now in the British Museum, and are fully described by Sir C. Newton in Discoveries at Halicarnassus. The modern name of the place is Budrüm. [J. S. H.] [W.]

HALL (ἀλή; atrium), used of the court of the high-priest's house (Luke xxii. 55). Ἀλή is in A. V. Matt. xxvi. 69, Mark xv. 66, John xviii. 15, "palace;" Vulg. atrium;—προαύλιον, Mark xv. 68, "porch;" Vulg. ante atrium. In Matt. xxvii. 27, and Mark xv. 16, ἀλή is syn. with πρατώριον, which in John xviii. 28 is in A. V. "judgment-hall." Ἀλή is the equivalent for Ἰσπῆ, an enclosed or fortified space (Ges. p. 512), in many places in O. T., where Vulg. and A. V. have respectively villa or viciulus, "village," or atrium, "court," chiefly of the Tabernacle or Temple. The hall or court of a house or palace would probably be an enclosed but uncovered space, impluvium, on a lower level than the apartments of the lowest floor which looked into it. The προαύλιον was the vestibule leading to it, called also Matt. xxvii. 71, πυλῶν. [HOUSE.] [H. W. P.]

HALLO'HESH (חַלְלוֹהֶשֶׁת = the whisperer or exorcist; B. 'Αλωῆς, A. 'Αδῶ; Alohes), one of the "chief of the people" who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 24). The name is Lochesh, with the definite article prefixed. That it is the name of a family, and not of an individual, appears probable from another passage in which it is given in the A. V. as

HALO'HESH (חַלְלוֹהֶשֶׁת; B. 'Ηλειά, A. 'Αλωῆς; Alohes). Shallum, son of Hal-lochesh, was "ruler of the half part of Jerusalem" at the time of the repair of the wall by Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 12). According to the Hebrew spelling the name is identical with HALLOHESH (so R. V. here). [W. A. W.] [F.]

HAM (חַם; Cham; Cham). 1. The name of one of the three sons of Noah, always holding the middle place, when they are mentioned together and in the list of their descendants in Gen. x., where Japheth instead of Shem has the first place. It is probably derived from חַם, "to be warm," and may mean "swarthy" or "sunburnt."

The name of Ham alone of the three brothers appears in that of a country, Egypt being called the land of Ham (Ps. cv. 23, cvi. 22; cp. "tents of Ham," lxxviii. 51). These are poetical passages, and scarcely warrant our connecting the name Ham with the common Egyptian name of Egypt, Kemi, the "black" land. A more plausible comparison is with the Egyptian word Khem, the name of the god of generation, according to most Egyptologists, which however Mr. Renouf reads Ames. This divinity was regarded as the parent of the Negroes, the Nehes-u, the race-name for the blacks, and as having come from Punt, the Egyptian terrestrial Paradise, Arabia Felix and the opposite coast of Ethiopia (Lefébure, Le Cham et l'Adam égyptiens: TSBA. ix. 167 sq.). It must, however, be proved that Khem is the usual name of this divinity before the comparison can be accepted.

The list of Ham's descendants in Gen. x. is peculiar in consisting of names of persons or tribes not in ethnic form, in ethnic names in the singular and plural, and for its historical incidents. The order is first Cush, giving a list of tribes occupying a zone from Babylonia to Ethiopia above Egypt. [CUSH.] The next in the list of sons is Mizraim, a name in dual form, like Ephraim, but apparently not a personal name, the singular Mazor occurring. The name is commonly applied to Egypt, and the dual form held probably to indicate the twofold division of the country into the valley of Upper Egypt and the plain of Lower Egypt, or the Delta. The names of the Mizraite tribes which follow are all in the plural, and therefore we may here point מִצְרַיִם in the pl. instead of following the Masoretes in the dual pointing. Brugsch has discovered in hieroglyphics the transcription, letter for letter, of Mizraim in Mazrima, the brother of the Hittite king Khetasar, contemporary with Ramses II. (Geogr. Inschrift. ii. p. 25, No. 77, pl. xviii.). This Hebrew name, if it be so, in the midst of Hittite names of another stock of language, would be most noteworthy, and would point to the use of Hebrew in Egypt then prevalent, supposing that the name was there given to the Hittite prince. It is obvious that if this be an instance of the use of the dual form Mizraim as a singular proper name, it would modify what has been just said on the subject. The names of the tribes are very hard to identify. It is clear that their extension is along the North African coast, and that of Phoenicia, and possibly the Island of Crete. The first tribe, the Ludim, have the same name as the Ludim mentioned in Gen. x. under the name of their eponym, Lud the son of Shem (v. 22). According to the principle suggested in art. CUSH, that the occurrence of the same names in different genealogies indicates the settlement of the same tracts by different races,—a principle which seems to be proved in the case of the settlements in Arabia in the art. referred to,—the Hamite and Shemite Ludim would point to a double occupation of some country by the dark and tawny races. The Shemite Ludim have generally been identified with the Lydians, but only on account of the close similarity of name. In certain passages of the prophets Lud is mentioned with African nations as supplying mercenaries to Egypt (Jer. xlv. 9; cp. Ezek. xxx. 4, 5). No African nation can be suggested at this time, and it is most likely that the Ionian and Carian mercenaries of the Saite kings are intended. These kings were allied with the Lydian sovereigns, who could have sent them forces drawn from their Ionian and Carian neighbours and ultimately subjects. To conclude: it is possible that the original text read Lubim instead of Ludim, ל and מ being similar in the old Hebrew character.

The Anamim have not been identified. [ANAMIM.] The Lehabim have been supposed to be the Lubim or Libyans, the Rebu or Lebu of the Egyptian records, the elision of the weak guttural being common in Hebrew. If, however, the Ludim are Lubim, the Lehabim must be a different tribe. [LEHABIM.] The Naphtuhim are probably to be traced in the Coptic ⲛⲓⲫⲁⲓⲁⲧ, ⲛⲓⲫⲁⲓⲁⲗ, the name of the city of Marea and the surrounding territory. [NAPHTUHIM.] Pathrusim, the ethnic of Pathros, Pa-to-res, the south land, or Upper Egypt, is a clear identification. It may be observed that Mazor in the sing. occurs in apposition to Pathros, and that thus it would seem that Mazor and even Mizraim, dual in form but perhaps not dual in sense, may designate Lower Egypt. [PATHRUSIM; PATHROS.] Casluhim has not been identified. [CASLUHIM.] Caphtorim, the ethnic of Caphtor, may be Crete. The nation corresponds, according to the Egyptian data, to the Phoenicians. [CAPHTORIM; CAPHTOR.] The Philistines are mentioned as emigrants from the Casluhim, but their nationality seems fixed by their being apparently called Caphtorim, and stated to have come out of Caphtor [CAPHTOR; PHILISTINES]. Phut, the third in order of the sons of Ham, is in the later notices a nation connected with Egypt on the side of Africa, for which no likely identification has yet been proposed. Clearly the people were closely allied with Egypt in the time of the Assyrian and Babylonian wars, but more than this we cannot say. De Rougé indeed proposed to identify Phut with the Egyptian Punt, the name of the country and people of Arabia Felix and the opposite Ethiopian coast (Recherches sur les Monuments, &c.: Mém. de l'Institut, xxv. 2, pp. 228, 229). Cesare de Cara, the latest writer on the subject, rejects the identification on philological grounds (Gli Hyksôs, p. 170, note 2). See PHUT.

The Canaanites, unlike the rest of the Hamites, have been completely traced at least to their settlements in the land of Canaan. Recently, however, an important discovery has been made. The phrase "afterward were the families of the Canaanite spread abroad" (Gen. x. 18), intervening between the list and the statement of the limited extent of what we may call the first Canaanite settlement, is now of striking significance. Professor Sayce has restored to history the lost fact of the great Hittite dominion. From about B.C. 1400 for seven centuries the Hittites ruled or controlled Northern Syria and Asia Minor, being the most formidable rivals of the Egyptians; and thus at the same time the Egyptians, only kept in check by the Hittites on the east and the Libyans on the west, formed the central Hamite power, while the Phoenician merchants were already the carriers of the commerce of the world.

The race characters of the Hamites are probably best defined by the Egyptian representations of themselves, the Punt or Ethiopians of Arabia Felix and the opposite coast of Africa, and the Phoenicians, whom they call Kefa. They are brown, but fairer in the north, with straight hair and scanty beards. The Libyans are, in very early monuments of about B.C. 2500, of the same aspect, but in about B.C. 1400 of a different type; white, more muscular, and with fuller beards. This difference may have been due to the colonization of Northern Africa by Iberians of the south of Europe, or pre-Hellenic islanders.

The Hamitic languages mainly belong to the Ethiopian stock, discussed in the Nubische Grammatik of Lepsius. The language of the Asiatic Cushites has not been recovered. The Canaanites all spoke Hebrew in Canaan, and the Phoenician is merely a dialect of Hebrew. The Hittites out of Canaan, however, spoke another language, not yet classed, but undoubtedly not Hebrew. It may therefore be doubted whether Hebrew was not adopted by them in Palestine from an older population, the extinct races of Palestine, the Rephaim, &c.; but this is a very obscure question.

An enquiry into Hamite civilization would lead us beyond the limits of an article. If we exclude the Libyans—who, as already shown, do not seem in the time at which they play a part in history, from B.C. 1400 downwards, to have been pure Hamites—we trace in all the race a power of administration, and thus of establishing settled government; in fact the earliest states seem to have been Hamite. Love of adventure in war or commerce is marked. Of their religions we cannot yet generalize. They certainly played a great part in history, though they fell before the vigour of the sons of Shem and the intelligence of those of Japheth. [R. S. P.]

2. (חַמַּת) Gen. xiv. 5; Sam. vii. Cham.) According to the Masoretic text, Chedorlaomer and his allies smote the Zuzim in a place called Ham. If, as seems likely, the Zuzim be the same as the Zamzumim, Ham must be placed in what was afterwards the Ammonite territory. Hence it has been conjectured by Tuch and Delitzsch [1887], that Ham is but another form of the name of the chief stronghold of the children of Ammon, Rabbah, now Am-man. The LXX. and Vulg., however, throw some doubt upon the Masoretic reading: the former has, as the rendering of חַמַּת חַמַּת־חַמַּת, καὶ ἔθνη ἰσχυρὰ ἕνα αἰσίοις; and the latter, et Zuzim cum eis, which shows that they read חַמַּת: but the Mas. rendering seems the more likely, as each clause mentions a nation, and its capital or stronghold. The place cannot be identified for certain.

3. In the account of a migration of the Simeonites to the valley of Gedor, and their destroying the predecessors (see R. V.) of the pastoral inhabitants, they are said to have been "of Ham" (חַמַּת; ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν Χάμ; de stirpe Cham, 1 Ch. iv. 40). This may indicate that a Hamite tribe was settled here, or, more precisely, that there was an Egyptian settlement. Others understand by the term Canaanite nomads (see Keil and Oetli [Strack u. Zöckler's Bib. Komm.] in loco). [G.] [F.]

HAMAN (חַמָּן), meaning uncertain. Cp. MV.¹¹; 'Αμάν; Aman), the chief minister or vizier of king Ahasuerus (Esth. iii. 1). After the failure of his attempt to cut off all the Jews in the Persian empire, he was hanged on the gallows which he had erected for Mordecai. It is very improbable that he is the same Aman who is mentioned as the oppressor of Achiacharus (Tobit xiv. 10; see Speaker's Comm. in loco). The Targum and Josephus (Ant. xi. 6, § 5) interpret the description of him—the Agagite—as signifying that he was of Amalekith descent; but the opinion that he was of necessity an enemy to Israel, because called a Macedonian by the LXX. in Esth. iv. 24 (cp. iii. 1; Additions to Esther, xii. 6, xvi. 10), and therefore also hostile to Jewish interests, is not now so universally accepted as of old (see Speaker's Comm. on "Additions," &c. l. oc.). Prideaux (Connection, anno 453) computes the sum which he offered to pay into the royal treasury at more than £2,000,000 sterling. [F.]

HA'MATH (חַמַּת [fortress, citadel]; 'Hadd, 'Hadd, Aḥadd; Emath) was probably the principal city of Upper Syria from the time of the Exodus until that of the Prophet Amos. It is situated in the valley of the Orontes, having, to the north- and south-east, the district of Jebel-al-A'la, and on the west, the Nusairiyeh Mountains (the Mons Bargylus of the ancients). The Orontes, which flows through Hamath from S.E. to N.W., forms a bend in the middle of the town. To the S.W., above Tripoli, there is an opening between the Nusairiyeh Mountains and the northern point of the Lebanon chain—the "entrance of Hamath," as it is called in Scripture, and the northern border of the Promised Land (Num. xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5; Ezek. xlvii. 13-21). A similar opening, but of much greater extent, occurs between the Anti-Lebanon and the low hills which lie eastward of Hamath. The valley of the Orontes runs N.E. and S.W., the city of Homs being situated near the intersection of the arms of the cross-shaped depression or valley thus formed. Northward the pass leads to Hamath, southward towards Baal-Gad in Coele-Syria, eastward to the great plain of the Syrian Desert, and westward to Kat-al-Hosn and the Mediterranean. The whole of the tract around the city seems to have formed the kingdom of Hamath during the time of its independence, extending to the south of, and including, Riblah.

The Hamathites, like the Hittites, were a Hamitic race, and are included among the descendants of Canaan (Gen. x. 18). Though not in any way Semites, they possibly intermarried with the Semitic nations around. Being closely akin to the Hittites, whose neighbours they were, they were naturally often in alliance with them. The earliest notices of the city (Num. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5, &c.) show that it was a well-known place, but no mention of its power occurs until the time of David (2 Sam. viii. 10), when we learn that Toi, king of Hamath, with whom Hadadazer, king of Zobah, had "had wars," sent his son to David to congratulate him upon his victory over that king—an act of homage not without political significance. Hamath seems afterwards to have come under the dominion of Solomon (cp. 1 K. iv. 21-24 with 2 Ch. viii. 4), and its king was, no doubt, one of the many princes over whom that monarch ruled, who "brought presents and served Solomon all the days of his life." The "store-cities" which Solomon built in Hamath (2 Ch. viii. 4) were, perhaps, staples for trade, the importance of the Orontes valley as a line of traffic being always great. On the death of Solomon, and the division of his kingdom, Hamath seems to have regained her independence. In the Assyrian inscriptions of the time of Shalmaneser II. (about 860 B.C.) it appears as an independent power, under its own king Irhuleni, in alliance with the Hittites, Damascus (under Addu-idri), Ahab of Israel, and several other states. About the year 810 B.C. Jeroboam the second "recovered Hamath" (2 K. xiv. 28). He seems to have dismantled the place, and on this account the prophet Amos (i. 1) couples "Hamath the great" with Gath, as an instance of desolation (Amos vi. 2). Tiglath-pileser, about 730 B.C., took tribute, among others, from Eni-llu (עֲנִילּוּ), king of Hamath; and Sargon boasts of having "rooted out (?) the land of Hamath, and dyed the skin of the foolish (?) Ilu-bi'di (variant Yau-bi'di) like wool." Judging from the words of Sennacherib's Rabshakeh or "chief of the captains" (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13, &c.), that king seems also to have captured the place, but this may be simply a reference to the exploits of Sargon. From this time, however, it seems to have ceased to be a place of much importance. Antiochus Epiphanes changed its name to Epiphanea, under which it was known to the Greeks and Romans from his time to that of St. Jerome (Comment. in Ezek. xlvii. 16), and possibly later. The natives, however, still called it Hamath; and its present name, Hamāh, is but very slightly altered from the ancient form. In 639 A.D. the city surrendered without resistance to the Moslems. Abulfedā, the eminent Arab scholar, a descendant of the family of Saladin, was appointed governor of the district in 1310, and with his death in 1331 Hamah's prosperity declined.

Burckhardt visited Hamah in 1812. He describes it as situated on both sides of the Orontes, partly on a slope of a hill, partly on the plain, and as divided into four quarters,—Hadher, El Djisr, El Aleyat, and El Medine, the last being the quarter of the Christians. The city contained 4,446 houses, and the number of male inhabitants was nearly 11,000. The place has but few attractions. A number of catacombs are said to exist on the right bank, at some height above the river, and Burckhardt mentions the so-called "Hamah-stones" (now regarded as "Hittite") which have since attracted the attention of scholars, but resisted all attempts at decipherment. These stones are of black, close-grained basalt, and contain five inscriptions, one evidently imperfect. The town is dirty, the streets badly paved, and most of the houses are built of mud. It is remarkable for its water-wheels, some of which are of huge dimensions, and are used for raising the water of the Orontes to supply the houses and gardens in the upper part of the town. Though the town is unhealthy, the neighbourhood is very fruitful, and the commerce of the place is still of some importance (Burckhardt, Travels in Syria, pp. 146, 147; Pococke, Travels in the East, vol. i.; Irby and Mangles, Travels, p. 244; Stanley, S. & P. pp. 406, 407; Murray's Handbook of Syria, pp. 538, 583.)

HAMATH-ZO'BAH (חַמַּת צוֹבָה; Βαυσαβδ; [A. Αἰμαθ Σαβδ;] Emath-Suba) is spoken of as having been attacked and conquered by Solomon (2 Ch. viii. 3). Many scholars regard it as the same as Hamath, looking upon it as being included in Aram-Zobah—a geographical expression which has usually a narrower meaning. It is possible, however, that Hamath-Zobah was another Hamath, so named to distinguish it from "Great Hamath," like Ramoth-Gilead, which is distinguished by the addition of Gilead from Ramah in Benjamin. It has also been conjectured that, at the time of Solomon's attack, Hamath and Zobah were united under the same king; hence the joining of the two names.

[G. R.] [T. G. P.]

HAMA'THITE, THE (חַמַּתִּית; δ' Αμαθι; Amathæus, Hamathæus), one of the families descended from Canaan, named last in the list (Gen. x. 18; 1 Ch. i. 16, B. om.). The place of their settlement was doubtless HAMATH.

HAMIT'AL, 2 K. xxiii. 31, the reading of A. V. [1611] for HAMU'TAL.

HAM'MATH (חַמַּת = warm spring; B. Ἰμαθαδακῆ—the last two syllables a corruption of the name following—A. Ἀμαθ; Emath), one of the fortified cities in the territory allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). It is not possible from this list to determine its position, but the notices of the Talmudists, collected by Lightfoot in his Chorographical Century and Chor. Decad, leave no doubt that it was near Tiberias, one mile distant (Tal. Bab. Megilla, 2b)—in fact that it had its name, Chammath, "hot baths," because it contained those of Tiberias. In accordance with this are the slight notices of Josephus, who mentions it under the name of Emmaus as a "village not far (κωμη . . . οὐκ ἄσπονη) from Tiberias" (Ant. xviii. 2, § 3), and as where Vespasian had encamped "before (πρὸ) Tiberias" (B. J. iv. 1, § 3). In both cases Josephus names the hot springs or baths, adding in the latter, that such is the interpretation of the name Ἀμμαοῦς, and that the waters are medicinal. The Hammām still send up their hot and sulphureous waters, at a spot rather more than a mile south of the modern town, at the extremity of the ruins of the ancient city. The waters of the several springs have a temperature of from 142° to 132° Fahr., and are much used by the Jews of Tiberias for rheumatism (Rob. ii. 383-4; Van de Velde, ii. 399; Wilson, Recovery of Jerusm. p. 362). These springs are sometimes confused with the hot springs of Gadara, which were situated at Hamtha in the valley of the Yarmuk, a sabbath day's journey from the town. [GADARA.] The traveller Parchi mentions a place called El-Hami, which he rightly identified with Hamtha (Zunz's Appendix to Benjamin of Tudela, ii. 403).

In the list of Levitical cities given out of Naphtali (Josh. xxi. 32) the name of this place seems to be HAMMOTH-DOR, and in 1 Ch. vi. 76 it is further altered to HAMMON. [G.] [W.]

HAMMEDA'THA (חַמַּדָּתָה; B. Ἀμαδάθος; A. Ἀναμαδάθος, Ἀμαδάθος [ix. 24]; Amadathus), father of the infamous Haman, and commonly designed as the "Agagite" (Esth. iii. 1, 10, viii. 5, ix. 24), though also without that title (ix. 10). By Gesenius (Lex. 1855, p. 539; *MV.*¹¹ s. n.) the name is taken to be Medatha (Μαδάθας), preceded by the definite article. For other explanations, see Fürst, HWB., and Simonis, Onomasticon, p. 586. The latter derives it from a Persian word meaning "double." For the termination, compare ARIDATHA. [G.] [F.]

HAMMELECH (הַמֶּלֶךְ = the king; τοῦ βασιλέως; Amelech), rendered in the A. V. as a proper name (Jer. xxxvi. 26, xxxviii. 6); but there is no apparent reason for supposing it to be anything but the ordinary Hebrew word for "the king," i.e. in the first case Jehoiakim, and in the latter Zedekiah. If this be so, it enables us to connect with the royal family of Judah two persons, Jerahmeel and Malciah, who do not appear in the A. V. as members thereof. R. V. reads "the king's son" in the text, and the son of H. in marg. [G.] [W.]

HAMMER. The Hebrew language has several names for this indispensable tool. (1) Patish (פַּתִּישׁ), connected etymologically with παράσσω, to strike, which was used by the gold-beater (Is. xli. 7, A. V. and R. V. "carpenter") to overlay with silver and "smooth" the surface of the image; as well as by the quarry-man (Jer. xxiii. 29). (2) Maqqābāh (מַקְבָּבָה). Cp. the name Maccabee, properly a tool for hollowing, hence a stonemason's mallet (1 K. vi. 7), and generally any workman's hammer (Judg. iv. 21; Is. xliv. 12; Jer. x. 4). (3) Halmūth (חַלְמוּת), used only in Judg. v. 26, and then with the addition of the word "workmen's" by way of explanation. It was probably of wood, and "the hammer" kept for driving in tent-pegs (see Bertheau² on iv. 21). (4) A kind of hammer, named mappēs (מַפֵּס), Jer. li. 20 (A. V. "battle-axe," R. V. marg. Or, maul), or mēphīs (מֵפִיס), Prov. xxv. 18 (A. V. and R. V. "maul"), was used as a weapon of war. "Hammer" is used figuratively for any overwhelming power, whether worldly (Jer. l. 23) or spiritual (Jer. xxiii. 29). [W. L. B.]

HAMMOLE'KETH, R. V. HAMMOLECHETH (חַמְלֵכֶת, with the article, = the Queen [cp. Ham-melech]; ἡ Μαλεχέθ; Regina), a woman introduced into the genealogies of Manasseh as daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Ch. vii. 17, 18), and as having among her children ABI-EZER, from whose family sprang the great judge Gideon. The Targum translates the name by חַמְלֵכַת = who reigned. The Jewish tradition, as preserved by Kimchi in his commentary on the passage, is that "she used to reign over a portion of the land which belonged to Gilead," and that for that reason her lineage has been preserved. [G.] [F.]

HAM'MON (חַמְמוֹן = hot or sunny; B. Ἐμμεμόν, A. Ἀμόν; Hamon, Ammon). 1. A city in Asher (Josh. xix. 28), apparently not far from Zidon-rabbah, or "Great Zidon." Guérin (Galilee, ii. 141) proposes to identify it with Kh. Umm. el-'Amūd, near the coast, about 11 miles S. of Tyre, on the grounds that M. Renan found on the spot a Phoenician inscription, dedicated to "the God Hammon," and that the name may be traced in W. Hamūl and 'Ain Hamūl close by. Dr. Schultz had previously suggested its identification with 'Ain Hamūl (Rob. iii. 66), but this is doubtful both in etymology and position. There is a similar objection to Major Conder's suggestion (Hbk. to Bib. p. 413) that it was at Kh. el-Hima, to the E. of Kh. Umm el-'Amūd. Knobel (s. v.) identifies it with Hammāna, in W. Hammāna, E. of Beirūt, but this is too far north for a town in Asher.

2. B. Χαμῶθ; A. Χαμόν. A city allotted out of the tribe of Naphtali to the Levites (1 Ch. vi. 76), and answering to the somewhat similar names HAMMATH and HAMMOTH-DOR in Joshua. [G.] [W.]

HAM'MOTH-DOR (חַמְמוֹת דּוֹר = warm springs of Dor; Νεμῶθ, A. Ἐμμαθῶρ; Ammoth Dor), a city of Naphtali, allotted with its suburbs to the Gershonite Levites, and for a city of refuge (Josh. xxi. 32). Unless there were two places of the same or very similar name in Naphtali, this is identical with HAMMATH (see Dillmann² on Josh. ix. 35). Why the suffix Dor is added it is hard to tell, unless the word refers in some way to the situation of the place on the coast, in which fact only had it (as far as we know) any resemblance to DOR, on the shore of the Mediterranean. In 1 Ch. vi. 76 the name is contracted to HAMMON. [G.] [W.]

HAM'ONAH (חַמְוִנָה; Πολυάνδριον; Amona), the prophetic name of a city mentioned in a highly obscure passage of Ezekiel (xxxix. 16); apparently that of the place in or near which the multitudes of Gog should be buried after their great slaughter by God; hence its name—"multitude." [G.] [W.]

HAMON-GOG, THE VALLEY OF (חַמְוִנַת גּוֹג = the ravine of Gog's multitude; Γαλτὸ πολυάνδριον τοῦ Γόγ; vallis multitudinis Gog), the name to be bestowed on a ravine or glen, previously known as "the ravine of the passengers on the east of the sea," after the burial there of "Gog and all his multitude" (Ezek. xxxix. 11, 15).

HAMOR (חַמּוֹר) i.e. in Heb. a large he-ass, the figure employed by Jacob for Issachar; Ἐμμόρ; Hemor, a Hivite (or according to the LXX. of Gen. xxiv. 2, ὁ Χορραῖος, a Horite), who at the time of the entrance of Jacob on Palestine was prince (Nasi) of the land and city of Shechem, and father of the impetuous young man of the latter name whose ill-treatment of Dinah brought destruction on himself, his father, and the whole of their city (Gen. xxxiii. 19; xxiv. 2, 4, 6, 8, 13, 18, 20, 24, 26). Hamor would seem to have been a person of great influence, because, though alive at the time, the men of his tribe are called after him Bene-Hamor, and he himself, in records narrating events long subsequent to this, is styled Hamor-Abi-Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 32; * Judg. ix. 28; Acts

* The LXX. have here read the word without its initial guttural, and rendered it καρὰ τῶν Ἀμορραίων, "from the Amorites."

vii. 16). In the second of these passages his name is used as a signal of revolt, when the remnant of the ancient Hivites attempted to rise against Abimelech son of Gideon. [SHECHEM.] For the title Abi-Shechem, "father of Shechem," cp. "father of Bethlehem," "father of Tekoah," and others in the early lists of 1 Ch. ii. iv. In Acts vii. 16 the name is given in the Greek form of EMMOR, and Abraham is said to have bought his sepulchre from the "sons of Emmor." [G.]

HAMU-EL (חַמּוּאֵל, i.e. Hammū'el [of uncertain etymology]; B. om., A. Ἀμουήλ; Amuel), a man of Simeon; son of Mishma, of the family of Shaul (1 Ch. iv. 26, ed. Baer), from whom, if we follow the records of this passage, it would seem that the whole tribe of Simeon located in Palestine were derived.

HAMUL (חַמּוּל = spared; Sam. חַמּוּל; Ἰεμουήλ; Amul), the younger son of Pharez, Judah's son by Tamar (Gen. xlii. 12; 1 Ch. ii. 5). Hamul was head of the family of the Hamulites (Num. xxvi. 21; LXX. v. 17; B. Ἰαμουόν, A.F. Ἰαμουήλ), but none of the genealogy of his descendants is preserved in the lists of 1 Chronicles, though those of the descendants of Zerah are fully given.

HAMULITES, THE (חַמּוּלִיתִּים; B. Ἰαμουήλ, A. Ἰαμουήλ, F. Ἰεμ.; Amulitæ), the family (חַמּוּלִיתִּים) of the preceding (Num. xxvi. 21).

HAMUT'AL (חַמּוּטָאֵל; Amital), daughter of Jeremia of Libnah; one of the wives of king Josiah, and mother of the unfortunate princes Jehoahaz (2 K. xxiii. 31, B. Ἀμειτάλ, A. Ἀμυτάλ) and Mattaniah or Zedekiah (2 K. xxiv. 18, B. Μειράτ, A. Ἀμειράτ; Jer. lii. 1, B. Ἀμειτάλλ, N.A. Ἀμυ-). In the last two passages the name is given in the original text as חַמּוּטָאֵל, Chamital.

HANAM-EEL (חַנַּנְיָאֵל; Ἀναμηήλ; Hanameel; R. V. Hanamel), son of Shallum, and cousin of Jeremiah. When Judaea was occupied by the Chaldeans, Jerusalem beleaguered, and Jeremiah in prison, the Prophet (as חַנַּנְיָאֵל), having the right of redemption, bought a field of Hanameel in token of his assurance that a time was to come when land should be once more a secure possession (Jer. xxxii. 7, 8, 9, 12; and cp. v. 44). The suburban fields belonging to the tribe of Levi could not be sold (Lev. xxv. 34); but commentators see in Hanameel's invitation to Jeremiah that he should purchase the field a desire that a Levitical and priestly possession should not pass into non-priestly hands. The restriction imposed by the Law was less strictly observed as time went on. Cp. the case of Barnabas, a Levite (see Speaker's Comm., note on Acts iv. 37). [F.]

HAN'AN (חַנַּנְיָאֵל = gracious; Ἀνά; Hanan).
1. One of the chief people of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch. viii. 23).
2. The last of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch. viii. 38, ix. 44).
3. "Son of Maachah," i.e. possibly a Syrian of Aram-Maachah, one of the heroes of David's guard, according to the extended list of 1 Ch. xi. 43.

4. Bene-Chanan were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 46; Neh. vii. 49). In the parallel list, 1 Esd. v. 30, the name is given as ANAN.

5. (LXX. omits.) One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in his public exposition of the Law (Neh. viii. 7). The same person is probably mentioned in x. 10 (B. om.; N^c. אַנָּא. Anā), as sealing the covenant, since several of the same names occur in both passages.

6. One of the "heads" of the "people;" that is, of the laymen, who also sealed the covenant (x. 22).

7. (Anā; see Swete in loco.) Another of the chief laymen on the same occasion (x. 26).

8. Son of Zaccur, son of Mattaniah, whom Nehemiah made one of the storekeepers of the provisions collected as tithes (Neh. xiii. 13). He was probably a layman, in which case the four storekeepers represented the four chief classes of the people—priests, scribes, Levites, and laymen.

9. Son of Igdaliah, "the man of God" (Jer. xxxv. 4). The sons of Hanan had a chamber in the Temple. The LXX. B. gives the name twice—Ἰανῶν υἱοῦ Ἀνανίου: N. reads Ἀνάων υἱοῦ Ἀνανίου. [G.] [F.]

HANA'NE-EL (R. V. HANANEL), THE TOWER OF (חַנַּנְיָאֵל; B. πύργος Ἀναμηήλ, A. -μ, N. (iii. 1) Νασήλ; turris Hananel), a tower which formed part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 1, xii. 39). From these two passages, particularly from the former, it might almost be inferred that Hananel was but another name for the Tower of Meah (חַמּוּטָאֵל = "the hundred;" R. V. Hammeah): at any rate they were close together, and stood between the sheep-gate and the fish-gate. This tower is further mentioned in Jer. xxxi. 38, as one of the limits of the restored Jerusalem, which the Prophet is announcing shall be "rebuilt to Jehovah," and "not be thrown down any more for ever." The remaining passage in which it is named (Zech. xiv. 10) also connects this tower with the "corner gate." In the Targum of Jonathan it is called Pekós or Pikkús. [JERUSALEM.] [G.] [F.]

HANANI (חַנַּנְיָאֵל, possibly contracted from חַנַּנְיָאֵל; B. omits from v. 4, and reads Ἀνανίας in v. 25; A. in both cases, Ἀνανί: Hanani).
1. One of the sons of Heman, David's Seer, who were separated for song in the house of the Lord, and head of the eighteenth course of the service (1 Ch. xxv. 4, 25).

2. B. Ἀναμεί, A. Ἀνανί. A Seer who rebuked Asa, king of Judah, for his want of faith in God, which he had shown by buying off the hostility of Benhadad I., king of Syria (2 Ch. xvi. 7). For this he was imprisoned by Asa (v. 10). He (or another Hanani) was the father of Jehu the Seer, who testified against Baasha (1 K. xvi. 1, 7) and Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xix. 2, xx. 34).

3. One of the priests who in the time of Ezra were connected with strange wives (Ezra x. 20). In Esdras the name is ANANIAS.

4. A brother of Nehemiah, who returned

B.C. 446 from Jerusalem to Susa (Neh. i. 2); and was afterwards made governor of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (vii. 2).

5. A priest mentioned in Neh. xii. 36 (B. omits; A. Ἀναβ). [W. T. B.] [F.]

HANANIAH (חַנַּנְיָהוּ and חַנַּנְיָהוּ) = Jah is gracious; B. [usually] Ἀναβίας; Ananias and Hananias. In N. T. Ἀναβίας; Ananias.

1. One of the fourteen sons of Heman the singer, and chief of the sixteenth out of the twenty-four courses or wards into which the 288 musicians of the Levites were divided by king David. The sons of Heman were especially employed to blow the horns (1 Ch. xxv. 4, 5, 23).

2. One of the chief captains of the army of king Uziah (2 Ch. xxvi. 11).

3. Father of Zedekiah, one of the princes in the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah (Jer. xxxvi. 12).

4. Son of Azur, a Benjamite of Gibeon and a false prophet in the time of Zedekiah king of Judah. In the fourth year of his reign Hananiah withstood Jeremiah the Prophet, and publicly prophesied in the Temple that within two years Jeconiah and all his fellow-captives, with the vessels of the Lord's House which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away to Babylon, should be brought back to Jerusalem (Jer. xxviii.): an indication that treacherous negotiations were already secretly opened with Pharaoh-Hophra [EGYPT, p. 888, col. 1], and that strong hopes were entertained of the destruction of the Babylonian power by him. The preceding chapter (xxvii. 3) shows further that a league was already in progress between Judah and the neighbouring nations of Edom, Ammon, Moab, Tyre and Sidon, for the purpose of organising resistance to Nebuchadnezzar, in combination no doubt with the projected movements of Pharaoh-Hophra. Hananiah corroborated his prophecy by taking from off the neck of Jeremiah the yoke which he wore by Divine command (Jer. xxvii., in token of the subjection of Judaea and the neighbouring countries to the Babylonian empire), and breaking it, added, "Thus saith Jehovah, Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon from the neck of all nations within the space of two full years." But Jeremiah was bidden to go and tell Hananiah that for the wooden yokes which he had broken he should make yokes of iron, so firm was the dominion of Babylon destined to be for seventy years. The Prophet Jeremiah added this rebuke and prediction of Hananiah's death, the fulfilment of which closes the history of this false prophet: "Hear now, Hananiah; Jehovah hath not sent thee; but thou makest this people to trust in a lie. Therefore thus saith Jehovah, Behold I will send thee away from off the face of the earth: this year thou shalt die, because thou hast taught rebellion against Jehovah. So Hananiah the prophet died the same year, in the seventh month" (Jer. xxviii. 15, 16, R. V.). The above history of Hananiah is of great interest, as throwing much light upon the Jewish politics of that eventful time, divided as parties were into the partisans of Babylon on the one hand, and of Egypt on the other. It also exhibits the machinery of false prophecies, by which the irreligious party sought to promote their own policy, in a very distinct form. At the same time that it explains in general the sort of political calculation on which such false prophecies were hazarded, it supplies an important clue in particular by which to judge of the date of Pharaoh-Hophra's (or Apries') accession to the Egyptian throne, and the commencement of his ineffectual effort to restore the power of Egypt (which had been prostrate since Necho's overthrow, Jer. xlvi. 2) upon the ruins of the Babylonian empire. The leaning to Egypt, indicated by Hananiah's prophecy as having begun in the fourth of Zedekiah, had in the sixth of his reign issued in open defection from Nebuchadnezzar, and in the guilt of perjury, which cost Zedekiah his crown and his life (Ezek. xvii. 12-20; the date being fixed by a comparison of Ezek. viii. 1 with xx. 1). The temporary success of the intrigue which is described in Jer. xxxvii. was speedily followed by the return of the Chaldeans and the destruction of the city, according to the prediction of Jeremiah. This history of Hananiah also illustrates the manner in which the false prophets hindered the mission, and obstructed the beneficent effects of the ministry, of the true Prophets; and it affords a remarkable example of the way in which they prophesied smooth things, and said peace when there was no peace (cp. 1 K. xxii. 11, 24, 25).

5. Grandfather of Irijah, the captain of the ward at the gate of Benjamin who arrested Jeremiah on a charge of deserting to the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxvii. 13).

6. Head of a Benjamite house (1 Ch. viii. 24).

7. The Hebrew name of Shadrach. [SHADRACH.] He was of the house of David, according to Jewish tradition (Dan. i. 3, 6, 7, 11, 19; ii. 17). [ANANIAS.]

8. Son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. iii. 19), from whom CHRIST derived His descent. He is the same person who is by St. Luke called Ἰεσοῦς, Joanna, and who, when Rhesa is discarded, appears there also as Zerubbabel's son. [GENEALOGY OF CHRIST.] The identity of the two names Hananiah and Joanna is apparent immediately we compare them in Hebrew. This identification is of great importance, as bringing St. Luke's genealogy into harmony with the Old Testament. Nothing more is known of this Hananiah.

9. The two names Hananiah and Jehohanan stand side by side (Ezra x. 28) as sons of Bebai, who returned with Ezra from Babylon.

10. A priest, one of the "apothecaries" or makers of the sacred ointments and incense (Ex. xxx. 22-38; 1 Ch. ix. 30), who built a portion of the wall of Jerusalem in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 8). He may be the same as the man mentioned in v. 30 as having repaired another portion. If so, he was the son of Shelemiah; perhaps the same as is mentioned in xii. 41.

11. Head of the priestly course of Jeremiah in the days of Joiakim the high-priest (Neh. xii. 12).

12. Ruler of the place (שַׂר הַבְּיָרָה; R. V. "governor of the castle") at Jerusalem under Nehemiah. He is described as "a faithful man, and one who feared God above many." His office seems to have been one of authority and trust, and was perhaps the same as that of Eliakim, who was "over the house" in the reign of Hezekiah. [ELIAKIM.] The arrangements for guarding the gates of Jerusalem were entrusted to him with Hanani, the Tirshatha's brother. The opinion that the appointment of Hanani and Hananiah indicates that at this time Nehemiah returned to Persia, has no sufficient ground (see Hunter, After the Exile, ii. 172). Nehemiah seems to have been continuously at Jerusalem for some time after the completion of the wall (vii. 5, 65; viii. 9; x. 1). If, too, the term הַבְּנֵי הַיְּהוּדִים means, as Gesenius supposes, and as the use of it in Neh. ii. 8 makes not improbable, not the palace, but the fortress (see R. V.) of the Temple, called by Josephus βάρης, there is still less reason to imagine Nehemiah's absence. In this case Hananiah would be a priest, perhaps of the same family as the preceding.

13. An Israelite (Neh. x. 23; Heb. v. 24). [ANANIAS.] Other Hananiahs will be found under ANANIAS. [A. C. H.]

HANDICRAFT

(τέχνη, ἐργασία; ars, artificium; Acts xviii. 3, xix. 25; Rev. xviii. 22). Although the extent cannot be ascertained to which those arts whose invention is ascribed to Tubal-Cain were carried on, it is probable that this was proportionate respectively to the nomadic or settled habits of the antediluvian races. Among nomad races, as the Bedouin Arabs, or the tribes of Northern and Central Asia and of America, the wants of life, as well as the arts which supply them, are few; and it is only among the city-dwellers that both of them are multiplied and make progress. This subject cannot, of course, be followed out here: in the present article brief notices can only be given of such handicraft trades as are mentioned in Scripture.

1. The preparation of iron for use either in war, in agriculture, or for domestic purposes,

Fig. 1. 1. Making jewelry. 2. Blowing the fire for melting the gold. 3. Weighing the gold. 4. Clerks or scribes. 5. The remaining part relates to the preparation of the metal before it is worked. 6, 7, 8, 9. Washing gold. 10. Superintendent. 11. Egyptian Goldsmith. (Wilkinson.) 12. Clerks or scribes. 13. Making jewelry.

was doubtless one of the earliest applications of labour; and, together with iron, working in brass, or rather copper alloyed with tin, bronze (תְּנָיִם, Gesen. p. 875), is mentioned in the same passage as practised in antediluvian times (Gen. iv. 22). The use of this last is usually considered as an art of higher antiquity even than that of iron (Hesiod, Works & Days, 150; Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. ii. p. 152 [1878]), and there can be no doubt that metal, whether iron or bronze, must have been largely used, either in material or in tools, for the construction of the ark (Gen. vi. 14, 16). Whether the weapons for war or chase used by the early warriors of Syria and Assyria, or the arrow-heads of the archer Ishmael, were of bronze or iron cannot be ascertained; but we know that iron was used for warlike purposes by the Assyrians (Layard, Nin. & Bab. p. 194), and on the other hand that stone-tipped arrows, as was the case also in Mexico, were used in the earlier times by the Egyptians as well as the Persians and Greeks, and that stone or flint knives continued to be used by them, and by the inhabitants of the desert, and also by the Jews, for religious purposes after the introduction of iron into general use (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 353, 354, ii. 163; Prescott, Mexico, i. 118; Ex. iv. 25; Josh. v. 2; 1st Egypt. Room, Brit. Mus. case 36, 37). In the construction of the Tabernacle, copper, but no iron, appears to have been used, though the use of iron was at the same period well known to the Jews, both from their own use of it and from their Egyptian education, whilst the Canaanite inhabitants of Palestine and Syria were in full possession of its use both for warlike and domestic purposes (Ex. xx. 25, xxv. 3, xxvii. 19; Num. xxxv. 16; Deut. iii. 11, iv. 20, viii. 9; Josh. viii. 31, xvii. 16, 18). After the establishment of the Jews in Canaan, the occupation of a smith (צורף) became recognised as a distinct employment (1 Sam. xiii. 19). The designer of a higher order, such as Bezaleel, Aholiab, and others, appears to have been called specially צורף (Gesen. p. 531; Ex. xxxv. 30, 35, xxxvi. 1, 2; 2 Ch. xxvi. 15; Saalschütz, Arch. Hebr. c. 14, § 16). The smith's work and its results are often mentioned in Scripture (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 K. vi. 7; 2 Ch. xxvi. 14; Is. xlv. 12, liv. 16). Among the captives taken to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar were 1000 "craftsmen" and smiths, who were probably of the superior kind (2 K. xxiv. 16; Jer. xxix. 2).

The worker in gold and silver (קצץ; ἀργυροκόπος, χρυσοεργός; argentarius, aurifer) must have found employment both among the Hebrews and the neighbouring nations in very early times, as appears from the ornaments sent by Abraham to Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 22, 53, xxiv. 4, xxviii. 18; Deut. vii. 25). But, whatever skill the Hebrews possessed, it is quite clear that they must have learned much from Egypt

and its "iron-furnaces," both in metal-work and in the arts of setting and polishing precious stones; arts which were turned to account both in the construction of the Tabernacle and the making of the priests' ornaments, and also in the casting of the golden calf as well as its destruction by Moses, probably, as suggested by Goguet, by a method which he had learnt in Egypt (Gen. xli. 42; Ex. iii. 22, xii. 35, xxxi.

4, 5, xxxii. 2, 4, 20, 24, xxxvii. 17, 24, xxxviii. 4, 8, 24, 25, xxxix. 6, 39; Neh. iii. 8; Is. xlv. 12). Various processes of the goldsmiths' work are illustrated by Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. 136, 152, 162 [1878]).

After the conquest frequent notices are found both of moulded and wrought metal, including soldering, which last had long been known in Egypt; but the Phoenicians appear to have possessed greater skill than the Jews in these arts, at least in Solomon's time (Judg. viii. 24, 27, setting precious stones in gold (Ex. xxxix. 3, 6, &c.; Beckmann, Hist. of Inv. ii. 414; Gesen. p. 1229). Among the tools of the smith are mentioned —tongs (𐤀𐤓𐤏𐤏𐤏𐤏), λαβίς, forceps, Gesen. p. 761, Is. vi. 6), hammer (𐤀𐤓𐤁, σφυρά, malleus, Gesen. p. 1101), anvil (𐤀𐤓𐤁, Gesen. p. 1118), bellows (𐤓𐤁𐤁, φουσητήρ, suffiatorium, Gesen. p. 896; Is. xli. 7; Jer. vi. 29; Ecclus. xxxviii. 28; Wilkinson, ii. 316 [1878]).

In the N. T. Alexander "the coppersmith" (ὁ χαλκεύς) of Ephesus is mentioned, where also was carried on that trade in "silver shrines" (ναοὶ ἀργυροῖ) which was represented by Demetrius the silversmith (ἀργυροκόπος) as being in danger from the spread of Christianity (Acts xix. 24, 28; 2 Tim. iv. 14).

2. The work of the carpenter (𐤀𐤓𐤓𐤓, 𐤀𐤓𐤓𐤓, τέκτων, artifex lignarius) is often mentioned in Scripture (e.g. Gen. vi. 14; Ex. xxxvii.; Is. xlv. 13). In the palace built by David for himself, the workmen employed were chiefly Phoenicians sent by Hiram (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Ch. xiv. 1), as most probably were those, or at least the principal of those, who were employed by Solomon in his works (1 K. v. 6). But in the repairs of the Temple, executed under Joash king of Judah, and also in the rebuilding under Zerubbabel, no mention is made of foreign workmen, though in the latter case, the timber is expressly said to have been brought by sea to Joppa by Sidonians (2 K. xii. 11; 2 Ch. xxiv. 12; Ezra iii. 7). That the Jewish carpenters must have been able to carve with some skill is evident from Is. xli. 7, xlv. 13, in which last passage some of the implements used in the trade are mentioned: — the rule and relics; the former, including dovetailing, veneering, drilling, gluing, varnishing, and inlaying, may be seen in Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. 111-119. Of the latter many specimens, including saws, hatchets, knives, awls, nails, a hone, and a drill, also turned objects in bone, exist in the British Museum, 1st Egypt. Room, case 42-43, Nos. 6046-6188. See also Wilkinson, ii. p. 113, fig. 395.

The process of the work, and the tools used by Egyptian carpenters, and also coopers and wheelwrights, are displayed in Egyptian monuments and relics; the former, including dovetailing, veneering, drilling, gluing, varnishing, and inlaying, may be seen in Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. 111-119. Of the latter many specimens, including saws, hatchets, knives, awls, nails, a hone, and a drill, also turned objects in bone, exist in the British Museum, 1st Egypt. Room, case 42-43, Nos. 6046-6188. See also Wilkinson, ii. p. 113, fig. 395.

3. The masons (𐤓𐤓𐤓, wall-builders, Gesen. p. 269) employed by David and Solomon, at least the chief of them, were Phoenicians, as is implied also in the word 𐤓𐤓𐤓, men of Gebal, Jebail, Byblus (Gesen. p. 258; 1 K. v. 18; Ezek. xxvii. 9; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 179).

Among their implements are mentioned the saw (𐤍𐤏𐤍, πριων), the plumb-line (𐤍𐤏𐤍, Gesen. p. 125), the measuring-reed (𐤍𐤏𐤍, κάλamos, calamus, Gesen. p. 1221). Some of these, and also the chisel and mallet, are represented on Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. 313, 314), or preserved in the Brit. Mus. (1st Egyp. Room, Nos. 6114, 6038). The large stones used in Solomon's Temple are said by Josephus to have been fitted together exactly without either mortar or cramps, but the foundation stones to have been fastened with lead (Joseph. Ant. viii. 3, § 2; xv. 11, § 3). For ordinary building, mortar, 𐤍𐤏𐤍 (Gesen. p. 1328), was used; sometimes, perhaps, bitumen, as was the case at Babylon (Gen. xi. 3). The lime, clay, and straw of which mortar is generally composed in the East, requires to be very carefully mixed and united so as to resist wet (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 27; Shaw, Trav. p. 206). The wall "daubed with untempered mortar" of Ezekiel (xiii. 10) was perhaps a sort of cob-wall of mud or clay, without lime (𐤍𐤏𐤍, Gesen. p. 1516), which would give way under heavy rain. The use of whitewash on tombs is remarked by our Lord (Matt. xxiii. 27. See also Mishn. Maaser Shenit, v. 1). Houses infected with leprosy were required by the Law to be replastered (Lev. xiv. 40-45).

4. Akin to the craft of the carpenter is that of ship and boat building, which must have been exercised to some extent for the fishing-vessels on the lake of Gennesaret (Matt. viii. 23, ix. 1; John xxi. 3, 8). Solomon built, at Ezion-geber, ships for his foreign trade, which were manned by Phœnician crews, an experiment which Jehoshaphat endeavoured in vain to renew (1 K. ix. 26, 27, xxii. 48; 2 Ch. xx. 36, 37).

5. The perfumes used in the religious services, and in later times in the funeral rites of monarchs, imply knowledge and practice in the art of the "apothecaries" (𐤍𐤏𐤍, μυρεσφοι, pigmentarii), who appear to have formed a guild or association (Ex. xxx. 25, 35; Neh. iii. 8; 2 Ch. xvi. 14; Eccles. vii. 1, x. 1; Eccles. xxxviii. 8).

6. The arts of spinning and weaving both wool and linen were carried on in early times, as they are still usually among the Bedouins, by women. The women spun and wove goat's hair and flax for the Tabernacle, as in later times their skill was employed in like manner for idolatrous purposes. One of the excellences attributed to the good housewife is her skill and industry in these arts (Ex. xxxv. 25, 26; Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11; 2 K. xxiii. 7; Ezek. xvi. 16; Prov. xxxi. 13, 24; Burckhardt, Notes on Bed. i. 65: cp. Hom. Il. i. 123; Od. i. 356, ii. 104). The loom, with its beam (𐤍𐤏𐤍, liciatorium, 1 Sam. xvii. 7; Gesen. p. 883), pin (𐤍𐤏𐤍, πάσσαλος, clavus, Judg. xvi. 14; Gesen. p. 643), and shuttle (𐤍𐤏𐤍, σπομῆν, Job vii. 6; Gesen. p. 146), was, perhaps, introduced later, but as early as David's time (1 Sam. xvii. 7), and worked by men, as was the case in Egypt, contrary to the practice of other nations. This trade also appears to have been practised hereditarily (1 Ch. iv. 21; Herod. ii. 35; Soph. Oed. Col. 339).

Together with weaving we read also of embroidery, in which gold and silver threads were interwoven with the body of the stuff, sometimes in figure patterns, or with precious stones set in the needlework (Ex. xxvi. 1, xxviii. 4, xxxi. 6-13).

7. Besides these arts, those of dyeing and of dressing cloth were practised in Palestine, and those also of tanning and dressing leather (Josh. ii. 15-18; 2 K. i. 8; Matt. iii. 4; Acts ix. 43; Mishn. Megil. iii. 2). Shoemakers, barbers, and tailors are mentioned in the Mishna (Pesach. iv. 6): the barber (𐤍𐤏𐤍, koupeus, Gesen. p. 283), or his occupation, by Ezekiel (v. 1; Lev. xiv. 8; Num. vi. 5; Josephus, Ant. xvi. 11, § 5; B. J. i. 27, § 5; Mishn. Shabb. i. 2), and the tailor (i. 3): plasterers, glaziers, glass vessels, painters, and goldworkers are mentioned in the Mishna (Cel. viii. 9, xxix. 3-8; xxx. 1).

Tentmakers (σκηνοποιοι) are noticed in the Acts (xviii. 3), and frequent allusion is made to the trade of the potters.

8. Bakers (𐤍𐤏𐤍, Gesen. p. 136) are noticed in Scripture as carrying on their trade (Jer. xxxvii. 21; Hos. vii. 4; Mishn. Cel. xv. 2); and the well-known valley Tyropœon probably derived its name from the occupation of the cheese-makers, its inhabitants (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, 1). Butchers, not Jewish, are spoken of in 1 Cor. x. 25.

Trade in all its branches was much developed after the Captivity; and for a father to teach his son a trade was reckoned not only honourable but indispensable (Mishn. Pirke Ab. ii. 2; Kiddush. iv. 14). Some trades, however, were regarded as less honourable (Jahn, Bibl. Arch. § 84).

Some, if not all trades, had special localities, as was the case formerly in European, and is now in Eastern, cities (Jer. xxxvii. 21; 1 Cor. x. 25; Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 1, and 8, § 1: Mishn. Beccor. v. 1; Russell, Aleppo, i. 20; Chardin, Voyages, vii. 274, 394; Lane, Mod. Eg. ii. 145).

One feature, distinguishing Jewish from other workmen, deserves peculiar notice, viz. that they were not slaves, nor were their trades necessarily hereditary, as was and is so often the case among other, especially heathen nations (Jahn, Bibl. Antiq. c. v. §§ 81-84; Saalschütz, Hebr. Arch. c. 14; Winer, s. v. Handwerke). [MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS; POTTERY; GLASS; LEATHER.] [H. W. P.]

HANDKERCHIEF, NAPKIN, APBON.

Of these terms, as used in the A. V., the first two = σουδάριον, the last = σμικκίνθιον: they are classed together, inasmuch as they refer to objects of a very similar character. Both words are of Latin origin: σουδάριον = sudarium from sudo, "to sweat;" the Lutheran translation preserves the reference to its etymology in its rendering, Schweisstuch: σμικκίνθιον = semicinctum, i. e. "a half girdle." Neither is much used by classical writers; the sudarium is referred to as used for wiping the face (caudilo frontem sudario tergeret, Quintil. vi. 3), or hands (sudario manus tergens, quod in collo habebat, Petron. in Fragm. Trupur. cap. 67); and also as worn over the face for the purpose of concealment (Sueton. in Neron. cap. 48); the word was introduced by the Romans into Palestine, where it was adopted by the Jews, in the form מַטְרֵיטָא = מַטְרֵיטָא, in Ruth iii. 15. The sudarium is noticed in the N. T. as a wrapper in which to fold up money (Luke xix. 20)—as a cloth bound about the head of a corpse (John xi. 44, xx. 7), being probably brought from the crown of the head under the chin—and lastly as an article of dress that could be easily removed (Acts xix. 12), probably a handkerchief worn on the head like the keffieh of the Bedouins. The semicinctum is noticed by Martial xiv. Epiqr. 153, and by Petron. in Satyr. cap. 94. The distinction between the cinctus and semicinctum consisted in its width (Isidor. Orig. xix. 33); with regard to the character of the σμικκίνθιον, the only inference from the passage in which it occurs (Acts xix. 12) is that it was easily removed from the person, and probably was worn next to the skin. According to Suidas, the distinction between the sudarium and the semicinctum was very small, for he explains the latter by the former, σμικκίνθιον φακίλιον ἢ σουδάριον, the φακίλιον being a species of head-dress: Hesychius likewise explains σμικκίνθιον by φακίλιον. According to the scholiast (in Cod. Steph.), as quoted by Schleusner (Lex. s. v. σουδάριον), the distinction between the two terms is that the sudarium was worn on the head, and the semicinctum used as a handkerchief. The difference was probably not in the shape, but in the use of the article. We may conceive them to have been bands of linen of greater or less size, which might be adapted to many purposes, like the lungi of the Arabs, which is applied sometimes as a girdle, at other times as a turban (Wellsted, Travels, i. 321). HANDMAID. [CONCUBINE, SLAVE.]

HANES (חַנַּס); Hanes, a place in Egypt, only mentioned in Is. xxx. 4: "For his princes are at BIBLE DICT.—VOL. I.

Zoan, and his ambassadors are come to Hanes." The LXX. has ὅτι εἰσὶν ἐν Τάβει ἀρχαγοὶ ἑγγελαὶ σουδαρίων, evidently following an entirely different reading.

Two identifications have been proposed: (1) with Tehaphnehes or Daphnae; (2) with Khinenu or Heracleopolis Magna. It has been argued (see the 1st edition of this Dict.) that Hanes must have been on the eastern frontier. When the princes had come to Zoan, the chief royal city at the time, it is quite reasonable to suppose that the ambassadors were at Daphnae. The Chald. Paraph. may have been influenced by this idea in choosing Tehaphnehes. But as an abbreviation of this name, Hanes seems out of all analogy, and thus the identification philologically too daring. On examining the text, the alternative seems preferable. The verb בָּיַן, used of the ambassadors, both in Kal and in Hiphil, as here, means primarily "to touch" or "reach to"; and in a secondary sense, "to come to." If therefore we would be strictly literal, the verb probably implies that Hanes was beyond Zoan. The old Egyptian civil name of Heracleopolis Magna, Khinenu, in Assyrian Khi-ni-in-shi, is preserved in the Coptic ⲬⲏⲚⲈ, ⲬⲏⲚⲈ, ⲬⲬⲏⲚⲈ, and the Arabic Ahnás-el-Medeeneh, أهناس.

المدينة, the name of a modern village believed to mark the site. The city of Khinenu was anciently the capital of two dynasties of Heracleopolite kings, the ninth and tenth of Manetho's list, who intervened between the last Memphite dynasty and the first Theban. They have recently been identified by Mr. F. Li. Griffith, from the inscriptions of the tombs of Asyot (Report of Egypt Exploration Fund, 1889, p. 11 sq.). In later times Heracleopolis does not seem to have played an important part in history until the break-up of the Egyptian monarchy, about B.C. 750, when the country was resolved into its original elements, the nomes; a condition which lasted about a century, until the successful effort of Psammeticus II. to reunite Egypt under a single sceptre. During this period Khinenu was the seat of one of the petty kings. At the date of the prophecy the titular king of all Egypt had his seat at Zoan, or Tanis, while the real over-lord was the Ethiopian of Napata. The rule of the Ethiopian depended on his power to resist the strength of Assyria. Consequently the phantom Pharaoh of Zoan and the little kings of the nomes occasionally rose to comparative importance. At a moment of this kind a neighbouring power would naturally address itself to Zoan and to one of the Upper Egyptian rulers, of whom the prince of Khinenu was the most northern, and would thus naturally represent the second chief addressed by envoys from a Palestinian kingdom. The princes would be more properly sent to Pharaoh at Zoan, the ambassadors to the inferior ruler of Hanes. We have still to determine the date of the embassy. It was addressed to Pharaoh (cv. 2, 3) and the Egyptians (cv. 2, 3, 7; xxxi. 1, 3). It therefore cannot be the embassy of Hoshea, king of Israel, to So, or Shebek (2 K. xvii. 4), the Ethiopian king or over-lord of Egypt. The conditions suit the embassy of Hezekiah to Pharaoh, to which Sennacherib made contemptuous allusion in his message to the king of udah (2 K. xviii. 20, 21). The whole context of the two chapters of Is. xxx., xxxi. points to Jerusalem and her miraculous deliverance from Assyria. [R. S. P.]

HANGING. [PUNISHMENT.]

HANGING; HANGINGS. These terms represent both different words in the original, and different articles in the furniture of the Temple. (1.) The "hanging" (קַלְסָוֹן; κάλωστρον; tentorium) was a curtain or "covering" (as the word radically means) to close an entrance; one was placed before the door of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 36, 37, xxxix. 38); it was made of variegated stuff wrought with needlework, and was hung on five pillars of acacia wood; another was placed before the entrance of the court (Ex. xxvii. 16, xxxviii. 18; Num. iv. 26); the term is also applied to the veil that concealed the Holy of Holies, in the full expression "veil of the covering" (Ex. xxxv. 12, xxxix. 34, xl. 21; Num. iv. 5). [CURTAINS, 2.]

(2.) The "hangings" (מִשְׁכָּנֵי; ιστρία; tentoria) were used for covering the walls of the court of the Tabernacle, just as tapestry was in modern times (Ex. xxvii. 9, xxxv. 17, xxxviii. 9; Num. iii. 26, iv. 26). The rendering in the LXX. implies that they were made of the same substance as the sails of a ship, i.e. (as explained by Rashi) "meshy, not woven:" this opinion is, however, incorrect, as the material of which they were constructed was "fine twined linen." The hangings were carried only five cubits high, or half the height of the walls of the court (Ex. xxvii. 18; cp. xxvi. 16). [TABERNACLE.]

In 2 K. xxiii. 7, the term battim, מִבְּתֵי, strictly "houses" (A. V. and R. V. text "hangings"), is probably intended to describe tents (A. V. marg.) used as portable sanctuaries. [W. L. B.]

HAN-EL (חַנְיָהּ), i.e. Channiel, R. V. "Hanniel" = gift (or grace) of God; Ἀνεήλα; Haniel), one of the sons of Ulla, a chief prince, and a choice hero in the tribe of Asher (1 Ch. vii. 39).

HAN'NAH (חַנָּה = grace, or beauty; Ἄννα; Anna), one of the wives of Elkanah, and mother of Samuel (1 Sam. i. ii.); a prophetess of considerable repute, though her claim to that title is based upon one production only, viz. the hymn of thanksgiving for the birth of her son. The hymn is in the highest order of prophetic poetry; its resemblance to that of the Virgin Mary (cp. 1 Sam. ii. 1-10 with Luke i. 46-55; see also Ps. cxliii.) has been noticed by commentators; and it is specially remarkable as containing the first designation of the Messiah under that name. In the Targum it has been subjected to a process of magniloquent dilution. [SAMUEL.] Modern critics do not hesitate to affirm that "in style and tone the Song throughout bears the marks of a later age than that of Hannah," even if it be admitted that "sober criticism" will "not assert categorically that the Song cannot be by Hannah" (cp. Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam., p. 21). [T. E. B.] [F.]

HANNA'THON (חַנְתָּוֹן, (? = graceful; B. Ἀναθή, A. Ἐνανθή; Hanathon), one of the cities of Zebulun, a point apparently on the northern boundary (Josh. xix. 14). Major Conder has proposed its identification with Kefer 'Anan, S.W. of Safed, which is mentioned in the Mishna (Shebiith, ix. 2) as marking the northern limit of Lower Galilee (PEF. Mem. i. 205).

[G.] [W.]

HAN-EL (חַנְיָהּ; Ἀνεήλα; Haniel), son of Ephod; as prince (Nasi) of Manasseh, he assisted in the division of the Promised Land (Num. xxxiv. 23). The name is the same as HANIEL.

HANO'CH (חֲנוֹךְ [see ENOCH]; Ἐνώχ; Henoch). 1. The third in order of the children of Midian, and therefore descended from Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 4). In the parallel list of 1 Ch. i. 33, the name is given in the A. V. as HENOCH (R. V. "Hanoch").

2. (חֲנוֹךְ; Ἐνώχ; Henoch.) Eldest son of Reuben (Gen. xli. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 5; 1 Ch. v. 3), and founder of the family of HANO'CHITES, THE (חֲנוֹכִיָּם; δῆμος τοῦ Ἐνώχ; familia Henochitarum), Num. xxvi. 5.

HA'NUN (חֲנוּן = he who hath received mercy; B. Ἀνών, A. Ἄδων and Ἀδών [Sam.]. BA. Ἀνών, N. sometimes Ἀνών [Ch.]; Hanon; Assy. Hanuni). 1. Son of Nahash (2 Sam. x. 1, 2; 1 Ch. xix. 1, 2), king of Ammon, who dishonoured the ambassadors of David (2 Sam. x. 4), and involved the Ammonites in a disastrous war (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Ch. xix. 6). [W. T. B.]

2. A man who, with the people of Zanoah, repaired the ravine-gate in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 13; Ἀνοών).

3. A man specified as "the sixth son of Zalaph," who also assisted in the repair of the wall, apparently on the east side (Neh. iii. 30; BA. Ἀνούμ, N. Ἀνώμ). [W. A. W.]

HAPA (חַפָּא; Ἄπης). The name of the Egyptian sacred bull Apis occurs in the LXX. of Jer. xli. (LXX. xxvi.) 15, where the Masoretic חֲפָאִים חֲפָאִים חֲפָאִים, "Why are thy valiant men swept away?" (A. V. "Why are thy strong ones?" or marg. Why is thy strong one? R. V.) is rendered by the LXX. οὐδ' εἶ ἐφυγεν ὁ Ἄπης, ὁ ἐλεγκτὸς σου. Hence it is conjectured by Frankl that the text from which the LXX. was translated read חֲפָאִים חַפָּאִים חַפָּאִים חַפָּאִים (Studien ueber die Septuaginta und Peschito zu Jeremia, pp. 14, 20, 21). This is certainly agreeable with the imagery of this prophecy, in which there are two other similar figures. "Egypt is a very fair heifer; but destruction [marg. Or, the gadfly] out of the north is come" [marg. it is come upon her] (v. 20). The mercenaries are also compared to "calves of the stall" (v. 21). The parallel allusion to the sacred bull of Osiris, Apis, and to the sacred cow Aha-t, sometimes represented as a heifer (Lanzoni, Dizionario di Mitologia Egizia, pl. i. 1, 2), of the mother-goddesses Athor and Isis (id. p. 3), is sufficiently remarkable; and if the reading "gadfly" be correct, the reference to the Graeco-Phoenician story of Io, or Aha-t, is probable. But it may be argued that the reference to the heifer led the LXX. translators to imagine Apis, and there is no doubt that either they had a very different text here from the Masoretic, or that they allowed themselves a great liberty of translation. [R. S. P.]

HAPHRA'IM, R. V. and A. V. 1611 HA-PHARA'IM (חַפְרָאִים, i.e. Chaphraïm; B. 'Αφείν, A. 'Αφραεϊμ; Hapharaïm), a city of Issachar, mentioned next to Shunem (Josh. xix. 19). The name possibly signifies "two pits." By Eusebius and Jerome it is spoken of as still known under the name of Afarea ('Αφραλα) and as standing 6 miles north of Legio (OS. p. 241, 61; p. 130, 28). The Afarea of Eusebius and Jerome is now apparently the important ruin, Kh. el-Farriyeh, 5½ Eng. miles N.W. of Lejjûn. But this site seems too far to the west for Haphraim, which should be looked for nearer to Solan (the ancient Shunem). Two miles west of this place stands the village of el-'Afulah (العفولة), which may be the representative of Chaphraim, Ain having taken the place of the Cheth. [G.] [W.]

HA'RA (הָרָא = mountain land; LXX. om.; Ara), a place mentioned with Hafah, Habor, and the river of Gozan, in connexion with the deportation into captivity of the Reubenites, Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh by the king of Assyria (1 Ch. v. 26). It may be Media magna (M^V.11); it is hardly probable that it was the same as Harran. [F.]

HARA'DAH (הָרָדָה, with the article, = the trembling; Xapaðð; Arada), a desert station of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 24, 25); its position is uncertain. [H. H.]

HA'RAN. 1. (הָרָן; 'Αβάρ; Jos. 'Αβάρης; Aran). The third son of Terah, and therefore youngest brother of Abram (Gen. xi. 26). Three children are ascribed to him—Lot (ev. 27, 31), and two daughters, viz. Milcah, who married her uncle Nahor (r. 29), and Iscah (v. 29), of whom we merely possess her name, though by some (e.g. Josephus) she is held to be identical with Sarah. Haran was born in Ur of the Chaldees, and he died there while his father was still living (r. 28). His sepulchre was still shown there when Josephus wrote his history (Ant. i. 6, § 5). The ancient Jewish tradition is that Haran was burnt in the furnace of Nimrod for his wavering conduct during the fiery trial of Abraham (see the Targum Ps.-Jonathan; Jerome's Quaest. in Genesis, and the notes thereto in the edit. of Migne). This tradition seems to have originated in a translation of the word Ur, which in Hebrew signifies "fire." It will be observed that although this name and that of the country appear the same in the A. V., there is in the original a certain difference between them; the latter commencing with the harsh guttural Cheth.

2. (B. Αἰδάν, A. 'Αράν; Aran.) A Gershonite Levite in the time of David, one of the family of Shimei (1 Ch. xxiii. 9). [G.] [W.]

HA'RAN (הָרָן, LXX. Xαβάρ; Haran) is the name of the place to which Abraham migrated from Ur of the Chaldees, and where the descendants of his brother Nahor established themselves. Haran is therefore called "the city of Nahor"

(cp. Gen. xxiv. 10 with xxvii. 43). It is said to be in Mesopotamia (Gen. xxiv. 10), or more definitely in Padan-aram (xxv. 20), which is the "cultivated district at the foot of the hills" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 129 n.), a name well applying to the beautiful stretch of country which lies below Mount Masius between the Khabour and the Euphrates [PADAN-ARAM]. Here, about midway in this district, is a town still called Harrân, which really never seems to have changed its appellation, and beyond any reasonable doubt is the Haran or Charran of Scripture (Bochart's Phaleg, i. 14; Ewald's Geschichte, i. 384).

The foundation of the city is lost in antiquity, but Assyrian or Babylonian influence probably predominated at an early date, as is indicated by the fact that the name, in Assyro-Babylonian, is Haran, meaning "road," and is written with the ideograph expressing that word. It was probably so called as the crossing-point of the Syrian, Assyrian, and Babylonian trade-route. It is often mentioned in cuneiform literature, Tiglath-pileser I. (about 1120 B.C.) boasting of having taken or killed elephants "in the land of Haran (ina mât Harrani) and on the banks of the Khabour;" and Sargon says that he "spread out his shadow over the city Haran (eli âli Harrana salûla-bu itrusû), and as a soldier of Anu and Dagon wrote its laws." Sennacherib (2 K. ix. 12) boasts of having conquered Gozan, Haran, Reseph, and the Beni-Eden; and the city is mentioned as a considerable trading-centre in Ezek. xxvii. 23. The patron-deity of the city was the moon-god, called Sin by the Assyrians, and the city was celebrated for his worship from exceedingly ancient times, as is indicated by Assurbanipal, and also by Nabonidus, who relates that the god Sin was angry with Haran and with his temple E-hulhul ("the house of joy") within it, and he therefore allowed the Umman-Manda (Medes or Scythians) to come and destroy the temple. Nabonidus, however, received (so he relates) from the gods Merodach and Sin, in a dream, instructions to rebuild the temple; and when Nabonidus pointed out that the Umman-Manda still surrounded the city, the destruction of those hordes was revealed to him, which destruction took place under Cyrus three years later. Nabonidus was thus enabled to continue and complete the work of Shalmaneser II. and Assurbanipal with great magnificence, and he adorned the city of Haran at the same time. It was famous among the Romans for being near the scene of the defeat of Crassus (Plin. N. H. v. 24). About the time of the Christian era it appears to have formed part of the kingdom of Edessa (Mos. Chor. ii. 32), which was ruled by Abgarus. Afterwards it passed with that kingdom under the dominion of the Romans, and appears as a Roman city in the wars of Caracalla (Mos. Chor. ii. 72) and Julian (Jo. Malal. p. 329). It was the seat of a bishopric in the 4th century, and possessed a magnificent cathedral, the ruins of which still remain. It is remarkable that the people of Haran retained until a late date the Chaldean language and the worship of Chaldean deities.

Haran lies on the Belias (Belich, ancient Bilichus), a small affluent of the Euphrates, which falls into it at about long. 39°. It now consists of a low range of mounds or hills on both sides of the river. The ruins of the castle, with its square columns 8 ft. thick supporting an arched roof 30 ft. high, are very conspicuous. There are also several more modern ruins. The walls, though in a state of dilapidation, are yet continuous throughout. They are very irregular. One of the gateways is flanked by three towers. Near the city is a well, traditionally pointed out as the one at which Rebekah was met, and there is also a mosque outside the walls. A fragment of an Assyrian lion has been found among the ruins of the town.

Haran, or Charran, showing the Ruins of the Castle, with some of the houses in the shape of bee-hives around it.

The modern Haran is now a small village inhabited by a few families of 'Arabs (cp. Ainsworth, in the PSBA., May 5, 1891, pp. 385-391).*

* Dr. Beke's view, that Haran is to be identified with the village Haran-el-Awamad, about four hours east of Damascus, cannot be accepted.—[F.]

In the A. V. of the New Testament the name follows the Greek form, and is given as Charran (Acts vii. 2, 4), but the R. V. has Haran.

[G. R.] [T. G. P.]

HARARITE, THE (הַרְרִי, perhaps = the mountaineer, Ges. Thes. p. 392; de Arari, or Orori, Ararites): the designation of three men connected with David's guard.

1. (δ'Αρωραιος.) "AGEE, a Hararite" (R. V.), father of Shammah, the third of the three chiefs of the heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 11. In the parallel passage, 1 Ch. xi., the name of this warrior is entirely omitted).

2. (δ'Αραμθρας.) "SHAMMAH the Hararite" is named as one of the thirty in 2 Sam. xxiii. 33. In 1 Ch. xi. 34 the name is altered to Shage (Luc. Σαγαδ). Kennicott's conclusion, from a minute investigation, is that the passage should stand in both, "Jonathan, son of Shammah the Hararite" (2 Sam. xxiii. 11)—Shammah being identical with Shimei, David's brother (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. in loco).

3. (Σαραουφρας, δ'Αροφλ.) "SHARAR (2 Sam. xxiii. 33) or SACAR (1 Ch. xi. 35) the Hararite" (R. V. "the Ararite") was the father of Ahiam, another member of the guard. Kennicott is inclined to consider Sacar to be the correct name.

HARBO'NA (חַרְבוֹנָה), possibly from the Pers. = ass-driver; BN. Χαλβη, A. Oapeβωδ; Harbona, the third of the seven chamberlains, or eunuchs, who served king Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10), and who suggested Haman's being hung on his own gallows (vii. 9). In the latter passage the name is HARBO'NAH (חַרְבוֹנָה); BA. Bouryabdr, N*. -d, N*--fay; Harbona).

HARE (אַרְנֵבֶת), 'arnēbeth; δαρύνους; lepus; Arab. أرنب, 'arnēb) occurs only in Lev. xi. 6 and Deut. xiv. 7, amongst the animals disallowed as food by the Mosaic Law. There is no doubt at all that 'arnēbeth denotes "a hare." The hare is at this day called arnēb (أرنب) by the Arabs in Palestine and Syria (see Russell's Nat. Hist. of Aleppo,² ii. 154). The δαρύνους, i.e. "rough foot," is identical with λαγώς, and is the term which Aristotle generally applies to the hare: indeed he only uses the latter word once in his History of Animals (viii. 27, § 4). The rabbit (L. cuniculus) was unknown to the ancient Hebrews; nor is it known in Syria or Palestine. It is indigenous only in Western Europe and North Africa: wherever it is found elsewhere, it has been introduced. It is doubtful whether Aristotle was acquainted with the rabbit, as he never alludes to any burrowing λαγώς or δαρύνους; but, on the other hand, see the passage in vi. 28, § 3, where the young of the δαρύνους are said to be "born blind," which will apply to the rabbit alone. Pliny (N. H. viii. 55) expressly notices rabbits (cuniculi), which occur in such numbers in the Balearic Islands as to destroy the harvests. He also notices the practice of ferreting these animals, and thus driving them out of their burrows. The hare is considered by the Syrians as well as the Arabs as an animal of the chase, and is pursued by greyhounds, or more frequently, among the Bedouin, by trained falcons. Its flesh is highly prized by the Arabs, though some of the more scrupulous of the Turks decline to eat it. But the Moslems tell one that the hare chews the cud, and therefore is clean. The Armenian Christians refuse to eat it, but not Greek Christians. The hare was forbidden to the Israelites because it has not a cloven hoof; the remark that it chews the cud being only parenthetical. It was generally believed that it chewed the cud from its habit of constantly grinding its teeth and moving its jaws, after the manner of ruminating animals. But in rodents such as the hare, the incisor teeth continue to grow through life, and must be kept to the proper length, by this constant grinding. If one tooth be accidentally broken off, the tooth that meets it grows on, and often by its length prevents the animal from feeding.

Moses speaks of animals according to appearances, and not with the precision of a comparative anatomist, and his object was to show why the hare should be interdicted, though to all appearance it chewed the cud, viz. because it did not divide the hoof.

There are two species of hares natives of different parts of Palestine, and two or three others which occasionally occur near the borders of the land:—

1. Lepus syriacus (Hemp. and Ehr. Symb. Phys. ii. tab. 15).—This is the only species in the wooded and cultivated districts of Palestine. Down the coast it is found from Lebanon and the time of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 14). In the parallel passage in Chronicles the name is given as HARRAH.

HAR'HUR (חַרְחֹרֵץ, ? = inflammation; 'Αρούρ [Ezra]; Harhur). Bene-Charchur were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53, B. 'Αρούρ, A. -ρ). In the Apocryphal 1 Esd. (v. 31), the name has become ASSUR.

HAR'IM (חַרִּים). 1. (B. Χαρήθ, A. Χαρήμ; Harim.) A priest who had charge of the third division in the house of God (1 Ch. xxiv. 8).

2. (B. om., A. 'Ηράμ [Ezra]; B. 'Ηράμ, Ἡ. 'Ηρά [Neh.]) Bene-Harim, probably descendants of the above, to the number of 1017, came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 39; Neh. vii. 42). [CARME.] The name, probably as representing the family, is mentioned amongst those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 5, B. Εἰράμ [see Swete, l. c.]); and amongst the priests who had to put away their foreign wives were five of the sons of Harim (Ezra x. 21, BNA. 'Ηράμ). In the parallel to this latter passage in 1 Esd. ix. 21, the name is given EANES (but see Speaker's Comm. in loco).

3. (B. om., A. 'Οπέμ.) It further occurs in a list of the families of priests "who went up with Zerubbabel and Jeshua," and of those who were their descendants in the next generation—in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. ii. 15). In the former list (xii. 4; BA. om., Ἡ. -Ἡ. Ρεόμ) the name is changed to REHUM (חַרִּים to רוּחַ) by a not unfrequent transposition of letters. [REHUM.]

4. Another family of Bene-Harim, 320 in number, came from the Captivity in the same caravan (Ezra ii. 32; Neh. vii. 35; 'Ηράμ). These were laymen, and seem to have taken their name from a place; at least the contiguous names in the list are certainly those of places. These also appear among those who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 31; 'Ηράμ), as well as those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 27; BA. 'Ηράμ, Ἡ. Ρεόμ). [G.] [F.]

HA'RIPH (חַרִּיף; Hareph). 112 of the Bene-Chariph returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 24; B. 'Αρεφ, A. -μ). The name occurs again among the "heads of the people" who sealed the covenant (x. 19; B. 'Αρεφ, see Swete, l. c.). In the lists of Ezra ii. 18, and 1 Esd. v. 16, Hariph appears as JORAH* and AZEPHURITH respectively. An almost identical name, Hareph, appears in the lists of Judah (1 Ch. iii. 51; B. 'Αρεφ, A. 'Αρε) as the father of Bethgader [HARUPHIT]. [G.] [F.]

HARLOT (זֹנֶה, often with אִשָּׁה, זֹנָה; קַרְטָה). That this condition of persons existed in the earliest states of society is clear from Gen. xxxviii. 15. So Rahab (Josh. ii. 1), who is said by the Chaldee paraph. (ad loc.) to have been an innkeeper;* but if there were such persons, considering what we know of Canaanitish morals (Lev. xviii. 27), we may conclude that they would, if women, have been of this class. The Law forbids (xix. 29) the father's compelling his daughter to sin, but does not mention it as a voluntary mode of life on her part without his complicity. It could indeed hardly be so. The isolated act which is the subject of Deut. xxii. 28, 29, is not to the purpose. Male relatives^b were probably allowed a practically unlimited discretion in punishing family dishonour incurred by their women's unchastity (Gen. xxxviii. 24). The provision of Lev. xxi. 9, regarding the priest's daughter, may have arisen from the fact of his home being less guarded owing to his absence when ministering, as well as from the scandal to sanctity so involved. Perhaps such abominations might, if not thus severely marked, lead the way to the excesses of Gentile ritualistic fornication, to which indeed, when so near the sanctuary, they might be viewed as approximating (Michaelis, Laws of Moses, art. 268). Yet it seems to be assumed that the harlot class would exist; and the prohibition of Deut. xxiii. 18, forbidding offerings from the wages of such sin, is perhaps due to the contagion of heathen example, in whose worship practices abounded which the Israelites were taught to abhor. The term קַרְטָה (meaning properly "consecrated") points to one description of persons, and נְכַרְיָה ("strange woman") to another, of whom this class mostly consisted. The first term refers to the impure worship of the Syrian* Antarte (Num. xxv. 1: cp. Herod. i. 199; Justin, xviii. 5; Strabo, viii. 378, xii. 559; Val. Max. ii. 6, 15; August. de Civ. Dei, iv. 4), whose votaries, as idolatry progressed, would be recruited from the daughters of Israel; hence the common mention of both these sins in the Prophets, the one indeed being a metaphor of the other (Is. i. 21, lvii. 8; Jer. ii. 20: cp. Ex. xxxiv. 15, 16; Jer. iii. 1, 2, 6; Ezek. xvi., xxiii.; Hos. i. 2, ii. 4, 5, iv. 11, 13-15, v. 3). The latter class would grow up with the growth of great cities and of foreign intercourse, and would hardly enter into the view of the Mosaic institutes. As regards the fashions involved in the practice, similar outward marks seem to have attended its earliest forms to those which we trace in the classical writers, e.g. a distinctive dress and a seat by the wayside (Gen. xxxviii. 14: cp. Ezek. xvi. 16, 25; Bar. vi. 43; Petron. Arb. Sat. xvi.; Juv. vi. 118 sq.; Dougltaei Analect. Sacr. Exc. xiv.). Public singing in the streets occurs also (Is. xxiii. 16; Eccles. ix. 4). Those who thus published their infamy were of the worst repute, others had houses of resort, and both classes seem to

* Deyling, Observ. Sacr. ii. 470, פְּנִיקִיתָא, i.e. πανδοκειρία.

^b Philo (lib. de Spec. Legib. 6, 7) contends that whoredom was punished under the Mosaic Law with stoning; but this is by Seiden (de Uz. Heb. iii. 18) shown to be unfounded.

^c So at Corinth were 1,000 ἱεροδούλαι dedicated to Aphrodite and the gross sins of her worship, and similarly at Comana, in Armenia (Strabo, ii. c.).

^d Ἄβραι αἱ γυναῖκες ἐκ τῆς ὁδοῦ τοὺς παρῖοντας ἐναπαύζουσι (Theophr. Char. xxxi.). So Catullus (Carm. xxxvii. 16) speaks converyly of semitarum moechi.

* Dr. Hackett (E. D. Am. ed. s. n.), giving to Jorah (יֹרָה) the meaning of first or early rain, makes it = Hariph, to which Gesenius gives the significance of autumnal rain, or the early rain which begins to fall in Palestine about the middle of October.

have been known among the Jews (Prov. vii. 8-12, xxiii. 28; Ecclus. ix. 7, 8); the two women in 1 K. iii. 16 lived as Greek hetærae sometimes did, in a house together (Dict. Gr. & Rom. Ant. s. v. Hetaera). The baneful fascination ascribed to them in Prov. v., vi., vii., may be compared with what Chardin says of similar effects among the young nobility of Persia (Voyages en Perse, i. 163, ed. 1711), as also may Luke xv. 30, for the sums lavished on them (ib. p. 162). In earlier times the price of a kid is mentioned (Gen. xxxviii.), and great wealth doubtless sometimes accrued to them (Ezek. xvi. 33, 39; xxiii. 26). But lust, as distinct from gain, appears as the inducement in Prov. vii. 14, 15 (see Dougtæi Anal. Sacr. ad loc.), where the victim is further allured by a promised sacrificial banquet (cp. Ter. Eua. iii. 3). Some of the expressions in Prov. vii. 22-27, cp. v. 4, 5, seem to point to private assassination as an object, to which such women, used as a lure, were the means—a practice known to have recently prevailed among the Oriental Thugs. The “harlots” are classed with “publicans,” as those who lay under the ban of society, in the N. T. (Matt. xxi. 32). No doubt they multiplied with the increase of polygamy, and consequently lowered the estimate of marriage. The corrupt practices imported by Gentile converts into the Church occasion most of the other passages in which allusions to the subject there occur (1 Cor. v. 1, 9, 11; 2 Cor. xii. 21; 1 Thess. iv. 3; 1 Tim. i. 10). The decree in Acts xv. 29 has occasioned doubts as to the meaning of πορνεία there, chiefly from its context, which may be seen discussed at length in Deyling’s Observ. Sacr. ii. 470 sq.; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. i. 468; Spencer and Hammond, ad loc. The simplest sense, however, seems the most probable. The children of such persons were held in contempt, and could not exercise privileges nor inherit (John viii. 41; Deut. xxiii. 2; Judg. xi. 1, 2). On the general subject see Michaelis’ Laws of Moses, Bk. v. art. 268; Selden, de Uz. Heb. i. 16, iii. 12, and de Jur. Natur. v. 4; Schoettgen and the authorities quoted by him. [H. H.]

The words וָהִיגוֹת רָחֲצוּ, A. V. “and they washed his armour” (1 K. xxii. 38), should be (cp. R. V.) “now the harlots washed themselves there,” which is not only the natural rendering, but in accordance with the LXX. and Josephus.

HARNE’PHER (חַרְנֶפֶת); B. Ἀναρπάρ, A. Ἀναρπάρ; Harnapher), one of the sons of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch. vii. 36).

HARO’D, THE WELL OF (better “the spring of Charod,” i.e. “of the trembling,” חַרְדָּר; B. ἠραρδῆ, A. ἠραρδῆ “Ἰαεῖρ; fons qui vocatur Harad), a spring by (עַל) which Gideon and his great army encamped on the morning of the day which ended in the rout of the Midianites (Judg. vii. 1), and where the trial of the people by their mode of drinking apparently took place. The word, slightly altered, recurs in the proclamation to the host—“Whosoever is fearful and trembling (חַרְדָּר, chârêd) let him return” (v. 3): but it is impossible to decide whether the name Charod was, as Dean Stanley proposes, bestowed on account of the trembling, or whether the mention of the trembling was suggested by the previously existing name of the fountain: either would suit the paronomastic vein in which these ancient records so delight. The word chârêd (A. V. “was afraid”) recurs in the description of another event which took place in this neighbourhood, possibly at this very spot—Saul’s last encounter with the Philistines—when he “was afraid, and his heart trembled greatly,” at the sight of their fierce hosts (1 Sam. xviii. 5). The ‘Ain Jalûd, “spring of Goliath,” with which Dean Stanley would identify Harod (S. & P.), is very suitable to the circumstances, as being at present the largest spring in the neighbourhood, and as forming a pool of considerable size, at which great numbers might drink (Rob. ii. 323; cp. Guérin, Samarie, i. 308 sq.). But if at that time so copious, would it not have been seized by the Midianites before Gideon’s arrival? However, if the ‘Ain Jalûd be not this spring, we are very much in the dark, since the “hill of Moreh,” the only landmark afforded us (vii. 1), has not been recognised. The only hill of Moreh of which we have any certain knowledge was by Shechem, 25 miles to the south. If ‘Ain Jalûd be Harod, then Jebel Duhy must be Moreh. Riehm (s. c.) suggests that the spring may be identical with “the fountain that is in Jezreel” (1 Sam. xxix. 1). Conder (Tent Work, ii. 69) identifies it with ‘Ain el-Jem’ain, “spring of the two assemblies,” at the foot of the eastern slope of Mt. Gilboa.

Josephus (Ant. v. 6, § 3) seems to have believed that Gideon assembled his men east of Jordan, and tried them at “the river” that is at the Jordan, on the left bank of which they encamped before passing over.

It is quite possible that the name Jalûd is a corruption of Harod. In that case it is a good example of the manner in which local names acquire a new meaning in passing from one language to another. Harod itself probably underwent a similar process after the arrival of the Hebrews in Canaan, and the paronomastic turn given to Gideon’s speech, as above, may be an indication of the change. On the other hand Jalûd may be a corruption of the name Gilead, which seems to have been attached to a portion of the range of Gilboa (Judg. vii. 3); or it may have had its origin in a confusion between Taluth and Jaluth, the Arab names of Saul and Goliath. A curious tradition, perhaps due to this confusion, existed in the 4th century (Itin. Hierosol.), that David killed Goliath near Jezreel. During the Crusades ‘Ain Jalûd was known to the Franks as Tubania (Wm. of Tyre, xxii. 26). [G.] [W.]

HARO’DITE, THE (חַרְדָּרִי); B. δ’ Ρουδαῖος, A. δ’ Αρουδαῖος, Ἐνανὰ δ’ Αραδαῖος; de Harodi), the designation of two of the thirty-seven warriors of David’s guard, SHAMMAH and ELIKA (2 Sam. xxiii. 25), doubtless derived from a place named Harod, either that just spoken of or some other. In the parallel passage of Chronicles by a change of letter the name appears as HARORITE.

HARO’EH (חַרְאֵה), i.e. hâ-Rô’eh = the scor; B. Αἰώ, A. Ἀπαδ), a name occurring in the genealogical lists of Judah as one of the sons of

"Shobal, father of Kirjath-jearim" (1 Ch. ii. 52). The Vulg. translates this and the following words, qui vadobat dimidium requietionum. A somewhat similar name—REZIAH—is given in iv. 2 as the son of Shobal, but there is nothing to establish the identity of the two.

HARORITE, THE (הַרְוֹרִיתִי; B. δ' Ἀρί, A. Ὀαρί; Arorites), the title given to SHAMMOTH, one of the warriors of David's guard (1 Ch. xi. 27). We have here an example of the minute discrepancies which exist between these two parallel lists. In this case it appears to have arisen from an exchange of γ, D, for ρ, R, and that at a very early date, since the LXX. is in agreement with the present Hebrew text. But there are other differences, for which see SHAMMAH.

HAROSHETH (חַרְשֶׁת, Charosheth = working in wood, stone, &c., Ges.: B. Ἀραισάθ, A. Ἀρεισάθ; in v. 16, A. Ἐρυσάθ; Haroseth), or rather "Haroseth of the Gentiles," as it was called (probably for the same reason that Galilee was similarly defined afterwards), from the mixed races that inhabited it, was the residence of Sisera, captain of Jabin, king of Canaan (Judg. iv. 2), whose capital, Hazor, was one of the fenced cities assigned to the children of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36). It was from Haroseth that Sisera marched, with 900 chariots, when he heard that Barak was at Mount Tabor (Judg. iv. 13); and to the same place his discomfited host was pursued by the victorious Israelites (v. 16). Probably from intermarriage with the conquered Canaanites, the name of Sisera became afterwards a family name (Ezra ii. 53). Neither is it irrelevant to allude to this coincidence in connexion with the moral effects of this decisive victory; for Hazor, once "the head of all those kingdoms" (Josh. xi. 6, 10), had been taken and burnt by Joshua; its king, Jabin I., put to the sword; and the whole confederation of the Canaanites of the north broken and slaughtered in the celebrated battle of the waters of Merom (Josh. xi. 5-14)—the first time that "chariots and horses" appear in array against the invading host, and are so summarily disposed of, according to Divine command, under Joshua; but which subsequently the children of Joseph feared to face in the valley of Jezreel (Josh. xvii. 16-18), and which Judah actually failed before in the Philistine plain (Judg. i. 19). Herein was the great difficulty of subduing plains, similar to that beside which Haroseth stood. It was not till the Israelites had asked for and obtained a king, that they began "to multiply chariots and horses" to themselves, contrary to the express words of the Law (Deut. xvii. 16), as it were to fight the enemy with his own weapons. The first instance occurs in 2 Sam. viii. 4, cp. 1 Ch. xviii. 4; next in the histories of Absalom, 2 Sam. xv. 1, and of Adonijah, 1 K. i. 5; while the climax was reached under Solomon (1 K. iv. 26). And then it was that their decadence set in! They were strong in faith, when they hamstringed the horses, and burned the chariots with fire, of the kings of Hazor, of Madon, of Shimron, and of Achshaph (Josh. xi. 1). And yet so rapidly did they decline when their illustrious leader was no more, that the city of Hazor had risen from its ruins; and in contrast to the kings of Mesopotamia and of Moab (Judg. iii.), who were both of them foreign potentates, another Jabin, the territory of whose ancestors had been assigned to the tribe of Naphtali, claimed the distinction of being the first to revolt against and shake off the dominion of Israel in his newly acquired inheritance. But the victory won by Deborah and Barak was well worthy of the song of triumph which it inspired (Judg. v.), and of the proverbial celebrity which ever afterwards attached to it (Ps. lxxxiii. 9, 10). The whole territory was gradually won back, to be held permanently, as it would seem (Judg. iv. 24); at all events we hear nothing more of Hazor, Haroseth, or the Canaanites of the north, in the succeeding wars.

The site of Haroseth has not yet been certainly identified; but el-Hârûhiyeh, first proposed for it by Thomson (Land & Book, ii. 143), and accepted by Riehm (s. v.), Conder (Tent Work, i. 132), and Geikie (H. L. & the Bible, ii. 262), seems best to meet the requirements of the Bible narrative. El-Hârithiyeh, situated in the gorge of the Kishon, and commanding the road between the two plains of Acve and Esdraelon, must have been a place of great military importance, and one well adapted to be the head-quarters of the commander of the king of Canaan's army. Dr. Thomson supposes that Heber the Kenite was encamped on Esdraelon at the time of the battle, and mentions (l. c.) in support of this view, that, on one occasion, he met Bedawîn who had come down from the high ground north of Nazareth to pass the cold winter months on the plain. Conder (Tent Work, i. 133) identifying Kedesh with Kh. Kadîsh, near the sea of Galilee, and Zaanaim with Bessum, places Heber's camp on the basaltic plain, Sahel el-Ahna; but it seems scarcely probable that Sisera would have fled to a place in rear of the victorious Israelites. Stanley, who gives a graphic description of the battle (Jewish Church, i. 322 sq.), supposes Haroseth to have been in the north, "on the outskirts of Lebanon," and Sisera to have met his death, three days after the battle, on the plain near Kedesh Naphtali. But a more natural inference from the narrative (Judg. iv. v.) is that Sisera was killed on the day of the battle, and that the pursuit to Haroseth ended the same day. Tristram (Bib. Places, p. 278) identifies Haroseth with Tell Hara, on a hill above the el-Hûleh lake, near Kades. [E. S. Ff.] [W.]

HARP is the uniform rendering in the A. V. of the Hebrew Kinnôr (כִּנּוֹר), and is for the first time mentioned in Gen. iv. 21. Yet, although it is of all musical instruments the first named in the Bible, it would be a mistake to suppose that the Scriptures wished thereby to convey the idea that Kinnôr was the oldest musical instrument invented. On the contrary, in the nature of things, proceeding from the simple to the complicated, wind-instruments must have preceded instruments of percussion, as these again must have preceded stringed instruments. People first whistled, then sang, then blew, then beat, and finally touched strings with fingers, or plectron, or bow. [DANCE; FLUTE.]

* Kinnôr, though not the oldest musical instrument, by being a term for a contrivance from which all stringed instruments have successively sprung, has although of masculine gender itself, a feminine plural.

The shape as well as the size of the Kinnôr differed not only in different ages and different countries, but also on different occasions in the same age and the same country. In 1 Sam. x. 5 it is mentioned as one of the four musical instruments borne before the young prophets. This would show that Kinnôr was a portable instrument, whilst it would appear from the same book (xviii. 10) that it was an instrument of somewhat large proportions, as it had to be placed near a wall.

Although Kinnôr^b is uniformly rendered by the A. V. "harp," it is yet a question to be settled

whether it really means a "harp," or a "lute," or a "lyre," or a "psaltery," or a "guitar," &c. One of the Rabbis (Midrash Tehillim, lxxi. 3) identifies the Kinnôr with the "psaltery" (Nébel), the only difference between the two being the number of strings they respectively had. If this were true, it would show both great poverty of original invention, and great fertility in the modification of old inventions, in the time of David. For it must not be forgotten that there were four thousand musicians (1 Ch. xxiii. 5)

^b On the other hand, the Kinnôrôth 'Al-Hassemînîth (1 Ch. xv. 21) cannot signify harps with eight strings, or harpe on, or set to, the Shemînîth, as the Shemînîth is clearly a music-band (ALJELETH SEHAR), and the Kinnôrôth were only played by the music-masters to direct (לְיָדָם) this eighth band [ALAMOTH].

and probably many somewhat different musical instruments in existence at his time, and yet there are not twelve entirely different ones mentioned. Hence there must have been various kinds of Kinnôrôth, even as we positively know that there were at least ten kinds of Nebâtim, if not more, to which the expression "on the tenth Nebel" (בְּנֶבֶל עֲשׂוֹרָה, Ps. xxxiii. 2) clearly points. [This, of course, does not exclude the possibility of the "tenth Nebel" having had ten strings.]

King David must have been a musician of no mean order on various instruments, as appears from the Scriptures, but the Kinnôr was his favourite one. On it he composed his wonderful rhythmical Psalms, and on it he chiefly excelled. The Rabbis (Talmud Yerushalmi Berakhoth, i. 1; Babil ibidem, leaf 3 b) suggested his partiality for, and dexterity on, this instrument, by ascribing to his Kinnôr the virtues of an Aeolian harp, which played of its own accord under the influence of the "midnight air." [S. M. S.-S.]

HARROW. The word so rendered 2 Sam. xii. 31, 1 Ch. xx. 3 (חָרַר), is probably a threshing machine; the verb rendered "to harrow" (חָרַר, Job xxxix. 10), and "to break clods" (Is. xxviii. 24; Hos. x. 11), expresses apparently this latter process, and is so far analogous to our harrowing: but whether done by any such machine as we call "a harrow," is very doubtful. Possibly the instrument called מַטְוֶה, "mattock," in Is. vii. 25 (specially there for hill-culture), might have been used. In modern Palestine, oxen are sometimes turned in to trample the clods, and in some parts of Asia a bush of thorns is dragged over the surface; but all these processes, if used, occur (not after, but) before the seed is committed to the soil. This is clearly shown in Is. xxviii. 24, Hos. x. 11, where "plow" and "open and break clods" are distinguished in the earlier verse, and followed by "sow" in the next. [See AGRICULTURE.] [H. H.]

HAR'SHA (חַרְשָׁא, MV.¹¹ = deaf: in Neh. BNA. 'Aðaarv; in Ezra. BA. 'Aḥḥad: Harsa). Bene-Charsha, sons of Charsha, were among the families of Nethinim who came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54). In the parallel list in Esdras the name is CHAREA.

HARSITH, THE GATE (Jer. xix. 2, R. V.). In A. V. the text reads "east gate," marg. sun gate; R. V. marg. gate of potsherds. A gate of Jerusalem which led to Tophet (cp.

¹¹ חַרְשָׁא is, and cannot be anything else than, an ordinal. Genesis xxiv. 55 must therefore be translated thus: "And her brother and her mother said, Let the damsel abide with us a year or a (the) tenth part thereof." That חַרְשָׁא may, and often does, mean a year will be seen from Ex. xlii. 10; Lev. xxv. 29, &c. A few days are called in Hebrew יָמִים אַחֲרָיִם (Gen. xxix. 20).

HART, HIND (חַיָּל, חַיָּלָה 'ayyāl, 'ayyālāh; Arab. ايل, ايلة; ἄλαφος; cervus). All English versions, hart, hind—the male and female of the deer. The hart is mentioned incidentally among clean animals in Deut. xii. 15, and from the many allusions to it in O. T. must have been familiar to the Israelites. It is not mentioned in the lists of clean and unclean animals in Lev. or Deut.; for though well known in Egypt and Palestine, it could not exist in the Arabian desert, fitted only for antelopes, and not for deer. No species of deer, except the more diminutive roebuck, can be said to be common in Palestine at the present day, though the fallow deer, Cervus dama, L. (Dama vulgaris of later writers), is not quite extinct in the north. Hasselquist found it on Mount Tabor in the last century, and we once met with it in some wood not many miles N.W. of Safed. We believe there are still a few on the banks of the Litany river and in the wooded district behind Sidon. It must have been very common in ancient times, as it is the native deer of Asia Minor, Cilicia, the Southern Taurid, and Armenia, where in suitable cover we found it still abundant; and if our identification be correct, it is mentioned in 1 K. iv. 23, among the daily articles of food at king Solomon's table. Our English fallow deer, never found except semi-domesticated, are derived from Asia Minor; though the species is now found wild in Sardinia and Spain. It must have existed in the Lebanon in very early times, as its teeth have been found there in bone breccia, in caves along with those of other animals. It would be more easily exterminated than the antelopes or the wild goats, from its partiality for open glades, and the outskirts of forests.

The only other deer to which 'ayyāl can refer is the red deer, Cervus elaphus, L., of which we found the teeth in considerable abundance in the breccia of caverns in Lebanon. As however these were mingled with those of the reindeer (Cervus tarandus, L.) and the elk (Cervus alces, L.), they probably belong to the prehistoric period. But it should be noted that though no red deer is now found in Egypt or its frontiers, yet we find it depicted in the temples at Beni-Hassan; and a small race of red deer, which has been separated by zoologists as Cervus barbarus, Bennet, is still found in the Djereed in the south of Tunis, and in parts of Algeria and Morocco. It is probably this species which was known to the Egyptians, and it is the only one of the Deer family which exists in Africa. But there is no evidence that the Barbary deer ever extended east of the Nile.

Barbary deer.

The name Ajalon, given to more than one place in Palestine, means "the place of deer," and the many scriptural allusions to its habits show that the deer was familiar to the inspired writers. The first occurrence of the word in Scripture is in Jacob's blessing of his children: "Naphtali is a hind let loose" (Gen. xlix. 21), which has been explained as prophetic of the gallant conduct of that tribe when, under Barak, "Zebulun and Naphtali jeoparded their lives unto the death in the high places of the field." In the passage in Genesis the LXX. have evidently read אֵילָן לְעֵץ הָאֵילָן, and rendered it by στέλεχος ἀνείμνον, "a luxuriant terebinth," but in this they have not been followed by the Vulgate. The inscription to Ps. xxii., Aijeleth Shahar, translated in the margin as "the hind of the morning," has been supposed to refer to some tune or melody known by that name. [AIJELETH SHAHAR.]

Many characteristics of the deer are used as illustrations in the poetical Books of Scripture. Its swiftness: "Then shall the lame man leap as a hart" (Is. xxxv. 6). "Behold, he cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills. My beloved is like a roe or a young hart" (Cant. ii. 8, 9). Its surefootedness: "He maketh my feet like hinds' feet" (2 Sam. xxii. 34; Ps. xviii. 33; Hab. iii. 19). Its activity is the quality referred to in Jacob's blessing of Naphtali. Its gentle and affectionate disposition is taken by the wise man as an image of a tender wife: "Let her be as the loving hind" (Prov. v. 19). Its shyness and avoidance of the haunts of men (Job xxxix. 1) are noted, and its timidity, which causes it to cast its young at the sound of thunder (Ps. xxix. 9). Its maternal affection is used by Jeremiah to illustrate the dire pressure of famine upon Jerusalem, under the misery of which "the hind also calved in the field and forsook it, because there was no grass" (xiv. 5). As the deer could only obtain water at certain places in the wilderness, and those far off, so the Psalmist could only join in the ordinances of God at the Tabernacle, from which he was far distant: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God" (Ps. xlii. 1). All these traits correspond with the character of the fallow deer better than with that of any other. [H. B. T.]

HARU'M (הָרִים, ? = elevated; BA. 'Iapelm; Arum). A name occurring in one of the most obscure portions of the genealogies of Judah, in which Coz is said to have begotten "the families of Aharhel son of Harum" (1 Ch. iv. 8).

HARU'MAPH (הָרִימָפִּי = slit-nosed, Ges.; B. 'Ερωμᾶθ, A. -φ, N. Εἰρωμᾶθ; Haromaph), father or ancestor of Jedaiah, who assisted in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

HARU'PHITE, THE (הַרְפִּיטִי; B. δ Χαρῆφει, A. 'Αροφί; Haruphites), the designation of Shephatiah, one of the Korhites who repaired to David at Ziklag when he was in distress (1 Ch. xii. 5). The Masorets read the word Hariphite, and point it accordingly, 'הָרִיפִי. [HARIPH.] The town of Haruph is perhaps represented by Kh. Kharúf, south of 'Aid el-Má, Adullam (PEF. Mem. iii. 313).

HA'RUZ (הָרִיזִי = zealous; 'Apoüs; Harus), a man of Jotbah, father of Meshullemeth, queen of Manasseh, and mother of AMON king of Judah (2 K. xxi. 19).

HARVEST. [AGRICULTURE.]

HASADI'AH (הָסַדִּיָּה; B. 'Ασαδία, A. 'Ασαβαεῖδ'; Hasadia), one of a group of five persons among the descendants of the royal line of Judah (1 Ch. iii. 20), apparently sons of Zerubbabel, the leader of the return from Babylon. It has been conjectured that this latter half of the family was born after the restoration, since some of the names, and amongst them this one—beloved of Jehovah—appear to embody the hopeful feeling of that time. [ASADIAS.]

HASENU'AH (הָסֵנֻיָּה, i.e. has-Senu'ah = the hated; B. 'Ασνᾶ, A. 'Ασανοῦα; Asana), a Benjamite, of one of the chief families in the tribe (1 Ch. ix. 7). The name is really Senuah, with the definite article prefixed.

HASHABI'AH (הַשְּׁבִיָּה, and with final ú, הַשְּׁבִיָּה; Hasabias, Hasabia, Hasobias, Hasebia), a name signifying regarded of Jehovah, much in request among the Levites, especially at the date of the return from Babylon.

1. A Merarite Levite, son of Amaziah, in the line of Ethan the singer (1 Ch. vi. 45, Hebr. v. 30; B. 'Ασβεβί, A. -ι).

2. Another Merarite Levite (1 Ch. ix. 14; B. 'Ασβιδ, A. -βιου).

3. CHASHABIAHU: another Levite, the fourth of the six sons of Jeduthun (the sixth is omitted here, but is supplied in v. 17), who played the harp in the service of the house of God under David's order (1 Ch. xiv. 3; B. 'Ασαβιά, A. -ias), and had charge of the twelfth course (v. 19).

4. CHASHABIAHU: one of the Hebronites, i.e. descendants of Hebron the son of Kohath, one of the chief families of the Levites (1 Ch. xxvi. 30; BA. 'Ασαβίας). He and the 1700 men of his kindred had superintendence for king David over business both sacred and secular on the west^a of Jordan. Possibly this is the same person as

5. The son of Kemuel, who was "prince" (שׂר) of the tribe of Levi in the time of David (1 Ch. xxvii. 17; BA. 'Ασαβίας).

6. CHASHABIAHU: another Levite, one of the "chiefs" (שׂר) of his tribe, who officiated for king Josiah at his great Passover-Feast (2 Ch. xxxv. 9; BA. 'Ασαβιά). In the parallel account of 1 Esdras the name appears as ASSABIAS.

7. A Merarite Levite who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 19; B. 'Ασεβεία, A. -ia). In 1 Esdras the name is ASEBIA.

8. One of the chiefs of the priests (and therefore of the family of Kohath) who formed part of the same caravan (Ezra viii. 24; B. 'Ασαβιά, A. ^{vid} Ζαβία). In 1 Esdras the name is ASSANIAS.

9. "Ruler" (שׂר) of half the circuit or environs (קְרִיב) of Keilah; he repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 17; BKA. 'Ασαβιά).

10. One of the Levites who sealed the covenant of reformation after the return from the Captivity (Neh. x. 11; B. om., N^{ca}ms A. 'Εσεβίας). Probably this is the person named as one of the "chiefs" (שׂר) of the Levites in the times immediately subsequent to the return from Babylon (xii. 24; cp. v. 26).

11. Another Levite, son of Bunni (Neh. xi. 15; BA. om., N^{ca}ms sup 'Ασαβίας). Notwithstanding the remarkable correspondence between the lists in this chapter and those in 1 Ch. ix.—and in none more than in this verse compared with 1 Ch. ix. 14—it does not appear that they can be identical, inasmuch as this relates to the times after the Captivity, while that in Chronicles refers to the original establishment of the Ark at Jerusalem by David, and of the Tabernacle (cp. vv. 19, 21, and the mention of Gibeon, where the Tabernacle was at this time, in v. 35). But see NEHEMIAH.

12. Another Levite in the same list of attendants on the Temple; son of Mattaniah (Neh. xi. 22; B. 'Ασαβιά, N. -εια).

13. A priest of the family of Hilkiah in the days of Joiakim son of Jeshua; that is, in the generation after the return from the Captivity (Neh. xii. 21, om. BKA., N^{ca}ms inf 'Ασαβίας; cp. vv. 1, 10, 26).

HASHAB'NAH (הַשָּׁבְנָה); BA. 'Εσαβαρά [see Swete in loco]; Hasebna, one of the chief

^a This is one of the instances in which the word 'eber (beyond) is used for the west side of Jordan. To remove the anomaly, the A. V. has rendered it "on this side" (R. V. "beyond").

^b This and the name following are considered by Olshausen (Lehrb. d. Heb. Sprache, § 277 h) as forms of חַשְׁבִּיָּהוּ (HASHABIAHU).—[F.]

("heads") of the "people" (i.e. the laymen) who sealed the covenant at the same time with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 25).

HASHABNIAH (הַשָּׁבְנִיָּה); B. 'Ασαβαράμ, A. 'Ασβαρία; Hasebonia. 1. Father of Hattush, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

2. Hasebnia. A Levite who was among those who officiated at the great fast under Ezra and Nehemiah when the covenant was sealed (Neh. ix. 5). This and several other names are omitted in the LXX.

HASHBADA'NA (הַשְּׁבַדָּנָה), see Olshausen, Lehrb. § 277, k. 4; B. om., A. 'Ασαβαράμ, N^{ca}ms 'Ασαβδανά; Habsadana, one of the men (probably Levites) who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the Law to the people in Jerusalem (Neh. viii. 4).

HA'SHEM (הַשֵּׁם); BKA. om., A. 'Ασάμ; Assem). The sons of Hasheem are named amongst the members of David's guard in the catalogue of 1 Ch. (xi. 34). In the parallel list of 2 Sam. xxiii. 32, we find "the sons of Jashen." The text is corrupt, and is variously restored by Driver (Heb. Text of the BB. of Sim. l. c.), and by Kennicott (Dissertation, pp. 198-203).

HASHMAN'NIM (הַשְּׁמַנִּים) = fat ones; πρέσβεις; legati. This word only occurs in the Hebrew of Ps. lxxviii. 31: "Princes [hashman-nim] shall come out of Egypt; Ethiopia [Cush] shall haste to stretch out her hands unto God" (R. V.). This has been thought to be an Egyptian word, but the idea must now be abandoned in favour of the rendering of the A. V. and R. V. [R. S. F.]

HASHMO'NAH (הַשְּׁמוֹנָה) = fruitfulness; B. Σελωνά, A. 'Ασελωνά; Hesmona, a station of the Israelites, mentioned Num. xxxiii. 29, as next before Moseroth, which, from xx. 28 and Deut. x. 6, was near Mount Hor; this tends to indicate the locality of Hashmonah. Palmer (Desert of the Exodus, ii. 509) takes Hashmonah to be the same as Heshmon (Josh. xv. 21), and locates it in the mountains of the 'Azázimoh; but this is too far from Mount Hor. [H. H.] [W.]

HASHU'B (הַשֻּׁב), i.e. Chashshüb = intelligent; 'Ασούβ; Asub). The reduplication of the Sh has been overlooked in the A. V., but retained by the R. V., and the name is identical with that elsewhere more correctly given as HASSHUB.

1. A son of Pahath-Moab who assisted in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 11).

2. Another man who assisted in the same work, but at another part of the wall (Neh. iii. 23).

3. The name is mentioned again among the heads of the "people" (that is, the laymen) who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 23). It may belong to either of the foregoing.

4. A Merarite Levite (Neh. xi. 15). In 1 Ch. ix. 14, he appears again as HASSHUB.

HASHU'BAH (הַשֻּׁבָּה) = esteemed; B. 'Ασουβέ, A. 'Ασεβί; Hasaba), the first of a group of five men, apparently the latter half of the family of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. iii. 20). For a suggestion concerning these persons, see HASADIAH.

HAS' SHUM (חֲשׂוּם) = rich, distinguished: B. 'ΑΣέμ, A. (Ezra) 'Ασούμ; B. 'Ησάμ, A. -ι (Neh.): Hasum, Hasom, Hasom. 1. Bene-Chashum, two hundred and twenty-three in number, came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 19; Neh. vii. 22). Seven men of them had married foreign wives, from whom they had to separate (Ezra x. 33). The chief man of the family was among those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 18).

2. (A. 'ΑΣόμ, B. omits; Asum.) The name occurs amongst the priests or Levites who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the Law to the congregation (Neh. viii. 4). In 1 Esd. ix. 44 the name is given corruptly as LOTHASUBUS.

HASHU'PHA (ἄσφρα) = uncovered; B. 'Ασφά, ἸΑ. 'Ασειφά; Hasupha, one of the families of Nethinim who returned from captivity in the first caravan (Neh. vii. 46). The name is accurately HASUPHA, as in Ezra ii. 43. [ASIPHA.]

HAS'RAH (ἡσρά) ; B. Χελλής, A. 'Εσσερή; Hasra, the form in which the name HARHAS is given in 2 Ch. xxxiv. 22 (cp. 2 K. xxii. 14).

HASSENA'AH (ἡσσηνά) ; B. 'Ασάν, Ἰ. 'Ασανδα, A. 'Ασανά; Asnaa. The Benè-hassena'ah, "sons of Hassenaah," rebuilt the fish-gate in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 3). The name is doubtless that of the place mentioned in Ezra ii. 35, and Neh. vii. 38—SENAAH, with the addition of the definite article. Perhaps it has some connexion with the rock or cliff SENEH (1 Sam. xiv. 4).

HASSHU'B (ἡσσηβ) = intelligent; 'Ασώβ; Assub, a Merarite Levite (1 Ch. ix. 14). He appears to be mentioned again in Neh. xi. 15, in what may be a repetition of the same genealogy; but here the A. V. has given the name as HASHUB.

HASU'PHA (ἄσφρα) = uncovered; B. 'Ασουφέ, A. -ά; Hasupha. Benè-Chasuphā were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 43). In Nehemiah the name is inaccurately given in the A. V. HASHUPHA; in Esdras it is ASIPHA.

HAT. [HEAD-DRESS.]

HATA'CH (ἡτάχ) ; B. 'Αχραβαίος; Athach, one of the eunuchs (A. V. and R. V. "chamberlains") in the court of Ahasuerus, in immediate attendance on Esther (Esth. iv. 5, 6, 9, 10). The LXX. alters v. 5 to τὸν εὐνοῦχον ἀτῆς.

HATHA'TH (ἡθάθ) = fearful; 'Αθάθ; Hathat, a man in the genealogy of Judah: one of the sons of Othniel the Kenizzite, the well-known judge of Israel (1 Ch. iv. 13).

HATIP'HA (ἡτίφα) ? = captivity: B. 'Ατουφά, A. 'Ατιφά; in Neh. ἸΑ. 'Ατειφά; Hatipha).

Bene-Chatipha were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 54; Neh. vii. 56). [ΑΤΙΦΑ.]

HAT'ITA (ἡτίτα) : A. 'Ατιτά; in Ezra, B. 'Ατηρά, in Neh. B. 'Ατειρά; Hatita. Bene-Chatita were among the "porters" or "children of the porters" (חַיְתָּוּיִם, i. e. the gate-keepers), a division of the Levites who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45). In Esdras the name is abbreviated to TETA.

HAT'TIL (ἡτίλ) : in Ezra, B. 'Ατειά, in Neh. B. 'Εγγήλ; in Ezra, A. 'Ατιλά, in Neh. 'Εττήλ; Hatūl. Bene-Chattil, "sons of C.," were among the "children of Solomon's slaves" who came back from Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59). [HAGIA.]

HAT'TUSH (ἡτίτση) ; B. Χαττούς, A. Χερ; Hattus. 1. A descendant of the kings of Judah, apparently one of the "sons of Shechaniah" (1 Ch. iii. 22), in the fourth or fifth generation from Zerubbabel. A person of the same name, expressly specified as one of the "sons of David of the sons of Shechaniah," accompanied Ezra on his journey from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 2), whither Zerubbabel himself had also come only seventy or eighty years before (Ezra ii. 1, 2). Indeed in another statement Hattush is said to have actually returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 2). At any rate he took part in the sealing of the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 4). To obviate the discrepancy between these last-mentioned statements and the interval between Hattush and Zerubbabel in 1 Ch. iii., Lord A. Hervey proposes to read the genealogy in that chapter as if he were the nephew of Zerubbabel, Shemaiah in v. 22 being taken as identical with Shimei in v. 19. For these proposals the reader is referred to Lord H.'s Genealogies, pp. 103, 307, 322, &c. [LETTUS; SHECHANIAH.]

2. (B. 'Αρούς, A. Αἰρούς.) Son of H-shabniah; one of those who assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

HAURAN (ἡώραν; Ἀβραῦνις; the modern Arabic حوران). Gesenius derives it from הור, "a cave," but possibly the meaning is "hollow" or "vale". This word only occurs in Ezek. xlvii. 16, 18, as the name of a region. It was the eastern part of Bashan joining GOLAN (which see), and formed one of the four provinces north of Gilead, which Josephus enumerates as Auranitis, Trachonitis, Gaulanitis, and Batanea (Wars, i. 20, § 4), now called the districts of Haurán, Lejja, Jaulán, and El Butein. It was part of the tetrarchy of Philip (Luke iii. 1; Josephus, Ant. xvii. 11, § 4). The name seems to occur in its Hebrew form in the Mishna (Rosh hash-Shanah, ii. 4), and was never lost, being well known to the Arab geographers and to the Crusaders.

The passage in Ezekiel is somewhat difficult of translation; it appears to draw the boundary of the land of Israel between (דמשק) Damascus on the one side, and Hauran and Gilead on the other (see the rendering of the R. V.).

The Hauran is a level plain of rich volcanic arable soil, still celebrated for its corn, but having little natural supply of water. In the Roman period it supported a large population, and it contains a great number of ruined sites of cities and villages dating from the 2nd to the 6th century A.D. The theory that these are "giant cities" of the time of the Hebrew conquest has no foundation: the remains are not superior in size to those of the same period found in other parts of Palestine and Syria, and the age of the buildings is attested with unusual exactitude by the dates giving often the day of the month as well as the year of their erection. Of these Greek inscriptions no less than twenty are known within the limits of the Haurân, and a yet larger number in other parts of Bashan (see Waddington, Inscriptions Grecques et Latines de la Syrie, Nos. 2392-2413). The earliest belong to the time of Herod the Great; the latest perhaps is a Christian text of 641 A.D. at the monastery of Job, in the traditional "land of Uz," which was in the 4th century supposed to be in the Hauran, though clearly placed in Edom by the O. T. account. Nothing is known of the condition of this region before the Christian era, with the exception of the names of certain of its towns mentioned in the Book of Joshua. The region is enumerated with Beth Ammon, Edom, Moab, and Zobah on Cylinder A of the Annals of Assurbani-pal. It was conquered in 13 A.H. by the Moslems, and its period of civilized prosperity seems then to have passed away. It is described in Burckhardt's Travels and in the works of De Vogüé and Waddington, and has also been well described by G. Schumacher (Across the Jordan) in 1886, though his journey did not extend to the eastern part of the region, which has, however, been frequently visited, and is fairly well known. The name is often loosely applied to the whole of Bashan, which included the four provinces named above; but the strict application is to the eastern part of the plain—east of the Jaulân. Wetzstein's Reisebericht über den Haurân, 1860, is one of the best books on the subject, and Graham's tour is given in the Journal of the Royal Geographical Society, xxviii. 226-263. The buildings standing in ruins in the cities are well given in the plates of De Vogüé's Syrie Centrale, and many of these, including Herod's temple at Si'ah, he discovered in 1862.

The Hauran is remarkable for its subterranean buildings, which are usually some 10 or 12 yards in length by about 6 in breadth, and 10 ft. high, often forming cave villages difficult of access. The name of the region may perhaps be derived from them, for they are mentioned very early in a Greek text from Canatha (Waddington, 2329), which includes the words, "King Agrippa, friend of Caesar and friend of the Romans, says . . . of a life like that of wild beasts . . . I know not how till now in many parts of the country dwelling in caves . . ." This custom is, however, not altogether peculiar to the Haurân. Dolmens and other rude stone monuments occur in the Haurân as in the Jaulân, and in Gilead and Moab, which are probably of high antiquity. The modern villages are poor and small, but the region being 1500 to 2000 feet above the sea, is healthy, with a dry air and a constant breeze from the sea. The inhabitants are mainly Druses or nomadic Arab tribes (see BASHAN). [C. R. C.]

HAVENS, FAIR. [FAIR HAVENS.]

HAVILAH (הַבִּילָה); Ḓēbilāt, Ḓēbilāt, Ḓēbilād, Ḓēbilād; Havilā. 1. "The Land of the Havilah;" a region famed for its products of fine gold, "bdellium," and "onyx stone," and surrounded by the river Pison (Gen. ii. 11, 12). [EDEN.]

2. One of the five sons of Cush the son of Ham (Gen. x. 7; 1 Ch. i. 9). Cush is the Assyrian Kūsu, Kūshu; that is, Upper Egypt, including Meroë or Ethiopia.

3. One of the thirteen sons of Joktan, a descendant of Shem (Gen. x. 29; 1 Ch. i. 23). The seats of the Joktanites appear to have lain along the west and south sides of the great peninsula of Arabia, where some of their tribal names, notably Sheba and Hazarmaveth, the Arabic Hadhramaut and Sabā, are identified with certainty. This agrees fairly well with the datum of Gen. xxv. 18, where Havilah appears as the south-eastern limit of the Ishmaelite Arabs; and with that of 1 Sam. xv. 7, where, however, the reading is doubtful.*

That we should find indications of kindred stocks on the opposite sides of a narrow sea like the Arabian Gulf is not, perhaps, remarkable. The existence of a Cushite or African Havilah and Joktanite or Arabian Havilah may be taken as evidence of an early connexion between the peoples thus known by a common designation. But when we come to ask whether that name itself can be identified in later geography, we are somewhat embarrassed by the number of suggestions offered by modern writers. Bochart thought of خولان, Khaulân; a district in Tihāmah, midway between Sana'a and Mecca. K. Niebuhr (Beschr. von Arabien, S. 270) and J. D. Michaelis (Spicileg. 202; Suppl. 685) agree with him.^b Gesenius (Thesaur. s. v.) is for Strabo's Χαυλοταῖος, the Chauloteans, who were neighbours of the Nabataeans and Hagarenes in Northern Arabia. The uniform spelling of the Septuagint may, however, indicate that the initial sound of the Hebrew הַבִּילָה was the soft heth (ח), rather than the harsh cheth (ח).

Ḓēbilād or Ḓēbilād may be contrasted with spellings like Χεβρών. This suggestion derives some support from the fact that the Arabic Version has حَوِيلَا, Ḓawilā, with the soft letter (ح) in Gen. x. 29; 1 Sam. xv. 7. The name of the town حويلة, Huailah, in the district of Lahsā or Hag'ar, on the Persian Gulf, would therefore agree better with the Hebrew Havilah, with which, indeed, Kautzsch has compared it (Riehm, s. v. Havila). But this point perhaps lies too far to the east for a Joktanite settlement. No clear trace of the name Havilah has yet been found in the cuneiform inscriptions.

* Wellhausen proposes Telaim, comparing 1 Sam. xxvii. 8.

^b Niebuhr, referring to Gen. x. 7 and xxv. 18, observes that "this little district" of Khaulân was apparently the Havilah of the Cushites and "the southern border of the Ishmaelites" (p. 270). He also mentions another small district of the same name, situate a few miles S.E. of Sana'a, which he thinks may have been the Havilah of Gen. x. 29.

A remarkable notice in Jacut's Mu'g'am (vol. iii. p. 636) states that حويل, Hawil, was the dialect spoken by "the descendants of Midian, the son of Abraham," and by the people of مهرة, Mahrah, the well-known district situate to the east of Hadhramaut. This looks like an unquestionable relic of the ancient name Havilah.

The Cushite Havilah, on the other hand, appears to have survived in the classical Aualitæ (Ptol. iv. 7; Plin. vi. 28); a people with a town Aualis, now زيلة, Zeila, on the African coast, south of the straits of Bab-el-Mandeb. As Gesenius points out, this may have been the opinion of Saadiah, who transcribes حويلة by زويلة, Zawilah, in Gen. ii. 11, x. 7, xxv. 18; cp. 1 Ch. i. 9, 23. [C. J. B.]

HA'VOTH-JA-IR, R. V. HAVVOTH-JA-IR (חַיִּיתַי יַרְדֵּן, s.e. Chavvoth Jair, "villages of J.;" ἑωάδεις and κόμμαι 'Iatp, Θαυάθ; vicus, Avoth Jair, viculus Jair), certain villages on the east of Jordan, in Gilead or Bashan. The word Chavvah, which occurs in the Bible in this connexion only, is perhaps best explained by the similar term in modern Arabic, which denotes a small collection of huts or hovels in a country place (see the citations in Gesenius, Thez. p. 451; and Stanley, S. & P., App. § 84).

(1.) The earliest notice of the Havvoth-jair is in Num. xxxii. 41, in the account of the settlement of the Transjordanic country, where Jair, son of Manasseh, is stated to have taken some villages (A. V. "the small towns," R. V. "the towns") of Gilead—which was allotted to his tribe—and to have named them after himself, Havvoth-jair. (2.) In Deut. iii. 14 (R. V.) it is said that Jair "took all the region of Argob, unto the border of the Geshurites and the Maacathites; and called them, even Bashan, after his own name, Havvoth-jair." (3.) In the records of Manasseh in Josh. xiii. 30, and 1 Ch. ii. 23 (A. V., in both "towns of Jair"), the Havvoth-jair are reckoned with other districts as making up sixty "cities" (שָׁרִיט). In 1 K. iv. 13 they are named as part of the commissariat district of Ben-geber, next in order to the "sixty great cities" of Argob. They had evidently become more important, as has been the case in our own country with more than one place still designated as a "hamlet," though long since a populous town. (4.) No less doubtful is the number of the Havvoth-jair. In 1 Ch. ii. 22 they are specified as twenty-three, but in Judg. x. 4, as thirty. In the latter passage, however, the allusion is to a second Jair, by whose thirty sons they were governed, and for whom the original number may have been increased. The word עִירִים, "cities," is perhaps employed here for the sake of the play which it affords with עִירִים, "asscolts." [JAIR; BASHAN-HAVOTH-JAIR.]

[G.] [W.]

HAWK (נֶשֶׁךְ, nēs; λέπαξ; accipiter), the translation of the above-named Hebrew term, which occurs in Lev. xi. 16 and Deut. xiv. 15 as one of the unclean birds, and in Job xxxix. 26, where it is asked, "Doth the nēs fly by thy wisdom and stretch her wings towards the south?" This may apply either to the migratory habits of many of the smaller birds of prey, or to their power of flying right in the sun's eye without being dazzled by its rays. The ancients believed this to be a power peculiar to eagles and hawks (Aelian, H. A. x. 14). Pliny believed that all hawks except one were migratory (x. 9). In this, however, he was in error. Moreover many species are residents in one country and migrants in another. The commonest of the smaller raptorial birds in Palestine is the kestrel, Tinnunculus alaudarius (Gm.), identical with our common but very beautiful English bird. In the Jordan valley and in the Eastern forests, among the ruins of Rabbath Ammon and Gerash, in the desolate gorges of the Dead Sea up to the confines of the Southern deserts, among the luxuriant gardens of the coast and in the sacred recesses of the mosques of Hebron and Jerusalem, it equally abounds. It is generally gregarious, ten or twenty pairs nesting in the same ruins. It often builds in the recesses of caverns occupied by griffons, and is the only bird which the eagles appear to admit as close neighbours. Another very pretty species is the lesser kestrel (Tinnunculus cenchris, Naum.), always distinguished by the natives, and, unlike the last, only a spring and summer resident. It lives in large colonies often in the towns, as in the roofs of the old quarried caves at Nazareth, or in the towers of mosques and churches. It feeds entirely on insects, and may be seen towards evening in the open glades, or in the lanes between the gardens about villages, catching cockchafers in its claws on the wing. It is distinguished by its white claws. The word nets is doubtless generic, as appears from the expression in Deut. and Lev. "after his kind," and includes various other species of the smaller Falconidae, such as the sparrow-hawk (Accipiter nisus, L.), which is very common in the country districts, and a permanent resident; the rarer Levant sparrow-hawk (Accipiter brevipes, Sev.), the black-shouldered hawk (Elanus caerulcus, Desf.), the hobby (Fulco subbuteo, L.), the merlin (Falco aesalon, Tunst.), Eleonora's falcon (F. eleonorae, Géné), and a few other rarer visitors. Besides the above-named smaller hawks, the two magnificent species, F. saker and F. lanarius, are summer visitors to Palestine. On one occasion, while riding with an Arab guide, I observed a falcon of large size rise close to us. The guide, when I pointed it out to him, exclaimed, "Tair Saqr." Tair, the Arabic for "bird," is universally throughout N. Africa and the East applied to those falcons which are capable of being trained for hunting, i.e. "the bird," par excellence. These two species of falcons, and perhaps the hobby and goshawk (Astur palumbarius), are employed by the Arabs in Syria and Palestine for the purpose of taking partridges, sand-grouse, quails, herons, gazelles, hares, &c. Dr. Russell (Nat. Hist. of Aleppo,² ii. p. 196) has given the Arabic names of several falcons, but it is probable that some at least of these names apply rather to the different sexes than to distinct species. See a very graphic description of the sport of falconry, as pursued by the Arabs of N. Africa, in the Ibis, i. p. 284; and cp. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 208.

Falco saker.

Whether falconry was pursued by the ancient Orientals or not, is a question we have been unable to determine decisively. No representation of such a sport occurs on the monuments of ancient Egypt (see Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 221), neither is there any definite allusion to falconry in the Bible. With regard, however, to the negative evidence supplied by the monuments of Egypt, we must be careful ere we draw a conclusion; for the camel is not represented, though we have Biblical evidence to show that this animal was used by the Egyptians as early as the time of Abraham; still, as instances of various modes of capturing fish, game, and wild animals are not unfrequent on the monuments, it seems probable the art was not known to the Egyptians. Nothing definite can be learnt from the passage in 1 Sam. xxvi. 20, which speaks of "a partridge hunted on the mountains," as this may allude to the method of taking these birds by "throw-sticks," &c. [PARTRIDGE.] The hind or hart "panting after the water-brooks" (Ps. xlii. 1) may appear at first sight to refer to the mode at present adopted in the East of taking gazelles, deer, and bustards, with the united aid of falcon and greyhound; but, as Hengstenberg (Comment. on Ps. l. c.) has argued, it seems pretty clear that the exhaustion spoken of is to be understood as arising not from pursuit, but from some prevailing drought, as in Ps. lxxiii. 1, "My soul thirsteth for Thee in a dry land" (see also Joel i. 20). The poetical version of Tate and Brady—

BIBLE DICT.—VOL. I.

"As pants the hart for cooling streams
When heated in the chase."

has therefore somewhat prejudged the matter. For the question as to whether falconry was known to the ancient Greeks, see Beckmann, History of Inventions (i. 198-205, Bohn's ed.). [W. H.] [H. B. T.]

HAY (חַיִּשׁ, chāšir; ἐν τῷ πεδίῳ χλωρός, χόπρος; prata, herba), the rendering of the A. V. in Prov. xxvii. 25, and Is. xv. 6, of the above-named Heb. term, which occurs frequently in the O. T., and denotes "grass" of any kind, from an unused root, "to be green." [GRASS.] In Num. xi. 5, this word is properly translated "leeks." [LEEK.] Harmer (Observat. i. 425, ed. 1797), quoting from a MS. paper of Sir J. Chardin, states that hay is not made anywhere in the East, and that the foenum of the Vulg. (alis locis) and the "hay" of the A. V. are therefore errors of translation. It is true that the modern Orientals do not make hay in our sense of the term; but they do mow thin grass with a scythe, and that both when withered and green, and lay it up in heaps for future use. I have often seen a considerable quantity thus piled up. The ancients did the same, as we see from Ps. xxxvii. 2, "They shall soon be cut down (שָׁבַע), and wither as the green herb;" Ps. lxxii. 6, "Like rain upon the mown grass" (יָבֵשׁ). See also Amos vii. 1, "The king's mowings" (חֲבֵשׁ); and Ps. cxxix. 7, where of the "grass upon the housetops" (Poa annua?) it is said that "the reaper (חַבֵּשׁ) filleth not his hand" with it, "nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom." We do not see therefore, with the author of Fragments in Continuation of Calmet (No. clxxviii.), any gross impropriety in our version of Prov. xxvii. 25, or in that of Is. xv. 6. "Certainly," says this writer, "if the tender grass is but just beginning to show itself, the hay, which is grass cut and dried after it has arrived at maturity, ought by no means to be associated with it, still less ought it to be placed before it." But (accepting the A. V. translation) where is the impropriety? The tender grass (חֲבֵשׁ) may refer to the springing after-grass, and the "hay" to the hay-grass. However, in the two passages in question, where alone the A. V. renders chāšir by "hay," the word would certainly be better translated by "grass" (R. V. marg.). We may remark that there is an express Hebrew term for "dry grass" or "hay," viz. chāshāsh,^b which, apparently from an unused root signifying "to be dry," is ^a The hay appeareth (R. V. "is carried"), and the tender grass sheweth itself, and herbs of the mountains are gathered" (Prov. xxvii. 25).

^b חֲשִׁישׁ, allied to the Arabic حَشِيش (cheshish), which Freytag thus explains, "Herba, peculi. siccor: scil. Papulum siccum, foenum (ut رطب viride et recens)."

^c The Arabs of the desert always call the dry juiceless herbage of the Sahara, which is ready-made hay while it is growing, cheshish, in contradistinction to the fresh grass of better soils.—[H. B. T.]

rendered in the only two places where the word occurs (Is. v. 24 [R. V. "dry grass"], xxxiii. 11) "chaff" in the English Versions. We do not, however, mean to assert that the chashash of the Orientals represents our modern English hay. The "dry grass" was not stacked, but only cut in small quantities, and then consumed. The grass of "the latter growth after the king's mowings" (Amos vii. 1) or second crop (שָׂבִיב), like our after-grass, denotes the mown grass as it grows afresh after the first cutting; like the Chordum foenum of Pliny (N. H. viii. 28). [W. H.] [H. B. T.]

HAZAE'EL (חֲזַאֵל = God hath seen; Ἀζαήλ; Hazaël) was a king of Damascus, who reigned from about B.C. 886 to B.C. 840. He appears to have been previously a person in a high position at the court of Benhadad, and was sent by his master to Elisha, when that prophet visited Damascus, to inquire if he would recover from the malady under which he was suffering. Elisha's answer that Benhadad would surely recover, but that he would also surely die, and his announcement to Hazael that he would one day be king of Syria, which seems to have been the fulfilment of the commission given to Elijah (1 K. xix. 15) to appoint Hazael king, led to the murder of Benhadad by his ambitious servant, who forthwith mounted the throne (2 K. viii. 7-15. See BENHADAD). He was soon engaged in hostilities with Ahaziah king of Judah, and Jehoram king of Israel, for the possession of the city of Ramoth-Gilead (ibid. viii. 28). The Assyrian inscriptions show that about this time a bloody and destructive war was being waged between the Assyrians on the one side, and the Syrians, Hittites, Hamathites, and Phoenicians on the other. [See DAMASCUS.] Benhadad had recently suffered several severe defeats at the hands of the Assyrian king, Shalmaneser II.; and upon the accession of Hazael the war was speedily renewed. Hazael took up a position in the fastnesses of the Anti-Libanus, but was there attacked by the Assyrians, who defeated him with great loss, killing 16,000 of his warriors, and capturing 1121 chariots, with his camp. Hazael fled, and was besieged by Shalmaneser in Damascus. Three years later the Assyrians once more entered Syria in force, and took possession of some of his strongholds. After this, internal troubles appear to have occupied the attention of the Assyrians, who made no more expeditions into these parts for about a century. The Syrians rapidly recovered their losses; and towards the close of the reign of Jehu, Hazael led them against the Israelites (about B.C. 860), whom he "smote in all their coasts" (2 K. x. 32), thus accomplishing the prophecy of Elisha (ibid. viii. 12). His main attack fell upon the eastern provinces, where he ravaged "all the land of Gilead, the Gadites, and the Reubenites, and the Manassites, from Aroer, which is by the river Arnon [R. V. "by the valley of Arnon"], even Gilead and Bashan" (ibid. x. 33). After this he seems to have held the kingdom of Israel in a species of subjection (ibid. xiii. 3-7, and 22); and towards the close of his life he even threatened the kingdom of Judah. Having taken Gath (ibid. xii. 17; cp. Amos

i. 2), he proceeded to attack Jerusalem, defeated the Jews in an engagement (2 Ch. xxiv. 24), and was about to assault the city, when Joash induced him to retire by presenting him with "all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and in the king's house" (2 K. xii. 18). Hazael appears to have died about the year B.C. 840 (ibid. xiii. 24), having reigned 46 years. He left his crown to his son Benhadad (2 K. xiii. 3). His "house" at Damascus is alluded to in Amos i. 4, probably as a well-known or beautiful palace. [G. R.] [T. G. P.]

HAZAI'AH (חֲזַיָּאִי = Jah hath seen; Β. Ὁζαΐδ, A. -la; Haziã), a man of Judah of the family of the Shilonites (R. V.; A. V. "Shiloni"), or descendants of SHELAH (Neh. xi. 5).

HAZAR-ADDAR, &c. [HAZER.]

HAZAR-MA'VETH (חֲזַר מַאֲוֶתַי = the court of death, Ges.: B. Ἀσαρμάθ, A. Σαρμάθ [Gen.]; B. om., A. Ἀπαρῶθ [1 Ch.]: Asarmoth), the third, in order, of the sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 26; 1 Ch. i. 20). The name is found on Sabaean inscriptions, and is preserved, almost literally, in the Arabic Hadramaut (حَضْرَمَوْت), and as the appellation of a province and an ancient people of Southern Arabia (cp. MV.¹¹ s. n.; Delitzsch [1887], and Dillmann² on Gen. i. c.). The province of Hadramaut is situate east of the modern Yemen (anciently, as shown in ARABIA, the limits of the latter province embraced almost the whole of the south of the peninsula), extending to the districts of Shihr and Mahreh. Its capital is Shibám, a very ancient city, of which the native writers give curious accounts, and its chief ports are Mirbát, Zafári [SEPHAR], and Kisheem, from whence a great trade was carried on, in ancient times, with India and Africa. Hadramaut itself is generally cultivated, in contrast to the contiguous sandy deserts (called El-Ahkáf, where lived the gigantic race of 'Ad); is partly mountainous, with watered valleys, and is still celebrated for its frankincense (El-Idrisi, ed. Jomard, i. p. 54; Niebuhr, Descr. p. 245), exporting also gum-arabic, myrrh, dragon's blood, and aloes; the latter, however, being chiefly from Socotra, which is under the rule of the Sheykh of Kesheem (Niebuhr, l. c. sq.). The early kings of Hadramaut were Joktanites, distinct from the descendants of Yaarub, the progenitor of the Joktanite Arabs generally; and it is hence to be inferred that they were separately descended from Hazarmaveth. They maintained their independence against the powerful kings of Himyer, until the latter were subdued at the Abyssinian invasion (Ibn-Khaldoun, ap. Caussin, Essai, i. 135 sq.). The Greeks and Romans called the people of Hadramaut variously, Chatramotitae, Chatrammitae, &c.; and there is little doubt that they were the same as the Adramitae. The modern people, although mixed with other races, are strongly characterised by fierce, fanatical, and restless dispositions. They are enterprising merchants, well known for their trading and travelling propensities. [E. S. P.]

HAZAZON-TAMAR, 2 Ch. xx. 2. [HAZAZON-TAMAR.]

HAZEL. The translation in A. V. of הַזֵּל, lüz; Arab. لوز, lauz. The R. V. renders it "almond tree," in Gen. xxx. 37, the only passage where the word occurs, as one of the three trees from which Jacob cut the rods which he peeled. The LXX. render it by αμυγδον, a generic term for any kind of kernel fruit, and equally applicable to the almond and the hazel. The Vulgate has virgas amygdalinas. There can be no question that the identification of the Vulgate and the R. V. is correct. We have for it the high authority of Celsius, who has exhaustively discussed the subject; and the fact of the common Arabic name of the almond-tree being identical should be conclusive. Besides which the almond is indigenous in Palestine and in Mesopotamia; the hazel is not found in these countries, being a native of more northern and western regions. [ALMOND.] [H. B. T.]

HAZELEPONI (הַזְּלֵפֹנִי), of uncertain meaning; B. Ἑσηλεβών, A. Ἑσηλλεφών; Asalephuni, the sister of the sons of Etam in the genealogies of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 3). The name has the definite article prefixed, and is accurately "the Tzelephonite," as of a family rather than an individual. [F.]

HA'ZER (הַזֵּר), i.e. Chāsēr, from הַצֵּר, to surround or enclose, a word which is of not unfrequent occurrence in the Bible in the sense of a "court" or quadrangle to a palace* or other building, but which topographically seems generally employed for the "villages" of people in a roving and unsettled life, the semi-permanent collections of dwellings which are described by travellers among the modern Arabs to consist of rough stone walls covered with the tent cloths, and thus holding a middle position between the tent of the wanderer—so transitory as to furnish an image of the sudden termination of life (Is. xxxviii. 12)—and the settled, permanent town.

As a proper name it appears in the A. V.—

1. In the plural, HAZERIM and HAZEROTH, for which see below.

2. In the slightly different form of HAZOR.

3. In composition with other words, giving a special designation to the particular "village" intended. When thus in union with another word, the name is Hazar (Chasar). The following are the places so named, and it should not be overlooked that they are all in the wilderness itself, or else quite on the confines of civilised country:—

1. HAZAR-ADDAR (הַזֵּר אֲדָר): in Num. Ἐραυλὸς Ἀρὰδ; in Josh. B. Σαράδα, A. Ἀδδάρ: Villa nomine Adar, Addar, a place named as one of the landmarks on the southern boundary of the land promised to Israel, between Kadesh-barnea and Azmon (Num. xxxiv. 4). In the specification of the south boundary of the country actually possessed (Josh. xv. 3), the name appears in the

* In 2 K. xx. 4, the Masorets (Ker) have substituted הַצֵּר (A. V. "court") for the הַזֵּר of the original text. The same change should probably be made in Jer. xli. 7. [See ISHMAEL, 6.]

shorter form of Addar (A. V. Adar), and an additional place is named on each side of it. The site of Hazar-addar does not appear to have been encountered in modern times. Riehm (s. v.) suggests that it may possibly be the same place as Hezron (Josh. xv. 3).

The LXX. reading might lead to the belief that Hazar-addar was identical with ARAD, a Canaanite city which lay in this direction, but the presence of the Ain in the latter name forbids such an inference.

2. HAZAR-ENAN (הַזֵּר עֵינַן) = village of springs; in Num. B. Ἀρσεναιεύ, A. Ἀσερραίν; Villa Enan, Atrium Enon, A. Enan, the place at which the northern boundary of the land promised to the children of Israel was to terminate (Num. xxxiv. 9), and the eastern boundary commence (c. 10). It is again mentioned in Ezekiel's prophecy (xlvii. 17, xlviii. 1) of what the ultimate extent of the land will be. These boundaries are traced by Mr. Porter, who would identify Hazar-enan with Kuryetein = "the two cities," a village more than 60 miles E.N.E. of Damascus, the chief ground for the identification apparently being the presence at Kuryetein of "large fountains," the only ones in that "vast region,"—a circumstance with which, the name of Hazar-enan well agrees (Porter, Damascus, i. 252, ii. 358). The great distance from Damascus and the body of Palestine is the main impediment to the reception of this identification. Keil (s. r.) suggests the springs near the watering-part between the Orontes and Leontes; Conder (Heth and Moab, p. 8), Ain el-'Asy, one of the principal sources of the Orontes.

3. HAZAR-GADDAH (הַזֵּר גַּדָּה); B. Σεπέ, A. Ἀσεργαδδ; Aser-Gadda, one of the towns in the southern district of Judah (Josh. xv. 27), named between Moladah and Heshmon. No trace of the situation of this place appears in the Onomasticon, or in the works of modern travellers. In the map of the PEF. (Sheet xxv.) a site named el-Ghurra is marked as close to Moladah (el-Mûh), but it is perhaps too much to assume that Gaddah has taken this form by the change so frequent in the East of D to R.

4. HAZAR-HAT-TICON, R. V. HAZER-HAT-TICON (הַזֵּר הַתִּיכֹן) = the middle village; Αὐλή τοῦ Σαυρά, A. corrupt; Domus Tichon, a place named in Ezekiel's prophecy of the ultimate boundaries of the land (Ezek. xlvii. 16), and specified as being on the boundary (הַזֵּר הַבְּרִי) of Hauran. It is not yet known; but Wetzstein (Reisebericht, p. 100) suggests its identification with Hadhar, to the north of Jebel Druze, and on the east border of el-Lejah.

5. HAZAR-SHUAL (הַזֵּר שְׁשׁוּאָל) = fox-village: B. Χολασεωλά, Ἀρσωλά, Ἑσπερουλάδ; A. Ἀσαρσουλά, Σερσουλά, Ἑσπερσουλά: Hasersual, Hasarsual, a town in the southern district of Judah, lying between Hazar-gaddah and Beersheba (Josh. xv. 28, xix. 3; 1 Ch. iv. 28). It is mentioned in the same connexion after the return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 27). The site has not yet been conclusively recovered; but in the map of the PEF. (Sheet xxv.) a site, Kh. Sauch, is marked at about the right spot, which may be a corruption of the original name.

6. HAZAR-SUSAN (חָזָר סוּסָן = horse-village; B. Σαρσουσέν, A. Ἀσερσουσίμ; Hazar-susa), one of the "cities" allotted to Simeon in the extreme south of the territory of Judah (Josh. xix. 5). Neither it nor its companion BETH-MARCABOTH, the "house of chariots," are named in the list of the towns of Judah in chap. xv., but they are included in those of Simeon in 1 Ch. iv. 31 (see v. 7), with the express statement that they existed before and up to the time of David. Dean Stanley has suggested (S. & P. p. 160) that they were the depôts and stations for the chariots and horses, such as those which in Solomon's time went to and fro between Egypt and Palestine. This view is supported by the inscriptions of Thothmes III., and by the Tell Amarna letters which mention Canaanite and Egyptian chariots in Palestine at a very early period. The names, if not Hebrew, are apparently Semitic. But they may perhaps be in the former language of the country, adopted by the Hebrews, and so altered as to bear a meaning in Hebrew. This is exactly the process which the Hebrew names have in their turn undergone from the Arabs, and is in fact one which is well known to have occurred in all languages, though not yet recognised in the particular case of the early local names of Palestine. Guérin (Judée, iii. 172) suggests its identification with Süsieh, E.N.E. of es-Semû'a, Eshtemoa; Tristram (Bibl. Places, p. 25) with Beit Susin, on the caravan road from Gaza to Egypt.

7. HAZAR-SUSIM (חָזָר סוּסִים = the village of horses; B. Ἡμισυσεσορίμ, A. Ἡμισυεσοσίμ; Hazarsusim), the form under which the preceding name appears in the list of the towns of Simeon in 1 Ch. iv. 31. [G.] [W.]

HAZERIM. The AVIMS, or more accurately the Avvim, a tribe commemorated in a fragment of very ancient history, as the early inhabitants of the south-western portion of Palestine, are therein said to have lived (R. V.) "in villages (A. V. "Hazerim," חָזָרִים; Ἀσθδῶθ, A.F. Ἀσθρῶθ; Hazerim) as far as Gaza" (Deut. ii. 23), before their expulsion by the Caphtorim. The word is the plural of HAZER, noticed above, and, as far as we can now appreciate the significance of the term, it implies that the Avvim were a wandering tribe who had retained in their new locality the transitory form of encampment of their original desert life. Professor Palmer (Desert of the Exodus, ii. 428) points out that the Avvim were the southernmost of the tribes inhabiting the Canaanitish territory (Josh. xiii. 3, 4), and identifies Hazerim with the mountains of the 'Azázimeh, at the southern extremity of the Negeb. [G.] [W.]

HAZEROTH (חָזָרֹתַי = pastoral enclosures, camping grounds; Ἀσθρῶθ, in Deut. Ἀδλῶν; Hazeroth: Num. xi. 35, xii. 16, xxxiii. 17; Deut. i. 1), a station of the Israelites in the desert, mentioned next to Kibroth-Hattaavah, and perhaps recognisable in the Arabic حضرَة, Hudherah (Robinson, i. 151; Stanley, S. & P. pp. 81, 82), which lies about eighteen hours' distance from Sinai on the road to 'Akabah. For a description of 'Ain Hudherah, and the curious

Bedawi legend connecting it with a lost caravan, see Ordnance Survey of Sinai, i. 66, 122, 303; and Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, i. 258 sq. [HAZER.] [W.]

HAZEZO'N-TA'MAR and HAZAZO'N-TA'MAR (חָזָזוֹן תְּמָר; in Gen. Ἀσάζων Θαμάρ, in 2 Ch. B. Ἀσῶν Θαμαρά, A. Ἀσῶν Θ'; Asazou Thamar), the names under which, at a very early period of the history of Palestine, and in a document believed by many to be the oldest of all these early records, we first hear of the place which afterwards became EN-GEDL. The Amorites were dwelling at Hazazon-tamar when the four kings made their incursion, and fought their successful battle with the five (Gen. xiv. 7). The name occurs only once again—in the records of the reign of Hezekiah (2 Ch. xx. 2)—when he is warned of the approach of the horde of Ammonites, Moabites, Mehunim, and men of Mount Seir, whom he afterwards so completely destroyed, and who were no doubt pursuing thus far exactly the same route as the four kings had done a thousand years before them. Here the explanation, "which is Engedi," is added. The existence of the earlier appellation, after En-gedi had been so long in use, is a remarkable instance of the tenacity of these old Oriental names, of which more modern instances are frequent. See ACCHO, BETHSAIDA, &c. The name possibly survives in Wady Husásah, north of 'Ain Jady, En-gedi.

Hazazon-tamar is interpreted in Hebrew to mean the "pruning or felling of the palm" (Gesen. Thes. p. 512). Jerome (Quaest. in Gen.) renders it urbs palmarium. This interpretation of the name is borne out by the ancient reputation of the palms of En-gedi (Ecclus. xxiv. 14, and the citations from Pliny, given under that name). The Samaritan Version has כְּרִי נוֹרָה = the Valley of Cadi, possibly a corruption of En-gedi. The Targums have En-gedi.

Perhaps this was "the city of palm-trees" (Ir hat-temárim) out of which the Kenites, the tribe of Moses' father-in-law, went up into the wilderness of Judah, after the conquest of the country (Judg. i. 16). If this were so, the allusion of Balaam to the Kenite (Num. xxiv. 21) is at once explained. Standing as he was on one of the lofty points of the highlands opposite Jericho, the western shore of the Dead Sea as far as Engedi would be before him, and the cliff, in the clefts of which the Kenites had fixed their secure "nest," would be a prominent object in the view. This has been already alluded to by Dean Stanley (S. & P. p. 225, n. 4). The allusion may, however, be to CAIN, Yukin, which forms a conspicuous point on the horizon as seen from the Moabite hills (Conder, MS. note). [G.] [W.]

HAZI-EL (חָזִי'אֵל = seen of God; B. Ειζήλ, A. Ἰαζήλ; Hosiel), a Levite in the time of king David, of the family of Shimeï, the younger branch of the Gershonites (1 Ch. xxiii. 9).

HAZO' (חָזוֹ'; Aζαῦ; Azau), a son of Nahor by Milcah his wife (Gen. xxii. 22). The name is compared by Friedrich Delitzsch (Paradies, p. 307) with the cuneiform (mât) Hu-zu-u,

(the land) Hazū; a district bordering on Northern Arabia, and mentioned in the inscriptions along with Bāzu, which is the Assyrian equivalent of the Biblical Buz (Gen. xxii. 21). The phonetic correspondence of the two names is complete (Heb. δ = Assy. \ddot{u}). See also Schrader, *KAT.*² p. 141. [C. J. B.]

HA'ZOR (חָצוֹר: 'Asōp; A. in 1 K. ix. 15, 'Asōp: Asor, Hasor). 1. A fortified city, which on the occupation of the country was allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36). Its position was apparently between Ramah and Kedesh (ib. xii. 19), on the high ground overlooking the Lake of Merom (ὄρεσθαι τῆς Σεμεχωνίτιδος λίμνης, Joseph. Ant. v. 5, § 1). There is no reason for supposing it a different place from that of which Jabin was king (Josh. xi. 1), both when Joshua gained his signal victory over the northern confederation, and when Deborah and Barak routed his general Sisera (Judg. iv. 2, 17; 1 Sam. xii. 9). It was the principal city of the whole of North Palestine, "the head of all those kingdoms" (Josh. xi. 10, and see Onomasticon, Asor). Like the other strong places of that part, it stood on an eminence (חָצוֹר, Josh. xi. 13, A. V. "strength," R. V. "mounds"), but the district around must have been on the whole flat, and suitable for the manœuvres of the "very many" chariots and horses which formed part of the forces of the king of Hazor and his confederates (Josh. xi. 4, 6, 9; Judg. iv. 3). Hazor was the only one of those northern cities which was burnt by Joshua; doubtless it was too strong and important to leave standing in his rear. Whether it was rebuilt by the men of Naphtali, or by the second Jabin (Judg. iv.), we are not told, but Solomon did not overlook so important a post; and the fortification of Hazor, Megiddo, and Gezer, the points of defence for the entrance from Syria and Assyria, the plain of Esdraelon, and the great maritime lowland respectively, was one of the chief pretexts for his levy of taxes (1 K. ix. 15). Later still it is mentioned in the list of the towns and districts whose inhabitants were carried off to Assyria by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. xv. 29; Joseph. Ant. ix. 11, § 1). It also not improbably occurs in Tobit 2, under the corrupt form of ASER. We encounter it once more in 1 Macc. xi. 67, where Jonathan, after encamping for the night at the "water of Gennesar," advances to the "plain of Asor" (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 5, § 7: the Greek text of the Maccabees has prefixed an n from the preceding word, πέδιον; E. V. Nasor) to meet Demetrius, who was in possession of Kadesh (xi. 63; Joseph. as above). [NABOR.]

The site of Hazor has not yet been certainly ascertained, but it has been proposed to identify it with:—(1) Tell Harrāh, a prominent isolated hill, rising steeply above 'Ain el-Mellahah, at the N. end of the great plain Ard el-Kheit, and 1½ miles from Lake Hüleh, "waters of Merom." On the top of the hill, which is 2½ miles S.E. of Kedesh, are extensive ruins of an old town, with its enclosing wall and acropolis. Much of the masonry, undressed blocks of stone set without mortar, seems to be very old (Wilson, PEF. Mem. i. 238; Guérin, Galiée, ii. 363 sq.). (2) Tell el-Khurcibeh, a hill at the S. end of the Merj Kades, 2½ miles from Kedesh, and 3½ miles from Lake Hüleh. The ruins on the hill consist of shapeless heaps of stones, with no trace of fortifications or large structures (Rob. iii. 364–5; Riehm, s. v.). (3) Conder has pointed out (PEF. Mem. i. 204) that the name Hadireh, the Arabic equivalent of Hazor, occurs in Jebel Hadireh and Merj Hadireh, 3½ miles S.S.W. of Kedesh and 5½ miles from Lake Hüleh. Though Jebel Hadireh is close to the point at which the main road to the north crosses the deep, rocky W. Hendāj, it does not appear to have been occupied by a fortress, for no ruins are mentioned in connexion either with the hill or the plain. The distance from the lake is also too great if the statement of Josephus be accepted as correct.

Several places bearing names probably derived from ancient Hazors, have been discovered in this district. A list will be found in Rob. iii. 366, note (and cp. also Van de Velde, Syria & P. ii. 178; Porter, Damascus, i. 304). But none of these answers to the requirements of this Hazor.

2. (B. 'Ασροπιρραίν, A. omits; Asor.) One of the "cities" of Judah in the extreme south, named next in order to Kedesh (Josh. xv. 23). It is mentioned nowhere else, nor has it yet been identified. The LXX. B. unites Hazor with the name following it; which causes Reland to maintain that they form but one (Pal. pp. 144, 708): but the LXX. text of this list is so corrupt, that it seems impossible to argue from it.

3. (LXX. omits; Asor nova.) Hazor-Hadattah, = "new Hazor," possibly contra-distinguished from that just mentioned; another of the southern towns of Judah (Josh. xv. 25). The words are improperly separated in the A. V. [HADATTAH.]

4. (B. 'Ασρών εστ' 'Ασώρ, A. 'Ασρώμ κ.τ.λ.; Asron, hæc est Asor.) "Hezron which is Hazor" (Josh. xv. 25); but whether it be intended that it is the same Hazor as either of those named before, or that the name was originally Hazor, and had been changed to Hezron, we cannot now decide.

5. (A. 'Asōp, B. omits; Asor.) A place in which the Benjamites resided after their return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 33). From the places mentioned with it, as Anathoth, Nob, Ramah, &c., it would seem to have lain north of Jerusalem, and at no great distance therefrom. It is perhaps Kh. Hazzūr, E. of Nebv Samuil (PEF. Mem. iii. 43, 114); or the same place with BAAL-HAZOR, though there is no positive evidence beyond the name in favour of such an identification.

6. (ή ἀλλή; Asor.) In Jer. xlix. 28–33. Hazor apparently denotes a region of Arabia under several sheikhs, "kingdoms of H." (v. 28; cp. xxv. 24), whose desolation is predicted in connexion with Kedar. The inhabitants are described as dwelling, like the Bedawin tribes of the present day, without gates or bars (v. 31; cp. Ezek. xxxviii. 11, and see HAZER, HAZERIM), from which circumstance the name is perhaps derived (Winer, RWB. s. v. Hazor; Riehm, HWB. s. v.; Dict. of Bible, Amer. ed., art. Hazor (6)).

The word is combined with Baal in BAAL-HAZOR, with Ain in EN-HAZOR. [G.] [W.]

HEAD-DRESS. The Hebrews do not appear to have regarded a covering for the head as an essential article of dress. The earliest notice we have of such a thing is in connexion with the sacerdotal vestments, and in this case it is described as an ornamental appendage "for glory and for beauty" (Ex. xxviii. 40). The absence of any allusion to a head-dress in passages where we should expect to meet with it, as in the trial of jealousy (Num. v. 18) and the regulations regarding the leper (Lev. xiii. 45), in both of which the "uncovering of the head" refers undoubtedly to the hair, leads to the inference that it was not ordinarily worn in the Mosaic age; and this is confirmed by the practice, frequently alluded to, of covering the head with the mantle. Even in after-times it seems to have been reserved especially for purposes of ornament: thus the Sāniph (שָׂנִיף) is noticed as being worn by nobles (Job xxix. 14), ladies (Is. iii. 23), and kings (Is. lxii. 3), while the Pe'er (פֵּאֵר) was an article of holiday dress (Is. lxi. 3, A. V. "beauty," R. V. "garland;" Ezek. xxiv. 17, 23), and was worn at weddings (Is. lxi. 10): the use of the μίτρα was restricted to similar occasions (Judith xvi. 8; Bar. v. 2). The former of these terms undoubtedly describes a kind of turban: its primary sense (פָּרָשָׁה, "to roll around") expresses the folds of linen wound round the head, and its form probably resembled that of the high-priest's Misnepheth (a word derived from the same root, and identical in meaning, for in Zech. iii. 5 Sāniph = Misnepheth), as described by Josephus (Ant. iii. 7, §3). The renderings of the term in the A. V., "hood" (Is. iii. 23, R. V. "turban"), A. V. and R. V. "diadem" (Job xxix. 14, R. V. marg. turban; Is. lxii. 3), A. V. and R. V. "mitre" (Zech. iii. 5, R. V. marg. turban), do not convey the right idea of its meaning. The other term, Pe'er, primarily means an ornament, and is so rendered in the A. V. (Is. lxi. 10; see also v. 3, "beauty," R. V. "garland" in both vs.), and is specifically applied to the head-dress from its ornamental character. It is uncertain what the term properly describes: the modern turban consists of two parts—the Kaokh, a stiff, round cap occasionally rising to a considerable height, and the Shash, a long piece of muslin wound about it (Russell, Aleppo, i. 104): Josephus' account of the high-priest's head-dress implies a similar construction; for he says that it was made of thick bands of linen doubled round many times, and sewn together; the whole covered by a piece of fine linen to conceal the seams. Saalschütz (Archæol. i. 27, note) suggests that the Sāniph and the Pe'er represent the Shash and the Kaokh, the latter rising high above the other, and so the more prominent and striking feature. In favour of this explanation it may be remarked that the Pe'er is more particularly connected with the Misnepheth, the high cap of the ordinary priests, in Ex. xxxix. 28; while the Sāniph, as we have seen, resembled the high-priest's mitre, in which the cap was concealed by the linen folds. The objection, however, to this explanation is that the etymological force of Pe'er is not brought out: may not that term have applied to the jewels and other ornaments with which the turban is frequently decorated (Russell, i. 106), some of which are represented in the illustrations below taken from Lane's Mod. Egypt. Appendix A? The term used for putting on either the Sāniph or the Pe'er is עָבַד, "to bind round" (Ex. xxix. 9; Lev. viii. 13); hence the words in Ezek. xvi. 10, "I girded thee about with fine linen," are to be understood of the turban; and by the use of the same term Jonah (ii. 5) represents the weeds as wrapped like a turban round his head. The turban now worn in the East varies very much in shape; the most prevalent forms are shown in Russell's Aleppo, i. 102.

If the Sāniph and the Pe'er were reserved for holiday attire, it remains for us to inquire whether any and what covering was ordinarily worn over the head. It appears that frequently the robes supplied the place of a head-dress, being so ample that they might be thrown over the head at pleasure: the Radiid and the Tsū'iph at all events were so used [DRESS], and the veil served a similar purpose. [VEIL.] The ordinary head-dress of the Bedouin consists of the kif'ye'h, a square handkerchief, generally of red and yellow cotton, or cotton and silk, folded so that three of the corners hang down over the back and shoulders, leaving the face exposed, and bound round the head by a cord (Burckhardt, Notes, i. 48). It is not improbable that a similar covering was used by the Hebrews on certain occasions: the "kerchief" in Ezek. xiii. 18 being understood by some as a kind of wrap or head-covering (see Fried. Delitzsch in Baer's ed. of Ezekiel, p. xiii.); and the σικκίνθιον (Acts xix. 12, A. V. and R. V. "apron"), as explained by Suidas (τὸ τῆς κεφαλῆς φόρημα), was applicable to the purposes of a head-dress. [HANDKERCHIEF.] Neither of these cases, however, supplies positive evidence on the point, and the general absence of allusions leads to the inference that the head was usually uncovered, as is still the case in many parts of Arabia (Wellsted, Travels, i. 73). The introduction of the Greek hat (πέτασος) by Jason, as an article of dress adapted to the gymnasium, was regarded as a national dishonour (2 Macc. iv. 12): in shape and material the Petasus very much resembled the common felt hats of this country (Dict. of Gk. & Rom. Ant. art. Pileus).

The Assyrian head-dress is described in Ezek. xiii. 15 under the terms כְּרִיחֵי טַבָּלִים, A. V. "exceeding in dyed attire" (R. V. marg., with dyed turbans). The R. V. marg. is the more correct, tebûlim describing not the coloured material of the head-dress, but a head-band or turban (fasciis obvolvît, Gesen. Thesour. p. 542; cp. Fried. Delitzsch in Baer's ed. of Ezek. l. c.). The term s'rûchê expresses the flowing character of the Eastern head-dress, as it falls down over the back (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 308). The word rendered A. V. "hats." (R. V. marg., turbans) in Dan. iii. 21 (כְּבָרִים בְּלִיאַ) is more probably a cloak (R. V. "tunica"). [W. L. B.] [F.]

HEARTH. 1. אַר; ἄρχαρα; arula (Ges. p. 69), a pot or brazier for containing fire. 2. מוֹקֵד m. and מוֹקְדָה f.; καυστρα, καῦσις; incendium (Ges. p. 620). 3. בֵּיור, בֵּיר (Zech. xii. 6); θαλός; caminus; in dual, בְּיָרִים (Lev. xi. 35); χυτροπόδες; chytropodes; A. V. and R. V. text "ranges for pots," R. V. marg. stewpans (Ges. p. 672).

One way of baking much practised in the East is to place the dough on an iron plate, either laid on or supported on legs above the vessel sunk in the ground, which forms the oven.

This plate or "hearth" is in Arabic طاجن, tajen; a word which has probably passed into Greek in τήγανον. The cakes baked "on the hearth" (Gen. xviii. 6, ἄγκυριπας, subcinericios panes) were probably baked in the existing Bedouin manner, on hot stones covered with ashes. The "hearth" of king Jehoiakim's winter palace, Jer. xxxvi. 23, was possibly a pan or brazier of charcoal (Burckhardt, Notes on Bed. i. 58; P. della Valle, Viaggi, i. 437; Harmer, Obs. i. p. 477, and note; Rauwolf, Travels, ap. Ray, ii. 163; Shaw, Travels, p. 231; Niebuhr, Desc. de l'Arabie, p. 45; Schleusner, Lex. Vet. Test. τήγανον; Gesen. s. v. תַּגְנָה, p. 997). [FIRE.] [H. W. P.]

HEATH, A. V. and R. V. (שֵׁרָפִים, ārō'ēr, and שֵׁרָפִים, ar'ār; ἡ ἀργιόμυρλη, δρος ἄργιος; myrica). The prophet Jeremiah compares the man "who maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord," to the ar'ār in the desert (xvii. 6; R. V. marg. a tamarisk [see below]). Again, in the judgment of Moab (xlviii. 6), to her inhabitants it is said, "Flee, save your lives, and be like the ārō'ēr in the wilderness," where the margin has a naked tree, R. V. marg. as in xvii. 6. There seems no reason to doubt Celsius' conclusion (Hierob. ii. 195), that the ar'ār is identical with the ar'ar (عرعر) of Arabic writers, which is a species of juniper. Robinson (Bib. Res. ii. 125-6) states that when he was in the pass of Nemela he observed juniper trees (Arab. ar'ar) on the porphyry rocks above. The berries, he adds, have the appearance and taste of the common juniper, except that there is more of the aroma of the pine. "These trees were ten or fifteen feet in height, and hung upon the rocks even to the summits of the cliffs and needles." This is the Juniperus Sabina, L., or savin, with small scale-like leaves, which are pressed close to its gnarled stem, a gloomy-looking bush of stunted appearance, and cropped close by the wild goats, inhabiting the most sterile soil (see English Cycl. N. Hist. iii. 311); a character which is obviously well suited to the naked or destitute tree spoken of by the prophet. The R. V. marg. has tamarisk (MV.¹¹), on what ground it is difficult to conceive, for the tamarisk is well known as the طرفا, tarfa, and not ar'ar. There is no true heath in Palestine south of Lebanon. Rosenmüller's explanation of the Hebrew word, which is also adopted by Maurer, "qui destitutus versatur" (Schol. ad Jer. xvii. 6), is very unsatisfactory. Not to mention the tameness of the comparison, it is evidently contradicted by the antithesis in v. 8: "Cursed is he that trusteth in man . . .

* From the root עָרַר, "to be naked," in allusion to the bare nature of the rocks on which the Juniperus Sabina often grows. Cp. Ps. cii. 17, תְּפִלַּת הָעֲרֵר, "the prayer of the destitute" (or ill clad).

he shall be like the juniper that grows on the bare rocks of the desert. Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord . . . he shall be as a tree planted by the waters." The contrast between the shrub of the arid desert and the tree growing by the waters is very striking; but Rosenmüller's interpretation appears to us to spoil the whole. Even more unsatisfactory is Michaelis (Supp. Lex. Heb. p. 1971), who thinks "guinea hens" (Numida meleagris) are intended! Gesenius (Thez. pp. 1073-4) understands these two Hebrew terms to denote "parietinae, aedificia eversa" (ruins); but it is more in accordance with the scriptural passages to suppose that some tree is intended, which explanation, moreover, has the sanction of the LXX. and Vulgate, and of the modern use of a kindred Arabic word. [W. H.] [H. B. T.]

HEATHEN. The Hebrew words הֵנִי, הֵנִי, gōi, gōyim, together with their Greek equivalents ἔθνος, ἔθνη (see Cremer, Bibl.-theology. Wörterb. d. N. T.lichen Gräcität. s. n.), have been somewhat arbitrarily rendered "nations," "Gentiles," and "heathen" in the A. V. It will be interesting to trace the manner in which a term, primarily and essentially general [including the Jews themselves] in its signification, acquired that more restricted sense which was afterwards attached to it. Its development is parallel with that of the Hebrew people, and its meaning at any period may be taken as significant of their relative position with regard to the surrounding nations.

1. While as yet the Jewish nation had no political existence, gōyim denoted generally the nations of the world, especially including the immediate descendants of Abraham (Gen. xviii. 18; cp. Gal. iii. 16). The latter, as they grew in numbers and importance, were distinguished in a most marked manner from the nations by whom they were surrounded, and were provided with a code of laws and a religious ritual which made the distinction still more peculiar. They were essentially a separate people (Lev. xx. 23); separate in habits, morals, and religion, and bound to maintain their separate character by denunciations of the most terrible judgments (Lev. xxvi. 14-38; Deut. xxviii.). On their march through the desert they encountered the most obstinate resistance from Amalek, "chief of the gōyim" (Num. xxiv. 20), in whose sight the deliverance from Egypt was achieved (Lev. xxvi. 45). During the conquest of Canaan and the subsequent wars of extermination, which the Israelites for several generations carried on against their enemies, the seven nations of the Canaanites—Amorites, Hittites, Hivites, Jebusites, Perizzites, and Girgashites (Ex. xxxiv. 24), together with the remnants of them who were left to prove Israel (Josh. xxiii. 13; Judg. iii. 1; Ps. lxxviii. 55), and teach them war (Judg. iii. 2)—received the especial appellation of gōyim. With these the Israelites were forbidden to associate (Josh. xxiii. 7), not in any spirit of hatred, but as a defensive measure; intermarriages were prohibited (Josh. xxiii. 12; 1 K. xi. 2); and as a warning against disobedience the fate of the nations of Canaan was kept constantly before their eyes (Lev. xviii. 24, 25; Deut. xviii. 12). They are ever associated with the worship of false gods, and the foul practices of idolaters (Lev. xviii., xx.), and these constituted their chief distinctions, as gōyim, from the worshippers of the one God, the people of Jehovah (Num. xv. 41; Deut. xxviii. 10). This distinction was maintained in its full force during the early times of the monarchy (2 Sam. vii. 23; 1 K. xi. 4-8, xiv. 24; Ps. cvi. 35). It was from among the gōyim, the degraded tribes who submitted to their arms, that the Israelites were permitted to purchase their bond servants (Lev. xxv. 44, 45), and this special enactment seems to have had the effect of giving to a national tradition the force and sanction of a law (cp. Gen. xxxi. 15). In later times this regulation was strictly adhered to. To the words of Eccles. ii. 7, "I bought men-servants and maid-servants," the Targum adds, "of the children of Ham, and the rest of the foreign nations."

And not only were the Israelites forbidden to intermarry with these gōyim, but the latter were virtually excluded from the possibility of becoming naturalised. An Ammonite or Moabite was shut out from the congregation of Jehovah even to the tenth generation (Deut. xxiii. 3), while an Edomite or Egyptian was admitted in the third (rr. 7, 8). The necessity of maintaining a separation so broadly marked is ever more and more manifest as we follow the Israelites through their history, and observe their constantly recurring tendency to idolatry. Offence and punishment followed each other with all the regularity of cause and effect (Judg. ii. 12, iii. 6-8, &c.). On the other hand, heathen who turned from their idolatrous and evil ways to the purer faith, were assured of God's forgiveness and of a welcome from Israelites (cp. Is. lvi. 3, 6, 7).

2. But, even in early Jewish times, the term gōyim received by anticipation a significance of wider range than the national experience (Lev. xxvi. 33, 38; Deut. xxx. 1); and as the latter was gradually developed during the prosperous times of the monarchy, the gōyim were the surrounding nations generally, with whom the Israelites were brought into contact by the extension of their commerce, and whose idolatrous practices they readily adopted (Ezek. xxiii. 30; Amos v. 26). Later still, it is applied to the Babylonians who took Jerusalem (Neh. v. 8; Ps. lxxix. 1, 6, 10), to the destroyers of Moab (Is. xvi. 8), and to the several nations among whom the Jews were scattered during the Captivity (Ps. cvi. 47; Jer. xlvi. 28; Lam. i. 3, &c.), the practice of idolatry still being their characteristic distinction (Is. xxxvi. 18; Jer. x. 2, 3, xiv. 22). This signification it retained after the return from Babylon, though it was used in a more limited sense as denoting the mixed race of colonists who settled in Palestine during the Captivity (Neh. v. 17), and who are described as fearing Jehovah, while serving their own gods (2 K. xvii. 29-33; Ezra vi. 21).

Tracing the synonymous term ἔθνη through the Apocryphal writings, we find that it is applied to the nations around Palestine (1 Macc. i. 11), including the Syrians and Philistines of the army of Gorgias (1 Macc. iii. 41; iv. 7, 11, 14), as well as the people of Ptolemais, Tyre and Sidon (1 Macc. v. 9, 10, 15). They were image-worshippers (1 Macc. iii. 48; Wisd. xv. 15), whose customs and fashions the Jews seem still to have had an unconquerable propensity to imitate, but on whom they were bound by national tradition to take vengeance (1 Macc. ii. 68; 1 Esd. viii. 85). Following the customs of the gōyim at this period denoted the neglect or concealment of circumcision (1 Macc. i. 15), disregard of sacrifices, profanation of the Sabbath, eating of swine's flesh and meat offered to idols (2 Macc. vi. 6-9, 18; xv. 1. 2), and adoption of the Greek national games (2 Macc. iv. 12, 14). In all points Judaism and heathenism are strongly contrasted. The "barbarous multitude" in 2 Macc. ii. 21 are opposed to those who played the man for Judaism, and the distinction now becomes an ecclesiastical one (cp. Matt. xviii. 17). In 2 Esd. iii. 33, 34, the "gentes" are defined as those "qui habitant in seculo" (cp. Matt. vi. 32; Luke xii. 30).

As the Greek influence became more extensively felt in Asia Minor, and the Greek language was generally used, Hellenism and heathenism became convertible terms, and a Greek was synonymous with a foreigner of any nation. This is singularly evident in the Syriac of 2 Macc. v. 9, 10, 13; cp. John vii. 35; 1 Cor. x. 32; 2 Macc. xi. 2.

In the N. T. again we find various shades of meaning attached to ἔθνη. In its narrowest sense it is opposed to "those of the circumcision" (Acts x. 45; cp. Esth. xiv. 15, where ἀλλοτρίους = ἀπεριμῆτος), and is contrasted with Israel, the people of Jehovah (Luke ii. 32), thus representing the Hebrew עַמּוֹת at one stage of its history. But, like gōyim, it also denotes the people of the earth generally (Acts xvii. 26; Gal. iii. 14). In Matt. vi. 7 ἔθνη is applied to an idolater.

But, in addition to its significance as an ethnographical term, gōyim had a moral sense which must not be overlooked. In Ps. ix. 5, 15, 17 (cp. Ezek. vii. 21) the word stands in parallelism with רָשָׁע, rāshā', the wicked, as distinguished by his moral obliquity (see Hupfeld on Ps. i. 1); and in v. 17 the people thus designated are described as "forgetters of God," that know not Jehovah (Jer. x. 25). Again in Ps. lix. 5 it is to some extent commensurate in meaning with אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה בְּיָדָם, boj'de 'aren, "iniquitous transgressors;" and in these passages, as well as in Ps. x. 15, it has a deeper significance than that of a merely national distinction, although the latter idea is never entirely lost sight of.

In later Jewish literature a technical definition of the word is laid down which is certainly not of universal application. Elias Levita (quoted by Eisenmenger, Entdecktes Judenthum, i. 665) explains the sing. gōi as denoting one who is not of Israelitish birth. This can only have reference to its after signification; in the O. T. the singular is never used of an individual, but is a collective term, applied equally to the Israelites (Josh. iii. 17) as to the nations of Canaan (Lev. xx. 23), and denotes simply a body politic. Another distinction, equally unsupported, is made between עַמּוֹת, gōyim, and אֲמִתּוֹת, 'ammit, the former being defined as the nations who had served Israel, while the latter were those who had not (Jalkut Chadash, fol. 20, No. 20; Eisenmenger, i. 667). Abaranel on Joel iii. 2 applies the former to both Christians and Turks, or Ishmaelites, while in Sepher Juchasin (fol. 148, col. 2) the Christians alone are distinguished by this appellation. Eisenmenger gives some curious examples of the disabilities under which a gōi laboured. One who kept sabbaths was judged deserving of death (ii. 206), and the study of the law was prohibited to him under the same penalty; but on the latter point the doctors are at issue (ii. 209). On the other hand, the Talmud has many beautiful passages recognising the virtues and rights of the heathen, and inspired by the same tenderness as that of Isaiah lvi. (see Hamburger, REN. s. n. "Heiden"). [W. A. W.] [F.]

HEAVEN. There are four Hebrew words thus rendered in the O. T., which we may briefly notice. 1. רָקִיעַ (στερέωμα; firmamentum; Luth. Veste), a solid expanse, from עָרַק "to beat out"; a word used primarily of the hammering out of metal (Ex. xxxix. 3; Num. xvi. 38). The fuller expression הַשָּׁמַיִם רָקִיעַ (Gen. i. 14 sq.). That Moses understood it to mean a solid expanse is clear from his representing it as the barrier between the upper and lower waters (Gen. i. 6 sq.), i.e. as separating the reservoir of the celestial ocean (Ps. civ. 3, xxix. 3) from the waters of the earth, or those on which the earth was supposed to float (Ps. cxxvi. 6). Through its open lattices (צַנּוֹתָם, Gen. vii. 11; 2 K. vii. 2, 19; cp. κόσκινον, Aristoph. Nub. 373) or doors (עֲדָנִים, Ps. lxxviii. 23) the dew and snow and hail are poured upon the earth (Job xxxviii. 22, 37, where we have the curious expression "bottles of heaven," utres coeli). This firm vault, which Job describes as being "strong as a molten looking-glass" (xxxvii. 18), is transparent, like pellucid sapphire, and splendid as crystal (Dan. xii. 3; Ex. xxiv. 10; Ezek. i. 22; Rev. iv. 6), upon which rests the throne of God (Is. lxvi. 1; Ezek. i. 26), and which is opened for the descent of Angels, or for prophetic visions (Gen. xxviii. 17; Ezek. i. 1; Acts vii. 56, x. 11). In it, like gems or golden lamps, the stars are fixed to give light to the earth, and regulate the seasons (Gen. i. 14-19); and the whole magnificent, immeasurable structure (Jer. xxxi. 37) is supported by the mountains as its pillars, or strong foundations (Ps. xvii. 7; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Job xxiv. 11). Similarly the Greeks believed in an οὐρανὸς πολύχαλκος (Hom. Il. v. 504), or σιδῆρεος (Hom. Od. xv. 328), or ἀδάμαστος (Orph. Hymn. ad Coelum), and the philosophers called στερέμιον, or κρυσταλλοειδές (Emped. ap. Plut. de Phil. plac. ii. 11; Artemid. ap. Sen. Nat. Quaest. vii. 13; quoted by Gesenius, s. v.). It is clear that very many of the above notions were mere metaphors resulting from the simple primitive conception, and that later writers among the Hebrews had arrived at more scientific views, although of course they retained much of the old phraseology, and are fluctuating and undecided in their terms. Elsewhere, for instance, the heavens are likened to a curtain (Ps. civ. 2; Is. xl. 22). In A. V. "heaven" and "heavens" are used to render not only רָקִיעַ, but also שָׁמַיִם, מְרוֹם, and שָׁשְׁקִים, for which reason we have thrown together under the former word the chief features ascribed by the Jewish writers to this portion of the universe.

2. שָׁמַיִם (Ch. שָׁמַיִם) is derived from שָׁמַיִם, "to be high." This is the word used in the expression "the heaven and the earth," or "the upper and lower regions" (Gen. i. 1), which was a periphrasis to supply the want of a single word for the Cosmos (Deut. xxxii. 1; Is. i. 2; Ps. cxlviii. 13). "Heaven of heavens" is the Hebrew expression for infinity (Neh. ix. 6; Ecclus. xvi. 18).

3. שָׁמַיִם, used for "heaven" in Ps. xviii. 16; Jer. xxv. 30; Is. xxiv. 18 (A. V. "on high"). Properly speaking, it means a mountain, as in Ps. cii. 19, Ezek. xvii. 23. It must not, however, be supposed for a moment that the Hebrews had any notion of a "Mountain of Meeting," like Albordsh, the northern hill of Babylonish mythology (Is. xiv. 13), or the Greek Olympus, or the Hindoo Meru, the Chinese Kuculun, or the Arabian Caf (see Kalisch, Gen. p. 24, and the authorities there quoted), since such a fancy is incompatible with the pure monotheism of the Old Testament.

4. שָׁמַיִם, "expanses," with reference to the extent of heaven, as the last two words were derived from its height; hence this word is often used together with שָׁמַיִם, as in Deut. xxxiii. 26; Job xxxv. 5. In the A. V. it is sometimes rendered "clouds," for which the fuller term is שָׁמַיִם עָבִי (Ps. xviii. 12). The word עָבִי means first "to pound," and then "to wear out." So that, according to some, "clouds" (from the notion of dust) is the original meaning of the word. Gesenius, however, rejects this opinion (Thesaur. s. v.; see MV.¹¹).

In one passage שָׁמַיִם is rendered "heaven" (Ps. lxxvii. 18), but the word means "a wheel," as it is everywhere else translated. The verse should be rendered "The voice of thy thunder was in the rolling," or "in the whirlwind" (R. V.; in Winkel, Ewald, and so too Gesenius, Hitzig, &c.). Kimchi, however, understands it of the globe or sphere of heaven, and he is followed by Luther and the A. V. Some have compared it to τροχὸς τῆς γενέσεως (Jas. iii. 6), which has no connexion with it.

In Ps. lxxviii. 4 עֲרֵבָה is rendered "heavens," but the meaning is "Him Who rideth through the deserts" (R. V.). The Targum and Talmud were here probably led astray by the analogy of Deut. xxxiii. 26. The LXX. and the Vulg. erroneously render it "the West" (Perowne on the Psalms, in loco).

In Is. v. 30 עֲרֵבָה is rendered "heavens." The R. V. renders it "clouds," and the marg. gives destructions. The Hebrew text is here doubtful.

In the N. T. we frequently have the word οὐρανός, which some consider to be a Hebraism, or a plural of excellence (Schleusner, Lex. Nov. Test. s. v.). St. Paul's expression ὡς τρίτου οὐρανοῦ (2 Cor. xii. 2) has led to much conjecture. Grotius said that the Jews divided the heaven into three parts: viz. 1. Nubiferum, the air or atmosphere, where clouds gather; 2. Astriferum, the firmament, in which the sun, moon, and stars are fixed; 3. Empyreum, or Angeliferum, the upper heaven, the abode of God and His Angels, i. e. 1. שָׁמַיִם (or רָקִיעַ); 2. עוֹלָם הַתִּיכוֹן (or שָׁמַיִם); and 3. עוֹלָם הָעֵלְיוֹן (or "heaven of heavens," שָׁמַיִם שְׁמַיִם). This curiously explicit statement is entirely unsupported by Rabbinic authority, but it is hardly fair of Meyer to call it a fiction, for it may be supposed to rest on some vague Biblical evidence (cp. Dan. iv. 12, "the fowls of the heaven;" Gen. xxiii. 17, "the stars of the heaven;" Ps. ii. 4, "He that sitteth in the heavens," &c.). The Rabbis spoke of two heavens (cp. Deut. x. 14, "the heaven and the heaven of heavens"), or seven (ἐπτά οὐρανοὺς οὐς τῆς ἀριθμοῦσι κατ' ἐπανάδασιν, Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. 7, 636). "Resch Lakisch dixit septem esse coelos, quorum nomina sunt, 1. velum; 2. expansum; 3. nubes; 4. habitaculum; 5. habitatio; 6. sedes fixa; 7. Araboth," or sometimes "the treasury." At the sin of Adam, God ascended into the first; at the sin of Cain, into the second; during the generation of Enoch, into the third, &c.; afterwards God descended downwards into the sixth at the time of Abraham, into the fifth during the life of Isaac, and so on down to the time of Moses, when He descended into the first (see many passages quoted by Wetstein, ad 2 Cor. xii. 2). Of all these definitions and deductions we may remark simply with Origen, ἐπτά δὲ οὐρανοὺς ἢ δῶς περιωρισμένον ἀριθμὸν αὐτῶν αἰ φερόμεναι ἐν ταῖς Ἐκκλησιαστικαῖς οὐκ ἀπαγγέλλουσι γραφαῖ (c. Cels. vi. 289).

If nothing has here been said on the secondary senses attached to the word "heaven," the omission is intentional. The object of this article is not practical, but exegetical; not theological, but critical and explanatory. A treatise on the nature and conditions of future beatitude would here be wholly out of place. We may however remark that as heaven was used metaphorically to signify the abode of Jehovah, it is constantly employed in the N. T. to signify the abode of the spirits of the just, and is described by symbols suggestive of light, and love, and peace (see for example Matt. v. 12, vi. 20; Luke x. 20, xii. 33; 2 Cor. v. 1; Col. i. 5).

HEAVE-OFFERING. [SACRIFICE.]

HE'BER (רָבֵר, once רָבֵר; Χόβαρ, Χόβερ, Ἄβαρ; Haber, Heber), a name wholly distinct from EBER (רָבֵר; Ἔβερ; Heber) and its cognate HEBREW [EBER; HEBREW].

Heber occurs in the O. T. as the name of the following individuals and houses:—

1. A grandson of Asher, and founder of a leading house or clan of that tribe (Gen. xli. 17; Num. xxvi. 45), whose line is perhaps

* So 1 Ch. viii. 17, with a softer pronunciation of the initial guttural. In 1 Ch. iv. 18, the name appears as Ἀβεισά (B.), but Ἀβερ (A.). In 1 Ch. v. 13, the reading is corrupt; and in 1 Ch. viii. 22, the LXX. seems to have read רָבֵר, Obed. The Vulgate transcribes both Heber and Eber by Heber, except in Judg. v. 11, 17, 21; v. 24, where it has Haber. Hence the Heber of Luke iii. 36, A. V.; corrected to Eber, R. V.

carried down to the fifth or sixth generation in 1 Ch. vii. 32-39 (see notes on this passage in Bp. Ellicott's Commentary).

2. A Judæan chief, son of Mered and his Jewish as distinct from his Egyptian wife, grandson of an otherwise unknown Ezra, and "father" or founder of Socho (1 Ch. iv. 18). [SOCHO.]

3. The head of a Gadite house or clan, settled in the Bashan (1 Ch. v. 13).

4. An offshoot or subdivision of the Benjaminite clan of Elpaal (1 Ch. ix. 17).

5. A subdivision of the Benjaminite clan of Shashak (1 Ch. ix. 22).

6. The Kenite, the husband of Jael, the heroine of the Song of Deborah (Judg. v. 24 sq.). Heber was the head of a Kenite clan, belonging to that branch of this interesting people which claimed descent from Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses (Num. x. 29), and was settled in the extreme south of Canaan (Judg. i. 16). [KENITES.] He and his clan had migrated to the north, and were encamped in the neighbourhood of Kedesh at the time of his wife's famous exploit (Judg. iv. 11, 17). [JAEI.] [C. J. B.]

HEBERITES, THE הֵבֵרִי (B. δ Χοβηπει, AF. -ι (v. 29); Hoberitæ), descendants of Heber, a branch of the tribe of Asher.

HEBREW, HEBREWS (עִבְרִיָּה, עִבְרִיָּה, עִבְרִיָּה, עִבְרִיָּה; 'Εβραῖος, 'Εβραϊκός; Hebraicus, Hebraei, Hebraicus). In modern usage, "Hebrews" is a synonym of "Jews" or "Israelites" (cp. Shakespeare's "an Ebrew Jew"), and Hebrew is the common designation of their ancient language. In the O. T., the term is not used at all in the latter sense. The sacred tongue is either "the lip (= speech) of Canaan" (Is. xix. 18), a fact which indicates what is otherwise known from Phœnician inscriptions—the close dialectical affinity of the language of Israel with that of Tyre and Sidon; or "Jewish," a later appellation, dating from the time when the southern kingdom had become the sole surviving representative of the nation (2 K. xviii. 26; Neh. xiii. 24). At a still later period, when an Aramaic dialect had displaced the old language of Judæa, the new vernacular was called "Hebrew;" so that we find Aramaic forms like Bethesda, Gabbatha, Golgotha, styled Hebrew in the N. T. (John v. 2; xix. 13, 17).^a

In this connexion we may note that the Greek 'Εβραῖος, whence the Latin Hebraeus and our "Hebrew," was directly derived, not from the old and strictly Hebrew term עִבְרִי, 'Ibri, but from the Aramaic עִבְרָאִי, 'Ibray; חֵבְרָא, 'Ebrāyā.

^a The psalms which were the war-songs of Judas Maccabeus were, doubtless, some of those comprised in the canonical collection (2 Macc. xii. 37). And an official revival of Hebrew is attested by the coins of the period. On the other hand, the words reported to have been spoken by our Lord on certain solemn occasions, e.g. Talitha kumi (Mark v. 41), are Aramaic; and it seems probable that the "Hebrew" in which St. Paul addressed the Jews (Acts xxi. 40, xxii. 2) was Palestinian Aramaic. As distinguished from this language, the true Hebrew came to be known as "the sacred tongue" (לשון הקודש).

As a national name, the term "Hebrew" ('Ibri) first appears in a very ancient historical fragment preserved in the Book of Genesis, where we read of "Abram the Hebrew" (Gen. xiv. 13).^b According to analogy, this expression can only refer to Abram's tribal or national extraction; that is, to his descent from עֵבֶר, 'Eber [EBER]. The Patriarch is called a Hebrew, or rather an Ibrite, to distinguish him from his Amorite (Canaanite) allies. Whether Eber was ever a strictly personal* or always a tribal designation, is perhaps immaterial for present purposes. It seems enough to note that Shem is called, in the older source of Genesis (J), "the father of all the benē 'Eber" (Gen. x. 21), and that benē 'Eber is as evidently a national designation as benē Lōt (Ps. lxxiii. 8), or benē Qēdēm (Job i. 3), or benē Yisrā'el. But if we ask what tribes or peoples were included under this designation, we find that it is a name of the widest reference, including, according to the same source (the Jahvist), Jektan and his numerous sons (that is, the tribes of W. and S. Arabia, and probably the eastern shore of the Red Sea; Gen. x. 25-30), as well as all the peoples which, like Ishmael, Edom, and Israel, claimed descent from Abram the Ibrite. Further, if Peleg (Gen. x. 25) denotes an Aramean stock or country, as it appears to do from the ethnographic genealogy given in what is probably a later source (the Priestly Legislation, Gen. xi. 17 sq., P), the benē 'Eber included Aramean peoples beyond the Euphrates (Serug, Nabor). With this may perhaps be compared the obscure passage, Num. xxiv. 24, where Asshur and Eber stand side by side. Another passage of the Jahvist so far agrees with it, in that Qemuel the son of Nabor, Abraham's brother, is there called "the father of Aram," i.e. of the Aramean peoples (Gen. xxii. 20 sq.).^c

No positive results follow from the comparison of עֵבֶר, 'Eber, the proper name (Gen. x. 21), with its homophone עֲבֶרָה, which, as a noun, means "the country on the other side," usually of a river, רֹד פְּעָרָה. הַ פְּעָרָה, whether the Euphrates (עֲבֶרָה הַנְּהַר), Is. vii. 20) or the Jordan (עֲבֶרָה הַיַּרְדֵּן), Gen. l. 10, 11, and often). It is obvious that the use of such an expression must be relative to the position of the person

^b The value of this narrative, as a whole, has of late years received independent confirmation from cuneiform research. See Schrader, KAT. 2 ad loc.

^c Some may think it a personal name in 1 Ch. v. 13, viii. 12, 22; Neh. xii. 20.

^d According to P, Aram is a son of Shem, and brother of Arphaxad the grandfather of Eber (Gen. x. 22-24). In the same list Eber is grandson of Arphaxad (v. 13, 14). Ewald interpreted this to mean that the Hebrew peoples had a tradition that their original home was in Arrapachitis (Ptolemy, vi. 1), N. of Assyria. Without assuming the identity of this name with Ur-Casdim (so Kuenen, Religion of Israel, i. 114, note), which the progress of cuneiform discovery has shown to be wrong, we may still hold, with these great scholars, that other names in the list, e.g. Serug, Nabor, Haran, mark stages in the progress of the Hebrew migrations from the north-east to the south and south-west. Ewald sees in Abraham's departure from Ur of the Chaldees [Ur], and in Jacob's from Charran, "only continuations of the migratory movements of this primitive people" (Hist. Isr., pp. 268 sq., 284-287, Eng. Tr.).

who uses it. Accordingly, in the passages just cited it denotes the country east of the rivers; but in Num. xxxiii. 19, 1 K. iv. 24, it designates their western sides. Yet many, following the Jewish interpreters (Midrash Bereshith Rabba; Rashi),* have supposed that Abram was originally called "the Hebrew" (Ibrite) by the Canaanites, because he came as an immigrant into their country from the other side ('éber) of the Great River. They support their opinion by the assertion that Hebrews continued to be the name by which Abram's descendants the Israelites were known to foreigners, while Israel or bené Israel was the title they preferred among themselves. But it does not appear that Abraham's tribe was the first or the only one that crossed the Euphrates and wandered into Syria-Palestine (see note †). Similar movements of nomadic tribes must have often occurred in antiquity. Nor can the supposed distinction be established from the usage of the O. T., where foreigners often speak of "Israel." Besides, if throughout the O. T. period the bené Israel were known to foreigners as Hebrews, it would be strange that no trace of this name should be found in the contemporary records of Egypt and Assyria. This, however, is actually the case.†

The simple truth is that Israel or bené Israel was the collective name of the people whose gentile designation was Hebrews or Ibrites.

The term Israelite (יִשְׂרָאֵלִי, fem. יִשְׂרָאֵלִית) is of late origin, and occurs only in a single passage (Lev. xxiv. 10, 11).‡ [C. J. B.]

HEBREW LANGUAGE [see SHEMITIC LANGUAGES].

HEBREWESS (עִבְרִיָּה; Ἑβραία; Hebraea).
A Hebrew woman (Jer. xxxiv. 9).

* The LXX. renders יִבְרִי by ἰβερῆς, as if the word were to be pointed יִבְרִי; cp. 1 Sam. xlii. 7, Sept. Aquila corrects into ἰβερῆς, "the man from the other side," a term used by Josephus for a Pereaean (Bell. Jud. ii. 20, 4).

† The Aperiu, Apuriu, Apura, or Aper, of the Egyptian monuments, a people famous for horse-breeding and horsemanship, who were still settled in the nome of Heliopolis long after the Exodus, are no longer supposed to have anything to do with the Hebrews (Ebers, Aegypten, i. 316; Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, Eng. Tr. by M. Brodrick, pp. 318 sq.). Nor has any trace of the name Hebrews been found in cuneiform documents. The northern kingdom was the Land or House of Chumri or Chumria, the southern the Land of Yaúdu or Yaúdi, to the Assyrian invaders of Israel and Judah. Tiglath-Pileser II. calls Abaz Yaúdiá, a Jew; and so Hezekiah is styled Sennacherib. It is very doubtful whether Achabba máh Sir'iláí, "Abah the Sir'ilite," mentioned by Shalmaneser II., is to be identified with Abah of Israel. We might transcribe Su'uláí, as well as Sir'iláí. On the other hand, Israel očur on the Moabite stone (9th cent. B.C.), as was only to be expected, in the case of an inscription belonging to a kindred people close at hand, and speaking the same language.

‡ Cruden gives sixteen references for Israelite, Israelites, and two for Israelitish, in the O. T. In 2 Sam. xvii. 25 the true reading is Ishmaelite, as corrected by the Chronicler (1 Ch. ii. 17). In all the other passages the Hebrew term is Israel, except Lev. i. c.

I. TEXT.—The original authorities for determining the text of the Epistle are, as in the case of the other Books of the New Testament, numerous and varied. There are, however, from the circumstances of the history of the Epistle, comparatively few quotations from it, and these within a narrow range, during the first three centuries.

The Epistle is contained in whole or in part in the following sources:—

i. Manuscripts.—The entire Epistle is preserved in the Primary Uncials, \aleph , A, D₂; in the Secondary Uncials, K₂, P₂; and in nearly three hundred cursivæ MSS., which are known more or less completely. The Vatican MS. (B) is defective after ix. 14, καθα[ρίστ]; and L₂ after xiii. 10, ἐκ ἔχουσι. More or less considerable fragments of the Epistle are found in C, H₂, M₂, N₂, and in two MSS. described by Dr. C. R. Gregory, ψ (nearly complete) and ζ .

The Epistle is not contained in the Graeco-Latin MSS. F₂, G₂. The Greek archetype of these MSS. was mutilated before either of them was written.

ii. Versions.—There are two distinct Latin texts of the Epistle: the Old Latin, represented by d (the Latin version of D₂), of which e is a copy with a few corrections; and the Vulgate Latin. The Old Latin text is singularly corrupt; and the Vulgate seems not to have been made by the author of the translation of the Epistles of St. Paul. The Epistle is also contained in the two Syriac Versions, the Peshitto and the Harclean; and the missing portion of the latter Version, which is found in the Cambridge MS., has recently been published by Prof. Bensly (1889). The Peshitto text is supposed to be the work of a distinct translator (Wichelhaus, De Vers. Simp. p. 86). Of the three Egyptian Versions of the Epistle, the Memphitic (Coptic) is complete; of the Thebaic (Sahidic) and the Bashmuri, which was derived from the Thebaic, only fragments remain.

The Epistle is found entire in the latter Versions, Armenian, Aethiopic, Slavonic; but it appears not to have been included in the Gothic (Bernhardt, Vulfilá, &c., s. xxiv.).

The text of the Epistle is on the whole well preserved, but there are some passages in which it is not unlikely that primitive errors have passed into all our existing copies: e.g. iv. 2; xi. 4, 37; xii. 11; xiii. 21; see also x. 1. Some primitive errors have been corrected in later MSS.: vii. 1; xi. 35.

The following passages offer variations of considerable interest, and serve as instructive exercises on the principles of textual criticism:

i. 2, 8; ii. 9; iv. 2; vi. 2, 3; ix. 11; x. 34; xi. 13; xii. 7.

The general contrast between the early and later texts is well seen by an examination of the readings in i. 2, 3, 12: ii. 1, 14; iii. 1, 9; v. 4; vi. 10; vii. 11, 16; viii. 4, 11; ix. 1, 9, 10; xi. 3, 13; xii. 15, 18, 20; xiii. 9.

II. TITLE.—In the oldest MSS. (BNA: C is defective, but it has the subscription ΠΡΟΣ ΕΒΡΑΙΟΥΣ) the title of the Epistle, like that of the other Epistles to Churches, is simply ΠΡΟΣ ΕΒΡΑΙΟΥΣ, "to Hebrews." There is no title or colophon to the Epistle in D_2 , but it has a running heading ΠΡΟΣ ΕΒΡΑΙΟΥΣ. The Egyptian Versions have the same simple title, To the Hebrews. This inscription was gradually enlarged. Later Greek MSS. give Παύλου ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Ἑβραίους, as in the Epistle to the Romans &c. (P_2), and, at greater length, τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ πανευφήμου ἀποστόλου Παύλου ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Ἑβραίους (L_2). Sometimes historical statements are inwoven in the title: ἐγγράφη ἀπὸ Ἰταλίας διὰ Τιμοθέου ἢ πρὸς Ἑβραίους ἐπιστολὴ ἐκτεθείσα ὡς ἐν πίνακι (M_2); Παῦλος ἀπόστολος Ἑβραίων τῆσε συγγενείῳ (f. Scr.).

The title forms no part of the original document; but it must have been given to the Book at a very early date, when it first passed into public use as part of a collection of apostolic letters. And it was rightly given in regard to the permanent relation which the Book occupies towards the whole message of the Gospel. For, while the treatment of the subjects with which it deals and the subjects themselves are of universal interest, the discussion is directed by special circumstances. The arguments and reflections in their whole form and spirit, even more than in special details, are addressed to "Hebrews,"—men, that is, whose hearts were filled with the thoughts, the hopes, the consolations, of the Old Covenant, such perhaps as, under another aspect, are described as of ἐκ περιτομῆς (Acts x. 45, xi. 21; Gal. ii. 12; Col. iv. 11; Tit. i. 10).

Tertullian has preserved an interesting notice of another name, which was given to the Epistle in North Africa, and which apparently dates from a time earlier than the formation of the collection of Apostolic Epistles. He quotes it definitely as Barnabae titulus ad Hebraeos (de Pudic. 20); and the number of στίχοι assigned to the Epistle of Barnabas which is included in the African (Latin) Stichometry contained in the Cod. Clarom. (D_2) proves beyond reasonable doubt that the Epistle to the Hebrews is there described by that name. There is not, however, the least evidence that this Epistle was ever called "the Epistle to the Laodiceans" (not in Philastr. Haer. 29 or Cod. Boern. G_2), or "the Epistle to the Alexandrines" (Can. Murat.: "fertur etiam ad Laudicenses [epistola], alia ad Alexandrinos Pauli nomine finctae ad haerese Marcionis, et alia plura quae in Catholicam ecclesiam recipi non potest"), although it might be described as "directed to meet (πρὸς τὴν ἀρεσιν) the teaching of Marcion" (cp. Hist. of N. T. Canon, p. 537).

Wherever the nature of the Book is defined by early writers it is called an "Epistle." The description is substantially correct, though the construction of the writing is irregular. It opens without any address or salutation (cp.

1 John i. 1), but it closes with salutations (xiii. 24 sq.). There are indeed personal references throughout, and in the course of the Book there is a gradual transition from the form of an "essay" to that of a "letter": ii. 1; iii. 1, 12; iv. 1, 14; v. 11; vi. 9; x. 19; xiii. 7, 22 sq.

The writer himself characterises his composition as λόγος παρακλήσεως (xiii. 22); and the verb which he uses of his communication (διὰ βραχέων ἐπέστειλα, l. c.), while it does not necessarily describe a letter, yet presupposes a direct personal address, though personal relationships are kept in the background till the end.

III. POSITION.—The places occupied by the Epistle in different authorities indicate the variety of opinions which were entertained in early times as to its authorship.

In the oldest Greek MSS. (NABC) it comes immediately before the Pastoral Epistles following 2 Thess.; and this is the position which it generally occupies in MSS. of the Memphitic Version (Woide, App. Cod. Alex. N. T. p. 19; Lightfoot ap. Scrivener, Introd. pp. 386 sq., 390). This order is followed also by many later MSS. (H_2P , 17, &c.), and by many Greek Fathers.

In Cod. Vat. (B) there is important evidence that it occupied a different position in an early collection of Pauline Epistles. In this MS. there is a marginal numeration which shows that the whole collection of Pauline Epistles was divided, either in its archetype or in some earlier copy, into a series of sections numbered consecutively. In this collection the Epistle to the Hebrews came between the Epistles to the Galatians and to the Ephesians.

This arrangement preserved by B approximates to that of the Thebaic and Bashmuric Versions, in which the Epistle comes between 2 Corinthians and Galatians (Zoega, Cat. Codd. in Mus. Borg. pp. 186, 140; cp. Lightfoot ap. Scrivener, l. c. pp. 339, 404). Cassiodorus (Instit. 14) gives another arrangement of the same type, placing the Epistle between Colossians and 1 Thessalonians.

In the Syriac Versions the Epistle comes after the Pastoral Epistles and Philemon; and this order, which was followed in the mass of later Greek MSS. (K_2 , L_2 , &c.), probably under Syrian influence, has passed into the "Received text." Cp. Epiph. Haer. xlii. p. 373.

The same order is found in Latin MSS. For in the West the Epistle did not originally form part of the collection of the writings of St. Paul; and other clear traces remain of the absence of the Book from the apostolic collection. Thus in Cod. Clarom. D_2 the Epistle appears as an appendix to the Pauline Epistles, being separated from the Epistle to Philemon by the Stichometry. The archetype of this MS., and the original text from which the Gothic Version was made, evidently contained only thirteen Epistles of St. Paul.

Thus at the earliest date at which we find a collection of St. Paul's Epistles in circulation in the Church, the Epistle to the Hebrews was by some definitely included in his writings, occupying a place either among or at the close of the Epistles to Churches: by others it was treated as an appendix to them, being set after the private letters: with others, again, it found no place at all among the apostolic writings.

IV. ORIGINAL LANGUAGE.—The earliest direct notice of the Epistle, quoted by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 14) from Clement of Alexandria, states that it "was written (by Paul) to Hebrews in the Hebrew language (i.e. the Aramaic dialect current in Palestine at the time, Acts xxiii. 2) and translated (into Greek) by Luke." This statement was repeated from Eusebius (and Jerome who depended on him), as it appears, and not from Clement himself, by a series of later writers both in the East and West (Theodoret, Euthalius, John of Damascus, Œcumenius, Theophylact, Primasius, Rabanus Maurus, Thomas Aquinas: see Bleek, p. 8 sq.; Credner, Eint. p. 533), but there is not the least trace of any independent evidence in favour of the tradition, nor is it said that any one had ever seen the original Hebrew document. The unsupported statement of Clement, which Origen discredits by his silence, is thus the whole historical foundation for the belief that the Epistle was written in "Hebrew." The opinion however, which was incorporated in the Glossa Ordinaria, became universally current in the West in the Middle Ages; and it was maintained by one or two scholars in the last century (J. Hallet, J. D. Michaelis). Lately it has again found a vigorous advocate in J. H. R. Biesenthal (Das Trostschriften d. Ap. Paulus an d. Hebräer, 1878; cp. Panek, Comm. in Ep. Proleg. § 2, 1882), who thinks that the Epistle was written in "the dialect of the Mishna, the language of the schools" in the Apostolic age, into which he has again rendered the Greek.

Not to dwell on the insufficiency of the statement of Clement, in the absence of all collateral external testimony, to justify the belief that the Epistle was written in Hebrew, internal evidence appears to establish absolutely beyond question that the Greek text is original and not a translation from any form of Aramaic. The vocabulary, the style, the rhetorical characteristics of the work, all lead to the same conclusion. It is (for example) impossible to imagine any Aramaic phrase which could have suggested to a translator the opening clause of the Epistle, ῥωλυμῆρας καὶ πολυτρόπως; and similar difficulties offer themselves throughout the Book in the free and masterly use of compound words which have no Aramaic equivalents (e.g. μετριοπαθεῖν, v. 2; εὐπερίστατος, xii. 1). The structure of the periods is bold and complicated, and the arrangement of the words is often singularly expressive (e.g. ii. 9). Paronomasias (e.g. i. 1; ii. 10; v. 8; vii. 23 sq.; ix. 28; x. 34, 38 sq.) are at least more likely to have been due to the writer than to have been introduced or imitated by a translator. But on the other hand stress must not be laid on a (falsely) assumed change in the meaning of διαθήκη in ix. 15 sq., or the obviously fortuitous hexameter in the common text of xii. 13.

A still more decisive proof that the Greek text is original lies in the fact that the quotations from the O. T. are all (except x. 30 || Deut. xxxii. 35) taken from the LXX., even when the LXX. differs from the Hebrew (e.g. ii. 7, παρ' ἀγγέλους; x. 38, καὶ ἐν ἵπποστέλιται; xii. 5 sq. μαστιγοῦ). And arguments are based on peculiarities of the LXX., so that the quotations cannot have been first introduced in the translation from Aramaic to Greek (e.g. x. 5 sq., σῶμα καθήρησιν; xii. 26 sq., ἄραξ).

V. DESTINATION.—The letter is described in all existing copies as addressed "to Hebrews"; and Tertullian, who assigned the authorship to Barnabas, gave it the same destination (de Pudic. 20, "Barnabae titulus ad Hebraeos"). There is, as has been already seen (§ III.), no evidence that it ever bore any other address.

In itself the title "Hebrew" is not local but national. It describes a quality of race and not of dwelling. But the Book itself enables us to define more exactly the circumstances and character of those to whom it was written.

There is no trace of any admixture of heathen converts among them; nor does the letter touch on any of the topics of heathen controversy (not xiii. 9). It is therefore scarcely possible that it could have been written to a mixed Church generally, or to the Jewish section of a mixed Church. In either case allusions to the relations of Jew and Gentile could scarcely have been avoided.

They were a small body (v. 12), and they were addressed separately from "their leaders" (xiii. 24). At the same time they were in a position to be generous, and for this trait they were and had been distinguished (vi. 10).

Their special trials came through disappointment of their first expectations. They had failed to grow under the discipline of experience, and so had degenerated: v. 11 sq. (καὶ ἠδὲ γὰρ ἐγενήθησαν); vi. 1; x. 25.

The widening breach between the Church and the Synagogue rendered it necessary at last to make choice between them, and "the Hebrews" were in danger of apostasy: ii. 1, 3; iii. 6, 12 sq.; iv. 1, 3, 11; vi. 6; x. 25, 29, 39. They had need therefore of effort and patience: iv. 14; vi. 11 sq.; x. 23, 36; xii. 1, 3 sq., 12 sq.

In earlier days they had borne reproach and hardships: x. 32 sq.; still they "had not yet resisted unto blood": xii. 3 sq.; though some at least "in bonds" claimed their sympathy and help: xiii. 3; and perhaps their former "leaders" had suffered even to martyrdom (xiii. 7).

From these individual traits it is clear that the letter is addressed to a definite Society and not to "Hebrew" Christians generally. This is proved yet more directly by the fact that the writer hoped to visit them (xiii. 23), as he had been with them before (xiii. 19). At the same time, though he spoke of them as "brethren" (iii. 1) and "beloved" (vi. 1), he does not speak of them as "children" (τέκνα).

The living portraiture of the character and position of this definite and marked Society will repay careful study (v. 11 sq.; vi. 9 sq.; x. 32 sq.; xii. 3 sq.); and whatever obscurity may hang over its local position, its spiritual features stand out with vivid clearness. We have in the Epistle to the Hebrews a picture of early Christian life such as is drawn in detail nowhere else (cp. 3 John), and which still, as we must see, represents a necessary phase in the growth of the Church. The first enthusiasm and the first hope had passed away. Believers began to reckon loss and gain. Some were inclined to overrate the loss; and we learn elsewhere that dark clouds hung over the close of the Apostolic age. Cp. 2 Tim. i. 15; Apoc. ii. iii.; 2 Pet. iii. 1 sq.; 1 John ii. 18 sq.

We might have expected it to be otherwise, and we do in fact unconsciously clothe the first centuries in light. But in this Letter the reality of imperfection meets us; and in the very sadness of the portraiture we feel with fresh force that Christianity is historical, entering into life, and subject to the common influences of life.

The phase of feeling traced in the Epistle has been spoken of as a necessary one in the development of Christian life. It is not difficult to see how this was so. Those who suffered in the trial were Jews; and the narrative of the Acts shows plainly with what loyal devotion the first believers from among the Jews observed the Law. Even at a later date St. Paul before the Sanhedrin claimed to be a true Jew. For a time this fellowship of the Church and Synagogue was allowed on both sides (cp. Euseb. H. E. ii. 23). Little by little the growth of the Gentile element in the Church excited the active hostility of the Jews against the whole body of Christians, as it troubled the Jewish converts themselves. This hostility could not fail to be intensified in Palestine by the spread of aggressive nationalism there shortly before the outbreak of the Jewish war (cp. Jos. de B. J. ii. 23, 29 sq.; iv. 11 sq.); and it is not unlikely that the solemn cursing of the heretics (Misim) in the Synagogues, which became an established custom after the fall of Jerusalem (Weber, Altzmag. Theol. 147 sq.), may have begun from that time (cp. Just. M. Dial. 16, and Otto's note; Epiph. Haer. xxix. 9, i. p. 124).

Meanwhile the Jewish converts had had ample time for realising the true relations of Christianity and Judaism. Devotion to Levitical ritual was no longer innocent, if it obscured the characteristic teaching of the Gospel. The position which rightly belonged to young and immature Christians was unsuited to those who ought to have reached the fulness of truth (v. 11 sq.). Men who won praise for their faith and constancy at the beginning of a generation, which was emphatically a period of transition, might well deserve blame and stand in peril of apostasy, if at the end of it they simply remained where they had been at first. While as yet the national unbelief of the Jews was undeclared, it was not possible to foresee that the coming of Christ would bring the overthrow of the old order. The approaching catastrophe is not realised in the earlier Apostolic writings. In the Epistle to the Hebrews it is shown to be imminent. In the Gospel and Epistles of St. John it is, as it were, lost in the fulness of the life of the Church.

We can see then, generally, what was the character of the body to whom the Letter was addressed. Where can we look for such a body? Some have found it in the "Hebrew" Christians of Asia Minor generally, or in some special congregation of Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, or Africa, and more particularly at Antioch or Rome or Alexandria. Lately the opinion that the Letter was addressed to the Roman Church has found considerable favour. But the dominant conception of the Old Testament Institutions as centering in sacrificial and priestly ordinances seems to be fatal to all these theories, which are not supported by any direct evidence, for no conclusion can be fairly drawn as to the original destination of the Epistle from the fact that Clement of Rome was acquainted with it. Such a view, unlike that of the observance of special days or meats, must be generally dependent in a large measure upon local circumstances of a narrow range. It is possible, indeed, that special circumstances with which we are unacquainted may have influenced the feelings of a small society, and there was in fact a "Synagogue of Hebrews" at Rome (Schürer, Gesch. d. Jüd. Volkes, ii. 517); but we naturally look, if there is nothing to determine our search otherwise, to some place where Judaism would present itself with practical force under this aspect.

In this way our choice is limited to Egypt, with the Temple at Leontopolis, and to Palestine, with the Temple at Jerusalem. Nowhere else would the images of sacrifice and intercession be constantly before the eye of a Jew.

There is very little evidence to show that the Temple at Leontopolis exercised the same power over the Alexandrian Jews as that at Jerusalem exercised over the Palestinian Jews and the Jews generally. Even in Egypt the Temple at Jerusalem was recognised as the true centre of worship. Nor is there the least ground for thinking that any of the divergences in the Epistle from the details of the Temple ceremonial coincide with peculiarities in the service at Leontopolis. On the contrary the furniture of the Temple at Jerusalem was more like that of the Tabernacle, which is described in the Epistle, than was that of the Egyptian Temple. But on the other hand it is certain that the kind of feeling which the Epistle is designed to meet must have been powerful at Jerusalem, and in its neighbourhood. The close connexion of the early Church with the Temple, the splendour and venerable majesty of the ritual, could not fail to make the thought of severance from Judaism most grievous to those who had hitherto been able to share in its noblest services according to the custom of their youth.

Nor is it a serious objection to this conclusion that the Temple is nowhere mentioned in the Epistle, and that the ritual details are those of the Tabernacle and not those of the second Temple. The readers were influenced by the actual form in which the Mosaic ordinances were embodied. The writer, perhaps from his external circumstances, or more probably in order to lay his reasoning on its deepest foundation, goes back to the first institution of the system. He shows how the original design of the priestly ritual of the Law, and therefore, of necessity, of all partial and specific embodiments of it, was satisfied by Christ. The Temple service, with all its peculiarities, finally drew its sanction from the Law. The ritual of the Tabernacle was the divine type of which the ritual of the Temple was the authoritative representation. And, according to the popular tradition, it was believed that "the Tabernacle" and its furniture, which had been removed by Jeremiah from the first Temple before its destruction, would in due time be restored (2 Macc. ii. 4 sq., and Grimm's notes).

And further it must be added that the Temple, like the kingdom with which it was co-ordinate, was spiritually a sign of retrogression. It was an endeavour to give fixity to that which was essentially provisional. And thus the writer of the Epistle, by going back to the fundamental legislation, significantly indicates that the spirit of the Mosaic Law first found accomplishment in Christ, and not in that outward Levitical system in which it seemed superficially to receive its perfect embodiment.

It is then most reasonable from general considerations to find the Society to whom the Letter was addressed in Jerusalem, or in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem.

In accordance with this view, it may be added that Eusebius speaks on written authority (ἐξ ἐγγράφων) of the Church of Jerusalem as having "been wholly composed of Hebrews" (συνεστάναι τὴν πᾶσαν ἐκκλησίαν ἐξ Ἑβραίων πιστῶν, H. E. iv. 5; cp. vi. 14) up to the time of the revolt under Hadrian. Up to the same date all the Bishops were "of the circumcision" (l. c.).

So also in the Clementine Homilies (xi. 35), "James that is called brother of the Lord" is said to be "entrusted with the administration of the Church of the Hebrews in Jerusalem" (πεπιστευμένος ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ τὴν Ἑβραίων διέπειν ἐκκλησίαν); and "the letter of Clement" prefixed to the same work, is addressed to "James the lord and Bishop of Bishops, who administers the holy Church of Hebrews in Jerusalem" (διέποιτι τὴν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἁγίαν Ἑβραίων ἐκκλησίαν).

It may therefore be fairly concluded that when the title πρὸς Ἑβραίους was added to the Epistle, it was an expression of the belief that the letter was addressed to the Church of Jerusalem, or some sister Church in Palestine dependent upon it.

The conclusion which has been reached is not beyond doubt, but it satisfies the conditions of the problem most simply. It is indeed possible that exceptional circumstances which cannot now be determined may have given occasion to the Letter. It is, for example, quite conceivable, as has been already admitted, that a society of "Hebrews" at Rome may have been led to develop the sacrificial theory of Judaism and to insist upon it, and so to call out "the word of exhortation." Such conjectures, however, need not detain us. It is well to recognise how little we can determine by the help of the data at present available. That which is beyond doubt, that which indeed alone concerns us, is the spiritual character of the readers of the Epistle. This we can clearly grasp wherever it may have been developed. And it is unquestionable that it would be likely—most likely—to be developed in Palestine.

W. Grimm has discussed in considerable detail (Zeitschrift wissensch. Theol., 1870, 19 sq.) the claims of Rome, Jerusalem, and Alexandria to be considered as the place to which the Epistle was directed. He decides against all, and suggests Jamnia. It is better to acquiesce in simply recognising the conditions which the place must satisfy.

VI. DATE.—The date of the Epistle is fixed within narrow limits by its contents. A generation of Christians had already passed away (xiii. 7; ii. 3). There had been space for great changes in religious feeling (x. 32), and for religious growth (v. 11 sq.).

On the other hand, the Levitical service is spoken of as still continued (viii. 4: ix. 8, 9;

x. 1 sq.; xiii. 10 sq.); and, even if the references to its present continuance could be explained away (cp. Just. Dial. 117; Orig. c. Cels. v. 25), it is inconceivable that such a national calamity as the Jewish war should be unnoticed if it had already broken out, and still more, if it had been decided. Indeed, the prospect of exclusion from the privileges of the old service is the very essence of the trial of "the Hebrews;" and the severity of the trial is in itself a decisive proof of the influence which the Temple ritual exercised at the time.

The letter may then be placed in the critical interval between A.D. 64, the government of Gessius Florus, and 67, the commencement of the Jewish war, and most probably just before the breaking of the storm in the latter year, as the writer speaks of the visible signs of the approach of "the day" (x. 25; cp. viii. 13, ἐγγὺς ἀφανισμοῦ); and indicates the likelihood of severer trials for the Church (xii. 4, ὄπω; xiii. 13 sq.).

The theories which assign the Epistle to a later date, after the persecution of Domitian, or in the time of Trajan, seem to be utterly irreconcilable with the conditions and scope of the writing.

VII. PLACE OF WRITING.—Tradition is silent as to the place from which the Epistle was written. No independent authority can be given to the subscription which is found in A, ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Πρώμης. This, as in the case of similar subscriptions to the other Epistles, appears to have been a deduction from the Epistle itself (xiii. 23, 24). And so it is given in the words of the text, and enlarged in later MSS.: e.g. P₂, ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Ἰταλίας. K₂, ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Ἰταλίας διὰ Τιμοθέου. H₂, Παύλου ἀποστόλου ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Ἑβραίους ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Ἰταλίας διὰ Τιμοθέου. Nor again is there anything in the Epistle itself which leads to a definite conclusion. No argument can be drawn from the mention of the release of Timothy (xiii. 23), for nothing is known of the event to which reference is made; and the phrase ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας (xiii. 24), which seems at first sight to promise more, gives no certain result; for the words may be so rendered as to describe a body of Christians in Italy ("those in Italy send salutations from Italy," or more simply "those who belong to Italy," "Italian Christians"), or a body of Italian Christians who were with the writer in a foreign land ("those here from Italy"). The place of writing must therefore be left in complete uncertainty.

VIII. STYLE AND LANGUAGE.—The language of the Epistle is both in vocabulary and in style purer and more vigorous than that of any other Book of the N. T.

i. The vocabulary is singularly copious. It includes a large number of words which are not found elsewhere in the apostolic writings, very many of which occur in this Book only among the Greek Scriptures, and some which are not quoted from any other independent source. Even when allowance is made for the requirements of the peculiar topics with which the writer deals, the number of peculiar words is still remarkable. In the Pastoral Epistles, however, the proportion is still greater.

Dr. Thayer (Lexicon to N. T.) reckons the same number of peculiar words (168) in the Pastoral Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews, but the latter is the longer in about the proportion of 21 to 15.

The following words are not quoted from any source independent of the Epistle: ἀγενεαλόγητος (vii. 3); αἰματεκχυσία (ix. 22); ἐκτρομος (xii. 21, marg.); ἐπιπερίστατος (xii. 1); θεατρί(ζευ) (x. 33; ἐκθεατρί(ζευ) in Polyb.); μισθοδοότης (xi. 6) and μισθοδοσία (ii. 2; x. 35; xi. 26) for the classical μισθοδοότης and μισθοδοσία; πρόσχυσις (xi. 28); συγκακουεῖν (xi. 25); τελειωτής (xii. 2).

The list of classical words which are found in the Epistle and in no other part of the Greek Scriptures is large: ἀκλιής (x. 23); ἀκροθίνιον (vii. 4); ἀλυσιτελής (xiii. 17); ἀμήτωρ, ἀπάτωρ (vii. 3); ἀναλογί(ζεσθαι) (xii. 3); ἀνασταυροῦν (vi. 6); ἀνταγωνί(ζεσθαι) (xii. 4); διόρθωσις (ix. 10); ἐκδοχή (x. 27); ἐκλαυθάνειν (xii. 5); ἐνυβρί(ζειν) (x. 29); ἐπεισαγωγή (vii. 19); εὐαρέστωσις (xii. 28); κατὰδηλος (vii. 15); κατασκιά(ζευ) (ix. 5); ἄγκος (xii. 1); παρὰπλησίως (ii. 14); συμπθεῖν (iv. 15; x. 34); συνεπιμαρτυρεῖν (ii. 14); τομιώτερος (iv. 12); ὕπεικειν (xiii. 17).

Other words peculiar to the Epistle among Biblical writings belong to the later stage of Greek literature:—

ἀθέτησις (vii. 18; ix. 26); ἄθλησις (x. 32); ἀκατάλυτος (vii. 16); ἀμετάθετος (vi. 17 sq.); ἀπαράβατος (vii. 24); ἀφορᾶν (xii. 2); δυσερμηνεύτος (v. 11); εὐπλοία (xiii. 16); καταγωνί(ζεσθαι) (xi. 33); Λευτικὸς (vii. 11); μεσιτεύειν (vi. 17); μετρισταθεῖν (v. 2); πολυμερῶς, πολυτρόπως (i. 1); σαββατισμός (iv. 9); τραχηλί(ζευ) (iv. 13); τυμπανί(ζειν) (xi. 35); ὑποστολή (x. 39).

The absence of some words (e.g. πληροῦν, εὐαγγέλιον, οἰκοδομεῖν, μυστήριον) is remarkable.

ii. The style is even more characteristic of a practised scholar than the vocabulary. It would be difficult to find anywhere passages more exact and pregnant in expression than i. 1-4; ii. 14-18; vii. 26-28; xii. 18-24. The language, the order, the rhythm, the parenthetical involutions, all contribute to the total effect. The writing shows everywhere traces of effort and care. In many respects it is not unlike that of the Book of Wisdom, but it is nowhere marred by the restlessly striving after effect which not unfrequently injures the beauty of that masterpiece of Alexandrine Greek. The calculated force of the periods is sharply distinguished from the impetuous eloquence of St. Paul. The author is never carried away by his thoughts. He has seen and measured all that he desires to convey to his readers before he begins to write. In writing he has, like an artist, simply to give life to the model which he has already completely fashioned. This is true even of the noblest rhetorical passages, such as ch. xi. Each element, which seems at first sight to offer itself spontaneously, will be found to have been carefully adjusted to its place, and to offer in subtle details results of deep thought, so expressed as to leave the simplicity and freshness of the whole perfectly unimpaired. For this reason there is perhaps no Book of Scripture in which the student may hope more confidently to enter into the mind of the author if he yields himself with absolute trust to his words. No Book re- presents with equal clearness the mature conclusions of human reflection.

The contrast of the style of the Epistle with that of St. Paul may be noticed in the passages which are quoted as echoes of St. Paul's language: ii. 10: cp. Rom. xi. 36; iii. 6: cp. Rom. v. 2; xi. 12: cp. Rom. iv. 19. The richer fullness of expression is seen in corresponding phrases: e.g. Col. iii. 1, compared with xii. 2.

The writer does not use St. Paul's rhetorical forms τί οὖν; τί γάρ; ἀλλ' ἔρει τις . . . , μὴ γένοιτο, ἕρα οὖν, οὐκ οἶδα (Credner, Eitl., p. 547). On the other hand, we notice the peculiar phrases ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν, εἰς τὸ διηρηκέτι, ἔλαθον ἐξείσατες.

The close resemblance of the language of the Epistle to that of St. Luke was noticed by Clement of Alexandria (cp. Euseb. H. E. vi. 14: . . . Λουκᾶν [φησὶν] . . . μεθερμηνεύσαντα ἐκδοῦναι τοῖς Ἑλλησιν· ἔθεν τὸν αὐτὸν χροῖα ἐδρίσκεσθαι κατὰ τὴν ἐρμηνείαν ταύτης τε τῆς ἐπιστολῆς καὶ τῶν πράξεων—the form of expression is remarkable), and his criticism was repeated by later writers. The significance of the coincidences may have been overrated, but no impartial student can fail to be struck by the frequent use of words characteristic of St. Luke among the writers of the N. T., e.g. διαμαρτυρεῖσθαι (ii. 6), ἀρχηγός (ii. 10), ἔθεν (ii. 17), ἰδούσκεσθαι (ii. 17), μέτοχος (iii. 1), περικεῖσθαι accus. (v. 2), εὐθετος (vi. 7), καταφεύγειν (vi. 18), πατριάρχης (vii. 4), εἰς τὸ παντελές (vii. 25), σχεδόν (ix. 22), ἀνώτερον (x. 8), παροξυσμός (x. 24), ἐπαρξίς (x. 34), ἀναστᾶσεως τυγχάνειν (xi. 35), ἐντρομος (xii. 21), ἀσάλευτος (xii. 28), οἱ ἠγοῦμενοι (xiii. 7), ἀναθεραεῖν (xiii. 7).

IX. PLAN.—The general progress of thought in the Epistle is clear; but, at the same time, in a writing so many-sided, where subjects are naturally foreshadowed and recalled, differences of opinion must arise as to the main divisions of the argument. The following arrangement gives at least an intelligible view of the main relations of the different parts of the Book.

THE THEME OF THE EPISTLE; THE FINALITY OF CHRISTIANITY: I. 1-4.

THE SUPERIORITY OF THE SON, THE MEDIATOR OF THE NEW REVELATION, TO ANGELS: I. 5-II. 18.

II. MOSES, JOSHUA, JESUS, THE FOUNDERS OF THE OLD ECONOMY AND OF THE NEW: III., IV.

III. THE HIGH-PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST, UNIVERSAL AND SOVEREIGN (MELCHIZEDEK): V.-VII.

IV. THE FULFILMENT OF CHRIST'S PRIESTLY WORK: VIII. 1-X. 18.

V. THE APPROPRIATION AND VITAL APPLICATION OF THE TRUTH LAID DOWN: X. 19-XII.

A PERSONAL EPILOGUE: XIII.

These chief divisions can be followed a little more in detail:

THE THEME OF THE EPISTLE; THE FINALITY OF CHRISTIANITY: I. 1-4.

I. The contrast of the Old Revelation and the New in method, time, persons (vv. 1, 2).

II. The nature and the work of the Son, in regard to His Divine Personality and to the Incarnation (v. 3).

III. Transition to the development of the argument (v. 4).

- I. THE SUPERIORITY OF THE SON, THE MEDIATOR OF THE NEW REVELATION, TO ANGELS: I. 5-II. 18.
- i. The testimony of Scripture (I. 5-14).
 - ii. The peril of rejecting the new revelation through the Son (II. 1-4).
 - iii. The fulfilment of the divine destiny of man in the Son of man (Jesus) through suffering (II. 5-18).
- II. MOSES, JOSHUA, JESUS: THE FOUNDERS OF THE OLD ECONOMY AND OF THE NEW: III., IV.
- I. Moses and Jesus: the servant and the Son (III. 1-6).
 - (1) A general view of the dignity of Jesus (rv. 1, 2).
 - (2) Moses represents a house: Jesus the maker of it (rv. 3, 4).
 - (3) Moses a servant: Jesus a Son (rv. 5, 6).
 - II. The promise and the people under the Old and the New Dispensations (III. 7-IV. 13).
 - (1) The condition of faith (III. 7-19).
 - (2) The promise remaining (IV. 1-13).
 - III. Transition to the doctrine of the High-priesthood, resuming II. 17, 18 (IV. 14-16).
- III. THE HIGH-PRIESTHOOD OF CHRIST, UNIVERSAL AND SOVEREIGN (MELCHIZEDEK): V.-VII.
- i. The characteristics of a High-priest, sympathy and divine appointment, fulfilled in Christ (v. 1-10).
 - ii. Progress through patient effort the condition of the knowledge of Christian mysteries (v. 11-vi.).
 - iii. The characteristics of Christ, as absolute High-priest, shadowed forth by Melchizedek (King-priest) (vii.).
- IV. THE FULFILMENT OF CHRIST'S PRIESTLY WORK: VIII. 1-X. 18.
- I. A general view of the scheme and condition of Christ's High-priestly work (ch. viii.).
 - (1) The scheme of Christ's work (viii. 1-6).
 - (2) The new Covenant (rv. 7-13).
 - II. The Old Service and the New: the Atonement of the Law, and the Atonement of Christ (ch. ix.).
 - (1) The Sanctuary and Priests under the Old Covenant (ix. 1-10).
 - (2) The High-priestly Atonement under the New Covenant (rv. 11-28).
 - III. The Old Sacrifices and the New; abiding efficacy of Christ's one Sacrifice (x. 1-18).
A summary of reassurance.
- V. THE APPROPRIATION AND VITAL APPLICATION OF THE TRUTH LAID DOWN: X. 19-XII. 29.
- i. The privileges, perils, encouragements of the Hebrews (x. 19-39).
 - ii. The past triumphs of Faith (xi.).
 - iii. The general application of the lessons of the past to the present season of trial (xii.).
- A PERSONAL EPILOGUE: XIII.
Detailed and specific instructions. Close.

One feature in this plan will strike the student. The central portion of each of the first three divisions is mainly occupied with solemn warnings; while the last division is a most grave and earnest exposition of the duties which follow from the confession of Christ's priestly work. The writer is unwilling, even in the development of truth, to allow the loftiest conception of the Gospel to appear to be a theory only. It is for him intensely practical; and the note of entire and reverential awe closes his description of the privileges of Christians (xii. 28 sq.).

X. CHARACTERISTICS.—The Epistle to the Hebrews is one of three Books in the N. T. specially addressed to those who were Jews by descent, the other two being the Gospel according to St. Matthew and the Epistle of St. James (Jas. i. 1, ταῖς δώδεκα φυλαῖς). To these, however, 1 Peter, probably addressed to those who had passed through Judaism to Christianity, may be added (1 Pet. i. 1, ἐκλεκτοῖς παρεπιδήμοις διασπορᾶς Πόντου . . .).

Each of these Books is marked by a characteristic view of the Faith. St. Matthew, according to general consent, gives the lineaments of the Davidic King. In St. James we have the power of "a perfect law" (Jas. i. 25; ii. 8): in St. Peter the accomplishment of prophecy (1 Pet. i. 10-12): in the Epistle to the Hebrews the efficacy of an eternal priesthood (Heb. vii. 23 sq.).

This general connexion indicates the true position of the Epistle, which is a final development of the teaching of "the three," and not a special application of the teaching of St. Paul. It is, so to speak, most truly intelligible as the last voice of the Apostles of the circumcision, and not as a peculiar utterance of the Apostle of the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 9 sq.). The Apostles of the circumcision regarded Judaism naturally with sympathy and even with affection, as that through which they had been led little by little to see the meaning of the Gospel. The Apostle of the Gentiles, with all his love for his countrymen and all his reverence for the work wrought through the Old Covenant, no less naturally regarded Judaism, as it was, as a system which had made him a persecutor of the Faith. For St. Paul the Law is a code of moral ordinances; for the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, it is a scheme of typical provisions for atonement. For the one it is a crushing burden; for the other it is a welcome if imperfect source of consolation. And it is in virtue of this general interpretation of the spirit of the Levitical system that the unknown Apostle to whom we owe the Epistle to the Hebrews was fitted to fulfil for the Church the part which was providentially committed to him.

The difference between St. Paul and the writer of the Epistle in their view of the Law may be presented in another light. St. Paul regards the Law mainly in relation to the requirements of man's discipline; his fellow Apostle in relation to the fulfilment of God's counsel. For St. Paul the Law was an episode, intercalated, as it were, in the course of revelation (Rom. v. 20, παρεισήθηεν); for the writer of the Epistle, it was a shadow of the realities to which the promise pointed. It is closely connected with this fundamental distinctness of the point of vision of the two teachers that St. Paul dwells with dominant interest on the individual aspect of the Gospel, the writer of the Epistle on its social aspect: for the one the supreme contrast is between flesh and spirit, for the other between the image and the reality, the imperfect and the perfect; for the one Christ is the direct object of personal faith, for the other the fulfiller of the destiny of man.

But this difference, however real and intelligible, does not issue in any opposition between the two writers. Both views are completely satisfied by the Incarnation; and each writer recognises the truth which the other develops. In the Epistle to the Ephesians St. Paul gives the widest possible expression to the social lessons of the Faith; and the writer to the Hebrews emphasises with the most touching solemnity the significance of personal responsibility (e.g. ch. vi.). At the same time the writer to the Hebrews suggests the unity, the harmonious unfolding, of the Divine plan, in a way which is foreign to the mode of thought of him who was suddenly changed from a persecutor to an Apostle. His eyes rest on one heavenly archetype made known to men as they could bear the sight in various degrees. He presupposes a divine ideal of the phenomenal world and of outward worship. This, he argues, was shadowed forth in the Mosaic system; and found its perfect embodiment under the conditions of earth in the Christian Church. He looks therefore with deep sympathy upon the devotion with which the Hebrews had regarded the provisions made by the Law for dealing with the power and guilt of sin. He enters into their feelings and points out how Christ satisfied them by His Person and His work.

This being so, the circumstances in which the Hebrews were placed led him naturally to develop the conception of Christ's priestly office. They had experienced a double disappointment. The shame of the sufferings of the Messiah had not been effaced, as many had hoped, by a glorious Return. It became evident that the Jews as a people would not receive Him. The national unbelief of Israel, apart from all direct persecution, brought with it a growing alienation of the Synagogue from the Church. The right of participation in the ministrations of the Temple could not, it became more and more clear, be retained by Christians who held their faith. The Hebrew Christians therefore were constrained to ask, whether there was to be no kingdom for Israel? Whether Christians were to be deprived of the manifold consolations of sacrificial worship and priestly atonement? The Epistle is an answer to the questions. The writer shows that the difficulty which arose from the sufferings of the Son of man (Jesus) included the solution of the difficulty which was felt in exclusion from the Temple: that he who remained a Jew outwardly could not but miss in the end the message and the inheritance of Christ, just as the Christian who understands his position is essentially independent of every support of the Old Covenant and heir of all its promises: that which seemed to be the weakness of the Gospel was revealed upon a closer vision to be its strength. In proportion as men can feel what Christ is (such is the writer's argument) they can feel also how His death and His advocacy more than supply the place of all sacrifices and priestly intercessions, how they lay open the victory of humanity in the Son of man over sin and death. In other words, under this light the Death of Christ becomes intelligible in itself without regard to the thought of a Return. The sense of His present priestly action gains a new force. The paradox of a suffering Messiah is disclosed in its own glory.

At the same time the writer goes beyond Judaism. The Gospel, as he presents it, is the fulfilment of the purpose of Creation and not only of the Mosaic system. Melchizedek is a more prominent figure in his treatment of the O. T. than Abraham. Thus the work of Judaism is made to appear as a stage in the advance towards a wider work which could not be achieved without a preparatory discipline. So regarded, the provisions of the Law can be seen in their full meaning, and by the help of their typical teaching a suffering Messiah can be acknowledged by the true Jew in His Majesty.

Thus the immediate purpose of the writer was fulfilled: and that which was an answer to the difficulties of the Hebrew Christian has been made the endowment of the whole Church. For in this Epistle we have what is found in no other Book of the N. T., that which may be called a philosophy of religion, of worship, of priesthood, centered in the Person of Christ. The form of the doctrine is determined by the O. T. foundations, but the doctrine itself is essentially new. In the light of the Gospel the whole teaching of the O. T. is seen to be a prophecy, unquestionable in the breadth and fulness of its scope.

But while the thoughts of the absolute value of Christ's sufferings and of the application of their virtue to men are brought out with prevailing force, it is not argued that all difficulty is removed from the present prospect of Christianity. There are still, the writer implies, difficulties in the state of things which we see. We cannot escape from them. But enough can be discerned to enable men to wait patiently for the appointed end. There is a triumph to come; and, in looking forward to this, Christians occupy the position which the Saints have always occupied, the position of faith, of faith under trials. The heroic records of ch. xi. lead up to the practical charge of xii. 1 sq.

Meanwhile the writer calls upon his readers to make their choice boldly. Judaism was becoming, if it had not already become, anti-Christian. It must be given up (xiii. 19). It was "near vanishing away" (viii. 13). It was no longer debated whether a Gentile Church could stand beside the Jewish Church, as in the first period of conflict in the apostolic age; or whether a Jewish Church should stand beside the Gentile Church, as in the next period. The Christian Church must be one and independent. And thus the Epistle is a monument of the last crisis of conflict out of which the Catholic Church rose.

This view of the relation of the Church to the Temple is the more impressive from the prominence which is assigned in the Epistle to the O. T., both to the writings and to the institutions which it hallows. There is not the least tendency towards disparagement of the one or the other. From first to last it is maintained that God spoke to the fathers in the Prophets. The message through the Son takes up and crowns all that had gone before. In each respect the New is the consummation of the Old. It offers a more perfect and absolute Revelation, carrying with it a more perfect and absolute Mediation, and establishing a more perfect and absolute Covenant, embodying finally the connexion of God and man. There is nothing in the Old which is not taken up and transfigured in the New.

For it is assumed throughout the Epistle that all visible theocratic institutions answer to a Divine antitype (archetype). They are (so to speak) a translation into a particular dialect of eternal truths: a representation under special conditions of an absolute ideal. In some sense which we can feel rather than define, the eternal is declared to lie beneath the temporal (xii. 27). In virtue of this truth, the work of Christ and the hope of the Christian are both described under Jewish imagery, without the least admixture of the millenarian extravagances which gained currency in the second century. There is for the believer a priestly consecration (x. 22), an altar (xiii. 10), a sabbath-rest (iv. 9).

It follows therefore that in studying the Levitical ritual we must recognise that there is a true correspondence of the seen with the unseen, a correspondence which extends to the fulness of life, and not simply a correspondence of a world of ideas (κόσμος νοητός), as Philo supposed, to a world of phenomena.

The same principle holds still under the Christian dispensation. We see the reality but only in figures (e.g. Rev. xxi. 16). Judaism was the shadow, and Christianity is the substance; yet both are regarded under the conditions of earth.

But the figures have an abiding significance. There is a heavenly city in the spiritual world, an organised body of rational beings; "a congregation" (ἐκκλησία) which answers to the full enjoyment of the privileges of social life: xi. 10 (ἡ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐκκ. πόλις); xi. 16; xii. 22 sq. (cp. viii. 11; xi. 10; xiii. 14). There is also a heavenly sanctuary there, which was the pattern of the earthly, to confirm the eternal duty and joy of worship: viii. 2, 5.

In this aspect the Epistle fulfils a universal work. It is addressed to Hebrews, and meets, as we have seen, their peculiar difficulties, but at the same time it deals with the largest views of the Faith. This it does not by digression or contrast. It discloses the catholicity of the Gospel by the simple interpretation of its scope. It does not insist on the fact as anything new or strange. It does not dwell on "the breaking down of the middle wall of partition" (Ephes. ii. 14), or on "the mystery which in other ages was not made known . . . that the Gentiles are . . . fellow-partakers of the promise in Christ Jesus" (Ephes. iii. 4 sq.; Rom. xvi. 25 sq.). The equality of men as men in the sight of God is implied in the declaration which is made of the Person and the Work of Christ. Faith is the condition of a divine fellowship, and that is essentially universal. The truth that there is no difference between Jew and Gentile has passed beyond the stage of keen controversy. It is acknowledged in the conception which has been gained of the Incarnation.

Viewed in this light, the Epistle to the Hebrews forms a complement to the Gospel of St. John. Both Books assume the universality of Christianity as the one religion of humanity without special argument (cp. John i. 12). Both regard "the Jews"—the men who clung to that which was transitory as if it were absolute and eternal—as enemies of Christ. Both recognise completely the provisional office of the Old Dispensation (John iv. 22). But they do this from different sides. The Epistle to the Hebrews enables us to see how Christianity is the absolute fulfilment of the idea of the positive institutions of the Law through which it was the good pleasure of God to discipline men, while the Fourth Gospel shows us in the Word become flesh the absolute fulfilment of the idea of creation which underlies the whole of the O. T.

One further observation must still be made. The style of the Book is characteristically Hellenistic,—perhaps we may say, as far as our scanty evidence goes, Alexandrine; but the teaching itself is, like that of St. John, characteristically Palestinian. This is shown not only by the teaching on details, on the heavenly Jerusalem, and the heavenly Sanctuary, on Satan as the king of death, on Angels, on the two ages (cp. Riehm, Lehrbegriff, pp. 248, 652 sq.), but still more by its whole form. The writer holds firmly to the true historical sense of the ancient history and the ancient legislation. Jewish ordinances are not for him, as for Philo, symbols of transcendental ideas, but elements in a preparatory discipline for a Divine manifestation upon earth. Christ is High-Priest not as the eternal Word, but as the Incarnate Son Who has lived and suffered and conquered as true man. At the same time the Apostle teaches us to recognise the Divine method in the education of the world. He shows us how God has used (and, as we are led to conclude, how He uses still) transitory institutions to awaken, to develop, to chasten, human thoughts of spiritual things. The Epistle is, to sum up all most briefly, the seal of the divine significance of all life. The interpretation, given in its salient points, of the record of the O. T., and of the training of Israel, is a prophetic light for the interpretation of the history of mankind.

XI. THE USE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.—The use which is made of the O. T. in the Epistle offers an interesting subject for study in regard to (i.) the range of the quotations, (ii.) the mode of citation, and (iii.) the principles of interpretation which the writer assumes.

(i.) Of twenty-nine direct quotations, twenty-three are taken from the Pentateuch and the Psalms, the fundamental Law and the Book of common devotion. The absence of detailed illustrations from the history of the kingdom, and the fewness of the references to the teaching of the Prophets, are both striking facts. It is yet more remarkable that, with two exceptions (2 Sam. vii. 14; Is. viii. 17 sq.), all the primary passages which are quoted to illustrate the true nature of the Person and Work of Christ are taken from the Psalms. No direct prophetic word is quoted. Nor again is anything quoted from the Prophets on the inefficiency of ritual sacrifices. It is further to be noticed, as a mark of the individuality of the writer, that of the twenty-nine passages which are reckoned as direct quotations, twenty-one are peculiar to the Epistle. The text of the quotations agrees, with three exceptions, with some form of the LXX., and particularly with the text of Cod.

Alex. (A). In eight passages it agrees with the LXX. against the present Hebrew text.

(ii.) The quotations are without exception made anonymously. There is no mention anywhere of the name of the writer (iv. 7 is no exception to the rule). God is presented as the speaker through the person of the Prophet, except in the one place where He is directly addressed (ii. 6 sq.; e.g. i. 5, 7 λέγει, 13; v. 5. In two places the words are attributed to Christ (ii. 11, 13; x. 5 sq.). In two other places the Holy Spirit specially is named as the speaker (iii. 7 sq.; x. 15; cp. ix. 8).

This assignment of the written word to God, as the Inspirer of the message, is most remarkable when the words spoken by the Prophet in his own person are treated as divine words, as words spoken by Moses (i. 6; iv. 4: cp. ττ. 5, 7, 8; x. 30) and by Isaiah (ii. 13: cp. also xiii. 5).

There is nothing really parallel to this general mode of quotation in the other Books of the N. T. Where the word λέγει occurs elsewhere, it is for the most part combined either with the name of the Prophet or with "Scripture" (Rom. iv. 3; x. 16, 19; xi. 9). And when God is the subject, as is rarely the case, the reference is to words directly spoken by God (2 Cor. vi. 2; Rom. ix. 15, 25).

This "personal" character of citation is the more significant when it is remembered how frequent elsewhere (in St. Paul for example) are the forms (καθὸς) γραφῶν (sixteen times in the Epistle to the Romans), ἡ γραφή λέγει, and the like, which never occur in the Epistle to the Hebrews; and whereas St. Paul not infrequently quotes the words of God as "Scripture" simply (e.g. Rom. ix. 17), it has been seen that in this Epistle prophetic words recorded in Scripture are treated as "words of God."

(iii.) It has been already observed that the writer of the Epistle everywhere assumes that there is a spiritual meaning in the whole record of the O. T. This deeper sense is recognised in the history both personal (vii. 1 sq.) and national (iv. 1 sq.): in the Mosaic ritual (ix. 8): in the experience of typical characters (ii. 13); and in the general teaching (ii. 6 sq.). Every detail in the record is treated as significant; and even the silence of the narrative suggests important thoughts (vii. 3).

Generally it may be said that Christ and the Christian dispensation are regarded as the one end to which the O. T. points, and in which it finds its complete accomplishment, not as though the Gospel were the answer to the riddle of the Law (as is taught in the Letter of Barnabas), but as being the consummation in life of that which was prepared in life. They therefore who acknowledged Jesus as the Christ, when they realised His Nature, could not fail to see that He had abrogated the outward system of Judaism by fulfilling it.

The use which the author makes of Holy Scripture is, in other words, not dialectic or rhetorical, but interpretative. The Christian faith is assumed, and the Hebrews are taught by him to recognise in the O. T. the foreshadowings of that growing purpose which the Gospel completes and crowns. This being so, his object is not to show that Jesus fulfils the idea of the Christ, and the Christian Church the idea of Israel, but, taking this for granted, to mark the relation in which the Gospel stands to the Mosaic system, as part of one Divine whole. Looking back therefore over the course of the Divine discipline of humanity, outlined in the O. T., he marks how Christ, Lawgiver and Priest, fulfilled perfectly the offices which Moses (ch. iii.), Aaron (ch. v.), and Melchizedek (ch. vii.) held in typical and transitory forms. And yet more than this, how as man He fulfilled the destiny of fallen man through suffering (ch. ii.). For he places the destiny of man in connexion with the record of Creation. Man, he implies, was made in order to enter into the rest of God; and lest he should seem to have finally lost his original inheritance by sin, he points out that this was confirmed to him afterwards by a promise.

The accomplishment of the Divine purpose for man necessarily required a long preparation. Even if he had not fallen, he would have needed the discipline of life to reach the Divine likeness through a free moral growth. The sinless Son of man "learnt obedience" (v. 8). As it is, the necessity of the discipline is twofold. Divine gifts have to be exercised; and human failures have to be repaired. The capacities and needs of man have to be revealed and satisfied. Thus the purpose of God for man indicated in creation is wrought out in two ways, by that which we may speak of as a natural growth through the unfolding of the life of the nations, and by a special discipline. Both elements are recognised in the Epistle. Melchizedek is set forth as the representative of the natural growth of man in fellowship with the divine spirit. The revelation to Israel (the "Law") is interpreted as the special preparation and foreshadowing of a fellowship of man with God, in spite of sin and death.

In marking the course of this special revelation the writer distinguishes the work of the Messianic people (Ex. xix. 5 sq.) and the work of the personal Messiah, typified on the one side by the Davidic king, and on the other side by the afflicted and faithful Servant of the Lord.

Both works are marked in the Epistle in their main outlines. Especially it will be observed that in dealing with the work of the Messianic people the writer of the Epistle emphasises the three great stages in the determination of their privileges and their office: i. The original promise to Abraham; ii. The discipline of the Law; iii. The new promise. These three crises mark three special forms of the Divine Covenant (Dispensation, διαθήκη), by which God is pleased to enter into a living fellowship with His people, the Covenant of grace, the Covenant of works, and the final Covenant of Divine fellowship based on perfect knowledge and sympathy.

The fulfilment of this last great promise (Jer. xxxii.) leads up to the thought of the work of the personal Messiah; and in no other Book of the N. T. is the Messiah presented with equal fullness of delineation. Each trait in the portraiture is connected with some preparatory sign in the O. T. The Christ, revealed in the Son of man, is shown to be all for which the people had looked, satisfying every hope and claim, without change or loss.

Thus we can read how the manifold teachings of the past in life and in institutions were concentrated on the final revelation of the Gospel. These had their fulfilment at the Coming of the Christ; and no less the spiritual experiences of those to whom they were first given have an application to Christians still. What was written of encouragement to Israel on the entrance into Canaan (xiii. 5), on the approach to the sanctuary (xiii. 6), in the prophetic delineation of the Messianic age (xii. 12 sq.), and in the words of the wise (xii. 5 sq.), was of force for the Hebrews in their crisis of trial, and is of force for the Church in all time. Counsels of patience (x. 37 sq.) and warnings of judgment (x. 27) from the Prophets and the Law are still addressed to those who are under a Divine discipline. In one sense the revelation given through the Son is final and unchanging (xii. 26), but its meaning is brought home to believers by a living voice, and we also must listen heedfully if haply the voice may sound in our ears "To-day" with a fresh message for us (iii. 7, &c.).

XII. HISTORY AND AUTHORSHIP.—In discussing the history of any one of the writings of the N. T. it is necessary to bear in mind the narrow range of the scanty remains of the earliest Christian literature, and the little scope which they offer for definite references to particular Books. It might perhaps have been expected that the arguments of the Epistle to the Hebrews would have given it prominence in the first controversies of the Church, but this does not appear to have been the case. Traces of its use occur indeed in the oldest Christian writing outside the Canon, the letter written by Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, but it is not referred to by name till the second half of the second century. There can be no doubt that Clement was familiar with its contents. He not only uses its language (ad Cor. 17, 36), but imitates its form in such a way (ad Cor. 9, 12, 45) as to show that he had the text before him; but the adaptations of words and thoughts are made silently, without any mark of quotation or any indication of the author from whom they are borrowed (cp. Euseb. H. E. iii. 38; Hier. de Vir. ill. 15). The fact that the Book was known at Rome at this early date is of importance, because it was at Rome that the Pauline authorship was most consistently denied, and for the longest period. In this connexion it is of interest that there are several coincidences of expression with the Epistle in the Shepherd of Hermas, which seem to be sufficient to show that Hermas also was acquainted with it.

The other evidence which can be alleged to show that the Epistle was known by the earliest Christian writers is less clear. Polycarp gives the Lord the title of "High-Priest" (ch. 12, pontifex), a title which is peculiar to this Epistle among the apostolic writings, but it is not possible to conclude certainly that he derived it directly from the Book. So again when Justin Martyr speaks of Christ as "Apostle" (Apol. i. 12, 63; Heb. iii. 1), and applies Ps. cx. to Him (Dial. 96, 113), he may be using thoughts which had become current among Christians, though these correspondences with characteristic features of the Epistle are more worthy of consideration because Justin has also several coincidences with its language (viii. 7 sq., Dial. 34; ix. 13 sq., Dial. 13; xii. 18 sq., Dial. 67).

On the other hand, the Epistle was not included among the apostolic writings received by Marcion; nor does it find any place in the Muratorian Canon, while by this catalogue it is distinctly excluded from the Epistles of St. Paul ("septem scribit ecclesias").

Towards the close of the second century there is evidence of a knowledge of the Epistle in Alexandria, North Africa, Italy, and the West of Europe. From the time of Pantaenus it was held at Alexandria to be, at least indirectly, the work of St. Paul and of canonical authority; and this opinion, supported in different forms by Clement and Origen, came to be generally received among the Eastern Greek Churches in the third century.

Meanwhile a Latin translation of the Epistle found a limited public recognition in North Africa, but not as a work of St. Paul. So Tertullian speaks of it as being "more widely received among the Churches than The Shepherd" (de Pudic. 20, "utique receptor apud ecclesias illo apocrypho Pastore moechorum"). Cyprian, however, never quotes it, and, by repeating the statement peculiar to Western writers that St. Paul "wrote to seven churches" (de Exhort. Mart. 11), he also implicitly denies its Pauline authorship.

In Italy and Western Europe the Epistle was not held to be St. Paul's, and by consequence, as it seems, it was not held to be canonical. Hippolytus (Lagarde, pp. 64, 89, 118, 149) and Irenaeus (Euseb. H. E. v. 26) were acquainted with it, but they held that it "was not Paul's" (Steph. Gobar. ap. Phot. Cod. 232); and if Irenaeus had held it to be authoritative Scripture, he could hardly have failed to use it freely in his Book "against heresies." Caius also reckoned only thirteen Epistles of St. Paul (Euseb. H. E. vi. 20; Hier. de Vir. ill. 59); and Eusebius, where he mentions the fact, adds that the opinion was "still held by some Romans."

It is impossible to decide certainly whether the Epistle formed a part of the earliest Syriac Version. The position which it holds in the Peshitto at present shows at least that it was not regarded strictly as one of St. Paul's Epistles, but as an appendix to the collection. In accordance with this view it is called simply the "Epistle to the Hebrews," and not, after the usage in the other Epistles, "the Epistle of Paul to the Hebrews."

This meagre account indicates all the independent external evidence which has been preserved by tradition as to the origin of the Epistle. Later writers simply combine and repeat the views which it represents in various ways. To speak summarily, when the Book first appears in general circulation three distinct opinions about it had already obtained local currency. At Alexandria the Greek Epistle was held to be not directly but mediately St. Paul's, as either a free translation of his words or a reproduction of his thoughts. In North Africa it was known to some extent as the work of Barnabas and acknowledged as a secondary authority. At Rome and in Western Europe it was not included in the collection of the Epistles of St. Paul, and had no apostolic weight.

In order to decide between these conflicting judgments, and to account for their partial acceptance, it is necessary to examine the primary evidence more in detail.

The testimony of Alexandria is the earliest and the most explicit. It has been preserved by Eusebius from lost writings of Clement and Origen. Clement, he writes (H. E. vi. 14), says in his "Outlines" (Ἔκτορας), "that the Epistle is Paul's, and that it was written to Hebrews in the Hebrew language, and that Luke translated it with zealous care and published it to the Greeks; whence it is that the same complexion of style is found in the translation of this Epistle and in the Acts. [Further] that the [ordinary] phrase 'Paul an Apostle' was not placed at the head of the Epistle for good reason; for, he says, in writing to Hebrews who had formed a prejudice against him and viewed him with suspicion, he was wise not to repel them at the beginning by setting his name there." The last clause only is quoted in Clement's own words, but there can be no doubt that Eusebius has given correctly the substance of what he said, as far as it goes, but much is left undetermined which it would be important to know. There is nothing to indicate the source of Clement's statement, or how far it was the common opinion of the Alexandrine Church at the time, or whether the hypothesis of a Hebrew original was framed to explain the peculiarities of the un-Pauline style. In part this deficiency may be supplied by another quotation from Clement, in regard to the Epistle, which Eusebius makes in the same place: "The blessed presbyter [Pantaenus] used to say: since the Lord was sent to the Hebrews, as being the Apostle of the Almighty, Paul through modesty, as was natural since he had been sent to the Gentiles, does not style himself Apostle of the Hebrews, both for the sake of the honour due to the Lord, and because it was a work of supererogation for him to write to the Hebrews, since he was herald and Apostle of the Gentiles." It appears then that the exceptional character of the Epistle had attracted attention at Alexandria in the generation before Clement, and that an explanation was offered of one at least of its peculiarities. It is possible therefore, though not probable, that Clement may have derived from his master the idea of a Hebrew original. At any rate the idea was compatible with what he had learnt from Pantaenus as to the authorship of the Greek text.

The judgment of Origen is quoted by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 25) in his own words. Every one competent to judge of language must admit, he remarks, that the style of the Epistle to the Hebrews is not that of St. Paul, and he adds that every one conversant with the Apostle's teaching must agree that the thoughts are marvellous and in no way inferior to his acknowledged writings, and then after a while he continues: "If I were to express my own opinion, I should say that the thoughts are the thoughts of the Apostle, but the language and the composition that of one who recalled from memory and, as it were, made notes of what was said by his master. If therefore any Church holds this Epistle as Paul's, let it be approved for this also [as for holding unquestioned truths], for it was not without reason that the men of old time have handed it down as Paul's [that is, as substantially expressing his thoughts]. But who wrote the Epistle God only knows certainly. The account that has reached us is twofold: some say that Clement, who became Bishop of the Romans, wrote the Epistle, others that Luke wrote it, who wrote the Gospel and the Acts. But on this I will say no more."

The testimony is of the highest value as supplementary to and in part explaining that of Clement. Origen does not refer to any "Hebrew" original. It is not possible then that this hypothesis formed part of the ancient tradition of Alexandria. It was a suggestion which Origen did not think it worth while to discuss. He was aware that some Churches did not receive the Epistle as St. Paul's. In the strictest sense of authorship he agreed with them. At the same time he held that in a true sense it could be regarded as St. Paul's, as embodying thoughts in every way worthy of him.

Thus Clement and Origen, both familiar with the details of the tradition of "the men of old time" to whom they refer, agree in regarding the Greek Epistle as St. Paul's only in a secondary sense. Clement regards it as a free translation of an original, so made by St. Luke as to show the characteristics of his style: Origen regards it as a scholar's eloquent reproduction of his master's teaching. Each view must have been consistent with what was generally received; and this can only have been that the Epistle rightly had a place among the apostolic letters, though its immediate authorship was uncertain. The practice of Clement and Origen is an application of this judgment. Both use the Epistle as St. Paul's without any qualification, because it was naturally placed in connexion with his writings; and Origen once went so far as to say that he was prepared to show that "the Epistle was Paul's" in reply to those "who rejected it as not written by Paul" (Ep. ad Afric. 9); and in another passage, preserved indeed only in a Latin translation, he speaks of "fourteen Epistles of St. Paul" (Hom. in Jos. vii.).

Looking back over the records of the first three centuries, Eusebius expressed the judgment to which the facts pointed plainly with all their apparent discrepancies. In different places he ranks the Epistle among "the acknowledged" (iii. 25) and the "controverted" Books (vi. 13). He held himself that it was originally written in "Hebrew," and that Clement of Rome (rather than St. Luke) had translated it, on the ground of its likeness to Clement's own Letter both in style and subject-matter (iii. 38). He used the Greek text as St. Paul's habitually; and reckoned his Epistles as fourteen (H. E. iii. 3), though he noticed that "some rejected the Epistle to the Hebrews on the ground that it was controverted (ἀντιλήγεσθαι) by the Roman Church as not being Paul's." At the same time this judgment was justified on the plea that it was reasonable "on the ground of its antiquity that it should be reckoned with the other writings of the Apostle" (H. E. iii. 38). Such a statement would be inconsistent with the idea that he held it to be St. Paul's in the same sense as the other Epistles. He held it to be canonical Scripture and Pauline, so to speak, for ecclesiastical use. Eusebius in other words, like Origen, was chiefly concerned to maintain the canonicity of the Epistle, and he upheld its ultimate Pauline authorship as connected with its apostolic authority.

It will be evident from the facts which have been given how slender is the historical evidence for the Pauline authorship of the Epistle when it is traced to the source. The unqualified statements of later writers simply reproduce the testimony of Clement or Origen as interpreted by their practice. But it is not clear that any one among the earliest witnesses attributed the Greek text to St. Paul. It is certain that neither Clement nor Origen did so, though they used the Epistle as his without reserve. What they were concerned to affirm for the Book was Pauline, or, we may say more correctly, apostolic authority.

Viewed in this light, the testimony of Alexandria is not irreconcilable with the testimony of the West. The difference between the two springs from the different estimate which they made of the two elements of the problem, canonicity and authorship. The Alexandrines emphasised the thought of canonicity, and, assured of this, placed the Epistle in connexion with St. Paul. The Western Fathers emphasised the thought of authorship, and, believing that the Epistle was not properly St. Paul's, denied its canonical authority. The former were wrong in requiring Pauline authorship as the condition of canonicity: the latter were wrong in denying the canonicity of a Book of which St. Paul was not recognised as the author. Experience has shown us how to unite the positive conclusions on both sides. We have been enabled to acknowledge that the canonical authority of the Epistle is independent of its Pauline authorship. The spiritual insight of the East can be joined with the historical witness of the West. And if we hold that the judgment of the Spirit makes itself felt through the consciousness of the Christian Society, no Book of the Bible is more completely recognised by universal consent as giving a Divine view of the facts of the Gospel, full of lessons for all time, than the Epistle to the Hebrews.

The practical judgment of Alexandria found formal expression in a Festal Epistle of Athanasius (A.D. 367). Among the Books of the Old and New Testaments which he reckons as "held canonical and divine," he enumerates "fourteen Epistles of the Apostle Paul" in the order of the oldest MSS. ("... 2 Thess., Hebrews, 1 Timothy..."). And from his time this reckoning of the "fourteen Epistles" became universal among Greek writers; but there is no reason to suppose that either he or the other Fathers who followed him wished to go beyond the testimony of Clement and Origen and Eusebius.

From the 4th century the canonical authority of the Epistle came to be recognised in the West, and in part, as a consequence, its Pauline authorship. Fathers like Hilary, who were familiar with Greek writers, naturally adopted little by little their mode of speaking of it. Still the influence of the old belief remained; and Jerome shows that the judgment which Eusebius notes in his time still survived unchanged. "The custom of the Latins," he says, "does not receive it among the canonical Scriptures as St. Paul's" (Ep. ad Dard. 129).

And while he himself rightly maintained its canonical authority and used it freely, he was even scrupulously careful to indicate in his quotations that he did not by so doing decide the question of its authorship. Augustine adopted the same general view as Jerome, and under his influence lists of Books for use in Church were authorised at three African Councils—at Hippo in 393, and at Carthage in 397 and 419. In these the Epistle to the Hebrews was included; and henceforward, while the doubts as to the authorship of the Epistle were noticed from time to time, the canonical authority of the Book was not again called in question in the West till the time of the Reformation. The Catalogue of the second Council of Carthage was transcribed in a letter of Innocent I. to Exsuperius, and became part of the Law of the Roman Church.

It is needless to follow in detail the statements of later writers. A few interesting traces of old doubts survive. Some commentators deal only with thirteen Epistles of St. Paul (Hilary of Rome, Migne, P. L. xvii. pp. 45 sq.; Pelagius, P. L. xxx. pp. 645 sq.; cp. Cassiod. de Inst. dir. litt. iv. 8), though Hilary and Pelagius speak of the Epistle to the Hebrews elsewhere as a Book of the Apostle. But the notices as to the authorship of the Book are for the most part simple repetitions of sentences of Jerome. Here and there a writer of exceptional power uses his materials with independence, but without real knowledge. Thomas Aquinas, for example, marshals the objections to the Pauline authorship and the answers to them in a true scholastic form, and decides in favour of the Pauline authorship on the ground of ancient authority, and because "Jerome receives it among the Epistles of Paul."

At the revival of Greek learning in Europe, when "the Grammarians" ventured to re-open questions of Biblical criticism, the authorship and, in part, the authority of the Epistle was called in question. On this, as on other similar subjects, Card. Cajetan spoke freely. Erasmus, with fuller knowledge, expressed his doubts: "not as to the authority, but as to the author of the Epistle; doubts," he added characteristically, "which would remain till he saw a distinct judgment of the Church upon the point." Luther denied the Pauline authorship of the Book without hesitation, and, referring to the earlier traditions, conjectured that it was more likely to have been written by Apollos (cp. Bleek, p. 249 n.). Calvin, while maintaining the full apostolical authority of the Epistle, professed that he "could not be brought to think that it was St. Paul's." He thought that it might be a work of St. Luke or of Clement. Beza also held that it was written by a disciple of St. Paul. At first he inclined to adopt Luther's conjecture as to the authorship, but this opinion he afterwards withdrew silently.

The review of the historical evidence as to the authorship of the Epistle will have shown sufficiently that there was no clear or uniform tradition on the subject in the early Church. Obvious circumstances are adequate to explain why the names of St. Paul and St. Luke, Barnabas and Clement, were connected with it; and in no case is the external testimony of such a character as to justify the belief that it was derived from a tradition contemporary in origin with the Book. It remains therefore to consider how far internal testimony helps towards the solution of the question. The direct evidence furnished by the Epistle is slight, though there is not the least indication that the writer wished to conceal his personality. He was intimately acquainted with those whom he addressed: vi. 9 sq.; x. 34 (τοῖς δεσμοῖς συνεπαθήσατε); xiii. 7; xiii. 19 (ἵνα τάχιον ἀποκατασταθῶ ὑμῖν), but the last clause does not necessarily imply that he belonged to their society, or that he was in confinement. He speaks of Timothy as a common friend: xiii. 23 (γινώσκετε τὸν ἀδελφὸν ἡμῶν Τ. ἀπολαυμένον), and there is no reason to question the identity of this Timothy with the companion of St. Paul. He places himself in the second generation of believers, as one who had received the Gospel from those who heard the Lord (ii. 3).

This last statement has been justly held to be a most grave (or indeed fatal) objection to the Pauline authorship. It is not possible to reconcile it without unnatural violence with St. Paul's jealous assertion of his immediate discipleship to Christ (contrast Gal. i. 1, 11 sq.). On the other hand, these few notices might all apply equally well to St. Luke or Barnabas or Clement.

The indirect evidence supplied by the Epistle is important at least negatively. The language and teaching offer materials for comparison with writings of the four authors suggested by tradition. With St. Luke the comparison is practically confined to the language: with Barnabas, if we assume that his letter is authentic, Clement, and St. Paul, it embraces both language and teaching.

It has been already seen that the earliest scholars who speak of the Epistle notice its likeness in style to the writings of St. Luke; and when every allowance has been made for coincidences which consist in forms of expression which are found also in the LXX. or in other writers of the N. T., or in late Greek generally, the likeness is unquestionably remarkable. No one can work independently at the Epistle without observing it (cp. p. 1313). But it is not possible to establish any sure conclusion on such a resemblance. The author of the Epistle may have been familiar with the writings of St. Luke themselves, or he may have been in close connexion with the Evangelist or with those whose language was moulded by his influence. In any case the likeness of vocabulary and expression is not greater than that which exists between 1 Peter and the Epistles of St. Paul. If indeed it were credible that the Epistle was originally written in "Hebrew," then the external and internal evidence combined would justify the belief that the Greek text is due to St. Luke. If that opinion is out of the question, the historical evidence for St. Luke's connexion with the Epistle is either destroyed or greatly weakened, and the internal evidence gives no valid result.

The superficial resemblances between the Epistle and the Letter of Clement, both in vocabulary and form, are very striking. It would be easy to draw up a list of parallelisms in words and manner sufficient to justify the judgment of Eusebius. But these parallelisms are more than counterbalanced by differences in both respects. Clement has an unusually large number of peculiar words; and his heaping together of co-ordinate clauses (as 1, 3, 20, 35, 36, 45, 55), his frequent doxologies (20, 38, 43, 45, 50, 58, 59), and to a certain extent his method of quotation, sharply distinguish his writing from the Epistle to the Hebrews. Moreover a closer examination of the parallelisms with the Epistle makes it clear that they are due to a use of it, like the use which is made of the Epistles of St. Paul (e.g. c. 49). And, what is of far greater moment, the wide difference between the two works in range of thought, in dogmatic depth, in prophetic insight, makes it impossible to suppose that the Epistle to the Corinthians could have been written after the Epistle to the Hebrews by the same writer. Clement is essentially receptive and imitative. He combines, but he does not create. Even if the external evidence for connecting him with the Epistle were greater than it is, the internal evidence would be incompatible with any other connexion than that of a simple translator.

Some differences in style between the Epistle and the writings of St. Paul have been already noticed. A more detailed inquiry shows that these cannot be adequately explained by differences of subject or of circumstances. They characterise two men, and not only two moods or two discussions. The student will feel the subtle force of the contrast if he compares the Epistle to the Hebrews with the Epistle to the Ephesians, to which it has the closest affinity. But it is as difficult to represent the contrast by an enumeration of details as it is to analyse an effect. It must be felt for a right appreciation of its force. So it is also with the dogmatic differences between the writer and St. Paul.

There is unquestionably a sense in which Origen is right in saying that "the thoughts" of the Epistle are the thoughts of St. Paul. The writer shows the same broad conception of the universality of the Gospel as the Apostle of the Gentiles, the same grasp of the age-long purpose of God wrought out through Israel, the same trust in the atoning work of Christ and in His present sovereignty. He speaks with the same conscious mastery of the Divine Counsel. But he approaches each topic from a different side. He looks at all as from within Israel, and not as from without. He speaks as one who step by step had read the fulfilment of the Old Covenant in the New without any rude crisis of awakening or any sharp struggle with traditional errors. His Judaism has been all along the Judaism of the prophets and not that of the Pharisees, of the O. T. and not of the schools (cp. p. 1314 sq.).

The differences between the Epistle and the Epistle which bears the name of Barnabas involve a contrast of principles and not simply of details, both in the treatment of the O. T. Scriptures and in the treatment of the Levitical system. The spiritual interpretation of the historical records in the Epistle of Barnabas is arbitrary and trivial (e.g. cc. ix., xv.). The Levitical legislation had, according to this writing, no historical, no disciplinary value whatever. The outward embodiment of the enigmatic ordinances was a pernicious delusion. Christians alone had the key to their meaning.

We are left then with a negative conclusion. The Epistle cannot be the work of St. Paul, and still less the work of Clement. It may have been written by St. Luke. It may have been written by Barnabas, if the Epistle of Barnabas is apocryphal. The scanty evidence which is accessible to us supports no more definite judgment.

One conjecture, however, remains to be noticed, not indeed for its own intrinsic worth, but because it has found favour with many scholars. Luther, as we have seen, with characteristic originality conjectured that it was the work of Apollos. The sole ground for the conjecture is the brief description of Apollos which is found in the N. T. (Acts xviii. 24 sq.; 1 Cor. i. 12, iii. 4 sq.). But the utmost which can be deduced from these notices is that Apollos, so far as we know, might have written the Epistle; just as what we know of Silas is consistent with the opinion that he wrote it, and has even suggested it. But on the other hand it is to be remembered that there is not the least evidence that Apollos wrote anything, or that he was the only man or the only Alexandrian in the Apostolic age who was "learned . . . and mighty in the Scriptures," or that he possessed these qualifications more than others among his contemporaries, or that, in the connexion in which they are noticed, they suggest the presence of the peculiar power which is shown in the Epistle. The wide acceptance of the conjecture as a fact is only explicable by our natural unwillingness to frankly confess our ignorance on a matter which excites our interest.

And yet in this case the confession of ignorance is really the confirmation of an inspiring faith. We acknowledge the Divine authority of the Epistle, self-attested and ratified by the illuminated consciousness of the Christian Society: we measure what would have been our loss if it had not been included in our Bible; and we confess that the wealth of spiritual power was so great in the early Church that he who was enabled to commit to writing this view of the fulness of the Truth has not by that conspicuous service even left his name for the grateful reverence of later ages. It was enough that the faith and the love were there to render ministry to the Lord (Matt. xxvi. 13).

In the course of this century the authorship of the Epistle has been debated with exhaustive thoroughness. Bleek's Introduction to his Commentary is a treasury of materials, arranged and used with scrupulous fairness. It would be difficult to make any important additions to his view of the external facts. All the recent Commentaries discuss the question more or less fully. It will be enough to refer to some representative writers who advocate the claims of particular men to the authorship. The case for St. Paul is maintained, with various modifications, by Ebrard, Hofmann, Biesenthal, Kay: for St. Luke, by Deitzsch: for Apollos, by Alford, Kurtz, Farrar: for Barnabas, by Grau, Renan, Zahn (cp. Holtzmann, Einl. p. 318 sq.).

Commentaries. — The most important early Commentaries are those of CHRYSOSTOM (xxiv. Homilies; Migne, P. Gr. lxiii.), OECUMENIUS (Migne, P. Gr. cxix.), THEOPHYLACT (Migne, P. Gr. cxxv.), EUTHYMIUS (ed. Calogeras, 1887), among the Greeks; and of PRIMASIUS (Migne, P. Lat. lxxviii.), also under the name of HAYMO, id. cxvii.), HERVEUS BURGIDALENSIS (Migne, P. Lat. clxxxi.), THOMAS AQUINAS, among the Latins.

Of later commentators the following may be named out of many as having a representative value:—

16th cent.: ERASMUS (1516), CALVIN (1539), BEZA (1565).

17th cent.: LUD. TONA (1611), CORN. A LAPIDE (1614), ESTIUS (1614), GROTIUS (1632), SZLICHTING (1634), HAMMOND (1653).

18th cent.: WHITBY (1700), BENDEL (1742).

19th cent.: BLEEK (1828–40), THOLUCK (1836–1850), EBRARD (1850), DELITZSCH (1857), KURTZ (1869), EWALD (1870), HOFMANN (1873), MOLL (1877, ed. 3), LÜNEMANN (1878, ed. 4), KEIL (1885) (Germany).

In England many separate Commentaries have been published in late years in addition to those contained in Commentaries on the whole N. T.: c.g. by Davidson (A. B., 1879), Edwards (T. C., 1892^d), Farrar (F. W., 1883), Rendal (F., 1888), Vaughan (C. J., 1890), Westcott (B. F., 1889).

The work of Riehm (E. K. A.) on the teaching of the Epistle (Der Lehrbegriff d. Hebräerbriefes dargestellt, 1858, 1867) is of the highest value.

[B. F. W.]

HEBR-ON (הֶבְרוֹן = union: Xεβρόν; in 1 Ch. xv. 9, B. Xεβρόν: Hebron). 1. The third son of Kohath, who was the second son of Levi; the younger brother of Amram, father of Moses and Aaron (Ex. vi. 18; Num. iii. 19; 1 Ch. vi. 2, 18, xxiii. 12). The immediate children of Hebron not mentioned by name (cp. Ex. vi. 21, 22), but he was the founder of a "family" (Mishpachah) of Hebronites (Num. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Ch. xxvi. 23, 30, 31) or Bene-Hebron (1 Ch. xv. 9, xxiii. 19), who are often mentioned in the enumerations of the Levites in the passages above cited. JERIAH was the head of the family in the time of David (1 Ch. xxiii. 19, xxvi. 31, xxiv. 23: in the last of these passages the name of Hebron does not now exist in the Hebrew, but has been supplied in the A. V. and R. V. from the other lists). In the last year of David's reign we find them settled at Jazer in Gilead (a place not elsewhere named as a Levitical city), "mighty men of valour" (בְּנֵי הַיָּל, 2,700 in number, who were superintendents for the king over the two and a half tribes in regard to all matters sacred and secular (1 Ch. xxvi. 31, 32). At the same time 1700 of the family under Hashabiah held the same office on the west* of Jordan (v. 30).

2. This name appears in the genealogical lists of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. ii. 42, 43), where Mareshah is said to have been the "father of Hebron," who again had four sons,

* The expression here is (R. V.) "had the oversight of Israel beyond (מֵעוֹרֵב) Jordan westward (מֵעוֹרֵבָה)," &c. "Beyond Jordan" generally means "on the east;" but here, induced probably by the word following, "westward," our translators have rendered it "on this side" (cp. Deut. i. 1, 5; Josh. ix. 1, &c. See Dillmann² II. cc.). Were Hashabiah and his brethren settled on the western side of the Transjordanic country?

one of whom was Tappuach. The three names just mentioned are those of places, as are also many others in the subsequent branches of this genealogy—Ziph, Maon, Bethzur, &c. But it seems impossible to say whether these names are those of the places themselves or of persons who founded them. [G.] [W.]

HEB-RON (הֶבְרֹן; Χεβρών and Χεβρών;

Hebron, 1 Macc. v. 65 Chebron; Arab. الخليل

= "the friend"). 1. A city of Judah (Josh. xv. 54), situated among the mountains (Josh. xx. 7, xxi. 11), 22 Roman miles south of Jerusalem (Euseb. s. o. 'Αρβώ, *OS.*² p. 233, 65), and 20 miles north of Beersheba (*OS.*² p. 248, 100). Hebron is one of the oldest existing Bible towns; and in this respect it is the rival of Damascus. It was built "seven years before Zoan in Egypt" (Num. xiii. 22), or according to Josephus (B. J. iv. 9, § 7), who says that it was in his day 2,300 years old, before Memphis; and it was a well-known town when Abram pitched his tent "by the oaks of Mamre," after separating from Lot on the heights of Bethel (Gen. xiii. 18). Its original name was Kirjath-Arba, R. V. Kirjath-A. (קִרְיַת אַרְבָּה); LXX., Κιριαθ-αρβοκ-σεφέρ, Gen. xxiii. 2, xxxv. 27; Josh. xv. 54, xx. 7; Judg. i. 10), "the city of Arba;" so called from Arba, "the greatest man among the Anakim" (Josh. xiv. 15) and the father of Anak (xv. 13, xxi. 11). [ANAKIM.] By later writers it was interpreted as the "city of four," which Jerome explains (*OS.*² p. 120, 9; Ep. Paul. § 11) as referring to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Adam, who were buried there. [KIRJATH-ARBA.] Hebron was also sometimes called Mamre (Gen. xiii. 19, xxxv. 27), probably from Abram's friend and ally Mamre, the Amorite (xiv. 13, 24), under the shadow of whose oaks the Patriarch dwelt (xiii. 18, xiv. 13, xviii. 1). [MAMRE.] Its modern name, el-Khalil, "the Friend," i. e. of God, is that by which Muhammadans call Abraham (cp. Is. xli. 8; Jas. ii. 23).

The chief interest of Hebron arises from its having been the home and the burial-place of the Patriarchs, and the scene of some of the most remarkable events in their lives. Abram dwelt there during the interval between his sojourn at Bethel and Beersheba (Gen. xiii. 18), and there his name was changed to Abraham (xvii. 5). It was "by the oaks of Mamre," at Hebron, that Abraham entertained the Angels unawares (xviii.); there Isaac was born; and there Sarah died (xxiii. 2), and was buried in the "cave of the field of Machpelah," which the Patriarch bought from Ephron the Hittite as a burial-place for his family (xxiii. 3-20). The city then apparently belonged to the children of Heth, who ratified by their presence (v. 17, 18) the contract between Abraham and Ephron. [HITTITES.] It was also the home, for a portion of their lives, of Isaac and Jacob (xxxv. 27; xxxvii. 14); thence Jacob and his sons probably went down to Egypt (xxvii. 14; cp. xli. 1); and there the three Patriarchs and their wives, excepting Rebecca, were buried (xlix. 30, 31; i. 13). Hebron was visited by the twelve spies (Num. xiii. 22); and after Joshua had killed the king Hoham, destroyed the town, and put the inhabitants to the sword (Josh. x. 3, 5, 23, 26, 36-39; xi. 21; xii. 10), it was given to Caleb, who drove out the Anakim (xiv. 13, xv. 13, 14; Judg. i. 20; cp. 1 Ch. ii. 42, 43). It was one of the six cities of refuge (Josh. xx. 7), and was given to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 11, 13; 1 Ch. vi. 2, 55, 57). During the time of the Judges it is mentioned in connexion with one of Samson's exploits (Judg. xvi. 3). Hebron acquired new importance when David, who, whilst living in Philistia, maintained friendly relations with its chiefs (1 Sam. xxx. 31), made it the seat of government, and his place of residence during the 7½ years that he reigned over Judah (2 Sam. ii. 1, S, 11, 32; cp. 1 Kings ii. 11; 1 Ch. xxix. 27). There six sons were born to David (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Ch. iii. 1-4); there he was joined by the "men-of-war"; and there he was anointed king over all the tribes of Israel (2 Sam. v. 1, 3; 1 Ch. xi. 1-3, xii. 23, 38). Hebron was the scene of the cruel murder of Abner by Joab (2 Sam. iii. 27) and the place of his burial (iii. 32, iv. 12); and beside the pool the murderers of Ishbosheth were hanged (iv. 12). At this time it contained a sanctuary of Jehovah, to which pilgrimages were made and offerings vowed (2 Sam. xv. 7), possibly the ancient sepulchres of the founders of the nation within the enclosure at Machpelah (see Jerome, Quaest. Heb. on 2 Sam. xv. 7); or perhaps the site of the altar erected by Abram (Gen. xiii. 18). Josephus, indeed (Ant. viii. 2, § 1), makes Hebron, and not Gibeon, the site of the "high place" where Solomon prayed for wisdom and knowledge (2 Ch. i. 3-13). Absalom raised the standard of revolt at Hebron (2 Sam. xv. 7-10); and at a later date it was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. xi. 10). It was re-occupied after the Captivity (Neh. ii. 25), but afterwards fell into the hands of the Edomites, from whom it was captured by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. v. 65; Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 6). During the interval between the conquest of Galilee by the Romans, and the final siege of Jerusalem, it was seized by Simon Bar-Gioras, but was shortly afterwards captured and burnt by Cerealis, one of the commanders of Vespasian (B. J. iv. 9, §§ 7, 9). Early in the 4th century Eusebius describes it (*OS.*² p. 233, 65) as a large town, κώμη μεγίστη; and it is mentioned in connexion with the tombs of the Patriarchs by all the earlier pilgrims. In the 6th century it was taken by the Arabs, when they conquered Palestine, and during their occupation it was visited by Arculf, who describes the city as having been long destroyed (ii. 8), and by Willibald, who calls it Aframia (E. T. p. 20). In A. D. 1100, after the capture of Jerusalem, it was occupied by the Crusaders; it had then been destroyed by the Saracens, and lay for a time in ruins, being known as castellum or praesidium ad sanctum Abraham (Saewulf, E. T. p. 45; Albert Aq. vi. 15, 41, 43, x. 32, xii. 22). In 1187 it was made the seat of a Latin bishopric (Will. Tyr. xx. 3), but twenty years later it reverted to the Moslems, in whose hands it has ever since remained. It is now one of the four sacred towns of Palestine, and has a population of about 17,000 Moslems and 1200 Jews.

Modern Hebron is, for the most part, situated on the left bank of a valley running from N.W. to S.E., and is built partly on the hill slope and partly in the valley. It has no walls, but the ends of the main streets are closed by gates. The town is divided into four quarters, and the houses are built of stone, with flat roofs having domes in the middle. It is well supplied with water; there are six springs in its immediate vicinity, and ten wells of large size. Amongst these are 'Ain Keshkaleh, which perhaps retains a trace of the name ESHCOL; 'Ain el-Judeich, a fine spring in a vault where, according to a mediaeval tradition, Adam and Eve mourned for Abel; Bir Ibrahim, said to be as old as the time of Abraham, and Bir Yakub. In the valley amidst the olive-trees and gardens is a "pool," 85 ft. long and 55 ft. broad, and lower down a larger one, 133 ft. square and 21 ft. deep, which is of ancient construction, and traditionally supposed to be that by which the murderers of Ishbosheth were hanged (2 Sam. iv. 12). The most conspicuous object in the town is the Haram, or "sacred area," 197 ft. long and 111 ft. broad, within which are the tombs of the Patriarchs [MACHPELAH]. The masonry of the enclosing walls is identical in character with that of the Wailing Place at Jerusalem, and is therefore almost certainly Herodian. The Haram at Hebron would almost seem to have been a copy in miniature of that at Jerusalem. In both a level platform is obtained by massive walls of large stones with marginal drafts. At Hebron the wall above the platform rises to a height of 25 ft., and is ornamented with pilasters; and this appears to have been the case at JERUSALEM. At the N.W. and S.E. corners of the Haram there are lofty minarets; and within the enclosure are a mosque, originally a 12th-century church, and the shrines of the Patriarchs and their wives. (For the Haram, see Conder in PEF. Mem. iii. 333 sq.; and, for the cave itself, Cte. Riant, Archives de l'Orient Latin, ii. 411 sq.). On the N.W. side of the Haram is a ruined fortress.

The sides of the valley in which Hebron lies are clothed with luxuriant vineyards, whilst groves of grey olive and other fruit trees give variety to the scene. Above 'Ain el-Judeideh, westward of the Haram, rise the terraced sides of Jebel er-Rumeidy, on which are the Deir el-Arba in, containing the traditional tombs of Jesse and Ruth, and the Kabr Hebrán, held by the Jews of Hebron to be the tomb of Abner. At the foot of the hill is the Ager Damascusus, from the red earth of which, according to tradition, Adam was made; Theodoricus (xxxiv.) and John of Würzburg (xxi.) state that the earth was eaten by the inhabitants and exported to Egypt. About 2 miles west of the Haram is a fine Sindán, called "Abraham's oak," which from the 12th century has been pointed out to Christians as the tree beneath which Abraham pitched his tent.

The Jews following ancient tradition place the oak of Mamre at Haram Rámet el-K'ulil, a remarkable ruin 2 miles north of Hebron, which was formerly called Drys, Δρύς, or Terebinthus (Euseb. and Jerome, OS. p. 257, 27;

p. 148, 16; Ilin. Hierosol.). Some of the earlier pilgrims distinguished Hebron the old city from the later town that had gathered round the spelunca duplex in which the Patriarchs were buried. Thus Theodosius (xxi.) makes Terebinthus 4 miles from the spelunca duplex, and the latter 2 miles from Hebron. Arculf (ii. 9) places the cave 1 furlong E. of Hebron and the oak of Mamre 1 mile to the north; Abbot Daniel (li.-liiii.) makes the cave 2 versts from the oak, which was on a high mountain, and half a verst from Hebron; Benjamin of Tudela says (E. T. p. 86) that the ancient city was situated on the hill, and in ruins, whilst the modern town was in the valley. Guérin suggests (Judée, iii. 243) that the ancient city of Hebron was on Jebel er-Rumeidy. It may perhaps be inferred from Gen. xxiii. 19 that the cave of Machpelah was to the east of Hebron; but it seems unnecessary to suppose that the town was on a hill. Caleb's portion, "the fields of the city" (Josh. xxi. 12), probably included Wády Tufsh, the traditionaly Eshcol, and the whole network of valleys near the town; and the "vale of Hebron" (Gen. xxxvii. 14), the valley that runs down from "Abraham's oak" (PEF. Mem. iii. 305-308, 316, 322, 332 sq.; Rob. ii. 75 sq.; Hbk. S. and P.; Sepp, Jerusalem and H. L. i. 594 sq.; Rosen, ZDMG. xii. 477; Guérin, Judée, iii. 214 sq.). [W.]

2. R. V. EBRON (עֲבְרוֹן and עֲבְרוֹן; B. Ἐβρών, A. Ἀχράν; Achran, later editions Abran). One of the towns in the territory of Asher (Josh. xix. 28), on the boundary of the tribe. It is named next to Rehob, and is apparently in the neighbourhood of Sidon. By Eusebius and Jerome it is merely mentioned (s. v. Achran, OS. p. 242, 73; p. 130, 8), and no one in modern times has discovered its site (see some conjectures in Dillmann in loco). It will be observed that the name in the original is quite different from that of Hebron, the well-known city of Judah (No. 1), although in the A. V. they are the same, our translators having represented the Ain by H, instead of by G, or by the vowel only, as is their usual custom. But, in addition, it is not certain whether the name should not rather be Ebdon or Abdon (עֲבְדוֹן), since that form is found in many MSS. (Davidson, Hebr. Text; Ges. Thes. p. 980), and since an Abdon is named amongst the Levitical cities of Asher in other lists, which otherwise would be unmentioned here. On the other hand, the old Versions (excepting only the Vat. LXX., which is obviously corrupt) unanimously retain Ebron. [ABDON.] [G.] [W.]

HEBRONITES, THE (חֲבֵרוֹנִי; Hebroni, Hebronitae). A family of Kohathite Levites, descendants of Hebron, the son of Levi (Num. iii. 47 [B.A. Χεβρωνείς, F. om.], xxvi. 58 [B. Χεβρωνεί, A. -ων, F. -ων]; 1 Ch. xxvi. 23, Χεβρών). In the time of David, the chief of the family west of Jordan was Hashabiah; while on the east, in the land of Gilead, were Jerijah and his brethren, "men of valour," over the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh (1 Ch. xxvi. 30-32). [W. A. W.]

in the A. V., as well as their Greek equivalent, denote simply that which surrounds or encloses, whether it be a stone wall (גִּדֵּר, gēder, Prov. xxiv. 31; Ezek. xlii. 10), or a fence of other materials. גִּדֵּר, gāder, and גִּדְרָה, g'derāh, are used of the hedge of a vineyard (Num. xxii. 24; Ps. lxxxix. 40; 1 Ch. iv. 23), and the latter is employed to describe the wide walls of stone, or fences of thorn, which served as a shelter for sheep in winter and summer (Num. xxxii. 16). The stone walls which surround the sheepfolds of modern Palestine are frequently crowned with sharp thorns (Thomson, Land and the Book, i. 299), a custom at least as ancient as the time of Homer (Od. xiv. 10), when a kind of prickly pear (ἀχέρδος) was used for that purpose, as well as for the fences of corn-fields at a later period (Arist. Ecol. 355). In order to protect the vineyards from the ravages of wild beasts (Ps. lxxx. 12), it was customary to surround them with a wall of loose stones or mud (Matt. xxi. 33; Mark xiii. 1), which was a favourite haunt of serpents (Eccles. x. 8), and a retreat for locusts from the cold (Nah. iii. 17). Such walls are described by Maundrell as surrounding the gardens of Damascus. "They are built of great pieces of earth, made in the fashion of brick and hardened in the sun. In their dimensions they are each two yards long and somewhat more than one broad, and half a yard thick. Two rows of these, placed one upon another, make a cheap, expeditious, and, in this dry country, a durable wall" (Early Trav. in Pal. p. 487). A wall or fence of this kind is clearly distinguished in Is. v. 5 from the tangled hedge, מִשְׁכַּחֲמֵי, m'si'achāh (מִסְכַּחֲמֵי, Mic. vii. 4), which was planted as an additional safeguard to the vineyard (cp. Eccles. xxviii. 24), and was composed of the thorny shrubs with which Palestine abounds. The prickly pear, a species of cactus, so frequently employed for this purpose in the East at present, is believed to be of comparatively modern introduction. The aptness of the comparison of a tangled hedge of thorn to the difficulties which a slothful man conjures up as an excuse for his inactivity, will be at once recognised (Prov. xv. 19; cp. Hos. ii. 6). The narrow paths between the hedges of the vineyards and gardens, with a fence on either side (Num. xxii. 24), are distinguished from the "highways," or more frequented tracks, in Luke xiv. 23. [W. A. W.]

HEDGEHOG. The rendering in Is. xxxiv. 12 in Coverdale's translation of הִפּוֹד, hippōd; ἔχινος πελεκάν, Aq.; κύκνος, Theod. in Zeph. ii. 14; ericinus. In R. V. "porcupine," in this and the other two passages where it occurs, viz. Is. xiv. 23, Zeph. ii. 14. But A. V. has in all "bit-tern." [BITTERN.] [H. B. T.]

HE'GAI (הֶגַי, Pers. name, Ges.; Gai; Egeus), one of the eunuchs (A. V. "chamberlains") of the court of Ahasuerus, who had special charge of the women of the harem (Esth. ii. 8, 15). According to the Hebrew text, he was a distinct person from the "keeper of the concubines"—Shaashgaz (v. 14), but the LXX. have the same name in v. 14 as in v. 8, while in v. 15 they omit it altogether. In v. 3 the name is given under the different form of HE'GE, R. V. HEGAI (הֶגַי; Egeus, probably a Persian name). Aja signifies eunuch in Sanscrit, in accordance with which the LXX. have τῷ εὐνοούχῳ. Hegias, Ἡγίας, is mentioned by Ctesias as one of the people about Xerxes (Gesenius, Thes. Addenda, p. 83 b).

HEIFER (הֶעֱלָה, הֶפָרָה; δάμαλις; taoca). The Hebrew language has no expression that exactly corresponds to our heifer; for both eglah and parāh are applied to cows that have calved (1 Sam. vi. 7-12; Job xxi. 10; Is. vii. 21): indeed eglah means a young animal of any species, the full expression being 'eglah bāqār, "heifer of kine" (Deut. xxi. 3; 1 Sam. xvi. 2; Is. vii. 21). The heifer or young cow was not commonly used for ploughing, but only for treading out the corn (Hos. x. 11; but see Judg. xiv. 18), when it ran about without any "muzzle" (Deut. xxv. 4); hence the expression an "unbroken heifer" (Hos. iv. 16; A. V. "backsliding," R. V. "stubborn"), to which Israel is compared. A similar sense has been attached to the expression "calf of three years old," i.e. unsubdued, in Is. xv. 5, Jer. xlviii. 34; but it is much more probably to be taken, with R. V., as a proper name, 'Eglath Shetshiyāh, such names being not uncommon. The sense of "dissolute" is conveyed undoubtedly in Amos iv. 1. The comparison of Egypt to a "fair heifer" (Jer. xlvi. 20) may be an allusion to the well-known form under which Apis was worshipped (to which we may also refer the words in v. 15, as understood in the LXX., "Why is the bullock [μύσχος εκλεκτός] swept away?"); and the "destruction" threatened being the bite of the gad-fly (R. V. marg.), to which the word qeres would fitly apply. "To plough with another man's heifer" (Judg. xiv. 18) implies that an advantage has been gained by unfair means. The proper names Eglah, Egeglaim, and Parah are derived from the Hebrew terms at the head of this article. [W. L. B.]

HEIR. The Hebrew institutions relative to inheritance were of a very simple character (see Bloch, Das Mos.-Talm. Erbrecht, Budapest, 1890). Under the Patriarchal system the property was divided among the sons of the legitimate wives (Gen. xxi. 10, xxiv. 36, xxv. 5), a larger portion being assigned to one, generally the eldest, on whom devolved the duty of maintaining the females of the family. [BIRTH-RIGHT.] The sons of concubines were portioned off with presents (Gen. xxv. 6); occasionally they were placed on a par with the legitimate sons (Gen. xlix. 1 sq.), but this may have been restricted to cases where the children had been adopted by the legitimate wife (Gen. xxx. 3). At a later period the exclusion of the sons of concubines was rigidly enforced (Judg. xi. 1 sq.). Daughters had no share in the patrimony (Gen. xxxi. 14), but received a marriage portion, consisting of a maid-servant (Gen. xxix. 24, 29), or some other property. As a matter of special favour they sometimes took part with the sons (Job xlii. 15). The Mosaic Law regulated the succession to real property thus: it was to be divided among the sons, the eldest receiving a double portion (Deut. xxi. 17), the others equal shares: if there were no sons, it went to the daughters (Num. xxvii. 8), on the condition that they did not marry out of their own tribe (Num. xxvii. 6 sq.; Tob. vi. 12, vii. 13), otherwise the patrimony was forfeited (Joseph. Ant. iv. 7, § 5). If there were no daughters, it went to the brother of the deceased; if no brother, to the paternal uncle; and, failing these, to the next of kin (Num. xxvii. 9-11). In the case of a widow being left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right of marrying her, and in the event of his refusal the next of kin (Ruth iii. 12, 13): with him rested the obligation of redeeming the property of the widow (Ruth iv. 1 sq.), if it had been either sold or mortgaged: this obligation was termed הַיְחָוּת הַנְּחִימָה ("the right of redemption"), and was exercised in other cases besides that of marriage (Jer. xxiii. 7 sq.). If none stepped forward to marry the widow, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin. The object of these regulations evidently was to prevent the alienation of the land, and to retain it in the same family: the Mosaic Law enforced, in short, a strict entail. Even the assignment of the double portion, which under the patriarchal régime had been at the disposal of the father (Gen. xlviii. 22), was by the Mosaic Law limited to the eldest son (Deut. xxi. 15-17). The case of Achsah, to whom Caleb presented a field (Josh. xv. 18, 19; Judg. i. 15), is an exception: but perhaps even in that instance the land reverted to Caleb's descendants either at the death of Achsah or in the year of Jubilee. The land being thus so strictly tied up, the notion of heirship, as we understand it, was hardly known to the Jews: succession was a matter of right, and not of favour—a state of things which is embodied in the Hebrew language itself, for the word יָרַשׁ (A. V. "to inherit") implies possession, and very often forcible possession (Deut. ii. 12; Judg. i. 29, xi. 24), and a similar idea lies at the root of the words יְחָוָה and הִנְחִיחַ, generally translated "inheritance." Testamentary dispositions were in a sense superfluous (Bloch, § 63): the nearest approach to the idea is the blessing, which in early times conveyed temporal as well as spiritual benefits (Gen. xxvii. 19, 37; Josh. xv. 19). The references to wills in St. Paul's writings are borrowed from the usages of Greece and Rome (Heb. ix. 17), whence the custom was introduced into Judaea: several wills are noticed by Josephus in connexion with the Herods (Ant. xiii. 16, § 1, xvii. 3, § 2; B. J. ii. 2, § 3).

With regard to personal property, it may be presumed that the owner had some authority over it, at all events during his lifetime. The admission of a slave to a portion of the inheritance with the sons (Prov. xvii. 2) probably applies only to the personality. A presentation of half the personality formed the marriage portion of Tobit's wife (Tob. viii. 21). A distribution of goods during the father's lifetime is implied in Luke xv. 11-13: a distinction may be noted between οὐσία, a general term applicable to personality, and κληρονομία, the landed property, which could only be divided after the father's death (Luke xii. 13).

There is a striking resemblance between the Hebrew and Athenian customs of heirship, particularly as regards heiresses (ἐπικληροί), who were, in both nations, bound to marry their nearest relation: the property did not vest in the husband even for his lifetime, but devolved upon the son of the heiress as soon as he was of age, who also bore the name, not of his father, but of his maternal grandfather. The object in both countries was the same, viz. to preserve the name and property of every family (Dict. of Gk. and Rom. Ant., art. Epikleros). [W. L. B.] [F.]

HEL-AH (הֶלְאָה) = rust; B. 'Αωδᾶ, A. 'Αλαδ; Halaa, one of the two wives of Ashur, father of Tekoa (1 Ch. iv. 5). Her three children are enumerated in v. 7. In the LXX. the passage is very much confused, the sons being ascribed to wives different from those named in the Hebrew text.

HE'LAM (הֶלָּאָם; Aladū; Helam), a place east of the Jordan, but west of the Euphrates ("the river"), at which the Syrians were collected by Hadarezer, and at which David met and defeated them (2 Sam. x. 16, 17). In the latter verse the name appears as Chelamah (חֶלְמָה), but the final syllable is probably only the particle of motion. This longer form, Χαλαμάς, is inserted by the B. text* of the LXX. in v. 16 as if the name of the river, but A. omits; while in the two other places it has Aladū, corresponding to the Hebrew text (see Wellhausen in loco). By Josephus (Ant. vii. 6, § 3) the name is given as Χαλαμάς, and as being that of the king of the Syrians beyond Euphrates—πρὸς Χαλαμᾶν τὸν τῶν πέραν Εὐφράτου Σύρων βασιλέα.

In the Vulgate no name is inserted after fluvium; but in v. 16, for "came to Helam," we find adduxit exercitum eorum, reading הֶלְאָה, "their army." This too is the rendering of the old translator Aquila—ἐν δυνάμει αὐτῶν—of whose version v. 16 has survived. In v. 17 the Vulgate agrees with the A. V.

Many conjectures have been made as to the locality of Helam; but to none of them does any certainty attach. The most feasible perhaps is that it is identical with Alamatha, a town, named by Ptolemy, on the west of the Euphrates near Nicephorium. [G.] [W.]

HEL'BAH (הֶלְבָּאָה, fat, and so fruitful; B. Χεβδᾶ, A. Σχεδῖαν; Helba), a town of Asher, probably on the plain of Phoenicia, near Sidon (Judg. i. 31). [W.]

HEL'BON (הֶלְבֹּן; T. Χελβόν, A. Χεβρών), a place only mentioned once in Scripture. Ezekiel (xxvii. 18), in describing the wealth and commerce of Tyre, says, "Damascus was thy merchant in the wine of Helbon." The Vulgate translates these words in vino pingui; and some other ancient Versions also make the word descriptive of the quality of the wine. There can be no doubt, however, that Helbon is a proper name. Strabo speaks of the wine of Chaly-

* This is probably a late addition, since in the LXX. text, as it stood in Origen's Hexapla, Χαλαμάς was omitted after ποταμοῦ (see Bardth, ad loc.).

bon (ὄνον ἐκ Συρίας τὸν Καλυβώνιον) from Syria as among the luxuries in which the kings of Persia indulged (xv. 735); and Athenaeus assigns it to Damascus (i. 22). Geographers formerly represented Helbon as identical with the city of Aleppo, called Halab (حلب) by the Arabs; but there are strong reasons against this. The whole force and beauty of the description in Ezekiel consists in this, that in the great market of Tyre every kingdom and city found ample demand for its own staple products. Why, therefore, should the Damascenes supply wine of Aleppo, conveying it a long and difficult journey overland? If strange merchants had engaged in this trade, we should naturally expect them to be some maritime people who could carry it cheaply along the coast from the port of Aleppo.

In 1853 the writer directed attention to a village and district within a few miles of Damascus, still bearing the ancient name Helbon

(the Arabic حلبون corresponds exactly to the Hebrew הלבון), and still celebrated as producing the finest grapes in the country (see Journal of Sac. Lit. July 1853, p. 260; Five Years in Damascus, ii. 330 sq.). There cannot be a doubt that this village, and not Aleppo, is the Helbon of Ezekiel and Strabo. The village is situated in a wild glen, high up in Antilebanon. The remains of some large and beautiful structures are strewn around it. The bottom and sides of the glen are covered with terraced vineyards; and the whole surrounding country is rich in vines and fig-trees (Handbk. for Syr. and Pal. pp. 495-6; Wetzstein, ZDMG. xi. 490; Rob. iii. 472). The wine of Helbon is mentioned in inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar and Assurbanipal (Schrader, KAT. p. 425). The Chalybon of Ptolemy (v. 15) is probably Aleppo, Halab. [J. L. P.] [W.]

HELCHIAH (Χελκίας, B. -κεί; Helcias), 1 Ed. viii. 1. [HILKIAH.]

HELCHIAS (Helcias), the same person as the preceding, 2 Ed. i. 1. [HILKIAH.]

HEL'DAI (Ἡλδαί, (?)) = worldly; B. Χολδαί, A. Χολδαί; Holdai). 1. The twelfth captain of the monthly courses for the Temple service (1 Ch. xxvii. 15). He is specified as "the Netophathite," and as a descendant of Othniel.

2. An Israelite who seems to have returned from the Captivity; for whom, with others, Zechariah was commanded to make certain crowns as memorials (Zech. vi. 10). In v. 14 the name appears to be changed to HELEM. The LXX. translate παρὰ τῶν ἀρχόντων.

HE'LEB (Ἡλεβ, ?) = milk; B. ομιτς, A. Ἀλαφ; Heled), son of Baanah, the Netophathite, one of the heroes of king David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 29). In the parallel list the name is given as HE'LED (Ἡλεδ; B. Χθαδδ, A. Ἐλαδ; Heled), 1 Ch. xi. 30.

HELEK (Ἡλεκ = a portion; in Num. [v. 34], B. Χέλεγ, A. Χέλεκ, F. Χέλεχ; in Josh., B.

Κέλες, A. Φέλεκ; Helec), one of the descendants of Manasseh; the second son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 30), and founder of the family of the HELEKITES. The Bene-Chelek, "children of Helek," are mentioned in Josh. xvii. 2 as of much importance in their tribe. The name has not however survived; at least it has not yet been met with.

HE'LEKITES, THE (Ἡλεκίται, i.e. "the Chelkite;" B. δ Χελεγετ, AF. δ Χελεκί; familii Helcitarum), the family descended from the foregoing (Num. xxvi. 30; LXX. v. 34).

HE'LEM (Ἡλεμ = a blow; B. Βαλαδμ, A. Ἐλαμ; Helem). 1. A man named among the descendants of Asher, in a passage evidently much disordered (1 Ch. vii. 35). If it be intended that he was the brother of Shamer, then he may be identical with Hotham, in v. 32, the name having been altered in copying; but this is mere conjecture. Berrington (i. 265) quotes two Hebrew MSS., in which the name is written Ἡλη, Chelus.

2. (LXX. τοῖς ὑπομνουσι.) A man mentioned only in Zech. vi. 14. Apparently the same who is given as HELDAI in v. 10.

HE-LEPH (Ἡλεφ; B. Μοολάμ, A. Μελέφ—both include the preposition prefixed; Heleph), the place from which the boundary of the tribe of Naphtali started (Josh. xix. 33), but where situated, or on which quarter, cannot be ascertained from the text. Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 320) proposes to identify it with Beit Lif, a village situated on a hill-top nearly mid-way between Râs Abyâd and Kades; and on the edge of a very marked ravine, which probably formed part of the boundary between Naphtali and Asher (Van de Velde, Syria, i. 233). The identification, however, is uncertain. [G.] [W.]

HE'LEZ (Ἡλεζ, (?)) = activity; in Sam. B. Σελαής—the initial Σ is probably from the end of the preceding word—A. Ἐλαής; 1 Ch. xxvii. 10, B. Χέσλας, A. Χελαής; Helles, Helles). 1. One of "the thirty" of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii.

26; 1 Ch. xi. 27: in the latter, Ἡλεζ), an Ephraimite, and captain of the seventh monthly course (1 Ch. xxvii. 10). In both these passages of Chronicles he is called "the Pelonite," of which Kennicott decides that "the Paltime" of Samuel is a corruption (Dissertation, &c., pp. 183-4; see, however, Driver on Sam. i. c.) [PALTIME.]

2. (Χελαής; Helles.) A man of Judah, son of Azariah (1 Ch. ii. 39); a descendant of Jerahmeel, of the great family of Hezron.

HE'LI (Ἡλῆ, Ἡλεῖ; Helit), the father of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary (Luke iii. 23); maintained by Lord A. Hervey, the investigator of the genealogy of Christ, to have been the real brother of Jacob, the father of the Virgin herself (Hervey, Genealogies, pp. 130, 138). The name, as we possess it, is the same as that employed by the LXX. in the O. T. to render the Hebrew ἱלִי, Eli the high-priest.

2. The third of three names inserted between

ACHITOB and AMARIAS in the genealogy of Ezra, in 2 Esd. i. 2 (cp. Ezra vii. 2, 3).

HEL'IAS, 2 Esd. vii. 39. [ELIJAH.]

HELIODORUS (Ἡλιόδωρος), the treasurer (ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν πραγμάτων) of Seleucus Philopator, who was commissioned by the king, at the instigation of Apollonius [APOLLONIUS], to carry away the private treasures deposited in the Temple at Jerusalem. According to the narrative in 2 Macc. iii. 9 sq., he was stayed from the execution of his design by a "great apparition" (ἐπιφάνεια), in consequence of which he fell down "compassed with great darkness," and speechless. He was afterwards restored at the intercession of the high-priest Onias, and bore witness to the king of the inviolable majesty of the Temple (2 Macc. iii.). The full details of the narrative are not supported by any other evidence. Josephus, who was unacquainted with 2 Macc., takes no notice of it; and the author of the so-called 4 Macc. attributes the attempt to plunder the Temple to Apollonius, and differs in his account of the miraculous interposition, though he distinctly recognises it (de Macc. 4, οὐρανὸν ἐπιπνοὶ προφάνησαν ἄγγελοι . . . καταπεσὼν δὲ ἡμιθανῆς ὁ Ἀπολλώνιος . . .). Heliodorus afterwards murdered Seleucus, and made an unsuccessful attempt to seize the Syrian crown B.C. 175 (App. Syr. 45). Cp. Wernsdorf, De fide Libr. Macc. § liv.; Speaker's Comm. in loco; Stanley's Lectt. on the Jewish Church, Lect. xviii. Raffaele's grand picture of "Heliodorus" will be known to many by copies and engravings, if not by the original. [B. F. W.]

HEL'KAI (Ἡλκαί, ?=Ἡλλή) = the Lord's portion; BA. omit; Helos), a priest of the family of Meraioth (or Meremoth, see v. 3), who was living in the days of Joiakim the high-priest, i.e. in the generation following the return from Babylon under Jeshna and Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 15; cp. vs. 10, 12).

HEL'KATH (Ἡλκαθ): in Josh. xix., B. Ἐλεκέθ, A. Χελκᾶθ; in Josh. xxi., B. Χελκᾶτ, A. Θελκᾶθ: Alcath and Elcath), the town named as the starting-point for the boundary of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 25), and allotted with its "suburbs" to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 31). The enumeration of the boundary seems to proceed from south to north; but nothing absolutely certain can be said thereon, nor has any traveller recovered the site of Helkath. Eusebius and Jerome report the name much corrupted (s. v. Ἐσᾶή, OS.² p. 261, 81; Elcath, p. 153, 30), but evidently knew nothing of the place. Schwarz (p. 191) suggests the village Yerka, which lies about 8½ miles east of 'Akka (see PEF. Map of Western Palestine, Sheet III.); but this is uncertain.

In the list of Levitical cities in 1 Ch. vi. HUKOK is substituted for Helkath. [G.] [W.]

HEL'KATH HAZ'ZURIM (Ἡλκαθ ἡζζυρίμ; μερίς τῶν ἐπιβούλων—perhaps reading Ἰζζυρίμ; Aquila, Κλῆρος τῶν στερεῶν; Ager robustorum), a smooth piece of ground, apparently close to the pool of Gibeon, where the combat took place between the two parties of Joab's men and Abner's men, which ended in the death of the whole of the combatants, and brought on a general battle (2 Sam. ii. 16). [GIBEON; JOAB.] Various interpretations are given of the name (see Driver in loco). In addition to those given above, Genesius (Theos. p. 485 a) renders it "the field of swords." The margin of the A. V. has the field of strong men, agreeing with Aquila and the Vulgate. The margin of R. V. has the field of the sharp knives. Ewald (Gesch. iii. 147), "das Feld der Tückischen." [G.] [W.]

HELKI'AS (B. Χελκείας, B^aA. Χελκίας; Vulg. omits). A fourth variation of the name of Hilkiah the high-priest, 1 Esd. i. 8. [HILKIAH.]

HELL. This is the word generally and unfortunately used by the translators of 1611 to render the Hebrew She'ol (שְׁאוֹל, or שְׁאֵל; אֵדֶם, and once θάνατος, 2 Sam. xxii. 6; Inferi or Inferna, or sometimes Mors). We say unfortunately, because—although, as St. Augustine truly asserts, Sheol, with its equivalents Inferi and Hades, are never used in an absolutely good sense (De Gen. ad Lit. xii. 33), yet—the English word Hell is mixed up with numberless associations entirely foreign to the minds of the ancient Hebrews. It would perhaps have been better to retain the Hebrew word Sheol, or else render it always by "the grave" or "the pit" (see the practice adopted in the R. V., Preface). Ewald accepts Luther's word Hölle; even Unterwelt, which is suggested by De Wette, involves conceptions too human for the purpose.

Passing over the derivations suggested by older writers, it is now generally agreed that the word comes from the root שָׁוַע, "to make hollow" (cp. Germ. Hölle, "hell," with Höhle, "a hollow"), and therefore means the vast hollow subterranean resting-place which is the common receptacle of the dead (Gesen. Theos. p. 1348; Böttcher, de Inferis, c. iv. p. 137 sq.; Ewald, ad Ps. p. 42). It is deep (Job xi. 8) and dark (Job xi. 21, 22), in the centre of the earth (Num. xvi. 30; Deut. xxxii. 22), having within it depths on depths (Prov. ix. 18), and fastened with gates (Is. xxxviii. 10) and bars (Job xvii. 16). Some have fancied (as Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 203, Eng. ed.) that the Jews, like the Greeks, believed in infernal rivers: thus Clemens Alex. defines Gehenna as "a river of fire" (Fragm. 38), and expressly compares it to the fiery rivers of Tartarus (Strom. v. 14, 92); and Tertullian says that it was supposed to resemble Pyriphlegethon (Apolog. cap. xlvii.). The notion, however, is not found in Scripture, for Ps. xviii. 4 ("torrents of wickedness") is a mere metaphor. In this cavernous realm are the souls of dead men, the Rephaim and ill-spirits (Ps. lxxxvi. 13, lxxxix. 48; Prov. xxiii. 14; Ezek. xxxi. 17, xxxii. 21). It is all-devouring (Prov. i. 12, xxx. 16), insatiable (Is. v. 14), and remorseless (Cant. viii. 6). The shadows, not of men only, but even of trees and kingdoms, are placed in Sheol (Is. xiv. 9-20; Ezek. xxxi. 14-18, xxxii. passim).

It is clear that in many passages of the O. T. Sheol can only mean "the grave," and it is so rendered in the A. V. (see, for example, Gen. xxxvii. 35, xlii. 38; 1 Sam. ii. 6; Job xiv. 13). In other passages, however, it seems to involve a notion of punishment, and is therefore rendered in the A. V. by the word "Hell." But in many cases this translation misleads the reader. It is obvious, for instance, that Job xi. 8, Ps. cxxxix. 8, and Amos ix. 2 (where "hell" is used as the antithesis of "heaven"), merely illustrate the Jewish notions of the locality of Sheol in the bowels of the earth. Even Ps. ix. 17, Prov. xv. 24, v. 5, ix. 18, seem to refer rather to the danger of terrible and precipitate death than to a place of infernal anguish. An attentive examination of all the passages in which the word occurs will show that the Hebrew notions respecting Sheol were of a vague description. The rewards and punishments of the Mosaic Law were temporal, and it was only gradually and slowly that God revealed to His chosen people a knowledge of future rewards and punishments. Generally speaking, the Hebrews regarded the grave as the final end of all sentient and intelligent existence, "the land where all things are forgotten" (Ps. vi. 5; Ps. lxxxviii. 10-22; Is. xxxviii. 9-20; Eccles. ix. 10; Eccles. xvii. 27, 28). Even the righteous Hezekiah trembled lest, "when his eyes closed upon the cherubim and the mercy-seat," he should no longer "see the Lord, even the Lord in the land of the living."

In the N. T. the word Hades (like Sheol) sometimes means merely "the grave" (Rev. xx. 13; Acts ii. 31; 1 Cor. xv. 55), or in general "the unseen world." It is in this sense that the creeds say of our Lord κατήλθεν ἐν ᾧδῃ or eis ᾧδου, descendit ad inferos, or inferna, meaning "the state of the dead in general, without any restriction of happiness or misery" (Beveridge on Art. iii.), a doctrine certainly, though only virtually, expressed in Scripture (Ephes. iv. 9; Acts ii. 25-31). Similarly Josephus uses Hades as the name of the place whence the soul of Samuel was evoked (Ant. vi. 14, § 2). Elsewhere in the N. T. Hades is used of a place of retribution (Luke xvi. 23; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Matt. xi. 23, &c.). Consequently it has been the prevalent, almost the universal, notion that Hades is an intermediate state between death and resurrection, divided into two parts, one the abode of the blessed and the other of the lost. This was the belief of the Jews after the Exile, who gave to the places the names of Paradise and Gehenna (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 1, § 3; cp. Otho, Lex. Rabb. s. vv.), of the Fathers generally (Tert. de Animâ, c. lv.; Jerome in Eccl. iii.; Just. Mart. Dial. c. Tryph. § 105, &c.; see Pearson on Creed, Art. v.), and of many moderns (Trench on the Parables, p. 467; Alford on Luke xvi. 23). In holding this view, main reliance is placed on the parable of Dives and Lazarus; but it is impossible to ground the proof of an important theological doctrine on a passage which confessedly abounds in Jewish metaphors. "Theologia parabolica non est demonstrativa" is a rule too valuable to be forgotten; and if we are to turn rhetoric into logic, and build a dogma on every metaphor, our belief will be of a vague and contradictory character. "Abraham's bosom," says Archbishop Trench, "is not heaven, though it will issue in heaven, so neither is Hades hell though to issue in it, when death and Hades shall be cast into the lake of fire which is the proper hell. It is the place of painful restraint (φυλακή, 1 Pet. iii.

19; ἄβυσσος, Luke viii. 31), where the souls of the wicked are reserved to the judgment of the great day." But respecting the condition of the dead whether before or after the resurrection we know very little indeed; nor shall we know anything certain until the awful curtains of mortality are drawn aside. Dogmatism on this topic appears to be peculiarly misplaced. [See PARADISE.]

The word most frequently used in the N. T. for the place of future punishment is Gehenna (γέεννα), or Gehenna of fire (ἡ γ. τοῦ πυρός), and this word we must notice only so far as our purpose requires; for further information see GEHENNA and HINNOM. The valley of Hinnom, for which Gehenna is the Greek representative, once pleasant with the waters of Siloa ("irrigua et nemorosa, plenuaque deliciis," Hieron. ad Jer. vii. 19, 31; Matt. v. 22), and which afterwards regained its old appearance ("hodieque hortorum praebens deliciis," id.), was with its horrible associations of Moloch-worship (Jer. vii. 31, xix. 2-6; 2 K. xxiii. 10) so abhorrent to Jewish feeling that they adopted the word as a symbol of disgust and torment. The feeling was kept up by the pollution which the valley underwent at the hands of Josiah, after which it was made the common sink of all the filth and corruption in the city, ghastly fires being kept burning (acc. to R. Kimchi) to preserve it from absolute putrefaction (see authorities quoted in Otho, Lex. Rabb. s. v. Hinnom, &c.). The fire and the worm were fit emblems of anguish, and as such had seized hold of the Jewish imagination (Is. lxvi. 24; Judith xvi. 17; Eccles. vii. 17); hence the application of the word Gehenna and its accessories in Matt. v. 22, 29, 30; Luke xii. 5.

A part of the valley of Hinnom was named Tophet (2 K. xxiii. 10; for its history and derivation see TOPHET), a word used for what is defiled and abominable (Jer. vii. 31, 32; xix. 6-13). It was applied by the Rabbis to a place of future torment (Targ. on Is. xxx. 33; Talm. Erubin, f. 19, 1; Böttcher, pp. 80, 85), but does not occur in the N. T. In the vivid picture of Isaiah (xxx. 33), which is full of fine irony against the enemy, the name is applied to purposes of threatening (with a probable allusion to the recent acts of Hezekiah; see Rosenmüller ad loc.). Besides the authorities quoted, see Bochart (Phaleg, p. 528), Ewald (Proph. ii. 55), Selden (de Dis Syris, p. 172 sq.), Wilson (Lands of the Bible, i. 499), &c. The subject of the punishment of the wicked and of Hell as a place of torment belongs to a Theological rather than to a Biblical Dictionary. [F. W. F.]

HELLENIST (Ἑλληνιστής; Graecus; cp. Ἑλληνισμός, 2 Macc. iv. 13). In one of the earliest notices of the first Christian Church at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 1), two distinct parties are recognised among its members, "Hebrews" and "Hellenists" (Grecians), who appear to stand towards one another in some degree in a relation of jealous rivalry. So again when St. Paul first visited Jerusalem after his conversion, he "spoke and disputed with the Hellenists" (Acts ix. 29), as if expecting to find more sympathy among them than with the rulers of the Jews. The term Hellenist occurs once again in the N. T. according to the common text (retained by Westcott and Hort), in the account of the foundation of the Church at Antioch (Acts xi. 20), but there the context, as well as the form of the sentence, seems to require the other reading "Greeks" (Ἕλληνες; Gebhardt), which is supported by great external evidence, as the true antithesis to "Jews" (Ἰουδαίους, not Ἑβραίους, v. 19; see Speaker's Comm. in loco).

The name, according to its derivation, whether the original verb (Ἑλληνίζω) be taken, according to the common analogy of similar forms (μυθίζω, ἀττικίζω, φιλιππίζω), in the general sense of adopting the spirit and character of Greeks, or, in the more limited sense of using the Greek language (Xen. Anab. vii. 3, § 25), marks a class distinguished by peculiar habits, and not by descent. Thus the Hellenists as a body included not only the proselytes of Greek (or foreign) parentage (οἱ σεβόμενοι Ἕλληνες, Acts xvii. 4; οἱ σεβόμενοι προσήλυτοι, Acts xiii. 43; οἱ σεβόμενοι, Acts xvii. 17), but also those Jews who, by settling in foreign countries, had adopted the prevalent form of the current Greek civilisation, and with it the use of the common Greek dialect, to the exclusion of the Aramaic, which was the national representative of the ancient Hebrew. Hellenism was thus a type of life, and not an indication of origin. Hellenists might be Greeks, but when the latter term is used (Ἕλληνες, John xii. 20), the point of race and not of creed is that which is foremost in the mind of the writer.

The general influence of the Greek conquests in the East, the rise and spread of the Jewish Dispersion, and the essential antagonism of Jew and Greek, have been noticed in other articles [ALEXANDER THE GREAT; ALEXANDRIA; DISPERSION; ANTIOCHUS IV. EPIPHANES], and it remains only to characterise briefly the elements which the Hellenists contributed to the language of the N. T., and the immediate effects which they produced upon the Apostolic teaching:—

1. The flexibility of the Greek language gained for it in ancient times a general currency similar to that which French enjoys in modern Europe; but with this important difference, that Greek was not only the language of educated men, but also the language of the masses in the great centres of commerce. The colonies of Alexander and his successors originally established what has been called the Macedonian dialect throughout the East; but even in this the prevailing power of Attic literature made itself distinctly felt. Peculiar words and forms adopted at Alexandria were undoubtedly of Macedonian origin, but the later Attic may be justly regarded as the real basis of Oriental Greek. This first type was, however, soon modified, at least in common use, by contact with other languages. The vocabulary was enriched by the addition of foreign words, and the syntax was modified by new constructions. In this way a variety of local dialects must have arisen, the specific characters of which were determined in the first instance by the conditions under which they were formed, and which afterwards passed away with the circumstances which had produced them. But one of these dialects has been preserved after the ruin of the people among whom it arose, by being consecrated to the noblest service which language has yet fulfilled. In other cases the dialects perished together with the communities who used them in the common intercourse of life, but in that of the Jews the Alexandrine Version of the O. T., acting in this respect like the great vernacular Versions of England and Germany, gave a definiteness and fixity to the popular language which could not have been gained without the existence of some recognised standard. The style of the LXX. itself is, indeed, different in different parts, but the same general character runs through the whole, and the variations which it presents are not greater than those which exist in the different Books of the N. T.

The functions which this Jewish-Greek had to discharge were of the widest application, and the language itself combined the most opposite features. It was essentially a fusion of Eastern and Western thought. For disregarding peculiarities of inflexion and novel words, the characteristic of the Hellenistic dialect is the combination of a Hebrew spirit with a Greek body, of a Hebrew form with Greek words. The conception belongs to one race, and the expression to another. Nor is it too much to say that this combination was one of the most important preparations for the reception of Christianity, and one of the most important aids for the adequate expression of its teaching. On the one hand, by the spread of the Hellenistic Greek, the deep, theocratic aspect of the world and life which distinguishes Jewish thought was placed before men at large; and on the other, the subtle truths which philosophy had gained from the analysis of mind and action, and enshrined in words, were transferred to the service of Revelation. In the fulness of time, when the great message came, a language was prepared to convey it; and thus the very dialect of the N. T. forms a great lesson in the true philosophy of history, and becomes in itself a monument of the providential government of mankind.

This view of the Hellenistic dialect will at once remove one of the commonest misconceptions relating to it. For it will follow that its deviations from the ordinary laws of classic Greek are themselves bound by some common law, and that irregularities of construction and altered usages of words are to be traced to their first source, and interpreted strictly according to the original conception out of which they sprang. A popular, and even a corrupt, dialect is not less precise—or, in other words, is not less human—than a polished one, though its interpretation may often be more difficult from the want of materials for analysis. But in the case of the N. T., the Books themselves furnish an ample store for the critic, and the Septuagint, when compared with the Hebrew text, provides him with the history of the language which he has to study.

2. The adoption of a strange language was essentially characteristic of the true nature of Hellenism. The purely outward elements of the national life were laid aside with a facility of which history offers few examples, while the inner character of the people remained unchanged. In every respect the thought, so to speak, was clothed in a new dress. Hellenism was, as it were, a fresh incorporation of Judaism according to altered laws of life and worship.

But as the Hebrew spirit made itself distinctly visible in the new dialect, so it remained undestroyed by the new conditions which regulated its action. While the Hellenistic Jews followed their natural instinct for trade, which was originally curbed by the Mosaic Law, and gained a deeper insight into foreign character, and with this a truer sympathy, or at least a wider tolerance towards foreign opinions, they found means at the same time to extend the knowledge of the principles of their divine faith, and to gain respect and attention even from those who did not openly embrace their religion. Hellenism accomplished for the outer world what the Return [CYRUS] accomplished for the Palestinian Jews: it was the necessary step between a religion of form and a religion of spirit: it witnessed against Judaism as final and universal, and it witnessed for it as the foundation of a spiritual religion which should be bound by no local restrictions. Under the influence of this wider instruction a Greek body grew up around the Synagogue, not admitted into the Jewish Church, and yet holding a recognised position with regard to it, which was able to apprehend the Apostolic teaching, and ready to receive it. The Hellenists themselves were at once missionaries to the heathen, and prophets to their own countrymen. Their lives were an abiding protest against polytheism and pantheism, and they retained with unshaken zeal the sum of their ancient creed, when the preacher had popularly occupied the place of the priest, and a service of prayer and praise and exhortation had succeeded in daily life to the elaborate ritual of the Temple. Yet this new development of Judaism was obtained without the sacrifice of national ties. The connexion of the Hellenists with the Temple was not broken, except in the case of some of the Egyptian Jews. [THE DISPERSION.] Unity coexisted with dispersion; and the organisation of a Catholic Church was foreshadowed, not only in the widening breadth of doctrine, but even externally in the scattered communities which looked to Jerusalem as their common centre.

In another aspect Hellenism served as the preparation for a Catholic creed. As it furnished the language of Christianity, it supplied also that literary instinct which counteracted the traditional reserve of the Palestinian Jews. The writings of the N. T., and all the writings of the Apostolic age, with the exception of the original Gospel of St. Matthew, were, as far as we know, Greek; and Greek seems to have remained the sole vehicle of Christian literature, and the principal medium of Christian worship, till the Church of North Africa rose into importance in the time of Tertullian. The Canon of the Christian Scriptures, the early Creeds, and the Liturgies are the memorials of this Hellenistic predominance in the Church, and the types of its working; and if in later times the Greek spirit descended to the investigation of painful subtleties, it may be questioned whether the fulness of Christian truth could have been developed without the power of Greek thought tempered by Hebrew discipline.

The general relations of Hellenism to Judaism are well treated in the histories of Ewald and Jost (cp. also Richm. HWB.; Herzog, *RE.*² s. n.; Farrar, St. Paul, ch. vii.; Schürer, Geschichte

d. jüd. Volkes im Zeitalter d. Jesus Christi, Index, s. n. Hellenismus; but the Hellenistic language has still, critically speaking, to be explored. Winer's Treatise on the Grammar of N. T. Greek,⁹ ed. Moulton, has done great service in establishing the idea of law in N. T. language, which was obliterated by earlier interpreters, but even Winer does not investigate the origin of the peculiarities of the Hellenistic dialect. Hatch's Essays on Biblical Greek are a great step towards this investigation, and much help may be gathered from materials scattered through the works of Field, Lagarde, Cornill, Hollenberg, Vollers, Wellhausen, Kamphausen, &c. The idioms of the N. T. cannot be discussed apart from the works of the LXX. (cp. Grinfield, N. T. Graec., ed. Hellenistica, and Scholía Hellenistica in N. T.); and no explanation can be considered perfect which does not take into account the origin of the corresponding Hebrew idioms. For this work the materials are gradually accumulating. A good text of the LXX. is within reach of all (cp. Swete's edition), the photographing of the great MSS. B. A. M. Q. having at last rendered exact knowledge of forms possible. Bruder's Concordance leaves nothing to be desired for the vocabulary of the N. T., and the Oxford edition of Trommius' Concordance to the LXX. is proving itself both admirable in method and trustworthy for critical purposes.

HELMET. [ARMS, p. 241.]

HE'LO'N (הֶלֶוֹן = strong; Καίλων; Helon), father of Eliab, who was the chief man of the tribe of Zebulun, when the census was taken in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 9; ii. 7; vii. 24, 29; x. 16).

HEM OF GARMENT (חֵטְם; κρόσπεδον; simbrū). The importance which the later Jews, especially the Pharisees (Matt. xxiii. 5), attached to the hem or fringe of their garments, was founded upon the regulation in Num. xv. 38, 39, which attached a symbolical meaning to it. We must not, however, conclude that the fringe owes its origin to that passage. It was in the first instance the ordinary mode of finishing the robe, the ends of the threads composing the woof being left in order to prevent the cloth from unravelling, just as in the Egyptian calasiris (Her. ii. 81; Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. ii. 91, 322 [1878]), and in the Assyrian robes as represented in the bas-reliefs of Nineveh: the blue riband being added to strengthen the border. The Hebrew word siith is expressive of this fretted edge: the Greek κρόσπεδα (the etymology of which is uncertain) applies to the edge of a river or mountain (Xen. Hist. Gr. iii. 2, § 16; iv. 6, § 8), and is explained by Hesychius as τὰ ἐν τῷ ἄκρῳ τοῦ ἱματίου κεκλωσμένα ῥάμματα καὶ τὸ ἄκρον αὐτοῦ. The béged or outer robe was a simple quadrangular piece of cloth, and generally so worn that two of the corners hung down in front: these corners were ornamented with a "riband of blue," the riband itself being, as we may conclude from the word used, חֵטְם (K. V. "cord"), as narrow as a thread or piece of string. The Jews attached great sanctity to this fringe (Matt. ix. 20, xiv. 36; Luke viii. 44), and the Pharisees made it more prominent than it was originally designed to be, enlarging both the fringe and the riband to an undue width (Matt. xxiii. 5). Directions were given as to the number of threads of which it ought to be composed, and other particulars, to each of which a symbolical meaning was attached (Carpzov, Apparat. p. 128). It was appended in later times to the *talit*h more especially, as being the robe usually worn at devotions: whence the proverbial saying quoted by Lightfoot (Exercit. on Matt. v. 40), "He that takes care of his fringes deserves a good coat." [W. L. B.]

HEMAM (הַמָּם = extermination; אַמָּם; Heman). Hori (i.e. Horite) and Heman were sons (A. V. "children," but the word is Bené) of Lotan, the eldest son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 22). In the list in 1 Ch. i. 39 the name appears as HOMAM, which is probably the correct form.

HE'MAN (הַמָּן = true, reliable). 1. Son of Zerah, 1 Ch. ii. 6 (B. Αἰμὼν, A. 'Αμῶν); 1 K. iv. 31 (LXX. iv. 27, B. Αἰδῶν, A. 'Ημῶν). See following article.

2. Son of Joel, and grandson of Samuel the prophet, a Kohathite. He is called "the singer" (הַמְשִׁיבֵר), rather the musician (1 Ch. vi. 33, Heb. v. 18), and was the first of the three chief Levites to whom was committed the vocal and instrumental music of the Temple-service in the reign of David, as we read 1 Ch. xv. 16-22; Asaph and Ethan, or rather, according to xxv. 1, 3, Jeduthun,* being his colleagues. [JEDUTHUN.] The genealogy of Heman is given in 1 Ch. vi. 33-38 (A. V.), but the generations between Assir the son of Korah and Samuel are somewhat confused, owing to two collateral lines having got mixed. A rectification of this genealogy will be found at p. 214 of The Genealogies of our Lord, where it is shown that Heman is fourteenth in descent from Levi. A further account of Heman is given in 1 Ch. xxv., where he is called (v. 5) "the king's seer in the matters of God," the word מְשִׁבֵר, "seer," which in 2 Ch. xxxv. 15 is applied to Jeduthun, and in xxix. 30 to Asaph, being probably used in the same sense as is מְשִׁבֵר, "prophesied," of Asaph and Jeduthun in xxv. 1-3. We there learn that Heman had fourteen sons and three daughters [HANANIAH, 1]. The sons all assisted in the music under their father, and each of them was head of one of the twenty-four wards of Levites, who "were instructed in the songs of the Lord," or rather in sacred music. Whether or no this Heman is the person to whom the 88th Psalm is ascribed is still a disputed question (see Delitzsch's loco and Schultz in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Komm. z. A. T., 'Einl. z. Pss.' p. 12). The chief reason for supposing him to be the same is, that as other Psalms are ascribed to Asaph and Jeduthun, so it is likely that this one should be to Heman the singer. But on the other hand he is there called "the Ezrahite;" and the 89th Psalm is ascribed to "Ethan the Ezrahite."^b But since Heman and Ethan are described in 1 Ch. ii. 6 as "sons of Zerah," it is in the highest degree probable that Ezrahite means "of the family of Zerah," and consequently that Heman of the 88th Psalm is different from Heman the singer, the Kohathite. In 1 K. iv. 31 again (Heb. v. 11), we have mention, as of the wisest of mankind, of Ethan the Ezrahite, Heman, Chalcol and Darda, the sons of Mahol, a list corresponding with the names of the sons of Zerah in 1 Ch. ii. 6. The inference from which is that there was a Heman, different from Heman the singer, of the family of Zerah the son of Judah, and that he is distinguished from Heman the singer, the Levite, by being called the Ezrahite. As regards the age when Heman the Ezrahite lived, the only thing that can be asserted is that he lived before Solomon, who was said to be "wiser than Heman," and after Zerah the son of Judah. His being called "son of Zerah" in 1 Ch. ii. 6, indicates nothing as to the precise age when he and his brother lived. They are probably mentioned in this abridged genealogy, only as having been illustrious persons of their family. Nor is anything known of Mahol their father. It is of course uncertain whether the tradition which ascribed the 88th Psalm to Heman's authorship is trustworthy. Nor is there anything in the Psalm itself which clearly marks the time of its composition.

If Heman the Kohathite, or his father, had married an heiress of the house of Zerah, as the sons of Hakkoz did of the house of Barzillai, and was so reckoned in the genealogy of Zerah, then all the notices of Heman might point to the same person, and the musical skill of David's chief musician, and the wisdom of David's seer, and the genius of the author of the 88th Psalm, concurring in the same individual, would make him fit to be joined with those other worthies whose wisdom was only exceeded by that of Solomon. But it is impossible to assert that this was the case.

HEMA' TH, R. V. HAMATH (חַמָּת; אַמָּת; BA. 'Εμᾶθ; Emath). Another form—not warranted by the Hebrew—of the well-known name HAMATH (Amos vi. 14).

HEMATH (חַמָּת, i.e. as in R. V. Hammath; A. Αἰμᾶθ, B. Μεσσημᾶθ; Vulg. translates de calore), a person, or a place, named in the genealogical lists of Judah, as the origin of the Kenites, and the "father" of the house of RECHAB (1 Ch. ii. 55).

HE'MDAN (חַמְדָּן = pleasant; 'Αμᾶδ; Am-dam, or Hamdam, some copies Hamdan), the eldest son of Dishon, son of Anah the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 26). In the parallel list of 1 Ch. (i. 41) the name is given as AMRAM (אִמְרָם), which in the A. V. is changed to AMRAM, probably following the Vulgate Hamram, in the earliest MSS. Amaran; but correctly in R. V.

The name Hemdan is by Knobel (Genesis, p. 256) compared with those of Hunsedy and Hamady, two of the five families of the tribe of Omran or Amran, who are located to the E. and S.E. of 'Akabah: also with the Bene-

* מְשִׁבֵר and מְשִׁבֵר are but two names of the same person. See also 2 Ch. xxix. 13, 14.

^b St. Augustine's copy read, with the LXX. (ed. Swete), Israélite, for Ezrahite, in the titles to the 86th and 89th Psalms. His explanation of the title of Ps. lxxxviii. is a curious specimen of spiritualizing interpretation.

Hamyde, who are found a short distance S. of Kerak (S.E. corner of the Dead Sea); and from thence to el-Busaireh, probably the ancient BOZRAH, on the road to Petra (see Burckhardt, Syria, &c., pp. 695, 407).

HEMLOCK. [GALL.]

HEN (הֵן; Hem). According to the rendering of the passage (Zech. vi. 14) adopted in the A. V. and R. V. (text), Hen (or accurately Chen) is the name of a son of Zephaniah. But by the LXX. (χαψίς). Ewald (Gunst), and many interpreters (see MV.¹¹; Orelli in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Komm. z. A. T., in loco), the words are taken to mean "for the favour of (R. V. marg. for the kindness of) the son of Zephaniah." [F.]

HEN. The hen is nowhere noticed in the O. T. (see Riehm, HWB. s. n. 'Hühner'), and in the N. T. only in the passages (Matt. xxiii. 37; Luke xii. 34) where our Saviour touchingly compares His anxiety to save Jerusalem to the tender care of a hen "gathering her chickens under her wings." The word employed is ὄρνις, which is used in the same specific sense in classical Greek (Aristoph. Av. 102; Vesp. 811). That a bird, so intimately connected with the household, and so common in Palestine, as we know from Rabbinical sources, should receive such slight notice, is certainly singular; it is almost equally singular that it is nowhere represented in the paintings of ancient Egypt (Wilkinson, i. 234 [1878]). On Babylonian cylinders and seals the cock would seem to symbolise some deity. [W. L. B.] [F.]

HE'NA (הֵנָּה; 'Aná; Ana) seems to have been one of the cities of a monarchical state which the Assyrian kings had conquered some time before the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib (2 K. xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 13). Its being mentioned immediately after Sepharvaim without the intervention of the words "and the king of," would lead one to suppose that it lay in the same province. As, however, Halévy has shown (Zeitschrift für Assyriologie, vol. ii., p. 401) that the site of Sepharvaim is uncertain, the position of Hena must likewise be regarded as doubtful. Fried. Delitzsch (Wo lag das Paradies? p. 279) points out that Hena cannot, for etymological reasons, be identified with عانة (Ānah or Ānat) on the Euphrates, and suggests that it may be the city mentioned by the Assyrian king Aššur-našir-apli under the name of An-at (Great Standard Inscription, col. iii. ll. 15, 16). This city, which was situated on an island in the Euphrates, has been already identified with 'Anah or 'Anat (Fox Talbot's Assyrian Texts, p. 21; Layard's Nineveh and Babylon, p. 355). Further uncertainty is introduced by the fact that the modern Anat is on the right bank of the stream, and that the name is also attached to some ruins a little lower down on the left bank, but between them is "a string of islands" (Chesney's Euphrates Expedition, i. 53), on one of which the ancient city may have been situated. It appears as Anatho ('Αναθώ) in Isidore of Charax (Mans. Parth. p. 4). [G. R.] [T. G. P.]

HEN-A'DAD (חֲנַנְיָדָד = favour of Hadad; B. 'Hvadš, A. 'Hvadšš; Henadad, Enadad), the head of a family of Levites who took a prominent part in the rebuilding of the Temple under Jeshua (Ezra iii. 9). Bavai and Binnui (Neh. iii. 18, 24), who assisted in the repair of the wall of the city, probably belonged to the same family. The latter also represented his family at the signing of the covenant (Neh. x. 9).

HE'NOCH (חֲנֹךְ; 'Enóχ; Henoch). 1. The form in which the well-known name ENOCH is given in the A. V. of 1 Ch. i. 3. The Hebrew word is the same both here and in Genesis, viz. Chanoc. Perhaps in the present case our translators followed the Vulgate. 2. So they appear also to have done in 1 Ch. i. 33 with a name which in Gen. xxv. 4 is more accurately given as HANOCH.

HEPHER (חֶפְרָה = a well; BAF. 'Opher; Hepher). 1. A descendant of Manasseh. The youngest of the sons of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 32; LXX. v. 36), and head of the family of the HEPHERITES. Hepher was father of ZELO-PHEAD (xvi. 33; xvii. 1; Josh. xvii. 2, 3), whose daughters first raised the question of the right of a woman, having no brother, to hold the property of her father.

2. ('Hφά; Hepher.) The second son of Naarah, one of the two wives of Ashur, the "father of Tekoa" (1 Ch. iv. 6), in the genealogy of Judah.

3. (B. 'Oφap.) The Mecherathite, one of the heroes of David's guard, according to the list of 1 Ch. xi. 36. In the catalogue of 2 Samuel this name does not exist (see xxiii. 34).

HEPHER (חֶפְרָה; 'Opher; Opher), a place in ancient Canaan, which, though not mentioned in the history of the conquest, occurs in the list of conquered kings (Josh. xii. 17). It was on the west of Jordan (cp. v. 7). So was also the "land of Hepher" (חֶפְרָה, terra Ephera), which is named with Socoh as one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 10). To judge from this catalogue it lay towards the south of Central Palestine, at any rate below Dor: so that there cannot be any connexion between it and GATH-HEPHER, which was in Zebulun near Sepphoris. [G.] [W.]

HEPHERITES, THE (חֶפְרָתִים, i. e. "the Hopherite"; AF. δ'Οφερη, B. δ'Οφερη; familia Hopheritarum), the family of Hepher the son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 32; LXX. v. 36).

HEPH'ZI-BAH (חֶפְזִיבָּה; θέλημα ἐμόν; voluntas mea in ea). 1. A name signifying "My delight in her," and actually the name of a queen (see No. 2), which is to be borne by the restored Jerusalem (Is. lxii. 4. Cp. Delitzsch⁴ and Dillmann⁵ in loco). The succeeding sentence contains a play on the word—"for Jehovah delighteth (חֶפְזָה, chāphēs) in thee."

2. (B. 'Οφειβά, B^{ab}. 'A—, A. 'Οφσιβά; Joseph. 'Αχιβά; Haphsiba.) The name of the queen of king Hezekiah, and the mother of Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 1). In the parallel account (2 Ch. xxxiii. 1) her name is omitted. No clue is given as to the character of this queen. But if she was an adherent of Jehovah—and this the wife of Hezekiah could not fail to be—it is not impossible that the words of Is. lxiii. 4 may contain a complimentary allusion to her.

HERALD (הֵרָאֵל). The only notice of this officer in the O. T. occurs in Dan. iii. 4; the term there used being connected etymologically with the Greek κηρύσσω (on the Greek words in Daniel, see s. n., p. 710) and with our "cry." There is an evident allusion to the office of the herald in the expressions κηρύσσω, κήρυξ, and κήρυγμα, which are frequent in the N. T., and which are but inadequately rendered by "preach," &c. The term "herald" might be substituted in 1 Tim. i. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 5. [W. L. B.]

HERCULES (Ἡρακλῆς), the name commonly applied by the Western nations to the tutelary deity of Tyre, whose national title was Melkart (מלְכָרְת, i. e. מלך קרת, the king of the city = πολιάρχος, Μεδικαρός, Phil. Bybl. ap. Euseb. Præp. Ev. i. 10). The identification was based upon a similarity of the legends and attributes referred to the two deities, but Herodotus (ii. 44) recognised their distinctness, and dwells on the extreme antiquity of the Tyrian rite (Herod. i. c.: cp. Strabo, xvi. 757; Arr. Alex. ii. 16; Joseph. Ant. viii. 5, § 3; c. Apion. i. 18). The worship of Melkart was spread throughout the Tyrian colonies, and was especially established at Carthage (cp. Hamilcar), where it was celebrated with human sacrifices (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4 [5]; cp. Jer. xix. 5). Mention is made of public embassies sent from the colonies to the mother state to honour the national god (Arr. Alex. ii. 24; Q. Curt. iv. 2; Polyb. xxxi. 20), and this fact places in a clearer light the offence of Jason in sending envoys (θεσφούς) to his festival (2 Macc. iv. 19 sq.).

There can be little doubt but that Melkart is the proper name of the Baal—the Lord (הַבַּעַל)—whose worship was introduced from Tyre by Jezebel, Ahab's queen (1 K. xvi. 31; cp. 2 K. xii. 18), after the earlier Canaanitish idolatry had been put down (1 Sam. vii. 4; cp. 1 K. xi. 5-8). Melkart (Hercules) and Astarte appear in the same close relation (Joseph. Ant. i. c.) as Baal and Astarte. See Baudissin in Herzog, RE. s. n. Baal; Balthgen, Beitr. z. Semit. Religionsgeschichte, pp. 20 sq., 234. [B. F. W.] [F.]

HERD, HERDSMAN. The herd was greatly regarded both in the patriarchal and Mosaic periods. Its multiplying was considered as a blessing, and its decrease as a curse (Gen. xiii. 2; Deut. vii. 14, xviii. 4; Ps. cvii. 38, cxliv. 14; Jer. li. 23). The ox was the most precious stock next to horse and mule, and (since those were rare) the thing of greatest value which was commonly possessed (1 K. xviii. 5). Hence we see the force of Saul's threat (1 Sam. xi. 7). The herd yielded the most esteemed sacrifice (Num. vii. 3; Ps. lxxix. 31; Is. lxvi. 3); also flesh-meat and milk, chiefly converted, probably, into butter and cheese (Deut. xxxii. 14; 2 Sam. xvii. 29), which such milk yields more copiously than that of small cattle* (Arist. Hist. Anim. iii. 20). The full-grown ox is hardly ever slaughtered in Syria; but, both for sacrificial and convivial purposes, the young animal was preferred (Ex. xxix. 1)—perhaps three years might be the age up to which it was so regarded (Gen. xv. 9)—and is spoken of as a special dainty (Gen. xviii. 8; Amos vi. 4; Luke xv. 23). The case of Gideon's sacrifice was one of exigency (Judg. vi. 25) and exceptional; and that of the people (1 Sam. xiv. 32) was an act of wanton excess. The agricultural and general usefulness of the ox, in ploughing, threshing [AGRICULTURE], and as a beast of burden (1 Ch. xiii. 40; Is. xlvi. 1), made such a slaughtering seem wasteful; nor, owing to difficulties of grazing, fattening, &c., is beef the product of an Eastern climate. The animal was broken to service probably in his third year (Is. xv. 5^b; Jer. xlvi. 34; cp. Plin. N. H. viii. 70, ed. Par.). In the moist season, when grass abounded in the waste lands, especially in the "south" region, herds grazed there; e.g. in Carmel on the W. side of the Dead Sea (1 Sam. xxv. 2; 2 Ch. xxvi. 10). Dothan also, Mishor, and Sharon (Gen. xxxvii. 17; cp. Robinson, iii. 122; Stanley, S. & P. pp. 247, 260, 484-5; 1 Ch. xxvii. 29; Is. lxxv. 10) were favourite pastures. For such purposes Uzziah built towers in the wilderness (2 Ch. xxvi. 10). Not only grass,* but foliage, is acceptable to the ox, and the hills and woods of Bashan and Gilead afforded both abundantly; on such upland (Ps. l. 10, lxx. 12) pastures cattle might graze, as also, of course, by river-sides, when driven by the heat from the regions of the "wilderness." Especially was the Eastern tableland (Ezek. xxxix. 18; Num. xxxii. 4) "a place for cattle," and the pastoral tribes of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, who settled there, retained something of the nomadic character and handed down some image of the patriarchal life (Stanley, S. & P. pp. 324-5). Herdsmen, &c., in Egypt were a low, perhaps the lowest, caste; hence as Joseph's kindred, through his position, were brought into contact with the highest castes, they are described as "an abomination;" but of the abundance of cattle in Egypt, and of the care there bestowed on them, there is no doubt (Gen. xlvii. 6, 17; Ex. ix. 4, 20). Brands were used to distinguish the owner's herds (Wilkinson, i. 217, 218 [1878]). So the plague of hail was sent to smite especially the cattle (Ps. lxxviii. 48), which also suffered severely in the murrain and shared the boil, and the firstborn of which also were smitten applied by the Bedouins to their goats' milk cheese.

8, Is. vii. 15, 2 Sam. xvii. 29, Job xx. 17, Judg. v. 25, Prov. xxx. 33, is properly rendered "butter" (which Gesenius, s. v., is mistaken in declaring to be "hardly known to the Orientals, except as a medicine"); and in Prov. i. c. the process itself is referred to. The word חֶמְאָה, Job x. 10, is the same as the Arab. حَمْد.

^b In R. V. here and at Jer. i. c. note that this expression—"a heifer of three years"—is made a proper name—needlessly; but, if so taken, the name has none the less its meaning, and that meaning supports the above view.

* In Num. xxii. 4, the word יֵרֶק, in A. V. "grass," really "verdure," includes all vegetation: cp. Ex. x. 15; Is. xxvii. 10; Cato, de R. R. c. 30; Varro, de R. R. i. 15 and ii. 6. יֵרֶק, Job viii. 12, xl. 15, seems used in a signification equally wide.

* These were common, and are frequently alluded to. The expression שְׁפֹת־בָּקָר, 2 Sam. xvii. 29, means

(Ex. xii. 29; Ps. cxxxv. 8, cxix. 3-9). The Israelites departing stipulated for (Ex. x. 26) and took "much cattle" with them (xii. 38; Num. xi. 22). [WILDERNESS OF WANDERING.]

Cattle formed thus one of the traditions of the Israelitish nation in its greatest period, and became almost a part of that greatness. They are the subject of providential care and legislative ordinance (Ex. xx. 10, 17, xxi. 28 sq.,^d xxxiv. 19; Lev. xix. 19, xxv. 7; Deut. xi. 15, xxii. 1, 4, 10, xxv. 4; Ps. civ. 14; Is. xxx. 23, 24; Jon. iv. 11), and even the Levites, though not holding land, were allowed cattle (Num. xxxv. 2, 3). When pasture failed, a mixture of various grains (called, Job vi. 5, לֶחֶם, rendered "fodder" in the A. V. and R. V., and, Is. xxx. 24, "provender;"* cp. the Roman farrago and ocymum, Plin. xviii. 10 and 42) was used, as also לֶחֶם, "chopped straw" (Gen. xxiv. 25; Is. xi. 7, lv.

bestowed their cattle "in cities" when they passed the Jordan to share the toils of conquest (Deut. iii. 19), i.e. probably in some pastures closely adjoining, like the "suburbs" appointed for the cattle of the Levites (Num. xxxv. 2, 3; Josh. xxi. 2). Cattle were ordinarily allowed as a prey in war to the captor (Deut. xx. 14; Josh. viii. 2), and the case of Amalek is exceptional, probably to mark the extreme curse to which that people was devoted (Ex. xvii. 14; 1 Sam. xv. 3). The occupation of herdsman was honourable in early times. Saul himself resumed it in the interval of his cares as king; also Doeg was certainly high in his confidence. Pharaoh made some of Joseph's brethren "rulers over his cattle." David's herd-masters were among his chief officers of state (Gen. xlvii. 6; 1 Sam. xi. 5, xxi. 7; 1 Ch. xxvii. 29, xxviii. 1). Cattle-keeping must have greatly suffered from the inroads of the enemies to which the country under the later kings of Judah and Israel was exposed. Uzziah, however (2 Ch. xxvi. 10), and Hezekiah (xxxii. 28, 29), resuming command of the open country, revived it. Josiah also seems to have been rich in herds (xxxv. 7-9). The prophet Amos at first followed this occupation (Amos i. 1, vii. 14). A goad was used (Judg. iii. 31; 1 Sam. xiii. 21, מַלְמֹד בְּרֶגֶל), being, as mostly, a staff armed with a spike. For the word Herd as applied to camels, asses, and swine, see CAMEL, ASS, SWINE (these, however, were all "unclean" by law, whereas the ox, &c. were not so); and on the general subject, Ugolini, xxix., de R. R. vet. Hebr. c. ii., which will be found nearly exhaustive of it. [H. H.]

HERES, MOUNT. One of the places in the territory of Dan, which, like Aijalon and Shaalbm, was occupied by the Amorites, and tributary to Ephraim (Judg. i. 34, 35). It was probably in the district Beni Hārith, N.E. of Yalo, Aijalon, which appears to retain a trace of the name. Seven miles E. of Jimzo, Gimzo, there is a village called Khurbetha im Hārith, which may be connected with it. Riehm (s. v.) suggests that instead of "in Mount Heres" we should read "in Har Heres," and that this town may perhaps be Ir-Shemesh or Beth-shemesh. [W.]

^d Rabbis differ on the question whether the owner of the animal was under this enactment liable or not liable. See de R. R. Veterum Hebraeorum, c. ii.; Ugolini, xxix.

* The word seems to be derived from לָלַח, to mix; used Judg. xix. 21 for "to give fodder" to an animal. The passage in Isaiah probably means that in the abundant yield of the crops the cattle should eat of the best, such as was usually consumed by man.

^f With this is often found, as if a complementary or inclusive term, לֶחֶם, A. V. and R. V. "provender," which also occurs alone, Gen. xlii. 27, xliii. 24.

HER'ES (Is. xix. 18). [IR-HA-HERES.]

HERESH (Ἡρῆς) = artificer; B. Παρῆλα, A. Ἀπίς; carpentarius, a Levite; or one of the staff attached to the Tabernacle (1 Ch. ix. 15).

HERMAS (Ἑρμῆς, from Ἑρμῆς, the "Greek god of gain," or Mercury), the name of a person to whom St. Paul sends greeting in his Epistle to the Romans (xvi. 14), and consequently then resident in Rome, and a Christian: and yet the origin of the name, like that of the other four mentioned in the same verse, is Greek. However, in those days, even a Jew, like St. Paul himself, might acquire Roman citizenship. Irenaeus, Tertullian, and Origen agree in attributing to him the work called the Shepherd: which, from the name of Clement occurring in it, is supposed to have been written in the pontificate of Clement I., or quite early in the second century; while others affirm it to have been the work of a namesake in the following age, and brother to Pius I. (or about the middle of the second century); others, again, have argued against its genuineness (Cave, Hist. Lit. s. v.; Bull, Defens. Fid. Nic. i. 2, 3-6; Dindorf, Praef. ad Hermac. Past. See Dict. of Christ. Biography, s. n.; Salmon, Introd. to the N. T. p. 579 sq.; Zahn, Der Hist. d. Hermas [1868]; and for text, &c., Gebhardt and Harnack's Patres Apostolici [1877]. Consult also C. Taylor, The Witness of Hermas to the Four Gospels [1892]). From internal evidence, its author, whoever he was, appears to have been a married man and father of a family: a deep mystic, but without ecclesiastical rank. Further, the work in question is supposed to have been originally written in Greek—in which language it is frequently cited by the Greek Fathers—though it now only exists entire in a Latin Version. It was never received into the Canon; but yet was generally cited with respect, only second to that which was paid to the authoritative Books of the N. T., and was held to be in some sense inspired (Caillau's Patres, tom. i. p. 17). It may be styled the Pilgrim's Progress of ante-Nicene times; and is divided into three parts: the first containing four visions, the second twelve moral and spiritual precepts, and the third ten similitudes, each intended to shadow forth some verity (Caillau, ibid.). Every man, according to this writer, is attended by a good and bad angel, who are continually endeavouring to affect his course through life; a doctrine which forcibly recalls the fable of Prodicus respecting the choice of Hercules (Xenoph. Mem. ii. 1).

The Hermas of the Epistle to the Romans is celebrated as a saint in the Roman calendar on May 9 (Butler's Lives of the Saints, May 9).

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς), the name of a man mentioned in the same Epistle with the preceding (Rom. xvi. 14). "According to the Greeks," says Calmet (Dict. s. v.), "he was one of the Seventy disciples, and afterwards Bishop of Dalmatia." His festival occurs in their calendar upon April 8 (Neale, Eastern Church, ii. 774). [E. S. Ff.]

HERMOGENES (Ἑρμογένης), a person mentioned by St. Paul in 2 Tim. i. 15 (see Alford's Proleg. c. vii. § 35), when "all in Asia" (i.e. those whom he had left there) "had turned away from him," and among their number "Phygellus and Hermogenes." It does not appear whether they had merely forsaken his cause, now that he was in bonds, through fear, like those of whom St. Cyprian treats in his celebrated work De Lapsis; or whether, like Hymenaeus and Philetus (2 Tim. ii. 18), they had embraced false doctrine. It is just possible that there may be a contrast intended between these two sets of deserters. According to the legendary history, bearing the name of Abdias (Fabricii Cod. Apocryph. N. T. p. 517), Hermogenes had been a magician, and was, with Philetus, converted by St. James the Great, who destroyed the charm of his spells. Neither the Hermogenes who suffered in the reign of Domitian (Hoffman, Lex. Univ. s. v.; Alford on 2 Tim. i. 15), nor the Hermogenes against whom Tertullian wrote—still less the martyrs of the Greek calendar (Neale, Eastern Church, ii. p. 770, Jan. 24, and p. 781, Sept. 1)—are to be confounded with the person now under notice, of whom nothing more is known. [E. S. Ff.]

HERMON (Ἱέρμων; Ἀερμῶν), a remarkable mountain, forming the north boundary of the land of Israel. Gesenius compares the word with the Arabic ^سخ^رم, which means a "prominent peak of a mountain." In the first passage in which the mountain is mentioned, a geographical note in Deuteronomy (iii. 9), we are informed that the Sidonians called it Sirion (Ἱέρμων) and that the Amorites called it Shenir (Ἱέρμων), both of which names have been rendered "breastplate." The first Gesenius compares with the name ^θω^ρα^τς, "breastplate," for a mountain in Magnesia (cp. 1 Sam. xvii. 5, 38); the second he compares with the Arabic ^سن^ور,

"a coat of mail." It may be legitimate to doubt if the Canaanite names are of necessity Semitic words. In Mongol speech Sir means "snow," and Sirion might mean "snowy," the modern name of Hermon being "the snowy top." It appears that the name Shenir still survived as Sinir (سنيير) in the 14th century A.D.; for according to Abu-el-feda it then applied to a mountain ridge north of Damascus (p. 164, ed. Köhler, as quoted by Gesenius, Lex.). Another name of Hermon was Sion (Ἱέρμων), as noted in Deuteronomy (iv. 48), meaning "elevated."—a word having no connexion with Zion, though seeming in the English form to be the same. It would appear that Hermon is included in the land of Israel in the Book of Joshua, for the limit is placed (xi. 17, xii. 1, xiii. 5) at "Baal-gad, in the valley of Lebanon under Mount Hermon;" this definition of the situation of Baal-gad does not agree with the position of that town at Baniās, as proposed by Robinson, since the latter is not in the valley of Lebanon, but in the valley of Jordan. Baal-gad is evidently to be sought on the north slopes of Hermon, and the name probably survives at the spring and plain called Jaldidah (جديدة), on the road from Damascus to Beirut, and at the foot of the northern spurs of Hermon, at the south end of the valley between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon.

From this point northwards the country belonged to the Phœnician Gibleitis and to the Hivites. In later passages Hermon is called Baal-hermon (Judg. iii. 3; cp. 1 Ch. v. 23), and in the second of these notices a distinction is apparently made between Baal-hermon, Shenir, and Hermon. As, however, the Hebrew participle often means "even" instead of "and," we may perhaps read "Baal-hermon, even Shenir, even Hermon." The term Baal is sometimes applied to mountains, as in the case of Baal-hazor, a very prominent summit, and in these cases perhaps means "the top" or "chief," unless indeed it refer to the sacred character of the mountains. From two passages in the Psalms (xlii. 6, lxxxix. 12) we may suppose that Hermon was a place of worship of Jehovah, like Carmel, Gerizim, and other high places. The Psalmist speaks of "remembering" Jehovah on the mountains of "the Hermonites" or "Hermons" (הַרְמוֹנִים); and the Hebrew verb "to remember" means radically to "make a memorial" or "monument." In the second passage we read that "Tabor and Hermon" are to rejoice in the name of Jehovah, which may also signify that they were considered sacred places. There is at least no doubt that, in Jeroboam's time, one of the two chief sanctuaries of Israel was at Dan at the foot of Hermon, and that the mountain was a sacred place in later Roman times, and is still to some extent considered sacred by the Druzes.

Another curious passage in the Psalms (cxxxiii. 3) speaks of the "dew of Hermon" as falling on the hill of Zion (צִיּוֹן), and it is apparent that Jerusalem is here intended from the termination of the verse. There was a Zion (Sahyán) in the Lebanon, but neither this nor the Zion at Jerusalem has any connexion with the name Zion, which applied to Hermon itself. Hermon is remarkable for the mists which cover its summit, and the passage may simply mean that the clouds came from Hermon to Jerusalem; but the distance between the two sites has given rise to curious speculations among Rabbinical writers. In the Song of Solomon (iv. 8) Shenir and Hermon are again distinguished, unless we read "Shenir, even Hermon." In Ezekiel Senir is noted for its fir-trees (xxvii. 5), and in Ecclesiasticus (xxiv. 13) for its cypresses. If we follow the description of Abu-el-feda, which makes Senir to have been a ridge north of Damascus, this must be distinguished from Hermon, which is an outlier of the Anti-Lebanon, and Shenir would be the name of the Anti-Lebanon ridge; but the pine grows on Hermon itself, whereas the main ridge of the north is very barren, and the geological formation renders it probable that it never had many trees upon it. The name of Shenir had perhaps a wider application than that of Hermon, but, as above stated, Shenir was the Hivite name of Hermon, according to the Book of Deuteronomy.

In the Talmudic writings (see Neubauer, Geog. Tal., pp. 10, 39) Hermon is called "the Snowy Mountain" (סֹרֵר הַלְּבָנוֹת); and this is one of its modern names, جبل الثلج, Jebel eth Theij, "Mountain of Snow;" but the old name is still known to some of the natives of the Lebanon. It is also called Jebel esh Shaikh, جبل الشيخ, which means "Mountain of the Chief;" this name being of Druze origin, and arising from the fact that it has always been the centre of the Druze religion from the 10th century A.D., and the place where their Sheikh or "Chief" had his abode. The common explanation, "chief of mountains" or "chief mountain," is grammatically incorrect.

The exact position and height of Mount Hermon were determined both trigonometrically and astronomically, and by observations of the mercurial barometer, by Sergt. Black, R.E., in 1873, by true bearing from Carmel, and by the triangulation of the PEF. Survey. The height is 9,200 feet above the Mediterranean, and the mountain thus rises more than 5,000 feet above the highest tops of Upper Galilee. It is consequently a very conspicuous object in all views in the north of Palestine. It is seen in the Jordan valley from near Jericho, and is also visible from Tell Asdr in the confines of Benjamin. It is not necessary therefore that Hebrew writers, who introduce Hermon into their pictures of scenery, should have written in the north of the country, though it is clear that the Song of Songs refers to Hermon, with Lebanon and Amanus, as a summer resort.

The lower part of the mountain consists of Nubian sandstone, which appears also in the Lebanon. This is found high up on the western pass which leads by Rashaiya to Damascus. The upper part is a very rugged and barren dome of hard grey fossiliferous dolomitic limestone, such as underlies the chalk in Palestine. The action of snow and frost has formed a sort of shingle, which covers the higher slopes between the rocks and pinnacles of the mountain side. The snow covers the whole of the summit in winter, and feeds the Jordan and the Abana in spring; but in autumn it sometimes quite disappears, and in 1873 the whole mountain was free from any snow. The Syrian bears, who live on the summit and descend to eat grapes in the vineyards on the slopes, have been seen by some travellers rolling in the snow in the early summer. The panther is also mentioned in Canticles as dwelling in caves on Hermon. The vineyards on the north and west slopes still produce wine which is considered excellent, and the wine of Helbon (Helbán, north of Damascus) is noticed by Ezekiel (xxvii. 18). Hermon is daily covered with clouds in summer, and the mists are excellent for vine culture. In this connexion it is interesting to notice that the "high mountain" was apparently, according to the First Gospel, somewhere near Caesarea Philippi (Matt. xvi. 18), and that the Transfiguration would thus seem to be localised on some part of Hermon. The very sudden formation of cloud on the mountain (and on the Lebanon also) thus perhaps illustrates the words "a cloud overshadowed them." The Gospel of the Hebrews, indeed, identified Tabor as the mountain in question, and this tradition has been followed ever since by Oriental Christians; but it is hardly reconcilable with the notice of Caesarea Philippi (Banids) as above mentioned, which lies at the foot of Hermon. The mountain is still a place of retreat for the Druze recluses, who inhabit a cave-dwelling on the upper part of the slope towards the west.

The view from the summit is very remarkable, extending over the gardens of Damascus to the deserts near the Euphrates on the east, and on the north-west across the Lebanon to the sea. On the south, Palestine as far as Mount Tabor is spread out like a map; the lakes of Merom and Galilee, the ridges of Upper Galilee, and the coasts near Tyre, Accho, and the Carmel bay, being well seen. At sunrise the shadow of the great dome is projected far west to the Mediterranean, and at sunset (which occurs long after the whole of Palestine is in dusky shadow) it stretches over the eastern desert, and stands up against the haze. The appearance of the Jaulán craters, as seen from this point some 7,000 feet above them, is very remarkable, and the plains of Bashan are visible throughout, with the northern part of Gilead. For a detailed description of this very magnificent view see,

Tent Work in Palestine (chap. viii.). On the slopes of the mountain, in 1873, wild rose, hawthorn, oak, and honeysuckle were observed, and the fauna and flora alike present a very remarkable contrast to those of the semi-tropical Jordan valley, close at the foot of the mountain. On the south, at about 1,000 feet above the sea, the main stream of the Jordan bursts suddenly from its cavern, and pours the snow waters from the mountain in foaming cascades past the walls of Caesarea Philippi. The oak and poplar are here the main features of tree scenery, while higher up is found the Aleppo pine, where the picturesque glens of the sandstone formation are strewn in places with basaltic boulders.

The mountain was covered in the 2nd century A.D. with small Roman temples, facing the rising sun. The more important of these have been carefully planned by Sir C. Warren. At Rukhleh on the north a church was built, in a later century, out of the fragments of one of these temples, and a large medallion represents the face of the sun-god; but this is not older than Roman times, and the Roman eagle formed part of the adornment of this shrine, which, as we learn from a Greek text on the spot, found in 1873, had doors plated with silver.

The top of the mountain consists of a small plateau with three limestone crags. The highest, to the east, was surrounded in Roman times with a circular wall of wrought stones, and it would seem as if an altar had been placed on the crag; while close by on the plateau is a curious underground chamber, hewn in rock, perhaps at one time a Mithraeum, for the sun-god Mithra, whom the Romans worshipped as well as the Persians, was adored by mysteries in such vaults. The whole system of worship in the Hermon temples seems to have been connected with the remarkable views of the rising sun obtained from the summit. The shrine was still venerated in the 4th century of our era; for Jerome, though he had apparently never ascended Hermon, says, "diciturque esse in vertice ejus insigne templum, quod ab ethnicis cultui habetur, e regione Paneedis et Libani" (*s. v. Aermon, OS.*² p. 126, 19). The same is also stated by Hilarius (on Psalm cxxiii.), as quoted by Reland, Pal. i. 323), the mountain itself being sacred according to his view. An early tradition made it the place where the sons of God came down to visit the daughters of men. That the region was sacred much earlier is evident from the history of Jeroboam, as already noticed; and the curious dolmen tables found in 1882, at Baniás, may perhaps indicate a prehistoric sanctuary at the foot of the mountain.

On the death of Hakem, the Druze chiefs sought refuge in the Hermon valleys, and the mountain is still hallowed by the memory of the teachings here first proclaimed to them. They have numerous Khalwehs or chapels on its slopes, outside the thriving mountain villages, of which the largest and most important is Rashaiya on the north-west, about 4,000 feet above the sea—the seat of government of the district. It was on Hermon in 1860 that the French discovered the Sacred Books of the Druzes, which contain a complete account of the Moslem heresies which form their religion, the highest initiation in which is a complete scepticism.

Mediæval travellers as a rule when describing

Hermon do not allude to the real mountain, but to the conical hill of Nety Druhy, just south of Tabor, which, for some unknown reason, was pointed out to pilgrims as the true Hermon—a view quite irreconcilable with the O.T. accounts of its position. Good descriptions of Hermon will be found in Robinson's Later Biblical Researches, and in the PEF. Mem. (volume of Special Papers and Jerusalem volume, Appendix, with Sir C. Warren's plans of the Temples). The present writer visited all the principal points of interest in 1873 and 1882. [C. R. C.]

HEROD (Ἡρώδης, i.e. Herodes). THE HERODIAN FAMILY. The history of the Herodian family presents one side of the last development of the Jewish nation. The evils which had existed in the hierarchy which grew up after the Return, found an unexpected embodiment in the tyranny of a foreign usurper. Religion was adopted as a policy; and the hellenizing designs of Antiochus Epiphanes were carried out, at least in their spirit, by men who professed to observe the Law. Side by side with the spiritual "kingdom of God," proclaimed by John the Baptist, and founded by the Lord, a kingdom of the world was established, which in its external splendour recalled the traditional magnificence of Solomon. The simultaneous realization of the two principles, national and spiritual, which had long variously influenced the Jews, in the establishment of a dynasty and a church, is a fact pregnant with instruction. In the fulness of time a descendant of Esau established a false counterpart of the promised glories of Messiah.

Various accounts are given of the ancestry of the Herods; but neglecting the exaggerated statements of friends and enemies,* it seems certain that they were of Idumean descent (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 1, § 3), a fact which is indicated by the forms of some of the names which were retained in the family (Ewald, Geschichte, iv. 477, note). But though aliens by race, the Herods were Jews in faith. The Idumeans had been conquered and brought over to Judaism by John Hyrcanus (B.C. 130, Joseph. Ant. xiii. 9, § 1); and from the time of their conversion they remained constant to their new religion, looking upon Jerusalem as their mother city and claiming for themselves the name of Jews (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7, § 7; B. J. i. 10, § 4, iv. 4, § 4).

* The Jewish partisans of Herod (Nicolas Damascenus, ap. Joseph. Ant. xiv. 1, § 3) sought to raise him to the dignity of a descent from one of the noble families which returned from Babylon; and, on the other hand, early Christian writers represented his origin as utterly mean and servile. Africanus has preserved a tradition (Routh, Rel. Sacr. ii. 235), on the authority of "the natural kinsmen of the Saviour," which makes Antipater, the father of Herod, the son of one Herod, a slave attached to the service of a temple of Apollo at Ascalon, who was taken prisoner by Idumean robbers, and kept by them as his father could not pay his ransom. The locality (cp. Philo, Leg. ad Caium, § 30) no less than the office was calculated to fix a heavy reproach upon the name (cp. Routh, ad loc.). This story is repeated with great inaccuracy by Euphianus (Haer. xx.).

The general policy of the whole Herodian family, though modified by the personal characteristics of the successive rulers, was the same. It centred in the endeavour to found a great and independent kingdom, in which the power of Judaism should subserve the consolidation of a state. The protection of Rome was in the first instance a necessity, but the designs of Herod I. and Agrippa I. point to an independent Eastern empire as their end, and not to a mere subject monarchy. Such a consummation of the Jewish hopes seems to have found some measure of acceptance at first [HERODIANS]; and by a natural reaction the temporal dominion of the Herods opened the way to the destruction of the Jewish nationality. The religion which was degraded into the instrument of unscrupulous ambition lost its power to quicken a united people. The high-priests were appointed and deposed by Herod I. and his successors with such a reckless disregard for the character of their office (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenthums, pp. 322, 325, 421), that the office itself was deprived of its sacred dignity (cp. Acts xxiii. 2 sq.; Jost, p. 430, &c.). The nation was divided, and amidst the conflict of sects a universal faith arose, which more than fulfilled the nobler hopes that found no satisfaction in the treacherous grandeur of a court.

The family relations of the Herods are singularly complicated from the frequent recurrence of the same names, and the several accounts of Josephus are not consistent in every detail. The following table, however, seems to offer a satisfactory summary of his statements. The members of the Herodian family who are mentioned in the N. T. are distinguished by capitals (see p. 1342).

Josephus is the one great authority for the history of the Herodian family. The scanty notices which occur in Hebrew and classic writers throw very little additional light upon the events which he narrates. Ewald has treated the whole subject with the widest and clearest view. Jost in his several works has added to the records of Josephus gleanings from later Jewish writers. Where the original sources are so accessible, monographs are of little use. [Some are quoted by Winer in his RWB., and a complete list of authorities and histories dealing with the period is given by Schürer, Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi, Index s. n. Consult also Riehm, HWB. s. n.; Herzog, RE. s. n.; Milman, Hist. of the Jews. ii. 52 sq.; Stanley, Lectures on the Jewish Church [1883], Lecture I.; Edersheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, Index s. n.—F.]

I. HEROD THE GREAT (Ἡρώδης) was the second son of Antipater, who was appointed procurator of Judaea by Julius Caesar, B.C. 47, and Cypros, an Arabian of noble descent (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 7, § 3). At the time of his father's elevation, though only fifteen years old, he received the government of Galilee (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 9, § 2), and shortly afterwards that of Coele-Syria. When Antony came to Syria, B.C. 41, he appointed Herod and his elder brother Phasael tetrarchs of Judaea (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 13, § 1). Herod was forced to abandon Judaea next year by an invasion of the Parthians, who supported the claims of Antigonus, the representative of the Hasmonæan dynasty, and fled to Rome (B.C. 40). At Rome he was well received by Antony and Octavian, and was appointed by the senate king of Judaea to the exclusion of the Hasmonæan line (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 14, § 4; App. Bell. C. 39). In the course of a few years, by the help of the Romans, he took Jerusalem (B.C. 37), and completely established his authority throughout his dominions. An expedition which he was forced to make against Arabia saved him from taking an active part in the civil war, though he was devoted to the cause of Antony. After the battle of Actium he visited Octavian at Rhodes, and his noble bearing won for him the favour of the conqueror, who confirmed him in the possession of the kingdom, B.C. 31, and in the next year increased it by the addition of several important cities (Joseph. Ant. xv. 10, § 1 sq.), and afterwards gave him the province of Trachonitis and the district of Paneas (Joseph. Ant. l. c.). The remainder of the reign of Herod was undisturbed by external troubles, but his domestic life was embittered by an almost uninterrupted series of injuries and cruel acts of vengeance. Hyrcanus, the grandfather of his wife Mariamne, was put to death shortly before his visit to Augustus. Mariamne herself, to whom he was passionately devoted, was next sacrificed to his jealousy. One execution followed another, till at last in B.C. 6 he was persuaded to put to death the two sons of Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus, in whom the chief hope of the people lay. Two years afterwards he condemned to death Antipater, his eldest son, who had been their most active accuser, and the order for his execution was among the last acts of Herod's life, for he himself died five days after the death of his son, B.C. 4, in the same year which marks the true date of the Nativity. [JESUS CHRIST.]

These terrible acts of bloodshed which Herod perpetrated in his own family were accompanied by others among his subjects equally terrible, from the numbers who fell victims to them. The infirmities of his later years exasperated him to yet greater cruelty; and, according to the well-known story, he ordered the nobles whom he had called to him in his last moments to be executed immediately after his decease, that so at least his death might be attended by universal mourning (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 7, § 5). It was at the time of this fatal illness that he must have caused the slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 16-18); and from the comparative insignificance of the murder of a few young children in an unimportant village when contrasted with the deeds which he carried out or designed, it is not surprising that Josephus has passed it over in silence. The number of children in Bethlehem and "all the borders thereof" (ἐν πᾶσιν τοῖς ὄρισις) may be estimated at about ten or twelve;^b and the language of the Evangelist leaves in complete uncertainty the method in which the deed was effected (ἀποστρέλας ἀνείλας). The scene of open and undisguised violence which has been consecrated by Christian art is wholly at variance with what may be supposed to have been the historic reality. At a later time the murder of the children seems to have been connected with the death of Antipater. Thus, according to the anecdote preserved by Macrobius (c. A. D. 410), "Augustus, cum audisset inter pueros quos in Syria Herodes, Rex Judæorum, intra bimatum (Matt. ii. 16; ib. Vulg. a bimatu et infra) jussit interfici, filium quoque ejus occisum, ait: Melius est Herodis porcum esse quam filium" (Macrob. Sat. ii. 4). But Josephus has preserved two very remarkable references to a massacre which Herod caused to be made shortly before his death, which may throw an additional light upon the history. In this it is said that Herod did not spare "those who seemed most dear to him" (Ant. xvi. 11, § 7), but "slew all those of his own family who sided with the Pharisees" (ὁ φαρισαῖος) in refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the Roman emperor, while they looked forward to a change in the royal line (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 2, § 6; cp. Lardner, Credibility, &c., i. pp. 278 sq., 332 sq., 349 sq.). How far this event may have been directly connected with the murder at Bethlehem it is impossible to say, from the obscurity of the details, but its occasion and character throw a great light upon St. Matthew's narrative.

In dealing with the religious feelings or prejudices of the Jews, Herod showed as great contempt for public opinion as in the execution of his personal vengeance. He signalled his elevation to the throne by offerings to the Capitoline Jupiter (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenthums, p. 318), and surrounded his person by foreign mercenaries, some of whom had been formerly in the service of Cleopatra (Joseph. Ant. xv. 7, § 3; xvii. 1, § 1; 8, § 3). His coins and those of his successors bore only Greek legends; and he introduced heathen games within the walls of Jerusalem (Joseph. Ant. xv. 8, § 1). He displayed ostentatiously his favour towards foreigners (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 5, § 3), and oppressed the old Jewish aristocracy (Joseph. Ant. xv. 1, § 1). The later Jewish traditions describe him as successively the servant of the Hasmonæans and the Romans, and relate that one Rabbi only survived the persecution which he directed against them, purchasing his life by the loss of sight (Jost, p. 319, &c.).

While Herod alienated in this manner the affections of the Jews by his cruelty and disregard for the Law, he adorned Jerusalem with many splendid monuments of his taste and magnificence. The Temple, which he rebuilt with scrupulous care, so that it might seem to be a restoration of the old building rather than a new one (Joseph. Ant. xv. § 11), was the greatest of these works. The restoration was begun B. C. 20, and the Temple itself was completed in a year and a half (Joseph. Ant. xv. 11, § 6). The surrounding buildings occupied eight years more (Joseph. Ant. xv. 11, § 5). But fresh additions were constantly made in succeeding years, so that at the time of the Lord's visit to Jerusalem at the beginning of His ministry, it was said that the Temple was "built (ᾠκοδομήθη) in forty and six years" (John ii. 20), a phrase which expresses the whole period from the commencement of Herod's work to the completion of the latest addition then made, for the final completion of the whole building is placed by Josephus (Ant. xx. 8, § 7, ἤδη δὲ τότε καὶ τὸ ἱερὸν ἐτετέλειτο) in the time of Herod Agrippa II. (c. A. D. 50).

Yet even this splendid work was not likely to mislead the Jews as to the real spirit of the king. While he rebuilt the Temple at Jerusalem, he rebuilt also the temple at Samaria (Joseph. Ant. xv. 8, § 5), and made provision in his new city Caesarea for the celebration of heathen worship (Joseph. Ant. xv. 9, § 5); and it has been supposed (Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. p. 323) that the rebuilding of the Temple furnished him with the opportunity of destroying the authentic collection of genealogies which was of the highest importance to the priestly families. Herod, as appears from his public designs, affected the dignity of a second Solomon, but he joined the licence of that monarch to his magnificence; and it was said that the monument which he raised over the royal tombs was due to the fear which seized him after a sacrilegious attempt to rob them of secret treasures (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 7, § 1).

It is, perhaps, difficult to see in the character of Herod any of the true elements of greatness. Some have even supposed that the title—the great—is a mistranslation for the elder (ἐκπρῶτος, Jost, p. 319, note; δ μέγας, Ewald, Gesch. iv. 473, &c.); and yet on the other hand he seems to have possessed the good qualities of our own Henry VIII. with his vices. He maintained peace at home during a long reign by the vigour and timely generosity of his administration. Abroad he conciliated the goodwill of the Romans under circumstances of unusual difficulty. His ostentatious display and even his arbitrary tyranny were calculated to inspire Orientals with awe. Bold and yet prudent, oppressive and yet profuse, he had many of the characteristics which make a popular hero; and the title which may have been first given in admiration of successful despotism now serves to bring out in clearer contrast the terrible price at which the success was purchased.

II. HEROD ANTIPAS (Ἀντίπατρος, Ἀντίπας) was the son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, § 3). His father had originally destined him as his successor in the kingdom (cp. Matt. ii. 22; ARCHELAUS), but by the last change of his will appointed him "tetrarch of Galilee and Perea" (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 8, § 1, Ἡρ. ὁ τετραρχῆς, Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1. Cp. Luke iii. 1, τετραρχῶντος τῆς Γαλιλαίας Ἡρ.), which brought him a yearly revenue of two hundred talents (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 13, § 4; cp. Luke viii. 3, Χουῶ ἐπιτρόπου Ἡρ.). He first married a daughter of Aretas, "king of Arabia Petraea," but after some time (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, § 1) he made overtures of marriage to Herodias, the wife of his half-brother Herod-Philip, which she received favourably. Aretas, indignant at the insult offered to his daughter, found a pretext for invading the territory of Herod, and defeated him with great loss (Joseph. l. c.). This defeat, according to the famous passage in Josephus (Ant. xviii. 5, § 2), was attributed by many to the murder of John the Baptist, which had been committed by Antipas shortly before, under the influence of Herodias (Matt. xiv. 4 sq.; Mark vi. 17 sq.; Luke iii. 19). At a later time the ambition of Herodias proved the cause of her husband's ruin. She urged him to go to Rome to gain the title of king (cp. Mark vi. 14, ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἡρ. by courtesy), which had been granted to his nephew Agrippa; but he was opposed at the court of Caligula by the emissaries of Agrippa [HEROD AGRIPPA], and condemned to perpetual banishment at Lugdunum, A.D. 39 (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7, § 2), whence he appears to have retired afterwards to Spain (B. J. ii. 9, § 6; but see note on p. 1347). Herodias voluntarily shared his punishment, and he died in exile. [HERODIAS.]

Pilate took occasion from our Lord's residence in Galilee to send Him for examination (Luke xxiii. 6 sq.) to Herod Antipas, who came up to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover (cp. Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, § 3), and thus heal the feud which had existed between the tetrarch and himself (Luke xxiii. 12; cp. Luke xiii. 1, περὶ τῶν Γαλιλαίων, ὃν τὸ αἷμα Πίλατος ἔμυξεν μετὰ τῶν θυσιῶν αὐτῶν). The share which Antipas thus took in the Passion is specially noticed in the Acts (iv. 27) in connexion with Ps. ii. 1, 2. His character, as it appears in the Gospels, answers to the general tenor of his life. He was unscrupulous (Luke iii. 19, περὶ πάντων ὃν ἐποίησεν ποιηρῶν), tyrannical (Luke xiii. 31), and weak (Matt. xiv. 9). Yet his cruelty was marked by cunning (Luke xiii. 32, τῇ ἀλώσει ταύτη), and followed by remorse (Mark vi. 14). In contrast with Pilate he presents the type of an Eastern despot, capricious, sensual, and superstitious. This last element of superstition is both natural and clearly marked. For a time "he heard John gladly" (Mark vi. 20), and was anxious to see Jesus (Luke ix. 9, xxiii. 8), in the expectation, as it is said, of witnessing some miracle wrought by Him (Luke xiii. 31, xxiii. 8).

The city of TIBERIAS, which Antipas founded and named in honour of the emperor, was the most conspicuous monument of his long reign; but, like the rest of the Herodian family, he showed his passion for building cities in several places, restoring Sepphoris, near Tabor, which had been destroyed in the wars after the death of Herod the Great (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 12, § 9; xviii. 2, § 1), and Betharamphtha (Beth-haram) in Peraea, which he named Julius, "from the wife of the emperor" (Jos. Ant. xviii. 2, § 1; Hieron. Euseb. Chron. A.D. 29, Livius).

III. ARCHELAUS (Ἀρχέλαος) was, like Herod Antipas, the son of Herod the Great and Malthace. He was brought up with his brother at Rome (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, § 3), and in consequence of the accusations of his eldest brother Antipater, the son of Doris, he was excluded by his father's will from any share in his dominions. Afterwards, however, by a second change, the "kingdom" was left to him, which had been designed for his brother Antipas (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 8, § 1), and it was this unexpected arrangement which led to the retreat of Joseph to Galilee (Matt. ii. 22). Archelaus did not enter on his power without strong opposition and bloodshed (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 9); but Augustus confirmed the will of Herod in its essential provisions, and gave Archelaus the government of "Idumaea, Judaea, and Samaria, with the cities of Caesarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem" (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 13, § 5), which produced a revenue of 400 (Joseph. B. J. ii. 6, § 3) or 600 talents (Ant. xvii. 13, § 5). For the time he received the title of Ethnarch, with the promise of that of king, if he proved worthy of it (Joseph. l. c.). His conduct justified the fears which his character inspired. After violating the Mosaic Law by the marriage with Glaphyra, his brother's widow (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 13, § 1), he roused his subjects by his tyranny and cruelty to appeal to Rome for redress. Augustus at once summoned him to his presence, and after his cause was heard he was banished to Vienne in Gaul (A.D. 7), where probably he died (Joseph. l. c.; cp. Strab. xvi. p. 765; Dio Cass. lv. 27); though in the time of Jerome his tomb was shown near Bethlehem (OS. p. 135, 12).

IV. HEROD PHILIP I. (Φίλιππος, Mark vi. 17) was the son of Herod the Great and Mariamne the daughter of a high-priest Simon (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, § 4), and must be carefully distinguished from the tetrarch Philip. [HEROD PHILIP II.] He married Herodias, the sister of Agrippa I., by whom he had a daughter Salome. Herodias, however, left him, and made an infamous marriage with his half-brother Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 17; Luke iii. 19). He is called only Herod by Josephus, but the repetition of the name Philip is fully justified by the frequent recurrence of names in the Herodian family (e.g. Antipater). The two Philips were confounded by Jerome (ad Matt. l. c.); and the confusion was the more easy, because the son of Mariamne was excluded from all share in his father's possessions (τῆς διαθήκης ἐξήλειψεν) in consequence of his mother's treachery (Joseph. B. J. i. 30, § 7), and lived afterwards in a private station.

V. HEROD PHILIP II. (Φίλιππος) was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra (Ἱεροσαλυμίτις). Like his half-brothers * Antipas and Archelaus, he was brought up at home (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 1, § 3), and on the death of his father advocated the claims of Archelaus before Augustus (Joseph. B. J. ii. 6, § 1). He received as his own government "Batanaea, Trachonitis, Auranitis (Gaulonitis), and some parts about Jamnia" (Joseph. B. J. ii. 6, § 3), with the title of tetrarch (Luke iii. 1, Φίλιππου . . . τετραρχοῦντος τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχωνιτιδος χώρας). His rule was distinguished by justice and moderation (Joseph. Ant. xvii. 2, § 4), and he appears to have devoted himself entirely to the duties of his office without sharing in the intrigues which disgraced his family (Joseph.

* Joseph. Ant. xvii. 8, § 1. Josephus calls Philip Ἀρχελαῖος ἀδελφὸς γνήσιος; but elsewhere he states their distinct descent.

Ant. xviii. 5, § 6). He built a new city on the site of Paneas, near the sources of the Jordan, which he called Caesarea (Καίσαρεια ἡ Φιλίππου, Matt. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27), and raised Bethsaida (in Lower Gaulonitis) to the rank of a city under the title of Julius (Joseph. Ant. ii. 9, § 1; xviii. 2, § 1), and died there A.D. 34 (xviii. 5, § 6). He married Salome, the daughter of Philip (I.) and Herodias (Ant. xviii. 6, § 4), but as he left no children at his death his dominions were added to the Roman province of Syria (xviii. 5, § 6).

VI. HEROD AGRIPPA I. (Ἡρώδης, Acts; Ἀγρίππας, Joseph.) was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was brought up at Rome with Claudius and Drusus, and after a life of various vicissitudes (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7) was thrown into prison by Tiberius for an unguarded speech, where he remained till the accession of Caius (Caligula) A.D. 37. The new emperor gave him the governments formerly held by the tetrarchs Philip and Lysanias, and bestowed on him the ensigns of royalty and other marks of favour (Acts xii. 1, Ἡρ. δ βασιλεύς). The jealousy of Herod Antipas and his wife Herodias was excited by these distinctions, and they sailed to Rome in the hope of supplanting Agrippa in the Emperor's favour. Agrippa was aware of their design, and anticipated it by a counter-charge against Antipas of treasonous correspondence with the Parthians. Antipas failed to answer the accusation, and was banished to Gaul (A.D. 39), and his dominions were added to those already held by Agrippa (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7, § 2). Afterwards Agrippa rendered important services to Claudius (Joseph. B. J. ii. 11, §§ 2, 3), and received from him in return (A.D. 41) the government of Judaea and Samaria; so that his entire dominions equalled in extent the kingdom of Herod the Great. Unlike his predecessors, Agrippa was a strict observer of the Law (Joseph. Ant. xix. 7, § 3), and he sought with success the favour of the Jews.^a It is probable that it was with this view* he put to death James the son of Zebedee, and further imprisoned Peter (Acts xii. 1 sq.). But his sudden death, which followed immediately afterwards, interrupted his ambitious projects.

In the fourth year of his reign over the whole of Judaea (A.D. 44), Agrippa attended some games at Caesarea, held in honour of the Emperor. When he appeared in the theatre (Joseph. Ant. xix. 8, § 2, δευτέρα τῶν θεωριῶν ἡμέρα; Acts xii. 21, τακτή ἡμέρα) in "a robe of silver stuff" (ἔξ ἀργύρου πεποιημένην πᾶσαν, Joseph.; ἔσθητα βασιλικήν, Acts xii. 21), which shone in the morning light, his flatterers saluted him as a god; and suddenly he was seized with terrible pains, and being carried from the theatre to the palace died after five days' agony (ἐφ' ἡμέρας πέντε τῷ τῆς γαστρὸς ἀλγήματι διεργασθεὶς τὸν βίον κατέστρεψεν, Joseph. Ant. xix. 8; γενόμενος σκωληκόβρωτος ἐξέψυξεν, Acts xii. 23; cp. 2 Macc. ix. 5-9).

By a singular but now explained confusion Eusebius (H. E. ii. 10; cp. n. 7 in loco, edd. Wace and Schaff) reads for the owl, which, according to Josephus, appeared to Herod as a messenger of evil (ἄγγελος κακῶν), "the Angel" of the Acts, who was the unseen minister of the Divine Will (Acts xii. 23, ἐπάταξεν αὐτὸν ἄγγελος Κυρίου; cp. 2 K. xix. 35, LXX.).

Various conjectures have been made as to the occasion of the festival at which the event took place. Josephus (l. c.) says that it was "in behalf of the Emperor's safety," and it has been supposed that it might have been in connexion with his return from Britain; but this is at least very uncertain (cp. Wieseler, Chron. d. Apost. Zeit. p. 131 sq.). Josephus mentions also the concurrence "of the chief men throughout the province" who were present on the occasion; and though he does not notice the embassy of the Tyrians and Agrippa's speech, yet his narrative is perfectly consistent with both facts.

VII. HEROD AGRIPPA II. (Ἀγρίππας, N. T.; Joseph.) was the son of Herod Agrippa I. and Cypros, a grand-niece of Herod the Great. At the time of the death of his father in A.D. 44 he was at Rome, and his youth (he was 17 years old) prevented Claudius from carrying out his first intention of appointing him his father's successor (Joseph. Ant. xix. 9, §§ 1, 2). Not long afterwards, however, the Emperor gave him (c. A.D. 50) the kingdom of Chalcis, which had belonged to his uncle (who died A. D. 48; Joseph. Ant. xx. 4, § 2; B. J. ii. 12, § 1); and then transferred him (A.D. 52) to the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip and Lysanias (Joseph. Ant. xx. 6, § 1; B. J. ii. 12, § 8), with the title of king (Acts xxv. 13, Ἀγρίππας δ βασιλεύς, xxvi. 2, 7, &c.).

Nero afterwards increased the dominions of Agrippa by the addition of several cities (Ant. xx. 6, § 4); and he displayed the lavish magnificence which marked his family by costly buildings at Jerusalem and Berytus, in both cases doing violence to the feelings of the Jews (Ant. xx. 7, § 11; 8, § 4). The relation in which he stood to his sister Berenice (Acts xxv. 13) was the cause of grave suspicion (Joseph. Ant. xx. 6, § 3), which was noticed by Juvenal (Sat. vi. 155 sq.). In the last Roman war Agrippa took part with the Romans, and after the fall of Jerusalem retired with Berenice to Rome, where he died in the third year of Trajan (A.D. 100), being the last prince of the house of Herod (Phot. Cod. 33).

The appearance of St. Paul before Agrippa (A.D. 60) offers several characteristic traits.

^a Jost (Gesch. d. Judenthums, p. 420) quotes a legend that Agrippa burst into tears on reading in a public service Deut. xvii. 15; whereupon the people cried out, "Be not distressed, Agrippa, thou art our brother;" in virtue, that is, of his half-descent from the Hasmonaeans.

* Jost (p. 421, &c.), who objects that these acts are inconsistent with the known humanity of Agrippa, entirely neglects the reason suggested by St. Luke (Acts xli. 3).

Agrippa seems to have been intimate with Festus (Joseph. Ant. xx. 7, § 11); and it was natural that the Roman governor should avail himself of his judgment on a question of what seemed to be Jewish law (Acts xxv. 18 sq., 26; cp. Joseph. Ant. xi. 8, § 7). The "pomp" (ᾠλοῦ φαντασία) with which the king came into the audience chamber (Acts xxv. 23) was accordant with his general bearing; and the cold irony with which he met the impassioned words of the Apostle (Acts xxvi. 27, 28) suits the temper of one who was contented to take part in the destruction of his nation. HERODIANS (Ἡρωδῖανοί). In the account which is given by St. Matthew (xxii. 15 sq.) and St. Mark (xii. 13 sq.) of the last efforts made by different sections of the Jews to obtain from our Lord Himself the materials for His accusation, a party under the name of Herodians is represented as acting in concert with the Pharisees* (Matt. xxii. 16; Mark xii. 13). St. Mark mentions the combination of the two parties for a similar object at an earlier period (Mark iii. 6); and, in another place (viii. 15; cp. Luke xii. 1), he preserves a saying of our Lord, in which "the leaven of Herod" is placed in close connexion with "the leaven of the Pharisees." In the Gospel of St. Luke, on the other hand, the Herodians are not brought forward at all by name.

These very scanty notices of the Evangelists as to the position of the Herodians are not compensated by other testimonies; yet it is not difficult to fix their characteristics by a reference to the condition of Jewish feeling in the Apostolic age. There were probably many who saw in the power of the Herodian family the pledge of the preservation of their national existence in the face of Roman ambition. In proportion as they regarded the independent nationality of the Jewish people as the first condition of the fulfilment of its future destiny, they would be willing to acquiesce in the dominion of men who were themselves of foreign descent [HEROD], and not rigid in the observance of the Mosaic ritual. Two distinct classes might thus unite in supporting what was a domestic tyranny as contrasted with absolute dependence on Rome: those who saw in the Herods a protection against direct heathen rule, which was the one object of their fear (cp. Juchus, f. 19, ap. Lightfoot, Harm. Ec. p. 470, ed. Leusd.: "Herodes etiam senem Hille magno in honore habuit; namque hi homines regem illum esse non aegre ferebant"),

* Origen (Comm. in Matt. tom. xvii. § 28) regards this combination of the Herodians and Pharisees as a combination of antagonistic parties, the one favourable to the Roman government (εὐκός γὰρ ὅτι ἐν τῷ λαῷ τότε οἱ μὲν διδάσκοντες τελεῖν τὸν φόρον Καίσαρι ἐκαλοῦντο Ἡρωδῖανοὶ ὑπὸ τῶν μὴ θέλοντων τοῦτο γίνεσθαι. . .), and the other opposed to it; but this view, which is only conjectural (εὐκός), does not offer a complete solution of the various relations of the Herodians to the other parties of the times. Jerome, following Origen, limits the meaning of the term yet more: "Cum Herodianis, id est, militibus Herodis, seu quos illudentes Pharisaei, quia Romanis tributis solvebant, Herodianos vocabant et non divino cultui deditos" (Hieron. Comm. in Matt. xxii. 15).

and those who were inclined to look with satisfaction upon such a compromise between the ancient faith and heathen civilisation, as Herod the Great and his successors had endeavoured to realise, as the true and highest consummation of Jewish hopes.^b On the one side the Herodians—partisans of Herod in the widest sense of the term—were thus brought into union with the Pharisees; on the other, with the Sadducees. Yet there is no reason to suppose that they endeavoured to form any very systematic harmony of the conflicting doctrines of the two sects, but rather the conflicting doctrines themselves were thrown into the background by what appeared to be a paramount political necessity. Such coalitions have been frequent in every age; and the rarity of the allusions to the Herodians, as a marked body, seems to show that this, like similar coalitions, had no enduring influence as the foundation of party. The feelings which led to the coalition remained, but they were incapable of animating the common action of a united body for any length of time. [B. F. W.]

HERODIAS (Ἡρωδίας, a female patronymic from Ἡρώδης; on patronymics and gentile names in tas, see Matthiae, Gk. Gr. §§ 101, 103), the name of a woman of notoriety in the N. T., daughter of Aristobulus, one of the sons of Mariamme and Herod the Great, and consequently sister of Agrippa I.

She first married Herod, surnamed Philip, another of the sons of Mariamme and the first Herod (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 5, § 4; cp. B. J. i. 29, § 4), and therefore her full uncle; then she eloped from him, during his lifetime (Ant. ibid.), to marry Herod Antipas, her step-uncle, who had been long married to, and was still living with, the daughter of Aeneas or Aretas—his assumed name—king of Arabia (ib. xvii. 9, § 4). Thus she left her husband, who was still alive, to connect herself with a man whose wife was still alive. Her paramour was indeed less of a blood relation than her original husband; but being likewise the half-brother of that husband, he was already connected with her by affinity—so close that there was only one case contemplated in the Law of Moses where it could be set aside; namely, when the married brother had died childless (Lev. xviii. 16 and xx. 21. See for the exception Deut. xxv. 5 sq.). Now Herodias had already had one child—Salome

^b In this way the Herodians were said to regard Herod (Antipas) as "the Messiah": Ἡρωδῖανοὶ καὶ ἱεραῖοι τοῖς χρόνοις ἦσαν οἱ τὸν Ἡρώδη Χριστὸν εἶναι λέγοντες ὡς ἰστορεῖται (Vict. Ant. ap. Cram. Cat. in Marc. p. 400). Philastrius (Haer. xxviii.) applies the same belief to Herod Agrippa; Epiphanius (Haer. xix.) to Herod the Great. Jerome in one place (ad Matt. xxii. 15) calls the idea "a ridiculous notion of some Latin writers, which rests on no authority (quod nusquam legitimus);" and again (Dial. c. Lucifer. xxiii.) mentions it in a general summary of heretical notions without hesitation. The belief was, in fact, one of general sentiment, and not of distinct and pronounced confession.

Others prefer to see in the Herodians "a semi-Roman and semi-Nationalist party;" differing, that is, from the extreme section of the Pharisees who hated Herod, on the one hand, and from the Nationalists pure, on the other (cp. Ederheim, The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, II. 384; cp. I. 237-240).—[F.]

—by Philip (Ant. xviii. 5, § 4), and, as he was still alive, might have had more. Well, therefore, may she be charged by Josephus with the intention of confounding her country's institutions (ib. xviii. 5, § 4); and well may St. John the Baptist have remonstrated against the enormity of such a connexion with the tetrarch, whose conscience would certainly seem to have been a less hardened one (Matt. xiv. 9 says he "was sorry;" Mark vi. 20 that he "feared" St. John, and "heard him gladly").

The consequences both of the crime, and of the reproof which it incurred, are well known. Aretas made war upon Herod for the injury done to his daughter, and routed him with the loss of his whole army (Ant. xviii. 5, § 1). The head of St. John the Baptist was granted to the request of Herodias (Matt. xiv. 8-11; Mark vi. 24-28). According to Josephus, the execution took place in a fortress called Machaerus, on the frontier between the dominions of Aretas and Herod; according to Pliny (v. 15), looking down upon the Dead Sea from the south (cp. Robinson, i. 570, note). And it was to the iniquity of this act, rather than to the immorality of that illicit connexion, that the historian says, some of the Jews attributed the defeat of Herod. In the closing scene of her career, indeed, Herodias exhibited considerable magnanimity: as she preferred going with Antipas to Lugdunum,* and there sharing his exile and reverses, till death ended them, to the remaining with her brother Agrippa I., and partaking of his elevation (Ant. xviii. 7, § 2).

There are few episodes in the whole range of the N. T. more suggestive to the commentator than this one scene in the life of Herodias.

1. It exhibits one of the most remarkable of the undesigned coincidences between the N. T. and Josephus; that there are some discrepancies in the two accounts, only enhances their value. More than this, it has led the historian into a brief digression upon the life, death, and character of the Baptist, which speaks volumes in favour of the genuineness of that still more celebrated passage, in which he speaks of "Jesus," that "wise man, if man He may be called" (Ant. xviii. 3, § 3; cp. xx. 9, § 1, unhesitatingly quoted as genuine by Euseb. H. E. i. 11).

2. It has been warmly debated whether it was the adultery, or the incestuous connexion, that drew down the reproof of the Baptist. It has been already shown that, either way, the offence merited condemnation upon more grounds than one.

3. The birthday feast is another undesigned coincidence between Scripture and profane history. The Jews abhorred keeping birthdays as a pagan custom (Bland on Matt. xiv. 6). On the other hand, it was usual with the Egyptians (Gen. xl. 20; cp. Joseph. Ant. xii. 4, § 7), with the Persians (Herod. i. 133), with the Greeks—even in the case of the dead, whence the Christian custom of keeping anniversaries of the martyrs (Bähr ad Herod. iv. 26)—and with the Romans (Pers. Sat. ii. 1-3). Now the Herods may be said to have gone beyond Rome in the observance of all that was Roman. Herod the Great kept the day of his accession; Antipas—as we read here—and Agrippa I., as Josephus tells us (Ant. xix. 7, § 1), their birthdays, with such magnificence, that the "birthdays of Herod" (Herodis dies) had passed into a proverb when Persius wrote (Sat. v. 180).

4. And yet dancing, on these festive occasions, was common to both Jew and Gentile; and was practised in the same way—youths and virgins, singly, or separated into two bands, but never intermingled, danced to do honour to their deity, their hero, or to the day of their solemnity. Miriam (Ex. xv. 20), the daughter of Jephthah (Judg. xi. 34), and David (2 Sam. vi. 14) are familiar instances in Holy Writ: the Carmen Saeculare of Horace, to quote no more, points to the same custom amongst Greeks and Romans. It is plainly owing to the elevation of woman in the social scale, that dancing in pairs (still unknown to the East) has come into fashion.

5. The rash oath of Herod, like that of Jephthah in the O. T., has afforded ample discussion to casuists. It is now ruled that all such oaths, where there is no reservation, expressed or implied, in favour of the laws of God or man, are illicit and without force. Solomon had long since decided thus (1 K. ii. 20-24; see Sanderson, De Juram. Oblig. Praelect. iii. 16). [E. S. Fr.]

HERO'DION (Ἡρώδιον; Herodion), a relative of St. Paul (τὸν συγγενῆ μου; cognatus), to whom he sends his salutation amongst the Christians of the Roman Church (Rom. xvi. 11). Nothing appears to be certainly known of him. By Hippolytus, however, he is said to have been Bishop of Tarsus; and by Pseudodorothe of Patra (Winer, s. n.). [G.]

HERON. The rendering in A. V. and R. V. (but R. V. margin, "ibis") of Ἡρώδιον, anaphāh; χαράδριος; charadrus, in Lev. xi. 19, Deut. xiv. 18, where alone it occurs. It would appear to have been well known, and also to include various species, from the addition of the words "after her kind." The translators of the LXX. do not seem to have recognised the bird intended as the heron, or they would have used its familiar name, ἐρῶδιος; but they at least took it to be an inhabitant of the marshes, for χαράδριος is applicable to all birds frequenting swampy ground (ἐν χαράδραις), though modern naturalists apply it to the plover tribe only. From a fancied derivation of the Greek ἀνοραία, a species of eagle (ὄρνις δ' ὡς ἀνοραία διέπτατο, Od. i. 320), from Ἡρώδιον, Bochart and others have supposed that some species of bird of prey was intended. The guesses of the Talmudists are equally vague. Gesenius, deriving the name from Ἡρώδιον, suggests some irascible bird, and other commentators would make it the goose or the parrot; both impossible, as neither of these classes are found in those countries. Probably the local or archaic name was unknown to the dwellers in the city of Alexandria, though they had a general idea that a marsh bird was intended. Weighing all that has been written on the subject, the rendering of our Versions seems to have more to recommend it than any other (see Knobel-Dillmann on Lev. l. c. MV.¹¹ compares Assy. anpatu, which Friedr. Delitzsch translates "the bird of light"). The heron tribe is very abundant in Egypt and Palestine, there are many different species, and they all affect marshy situations. They are so numerous and conspicuous that it is unlikely they should not be mentioned in the list; while the plover tribe there are neither numerous, varied, nor conspicuous. There are no less than seven species of heron all common in Egypt, and the same are also found throughout Palestine in suitable localities. They are the Common Heron (Ardea cinerea, L.), the Purple Heron (Ardea purpurea, L.), the Great White Heron (Ardea alba, L.), found about the Lake of Gennesareth; the little Egret (Ardea garzetta, L.), the Buff-backed Heron (Ardea bubulcus, Aud.), very common in pastures with cattle; the Squacco (Ardea ralloides, Scop.), and the Night Heron (Nycticorax griseus, L.). Vast flocks of the buff-backed and squacco herons live and breed in the swamps of Huleh, the ancient Merom. The marginal rendering of R. V., ibis, is fully justified, as the Purple Ibis always consorts with the last-named species, but in small numbers, reminding one of the black members of a flock of sheep in England. The food of all these birds is the same, principally fish, frogs, and reptiles. The smaller species also devour caterpillars and beetles. [H. B. T.]

* This town is probably Lugdunum Convenarum, a town of Gaul, situated on the right bank of the Garonne, at the foot of the Pyrenees, now St. Bertrand de Comminges (Murray, Handb. of France, s. n.); Eusebius, H. E. i. 11, says Vienne, confounding Antipas with Archelaus (see Euseb. l. c., edd. Wace and Schaff). Burton on Matt. xiv. 3, Alford, and moderns in general, prefer Lyons. In Josephus (B. J. ii. 9, § 6), Antipas is said to have died in Spain—apparently, from the context, the land of his exile. A town on the frontiers, therefore, like the above, would satisfy both passages.

HE'SED (הֶסֶד = grace; B. 'Esoth, A. 'Esoth; Benesed). The son of Hessed, or Ben-Chesed, was commissary for Solomon in the district of "the Arubboth, Socoh, and all the land of Hephher" (1 K. iv. 10).

HESH'BON (הֶשְׁבֹּן, ? = prudence, al., reckoning: B. 'Esoth, A. 'Esoth, Josh. xxi. 39; Joseph. Esoth: Heshbon), the capital of the independent kingdom which Sihon, king of the Amorites, established north of the Arnon after he had driven out the Moabites (Num. xxi. 25-34; Deut. iv. 46; Josh. xii. 2, 5, xiii. 27). The town passed into the hands of the Israelites after the battle of Jahaz (Deut. ii. 32), in which Sihon, who was the first to resist the invaders, was defeated and killed (Num. xxi. 25; Deut. i. 4, ii. 24, 30, iii. 2, 6, xix. 7; Josh. ix. 10; Judg. xi. 19, 26; Neh. ix. 22; Judith v. 15). It was situated, with its dependent cities, on the level downs, mishor, east of the Dead Sea (Josh. xiii. 17),—"the place for cattle" which the pastoral tribes, Reuben and Gad, asked Moses to give them for a possession (Num. xxxii. 3). It was given to Reuben (Josh. xiii. 10, 17, 21), and rebuilt by the tribe (Num. xxxii. 37); but was so near the boundary between Reuben and Gad (Josh. xiii. 26) that, in the list of towns assigned to the Merarite Levites, it is said to have belonged to the latter tribe (Josh. xxi. 39; 1 Ch. vi. 81). In the time of Isaiah it was apparently in the hands of the Moabites, to whom it originally belonged (Num. xxi. 26); and hence it is mentioned in the prophetic denunciations against Moab (Is. xv. 4, xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 2, 34, 45, xlix. 3). It is usually taken to be the same place as the Casphor (Χασφῶρ) or Casphon (Χασφῶν) of 1 Macc. v. 26, 36, and the Chasphoma (Χάσφωμα) of Josephus (Ant. xii. 8, § 3), which was captured by Judas Maccabaeus (Reland, Pal. p. 719; Riehm, HWB. s. v.); but the operations of Judas, east of Jordan, were apparently confined to the northern districts, and did not extend southwards as far as Heshbon. During the reign of Alexander Jannaeus it was in the possession of the Jews (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 15, § 4); and under Herod it was restored, and garrisoned by cavalry (Ant. xv. 8, § 5). At the commencement of the Jewish War it was laid waste by the Jews (B. J. ii. 18, § 1), but soon recovered. Ptolemy (v. 17) mentions it under the name Esbutha ('Εσβούθα, and the "Arabes Esbonitae" of Pliny (v. 12) must be referred to this place. Eusebius says (OS. p. 259, 24) that it was in his day called Esbus ('Εσβούς), and was a famous city of Arabia, situated in the mountains opposite Jericho, and 20 M.P. from the Jordan. It is mentioned in the list of the Eparchies of Arabia under the name 'Esothos (Reland, Pal. p. 217), and in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon as Πόλις 'Εσβούθρων. According to Abu-l Fedá, it was in the 14th century a small town and the capital of the Belhá province (Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, p. 456). There are coins of Nero and Caracalla; those of the latter emperor have a temple of Astarte, or a "Deus Lunus" with a Phrygian cap, and the epigraph ECBOY.

The ruins of Heshbon (see Tristram, Land of Israel,² p. 544), now called Heshbân, lie on a plateau quite bare of trees, about 16 miles E. of the Pilgrims' Bathing Place in the Jordan. The nearest water is 'Ain Heshbân, in a valley to the W., whence an ancient road winds up to the plateau. The remains are those of an important town, but none of them, excepting the caves, cisterns, and rock cuttings, appear to be more ancient than the 2nd century A.D. Heaps of fallen masonry cover the sides of a high Tell, on the top of which there was a large building; and on the ground to the S.W. of this are numerous remains of houses, some of which appear to have had considerable architectural pretensions. There are many caves and rock-hewn cisterns, and, on the S. side of the Tell, a large ancient reservoir, which calls to mind the passage in Cant. vii. 4, "Thine eyes are like the fishpools (R. V. pools) of Heshbon by the gate of Bath-rabbim." See Burckhardt, Trav. in Syr. p. 365; Irby and Mangles, p. 472; PEF. Mem. E. Pal. i. 104 sq.; Riehm, HWB. s. v. [BATH-RABBIM.] [W.]

HESH'MON (הֶשְׁמֹן = thriving, fruitfulness; both MSS. of LXX. omit; Hassemon), a place named, with others, as lying between Moladah and Beersheba (Josh. xv. 27), and therefore in the extreme south of Judah. Nothing further is known of it; but may it not be another form of the name AZMON, given in Num. xxxiv. 4 as one of the landmarks of the southern boundary of Judah? [G.] [W.]

HES'RON. [HEZBON.]

HESRONITES. [HEZRONITES.]

HETH (חֶת, i.e. Cheth, terror, giant; Xér; Heth), the forefather of the nation of THE HITTITES. In the genealogical tables of Gen. x. and 1 Ch. i., Heth is stated to be a son of Canaan, younger than Zidon the firstborn, but preceding the Jebusite, the Amorite, and the other Canaanite families. Heth and Zidon alone are named as persons; all the rest figure as tribes (Gen. x. 15; 1 Ch. i. 13; LXX. τῶν Χετταίων; and so Josephus, Ant. i. 6, § 2: Vulg. Hethacum).

The Hittites were therefore a Hamite race, neither of the "country" nor of the "kindred" of Abraham and Isaac (Gen. xxiv. 3, 4; xxviii. 1, 2). In the earliest historical mention of the nation—the beautiful narrative of Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah—they are styled, not Hittites, but Benê-Cheth (A. V. "sons, and children of Heth," Gen. xxiii. 3, 5, 7, 10, 16, 18, 20; xxv. 10; xlix. 32). Once we hear of "daughters of Heth" (xxvii. 46), the "daughters of the land;" at that early period still called, after their less immediate progenitor, "daughters of Canaan" (xxviii. 1, 8, compared with xxvii. 46 and xxvi. 34, 35). [G.] [W.]

HETH'LOH (חֶתְלוֹן, "the way of Hethlon"; LXX. translates the name; Hethalon), the name of a place on the northern border of the "promised land." It is mentioned only twice in Scripture (Ezek. xlvii. 15, xlviii. 1). In all probability the "way of Hethlon" is the pass at the northern end of Lebanon, from the sea-coast of the Mediterranean to the great plain of Hamath, and is thus identical with "the entrance of Hamath" in Num. xxxiv. 8, &c. See Porter's Five Years in Damascus, ii. 356. [J. L. P.] [W.]

HE'ZEKI (חֶזְקִיָּה, i.e. Hizki, a short form of Hizkiah, = Hezekiah, strength of Jah; B. אֲזַקְיָהוּ, A. -κι; Hezeki), a man in the genealogies of Benjamin, one of the Bene-Elpaal, a descendant of Shaaraim (1 Ch. viii. 17).

HEZEKIAH (חֶזְקִיָּהוּ, generally חֶזְקִיָּהוּ, Hizkiyahu, and also with initial ח, חֶזְקִיָּהוּ; LXX. and Joseph. Ἐζεκίας; Ezechias; = strength of Jah, cp. Germ. Gotthard, Gesen.). I. Twelfth king of Judah, son of the apostate Ahaz and Abi (or Abijah), ascended the throne at the age of twenty-five, B.C. 726. Since, however, Ahaz died at the age of thirty-six, some prefer to make Hezekiah only twenty years old at his accession (reading ח for כה), as otherwise he must have been born when Ahaz was a boy of eleven years old. This indeed is not impossible (Hieron. Ep. ad Vitalem. 132, quoted by Bochart, Geogr. Sacr. p. 920: see Keil on 2 K. xviii. 1; Knobel, Jes. p. 22, &c.); but, if any change be desirable, it is better to suppose that Ahaz was twenty-five and not twenty years old at his accession (LXX., Syr., Arab., 2 Ch. xxviii. 1), reading כה for ח in 2 K. xvi. 2. That some change must be made is obvious, since 2 K. xviii. 10, 13 and 2 Ch. xxviii. 1 are not reconcilable (as they stand) either with each other or with Assyrian chronology. Ussher's chronology gives B.C. 726 as the date of Hezekiah's accession. Wellhausen and Kamphausen fix that date at B.C. 715. Duncker, who is followed by many English authorities, selects the date B.C. 728. From the Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions we arrive at the dates of three events in this period:—(1.) Dethronement of Pekah by Tiglath-pileser, and accession of Hoshea and of Ahaz in Judah B.C. 734. (2.) Fall of Samaria, B.C. 722. (3.) Campaign against Hezekiah, B.C. 701. If these dates be adopted, Ahaz succeeded at the age of twenty-five, and Hezekiah perhaps at fifteen. (On these difficult questions, see W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, pp. 416-419; Kamphausen, Die Chronologie d. Hebr. Könige; Duncker, Hist. of Antiquity, E. T. iii. 16-18; Schrader, The Cuneiform Inscriptions [E. T.], and the inscriptions quoted and translated in Records of the Past [Bagsters].)

Hezekiah was one of the three most perfect kings of Judah (2 K. xviii. 5; Ecclus. xlix. 4). His first act was to purge, and repair, and re-open with splendid sacrifices and perfect ceremonial, the Temple which had been despoiled and neglected during the careless and idolatrous reign of his father. This consecration was accompanied by a revival of the theocratic spirit, so strict as not even to spare "the high places," which, although tolerated by many well-intentioned kings, had naturally been profaned by the worship of images and Asherahs (2 K. xviii. 4). On the extreme importance and probable consequences of this measure, see HIGH PLACES. A still more decisive act was the destruction of a brazen serpent, said to have been the one used by Moses in the miraculous healing of the Israelites (Num. xxi. 9), which had been removed to Jerusalem, and had become, "down to those days," an object of adoration, partly in consequence of its venerable character as a relic, and partly perhaps from some dim tendencies to the ophiolatry common in ancient times (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 622). To break up a figure so curious and so highly honoured showed a strong mind, as well as a clear-sighted zeal, and Hezekiah briefly justified his procedure by calling the image תְּשֻׁבָּת, "a brazen thing," possibly with a contemptuous play on the word שָׂרָף, "a serpent." How necessary this was in such times may be inferred from the fact that "the brazen serpent" is, or was, still revered in the Church of St. Ambrose at Milan (Prideaux, Connezion, i. 19, Oxf. ed.).* Hezekiah abandoned altogether the weak and faithless policy of his father Ahaz, and reverted to the ideas of his great-grandfather, Uzziah. He strengthened the city, and enabled it to stand a siege by improving the water-supply (2 K. xx. 20; 2 Ch. xxxii. 30); and of these patriotic labours we have, probably, a most interesting confirmation in the engineer's inscription, discovered in 1880, on the wall of the rocky tunnel between the spring of Gihon and the Pool of Siloam. The early part of his reign was very prosperous. He encouraged agriculture, the storage of produce, and proper care for flocks and herds, so that he amassed treasures which almost recall the days of Solomon (2 Ch. xxxii. 27-30); and men saw in his wealth and success a Divine reward for his pious deeds (id. 32). His success was the more remarkable because at his accession Judah had only been evacuated six years by the forces of Rezin and Pekah, and he found "an empty treasury (2 K. xvi. 8), a ruined peasantry, an unprotected frontier, and a shattered army" (Driver's Isaiah, p. 48). When the kingdom of Israel had fallen (B.C. 722), Hezekiah extended his pious endeavours to Ephraim and Manasseh, and by inviting the scattered inhabitants to a peculiar Passover kindled their indignation also against the idolatrous practices which still continued among them. This Passover was, from the necessities of the case, celebrated at an unusual, though not illegal (Num. ix. 10, 11) time; and by an excess of Levitical zeal, it was continued for the unprecedented period of fourteen days. For these latter facts the Chronicler (2 Ch. xxx., xxx., xxxi.) is our sole authority, and he characteristically narrates them at great length. It would appear at first sight that this Passover was celebrated immediately after the purification of the Temple (see Prideaux, l. c.), but careful consideration makes it almost certain that it could not have taken place before the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign, when the fall of Samaria had stricken remorseful terror into the heart of Israel (2 Ch. xxxi. 1; xxx. 6, 9, and Keil on 2 K. xviii. 3). The Reformation wrought by Hezekiah was less thorough and effectual than that in the days of Josiah, but it pointed in the right direction, and paved the way for later efforts. From Is. xxx. 22, xxxi. 7 (which belong to B.C. 702), some have inferred that this re-establishment of the pure worship of Jehovah was not fully carried out till later in his reign, when he had triumphed over Assyria.

By a rare and happy providence the most pious of kings was confirmed in his faithfulness, and seconded in his endeavours, by the powerful assistance of the noblest and most eloquent of prophets. The influence of Isaiah was, however, not gained without a struggle with the "scornful" remnant of the former royal counsellors (Is. xxviii. 14), who in all probability recommended to the king such alliances and compromises as would be in unison rather with the dictates of political expediency, than with that sole unhesitating trust in the arm of Jehovah which the Prophets inculcated. The leading man of this cabinet was Shebna, who, from the omission of his father's name and the expression in Is. xxii. 16 (see Blunt, Undes. Coincidences), was probably a foreigner, perhaps a Syrian (Hitzig). At the instance of Isaiah, he seems to have been subsequently degraded from the high post of prefect of the palace (which office was given to Eliakim, Is. xxii. 21), to the inferior, though still honourable, station of state-secretary (שֹׁמֵר הַדָּבָר, 2 K. xviii. 18); the further punishment of exile with which Isaiah had threatened him (xxii. 18) being possibly forgiven on his amendment, of which we have some traces in Is. xxxvii. 2 sq. (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 617).

At the head of a repentant and united people, Hezekiah ventured to assume the aggressive against the Philistines, and in a series of victories not only won back the cities which his father had lost (2 Ch. xxviii. 18), but even dispossessed them of their own cities except Gaza (2 K. xviii. 8) and Gath (Joseph. Ant. ix. 13, § 3). This was his only military enterprise. It was perhaps to the purposes of this war that he applied the money which would otherwise have been used to pay the tribute exacted by Shalmaneser, according to the agreement of Ahaz with his predecessor, Tiglath-pileser. When, after the capture of Samaria, the king of Assyria applied for this impost, Hezekiah refused it, and in open rebellion omitted to send even the usual presents (2 K. xviii. 7), a line of conduct to which he was doubtless encouraged by the splendid exhortations of his prophetic guide.

We must here pause for a moment to say a word about Assyria and her kings. According to Mr. G. Smith's Assyrian Discoveries, the dates of the formidable conquerors of this epoch were as follows:—

	B.C.
Tiglath-pileser II.	745-727
Shalmaneser IV.	727-722
Sargon	722-705
Sennacherib	705-681

To the first of these four monarchs belongs the cruel policy of deportation of conquered peoples and the use of subordinate generals (Tartans). He took Arpad, received tribute from Menahem, and was bribed by Ahaz to attack Rezin and Pekah. He put Pekah to death, elevated Hoshea, deported many Israelites, took Damascus, and reduced Merodach-baladan to submission. When Hoshea revolted against his successor, Shalmaneser IV., that king began the siege of Samaria, which was completed in 722 by Sargon, who had perhaps been a rebel general. Sargon was murdered by an unknown assassin in 705. In one inscription he calls himself "a subjector of the land of Judah," but this can only be an idle boast (Schrader, p. 188). Sennacherib, whom Nahum calls "the breaker in pieces" (Nah. ii. 1), was the first of the Sargonidae, and reigned for twenty-five years.

When Hezekiah refused tribute to Shalmaneser, instant war was averted by the heroic and long-continued resistance of the Tyrians under their king Elulæus (Joseph. Ant. ix. 14), against a siege, which was abandoned only in the fifth year (Grote, Greece, iii. 359; 4th ed.), when it was found to be impracticable. This must have been a critical and intensely anxious period for Jerusalem, and Hezekiah used every available means to strengthen his position and render his capital impregnable (2 K. xx. 20; 2 Ch. xxxii. 3-5, 30; Is. xxii. 8-11, xxxiii. 18; and to these events Ewald also refers Ps. lxxiii. 13). But while all Judæa trembled with anticipation of Assyrian invasion, and while Shebna and others were relying "in the shadow of Egypt," Isaiah's brave heart did not fail, and he even denounced the wrath of God against the proud and sinful merchant-city (Is. xxiii.), which now seemed to be the main bulwark of Judæa against immediate attack.

It was probably during the siege of Samaria that Shalmaneser died, and was succeeded by Sargon, who, jealous of Egyptian influence in Judæa, sent an army under a Tartan or general (Is. xx. 1), which penetrated Egypt (Nah. iii. 8-10) and destroyed No-Amon; although it is clear from Hezekiah's rebellion (2 K. xviii. 7) that it can have produced but little permanent impression. Sargon's capture of Hamath, and the defeat of Egypt at Raphia (B.C. 720), were practically forgotten in the course of six or seven years during which he was engaged in other directions. Sargon, in the tenth year of his reign (which is the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah), made an expedition to Palestine; but his annals make no mention of any conquests from Hezekiah on this occasion, and he seems to have occupied himself in the siege of Ashdod (Is. xx. 1) and in the inspection of mines (Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. ix.). This must therefore be the expedition alluded to in 2 K. xviii. 13, Is. xxxvi. 1; an expedition which is merely alluded to, as it led to no result. But if the Scripture narrative is to be reconciled with the records of Assyrian history, it seems necessary to make a transposition in the text of Isaiah (and therefore of the Book of Kings). That some such expedient must be resorted to, if the Assyrian history is trustworthy, is maintained by Dr. Hincks in a paper On the rectification of Chronology, which the newly-discovered Apis-steles render necessary. "The text," he says, "as it originally stood, was probably to this effect: 2 K. xviii. 13, 'Now in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah the king of Assyria came up' [alluding to the attack mentioned in Sargon's Annals]; then followed xx. 1-19, 'In those days was king Hezekiah sick unto death,' &c. After which came, 'And Sennacherib, king of Assyria, came up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them,' &c., xviii. 13-xix. 37" (Dr. Hincks, in Journ. of Sac. Lit., Oct. 1858). Perhaps some later transcriber, unaware of the earlier and unimportant invasion, confused the allusion to Sargon in 2 K. xviii. 13 with the detailed story of Sennacherib's attack (2 K. xviii. 14-xix. 37); and, considering that the account of Hezekiah's illness broke the continuity of the narrative, removed it to the end.

According to this scheme, Hezekiah's dangerous illness (2 K. xx.; Is. xxxviii.; 2 Ch. xxxii. 24) nearly synchronised with Sargon's futile invasion, in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, eleven years before Sennacherib's invasion. That it must have preceded the attack of Sennacherib is nearly obvious from the promise in 2 K. xx. 6, as well as from modern discoveries (Layard, Nin. & Bab. i. 145); and such is the view adopted by the Rabbis (Seder Olam, cap. cxiii.), Üssher, and by most commentators, except Vtringa and Gesenius (Keil, ad loc.; Prideaux, i. 22). There seems to be no ground whatever for the vague conjecture so confidently advanced (Winer, s. v. Hiskias; Jahn, Hebr. Common. § xli.) that the king's illness was the same plague which had destroyed the Assyrian army. The word פִּיִּי is not elsewhere applied to the plague, but to carbuncles and inflammatory ulcers (Ex. ix. 9; Job ii. 1, &c.). Hezekiah, whose kingdom was in a dangerous crisis, who had at that time no heir (for Manasseh was not born till long afterwards, 2 K. xxi. 1), and who regarded death as the end of existence (Is. xxxviii.), "turned his face to the wall and wept sore" at the threatened approach of dissolution. God had compassion on his anguish, and heard his prayer. Isaiah had hardly left the palace when he was ordered to promise the king immediate recovery, and a fresh lease of life, ratifying the promise by a sign, and curing the boil by a plaster of figs, which were often used medicinally in similar cases (Gesen. Thes. i. 311; Celsius, Hierobot. ii. 377; Bartholinus, De Morbis Biblicis, x. 47). What was the exact nature of the disease we cannot say; according to Meade, it was fever terminating in abscess. For some account of the retrogression of the shadow on the sundial of Ahaz, see DIAL. On this remarkable passage we must be content to refer the reader to Carpov, App. Crit. p. 351 sq.; Winer, s. vv. Hiskias and Uhren; Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 332 sq.; the elaborate notes of Keil on 2 K. xx.; Rosenmüller and Gesenius on Is. xxxviii., and especially Ewald, Gesch. iii. 638.

Various ambassadors came with letters and gifts to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery (2 Ch. xxxii. 23), and among them (perhaps about B.C. 713) an embassy from Merodach-baladan (or Berodach, 2 K. xx. 12; ὁ Βεδασ, Joseph. l. c.), the viceroy of Babylon, the Mardokempados of Ptolemy's canon. The ostensible object of this mission was to compliment Hezekiah on his convalescence (2 K. xx. 12; Is. xxxix. 1), and "to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land" (2 Ch. xxxii. 31), a rumour of which could not fail to interest a people devoted to astrology. But its real purpose was to discover how far an alliance between the two powers was possible or desirable, for Mardokempados, no less than Hezekiah, was in apprehension of the Assyrians. In fact Sargon expelled this bold patriot from the throne of Babylon (Records of the Past, vii. 41, 46), although after the assassination of Sargon he seems to have returned and re-established himself for six months, at the end of which he was murdered by Belibos (Dr. Hincks, l. c.; Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. ch. viii.; Layard, Nin. & Bab. i. 141). Community of interest made Hezekiah receive the overtures of Babylon with unconcealed gratification; and, perhaps, to enhance the opinion of his own importance as an ally, he displayed to the messengers the princely treasures which he and his predecessors had accumulated. The mention of such rich stores is an additional argument for supposing these events to have happened before Sennacherib's invasion (see 2 K. xviii. 14-16), although they are related after them in the Scripture historians. If ostentation were his motive, it received a terrible rebuke, for he was informed by Isaiah that from the then tottering and subordinate province of Babylon, and not from the mighty Assyria, would come the ruin and captivity of Judah (Is. xxxix. 5). This prophecy and the one of Micah (Mic. iv. 10) are the earliest definition of the locality of that hostile power, where the clouds of exile so long threatened (Lev. xxvi. 33; Deut. iv. 27, xxx. 3) were beginning to gather. It is an impressive and fearful circumstance that the moment of exultation was chosen as the opportunity for warning, and that the prophecies of the Assyrian deliverance are set side by side with those of the Babylonish Captivity (Davison On Prophecy, p. 256). The weak friend was to accomplish that which was impossible to the powerful foe. But, although pride was the sin thus vehemently checked by the Prophet, Isaiah was certainly not blind to the political motives (Joseph. Ant. x. 2, § 2) which made Hezekiah so complaisant to the Babylonian ambassadors. Into those motives he had inquired in vain, for the king met that portion of his question ("What said these men?") by emphatic silence. Hezekiah's meek answer to the stern denunciation of future woe has been most unjustly censured as "a false resignation which combines selfishness with silliness" (Newman, Hebr. Mon. p. 274). On the contrary it merely implies a conviction that God's decree could not be otherwise than just and right, and a natural thankfulness for even a temporary suspension of its inevitable fulfilment.

Sargon was succeeded (B.C. 705) by his son Sennacherib, whose two invasions occupy the greater part of the Scripture records concerning the reign of Hezekiah. The first of these took place in the third year of Sennacherib (B.C. 702), and occupies only four verses (2 K. xviii. 13-16), though the route of the advancing Assyrians may be traced in Is. x. 5, xi. The rumour of the invasion redoubled Hezekiah's exertions, and he prepared for a siege by providing offensive and defensive armour, stopping up the wells, and (perhaps at this time) diverting the watercourses, conducting the water of Gihon into the city by a subterranean canal (Eccles. xlvi. 17. For a similar precaution taken by the Mohammedans, see Will. Tyr. viii. 7, Keil). But the main hope of the political faction was the alliance with Egypt, and they seem to have sought it by presents and private entreaties (Is. xxx. 6), especially with a view to obtaining chariots and cavalry (Is. xxxi. 1-3), which was the weakest arm of the Jewish service, as we see from the derision which it excited (2 K. xviii. 23). Such overtures kindled Isaiah's indignation, and Shebna may have lost his high office by recommending them. The Prophet clearly saw that Egypt was too weak and faithless to be serviceable, and the applications to Pharaoh (who is compared by Rabshakeh to one of the weak reeds of his own river) implied a want of trust in the help of God. He says with bitter scorn :

"Egypt helpeth in vain, and to no purpose :
Therefore have I called her Rahab that sitteth still."
(Is. xxx. 7, R. V.)

But Isaiah did not disapprove of the spontaneously proffered assistance of the tall and warlike Ethiopians (Is. xviii. 2, 7, acc. to Ewald's transl.); because he may have regarded it as a providential aid.

The account given of this first invasion in the Annals of Sennacherib is that he attacked Hezekiah because the Ekronites had sent their king Padiya (or "Haddiya" acc. to Sir H. Rawlinson) as a prisoner to Jerusalem (cp. 2 K. xviii. 8); that he took forty-six cities ("all the fenced cities" in 2 K. xviii. 13 is apparently a general expression, cp. xiii. 8) and 200,000 prisoners; that he besieged Jerusalem with mounds (cp. 2 K. xix. 32); and although Hezekiah promised to pay 800 talents of silver (of which perhaps 300 only were ever paid) and 30 of gold (2 K. xviii. 14; Is. xxxvi. 1; but see Layard, Nin. & Bab. p. 145), yet not content with this he mulcted him of a part of his dominions, and gave them to the kings of Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza (Rawlinson, Herod. i. 475 sq.). So important was this expedition that Demetrius, the Jewish historian, even attributes to Sennacherib the Great Captivity (Clem. Alex. Strom. p. 146, ed. Sylb.). In the inscription on Bellino's Cylinder in the British Museum and in the Bull-inscription of Kouyunjik, Sennacherib boasts that he first attacked and reduced the cities of Phoenicia, and those in the Shephelah; that he reduced Ekron, which had sent to Hezekiah its king Padi, who remained loyal to Assyria; that he hewed and trampled down forty-six of Hezekiah's cities, took a vast amount of spoil, deported 200,150 of his people, and shut him up in Jerusalem "like a bird in a cage;" and finally, on his submission, carried off to Nineveh his daughters, his harem, and his eunuchs. In almost every particular this account agrees with the notice in Scripture, and we may see a reason for so great a sacrifice on the part of Hezekiah in the glimpse which Isaiah gives us of his capital city driven by desperation into licentious and impious mirth (xxii. 12-14). This campaign must at least have had the one good result of proving the worthlessness of the Egyptian alliance; for at a place called Altagdū (? the Eltekon of Josh. xv. 59) Sennacherib (B.C. 701) inflicted an overwhelming defeat on the combined forces of Egypt and Ethiopia, which had come to the assistance of Ekron. But Isaiah regarded the purchased treaty as a cowardly defection, and the sight of his fellow-citizens gazing peacefully from the house-tops on the bright array of the car-borne and quivered Assyrians, filled him with indignation and despair (Is. xxii. 1-7, if the latest explanations of this chapter be correct).

Hezekiah's bribe (or fine) brought a temporary release, for the Assyrians marched into Egypt, where, if Herodotus (ii. 141) and Josephus (Ant. x. 1-3) are to be trusted, they advanced without resistance to Pelusium, owing to the hatred of the warrior-caste against Sethos the king-priest of Pthah, who had, in his priestly predilections, interfered with their prerogatives. In spite of this advantage, Sennacherib was forced to raise the siege of Pelusium, by the advance of Tirhakah or Tarakes, the ally of Sethos and Hezekiah, who afterwards united the crowns of Egypt and Ethiopia. This famous Ethiopian hero, who had extended his conquests to the Pillars of Hercules (Strab. xv. 472), was indeed a formidable antagonist. His deeds are recorded in a temple at Medinet Haboo, but the jealousy of the Memphites (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt. i. 141 [1st ed.]) concealed his assistance, and attributed the deliverance of Sethos to the miraculous interposition of an army of mice (Herod. ii. 141). This story may have had its source, however, not in jealousy, but in the use of a mouse as the emblem of destruction (Horapoll. Hiérog. i. 50; Rawlinson, Herod. ad loc.), and of some sort of disease or plague (? 1 Sam. vi. 18; Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 185). The legend doubtless gained ground from the extraordinary circumstances which afterwards ruined the army of Sennacherib. We say afterwards, because, however much the details of the two occurrences may have been confused, we cannot agree with the majority of writers (Prideaux, Bochart, Michaelis, Jahn, Keil, Newman, &c.) in identifying the flight of Sennacherib from Pelusium with the event described in 2 K. xix. We prefer to follow Josephus in making them allude to distinct events.

Returning from his futile expedition (ἄπρακτος ἀνεχώρησε, Joseph. Ant. x. 1, § 4) Sennacherib "dealt treacherously" with Hezekiah (Is. xxxiii. 1) by attacking the stronghold of Lachish. The siege of Lachish (Um-Lakis) and its submission are represented on the famous bas-relief in the British Museum (Schrader, p. 287; Stade, Geschichte, i. 620; Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, pp. 148-152). This was the commencement of that second invasion, respecting which we have such full details in 2 K. xviii. 17 sq.; 2 Ch. xxxii. 9 sq.; Is. xxxvi. That there were two invasions (contrary to the opinion of Layard, Bosanquet, Vance Smith, &c.) is clearly proved by the details of the first given in the Assyrian annals (see Rawlinson, Herod. i. p. 477; Schrader, pp. 208, 301; Records of the Past, i. 35, vii. 59). Although the Annals of Sennacherib, on the great cylinder in the British Museum, reach to the end of his eighth year, and this second invasion belongs to his fifth year (B.C. 698, the twenty-eighth year of Hezekiah), yet no allusion to it has been found. So shameful a disaster as that in which it ended was naturally concealed by national vanity. From Lachish he had sent against Jerusalem an army under his general (Tartan), his chamberlain (Rab-Saris), and his cup-bearer the orator Rabshakeh, with a blasphemous and insulting summons to surrender, deriding Hezekiah's hopes of Egyptian succour, and apparently endeavouring to inspire the people with distrust of his religious innovations (2 K. xviii. 22, 25, 30). The reiteration and peculiarity of the latter argument, together with the Rabshakeh's fluent mastery of Hebrew (which he used to tempt the people from their allegiance by a glowing promise, vv. 31, 32), give countenance to the supposition that he was an apostate Jew. Hezekiah's ministers were thrown into anguish and dismay; but the undaunted Isaiah hurled back threatening for threatening with unrivalled eloquence and force. He even prophesied that the fires of Tophet were already burning in expectancy of the Assyrian corpses which were destined to feed their flame. Meanwhile Sennacherib, having taken Lachish (Um-Lakis), was besieging Libnah (Tell es-Safiah, 12 miles nearer Jerusalem), when, alarmed by a "rumour" of Tirhakah's advance in person (to avenge the defeat at Altaqâ?), he was forced to relinquish once more his immediate designs, and content himself with a defiant letter to Hezekiah. Whether on the occasion he encountered and defeated the Ethiopians (as Prideaux precariously infers from Is. xx.: Connex. i. p. 26), or not, we cannot tell. The next event of the campaign, about which we are informed, is that the Jewish king with simple piety prayed to God with Sennacherib's letter outspread before him (cp. 1 Macc. iii. 48), and received a prophecy of immediate deliverance. Accordingly "that night the Angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians 185,000 men." "The Biblical and Assyrian accounts of Sennacherib's campaign," says Prof. Driver, "while in substantial agreement, are both imperfect, and may be combined in different ways. The essential difference between them is that while one narrates the entire campaign [viz. (1) the subjection of the Phœnician cities; (2) the successes against Ekron and the Egyptian forces; (3) the hostilities against Judah], the other deals only with the stage affecting Judah, and dwells principally upon two episodes (2 K. xviii. 17-xix. 7; xix. 8-36), belonging in fact to a fifth and subsequent stage upon which the Assyrian account is silent" (Isaiah, p. 82).

There is no doubt that some secondary cause was employed in the accomplishment of this event. We are certainly "not to suppose," as Dr. Johnson observed, "that the Angel went about with a sword in his hand stabbing them one by one, but that some powerful natural agent was employed." The Babylonish Talmud and some of the Targums attribute it to storms of lightning (Vitringa, Vogel, &c.); Prideaux, Heine (de causâ Strag. Assy.), and Faber to the simoom; R. Jose, Ussher, Preiss (de causâ clad. Assy.), &c., to a nocturnal attack by Tirhakah; Paulus to a poisoning of the waters; and finally Josephus, followed by an immense majority of ancient and modern commentators, including even Keil, to the pestilence (cp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 15, 16). This would be a cause not only adequate (Justin, xix. 11; Diodor. xix. p. 434: see the other instances quoted by Rosenmüller, Winer, Keil, Jahn, &c.), but most probable in itself from the crowded and terrified state of the camp. There is therefore no necessity to adopt the ingenious conjectures by which Döderlein, Koppe, and Wessler endeavour to get rid of the large number 185,000.

After this reverse Sennacherib fled precipitately to Nineveh, where he revenged himself on as many Jews as were in his power (Tob. i. 18), and after twenty years (not fifty-five days, as Tobit says, i. 21) was murdered by two of his sons as he went to pray before his idol Dagon (Tob.) or Nisroch (Assarac?) his god (B.C. 681). He certainly lived till B.C. 680, for his 22nd year is mentioned on a clay tablet (Rawlinson, l.c.); he must therefore have survived Hezekiah by some seventeen years. It is possible that several of the Psalms (e.g. xlvi.-xlviii., lxxvi.) allude to his discomfiture.

Hezekiah only lived to enjoy for about one year more his well-earned peace and glory. He slept with his fathers after a reign of twenty-nine years, in the 56th year of his age (B.C. 697), and was buried with great honour and universal mourning "in the chiefest of the sepulchres" ("the road leading up to the sepulchres," ἐν ἀναβδόσει τῶπων, LXX., because, as Thenius conjectures, the actual sepulchres were full) of the sons of David" (2 Ch. xxxii. 33). He had found time for many works of peace in the noble and almost blameless course of his troubled life, and to his pious labours we are indebted for at least one portion of the present canon (Prov. xxv. 1; Eccles. xlviii. 17 sq.). He can have no finer panegyric than the words of the son of Sirach, "Even the kings of Judah failed, for they forsook the law of the Most High; all except David, and Ezekias, and Josias failed." In addition to his many merits, as a king faithful to the covenant of Jehovah, and as one who followed in the main the guidance of the great Prophet Isaiah, Hezekiah did much for his kingdom in every way. He was a poet, and one famous song is preserved in Isaiah (xxxviii. 9-20), and by his employment of scribes to copy fragments of early literature he helped to preserve the precious wisdom of earlier days.

Besides the many authors and commentators who have written on this period of Jewish history (on which much light has been thrown by Sir H. Layard, Sir G. Wilkinson, Sir H. Rawlinson, Dr. Hincks, Prof. Sayce, Schrader, and other scholars who have studied the Nineveh remains, see for continuous lives of Hezekiah, Josephus (Ant. ix. 13—ix. 2), Prideaux (Concezion, &c. i. 16—30), Jahn (Hebr. Com. § xli.), Winer (s. v. Hiskias), Ewald (Gesch. iii. 614—644, 2d ed.), and Stanley (History of the Jewish Church, Lecture xxxviii.).

2. Son of Neariah, one of the descendants of the royal family of Judah (1 Ch. iii. 23).

3. The same name, though rendered in the A. V. HIZKIAH, is found in Zeph. i. 1.

4. ATER-OF-HEZ. [ATER.] [F. W. F.]

HEZ-ION (הִזְיוֹן) = sight; B. 'Αζείν, A. and Luc. 'Αζήλ; Hezion, a king of Aram (Syria), father of Tabrimon, and grandfather of Benhadad I. He and his father are mentioned only in 1 K. xv. 18, and their names are omitted by Josephus. In the absence of all information, the natural suggestion is that he is identical with REZON, the contemporary of Solomon, in 1 K. xi. 23; the two names being not dissimilar in Hebrew, and still more so in other Versions (cp. Arab. and Peshitto on the latter passage); and indeed this conclusion has been adopted by some translators and commentators (Junius, Köhler, Dathe, Ewald, Klostermann, &c.). Against it are: (a.) That the number of generations of the Syrian kings would then be one less than those of the contemporary kings of Judah. But then the reign of Abijam was only three years, and in fact Jeroboam outlived both Rehoboam and his son. (b.) The statement of Nicolaus of Damascus (Joseph. Ant. vii. 5, § 2), that from the time of David for ten generations the kings of Syria were one dynasty, each king taking the name of Hadad, "as did the Ptolemies in Egypt." But this would exclude, not only Hezion and Tabrimon, but Rezon, unless we may interpret the last sentence to mean that the official title of Hadad was held in addition to the ordinary name of the king. [REZON; TABRIMON.] [G.] [W.]

HEZ'ZIR (הִזְזִיר) = swine; A. Ηεζείρ, B. 'Αφεσθή; Hezir. 1. A priest in the time of David, leader of the 17th monthly course in the service (1 Ch. xxiv. 15).

2. (Ηεζείρ; Hazir.) One of the heads of the people (laymen) who sealed the solemn covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 20).

HEZ'RAI (הִזְרַי), i.e. according to the Keri of the Masorets, but the original reading of the text, Ketib, has הִזְרַי = Hezro; BA. 'Ασαρά; Esrai, a native of Carmel, perhaps of the southern one, and in that case possibly once a slave or adherent of Nabal; 1 Sam. of the thirty heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 35). In the parallel list the name appears as HEZ'RO (הִזְרֹו); B. 'Hερέ, N. 'Hεραί, A. 'Ασαρά; Asro, in 1 Ch. xi. 37. Kennicott however (Dissertation, pp. 207—8) decides, on the almost unanimous authority of the ancient Versions, that Hezrai is the original form of the name.

HEZ'RON (הִזְרֹון); B. 'Ασρών, in Num. A. 'Ασράμ; Hesron. 1. A son of Reuben (Gen. xli. 9; Ex. vi. 14), who founded the family of the Hezronites (Num. xxvi. 6).

2. A son of Pharez, and one of the direct ancestors of David (Gen. xli. 12, 'Ασρών; Ruth iv. 18, B. 'Εφών, A. -μ, and so in Matt. i. 18. In 1 Ch. ii. 9, 18, 21, 25, B. 'Εσρών, A. 'Εσρώμ; ii. 5, iv. 1, B. 'Ασρών; Vulg. Hesron, in Ruth Esron). [T. E. B.] [W.]

HEZ'RON (הִזְרֹון) = enclosed; B. 'Ασρών, A. 'Εσρώμ; Chetron, a place on the south border of Judah between Kadesh-barnea and Addar (Josh. xv. 3). In Num. xxiv. 4, the name is given as Hazar-addar. Riehm suggests (s. v.) that Hazar, or Hezron, and Addar were so near each other that they could be called one place, Hazar-addar. In the list of towns in the Negeb (Josh. xv. 25), A. V. has "Kerioth, and Hezron, which is Hazor;" but the Hebrew text, which is followed by R. V., has only one name, Kerioth-Hezron: whether this be the same place as the Hezron of v. 3, is uncertain. Conder has suggested (Hbk. p. 257), as a possible identification, Jebel Hadhrâ, near 'Abdeh, Eboda, at the southern extremity of the northern and highest terrace of the Negeb, which he would make the southern limit of Judah. But this is too far, quite 50 miles, from Mount Hor; and it seems more probable that the Promised Land extended to the edge of the mountain plateau of Jebel Magrâh, which rises abruptly from the desert of et-Tih, and forms a natural boundary southward (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, map). In this direction, then, a search should be made for Hezron. Riehm (s. v.) identifies Kerioth-Hezron with Kh. el-Kureitein, N. of Tell 'Arâd, but the boundary of Judah must have been a long way to the south of this place. [W.]

HEZRONITES, THE (הִזְרֹוֹנִים); δ 'Ασρω-νεί; Hesronitæ. A branch of the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxvi. 21). The ed. of 1611 spelt Hesronites.

HID'DAI (הִידַי); A. 'Αθθαί, B. omits: Heddai, one of the thirty-seven heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 30), described as "of the torrents of Gaash." In the parallel list of 1 Ch. (xi. 32) the name is given as HURAI. Kennicott (Dissert. p. 194) decides in favour of "Hurai" on grounds for which the reader must be referred to his work.

HID'DEKEL (הִידְדְּקֵל); Τίγρις, Τίγρις-Ἐδδ-κέλ; Tygris, Tigris, one of the rivers of Eden, the river which "goeth eastward to Assyria" (Gen. ii. 14), and which Daniel calls "the great river" (Dan. x. 4), is rightly identified by the LXX. with the Tigris. As the Akkadian and Assyro-Babylonian forms are Idigna and Idiklat or Diklat respectively, it is difficult to account for the initial H, except by supposing that these two forms are weakened from Hidigna and Hidiklat. The form Diglath (the first syllable having disappeared) occurs in the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, in Josephus (Ant. Jud. i. 1), in the Armenian Eusebius (Chron. Can. Pars. i. c. 2), in Zonaras (Ann. i. 2), and in the Armenian Version of the Scriptures. It is hardened to Diglit (Diglitto) in Pliny (H. N. vi. 27). The form now used by the inhabitants of Mesopotamia is Diglah.

Strabo (xi. 14, § 8), Pliny (loc. cit.), and other writers tell us that the river received its designation from its rapidity, the word Tigris

(Tigra) meaning, in the Medo-Persic language, "an arrow." As far as the reference to its rapidity goes, this is not improbably correct, one of the ideographs for the stream being (id) halhala, "the swiftly-running stream." There is hardly any doubt that the first component part of the name Idigna or Idihlat is the Akkadian word for "river" (hidī, hūd, or id, also abbreviated to i). On one of the tablets there is a reference to the properties and names of the various rivers, that referring to the Tigris being, "Let him explain the Tigris as the bringer of fertility" (babilat nuhū). Another Semitic name of the river, when expressed by the ideograph id Halhala, was Amnu. The star of the river Tigris or Hiddekel was identified with Anunitu*, the goddess of one of the Sipparas (Sipar or Sippara of Anunitu). For its course see under TIGRIS. [G. R.] [T. G. P.]

H'EL (אֱלֹהִים), perhaps for אֱלֹהִים = God lives,

[Ges.], or for אֱלֹהִים = brother of God [cp. Bätthgen, Beitr. z. Sem. Religionsgeschichte, p. 156]; B. אַחֵיָּהּ, A. -i-; Hiel), a native of Bethel, who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Ahab (1 K. xvi. 34); and in whom was fulfilled the curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. vi. 26). Strabo speaks of this cursing of a destroyed city as an ancient custom, and instances the curses imprecated by Agamemnon and Croesus (Grot. Annot. ad Josh. vi. 26); Masius compares the cursing of Carthage by the Romans (Pol. Syn.). To rebuild was an impiety (cp. Dillmann² in loco). The term Bethelite (אֱלֹהִים בֵּית) is here rendered house or place of cursing (Ar., Syr., and Chald. Verss.), אֱלֹהִים בֵּית (Jon.); but there seems no reason for questioning the accuracy of the LXX. δ Βαυθελειτης, which is approved by most commentators and sanctioned by Gesen. (Lex. s. v.). The rebuilding of Jericho was perhaps an intrusion upon the kingdom of Jehoshaphat, but more emphatically a mark of the irreligiousness of the time (Speaker's Comm. on 1 K. i. c.). [T. E. B.] [F.]

HIERAPOLIS (Ἱεράπολις = sacred city). This place is mentioned only once in Scripture, and that incidentally, viz. in Col. iv. 13, where its church is associated with those of COLOSSAE and LAODICEA. Such association is just what we should expect; for the three towns were all in the valley of the Lycus, and within a few miles of one another. It is probable that Hierapolis was one of the "inlustres Asiae urbes" (Tac. Ann. xiv. 27) which, with Laodicea, were simultaneously desolated by an earthquake about the time when Christianity was established in this district. There is little doubt that the Church of Hierapolis was founded at the same time as that of Colossae, and that its characteristics in the Apostolic period were the same. Ramsay identifies Sibila as the native name of Hierapolis (Histor. Geography of Asia Minor, p. 450). Its modern name is Pambük-Kalesi. The most remarkable feature of the neighbourhood consists of the hot calcareous springs, which have deposited the vast and singular incrustations noticed by travellers. See, for instance, Chandler, Trav. in Asia Minor (1817), i. 264-272; Hamilton, Res. in A. M.

(1842), i. 507-522; Lewin, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 204 sq. The situation of Hierapolis is extremely beautiful; and its ruins are considerable, the theatre and gymnasium being the most conspicuous. [J. S. H.] [W.]

HIER'E-EL (Ἱερεήλ; Jeelech), 1 Esd. ix. 21. [Jehiel.]

HIER'EMOTH (Ἱερεμῶθ; Erimoth). 1. 1 Esd. ix. 27. [JEREMOTH.] 2. (Serimoth). 1 Esd. ix. 30. [RAMOTH.]

HIERIE'LUS (A. Ἱεζριήλος, i.e. Iezrielos; B. Ἱεζριήλος; Jezrelus), 1 Esd. ix. 27. This answers to JEHEL in the list of Ezra x.; but whence the A. V. obtained the form of the name does not appear

HIER'MAS (A. Ἱερμάς, B. Ἱεμῶς; Remias), 1 Esd. ix. 26. [RAMIAH.]

HIERON'YMUS (Ἱερώνυμος; Hieronymus), a Syrian general in the time of Antiochus V. Eupator (2 Macc. xii. 2). The name was made distinguished among the Asiatic Greeks by Hieronymus of Cardia, the historian of Alexander's successors. [B. F. W.]

HIERUSALEM, an early form (1611) for Jerusalem.

HIGGAION, or, more accurately, Higgāyōn, occurs in the Hebrew text of the Psalms twice (ix. 17; xcii. 4). It, and the words akin to it, have various significations, all of which however can be reduced to the common root Hagoh (הָגָה),—to think, to think aloud, to speculate, to speculate philosophically, to separate, to pronounce, to play fantasias. Most of these significations are to be met with in the Bible itself; others are found either in the canonical or non-canonical Mishnah (Mathnithā Bāraitā), and others again in the writers of the Middle Ages.

The word Higgayon is also found in composition, i.e. with the word Shir (שִׁיר) preceding it. In that case, by combination and assimilation, it stands as Shiggāyōn (שִׁירֵי שִׁירֵי),* Ps. vii., in the superscription, and signifies a song expressing deep thought, i.e. a philosophico-religious argument embodied in a Psalm. Inasmuch, however, as one or more of the various singing or music bands, which consisted of thousands of persons [HARP], excelled in one kind of song and music more than in another, that band or those bands which executed best the Shirē Higgāyōn, was or were called, by further contraction,

* That Shiggayon is a compound of Shir and Higgayon is too patent, one would have thought, to be questioned, as the verse itself shows (שִׁירֵי שִׁירֵי). Yet it has been actually questioned, chiefly on account of three elisions that would necessarily have taken place. But of these three elisions, the ו and the ה being well known to be the weakest letters in the alphabet, only one—that of the ג—presents a difficulty. But this even can only be a momentary one. See שִׁירֵי שִׁירֵי, which stands for שִׁירֵי שִׁירֵי, which, of course, stands for שִׁירֵי שִׁירֵי.

Shigyōnth (שִׁינֹת).^b It is to the director of that band or those bands (Habakkuk himself) that Habakkuk's sublime prayer was given, to be recited to the accompaniment of the prophet's own instrument Neginōth (נְגִינֹת), as is shown by the phrase 'Al Shigyōnth (עַל שִׁינֹת) at the beginning, and Lamenassēach Bineginōthai (לְמִנְצַח בְּנִינֹת) at the end.

Explanations differing from this are to be found in the Targumist and in Rashi, both of whom, however much they may differ in the application of the word, render Shigyōnth by ^b Shiggayōn and Shigyōnth are placed in close connexion by David Qimchi (on Hab. iii. 1).

“sins” or “errors.” Ibn Ezra, of course, takes Shigyōnth to be the commencement of a poem, the tune of which in ancient times was well known. Qimchi says that this prayer was composed in the style of one of the old hymns of the Psalter, and that Shigyōnth resembled Shiggayōn

(see above). Others say that Shigyōnth was a musical instrument. All these explanations, however, must be rejected on grounds sufficiently explained in ALJELETH SHAHAR, ALAMOTH, AL-TASCHITH, and GITTITH. [S. M. S.-S.]

HIGH PLACES (בָּמֹת; in the historical books, τὰ ὄρηλα, τὰ ὕψη; in the Prophets, βουαί; in the Pentateuch, στήλαι, Lev. xxvi. 30, &c.; and once εἰσωλα, Ezek. xvi. 16; Excelsa, fana). Other Hebrew words occasionally thus rendered are מִדֹּם (Prov. viii. 2); צָרִיחַ (1 Sam. xiii. 6); רָמָה (Ezek. xvi. 24), and שֵׁפֵץ (Num. xxiii. 3); but these words are never used in the technical sense of Bāmōth. From the earliest times it was the custom among all nations to erect altars and places of worship on lofty and conspicuous spots. We find that the Trojans sacrificed to Zeus on Mount Ida (Il. x. 171), and we are repeatedly told that such was the custom of the Persians, Greeks, Germans, &c., because they fancied that the hill-tops were nearer heaven, and therefore the most favourable places for prayer and incense (Herod. i. 131; Xen. Cyrop. viii. 7; Mem. iii. 8, § 10; Strab. xv. 732; Luc. de Sacrif. i. 4; Creuzer, Symb. i. 159; Andrian, Der Höhengultus asiat. u. europ. Völker, 1891). To this general custom we find constant allusion in the Bible (Is. lxxv. 7; Jer. iii. 6; Ezek. vi. 13, xviii. 6; Hos. iv. 13), and it is especially attributed to the Moabites (Is. xv. 2, xvi. 12; Jer. xlvi. 35). Even Abraham built an altar to the Lord on a mountain near Bethel (Gen. xii. 7, 8; cp. xxii. 2-4, xxxi. 54), which shows that the practice was then as innocent as it was natural; and although it afterwards became mingled with idolatrous observances (Num. xxiii. 3), it was in itself far less likely to be abused than the consecration of groves (Hos. iv. 13). The external religion of the Patriarchs was in some outward observances different from that subsequently established by the Mosaic Law, and therefore they should not be condemned for actions which afterwards became sinful only because they were forbidden (Heidegger, Hist. Patr. ii. iii. § 53).

It is, however, quite obvious that if every grove and eminence had been suffered to become a place for legitimate worship, especially in a country where they had already been defiled with the sins of polytheism, the utmost danger would have resulted to the pure worship of the one true God (Hävernick, Eiml. i. 592). It would infallibly have led to the adoption of nature-goddesses, and "gods of the hills" (1 K. xx. 23). It was therefore implicitly forbidden by the Law of Moses (Deut. xii. 11-14), which also gave the strictest injunction to destroy these monuments of Canaanitish idolatry (Lev. xxvi. 30; Num. xxxiii. 52; Deut. xxxiii. 29; ubi LXX. τραχήλων), without stating any general reason for this command, beyond the fact that they had been connected with such associations. It seems, however, to be assumed that every Israelite would perfectly understand why groves and high places were prohibited, and therefore they are only condemned by virtue of the injunction to use but one altar for the purposes of sacrifice (Lev. xvii. 3, 4; Deut. xii. passim, xvi. 21; John iv. 20).

The command was a prospective one, and was not to come into force until such time as the tribes were settled in the Promised Land, and "had rest from all their enemies round about." Thus we find that both Gideon and Manoah built altars on high places by Divine command (Judg. vi. 25, 26; xiii. 16-23), and it is quite clear from the tone of the Book of Judges that the law on the subject was either totally forgotten or practically obsolete. Nor could the unsettled state of the country have been pleaded as an excuse, since it seems to have been most fully understood, even during the life of Joshua, that burnt-offerings could be legally offered on one altar only (Josh. xxii. 29). It is more surprising to find this Law absolutely ignored at a much later period, when there was no intelligible reason for its violation—as by Samuel at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vii. 10) and at Bethlehem (xvi. 5); by Saul at Gilgal (xiii. 9) and at Ajalon (? xiv. 35); by David (1 Ch. xxi. 26); by Elijah on Mount Carmel (1 K. xviii. 30); and by other prophets (1 Sam. x. 5). To suppose that in all these cases the rule was superseded by a Divine intimation appears to us an unwarrantable expedient, the more so as the actors in the transactions do not appear to be aware of anything extraordinary in their conduct. The Rabbis have invented elaborate methods to account for the anomaly: thus they say that high places were allowed until the building of the Tabernacle; that they were then illegal until the arrival at Gilgal, and then during the period while the Tabernacle was at Shiloh; that they were once more permitted whilst it was at Nob and Gideon (cp. 2 Ch. i. 3), until the building of the Temple at Jerusalem rendered them finally unlawful (R. Sol. Jarchi, Abarbanel, &c., quoted in Carpov. App. Crit. p. 333 sq.; Reland, Ant. Hebr. i. 8 sq.). Others content themselves with saying that until Solomon's time all Palestine was considered holy ground, or that there existed a recognised exemption in favour of high places for private and spontaneous, though not for the stated and public, sacrifices.

Such explanations are sufficiently unsatisfactory; but it is at any rate certain that, whether from the obvious temptations to the disobedience, or from the example of other nations, or from ignorance of any definite law against it, the worship in high places was organised and all but universal throughout Judea, not only during (1 K. iii. 2-4), but even after the time of Solomon. The convenience of them was obvious, because, as local centres of religious worship, they obviated the unpleasant and dangerous necessity of visiting Jerusalem for the celebration of the yearly Feasts (2 K. xxiii. 9). The tendency was engrained in the national mind; and although it was severely reprobated by the later historians, we have no proof that it was known to be sinful during the earlier periods of the monarchy, except of course where it was directly connected with idolatrous abominations (1 K. xi. 7; 2 K. xxiii. 13). In fact the high places seem to have supplied the need of synagogues (Ps. lxxiv. 8), and to have obviated the extreme self-denial involved in having but one legalised locality for the highest forms of worship. Thus we find that Rehoboam established a definite worship at the high places, with its own peculiar and separated priesthood (2 Ch. xi. 15; 2 K. xxiii. 9), the members of which were still considered to be priests of Jehovah (although in 2 K. xxiii. 5 they are called by the opprobrious term בְּכֹרִים). It was therefore no wonder that Jeroboam found it so easy to seduce the people into his symbolic worship at the high places of Dan and Bethel, at each of which he built a chapel for his golden calves. Such chapels were of course frequently added to the mere altars on the hills, as appears from the expressions in 1 K. xi. 7, 2 K. xvii. 9, &c. Indeed the word בְּמֹת became so common that it was used for any idolatrous shrine even in a valley (Jer. vii. 31), or in the streets of cities (2 K. xvii. 9; Ezek. xvi. 31). These chapels were probably not structures of stone, but mere tabernacles hung with coloured tapestry (Ezek. xvi. 16; ἐμβόλιμα, Aqu., Theod.; Jer. ad loc.; εἰδωλον βαπτρον, LXX.), like the σκηνη ἱερᾶ of the Carthaginians (Diod. Sic. xx. 65; Gesen. Thes. i. 188), and like those mentioned in 2 K. xxiii. 7, Amos v. 26 (cp. Piepenbring, 'Hist. d. lieux d. culte en Israël' in Revue de l'hist. d. Religions, 1891, pp. 1-60, 133-186).

Many of the pious kings of Judah were either too weak or too ill-informed to repress the worship of Jehovah at these local sanctuaries, while they of course endeavoured to prevent it from being contaminated with polytheism. It is therefore appended as a matter of blame or a (perhaps venial) drawback to the character of some of the most pious princes, that they tolerated this disobedience to the provision of Deuteronomy and Leviticus. On the other hand it is mentioned as an aggravation of the sinfulness of other kings that they built or raised high places (2 Ch. xxi. 11; xxviii. 25), which are generally said to have been dedicated to idolatrous purposes. It is almost inconceivable that so direct a violation of the theocratic principle as the permitted existence of idol-worship at high places should have been tolerated by kings of even ordinary piety, much less by the highest sacerdotal authorities (2 K. xii. 3). When therefore we find the recurring phrase, "only the high places were not taken away; as yet the people did sacrifice and burn incense on the high places" (2 K. xiv. 4, xv. 5, 35; 2 Ch. xv. 17, &c.), we are forced to limit it (as above) to places dedicated to Jehovah only. The subject, however, is made more difficult by a double discrepancy, for the assertion that Asa "took away the high places" (2 Ch. xiv. 3) is opposed to what is stated in the First Book of Kings (xv. 14), and a similar discrepancy is found in the case of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xvii. 6; xx. 33). Moreover in both instances the chronicler is apparently at issue with himself (xiv. 3; xv. 17; xvii. 6; xx. 33). It is incredible that this should have been the result of carelessness or oversight, and we must therefore suppose, either that the earlier notices expressed the will and endeavour of these monarchs to remove the high places, and that the later ones recorded their failure in the attempt (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 468; Keil, Apolog. Versuch. p. 290; Winer, s. vv. Asa, Josaphat); or that the statements refer respectively to Bamoth, dedicated to Jehovah and to idols (Michaelis, Schulz, Bertheau on 2 Ch. xvii. 6, &c.). "Those devoted to false gods were removed, those misdevoted to the true God were suffered to remain. The kings opposed impiety, but winked at error" (Bishop Hall).

At last Hezekiah set himself in good earnest to the suppression of this prevalent corruption (2 K. xviii. 4, 22), both in Judah and Israel (2 Ch. xxxi. 1), although so rapid was the growth of the evil, that even his sweeping reformation required to be finally consummated by Josiah (2 K. xxiii.), and that too in Jerusalem and its immediate neighbourhood (2 Ch. xxxiv. 3). The measure must have caused a very violent shock to the religious prejudices of a large number of people, and we have a curious and almost unnoticed trace of this resentment in the fact that the Rabshakeh sent by Sennacherib appeals to the discontented faction, and represents Hezekiah as a dangerous innovator who had provoked God's anger by his arbitrary impiety (2 K. xviii. 22; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 12). After the time of Josiah we find no further mention of these Jehovistic high places. [F. W. F.]

HIGH-PRIEST, THE. The rendering in A. V. and R. V. of the title הַכֹּהֵן הַגָּדוֹל, "The great priest," in Lev. xxi. 10, Num. xxxv. 25, 28, Josh. xx. 6; the only places in the Hexateuch where the Hebrew phrase is found. It occurs also in 2 K. xii. 10, xxiii. 4, 8, xxiii. 4; 2 Ch. xxxiv. 9; Neh. iii. 1, 20, xiii. 28; Hag. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 2, 4; Zech. iii. 1, 8, vi. 11, and on Maccabean coins: but is not found in Judges and Samuel, nor in the great pre-exilic Prophets. The LXX. renders it ὁ ἱερεὺς ὁ μέγας. A synonymous expression is כֹּהֵן הַרְאִשׁ, 2 K. xxv. 18; 2 Ch. xix. 11, xxiv. 11, xxvi. 20; Jer. lii. 24: or הַכֹּהֵן רִאשׁוֹ, 1 Ch. xxvii. 5, or הַכֹּהֵן הַרְאִשׁ, 2 Ch. xxxi. 10, Ezra vii. 5, "The head priest," A. V. "The chief priest." But usually both in the Priestly Legislation and elsewhere the principal or representative priest is simply הַכֹּהֵן, "the priest," rendered ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς only in Lev. iv. 3, LXX., though this Greek term is frequent in Apoc. and N. T. (In the last period ex-high-priests, and even members of high-priestly families, are often so designated.) Vulg. Sacerdos magnus, or primus pontifex, princeps sacerdotum.

In treating of the office of high-priest among the Israelites, it will be convenient to consider it—I. Legally. II. Theologically. III. Historically.

I. The legal view of the high-priest's office comprises all that the Levitical Code ordains respecting it. The first distinct separation of Aaron to the office of the priesthood is described in Ex. xxviii. A partial anticipation of this call occurs at the gathering of the manna (ch. xvi. 33), when Moses bids Aaron take a pot of manna, and lay it up before the Lord, and Aaron lays it up "before the Testimony," i.e. the Ark (the construction of which, however, is not prescribed till ch. xxv.). The taking up of Nadab and Abihu with their father Aaron to the Mount, where they beheld the glory of the God of Israel, may also have been intended as a preparatory intimation of Aaron's hereditary priesthood (see also xxvii. 21). But it is not till the completion of the directions for making the Tabernacle and its furniture that the distinct order is given to Moses, "Take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him, from among the children of Israel, that he may minister unto Me in the priest's office, even Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron's sons" (Ex. xxviii. 1). And after the order for the priestly garments to be made "for Aaron and his sons," it is added, "and the priest's office shall be theirs for a perpetual statute; and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons," and "I will sanctify both Aaron and his sons to minister to Me in the priest's office". (xxix. 9, 44).

Aaron and his successors are distinguished from the other priests in the following respects:

(1.) Aaron alone is anointed. "He poured of the anointing oil upon Aaron's head, and anointed him to sanctify him" (Lev. viii. 12): whence one of the distinctive epithets of the high-priest is אֲנֻשׁ הַדְּבָרִים, "the anointed priest" (only in Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16; vi. 22 [Heb. 15]: cp. Num. xxxv. 25).^a So also in Ex. xxix. 29, 30, it is ordered that the one of the sons of Aaron who succeeds him in the priest's office shall wear the holy garments that were Aaron's for seven days, to be anointed therein, and to be installed in them. Hence Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. i. 6; Dem. Evang. viii.) understands by the "anointing" (χρίσμα) of Dan. ix. 26, LXX., that of the Jewish high-priests: "It means nothing else than the succession of high-priests, whom the Scripture commonly calls χριστάους, anointed;" and so too Tertullian and Theodoret (Rosenm. ad l. c.). The anointing of the sons of Aaron, i. e. the common priests, seems to have been confined to sprinkling their garments with the anointing oil (Ex. xxix. 21, xxviii. 41, &c.), though according to Kalisch on Ex. xxix. 8, and Lightfoot, following the Rabbinical interpretation, the difference consists in the abundant pouring of oil (שָׁן) on the head of the high-priest, from whence it was drawn with the finger into two streams, in the shape of a Greek X, while the priests were merely marked with the finger dipped in oil on the forehead (מָשַׁח).

But this is probably a late invention of the Rabbins. The anointing of the high-priest is alluded to in Ps. cxxxiii. 2: "It is like the precious ointment [oil; Ex. xxix. 7] upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard, that went down to the skirts of his garments." The composition of this anointing oil, consisting of myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, cassia and oil olive, is prescribed Ex. xxx. 22-25; and its use for any other purpose but that of anointing the priests, the Tabernacle and the vessels, is strictly prohibited (v. 33) on pain of being "cut off from one's fellow-tribesmen." The manufacture of it was entrusted to certain priests, called "apothecaries" (Neh. iii. 8). But this oil is said to have been wanting under the Second Temple (Prideaux, i. 151; Selden, cap. ix.).

(2.) The high-priest has a peculiar dress, which, as we have seen, passes to his successor at his death. This dress consisted of eight parts, as the Rabbins constantly note: the breastplate, the ephod with its "curious girdle," the robe of the ephod, the mitre, the broidered coat or diaper tunic, and the girdle, the materials being gold, blue, red, crimson, and fine (white) linen (Ex. xxviii. 4). To the above are added,

v. 42, the breeches or drawers (Lev. xvi. 4) of linen; and to make up the number eight, some reckon the high-priest's mitre, or the plate (כִּנֹּוֹת) separately from the bonnet; while others reckon the curious girdle of the ephod separately from the ephod.^b

Of these eight articles of attire, four—viz., the coat or tunic, the girdle, the breeches, and the bonnet or turban, כִּנֹּוֹת, instead of the mitre, מִצְנֵפֶת—belonged also to the common priests.

It is well known how, in the Assyrian sculptures, the king is in like manner distinguished by the shape of his head-dress; and how in Persia none but the king wore the cidaris or erect tiara.^c On some Babylonian seals also the priest wears a high conical hat or mitre, surmounting a sort of turban. Taking the articles of the high-priest's dress in the order in which they are enumerated above, we have (a) the breastplate, or, as it is further named, v. 15, 29, 30, the breastplate of judgment, or rather decision, אֲבִנֵי הַחֵן, τὰ λογίων (or λογείων) τῶν κρίσεων (or τῆς κρίσεως), "the Oracle of Decision," in the LXX., and only in v. 4, τὸ περιστήθιον. It was, like the inner curtains of the Tabernacle, the yail, and the ephod, of "cunning work," מְעֵשֶׁת הַשֵּׁב (strictly, "a work of a weaver in colours"); "opus plumarium," and "arte plumaria," Vulg. [See EMBROIDERER.] The breastplate was originally 2 spans long and 1 span broad, but when doubled it was square, the shape in which it was worn. It was fastened at the top by rings and chains of wreathen gold to the two onyx stones on the shoulders, and beneath with two other rings and a lace of blue to two corresponding rings in the ephod, to keep it fixed in its place, above the curious girdle. But the most remarkable and most important part of this breastplate were the 12 precious stones, set in 4 rows, 3 in a row, thus corresponding to the 12 tribes, and divided in the same manner as their camps were; each stone perhaps having the name of one of the children of Israel engraved upon it. Whether the order followed the ages of the sons of Israel, or, as seems most probable, the order of the encampment, may be doubted; but unless any appropriate distinct symbolism of the different tribes be found in the names of the precious stones, the question can scarcely be decided. According to Josephus, it was these stones which constituted the Urim and Thummim; but Josephus merely guesses, probably from the literal meaning of the term Urim, the nature of things which had ceased to exist centuries before his time. His opinion, improved upon by the Rabbins, as to the manner in which the stones gave out the oracular answer, by preternatural illumination, is, besides, intrinsically destitute of probability. That the Urim and Thummim were

^b In Lev. viii. 7-12 there is a complete account of the putting on of these garments by Aaron, and the whole ceremony of his consecration and that of his sons. It there appears distinctly that, besides the girdle common to all the priests, the high-priest also wore the curious girdle of the ephod.

^c Josephus, however, whom Bähr follows, calls the bonnets of the priests by the name of מִצְנֵפֶת. See below.

^d Bähr compares also the spices of the flamen Dialis.

^a Lev. iv. may be of more recent origin than Ex. xxix. See Driver, LOT., p. 40.

material objects is evident from the fact that they were put into the Breastplate of Decision (Ex. xxviii. 30; Lev. viii. 8). The Heb. names תְּמִימִים וְאִרִּים, "Light and Conclusion" (= Decision),* rather describe their use or purpose than their precise nature. It is, however, clear from the context of various passages in the Historical Books that the Urim and Thummim were means of divining the Will of Jahvah, and probably a species of sacred lot. The passage which seems decisive is 1 Sam. xiv. 41, 42. The former verse in the Heb. text is evidently mutilated, but in the LXX. (and Vulgate) runs as follows: "O Lord, the God of Israel, wherefore hast Thou not answered Thy servant this day? If the iniquity be in me, or in Jonathan my son, give Urim; and if it be in Thy people Israel, give Thummim." After this prayer Saul bids the priest (cp. v. 36) cast the sacred lots between him and his son. Other passages which should be compared with this are 1 Sam. ii. 18, 28; xiv. 3, 18 [LXX.]; xxi. 9; xxii. 18; xxiii. 6, 9; xxx. 7; 2 Sam. vi. 14; 1 Ch. xv. 27; Deut. xxxiii. 8 (see Kuenen, Rel. of Isr., i. 96-100).^f

Apart from its ornamental purpose (Ex. xxviii. 2, "for glory and for beauty"; cp. Eccus. xlv. 7 sq., l.), the chief use of the breastplate seems to have been to serve as a receptacle for the Urim and Thummim. Its Heb. name תְּמִימִים וְאִרִּים, according to the opinion of Gesenius, who connects תְּמִימִים with حَسَن II. ornavit, covers both uses. The passage Ex. xxviii. 30 b, which belongs to the Priestly Legislation, may be paraphrased: "And Aaron shall bear the oracle (strictly means of decision) of the benê Israel upon his heart before Jahvah continually."

(b.) The Ephod (אֶפֶד). This consisted of two parts, of which one covered the back, and the other the front, i.e. the breast and upper part of the body. These were clasped together on the shoulder with two large onyx stones, each having engraved on it six of the names of the tribes of Israel. It was further united by a "curious girdle" (R. V. "cunningly woven band") of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined old linen round the waist. Upon it was placed the breastplate of judgment, which in fact was a part of the ephod, and included in the term in such passages as 1 Sam. ii. 28, xiv. 3, xxiii. 9, and was fastened to it just above the "curious girdle" of the ephod. Linen ephods

* The root תָּמַם denotes finishing and ending; so that תְּמִימִים, as the name of a sacred oracle, is practically equivalent to תְּמִימִים, Judgment or Decision. The LXX. rendering, θῆλοσις και ἀλήθεια, is somewhat paraphrastic.

^f Kuenen argues, mainly from 1 Sam. ii. 28, Deut. xxxiii. 8, that in the earlier period the consultation of Jahvah by Ephod and Urim and Thummim belonged to the priests in general; giving oracles being the priest's proper task, as his name כַּהֵן (= كاهن, kahîn, "soothsayer") implied. On the question of the form of the Urim and Thummim, he refers to Kell, HB.A., i. 169, and Knobel, Exodus and Levit. p. 288. It is a probable inference from Hos. iii. 4, Judg. xvii. 5 (cp. xviii. 5), that they were little images like the Teraphim.

were also worn by other priests (1 Sam. xxii. 18), by Samuel, who was a temple servant (1 Sam. ii. 18), and by David when bringing up the Ark (2 Sam. vi. 14). The expression for wearing an ephod is "girded with a linen ephod." The ephod was also frequently used in the local and family worship of the Israelites. See Judg. viii. 27, xvii. 5, xviii. 17-20; Hos. iii. 4. [EPHOD; GIRDLE.] (The inference which many have drawn from these passages, that ephod also denoted a plated image, is neither necessary nor probable. Cp. Kuenen, RI. i. 99, 100.)

(c.) The Robe of the ephod (מִעֵיל). This was of inferior material to the ephod itself, being all of blue (v. 31), which implied its being only of "woven work" (מְעֵשֶׂה אֲרָנִי), xxxix. 22). It was worn immediately under the ephod, and was longer than it, though not so long as the "broidered coat," or rather chequered tunic (בְּתִשְׁבֹּת תִּשְׁבֹּת), according to some statements (Bähr, Winer, Kalisch, &c.). The Greek rendering, however, of מִעֵיל, σάκος, and Josephus's description of it (B. J. v. 5, § 7), seem to outweigh the reasons given by Bähr for thinking the robe only came down to the knees, and to make it improbable that the tunic should have been seen below the robe. It seems likely therefore that the sleeves of the tunic, of white diaper linen, were the only parts of it which were visible, in the case of the high-priest, when he wore the blue robe over it. For the blue robe had no sleeves, but only slits in the sides for the arms to come through. It had a hole for the head to pass through, with a border round it of woven work, to prevent its being rent. The skirt of this robe had a remarkable trimming of pomegranates in blue, red, and crimson, with a bell of gold between each pomegranate alternately. The bells were to give a sound when the high-priest went in and came out of the Holy Place. Josephus in the Antiquities gives no explanation of the use of the bells, but merely speaks of the studied beauty of their appearance. In his Jewish War, however, he tells us that the bells signified thunder, and the pomegranates lightning. For Philo's very curious observations, see Lightfoot's Works, ii. p. 25.

Neither does the son of Sirach very distinctly explain it (Eccus. xlv. 9), who in his description of the high-priest's attire seems chiefly impressed with its beauty and magnificence, and says of this trimming, "He compassed him with pomegranates and with many golden bells round about, that as he went there might be a sound, and a noise made that might be heard in the temple, for a memorial (or reminder) to the children of his people." It is his gloss upon Ex. xxviii. 35. Perhaps he means to intimate that the use of the bells was to give notice to the people outside, when the high-priest went in and came out of the sanctuary, as Whiston, Vatablus, and many others have supposed. But it would be quite consistent with the other strong anthropomorphisms of the Pentateuch to suppose that the object was to give due warning to the Divine Occupant of the inner shrine.

(d.) The fourth article peculiar to the high-priest is the mitre or upper turban, with its gold plate, engraved with HOLINESS TO THE LORD, fastened to it by a ribbon of blue. Josephus applies the term Πρηγῶν (μασναμφθῆς) to the turbans of the common priests as well, but says that in addition to this, and sewn on to the top of it, the high-priest had another turban of blue; that besides this he had outside the turban a triple crown of gold, consisting, that is, of three rims one above the other, and terminating at top in a kind of conical calyx, like the inverted calyx of the herb hysocyanus. Josephus doubtless gives a true account of the high-priest's turban as worn in his day. It may be fairly conjectured that the crown was appended when the Hasmoneans united the temporal monarchy with the priesthood, and that this was continued, though in a modified shape,* after the sovereignty was taken from them. Josephus also describes the πέταλον, the lamina or gold plate, which he says covered the forehead of the high-priest. In Ant. viii. 3, § 8, he says that the identical gold plate made in the days of Moses existed in his time; and Whiston adds in a note that it was still preserved in the time of Origen, and that the inscription on it was engraved in "Samaritan" characters (Ant. iii. 7, § 6). But this would be far indeed from proving that the plate was as old as "the days of Moses." It may have been a relic of the Maccabean revival. R. Eliezer, who flourished in Hadrian's reign, saw it at Rome. It was doubtless placed, with other spoils of the Temple, in the temple of Peace, which was burnt down in the reign of Commodus. These spoils, however, are expressly mentioned as part of Alaric's plunder when he took Rome. They were carried by Genseric into Africa, and brought by Belisarius to Byzantium, where they adorned his triumph. On the warning of a Jew the emperor ordered them back to Jerusalem, but what became of them is not known (Reland, de Spoliis Templi).

(e.) The broidered coat (R. V. "coat of chequer work"), צָבִיבֵי תָּבִיבֵי, was a tunic or long shirt of linen with a tessellated or diaper pattern, like the setting of a stone. The girdle, אֲבִנֵי, also of linen, was wound round the body several times from the breast downwards, and the ends hung down to the ankles. The linen (or cotton?) breeches or drawers, מְכַסְּי־בָרַךְ (= מְכַסְּי־בָרַךְ), Ezek. xlv. 18), covered the loins and thighs; and the bonnet or תְּפִלָּה־כִּנֹּרֶת was a turban of linen, partially covering the head, but not in the form of a cone like that of the high-priest when the mitre was added to it. These four last were common to all priests. Josephus speaks of the robes (ἐσθῆματα) of the chief priests, and the tunics and girdles of the priests, as forming part of the spoil of the Temple (B. J. vi. 8, § 3). According to the Priestly Code, Aaron, and at his death Eleazar (Num. xx. 22-29 P.), and their successors in the high-priesthood, were solemnly inaugurated into their office by being clad in these eight articles of dress on seven successive days. From the time of the Second Temple, when the sacred oil (said to have been hid by Josiah, and lost) was wanting, this putting on of the garments was deemed the official investiture of the office. Hence the robes, which had always been kept in one of the chambers of the Temple, and were by Hyrcanus deposited in the Baris, which he built on purpose, were kept by Herod in the same tower, which he called Antonia, so that they might be at his absolute disposal. The Romans did the same till the government of Vitellius in the reign of Tiberius, when the custody of the robes was restored to the Jews (Ant. xv. 11, § 4; xviii. 4, § 3).

(3.) Aaron has peculiar functions assigned to him in the Priestly Legislation. To him alone it appertains, and he alone is permitted, to enter the Holy of Holies, which he does once a year, on the great Day of Atonement, when he sprinkles the blood of the sin-offering on the mercy-seat, and burns incense within the veil (Lev. xvi.). He is said by the Talmudists, with whom agree Lightfoot, Selden, Grotius, Winer, Bähr, and many others, not to have worn his full pontifical robes on this occasion, but to have been clad entirely in white linen (Lev. xvi. 4, 32). It is singular, however, that on the other hand Josephus says that the great fast day was the chief, if not the only day in the year, when the high-priest wore all his robes (B. J. v. 5, § 7); and in spite of the alleged impropriety of his wearing his splendid apparel on a day of humiliation, it seems far more probable that on the one occasion when he performed functions peculiar to the high-priest, he should have worn his full dress. Josephus too could not have been mistaken as to the fact, which he repeats (cont. Ap. lib. ii. § 8), where he says the high-priests alone might enter into the Holy of Holies, "propria stola circumamicti." For although Selden,^b who strenuously supports the Rabbinical statement that the high-priest wore only the four linen garments when he entered the Holy of Holies, endeavours to make Josephus say the same thing, it is impossible to twist his words into this meaning. It is true, on the other hand, that Lev. xvi. distinctly prescribes that Aaron should wear the four priestly garments of linen when he entered into the Holy of Holies, and put them off immediately he came out, and leave them in the Temple; no one being present in the Temple while Aaron made the atonement (v. 17). Either therefore in the time of Josephus this law was not kept in practice, or else we must reconcile the manifest contradiction by supposing that in consequence of the great jealousy with which the high-priest's robes were kept by the civil power at this time, the custom had arisen for him to wear them, not even always on the three great Festivals (Ant. xviii. 4, § 3), but only on the great day of expiation. Clad in this gorgeous attire, he would enter the Temple in presence of all the people; and after having performed in secret, as the Law required, the rites of expiation in the linen dress, he would resume his pontifical robes and so appear again in public. Thus his wearing the robes would easily come to be identified chiefly with the Day of Atonement; and this is perhaps the most probable explanation.¹ In other respects the high-priest performed the functions of a priest on new moons and sabbaths and annual festivals (Jos. B. J. v. 5, § 7), and on such solemn occasions as the dedication of the Temple under Zerubbabel. [ATONEMENT, DAY OF.] He was legally bound to officiate only on the Day of Atonement; though later usage required him also to offer the daily sacrifice throughout the previous week (Joma, i. 2). Otherwise he was free to sacrifice or not as he pleased (ibid.; Tamid, vii. 3). See Schürer, II. i. p. 255.

* Josephus (Ant. ix. 10) says that Pompey would not allow Hyrcanus to wear the diadem, when he restored him to the high-priesthood.

^b Selden himself remarks (cap. vii. in fin.) that Josephus and others always describe the pontifical robes by the name of τῆς στολῆς ἀρχιερατικῆς.

(4.) The high-priest has a peculiar place in the law of the manslayer, and his taking sanctuary in the cities of refuge. The manslayer might not leave the city of refuge during the lifetime of the existing high-priest who was anointed with the holy oil (Num. xxxv. 25, 28; Josh. xx. 6). It was also forbidden to the high-priest to follow a funeral, or rend his clothes for the dead, according to the precedent in Lev. x. 6.

The other respects in which the high-priest exercised superior functions to the other priests arose rather from his position and opportunities, than from the legally defined duties of his office, and they consequently varied with the personal character and abilities of the high-priest. Such were reforms in religion, restorations of the Temple and its service (which, however, really depended on the royal will during the period of the monarchy), the preservation of the Temple from intrusion or profanation, taking the lead in ecclesiastical or civil affairs, judging the people, presiding in the Sanhedrin (which, however, he is said by Lightfoot rarely to have done), and other similar transactions, in which we find the high-priest sometimes prominent, sometimes not even mentioned (see the historical part of this article). Even that portion of power which most naturally and usually fell to his share, the rule of the Temple, and the government of the priests and Levites who ministered there, did not invariably fall to the share of the high-priest. For the title "Ruler of the House of God," גִּיד בֵּית הָאֱלֹהִים, which usually denotes the high-priest, is sometimes given to those who were not high-priests, as e.g. to Pashur the son of Immer in Jer. xx. 1 (cp. 1 Ch. xii. 27). The Rabbins speak very frequently of one second in dignity to the high-priest, whom they call the Sagan or Segen (a term of Babylonian origin), and who often acted in the high-priest's room.² He is identified (see Buxtorf, s. c.) with "the second priest" (2 K. xxiii. 4, xxv. 18). They say that Moses was Sagan to Aaron; a summary mode of getting rid of the difficulties inherent in the traditional view of their official relations. Thus too it is explained of Annas and Caiaphas (Luke iii. 2), that Annas was Sagan. Ananias is also thought by some to have been Sagan, acting for the high-priest (Acts xxiii. 2). In like manner they say (unhistorically) that Zadok and Abiathar were high-priest and Sagan in the time of David. The Sagan is also very frequently called Memunneh, or Prefect of the Temple; and upon him chiefly lay the care and charge of the Temple services (Lightfoot, passim). If the high-priest was incapacitated from officiating by any accidental uncleanness, the Sagan took his place. Thus, e.g., the Jerusalem Talmud tells a story of Simon son of Kamith, that "on the eve of the day of expiation [Atonement], he went out to speak with the king, and some spittle fell upon his garments and defiled him: therefore Judah his brother went in on the day of expiation, and served in his stead; and so their mother Kamith saw two of her sons high-priests in one day. She had seven sons, and they all served in the high-priesthood" (Lightfoot, ix. 35). It does not appear by whose authority the high-priests were appointed to their office before there were kings of Israel [see under III. infra]. It was invariably done by the civil power in later times; the principal priest of the Temple of Jerusalem being, in fact, the servant of the sovereign, whose palace adjoined the sanctuary, and who appointed and deposed him at pleasure (cp. 1 Sam. ii. 35, "mine Anointed" = the king; 1 K. ii. 27; Ezek. xliii. 8). The installation and anointing of the high-priest or clothing him with the eight garments, which was the formal investiture, is naturally enough ascribed by Maimonides to the Sanhedrin at all times (Lightfoot, ix. 22).

It should be added, that the usual age for entering upon the functions of the priesthood, according to 2 Ch. xxxi. 17, is considered to have been twenty years, though a priest or high-priest was not actually incapacitated if he had attained to puberty, as appears by the example of Aristobulus, who was high-priest at seventeen. Onias, the son of Simon the Just, could not be high-priest, because he was but a child at his father's death. Again, according to Lev. xxi. 18-20, no one that had a blemish could officiate at the altar. The twelve blemishes there enumerated are expanded by the Talmud into one hundred and forty-two. Josephus relates how Antigonus mutilated Hyrcanus's ears, to incapacitate him for being restored to the high-priesthood. Illegitimate birth was also a bar to the high-priesthood, and the subtlety of Jewish distinctions extended this illegitimacy to being born of a mother who had been taken captive by heathen conquerors (Joseph. c. Apion. i. § 7). Thus Eleazar said to John Hyrcanus (though, Josephus says, falsely) that if he was a just man, he ought to resign the pontificate, because his mother had been a captive, and he was therefore incapacitated. Lev. xxi. 13, 14 was taken as the ground of this and similar disqualifications. For a full account of this branch of the subject, the reader is referred to Selden's learned treatises De Successionibus, &c., and De

² There is a controversy as to whether the deputy high-priest was the same as the Sagan. Lightfoot thinks not. So also Schürer, who points out that the term, which in the O. T. occurs only in the plural, is mostly rendered στρατηγός by the LXX., and identifies the Sagan with the στρατηγός τοῦ ἱεροῦ, or "Captain of the Temple." Acts iv. 1; v. 24, 26 (see Schürer, ii. i. 257 sq.). The word appears to be identical with the Assyrio-Babylonian šakanu, šakan, "one appointed," "officer," "deputy," or the like. See Is. xli. 25, and Schrader, KAT. 2 ad loc.

Success. in Pontif. Ebraeor.; and to Prideaux, ii. 306. It was the universal opinion of the Jews that the deposition of a high-priest, which became so common, was unlawful. Josephus (Ant. xv. 3) says that Antiochus Epiphanes was the first who did so, when he deposed Jesus or Jason; Aristobulus, who deposed his brother Hyrcanus, the second; and Herod, who took away the high-priesthood from Ananelus to give it to Aristobulus, the third. See the story of Jonathan son of Ananus in Ant. xix. 6, § 4.

II. Theologically. The theological view of the high-priesthood does not fall within the scope of this Dictionary. It may, however, be stated that such a view would embrace the consideration of the office, dress, functions, and ministrations of the high-priest, considered as typical of the priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and as setting forth under shadows the truths which are openly taught under the Gospel. This has been done to a great extent in the Epistle to the Hebrews, and is occasionally done in other parts of Scripture, as, e.g., Rev. i. 13, where the ἰσθῆνες, and the girdle about the paps, are distinctly the robe, and the curious girdle of the ephod, characteristic of the high-priest. It would also embrace all the moral and spiritual teaching supposed to be intended by such symbols. Philo (de vitâ Mosis), Origen (Homil. in Levit.), Eusebius (Demonst. Evang. lib. iii.); Epiphanius (cont. Melchized. iv. &c.), Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. i., Eliæ Cretens., and Comment. p. 195), Augustine (Quæst. in Exod.) may be cited among many others of the ancients who have more or less thus treated the subject. Of moderns, Bähr (Symbolik des Mosaischen Cultus), Fairbairn (Typology of Script.), Kalisch (Comment. on Exod.) have entered fully into this subject, both from the Jewish and Christian point of view.

III. To pass to the historical view of the subject. The history of the high-priests embraces a period of about fourteen centuries, and a succession of about eighty high-priests, beginning with Aaron and ending with Phannias, according to the traditional view, which rests ultimately upon the statements of the Priestly Code. "The number of all the high-priests," says Josephus, "from Aaron . . . until Phannias . . . was eighty-three" (Ant. xx. 10, where he gives a comprehensive account of them). They naturally arrange themselves into three groups—(a.) those before David; (b.) those from David to the Captivity; (c.) those from the return from the Babylonish Captivity till the cessation of the office at the destruction of Jerusalem. The former two have come down to us in the canonical Books of Scripture, and so have a few of the earliest and the latest names of the third group; but for by far the larger portion of the latter group we have only the authority of Josephus, the Talmud, and some other profane writers.

(a.) The high-priests of the first group (or those who are commonly regarded as such) are—1. Aaron; 2. Eleazar; 3. Phinehas; 4. Eli; 5. Ahitub (1 Ch. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11; 1 Sam. xiv. 3); 6. Abiah; 7. Ahimelech (on the assumption that he was not identical with Ahiah or rather Ahijah, which Ewald regards as certain; cp. 1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18, xxi. 1, xxii. 9.

See Ewald, HI. ii. 415, n. 3). Phinehas the son of Eli, and father of Ahitub, died before his father, and so was not high-priest. Of the above the first three succeeded in regular order; Nadab and Abihu, Aaron's eldest sons, having died in the wilderness (Lev. x.). But Eli, the fourth, was of the line of Ithamar according to Josephus (Ant. v. 11, § 5; cp. 1 Ch. xxiv. 2, 3). What was the exact interval between the death of Phinehas and the accession of Eli, what led to the transference of the chief priesthood from the line of Eleazar to that of Ithamar, and whether any, or which, of the descendants of Eleazar between Phinehas and Zadok (seven in number, according to 1 Ch. vi. 4-8, viz. Abishua, Bukki, Uzzi, Zerachiah, Meraioth, Amariah, Ahitub) were high-priests, we have no means of determining from Scripture. In Judg. xx. 28, we see Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, priest at Beth-el (cp. v. 26); and 1 Sam. i. 3, 9, finds Eli high-priest at Shiloh, with two grown-up sons priests under him. The only clue is to be found in the genealogies, by which it appears that Phinehas was sixth in succession from Levi, while Eli, supposing him to be the same generation as Samuel's grandfather, would be tenth. If however Phinehas lived, as is possible, to a great old age, and Eli, as his age admits, be placed about half a generation backward, a very small interval will remain. Josephus asserts (Ant. viii. 1, § 3) that the father of Bukki—whom he calls Joseph, and (Ant. v. 11, § 5) Abiezer, instead of Abishua—was the last high-priest of Phinehas's line, before Zadok. This is perhaps a true tradition, though Josephus, with characteristic levity,¹ does not adhere to it in the above passage of his 5th book, where he makes Bukki and Uzzi to have been both high-priests, and Eli to have succeeded Uzzi; or in bk. xx. 10, where he reckons the high-priests before Zadok and Solomon to have been thirteen (a reckoning which includes apparently all Eleazar's descendants down to Ahitub), and adds Eli and his son Phinehas, and Abiathar, whom he calls Eli's grandson. If Abishua died, leaving a son or grandson under age, Eli, as head of the line of Ithamar, might have become high-priest as a matter of course, or he might have been appointed by the elders.² His having judged Israel forty years (1 Sam. iv. 18) marks him as a man of ability. If Ahiah and Ahimelech are not variations of the name of the same person, they must have been brothers, since both were sons of Ahitub. The high-priests then before

² No instance of such a mode of appointment can be cited from the Historical Books. But the grand difficulty is that while on the one hand no trace is to be found of the priesthood of Abishua, Bukki, &c., nor even of their existence, in the Books of Judges and Samuel, on the other hand the immediate predecessors of Eli, and Eli himself and his successors in the priesthood, are omitted from the Chronicler's apparently complete list of hereditary high-priests from Aaron to the Exile (1 Ch. vi. 8-15).

David's reign may be set down as eight (but vid. supr.) in number, of whom seven are inferred from Scripture to have been high-priests, and one is said to have been such by Josephus alone. The bearing of this on the chronology of the times from the Exodus to David, tallying as it does with the number of the ancestors of David, is too important to be passed over in silence. It must also be noted that the Tabernacle, during the high-priesthood of Aaron's successors of this first group, was pitched at Shiloh in the tribe of Ephraim; a fact which marks the strong influence which the temporal power already had in ecclesiastical affairs, since Ephraim was Joshua's tribe, as Judah was David's (Josh. xxiv. 30, 33; Judg. xx. 27, 28, xxi. 21; 1 Sam. i. 3, 9, 24, iv. 3, 4, xiv. 3, &c.; Ps. lxxviii. 60). This strong influence and interference of the secular power is manifest throughout the subsequent history. This first period was also marked by the calamity which befell the high-priests as the guardians of the Ark, in its capture by the Philistines. This probably suspended all inquiries by Urim and Thummim, which were made before the Ark (1 Ch. xiii. 3: cp. Judg. xx. 27, 1 Sam. vii. 2, xiv. 18),^a and must have greatly diminished the influence of the high-priests, on whom the largest share of the humiliation which was popularly seen in the name Ichabod^b would naturally fall. The rise of Samuel as a prophet at this very time, and his paramount influence and importance in the State, to the entire eclipsing of Ahiah the priest, coincides remarkably with the absence of the Ark and the means of inquiring by Urim and Thummim.

(b.) Passing to the second group, we begin with the unexplained circumstance of there being two priests in the reign of David, apparently of nearly equal authority, viz. Zadok and Abiathar (1 Ch. xv. 11; 2 Sam. viii. 17). Indeed it is only from the deposition of Abiathar, and the placing of Zadok in his room, by Solomon (1 K. ii. 35), that we are able to infer that Abiathar was the high-priest, and Zadok the second. Zadok was son of Ahitub,^c of the line of Eleazar (1 Ch. vi. 8), and the first mention of him is in 1 Ch. xii. 28 as "a young man, mighty in valour," who joined David in Hebron after Saul's death, with twenty-two captains of his father's house. It is therefore not unlikely that after the death of Ahimelech and the secession of Abiathar to David, Saul may have made Zadok priest, so far as it was possible for him to do it in the absence of the Ark and the high-priest's robes, and that David may have avoided the difficulty of deciding between the claims of his faithful friend Abiathar and his new and important ally Zadok (who perhaps was the means of attaching to David's cause the 4,600 Levites and the 3,700 priests who are said to have come under Jehoiada their captain, vs. 26, 27),^d by appointing them to a joint priesthood: the first place, with the ephod, and Urim and Thummim, remaining with Abiathar, who was in actual possession of them. Certain it is that from this time Zadok and Abiathar are constantly named together, and singularly Zadok always first, both in the Book of Samuel and that of Kings. We can, however, trace very clearly up to a certain point the division of the priestly offices and dignities between them, coinciding as it did with the divided state of the Levitical worship in David's time. For we learn from 1 Ch. xvi. 1-7, 37 compared with vs. 39, 40, and yet more distinctly from 2 Ch. i. 3, 4, 5, that the Tabernacle and the Brazen Altar made by Moses and Bezaleel in the wilderness were at this time at Gibeon, while the Ark was at Jerusalem, in the separate tent made for it by David. [GIBEON, p. 1181.] Now Zadok the priest and his brethren the priests were left "before the Tabernacle . . . at Gibeon; to offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord . . . morning and evening, and to do according to all that is written in the law of the Lord" (1 Ch. xvi. 39, 40). It is therefore obvious to conclude that Abiathar had special charge of the Ark and the services connected with it, which agrees exactly with the possession of the ephod^e by Abiathar, and his previous position with David before he became king of Israel, as well as with what we are told in 1 Ch. xxvii. 34, that Jehoiada and Abiathar were the king's counsellors next to Ahithophel. Residence at Jerusalem with the Ark, and the privilege of inquiring of the Lord before the Ark, both well suit his office of counsellor. Abiathar, however, forfeited his place by taking part with Adonijah against Solomon, and Zadok was made high-priest in his room. The pontificate was thus again consolidated, and transferred permanently from the line of Ithamar to that of Eleazar. This is the only instance recorded of the deposition of a high-priest (which became common in later times, especially under Herod and the Romans) during this second period. It was the fulfilment of the prophetic denunciations of the sin of Eli's sons (1 Sam. ii. iii.).

The first considerable difficulty that meets us in the historical survey of the high-priests of the second group is to ascertain who was high-priest at the dedication of Solomon's Temple. Josephus (Ant. x. 8, § 6) asserts that Zadok was, and the Seder Olam makes him the high-priest in the reign of Solomon. But first it is very improbable that Zadok, who must

^a But the true reading of 1 Sam. xiv. 18 is preserved by the Sept.: "And Saul said unto Ahijah, Bring hither the ephod; for he (Ahijah) wore the ephod at that time before the benê Israel." It does not appear that the Ark was necessary to the consultation of Jahvah by Urim and Thummim (1 Sam. xxiii. 6, 9; xxx. 7, 8; vs. 38-42. Vid. supr.). See Driver's Samuel ad loc.

^b Ichabod is a name formed like Ithamar, and probably means "man of glory" (Heb. ish kâbôd). See Ewald, Lehrb. § 273.

^c But Ahitub appears in 1 Sam. xiv. 3, xxii. 9, 20, as father of Ahijah-Ahimelech and grandfather of Abiathar, Zadok's rival, of the house of Eli and line of Ithamar.

^d The numbers are very surprising, in view of the comparative paucity of priests in the preceding history (Judges, Samuel). See Wellhausen, II. p. 174. The Chronicler and his principal source in all good faith antedate many things, owing to the very natural desire of finding an indefeasible sanction for present institutions in the venerable past.

^e But "Zadok and his brethren" at Gibeon must, as priests, have worn the ephod (1 Sam. ii. 28, xxii. 18). See Kuenen, RI. i. 97.

have been very old at Solomon's accession (being David's contemporary), should have lived to the eleventh year of his reign; and next, 1 K. iv. 2 distinctly asserts that Azariah the son of Zadok was priest under Solomon, and 1 Ch. vi. 10 tells us of Azariah,* "he it is that executed the priest's office in the Temple that Solomon built in Jerusalem," obviously meaning at its first completion. We can hardly therefore be wrong in saying that Azariah the son (so 1 Ch. vi. 9; and brother, according to 2 Sam. xviii. 19, 1 K. iv. 2) of Ahimaaz was the first high-priest of Solomon's Temple. The non-mention of him in the account of the dedication of the Temple, even where one would most have expected it (as 1 K. viii. 3, 6, 10, 11, 14, 55, 62; 2 Ch. v. 7, 11, &c.), and the prominence given to Solomon—the civil power—are certainly remarkable. Cp. also 2 Ch. viii. 14, 15. The probable inference is that Azariah had no great personal qualities or energy.¹ In constructing the list of the succession of priests of this group, our method must be to compare the genealogical list in 1 Ch. vi. 8-15 (A. V.) with the notices of high-priests in the sacred history, and with the list given by Josephus, who, it must be remembered, had access to the lists preserved in the archives at Jerusalem: testing the whole by the application of the ordinary rules of genealogical succession. Now as regards the genealogy, it is seen at once that there is something defective; for whereas from David to Jehoniah there are twenty kings, from Zadok to Jehozadak there are but thirteen priests. Moreover the passage in question was perhaps not intended for a list of the actual high-priests, but to give the pedigree of Jehozadak. Then again, while the pedigree in its first six generations from Zadok, inclusive, exactly suits the history—for it makes Amariah the sixth priest, while the history (2 Ch. xix. 11) tells us he lived in Jehoshaphat's reign, who was the sixth king from David, inclusive; and while the same pedigree in its last five generations also suits the history—inasmuch as it places Hilkiah the son of Shallum fourth from the end, and the history tells us he lived in the reign of Josiah, the fourth king from the end—yet is there a great gap in the middle. For between Amariah, the high-priest in Jehoshaphat's reign, and Shallum the father of Hilkiah, the high-priest in Josiah's reign—an interval of over two centuries—there are but two names, Ahitub and Zadok, and these liable to the utmost suspicion from their reproducing the same sequence which occurs in the earlier part of the same genealogy—Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok. Besides which they are not mentioned by Josephus. This part therefore of the pedigree is useless for our purpose. But the narrative of Kings and Chronicles supplies us with four or five names for this interval, viz. Jehoiaada in the reigns of Athaliah and Joash, and probably still earlier; Zechariah his son; Azariah in the reign of Uzziah; Urijah in the reign of Ahaz; and Azariah in the reign of Hezekiah. If, however, in the genealogy of 1 Ch. vi. 13, 14, Azariah and Hilkiah have been accidentally transposed, as is not unlikely, then the Azariah who was high-priest in Hezekiah's reign (2 Ch. xxxi. 10) may possibly be that Azariah. Putting the additional historical names at four, and deducting the two suspicious names from the genealogy, we have fifteen high-priests indicated in Scripture as contemporary with the twenty kings, with room, however, for one or two more in the history.² Turning to Josephus, we find his list of seventeen high-priests (whom he reckons as eighteen [Ant. xi. 10], as do also the Rabbins) in places exceedingly corrupt; a corruption sometimes caused by the end of one name sticking on to the beginning of the following (as in Axiormus), sometimes apparently by substituting the name of the contemporary king or prophet for that of the high-priest, as Joel and Jotham. Perhaps, however, Sudeas, who corresponds to Zedekiah in the reign of Amariah in the Seder Olam Zutta, pp. 137, 139 (ed. G. Genebrardus, Basileae, 1580), and Odeas, who corresponds to Hoshaiah in the reign of Manasseh, according to the same Jewish chronicle, may really represent high-priests whose names have not been preserved in Scripture. This would bring up the number to seventeen; or, if we retained Azariah as the father of Seraiah (1 Ch. vi. 13, 14), to eighteen, which would agree so far with the twenty kings.

Reviewing the high-priests of this second group, the following are some of the most remarkable incidents related of their times:—(1) The transfer of the seat of worship from Shiloh in the tribe of Ephraim to Jerusalem in the tribe of Judah, effected by David, and consolidated by the building of the magnificent Temple of Solomon. (2) The organization of the Temple-service under the high-priests, and the division of the priests and Levites into courses, who resided at the Temple during their term of service—all which necessarily put great power into the hands of an able high-priest.³ (3) The revolt of the ten tribes from the dynasty of David and from the worship at Jerusalem, and the setting up of a schismatical priesthood at Dan and Beersheba (1 K. xii. 31; 2 Ch. xiii. 9, &c.). (4) The overthrow of the usurpation of Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab, by Jehoiaada the high-priest, whose near relationship to king Joash, added to his zeal against the idolatries of the house of Ahab, stimulated him to head the revolution with the royal guards, according to 2 K. xi., or with the force of priests and Levites at his command, according to 2 Ch. xxii. (see Wellhausen, HI. pp. 196 sqq.). (5) The boldness and success with which according to the Chronicler—Kings is silent upon the matter—the high-priest Azariah withstood the encroachments of the king Uzziah upon the office and functions of

* The notice in 1 Ch. vi. 10 seems to belong to Azariah ben Zadok, and not to the son of Johanan.

² It must, however, be borne in mind that Amariah and Azariah find no place in the Book of Kings, and in this respect are quite on a par with the two names rejected above, Ahitub II. and Zadok II.

³ The sole ancient authority for these arrangements is the Book of Chronicles, which appears to transfer some of the institutions of the second Temple to the period of David and Solomon.

the priesthood. (6) The repair of the Temple by Jehoiada, in the reign of Joash, the restoration of the Temple-services by Azariah in the reign of Hezekiah, and the discovery of the Book of the Law, and the religious reformation by Hilkiah in the reign of Josiah. [DEUTERONOMY.] (7) In all these great religious movements, however, excepting the one headed by Jehoiada, it is remarkable how the civil power took the lead. It was David who arranged all the Temple-service, Solomon who directed the building and dedication of the Temple, the high-priest being not so much as named; Jehoshaphat who sent the priests about to teach the people, and assigned to the high-priest Amariah his share in the work; Hezekiah who headed the reformation, and urged on Azariah and the priests and Levites; Josiah who encouraged the priests in the service of the house of the Lord. On the other hand, we read of no opposition to the idolatries of Manasseh by the high-priest; and we know how shamefully subservient Urijah the high-priest was to king Ahaz, actually building an altar according to the pattern of one at Damascus, to displace the Brazen Altar, and joining the king in his profane worship before it (2 K. xvi. 10-16). The preponderance of the civil over the ecclesiastical power, as an historical fact, in the kingdom of Judah, seems to be proved from these circumstances.

The priests of this series ended with Seraiah, who was taken prisoner by Nebuzar-adan, and slain at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar, together with Zephaniah the second priest or Sagan, after the burning of the Temple and the plunder of all the sacred vessels (2 K. xxv. 18). His son Jehozadak or Josedech was at the same time carried away captive (1 Ch. vi. 15).

The time occupied by these (say) eighteen high-priests who ministered at Jerusalem, was about 454 years, which gives an average of something more than twenty-five years to each high-priest. It is remarkable that not a single instance is recorded after the time of David of recourse to the Urim and Thummim as a means of inquiring of the Lord. The ministry of the prophets seems to have superseded that of the high-priests (see e.g. 2 Ch. xv., xviii., xx. 14, 15; 2 K. xix. 1, 2, xxii. 12-14; Jer. xxi. 1, 2). Some think that Urim and Thummim ceased with the theocracy; others with the division of Israel into two kingdoms. Nehemiah seems to have expected the restoration of it (Neh. vii. 65), and so perhaps did Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc. iv. 46; cp. xiv. 41); while Josephus affirms that it had been exercised for the last time two hundred years before he wrote, viz. by John Hyrcanus (Whiston, note on Ant. iii. 8, and Prid. Conn. i. 150, 151). It seems therefore scarcely true to reckon Urim and Thummim as one of the marks of God's Presence with Solomon's Temple, which was wanting to the second Temple (Prid. i. 138, 144 sq.). This early cessation of answers by Urim and Thummim, though the high-priest's office and the wearing of the breastplate continued in force during so many centuries, seems to confirm the notion that such answers were not the fundamental, but only the accessory uses of the breastplate of judgment. (But vid. sup. I. (2).)

elapsed between the high-priests of the second and third group, during which there was neither Temple, nor Altar, nor Ark, nor priest. Jehozadak, or Josedech, as it is written in the A. V. of Haggai (i. 1, 14, &c.; Sept. and Vulg., Josedec; Heb. and R. V. Jehozadak), who should have succeeded Seraiah, lived and died a captive at Babylon. The pontifical office revived in his son Jeshua, of whom such frequent mention is made in Ezra and Nehemiah, Haggai, and Zechariah, 1 Esd. and Ecclus.; and he therefore stands at the head of this third and last series, honourably distinguished for his zealous co-operation with Zerubbabel in rebuilding the Temple, and founding the new religious community. His successors, as far as the O. T. guides us, were Joiakim, Eliahib, Joiada, Johanan, Jonathan (so Herzfeld and others), and Jaddua (see Neh. xii. 10, 11, 22, 23). Of these we find Eliahib hindering rather than seconding the zeal of the devout Tirshatha Nehemiah for the observance of God's law in Israel (Neh. xiii. 4, 7); and Johanan, Josephus tells us, murdered his own brother Jesus or Jeshua in the Temple, which led to its further profanation by Bagoses, the general of Artaxerxes Mnemon's army (Ant. xi. 7). Jaddua was high-priest in the time of Alexander the Great. Concerning him Josephus relates the story that he went out to meet Alexander at Sapha (probably the ancient Mizpeh) at the head of a procession of priests; and that when Alexander saw the multitude clothed in white, and the priests in their linen garments, and the high-priest in blue and gold, with the mitre on his head, and the gold plate, on which was the Name of God, he stepped forward alone and adored the Name, and hastened to embrace the high-priest (Ant. xi. 8, § 5). Josephus adds among other things that the king entered Jerusalem with the high-priest, and went up to the Temple to worship and offer sacrifice; that he was shown the "prophecies of Daniel" [see DANIEL] concerning himself, and at the high-priest's intercession granted the Jews liberty to live according to their own laws, and freedom from tribute on the Sabbatical years. The story, however, is undoubtedly apocryphal in its details, though the main fact may be historical (see Schürer, i. i. p. 187, n. 1). It was the brother of this Jaddua, Manasseh, who, according to the same authority, was at the request of Sanballat made the first high-priest of the Samaritan temple by Alexander the Great.

Jaddua was succeeded by Onias I., his son, and he again by Simon the Just, the last of "the Men of the Great Synagogue," to whom the Jews ascribe the completion of the Canon of the O. T. (Prideaux, Conn. i. 545). Of him Jesus, the son of Sirach, speaks in terms of glowing eulogy in Ecclus. l., and ascribes to him the repair and fortification of the Temple, with other works. (Others, e.g. Schürer, suppose that the reference is to Simon II.) The passage (cc. 1-21) contains a vivid account of the ministrations of the high-priest, in all the pomp and splendour of his office, as exhibited in the period of the writer. Upon Simon's death, his son Onias being under age, Eleazar, Simon's brother, succeeded him. The high-priesthood of Eleazar is memorable as being that under which the

LXX. Version of the Scriptures was made at Alexandria for Ptolemy Philadelphus, according to the account of Josephus taken from Aristæus (Ant. xii. 2), whose letter, however, is a forgery [SEPTUAGINT].⁷ The translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek, valuable as it was with reference to the wider interests of religion, and marked as was the Providence which gave it to the world during this period as a preparation for the approaching Advent of Christ, yet viewed in its relation to Judaism and the high-priesthood, was a sign, and perhaps a helping cause, of their decay. It marked a growing tendency to Hellenize, utterly inconsistent with the spirit of the Mosaic economy. Accordingly, in the high-priesthood of Eleazar's rival nephews, Jesus and Onias, we find their very names changed into the Greek ones of Jason and Menelaus; and with the introduction of this new feature of rival high-priests we find one of them, Menelaus, strengthening himself and seeking support from the Syro-Grecian kings against the orthodox party, by offering to forsake the national laws and customs, and to adopt those of the Greeks. The building of a gymnasium at Jerusalem for the use of these apostate Jews, and their endeavour to conceal their circumcision when stripped for the games (1 Macc. i. 14, 15; 2 Macc. iv. 12-15; Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, § 1), show the length to which this spurious priestly was carried. The acceptance of the spurious priesthood of the temple of Onion from Ptolemy Philometor by Onias (the son of Onias the high-priest), who would have been the legitimate high-priest on the death of Menelaus, his uncle, is another striking indication of the same degeneracy. By this flight of Onias into Egypt the succession of high-priests in the family of Jehozadak ceased; for although the Syro-Grecian kings had introduced much uncertainty into the succession, by deposing at their will obnoxious persons, and appointing whom they pleased, yet the dignity had never gone out of the one family. Alcimus, whose Hebrew name was, according to Ruffinus (ap. Selden), Joachim, i.e. Joakim or Jehoiakim, of which Eliakim (= Alkimus) is a natural variant (cp. Judith iv. 6, Joakim, Greek = Eliakim, Syriac and Vulg.), and who was made high-priest by Antiochus Eupator on Menelaus being put to death by him, was the first who was of a different family; one, says Josephus, that "was indeed of the stock of Aaron, but not of this (Jehozadak's) family."

What, however, for a time saved the Jewish institutions, infused a new life and consistency into the priesthood and the national religion, and enabled them to fulfil their destined course till the Advent of Christ, was the cruel and impolitic persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. This thoroughly aroused the piety and national spirit of the Jews, and drew together in defence of their Temple and country all who feared God and were attached to their national institutions. The result was that after the high-priesthood had been brought to the lowest degradation by the apostasy and crimes of the last Onias or Menelaus, and after a vacancy of seven years had followed the brief pontificate of Alcimus, his no less infamous successor, a new and glorious succession of high-priests arose in the Hasmonean family, who united the dignity of civil rulers, and for a time of independent sovereigns, to that of the high-priesthood. Josephus, who is followed by Lightfoot, Selden, and others, calls Judas Maccabæus "high-priest of the nation of Judah" (Ant. xii. 10, § 6); but, according to the far better authority of 1 Macc. x. 20, it was not till after the death of Judas Maccabæus that Alcimus himself died, and that Alexander, king of Syria, made Jonathan, the brother of Judas, high-priest. Josephus himself, too, speaks of Jonathan as "the first of the sons of Asamoneus, who was high-priest" (Vita, § 1). It is possible, however, that Judas may have been elected by the people to the office of high-priest, though never confirmed in it by the Syrian kings. The Hasmonean family were priests of the course of Jojarib, the first of the twenty-four courses (1 Ch. xxiv. 7), whose return from Captivity is recorded 1 Ch. ix. 10, Neh. xi. 10. They were probably of the house of Eleazar, though this cannot be affirmed with certainty; and Josephus tells us that he himself was related to them, one of his ancestors having married a daughter of Jonathan, the first high-priest of the house. This Hasmonean dynasty lasted from B.C. 153, till the family was damaged by intestine divisions, and then destroyed by Herod the Great. Aristobulus, the last high-priest of his line, brother of Mariamne, was murdered by order of Herod, his brother-in-law, B.C. 35. The independence of Judæa, under the priest-kings of this race, had lasted till Pompey took Jerusalem, and sent king Aristobulus II. (who had also taken the high-priesthood from his brother Hyrcanus) a prisoner to Rome. Pompey restored Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood, but forbade him to wear the diadem. Everything Jewish was now, however, hastening to decay. Herod made men of low birth high-priests, deposed them at his will, and named others in their room. In this he was followed by Archelaus, and by the Romans when they took the government of Judæa into their own hands; so that there were no fewer than twenty-eight high-priests from the reign of Herod to the destruction of the Temple by Titus, a period of 107 years.* The N. T. introduces us to some of these later and oft-changing high-priests, viz. Annas and Caiaphas—the former, high-priest at the commencement of St. John Baptist's ministry, with Caiaphas as second priest; and the latter high-priest himself at our Lord's crucifixion—and Ananias, thought to be the same as Ananus, who was murdered by the Zealots just before the siege of Jerusalem, before whom St. Paul was tried, as we read Acts xxiii., and of whom he said, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall." Theophilus, the son of Ananus, was the high-priest from whom Saul received letters to the synagogue at Damascus (Acts ix. 1, 14, Kuinoel).

* Josephus tells us of one Ananus and his five sons who all filled the office of high-priest in turn. One of these, Ananus the younger, was deposed by king Agrippa for the part he took in causing "James the brother of Jesus who was called Christ" to be stoned (Ant. xx. 9, § 1).

⁷ Even the Seder Olam Zutta ascribes to "Ptolemy" no more than the Greek version of the Five Books of the Law.

Both he and Ananias seem certainly to have presided in the Sanhedrin, and that officially, nor is Lightfoot's explanation (viii. 450 and 484) of the mention of the high-priest, though Gamaliel and his son Simcon were respectively presidents of the Sanhedrin, at all probable or satisfactory (see Acts v. 17, &c.). The last high-priest was appointed by lot by the Zealots from the course of priests called by Josephus Eniachim (probably a corrupt reading for Eliachim = El-jakim = Jakim, 1 Ch. xxiv. 12). He is thus described by the Jewish historian: "His name was Phannias: he was the son of Samuel of the village of Aphtha, a man not only not of the number of the chief priests, but who, such a mere rustic was he, scarcely knew what the high-priesthood meant. Yet did they drag him reluctant from the country, and, setting him forth in a borrowed character as on the stage, they put the sacred vestments on him, and instructed him how to act on the occasion. This shocking impiety, which to them was a subject of merriment and sport, drew tears from the other priests, who beheld from a distance their Law turned into ridicule, and groaned over the subversion of the sacred honours" (B. J. iv. 3, § 8). Thus ignominiously ended the series of high-priests which had stretched in a scarcely broken line, through nearly fourteen, or, according to the common chronology, sixteen centuries. The Egyptian, Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires, which the Jewish high-priests had seen in turn overshadowing the world, had each, except the last, one by one withered away and died; and now the last successor of Aaron was stripped of his sacerdotal robes, and the Temple which he served laid level with the ground to rise no more. But this did not happen till the true High-priest and King of Israel, the Minister of the Sanctuary and of the true Tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man, had offered His one sacrifice, once for all, and had taken His place at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, to continue a Priest for ever, in the Sanctuary which shall never be taken down.

The subjoined table shows the succession of high-priests, as far as it can be ascertained, and of the contemporary civil rulers.

CIVIL RULER.	HIGH-PRIEST.
Moses	Aaron.
Joshua	Eleazar.
Othniel	Phinehas.
Abishua	Abishua.

Abijah	Johanan. [Azariah.]
Asa	Azariah.

* The names added in square brackets are from the Seder Olam Zutta, according to which Abiathar only was high-priest under David, and Zadok under Solomon. The names of Abaz (= Jehoabaz), Pedalah, Neriah, &c. seem worthy of notice as an evidence of a distinct tradition. That "Jotham" should be high-priest under Jotham, is hardly more remarkable than that "Azariah" should be high-priest under Azariah-Uzziah (2 Ch. xxvi. 17).

The latter part of the above list is taken partly from Lightfoot, vol. ix. ch. iv.; also in part from Josephus directly, and in part from Whiston's note on Ant. xv. 8, § 5. See also the histories of Ewald, Kuenen, Wellhausen, Grätz, and especially Schürer. [A. C. H.] [C. J. B.]

HILEN (הִילֵן; B. $\Sigma\epsilon\lambda\alpha\delta$, A. $\text{N}\eta\lambda\acute{\omega}\nu$; Helon), the name of a city of Judah allotted with its "suburbs" to the priests (1 Ch. vi. 58); and which in the corresponding lists of Joshua is called HOLON. [G.] [W.]

HILKIAH (הִלְקִיָּהוּ and הִלְקִיָּהוּ = the Lord is my portion; B. $\Sigma\epsilon\lambda\kappa\iota\alpha\varsigma$, A. $\kappa\iota\alpha\varsigma$; Helcias). 1. HILKIAHU, father of Eliakim (2 K. xviii. 37; Is. xxii. 20, xxxvi. 22). [ELIAKIM.]

2. High-priest in the reign of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 4 sq.; 2 Ch. xxxiv. 9 sq.; 1 Esd. i. 8). According to the genealogy in 1 Ch. vi. 13 (A. V.), he was son of Shallum, and, from Ezra vii. 1, apparently the ancestor of Ezra the scribe. His high-priesthood was rendered particularly illustrious by the great reformation effected under it by king Josiah, by the solemn Passover kept at Jerusalem in the 18th year of that king's reign, and above all by the discovery which he made of the Book of the Law of Moses in the Temple, probably deposited by the side of the Ark of the covenant within the veil (Deut. xxxi. 9, 26).

A difficult and interesting question arises, What was the book found by Hilkiah? Various answers have been given, but modern criticism is mostly in favour of the Book of Deuteronomy, and probably other portions of the Law (Edersheim, Bible History, iv. 182 sq.), or—more briefly—Deut. xii.—xxvi. alone (Wellhausen, Die Composition . . . d. Histor. BB. d. A. Ts., p. 189; Stade, Gesch. d. Volkes Isr. p. 61). All the actions of Josiah which followed the reading of the book found—the destruction of all idolatrous symbols, the putting away of wizards and workers with familiar spirits, and the keeping of the Passover—were such as would follow from hearing chapters xvi., xviii., and others of Deuteronomy, while there is not one that points to any precept contained in the other Books and not in Deuteronomy. Further, it is well known how full the writings of Jeremiah are of direct references and of points of resemblance to the Book of Deuteronomy. Now this is at once accounted for on the supposition of the Law thus found by Hilkiah being that Book, which would thus naturally be an object of special curiosity and study to the Prophet, and as naturally influence his own writings (cp. Jer. xi. 3–5 with Deut. xxvii. 26).

Surprise has been sometimes expressed at the previous non-acquaintance with this book on the part of Hilkiah, Josiah, and the people generally, which their manner of receiving it plainly evidences; and some have argued from hence that "the law of Moses" is not of older date than the reign of Josiah: * in fact that some unknown person invented it, and Hilkiah pretended to have found a copy in the Temple in order to give sanction to the reformation which they had in hand. If the charge of fraud or forgery may be at once dismissed, is the "needful illusion" stipulated by some critics in explanation of what took place, much better? The following remarks will point out the true inferences to be drawn from the narrative of this remarkable discovery in the Books of Kings and Chronicles. The direction in Deut. xxxi. 10–13 for the public reading of the Law at the Feast of Tabernacles on each seventh year, or year of release, to the whole congregation, as the means of perpetuating the knowledge of the Law, sufficiently shows that at that time a multiplication of copies and a multitude of readers were not contemplated. The same thing seems to be implied also in the direction given in Deut. xvii. 18, 19, concerning the copy of the Law to be made, for the special use of the king, distinct from that in the keeping of the priests and Levites. And this paucity of copies and of readers is just what one would have expected in an age when the art of reading and writing was confined to the professional scribes, and to the very few others who, like Moses, had learnt the art in Egypt (Acts vii. 22). The troublous times of the Judges were obviously more likely to obliterate than to promote the study of letters. And whatever occasional revival of sacred learning may have taken place under such kings as David, Solomon, Jehoshaphat, Uzziah, Jotham, and Hezekiah, yet on the other hand such reigns as that of Athaliah, the last years of Joash, that of Ahaz, and above all the long reign of Manasseh, with their idolatries and national calamities, must have been most unfavourable to the study of "the sacred letters." On the whole, in the days of Josiah irreligion and ignorance had overflowed all the dykes erected to stay their progress. In spite of such occasional acts as the public reading of the Law to the people, enjoined by Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xvii. 9), and such isolated evidences of the king's reading the Law, as commanded by Moses, as the action recorded of Amaziah affords (2 K. xiv. 6), and the yet more marked acquaintance with the Law attributed to Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 5, 6) [GENEALOGY], everything in Josiah's reign indicates a very low state of knowledge. How then can we wonder that under such circumstances the knowledge of the Law had fallen into desuetude? or fail to see in the incident of the startling discovery of the copy of it by Hilkiah one of those many instances of simple truthfulness which impress on the Scripture narrative such an unmistakable stamp of authenticity, when it is read in the same guileless spirit in which it is written? In fact, the ignorance of the Law of Moses which this history reveals is in most striking harmony with the prevalent idolatry disclosed by the previous history of Judaea, especially since its connexion with the house of Ahab, as well as with the low state of education which is apparent from so many incidental notices.

The story of Hilkiah's discovery throws no light whatever upon the mode in which other portions of the Scriptures were preserved, and therefore this is not the place to consider it. But Thenius truly observes that the expression in 2 K. xxii. 8 clearly implies that the existence of the Law of Moses was a thing well known to the Jews. It is interesting to notice the concurrence of the king with the high-priest in the restoration of the Temple, as well as the analogy of the circumstances with what took place in the reign of Josiah, when Jehoiada was high-priest, as related in 2 Ch. xxiv. [CHELCIAS.] [A. C. H.]

3. HILKIAH (B. om.; Helcias), a Merarite Levite, son of Amzi, one of the ancestors of ETHAN (1 Ch. vi. 45; Heb. v. 30).

4. HILKIAHU; another Merarite Levite, second son of Hosah; among the doorkeepers of the Tabernacle in the time of king David (1 Ch. xxvi. 11; B. om.).

5. HILKIAH; one of those who stood on the right hand of Ezra when he read the Law to the people. Doubtless a Levite, and probably a priest (Neh. viii. 4; B. Ἐλκιά, κ. Χελκιά, A. -cia). He may be identical with the Hilkiah who came up in the expedition with Jeshua and Zerubbabel (xii. 7; om. B^N*A.), and whose descendant Hashabiah is commemorated as living in the days of Joiakim (xii. 21; om. B^N*A.).

6. HILKIAHU; a priest, of Anathoth, father of the prophet JEREMIAH (Jer. i. 1).

7. HILKIAH, father of Gemariah, who was one of Zedekiah's envoys to Babylon (Jer. xxix. 3). [W. A. W.]

HIL'LEL (לֵלֵל) = he hath celebrated; B. Ἑλλάλη. A. Σελλάλη, Joseph. Ἑλληλος; Ille), a native of Pirathon in Mount Ephraim, father of ABDON, one of the judges of Israel (Judg. xii. 13, 15).

HILLS. The structure and characteristics of the hills of Palestine will be most conveniently noticed in the general description of the features of the country. [PALESTINE.] But it may not be unprofitable to call attention here to the various Hebrew terms for which the word "hill" has been employed in the A. V.

1. Gibeah, גִּבְעָה, from a root akin to גָּבַח, which seems to have the force of curvature or humpishness. A word involving this idea is peculiarly applicable to the rounded hills of Palestine, and from it are derived, as has been pointed out under GIBEAH, the names of several places situated on hills. Our translators (A. V.) have been consistent in rendering gibeah by "hill;" in four passages only qualifying it as "little hill," doubtless for the more complete antithesis to "mountain" (Pss. lxxv. 12, lxxii. 3, cxiv. 4, 6, where R. V. has "little hills" in cxiv. 4, 6 only).

2. But they have also employed the same English word for the very different term har, הַר, which has a much more extended sense than gibeah, meaning a whole district rather than an individual eminence, and to which our word "mountain" answers with tolerable accuracy. This exchange is always undesirable, but it sometimes occurs so as to confuse the meaning of a passage where it is desirable that the topography should be unmistakable. For instance, in Ex. xxiv. 4 the "hill" (R. V. "mount") is the same which is elsewhere in the same chapter (v. 12, 13, 18, &c.) and Book, consistently and accurately rendered "mount" and "mountain." In Num. xiv. 44, 45, the "hill" is the "mountain" of v. 40, as also in Deut. i. 41, 43, compared with v. 24, 44; and in Josh. xv. 9, compared with the preceding verse. The country of the "hills" (R. V. "hill country") in Deut. i. 7, Josh. ix. 1, x. 40, xi. 16, is the elevated district of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, which is correctly called "the mountain" in the earliest descriptions of Palestine (Num. xiii. 29), and in many subsequent passages. The "holy hill" (Ps. iii. 4), the "hill of Jebovah" (xxiv. 3), the "hill of God" (lxxviii. 15), are nothing else than "Mount Zion." In 2 K. i. 9 and iv. 27, the use of the word "hill" (retained in R. V.) obscures the allusion to Carmel, which in other passages of the life of the prophet (e.g. 1 K. xviii. 19; 2 K. iv. 25) has the term "mount" correctly attached to it. Other places in the historical Books in which the same substitution weakens the force of the narrative, are as follows:—Gen. vii. 19; Deut. viii. 7; Josh. xiii. 6, xviii. 13, 14; Judg. xvi. 3; 1 Sam. xxiii. 14, xxv. 20, xxvi. 13; 2 Sam. xiii. 34; 1 K. xx. 23, 28, xxii. 17, &c.

3. On one occasion the word Mar'alah, מַרְאֵלָה, is rendered "hill," viz. 1 Sam. ix. 11, where it would be better to employ "ascent" (as in R. V.) or some similar term.

4. In the N. T. the word "hill" is employed to render the Greek word βουνός; but on one occasion it is used for δρος, elsewhere "mountain," so as to obscure the connexion between the two parts of the same narrative. The "hill" (R. V. "mountain") from which Jesus was coming down in Luke ix. 37, is the same as "the mountain" into which He had gone for His transfiguration the day before (cp. v. 28). In Matt. v. 14, and Luke iv. 29, δρος is also rendered "hill," but without inconvenience. In Luke i. 39, the "hill country" (ἡ ὄρεσθ) is the same "mountain of Judah" to which reference is frequent in the O. T. [G.] [W.]

HIN. [MEASURE.]

HIND. [HART.]

HINGE. 1. יָצַע, στροφή, cardo, with the notion of turning (Ges. p. 1165). 2. תָּבַח, θύρωμα, cardo, with the notion of insertion (Ges. p. 1096). Both ancient Egyptian and modern Oriental doors were and are hung by means of pivots turning in sockets both on the upper and lower sides. In Syria, and especially the Haurān, there are many ancient doors consisting of stone slabs with pivots carved out of the same piece, inserted in sockets above and below, and fixed during the building of the house. The allusion in Prov. xxvi. 14 is thus clearly explained. The hinges mentioned in 1 K. vii. 50 were probably of the Egyptian kind, attached to the upper and lower sides of the door (Buckingham, Arab Tribes, p. 177; Porter, Damascus, ii. 22, 192; Maundrell, Early Travels, pp. 447, 448; Bohn; Shaw, Travels, p. 210; Lord Lindsay, Letters, p. 292; Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 15 [1878]). [H. W. P.]

HINNOM, VALLEY OF, otherwise called "the valley of the son" or "children of Hinnom" (בְּנֵי הַיָּדֵי, or בְּנֵי יְהוֹיָדָה, once בְּנֵי יְהוֹיָדָה), variously rendered by LXX. φάραγξ Ἐννόμ, B. ὄνδμ in Josh. xv. 8, or υἱού Ἐννόμ [2 K. xxiii. 10; Jer. vii. 29, 30, xxxii. 35], or Β. Γαιέννα, A. Γαί Ὀννόμ [Josh. xviii. 16]; also B. ἐν Γαιθενόμ, A. ἐν Γηθενόμ [2 Ch. xxviii. 3]; B. ἐν γὰρ βαρὲ Ἐννόμ, A. ἐν γῆ Βεενόμ; τὸ πολυάνδρῳν υἱῶν τῶν τέκνων αὐτῶν [Jer. xix. 2], π. υἱού Ἐννόμ [v. 6], a ravine, gai, taking its name, according to Dean Stanley, from "some ancient hero, the son of Hinnom," having encamped in it (Stanley, S. & P. p. 172). It was on the south side of Jerusalem, and formed the boundary between Judah and Benjamin; and to the west of it there was a mountain which marked the northern extremity of the vale, ἔμεγ, of Rephaim (Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16). It is also mentioned as the northern limit of the district occupied by the "children of Judah" after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 30), and as being near the gate Harsith (R. V. marg. of *potsherd*s; A. V. "east gate," marg. sun gate) of Jerusalem (Jer. xix. 2). Ahaz and Manasseh burnt incense and made their children "pass through the fire" in the valley of Hinnom (2 Ch. xxviii. 3, cp. 2 K. xvi. 3; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 6, cp. 2 K. xxi. 6); probably at the "high places of Tophet" or "of Baal," which were specially built in connexion with the fenish custom of infant sacrifice to Molech, the fire-god* (Jer. vii. 31, xxxii. 35). [TOPHET.] To put an end to these abominations the place was polluted by Josiah, who rendered it ceremonially unclean by spreading over it human bones and other corruptions (2 K. xxiii. 10, 13, 14; 2 Ch. xxiv. 4, 5), from which time it appears to have become the common burial-place of the city, and to have received the name of the Valley of Slaughter (Jer. vii. 32, xix. 16). Most commentators follow Buxtorf, Lightfoot, and others, in asserting that perpetual fires were here kept up for the consumption of bodies of criminals, carcasses of animals, and whatever else was combustible; but the Rabbinical authorities usually brought forward in support of this idea appear insufficient, and Robinson declares (i. 274) that "there is no evidence of any other fires than those of Molech having been kept up in this valley," referring to Rosenmüller, Biblich. Geogr. ii. i. 156, 164. For the more ordinary view, see Hengstenberg, Christol. ii. 454, iv. 41; Keil on Kings ii. 147, Clark's edit.; and cp. Is. xxx. 33, lxxvi. 24.

From its ceremonial defilement, and from the detested and abominable fire of Molech, if not from the supposed ever-burning funeral piles, the later Jews applied the name of this valley Ge Hinnom, Gehenna, to denote the place of eternal torment, and some of the Rabbins here fixed the "door of hell;" a sense in which it is used by our Lord. [GEHENNA.] It gave its name to the "Valley gate" of Jerusalem^b (2 Ch. xxvi. 9; Neh. ii. 13, 15, iii. 13); and it is perhaps "the valley" κατ' ἄστρον (Jer. ii. 23), the "valley of the shadow of death" (Ps. xxiii. 4), and the "valley of vision" (Is. xxii. 1, 5). In Jer. xxxi. 40, it is apparently referred to as the "valley," ἔμεγ, of the dead bodies."

The Valley of Hinnom has been variously identified with—(1.) Wady er-Rabbéh, which passes round the W. and S. sides of the spur on which Jerusalem is built. This valley commences in a broad shallow depression, or basin, to the N.W. of the city, to which the term ἔμεγ, used by Jeremiah (xxxi. 40) in his description of the boundary of the restored "holy" Jerusalem, might well be applied. The basin may possibly be the "valley of Shaveh, which is the king's dale" (Gen. xiv. 17), the "king's dale" (2 Sam. xviii. 18) in which Absalom reared up a pillar that according to Josephus (Ant. vii. 10, § 3) was only two stadia from Jerusalem; and, perhaps, the "valley of Jehoshaphat" (Joel iii. 2, 12), or "of decision" (v. 14). Almost in the centre of the depression is the Birket Mamilla, a large open reservoir, surrounded by Muhammadan tombs, which some authorities have erroneously identified as the "upper pool" of Gihon. [GIHON.] From this reservoir the valley runs E.S.E. to a point opposite the Jaffa Gate, and in a distance of 550 yards falls 79 feet. It then follows a southerly direction for 730 yards, and gradually contracts, until, at the Birket es-Sultān, which occupies its whole breadth, it begins to assume the character of a ravine. Above this reservoir, which is 141 feet below the Birket Mamilla, and was called in the Middle Ages Germanus, the aqueduct conveying water from "Solomon's Pools" to the Temple crosses the valley; and at its lower end is the road from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. About 130 yards below the Birket es-Sultān the valley sweeps round to the E., and descends rapidly, 320 feet in 1000 yards, to its junction with the Kedron. It is now a deep ravine between the steep slopes of the modern Zion and the broken cliffs, honeycombed with rock-hewn tombs, which, rising in a succession of terraces, form the northern slopes of the

* In the immediate vicinity, if not at the same spot, must have been the high place which Solomon built "for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon" (1 K. xi. 7).

^b It may also have given its name to the gate Gennath (Ge-hennath) in the first wall (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 2).

"Hill of Evil Counsel." Amidst these tombs is the traditional ACELDAMA; and on the height above tradition places the tree on which Judas hanged himself. Where the valley joins the Kedron there is an open plot of ground, occupied by gardens, that may well be "the pleasant and woody spot, full of delightful gardens watered from the fountain of Siloah," which Jerome identified with Tophet, and which is perhaps "the fields" of Jer. xxxi. 40. If, as seems probable, the Valley of Rephaim, which Josephus says (Ant. vii. 12, § 4) extended towards Bethlehem, is that now called el-Bukai'a, over which the road to Bethlehem runs, W. er-Rabābeh must be the Valley of Hinnom. It answers exactly to the minute topographical description in Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16, and is one of the most important features in the district. This view has the support of Robinson (Phys. Geog. p. 90 sq.), Stanley (S. & P. p. 172), Barclay (City of the Great King, p. 90), Riehm (HWB. s. v.); Tobler (Topog. ii. 39 sq.), Baedeker-Socin (Hbk.), &c.

(2.) The narrow ravine, called by Josephus the Tyropoeon Valley, that divides the spur, on which Jerusalem stands, into two unequal halves, has been proposed by Professor Robertson Smith (Encyc. Brit. s. v. Jerusalem), Professor Sayce (PEFQy. Stat. 1883, p. 213), Rev. W. Birch (PEFQy. Stat. 1878, p. 179), and Schwarz (Das H. L. p. 190). It is argued in support of this view that pre-exilic Jerusalem was confined to the eastern hill; that the Tyropoeon is a veritable gai; and that a boundary following its course would give the western hill to Judah and the eastern to Benjamin, thus meeting the supposed difficulty in Josh. xv. 63, Judg. i. 3-8, 21, where Jerusalem is given to Judah. On the other hand, the Tyropoeon is a minor topographical feature compared with W. er-Rabābeh and the Kedron, and so not likely to have been selected as the boundary between two tribes, or to have been alluded to in the terms of Neh. xi. 30. Dean Stanley has suggested (S. & P. p. 176) that the ancient city stood on neutral ground, and was enclosed equally from the boundaries of each tribe. [But see JERUSALEM.] It has been suggested by Dr. Bonar (Imp. Bib. Dict. s. v. Jerusalem) that Josephus mistook gebeninnom for cheese-makers, and translated it τυροποιος, the Hebrew words being so very similar, and by M. Clermont-Ganneau (MS. note) that γῆ-βευυών in the primitive text of Josephus was taken by an ignorant reader for the transcription of Gebinūn (cheeses), as if from gebiniāh, cheese, and translated in the margin by τυροποιών.

(3.) The Valley of the Kedron has been proposed by Sir C. Warren (Recov. of Jer. p. 307), who apparently bases his argument on the mis-translation "east gate" of A. V. in Jer. xix. 2 (see above); and on Arab tradition, which identifies the Kedron with Wādī Jahannum (Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, p. 218 sq.). This was the view of Jerome (OS² p. 160, 9); and it appears to have been adopted by Dean Stanley (Recov. of Jer. xiv.). It is true that the lower part of the Kedron valley may well be called a ravine, gai; but the distinction between the valley (nachal) of the Kedron and the ravine (gai) of the children of Hinnom is apparently always maintained in the Bible; and the Kedron valley does not meet the requirements of Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16.

A possible explanation of the difficulty is that the true Valley of Hinnom, mentioned as a geographical feature in Joshua and Nehemiah, is the W. er-Rabābeh; and that after the introduction of infant sacrifices the name was loosely applied to those portions of the three valleys nearest to Tophet. HIPPOPOTAMUS. The marg. reading of R. V. for חֲמֹתִים. [BEHEMOTH.]

H'RAH (חֲרִיךְ, ? = noble; Eipds; Hiram), an Adullamite, the friend (חֲרִיף) of Judah (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12; and see v. 20). For "friend" the LXX. and Vulg. have "shepherd," probably reading חֲרִיף.

H'RAM, or HU'RAM (חֲרִימ, or חֲרִימ [see HURAM], probably for חֲרִימ or חֲרִימ, a Phoenician title = brother of the exalted one; cp. Bāthgen, Beitr. z. Semit. Religionsgeschichte, p. 156; Χεράμ; Hiram). 1. The king of Tyre who sent workmen and materials to Jerusalem, first (2 Sam. v. 11, 1 Ch. xiv. 1) to build a palace for David, whom he ever loved (1 K. v. 1), and again (1 K. v. 10, vii. 13; 2 Ch. ii. 14, 16) to build the Temple for Solomon, with whom he had a treaty of peace and commerce (1 K. v. 11, 12). The contempt with which he received Solomon's present of Cabul (1 K. ix. 12) does not appear to have caused any breach between the two kings. He admitted Solomon's ships, issuing from Joppa, to a share in the profitable trade of the Mediterranean (1 K. x. 22); and Jewish sailors, under the guidance of Tyrians, were taught to bring the gold of India (1 K. ix. 26) to Solomon's two harbours on the Red Sea (see Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii. 345-347).

Eupolemon (ap. Euseb. Praep. Evang. ix. 30) states that David, after a war with Hiram, reduced him to the condition of a tributary prince. Dius the Phoenician historian, and Menander of Ephesus (ap. Joseph. c. Ap. i. 17, 18), assign to Hiram a prosperous reign of 34 years, and relate that his father was Abibal, his son and successor Baleazar; that he rebuilt various idol-temples, and dedicated some splendid offerings; that he was successful in war; that he enlarged and fortified his city; that he and Solomon had a contest with riddles or dark sayings (cp. Samson and his friends, Judg. xiv. 12), in which Solomon, after winning a large sum of money from the king of Tyre, was eventually outwitted by Abdeemon, one of his subjects. The intercourse of these great and kindred-minded kings was much celebrated by local historians. Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 8) states that the correspondence between them with respect to the building of the Temple was preserved among the Tyrian archives in his days. With the letters in 1 K. v. and 2 Ch. ii. may be compared not only his copies of the letters, but also the still less authentic letters between Solomon and Hiram, and between Solomon and Vaphres (Apries?), which are preserved by Eupolemon (ap. Euseb. Praep. Evang. ix. 30), and mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor (ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 21, p. 332). Some Phoenician historians (ap. Tatian, cont.

Græc. § 37) relate that Hiram, besides supplying timber for the Temple, gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon (so Hamburger, RE. s. n., referring to 1 K. xxxiii. 11, but Riehm, HWB. s. n., rejects this as very improbable). Jewish writers in less ancient times cannot overlook Hiram's uncircumcision notwithstanding his services towards the building of the Temple. Their legends relate (ap. Eisenm. Ent. Jud. i. 868) that because he was a God-fearing man and built the Temple he was received alive into Paradise; but that, after he had been there a thousand years, he sinned by pride, and was thrust down into hell.

The so-called Tomb of Hiram stands on the hillside east of Tyre. The sarcophagus of limestone rests on a massive pedestal, the whole perfect if weather-beaten, "a solitary, venerable relic of remote antiquity" (Porter, Hdbk. ii. 395). Hiram's name is also connected with a fountain near Tyre, over which a massive stone structure has been raised.

2. Hiram was the name of a man of mixed race (1 K. vii. 13, 40), the principal architect and engineer sent by king Hiram to Solomon; also called Huram in the Chronicles. On the title of מֶלֶךְ = "master," or "father," given to him in 2 Ch. ii. 13, iv. 16, see HURAM, No. 3.

[W. T. B.] [F.]

HIRCANUS (Ἱρκανός; Hircanus), "a son of Tobias," who had a large treasure placed for security in the treasury of the Temple at the time of the visit of Heliodorus (c. 187 B.C.; 2 Macc. iii. 11). Josephus also mentions "children of Tobias" (Ant. xii. 5, § 1, παῖδες Τωβίου), who, however, belonged to the faction of Menelaus, and notices especially a son of one of them (Joseph) who was named Hircanus (Ant. xii. 4, § 2 sq.). But there is no sufficient reason for identifying (as Riehm prefers, HWB. s. n.) the Hircanus of 2 Macc. with this grandson of Tobias, either by supposing that the ellipse (τοῦ Τωβίου) is to be so filled up (Grotius, Calmet), or that the sons of Joseph were popularly named after their grandfather (Ewald, Gesch. iv. 309), which could scarcely have been the case in consequence of the great eminence of their father.

The name appears to be simply a local appellation, and became illustrious afterwards in the Maccabean dynasty, though the circumstances which led to its adoption are unknown (yet cp. Ant. xiii. 8, § 4). [MACCABEÆ.] [B. F. W.]

HITTITES (חִתִּי, pl. חִתִּים; fem. חִתִּית, pl. חִתִּיִּת; Xerxáioi), an important Canaanite tribe. Gesenius compares the name with חָת, "fear," but the word is probably not of Semitic origin. In Genesis (x. 15) Heth (חִת) is mentioned as a son of Canaan, son of Ham; and the original inhabitants of Sidon, Arka, Simyra, Hamath, and other cities of Phœnicia, are attributed to the same family, with Canaanite tribes of the south, including Jebusites, Amorites, Gîrgashites, and Hivites. The passage is of great ethnical importance. The sons of Ham included Cush (in Mesopotamia), Mizraim (in Egypt), Phut, and Canaan. This population is carefully distinguished from the Semitic race (Shem) and from the white race (probably Aryan) of Asia Minor and Armenia. It thus appears that the Hittites, named as the first of Canaanite tribes, were of the same stock as the conquering Cushites of Chaldea, who advanced into Assyria, and among whom Nimrod is mentioned as a celebrated hero. To the same stock also certain tribes of Mizraim (Egypt) are said to have belonged (v. 13), including the Philistines. In later times, we read (v. 18), "the families of the Canaanites spread abroad" (or "swelled") from Sidon to Gaza, and as far east as the Jordan valley. The account terminates (v. 20) with the words, "These are the sons of Ham according to their families (or "extensions"), and according to their languages, in their countries, and in their nations (or "multitudes)." It appears natural to suppose that, as they themselves were of a distinct stock, so also the "languages" here specified may have differed from those of the sons of Shem. It would also seem to be indicated that the original home of the Canaanite (or "lowlander") was in Northern Syria and Phœnicia, where Sidon was the "first-born of Canaan," and that the extension of the race was southwards towards Gaza.

Abram is said (Gen. xv. 18), on entering the Land of Promise, to have found Hittites, with other tribes, including Amorites, Rephaim, Canaanites, Gîrgashites and Jebusites, and also with the Kenites, Kadmonites and Kenizzites, who dwelt south of Hebron, already possessing the country; and at Hebron (Gen. xxiii. 3, 7, 8: cp. xxv. 10) the "sons of Heth" (בְּנֵי חֵת) were established as owners of a city with fields; they buried in tombs (v. 6) and possessed a silver currency (v. 16); and merchants were known to them—a civilised condition which monumental evidence also shows to have existed at this early period. This early extension of the Hittites to the extreme south agrees with the statement of Ezekiel (xvi. 3), which makes the original Jebusite population in Jerusalem to have been of mixed Amorite and Hittite origin—"thy father was an Amorite and thy mother a Hittite." The Hittites did not confine themselves to marriages within the limits of their own tribe. Esau married two Hittite wives (Gen. xxvi. 34), and a similar alliance was feared in Jacob's case (Gen. xxvii. 46). About the time of the Exodus the Hittites (Num. xiii. 29) are said to have inhabited the mountains, with Jebusites and Amorites, north of the Amalekites. In Deuteronomy (vii. 1) they are mentioned as one of the seven nations of Palestine, and stand first as though the most important of all (cp. Ex. xxxiii. 2). In the Book of Joshua they are, however, mentioned only in the north of Syria (Josh. i. 4; cp. Judg. i. 26): in "Lebanon, even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites." In David's time Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam. xii.) was resident in Jerusalem, married to Bathsheba, whose name is Semitic, and who may perhaps have been a Hebrew woman. The census of David's dominions was carried on the north as far as TAHTIM-HODSHI (2 Sam. xxiv. 6; cp. Driver in loco), which should be read "(the land of) the Hittites towards Kadesh," substituting שְׂרֵיִלְמָה קַדְשָׁה; cp. Lulian's recension, εἰς γῆν Χερριεῖλου Καδῆς). In Solomon's time the "kings of the Hittites" are mentioned, with the kings of Syria, as receiving, through the medium of merchants, from Egypt, chariots at a price of about £100, and horses valued at £25 each. Solomon married Hittite wives (1 Kings xi. 1) as well as women of Semitic race from Moab, Edom, and Ammon. About 800 B.C. the "kings of the Hittites" were also feared by the Syrians (2 K. vii. 6), who supposed an alliance with Israel: "the king of Israel hath hired against us the kings of the Hittites, and the kings of the Egyptians." They disappear after this date from Hebrew history, and the explanation is found in the monumental records of the destruction of their power by Sargon in 717 B.C. There probably remained, however, much Hittite blood in the veins of the population, for the Hebrews early intermarried with the Canaanite tribes (Judg. iii. 5).

The names of the Hittites mentioned in the Bible are worthy of careful consideration, since we have seen that the race was of a distinct stock, not descendants of Shem. The names of Ephron and Beeri (Gen. xxiii. 3; xxvi. 34) have no proper meaning as Semitic words, nor has that of Toi or Tou, king of Hamath in David's time (2 Sam. viii. 9, 10); while Zohar, Elon, Judith, and Bashemath have been rendered as Hebrew names (Gen. xxvi. 34). In David's time, Ahimelech (1 Sam. xxvi. 6) and Uriah (2 Sam.) have names of which a Semitic rendering is possible. Mixture of race is probably indicated by such names, and the simplest explanation of the difficulty in finding an appropriate derivation in some cases appears to be that the words, like many others in the Bible, are not of Hebrew origin. Other references to the Hittites as a Canaanite tribe are found in the Pentateuch (Exod. iii. 8, 17; xiii. 5; xliii. 28; cp. Josh. ix. 1), and the last passage again connects them with Northern Syria. The result of the Biblical notices is, therefore, that the Hittites were a people akin to the Cushites of Babylonia, spreading in early times over Northern Syria, and southwards to the Hebron mountains, where they were settled and civilised; that they were still ruled by kings in the Lebanon region in Solomon's time, when they traded with Egypt by aid of Hebrew and Phoenician merchants; that they intermarried with the Hebrews, but remained independent in David's time, and finally that they disappear from history after the reign of Ahab.

The monumental notices of the Hittites are numerous and important, derived from both Egyptian and Assyrian sources, and agreeing in a remarkable manner with the Biblical account, which they supplement with something approaching to a continuous history. Of the various Canaanite tribes, as the exception of the Amorites, the Hittites are the only nation of which the name is monumentally preserved. Both from the Bible and from the monuments we gather that the Hittites were more powerful and important than other Canaanite peoples, and that they maintained their independence in the north, while the rest were subdued by the Hebrews in the south, allying themselves to David as neighbours, and by marriage to Solomon, who, if his mother Bathsheba (the wife of Uriah) was of the same race as her first husband, was himself half a Hittite by birth.

The earliest historic notice of the region of the Northern Lebanon, which was ruled by the Hittites, is found in the recently translated inscriptions of Tell Loh (on the Lower Tigris; cp. Records of the Past, N. S., ii. 75 sq.), in which the Akkadian king Gudea, about 2500 B.C., states that he ruled from the lower to the upper sea, and cut cedars in Amanus (Northern Lebanon), and brought diorite from Laban, which scholars agree—on account of other notices of the region—in identifying with the Sinaitic peninsula (see T. G. Pinches, Proceedings of the Victoria Institute, Jan. 1891). This text makes it clear that the Akkadians, or non-Semitic aborigines of Chaldea, who had attained to an advanced civilisation, were extending their conquests even earlier than the time usually assigned to Abraham's migration, at least as far as the north-east shores of the Mediterranean, and were in communication with the Sinaitic miners. The Akkadians are usually regarded as representing the Cushite population of Chaldea, already noticed, who were of the same original stock as the Hittites, according to the Book of Genesis; and their language, as identified by Sir H. Rawlinson, and by the numerous authorities who have accepted his views, was an agglutinative Mongolic dialect, represented in our own times by the archaic Mongol and Turkic languages of Central Asia.

Another early race, thought to have been of the same stock, had advanced from Commagene, or the region east of the Euphrates near the Taurus, and had settled in Lower Egypt as early as 2000 B.C. They are called the Men or Menti, apparently the later Minni or Minyans, a well-known tribe of Asia Minor, and described as living east of Ruten or Syria, and in the land of Assyria. They were finally driven out by the Theban kings, and are connected with the Hyksos, whose portraits are now held by many scholars to give strong evidence of Mongolic derivation. According to Mariette and other scholars, one of these Hyksos dynasties is to be regarded as of Hittite origin. It is perhaps to this element in the mixed population of Egypt, which also included Semitic and African stocks, that the Book of Genesis refers, in speaking of Egyptian tribes akin to the other sons of Ham in Chaldea and in Canaan.

With the rise of the great 18th Egyptian dynasty the Asiatics were driven back to their own countries, and Thothmes I. in the 17th century B.C. (about 1666 B.C. according to Brugsch) extended his conquests far north into Ruten or Syria, and even into Naharaim ("the two rivers") or the region beyond the Euphrates. Horses and chariots were among the spoils which he took from the Syrians in this campaign. In 1600 B.C., however, a formidable league of Syrians encountered Thothmes III., and attempted to throw off the Egyptian yoke. A great battle was fought near Megiddo in Central Palestine, and among the opponents was the king of Kadesh, who, as will appear immediately, may probably have been a Hittite. The very remarkable list of spoils taken after the Egyptian victory attests the wealth and civilisation of Syria at this early period (see Records of the Past, O. S., ii. 37). The whole of Palestine, except the hills of Jerusalem and Hebron, then held by the Amorites, fell into the power of Thothmes III. in consequence of this decisive engagement, and his victories were pushed northwards to Tunep (Tennûb) and Kadesh on the Orontes—the Hittite capital, where trees were cut down and the harvest carried off. The Egyptian rule was re-established as far as Naharaim, and even the king of Assyria became tributary. Among the tributary princes the chief of the Hittites is mentioned, from whom was exacted tribute of gold, silver, negro slaves, and boat-loads of ivory.

The country of the Hittites, with the regions further south, remained subject to Egypt for a century and a half after this conquest until the time of Amenophis IV.

The very remarkable tablets found in 1887 in Upper Egypt, at Tell Amarna, written in the cuneiform character, and in the majority of cases in a Semitic language, contain several notices of the Hittites (Thontafelfund von el Amarna, ed. H. Winckler, 1889-90).

There are about 300 of these letters: some from princes of Assyria, Babylon, and Syria; some from governors appointed by the Pharaohs in Palestine and Syria, and all addressed to Amenophis III. and his son Amenophis IV. In one of these the king of Alosa (a Syrian region) begs the king of Egypt not to make any treaty with the kings of the Hittites or of Shinar. In another letter the king of the Hittites is said to have been taken captive in the land of Mitani, which was close to Northern Syria, east of the Euphrates. In other letters the Egyptian governors or allies say that the king of the Hittites has seized the town of Tunep (Tennûb), and has rebelled, devastating the country, and that it is feared he will overrun Phoenicia. There are other notices of the "land of the Hittites" (Ahati); and in the later reign, when the Egyptian power was decadent, there are notices of rebellion and of an attack on the Egyptian governors by the Northern Hittites. The most interesting letter in the collection, for our present purpose, is, however, one from Tarkondara, king of Rezep, not far from Palmyra, who calls himself king of the Hittites, and who sends presents to Amenophis III., including tin, precious stones, and choice woods. The language of this letter, which includes 38 lines of writing, has been recognised by Dr. Winckler and other scholars to be probably that of the Hittites. It is not Semitic, and several scholars have pointed out that the forms of the verbs, the pronouns, and other words, serve to show that the language of this letter is connected with the Akkadian dialect of Lower Chaldea.

After the fall of the 18th dynasty and the loss of Syria, a reconquest was effected by Seti I. after his defeat of the Amorites near Hebron. He states in one of his inscriptions (see Chabas, Voyage d'un Égyptien, p. 327) that he carried off "chiefs of the Rutennu (or Syrians) from the land of the Kheta" or Hittites; but these victories were transient, and it was not until the accession of Rameses II. (about 1360 B.C.) that a permanent reconquest was effected. This great monarch, after taking Phalanx of the Hittites or Kheta, with the fortified town of Kadesh on the Orontes, surrounded by double ditches, over which are bridges (figs. 2 and 3). (Thebes.)

Ascalon and the towns of Upper Galilee, advanced by the sea-coast to the Dog River near Beirut, and crossed the Lebanon near Afka, descending to the valley of the Orontes near the Lake of Amuli (the present Lake of Yammûneh). Here he took prisoners, who falsely represented that the Hittites of Kadesh on the Orontes (Kades) had fled to Aleppo; and pushing in front of his army along the west bank of the Orontes, he fell into an ambush, and nearly lost his life. The Hittites were however driven back on the arrival of Egyptian troops, and fled to Kadesh, which, on the sculptures representing this event

(at Thebes), is pictured as a walled town with towers, surrounded by the river. The position fully accords with that of the present site of a ruined town on the Orontes south of Emesa, discovered in 1881 to still retain the name Kades. This city, which appears to be the Kadytis (ii. 159, iii. 5) in Syria of Herodotus, was the southern capital of the Hittites; but the troops of other Hittite princes, including the ruler of Aleppo, were allied with the Prince of Kadesh, and took part in the battle (see Records of the Past, O. S., ii. 87). On the sculptures the Hittites are represented armed with shields and spears, each warrior driven in a two-horsed chariot, having a charioteer beside him. Corps of infantry, standing in regular columns, are also shown near the city. After Kadesh had been reduced, Rameses pushed his way northwards, taking vengeance on the Hittite allies, among whom the natives of Aradus, Carchemish, Aleppo, and Naharaim are enumerated, with the Mysians, Dardanians, and other unknown tribes. The discovery of the cartouche of Rameses II. on the rock bas-relief of Mount Sipylus, near Smyrna, shows that the Egyptian advance was pushed westwards to the shores of the Aegean. Another text of the same reign (perhaps later) refers to a dispute between the Hittites and the Egyptians, concerning two statues of the Pharaoh which had been set up in a Hittite city. Tunep was conquered in the expedition which ensued, and the Egyptians again reached Naharaim or Mesopotamia (Brugsch, Hist. Egypt. ii. 63). The result of these victories was an alliance, cemented by marriage, between Rameses II. and Kheta Sar, the king of the Hittites. His eldest daughter so married to the Pharaoh received the Egyptian name Ur-maa-noferu-ra. The inscription states that "she herself knew not the impression which her beauty made on the heart" of her royal husband (Brugsch, Hist. Egypt. ii. 75, 86). Another very important document of this reign is an Egyptian copy of a treaty between Kheta Sar, king of the Hittites, and Rameses II. (Records of the Past, O. S., iv. 25; Chabas, Voyage d'un Égyptien, p. 333): the original—which Chabas supposes to have been in the Hittite language—is stated to have been written on a silver plate, and on the opposite side was a figure of Set, the Hittite god, embracing the Hittite king, with an inscription commencing, "O image of Set, king of heaven and earth, grant that the compact made by Kheta Sar, prince of the Kheta . . ." The Egyptian copy is unfortunately here mutilated. The provisions of the treaty are very important, and the document contains also historical information and valuable religious indications. It was sent by an envoy named Tartesebu from Kheta Sar, son of Maurasar and grandson of Saplili, Hittite kings. His elder brother Mautur is said to have fought Seti I. (breaking the earlier treaty) and to have been killed, but it was now desired to restore the condition of peace and alliance existing in the time of Saplili and of Mautur himself. Some of the clauses regulate the extradition of criminals and fugitives, and it is stipulated that such refugees are to be restored by either party, and are not to be punished by loss of eyes, feet or tongue, nor are their wives, children, or mothers to be punished, or any accusation brought against them. "Skilled workmen" from Syria or from Egypt, sent to the other country for special work, are not to be retained. The alliance in time of war is to be offensive as well as defensive. The gods are called to witness the treaty, including Ammon, Phra, Set, and Istar (or Antarata), with a thousand gods and a thousand goddesses on either side: and in addition the mountains, rivers, sea, wind, and clouds are invoked. This interesting document betokens a settled condition of civilisation, and an animistic creed.

The previous conflict with the Kheta was lightly regarded after peace was made, so that a court scribe writes, "History had nothing to report of the Kheta people, but that they had one heart and one soul with Egypt" (Brugsch, Hist. Egypt. ii. 86). In the reign of Menepthah (1300 B.C.) a great inroad of tribes from the north occurred, but the Hittites appear to have remained friendly to Egypt, and mention is made of wheat taken in ships from Egypt to preserve the lives of the Kheta people—probably in a time of famine. A century later however another invasion, in which the Danau (or Greeks) took part, was repulsed by Rameses III. (1200 B.C.): the Hittites are said to have been unable to withstand these northern hordes, who encamped in the land of the Amorites. They were however punished equally with others in the return expedition, when the Egyptians conquered Cyprus, and took Carchemish, Aleppo, Tarsus, and other places in the north. The king of the Hittites was taken alive and made a prisoner, with the Amorite chief and with others.

About 1120–1100 B.C., when the power of Egypt had decayed, Tiglath-pileser I. began to push westwards from Assyria, and attacked the Hittite tribes, among whom the Kaskaya and Hurunaya are specified as "warriors of the Khati" (Records of the Past, v. 6). A hundred and twenty chariots were taken, and the Assyrians, crossing the Euphrates on skin rafts, reached "Carchemish, belonging to the country of the Khati," and advanced to the Mediterranean or "upper sea of the setting sun." Iniel was king of Hamath at this time (cp. Records of the Past, iii. 52), and Mitani or Commagene, which was overrun, appears to have been held by a race of the same stock with the Hittites, judging from the language of the long letter of Dusratta, king of Mitani, to Amenophis III., which contains 500 lines of cuneiform writing. Further troubles awaited the Hittites in the reign of Assurnasir-pal (883–858 B.C.), when their princes were carried into captivity, and spoil taken by the Assyrians, including silver, gold, tin, copper, oxen, sheep, and horses: Carchemish was put to tribute, and gold and linen vestments were taken thence. From the Hittite chief Lubarna were taken 20 talents of silver, 1 talent of gold, 100 talents of tin, 1000 oxen, 10,000 sheep, with the precious vessels of the palace, chariots, and engines of war. The Assyrians again reached the Mediterranean, and took Gebal, Arvad, Tyre and Sidon. Shalmaneser II. (860–825 B.C.) also attacked these regions ("Black Obelisk," Records of the Past, v. 30), and took Pethor, a "Hittite city" west of the Euphrates (cp. Num. xxii. 5): the "kings of the Hittites" gave tribute, after Amanus (the Northern Lebanon) and Aleppo had been taken. The Hittite princes, with Irkhulena, king of Hamath, had leagued themselves with Benhadad of Syria to withstand this advance, but in the great battle in the plains of Northern Syria had been defeated, and the allies are said to have lost 20,500 men, slain with arrows. Carchemish was taken in 855 B.C., and six years later we again read of eighty-nine cities conquered, belonging to the "Hittites of the land of Hamath." Twelve Hittite kings are enumerated as contemporary rulers at this time. The final overthrow of their independence was effected by Sargon (Records of the Past, vii. 31), who found Pisiris, king of Carchemish, to have made an alliance with Mita the Moesian. The city was not only taken by the Assyrians in 717 B.C., but its inhabitants were carried off (like the Israelites) as captives to Assyria, and the town was repopled with Assyrian colonists; gold and silver, treasures of the palace, 50 chariots, and 200 riders with 3000 foot-soldiers were captured. The Hittite name thus disappears from monumental history within a century of the latest notice of their kings in the Old Testament. It is curious, however, that Sargon speaks of Ashdod, in Philistia, as a Hittite city, as though some remnant of the southern tribe still survived. At the present day the name of the Hittites seems to linger at the villages of Hatta (חתה) and Kefr Hatta in Philistia, as well as at the ruin of Tell Hatta, not far from Kadesh on the Orontes. It is also noticeable that the Jews of Persia in later times believed that remnants of the Canaanite population survived in Central Asia, and that Ptolemy (vi. 15, 16) speaks of the Khatae as a people near Cashgar. He evidently refers to the important Mongol people called the Khitai (Royal Asiatic Society Journal, xiii. ii.), who played a great part in the early history of Turkestan, and who conquered Western China about 900 A.D. They were conquered by Genghiz Khan; and if the Hittites were a Mongolic race, it is not impossible that some connexion exists between the Khitai and the old Kheta or Khati of the monuments.

Head of Hittite. (Thebes.)

As regards the nationality of the Hittites, the late Dr. Birch of the British Museum suggested that the Kheta were Mongols. He was followed by Rev. H. G. Tomkins (Times of Abraham, 1878) and by the present writer in 1883. Dr. Sayce has recently (The Hittites, 1888) adopted the same view, and has well described (p. 15) the appearance of the Kheta, as depicted on the Egyptian monuments. "The Hittites," he says, "were a people with yellow skins, and 'Mongoloid' features, whose receding foreheads, oblique eyes, and protruding upper jaws are as faithfully represented on their own monuments as they are on those of Egypt." The type may be seen in our own times among the Tartars of Turkestan, and even among the Turkish peasants of the Taurus, close to the Hittite country. The sculptures also represent them as wearing pigtails—a Tartar custom imposed on the Chinese at the time of the Tartar conquest. They wear boots similar to those of the modern Turks and Arabs, and in some cases a short jerkin, with a tall conical cap, such as Herodotus ascribes to the Sacae (vii. 64), and which was common among the Tartars of the Middle Ages, and worn also by the Etruscans in Italy (the tutulus of classic writers): the chiefs are represented however in long robes, and Kheta Sar is shown wearing a lofty tiara.

As regards the language of the Hittites, many theories have been advanced: it has been compared with Egyptian and Hebrew, though neither of these views is now supported by any scholar of eminence, Brugsch and Chabas having pronounced it non-Semitic—a view in which Dr. Sayce concurs. It has also been compared with Armenian, Georgian, Basque, and Chinese; but these languages are far too modern, and too much decayed from their earlier forms, to be considered legitimate subjects for comparative study. The question at present depends on the study of names of persons and places in the Hittite country, which appear to be neither Semitic nor Aryan, but are comparable with ancient Turanian words; and on the understanding of the letter of Turkondara the Hittite prince, already mentioned as written in the Hittite language, and in the well-known cuneiform script.

The remains of an ancient native civilisation, in the region which the Hittites ruled for so many centuries, have very naturally been supposed to show the workmanship of the Hittites and of their allies of the same race; and this is confirmed by the physiognomy of the people represented, who are usually beardless, with Mongol features, and in some cases wearing pigtails. This theory of the origin of the Syrian bas-reliefs and inscriptions was first put forward by Dr. W. Wright in 1874, and soon after found an advocate in Dr. Sayce. There is indeed no known race to whom the carving of these monuments can be attributed with greater probability than it may be to the Hittite population. But the more distant examples, in Asia Minor and Armenia, which appear to be later in some cases than those of Carchemish and Hamath, may have been executed by tribes of the same stock, who cannot strictly be called Hittites. History tells us nothing of any "Hittite empire," for in the time of Rameses II. and in the time of Sargon alike we find numerous chiefs of the Hittites, ruling at different cities, and allied to each other, under some daring or powerful leader, against their foreign foes.

The monuments so grouped represent a civilisation distinct from that of either Chaldea or Egypt, but which has been thought to supply the early prototypes for Greek and Phoenician art. The earliest discovery of Hittite inscriptions was made by Burckhardt in 1812 at Hamath. Since then many travellers have added to what is now a constantly increasing store of sculptures, inscriptions, seals, and gems, marked by the hieroglyphic symbols, and the peculiar features of a native art, which had its home in Northern Syria and on the southern slopes of the Taurus. Among such travellers were Major Fischer, George Smith, Perrot, Tyrwhitt Drake, Sir C. W. Wilson, and quite recently HH. Humann and Puchstein; while new and valuable finds have been made in 1890 by Prof. Ramsay and Mr. Hogarth. The regions in which further finds may be expected have not, however, yet been exhausted. The Hittite monuments in Syria occur at Hamath, Aleppo, and Carchemish, with one doubtful example at Damascus. Further north they occur frequently near Merash, and also at Samosata on the Euphrates north of Edessa. On the west other examples are known at Tyana, and near it at Ibrez, also yet further west near Ephesus (on the Weeping Niobe of Mount Sipylus) and in the pass of Karabel, where the figures now found are mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 106). Seals with Hittite characters have been brought from Lydia, and east of the Halys are the important ruins of Pteria and Eyuk, where the same art and the same system of hieroglyphic writing are found. Similar seals have also been found in Nineveh, and an inscribed bowl in Babylon, but these may be spoils taken from another region by Assyrians and later Babylonians.

As regards the age of these monuments, the most important clue is that discovered by Dr. Gollob in 1882. He found that the cartouche of Rameses II. is incised on the ancient carving called the "Weeping Niobe"—a bas-relief having a few clearly Hittite symbols in relief on the field. It is clear therefore that this monument existed already in 1360 B.C., and it is not improbable that the monuments of Hamath and Carchemish may be referred to a more remote date, contemporary with the earliest Akkadian and Egyptian sculptures.

The subject of many of these bas-reliefs is religious. Winged figures are represented, and fabulous monsters, deities standing on various animals—such as the lion, the hare, and the two-headed eagle (which became a device in later times among the Seljuks and Mongols). The sphinx and the winged horse, the gryphon, &c., are also found associated with Hittite symbols, and demons are represented much as among the Akkadians and Assyrians: the winged sun, common also to Egyptians and Babylonians, is a Hittite emblem. The figures as a rule are clumsy, and recall the early art of Babylonia, Greece, and Phoenicia, but they are perhaps more archaic than any of these latter. The Turkish boot, the conical cap, the pigtail, the bow and spear and shield, and a very heavy sword, are represented; while the females wear a cylindrical hat and a robe in many pleats. Some of the garments of kings and deities are adorned with patterns said still to be in use in Asia Minor. Most of the males are beardless, but a few cases occur in which a long beard is represented, with a shaven upper lip, as among the Phoenicians and Cypriote Greeks. The best executed reliefs yet found are from Carchemish. The hieroglyphic characters accompanying these sculptures represent the heads of animals (such as the bull, stag, sheep, ram, ass, dog, lion, camel, and hare), with a full figure of an eagle, and human heads, legs, arms, feet and hands, together with other less distinct emblems.

Monument from Jerash.

The system included over a hundred signs, which recur on all the texts. Some bear close resemblance in form, and probably in meaning, to the emblems of Egypt and of the Akkadians, but those which appear to denote grammatical terminations are distinct from the signs of other systems. The following particulars may be stated as generally agreed upon by all scholars who have given serious attention to the matter. (1) The Hittite system is distinct and native. (2) It must be studied on the same principles which led to the recovery of the cuneiform and Egyptian, being mainly syllabic as shown by the number of signs in use. (3) It was probably the origin of the syllabary used in Cyprus, and from this syllabary the sounds proper to the older emblems may in a few cases be recovered. [But see Peiser, Die Hittitischen Inschriften, p. xv.] (4) The lines read alternately from right to left and left to right, as in early Greek. (5) The syllables are arranged vertically in the line, as in the early Akkadian inscriptions.

The questions which remain in dispute refer to the proper sound and meaning of the emblems, and to the language which should be used for comparison. The view taken by Dr. Sayce (The Hittites, p. 134) is that the language spoken by the tribes round Lake Van in the 9th century

B.C. "may belong to the same family of speech." The objection taken to this view is that, in the opinion of Dr. Mordtmann and of other scholars, this Vannic language is an Aryan dialect, akin to ancient Persian or to Armenian. If the Hittites were, as Dr. Sayce has said, a "Mongoloid" people, it seems improbable that their language should have been Aryan, especially at so early an historic period. Dr. Sayce, however, does not admit the Vannic to be an Aryan language. [C. R. C.]

[The truth is that our knowledge of the language represented by the rock-inscriptions of Van is only less limited and precarious than our knowledge of the language (or languages) represented by the supposed Hittite inscriptions. At present, whatever our more or less probable conjectures, we do not certainly know the sound of a single "Hittite" symbol. Hardly any two investigators are agreed upon the reading of the bilingual "Boss of Tarkondemos," of which only a questionable cast is known to exist (cp. Rylands' remarks on the authenticity of this relic, PSBA. Nov. 1880). The latest handling of the "boss," that of Dr. F. E. Peiser of Breslau, a well-known Assyrian scholar, differs from all preceding attempts at decipherment in the values assigned to several of the six "Hittite" characters. The same may be said of the new "bilingual" seal, found in Cilicia, and now in the Ashmolean Museum (Academy, Jan. 9, 1892; Nachtrag zur Peiser, Die Hethitischen Inschriften, Berlin, 1892). The cuneiform letter of Tarhun-darau, king of Arzap(u), discovered at Tell al-Amarna, may or may not be the letter of a "Hittite" prince (Winckler doubtfully transcribes Tar-hu-un-dara-du: see Der Thontafelfund von el Amarna, i. No. 19; Academy, No. 916, p. 343 sq.). It is uncertain whether Arzapi was the Biblical Rezerph, which the Assyrians called Rasappa. Halévy places it in Asia Minor (Journal Asiatique, 1890, i. p. 292), and Dr. Lehmann compares an apparently gentilic Lycian name 𐌂𐌆𐌆𐌆 (Šamašsumukin, Nachträge, p. 113, Leipz. 1892). One thing is clear to every transcriber: if the letter of the king of Arzapi is "Hittite," the much longer letter of Dušratta of Mitāni (p. 1376, col. 2) is not Hittite (Winckler, ibid., No. 27). Moreover, the languages of these two ancient letters are confessedly as remote from the Semitic tongues as from each other. But all the Hittite proper names recorded in the Old Testament are of a decidedly Semitic complexion, and some of them, like Beeri and Uriah, are transparent Hebrew. As Prof. Robertson Smith has observed, with perfect justice, "Though the so-called Hittite monuments, which have given rise to so much speculation, may afford evidence that a non-Semitic people from Asia Minor at one time pushed its way into Northern Syria, it is pretty clear that the Hittites of the Bible, i.e. the non-Aramaic communities of Coele-Syria, were a branch of the Canaanite stock, and that the utmost concession that can be made to modern theories on this subject is that they may for a time have been dominated by a non-Semitic aristocracy" (Rel. of Semites, 1st ser. pp. 11, 12). But if there is no consensus of qualified opinion as to the language of the inscriptions, neither is there yet any general agreement as to their probable date. So far from referring the stones from Hamath and Jerabis to an earlier period than that of Ramses II. (p. 1378, col. 1), Puchstein, who holds that they are of Commagenian not Hittite origin, assigns all the so-called Hittite sculptures to the period between the 7th and 10th centuries B.C. Peiser repeats these dates; but, with present information, it is futile to attempt precision.

HIVITES, THE (𐌂𐌆𐌆𐌆, i.e. the Chivvite: ὁ Εὐβαῖος; in Josh. ix. 7 (LXX. v. 13), ὁ Χορβαῖος, and so A. in Gen. xxiv. 2: Hevæcus). The name is, in the original, uniformly found in the sing. number, and is so given in R. V. It never has, like that of the Hittites, a plural, nor does it appear in any other form. Perhaps we may assume from this that it originated in some peculiarity of locality or circumstance, as in the case of the Amorites—"mountaineers:" and not in a progenitor, as did that of the Ammonites, who are also styled Benê-Ammon—children of Ammon; or the Hittites, Benê-Cheth—children of Heth. The name is explained by Ewald (Gesch. i. 318) as Binnenländer, that is, "Midlanders;" by Gesenius (Thes. p. 451) as paganî, "villagers." In the following passages the name is given in the A. V. in the singular—THE HIVITE:—Gen. x. 17; Ex. xxiii. 28, xxxiii. 2, xxiv. 11; Josh. ix. 1, xi. 3; 1 Ch. i. 15; also Gen. xxiv. 2, xxxvi. 2. In all the rest it is plural.

1. In the genealogical tables of Genesis, "the Hivite" is named as one of the descendants—the sixth in order—of Canaan, the son of Ham (Gen. x. 17; 1 Ch. i. 15). In the first enumeration of the nations who, at the time of the call of Abraham, occupied the Promised Land (Gen. xv. 19–21), the Hivites are omitted from the Hebrew text (though in the Samaritan and LXX. their name is inserted). This has led to the conjecture, amongst others, that they are identical with the KADMONITES, whose name is found there and there only (Reland, Pal. p. 140; Bochart, Phal. iv. 36, Can. i. 19). But are not the Kadmonites rather, as their name implies, the representatives of the Benê-Kêdem, or "children of the East"? The name constantly occurs in the formula by which the country is designated in the earlier Books (Ex. iii. 8, 17, xiii. 5, xxiii. 23, 28, xxxiii. 2, xxiv. 11; Deut. vii. 1, xx. 17; Josh. iii. 10, ix. 1, xii. 8, xxiv. 11), and also in the later ones (1 K. ix. 20; 2 Ch. viii. 7; but cp. Ezra ix. 1 and Neh. ix. 8). It is, however, absent in the report of the spies (Num. xiii. 29), a document which fixes the localities occupied by the Canaanite nations at that time. Perhaps this is owing to the then insignificance of the Hivites, or perhaps to the fact that they were indifferent to the special locality of their settlements.

2. We first encounter the actual people of the Hivites at the time of Jacob's return to Canaan. Shechem was then (according to the current Hebrew text) in their possession, Hamor the Hivite being the "prince (נָשִׂיא) of the land" (Gen. xxxiv. 2). They were at this time, to judge of them by their rulers, a warm and impetuous people, credulous, and easily deceived by the crafty and cruel sons of Jacob. The narrative further exhibits them as peaceful and commercial, given to "trade" (v. 10, 21), and to the acquiring of "possessions" of cattle and other "wealth" (v. 10, 23, 28, 29). Like the Hittites, they held their assemblies or conferences in the gate of their city (v. 20). We may also see a testimony to their peaceful habits in the absence of any attempt at revenge on Jacob for the massacre of the Shechemites. Perhaps a similar indication is furnished by the name of the god of the Shechemites some generations after this—Baal-berith—Baal of the league, or the alliance (Judg. viii. 33, ix. 4, 46); by the way in which the Shechemites were beaten by Abimelech (v. 40); and by the unmilitary character, both of the weapon which caused Abimelech's death and of the person who discharged it (ix. 53).

The A. MS., and several other MSS. of the LXX., in the above narrative (Gen. xxxiv. 2) substitute "Horite" for "Hivite." The change is remarkable from the usually close adherence of the A. Codex to the Hebrew text, but it is not corroborated by any other of the ancient Versions, nor is it recommended by other considerations. No instances occur of Horites in this part of Palestine, while we know, from a later narrative, that there was an important colony of Hivites on the highland of Benjamin at Gibeon, &c., no very great distance from Shechem. On the other hand, in Gen. xxxvi. 2, where Aholibama, one of Esau's wives, is said to have been the daughter of the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite, all considerations are in favour of reading "Horite" for "Hivite." In this case we fortunately possess a detailed genealogy of the family, by comparison of which little doubt is left of the propriety of the change (cp. v. 20, 24, 25, 30, with v. 2), although no ancient Version has suggested it here.

3. We next meet with the Hivites during the conquest of Canaan (Josh. ix. 7, xi. 19). Their character is now in some respects materially altered. They are still evidently averse to fighting, but they have acquired—possibly by long experience in traffic—an amount of craft which they did not before possess, and which enables them to turn the tables on the Israelites in a highly successful manner (Josh. ix. 3–27). The colony of Hivites,* who made Joshua and the heads of the tribes their dupes on this occasion, had four cities—Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim—situated, if our present knowledge is accurate, at considerable distances asunder. It is not certain whether the last three were destroyed by Joshua or not (xi. 19); Gibeon certainly was spared. In v. 11 the Gibeonites speak of the "elders" of their city, a word which does not necessarily point to any special form of government, as is assumed by Winer (Heviter), who uses the ambiguous expression that they "lived under a republican constitution" (in republicanischer Verfassung)! See also Ewald (Gesch. i. 318–9).

4. The main body of the Hivites, however, were at this time living on the northern confines of Western Palestine—"under Hermon, in the land of Mizpeh" (Josh. xi. 3)—"in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal-hermon to the entering in of Hamath" (Judg. iii. 3). Somewhere in this neighbourhood they were settled when Joab and the captains of the host, in their tour of numbering, came to "all the cities of the Hivites" near Tyre (2 Sam. xxiv. 7). In the Jerusalem Targum on Gen. x. 17, they are called Tripolitans (טְרִיפּוֹלִיטָיִם), a name which points to the same general northern locality.

5. In speaking of the AVIM, or Avvites, a suggestion has been made by the writer that they may have been identical with the Hivites. This is apparently corroborated by the fact that, according to the notice in Deut. ii., the name of the Avites vanished before the Hivites appear on the scene of the sacred history. It is perhaps some corroboration of this that the LXX. (both MSS.) unmistakably translate Avim by Εβαιοι, Hivites. [G.] [W.]

HIZKI'AH, R. V. HEZEKIAH (חִזְקִיָּהוּ = strength of Jah; Ἐζεκίας; Ezechia), an ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

HIZKI'JAH, R. V. HEZEKI'AH (חִזְקִיָּהוּ; Ἐζεκία; Ezechia), according to the punctuation of the A. V. and R. V., a man who sealed the covenant of reformation with Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. x. 17). But some think that the name should be taken with that preceding it, as "Ater-Hizkijah," a name given in the lists of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. Further, the two names following these in x. 17,

* Here again the LXX. (both MSS.) have Horites for Hivites; but we cannot accept the change without further consideration.

18 (Azzur, Hodijah) are by some considered only corrupt repetitions of them.

This and the preceding name are identical with, and are the same as those given in A. V. as, HEZEKIAH.

HO'AB (חֹבָב, ? = beloved; B. Ὁβὰβ, A. Ὁβὰβ, in Judg. BA. Ἰωβὰβ; Hobab). This name is found in two places only (Num. x. 29; Judg. iv. 11), and it seems doubtful whether it denotes the father-in-law of Moses, or his son. (1.) In favour of the latter are (a) the express statement that Hobab was "the son of Raguel" (Num. x. 29); Raguel or Reuel—the Hebrew word in both cases is the same—being identified with Jethro, not only in Ex. ii. 18 (see Knobel-Dillmann in loco; cp. iii. 1, &c.), but also by Josephus, who constantly gives him that name. (b) The fact that Jethro had some time previously left the Israelite camp to return to his own country (Ex. xviii. 27). The words "the father-in-law of Moses" in Num. x. 29, though in most of the ancient Versions connected with Hobab, will in the original read either way, so that no argument can be founded on them. (2.) In favour of Hobab's identity with Jethro are (a) the words of Judg. iv. 11; but it should be remembered that this is (ostensibly) of later date than the other, and altogether a more casual statement. (b) Josephus in speaking of Raguel remarks once (Ant. ii. 12, § 1) that he "had Iothor (i.e. Jethro) for a surname" (αὐτοῦ γὰρ ἦν ἐπίκλημα τῷ Ἰαθούρη). From the absence of the article here, it is inferred by Whiston and others that Josephus intends that he had more than one surname, but this seems hardly safe.

The Muhammadan traditions are certainly in favour of the identity of Hobab with Jethro. He is known in the Koran and elsewhere, and in the East at the present day, by the name of Shu'ab (شعب), doubtless a corruption of Hobab (Ewald, Geschichte, ii. 59, note). According to those traditions, he was the prophet of God to the idolaters of Madyān (Midian), who not believing his message were destroyed (Lane's Koran, pp. 179-181); he was blind (ib. p. 180, n.); the rod of Moses was his gift,—it had once been the rod of Adam, and was of the myrtle of Paradise, &c. (ib. p. 190; Weill's Bibl. Legends, pp. 107-109). The name of Shu'ab still remains attached to one of the Wādys on the east side of the Jordan, opposite Jericho, through which, according to the tradition of the locality (Seetzen, Reisen, 1854, ii. 319, 376), the children of Israel descended to the Jordan. [BETH-NIMRAH.] According to this tradition, therefore, he accompanied the people as far as the Promised Land, though whatever weight that may possess is, when the statement of Ex. xviii. 27 is taken into account, against his identity with Jethro. Other places bearing his name and those of his two daughters are shown at Sinai and on the Gulf of 'Akabah (Stanley, S. & P. p. 33; Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, p. 75). His tomb was shown at Tiberias (Ibn Batuta, ii.).

But whether Hobab was the father-in-law of Moses or not, the notice of him in Num. x. 29-32, though brief, is full of point and interest. While Jethro is preserved to us as the wise and practised administrator, Hobab appears as the experienced Bedawi sheikh, to whom Moses looked for the material safety of his cumbrous caravan in the new and difficult ground before them. The tracks and passes of that "waste howling wilderness" were all familiar to him, and his practised sight would be to them "instead of eyes" in discerning the distant clumps of verdure which betokened the wells or springs for the daily encampment, and in giving timely warning of the approach of Amalekites or other spoilers of the desert. [JETHRO.] [G.] [W.]

HO'BAH (חֹבַב = concealed, Ges.; Χαβάα; Hoba), the place to which Abraham pursued the kings who had pillaged Sodom (Gen. xv. 15). It was situated "to the north of Damascus"

(חֹבַב לְדָמָסְכּוּס). Josephus mentions a tradition concerning Abraham which he takes from Nicolaus of Damascus: "Abraham reigned at Damascus, being a foreigner . . . and his name is still famous in the country; and there is shown a village called from him The Habitation of Abraham" (Ant. i. 7, § 2). It is remarkable that in the village of Burzah, 3 miles north of Damascus, there is a wāi held in high veneration by the Muhammadans, and called after the name of the patriarch, Masjid 'Ibrāhīm, "the prayer-place of Abraham." The tradition attached to it is that here Abraham offered thanks to God after the total discomfiture of the eastern kings. Behind the wāi is a cleft in the rock, in which another tradition represents the patriarch as taking refuge on one occasion from the giant Nimrod. It is remarkable that the word Hobah signifies "a hiding-place."

The Jews of Damascus affirm that the village of G'ōbar, not far from Burzah, is the Hobah of Scripture. They have a synagogue there dedicated to Elijah, to which they make frequent pilgrimages (see Handb. for Syr. and Pal.; Stanley, S. & P. p. 414 k). [J. L. P.] [W.]

HOD (הוֹד = glory; BA. Ὄδ; Hod), one of the sons of Zophah, among the descendants of Asher (1 Ch. vii. 37).

HODAVIAH (כַּתִּיב, הוֹדַוְיָהּ, altered in the Keri to הוֹדַוְיָהּ, i.e. HODAVYAHU = praise ye Jah, or his praise is Jah; B. Ὀδοῖα, A. Ὀδοῖα; Oduia), son of Elioenai, one of the last members of the royal line of Judah; mentioned 1 Ch. iii. 24.

HODAVIAH (הוֹדַוְיָהּ = הוֹדַוְיָהּ; BA. Ὀδοῖα; Odoia). 1. A man of Manasseh, one of the heads of the half-tribe on the east of Jordan (1 Ch. v. 24).

2. (B. Ὀδοῖα, A. Ὀδοῖα; Oduia.) A man of Benjamin, son of Has-senuah (1 Ch. ix. 7).

3. (B. Σοδοῖα, A. Σοδοῖα [the σ having been carried on from the previous word]; Odovia.) A Levite, who seems to have given his name to an important family in the tribe—the Bene-Hodaviah (Ezra ii. 40). In Nehemiah the name appears as HODEVAH. Lord A. Hervey has called attention to the fact that this name is closely connected with Judah (Genealogies, p. 119). This being the case, we probably find this Hodaviah mentioned again in iii. 9.

HO'DESH (חֹדֶשׁ = new moon; Ἄδα; Hodes), a woman named in the genealogies of Benjamin

(1 Ch. viii. 9) as the wife of a certain Shaharaim, and mother of seven children. Shaharaim had two wives besides Hodesh, or possibly Hodesh was a second name of one of those women (v. 8). The LXX. by rendering Baara B. 'Iḡaada, A. Baada, and Hodesh 'Ada, seem to wish to establish such a connexion.

HODEVAH (הודבא, Keri הודיה; Ἰ. Ὀδουία, B. Θουδουία; Oduia), Bene-Hodevah, a Levite family, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 43). In the parallel lists it is given as HODAVIAH (No. 3) and SUDIAS.

HODIAH (הודיה = glory of Jah; B. ה' 'Iḡuia, A. ה' 'Iḡuia; Oduia), one of the two wives of Ezra, a man of Judah, and mother to the founders of Keilah and Eshtemoa (1 Ch. iv. 19). She is doubtless the same person as Jehudijah (in v. 18; that is, "the Jewess;" B. 'Aḡad, B. 'Iḡad); in fact, except the article, which is disregarded in the A. V., the two names are identical [cp. HODAVIAH, No. 3]. Hodiah is exactly the same name as HODIAH, under which form it is given more than once in the A. V.

HODIAH (הודיה; BNA. 'Oduia; Odia, Odaia). This is in the original precisely the same name as the preceding, and is so given in R. V., though spelt differently in the A. V.

1. A Levite in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. vii. 7; and probably also ix. 5, x. 10). The name with others is omitted in the first two of these passages in the LXX.

2. (B. 'Oduia, A. 'Oduia; Odaia). Another Levite at the same time (Neh. x. 13).

3. (BA. 'Oduia; Odaia). A layman; one of the "heads" of the people at the same time (Neh. x. 18).

HOG'LAH (הוגלא = partridge; B. 'Eglā, AF. Aḡlā, [in Josh. i. Aḡlā; Hegla], the third of the five daughters of Zelophehad, in whose favour the law of inheritance was altered so that a daughter could inherit her father's estate when he left no sons (Num. xxvi. 33 [LXX. v. 37], xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3). The name also occurs in BETH-HOGLAH, which see.

HOSHAM (חשמ, Ges.; Aḡām; Oham), king of Hebron at the time of the conquest of Canaan (Josh. x. 3); one of the five kings who were pursued by Joshua down the pass of Bethhoron, and who were at last captured in the cave at Makedah and there put to death. As king of Hebron he is frequently referred to in Josh. x., but his name occurs in the above passage only.

HOLM-TREE (פריוס; ilex) occurs only in the apocryphal story of Susanna (v. 58). The passage contains a characteristic play on the names of the two trees mentioned by the elders in their evidence. That on the mastich (σχίνον... ἄγγελος σχίσει σε) is noticed under that head [ΜΑΣΤΙΧΗ]. That on the holm-tree (פריוס) is "the Angel of God waiteth with the sword to cut thee in two" (πρίσαι σε). For the historical significance of these puns, see SUSANNA. The prinos of Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. iii. 7, § 3, and 16, § 1, and elsewhere) and Dioscorides (i. 144) denotes, there can be no doubt, the Quercus coccifera, L., and the Q. pseudo-coccifera, Desl., which is perhaps not specifically distinct from the first-mentioned oak. The ilex of the Roman writers was applied both to the holm-oak (Quercus ilex, L.) and to the Q. coccifera or kermes oak. See Pliny, N. H. xvi. 6.

For the oaks of Palestine, see a paper by Dr. Hooker in the Trans. of the Linn. Soc. xxiii. pt. ii. pp. 381-387. [OAK.] [W. H.]

HOLOFER'NES, or, more correctly, OLOPHERNES (Ολοφέρνης), was, according to the book of Judith, a general of Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Assyrians (Judith ii. 4), who was slain by the Jewish heroine Judith during the siege of Bethulia. [JUDITH.] The name is a debased form of Orophernes, a standing title of the princes of Cappadocia. It occurs twice in Cappadocian history, as borne by the brother of Ariarathes I. (c. B.C. 350), and afterwards by a pretender to the Cappadocian throne, who was at first supported and afterwards imprisoned by Demetrius Soter (c. B.C. 158). The termination (cp. Tissaphernes, &c.) points to a Persian origin, but the meaning of the word is uncertain. Ball compares the names of two Median princes conquered by Egar-haddon, Sidir-parna and E-parna. This illustrates the Syriac rendering of Olophernes, ܠܘܦܗܪܢܐ, Alipharnā. See Speaker's Comm. on Judith l. c.

HOL'ON (ח'לון; Χαλόν, [in Josh. xv.] BA. Χαλουόν; [in Josh. xxi.] B. ἡ Γελά, A. 'Olon; Holon). 1. A town in the mountains of Judah; one of the first group, of which Debir was apparently the most considerable. It is named between GOSHEN and GILOH (Josh. xv. 51), and was allotted with its "suburbs" to the priests (xxi. 15). In the list of priests' cities of 1 Ch. vi. the name appears as HILEN. In the Onomasticon ('Oλω, OS.² p. 291, 2; Ocho, OS.² p. 176, 29) it is mentioned, but not so as to imply its then existence. The site has not yet been recovered, but it may perhaps be Bait Aila, on a spur N.W. of Hebron and S.W. of Kh. Jalā, Giloh.

2. (ח'לון; Χαλόν; Holon). A city of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 21, only). It was one of the towns of the Mishor, the level downs (A. V. "plain country") east of Jordan, and is named with Jahazah, Dibon, and other known places; but no identification of it has yet taken place, nor does it appear in the parallel lists of Num. xxxii. and Josh. xiii. It is mentioned by Eusebius (Χελὼν ἢ καὶ Ἐλών, OS.² p. 290, 74) as a town of Moab, without any indication of position.

[G.] [W.]

HOM'AM (ח'מא, (?)=extermination, Ges.; Aḡmān; Homan), the form under which in 1 Ch. i. 39 an Edomite name appears, which in Gen. xxxvi. 22 is given HEMAM. Homam is assumed by Gesenius to be the original form (Theo. p. 385 a). By Knobel (cp. Dillmann² on Gen. l. c.), the name is compared with that of Homaimah (ܗܘܡܝܡܗ), a town now ruined, though once important, halfway between Petra and Ailath, on the ancient road at the back of the mountain. See Laborde, Journey, p. 207, Ameimé; also the Arabic authorities mentioned by Knobel.

HOMER. [MEASURES.]

HONEY. We have already noticed [FOOD] the extensive use of honey as an article of ordinary food among the Hebrews: we shall therefore in the present article restrict ourselves to a description of the different articles which passed under the Hebrew name of d'bash (דבש). (1.) In the first place it applies to the product of the bee, to which we exclusively apply the name of honey. All travellers agree in describing Palestine as a land "flowing with honey" (Ex. iii. 8), bees being abundant even in the remote parts of the wilderness, where they deposit their honey in the crevices of the rocks or in hollow trees. In some parts of Northern Arabia the hills are so well stocked with bees, that no sooner are hives placed than they are occupied (Wellsted's Travels, ii. 123). The Hebrews had special expressions to describe the exuding of the honey from the comb, such as nopheth (נֹפֶת), "dropping" (Cant. iv. 11; Prov. v. 3, xxiv. 13); siph (סִיף), "overflowing" (Ps. xix. 10; Prov. xvi. 24), and ya'ar (יָאָר = flowing honey) or ya'arah (יָאָרָה); 1 Sam. xiv. 27; Cant. v. 1)—expressions which answer to the mel acetum of Pliny (xi. 15): the second of these terms approaches nearest to the sense of "honeycomb," inasmuch as it is connected with nopheth in Ps. xix. 10, "the droppings of the honeycomb" (R. V.). (2.) In the second place, the term d'bash applies to a decoction of the juice of the grape, which is still called dibs, and which forms an article of commerce in the East; it was this, and not ordinary bee-honey, which Jacob sent to Joseph (Gen. xliii. 11), and which the Tyrians purchased from Palestine (Ezek. xxvii. 17). The mode of preparing it is described by Pliny (xiv. 11): the must was either boiled down to a half (in which case it was called defrutum), or to a third (when it was called siracum, or sapa, the σάραος οἶνος and σάραμα of the Greeks): it was mixed either with wine or milk (Virg. Georg. i. 296; Ov. Fast. iv. 780): it is still a favourite article of nutriment among the Syrians, and has the appearance of coarse honey (Russell, Aleppo, i. 82). (3.) A third kind has been described by some writers as "vegetable" honey, by which is meant the exudations of certain trees and shrubs, such as the Tamarix mannifera, found in the Peninsula of Sinai or the stunted oaks of Luristan and Mesopotamia. The honey which Jonathan ate in the wood (1 Sam. xiv. 25), and the "wild honey" which supported St. John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 4), have been referred to this species. We do not agree with this view: the honey in the wood was in such abundance that Jonathan took it up on the end of a stick; but the vegetable honey is found only in small globules, which must be carefully collected and strained before being used (Wellsted, ii. 50). The use of the term ya'ar in that passage is decisive against this kind of honey. The μέλι ἄγριον of Matthew need not mean anything else than the honey of the wild bees, which we have already stated to be common in Palestine, and which Josephus (B. J. iv. 8, § 3) specifies among the natural productions of the plain of Jericho: the expression is certainly applied by Diodorus Siculus (xix. 94) to honey exuded from trees; but it may also be applied like the Latin mel silvestre (Plin. xi. 16) to a particular kind of bee-honey. (4.) A fourth kind is described by Josephus (l. c.) as being manufactured from the juice of the date.

The prohibition against the use of honey in meat offerings (Lev. ii. 11) appears to have been grounded on the fermentation produced by it, honey soon turning sour, and even forming vinegar (Plin. xxi. 48). This fact is embodied in the Talmudical word hidbush = "to ferment," derived from d'bash (cp. Knobel-Dillmann in loco). Other explanations have been offered, as that bees were unclean (Philo, De Sacrif. vi. App. ii. 255), or that the honey was the artificial dibs (Bähr, Symbol. ii. 323). [W. L. B.] [F.]

HOOD. Is. iii. 23 (R. V. "turban"). [HEAD-DRESS.]

HOOK, HOOKS. Various kinds of hooks are noticed in the Bible, of which the following are the most important:—

1. Fishing-hooks (חֲזֵז, חֲזֵז, Amos iv. 2; חֲזֵז, Job xli. 2; Is. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15). The first two of these Hebrew terms mean primarily thorns, and secondarily fishing-hooks, from the similarity in shape, or perhaps from thorns having been originally used for the purpose; in both cases the LXX. and Vulg. are mistaken in their renderings, giving θαλασσι and contis for the first, λέβητας and ollis for the second: the third term refers to the contraction of the mouth by the hook.

2. חֲזֵז (A. V. "thorn," R. V. "hook"), properly a ring (ψέλλιον, circulus) placed through the mouth of a large fish and attached by a cord (חֲזֵז) to a stake for the purpose of keeping it alive in the water (Job xli. 2); the word (in v. 2a) meaning the cord is rendered "hook" in the A. V. (R. V. "rope") and = σχοῖνος.

3. חֲזֵז and חֲזֵז, generally rendered "hook" in the A. V. after the LXX. ἀγκιστρον, but properly a ring (circulus), such as in ov: country is placed through the nose of a bull, and similarly used in the East for leading about lions (Ezek. xix. 4, where the A. V. has "with chains," R. V. "with hooks"), camels and other animals. A similar method was adopted for leading prisoners, as in the case of Manasseh, who was led with rings (2 Ch. xxxiii. 11; A. V. "among the thorns," R. V. "in chains," marg. with hooks). An illustration of this practice is found in a bas-relief discovered at Khorasabad (Layard, ii. 376). The expression is used several times in this sense (2 K. xix. 28; Is. xxxvii. 29; Ezek. xxix. 4, xxxviii. 4). The term חֲזֵז is used in a similar sense in Job xl. 24 (A. V., marg. bore his nose with a gin; R. V. text, "pierce through his nose with a snare").

Hook. (Layard's Nineveh.)

4. חֲזֵז, a term exclusively used — reference to the Tabernacle, rendered "hooks" in the A. V. and R. V. The LXX. varies in its rendering, sometimes giving κεφαλῆς, i.e. the capital of the pillars, sometimes κρῖκος and ἀγκύλη; the expenditure of gold, as given in Ex. xxxviii. 28, has led to this doubt; they were, however, most probably hooks (Ex. xxvi. 32, 37; xxvii. 10 sq.; xxxviii. 10 sq.): the word seems to have given name to the letter ה in the Hebrew alphabet, from a similarity of its form, both in the Hebrew square character and in Phoenician, to a hook (see MV.¹¹).

5. הַמְּוֹלֵה, a vine-dresser's pruning-hook (Is. ii. 4, xviii. 5; Micah iv. 3; Joel iii. 10).

6. מוֹלֵךְ and מוֹלֵג (κρεάγρα), a flesh-hook for getting up the joints of meat out of the boiling pot (Ex. xvii. 3; 1 Sam. u. 13, 14).

7. מוֹלֵעַ (Ezek. xl. 43), a term of very doubtful meaning, probably meaning "hooks" (as in the text of A. V. and R. V.), used for the purpose of hanging up animals to flay them (parvilli bifurci, Gesen. Thesaur. p. 1470); other meanings given are—ledges (R. V. marg.; labia, Vulg.); pens for keeping the animals previous to their being slaughtered; hearth-stones, as in A. V. marg.; and lastly, gutters to receive and carry off the blood from the slaughtered animals (see Cornill and Orelli [in Strack u. Zöckler's Aegf. Komm.] in loco). [W. L. B.] [F.]

HOPH'NI (הֹפְנִי, ? = my fist [cp. the name of Sabaean kings הֹפְנִי; see MV.¹¹]; 'Οφνι) and PHINEHAS, the two sons of Eli, who fulfilled their hereditary sacerdotal duties at Shiloh. Their brutal rapacity and lust, which seemed to acquire fresh violence with their father's increasing years (1 Sam. ii. 22, 12–17), filled the people with disgust and indignation, and provoked the curse which was denounced against their father's house first by an unknown prophet (vv. 27–36), and then by Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 11–14). They were both cut off in one day in the flower of their age, and the Ark which they had accompanied to battle against the Philistines was lost on the same occasion (1 Sam. iv. 10, 11). The predicted ruin and ejection of Eli's house were fulfilled in the reign of Solomon. [ELI; ZADOK.] The unbridled licentiousness of these young priests gives us a terrible glimpse into the fallen condition of the chosen people (Ewald, Gesch. ii. 538–638; Stanley, Hist. of the Jewish Church, Lecture xvii.). The Scripture calls them "sons of Belial" (1 Sam. ii. 12); and to this our great poet alludes in the words—

— "to him no temple stood
Or altar smoked; yet who more oft than he
In temples and at altars, when the priest
Turns atheist, as did Eli's sons, who filled
With lust and violence the house of God?"

Par. Lost, l. 492. [F. W. F.]

HOR, MOUNT (הַר הָהָר), i.e. "Hor the mountain," remarkable as the only case in which the name comes first). 1. (ὄρος ἡ ὄρος; Mons Hor), the mountain on which Aaron died (Num. xx. 25, 27, xxxiii. 38; Deut. xxxii. 50). The word Hor is regarded by the lexicographers as an archaic form of Har, the usual Hebrew term for "mountain" (Gesenius, Thes. p. 391 b), so that the meaning of the name is simply "the mountain of mountains," as the LXX. have it in another case (see below, No. 2), τὸ ὄρος τὸ ὄρος; Vulg. mons altissimus; and Jerome (Ep.

ad Fabiolam) non in monte simpliciter sed in montis monte.

The few facts given us in the Bible regarding Mount Hor are soon told. It was "on the boundary line" (Num. xx. 23) or "at the edge" (xxxiii. 37) of the land of Edom. It was the next halting-place of the people after Kadesh (xx. 22; xxxiii. 37), and they quitted it for Zalmonah (xxxiii. 41) in the road to the Red Sea (xxi. 4). It was during the encampment at Mount Hor that Aaron was gathered to his fathers. At the command of Jehovah, he, his brother, and his son ascended the mountain, in the presence of the people, "in the eyes of all the congregation." The garments, and with the garments the office, of high-priest were taken from Aaron and put upon Eleazar, and Aaron died there in the top of the mountain. In the circumstances of the ascent of the height to die, and in the marked exclusion from the Promised Land, the end of the one brother resembled the end of the other; but in the presence of the two survivors, and of the gazing crowd below, there is a striking difference between this event and the solitary death of Moses.

Mount Hor "is one of the very few spots connected with the wanderings of the Israelites which admit of no reasonable doubt" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 86). It is almost unnecessary to state that it is situated on the eastern side of the great valley of the Arabah, the highest and most conspicuous of the whole range of the sandstone mountains of Edom, having close beneath it on its eastern side—though, strange to say, the two are not visible to each other—the mysterious city of Petra. The tradition has existed from the earliest date. Josephus does not mention the name of Hor (Ant. iv. 4, § 7), but he describes the death of Aaron as taking place "on a very high mountain which surrounded the metropolis of the Arabs," which latter "was formerly called Arke, but now Petra." In the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome (OS. p. 291, 88; p. 175, 14) it is Or mons—"a mountain in which Aaron died, close to the city of Petra." When it was visited by the Crusaders (see the quotations in Robinson, p. 521), the sanctuary was already on its top, and there is little doubt that it was then what it is now—the G'abal Nabī Hārūn, "the mountain of the Prophet Aaron."

Mount Hor is formed of beds of red sandstone and conglomerate which have a gentle "dip," or inclination eastwards, towards Wādī Musā, and rise in a precipitous wall of natural masonry, tier above tier, with their faces to the west. The base of the cliff of sandstone rests upon a solid mass of granite and porphyry traversed by dykes; and against the western face of this, beds of cretaceous limestone are thrown down by a large fault which runs north and south. The sandstone resting on the granite has the appearance of "a mountain on a mountain," and its summit, crowned by the little white mosque that covers the tomb of Aaron, is somewhat in the form of a rude pyramid. "The mount is flanked by two remarkable bastions of sandstone, standing erect on the granitic base, and somewhat in advance of the mural cliffs." The granite base on which the sandstone rests is the "plain of Aaron," beyond which Burckhardt was, after all his toils, prevented from ascending (Travels in Syria and the H. L., pp. 429, 430).

From this place an ancient path, similar to that on G'abal Mūsā, with worn steps made out of boulders at difficult parts, leads up the mountain to another level space, or platform, from which the highest peak rises abruptly, and here sheep are sacrificed to "the Prophet Aaron." A flight of steps cut out of the rock leads hence up a steep precipice to the tomb itself, and about halfway up these steps is a large cistern or chamber covered in with arches, over which the staircase is built. The altitude of Mount Hor above the sea is about 4,580 ft., above Petra about 1,325 ft., and above the Dead Sea about 5,872 ft. (Hull, PEF. Mem. "Geology," p. 106, with geological section; Hull and Kitchener, Mount Seir, pp. 86, 95, 211; Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, pp. 434, 435).

The mosque, an ordinary Muslim wali, is a small square building, measuring inside about 28 ft. by 33 (Wilson, Lands, p. 295), with its door in the S.W. angle. Over the door is an inscription, stating that the building was restored by ash-Shim'āni, the son of Muhammad Kalaḥn, Sultan of Egypt by his father's orders, A.H. 739. The wali is built of rude stones, in part broken columns; all of sandstone, but fragments of granite and marble lie about. Steps lead to the flat roof of the wali, from which rises the usual white dome. The interior consists of two chambers, one below the other. The upper one has four large pillars and a stone chest, or tombstone, like one of the ordinary slabs in churchyards, but larger and higher, and rather bigger at the top than at the bottom. At its head is a high round stone, on which sacrifices are made, and which retained, when Stephens saw it, the marks of the smoke and blood of recent offerings. "On the slab are Arabic inscriptions, and it is covered with shawls, chiefly red. One of the pillars is hung with votive offerings of beads, &c., and two ostrich eggs are suspended over the chest. Steps in the N.W. angle lead down to the lower chamber, which is partly in the rock, but plastered. It is perfectly dark. At the end, apparently under the stone chest above, is a recess guarded by a grating. Within this is a rude protuberance, whether of stone or plaster was not ascertainable, resting on wood, and covered by a ragged pall. This lower recess is no doubt the tomb, and possibly ancient. What is above is only the artificial monument and certainly modern."* In one of the walls of the upper chamber is a "round polished black stone," one of those mysterious stones of which the prototype is the Kaaba at Mecca, and which, like that, would appear to be the object of great devotion (Martineau, pp. 419-20).

The impression received on the spot is that Aaron's death took place in the small basin between the two peaks, and that the people were stationed either on the plain at the base of the peaks, or at that part of the Wādī Kusaibah from which the top is commanded. Josephus says that the ground was sloping downwards (καταρτες ἦν τὸ χωρίον; Ant. iv. 4, § 7). But this may be the mere general expression of a man who had never been on the spot. The greater part of the above information was kindly communicated to the writer by Dean Stanley.

The chief interest of Mount Hor will always consist in the prospect from its summit—the last view of Aaron—"that view which was to him what Pisgah was to his brother." It is described at length by Irby (p. 134), Wilson (i. 292-9), Martineau (p. 420), and is well summed up by Stanley in the following words:—"We saw all the main points on which his eye must have rested. He looked over the valley of the 'Arabah countersected by its hundred water-courses, and beyond, over the white mountains of the wilderness they had so long traversed; and at the northern edge of it there must have been visible the heights through which the Israelites had vainly attempted to force their way into the Promised Land. This was the western view. Close around him on the east were the rugged mountains of Edom, and far along the horizon the wide downs of Mount Seir, through which the passage had been denied by the wild tribes of Esau who hunted over their long slopes." On the north lay the mysterious Dead Sea gleaming from the depths of its profound basin (Stephens Incidents). "A dreary moment, and a dreary scene—such it must have seemed to the aged priest. . . . The peculiarity of the view is the combination of wide extension with the scarcity of marked features. Petra is shut out by intervening rocks. But the survey of the Desert on one side, and the mountains of Edom on the other, is complete; and of these last the great feature is the mass of red bald-headed sandstone rocks, intersected not by valleys but by deep seams" (S. & P. p. 87). Though Petra itself is entirely shut out, one outlying building—if it may be called a building—is visible, that which goes by the name of the Dair, or Convent. Dean Stanley has thrown out a suggestion on the connexion between the two which is well worth investigation.

2. (τὸ ὄρος τὸ ὄρος; mons altissimus.) A mountain, entirely distinct from the preceding, named, in Num. xxiv. 7, 8, only, as one of the marks of the northern boundary of the land which the children of Israel were about to conquer. The identification of this mountain has always been one of the puzzles of Sacred Geography. The Mediterranean was the western boundary. The northern boundary started from the sea; the first point in it was Mount Hor, and the second the entrance of Hamath. Since Sidon was subsequently allotted to the most northern tribe—Asher, and was, so far as we know, the most northern town so allotted, it would seem probable that the northern boundary would commence at about that point; that is, opposite to where the great range of Lebanon breaks down to the sea. The next landmark, the entrance to Hamath, is the valley of the ELEUTHERUS, Nahr al-Kabir, which rises not far from Homs, the ancient Hamath, and divides the Lebanon from the range to the north. Surely "Mount Hor" then can be nothing else than the great chain of Lebanon itself. Looking at the massive character and enormous height of the range, it is very difficult to suppose that any individual peak or mountain is intended and not the whole mass, which takes nearly a straight course between the two points just named, and includes below it the great plain of the Bukh'a and the whole of Palestine properly so called.

The Targum Pseudojon. renders Mount Hor by Umanos, probably intending Amana. The latter is also the reading of the Talmud (Gittin 8, quoted by Fürst, sub voce), in which it is connected with the Amana named in Cant. iv. 8. But the situation of this Amana is nowhere indicated by them. It cannot have any connexion with the Amana or Abana river which flowed through Damascus, as that is quite away from the position required in the passage. By the Jewish geographer Parchi (Benj. of Tudela, 413, &c.), for various traditional and linguistic reasons, a mountain is fixed upon very far to the north; in fact, though they do not say so, very near the Mons Amanus of the classical geographers. But this is some 200 miles north of Sidon and 150 above Hamath, and is surely an unwarranted extension of the limits of the Holy Land. Schwarz (pp. 6, 32) with greater probability identifies it with the bold promontory, Râs esh-Shuk'ah, known to the Greeks as Theoprosopon, to the south of Tripolis (see other conjectures in Dillmann.² For the views of the Jewish commentators, see Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, p. 7 sq.). The great range of Lebanon is so clearly the natural northern boundary of the country, that there seems no reason to doubt that the whole range is intended by the term Hor. Robinson, however (Phys. Geog. p. 314), limits this Hor "to the northern end of Lebanon Proper, or a spur connected with it." [G.] [W.]

HO'RAM (ὄρη = elevated, great; BA. Αἰλάμ; Horam), king of GEZER at the time of the conquest of the south-western part of Palestine (Josh. x. 33). He came to the assistance of Lachish, but was slaughtered by Joshua with all his people.

HO'REB (ὄρη = dry; Χωρήθ; A. in Deut. i. 19, Σοχωθ: Horeb). Ex. iii. 1, xvii. 6, xxxiii. 6; Deut. i. 2, 6, 19, iv. 10, 15, v. 2, ix. 8, xviii. 16, xxix. 1; 1 K. viii. 9, xix. 8; 2 Ch. v. 10; Ps. cvii. 19; Mal. iv. 4; Ecclus. xlviii. 7. [SINAL.]

HORE'M (ὄρη = dedicated; B. Μεγαλαρείμ, A. Μαγαλιθωρείμ, both by inclusion of the preceding name; Horem), an unidentified fortified place in the territory of Naphtali; named with Iron, Migdal-el, and Beth-anath (Josh. xix. 38). Van de Velde (i. 178-9; Memoir, p. 322) suggests Hurah (in PEF. lists Ἀῆ. el-Kûrah) as the site of Horem. It is an ancient site in the centre of the country, half-way between the Râs en-Nâkûrah and the Lake Merom. It is also in favour of this identification that Hurah is near Farân, probably the representative of the ancient IRON, named with Horem. Conder (Hbk. p. 415) suggests Kh. Hârah, in the hills W. of Meis. [G.] [W.]

HOR HAGID'GAD, R. V. HOR HAGIDGAD (ὄρη ἡ ἡνὶ γαδ; τὸ ὄρος Γαδγὰδ; Mons Gadgad—both reading ἡ for ὄρη), the name of a desert station where the Israelites encamped (Num. xxxiii. 32, 33), probably the same as Gudgodah (Deut. x. 7). In both passages it stands in sequence with three others,—Moserah or Moseroth, Beeroth, Bene Jaakan, and Jotbath or Jotbahah; but the order is not strictly preserved [see WILDERNESS OF WANDERING]. It is observable that on the west side of the 'Arabah Robinson (vol. i., map) has the Wâdy Ghûdâghîdh, which may bear the same meaning; but as that meaning might be perhaps applied to a great number of localities, it would be dangerous to infer identity. The junction of this wady with the 'Arabah would not, however, be unsuitable for a station between Mount Hor, near which Moserah lay (cp. Num. xx. 28, Deut. x. 6), and Ezion-geber. *Dillmann*² (Num. l. c.) argues from the epithet Hor that it was in the land of the Horites near Aaron's burial-place. [H. H.] [W.]

HOR'L (ח'רל), but in Ch. ח'רל = inhabitant of caves, Ges., Fürst; in Gen. A. Xoppel, in Ch. A. Xoppel, B. Xoppel; Hori, a Horite, as his name betokens; son of Lotan the son of Seir, and brother to Hemam and Homam (Gen. xxxvi. 22; 1 Ch. i. 39). No trace of the name appears to have been met with in modern times.

2. (A. Xoppel; Horraeorum.) In Gen. xxxvi. 30, the name has in the original the definite article prefixed—ח'רל = "the Horite;" and is in fact precisely the same word as that which in the preceding verse, and also in v. 21, is rendered in the A. V. "the Horites."

3. (ח'רל; A. Zoupl, B. Zoupel, the s being carried on from the previous word; Huri.) A man of Simeon, father of Shaphat, who represented that tribe among the spies sent up into Canaan by Moses (Num. xiii. 5).

HORITES and HORIMS (ח'ר, Gen. xiv. 6, and ח'ר, Deut. ii. 12; Xoppai; Chorraei, Horraei: also HORITE in the sing., Gen. xxxvi. 20, Xoppaios; Horraeus), the aboriginal inhabitants of Mount Seir (Gen. xiv. 6), and probably allied to the Emim and Rephaim. The name Horite (ח'ר, "a troglodyte," from ח'ר, "a hole" or "cave") appears to have been derived from their habits as "cave-dwellers." Their excavated dwellings are still found in hundreds in the sandstone cliffs and mountains of Edom, and especially in Petra. [EDOM and EDOMITES.] It may, perhaps, be to the Horites that Job refers in xxx. 6, 7. They are only three times mentioned in Scripture: first, when they were smitten by the kings of the East (Gen. xiv. 6); then when their genealogy is given in Gen. xxxvi. 20-30 and 1 Ch. i. 38-42; and lastly when they were exterminated by the Edomites (Deut. ii. 12, 22). It is probable that they were not Canaanites, but an earlier race, who inhabited Mount Seir before the posterity of Canaan took possession of Palestine (Ewald, Gesch. i. 304-5). [J. L. P.] [W.]

HOR'MAH (ח'רמא): but in Num. xxi. 3, Judg. i. 17, 'Αράβημα, A. [in Judg.] Ἐλαόθρονεις; Num. xiv. 45, B. 'Ερμάς, AF. -a; Josh. xii. 14, B. 'Ερμάθ, A. -a; xv. 30, B. 'Ερμά, A. 'Ερμάλ; 1 Sam. xxx. 30, B. 'Ιερειμοθ, A. Ραμμά; Horma, Harma, Arama: its earlier name Zephath, צפא, is found in Judg. i. 17) was the chief town of a "king" of a Canaanitish tribe reduced by Joshua (Josh. xii. 14; cp. Judg. i. 17). It was situated in the Negeb, or extreme south of Palestine, and became a city of the territory of Judah (Josh. xv. 30), but apparently belonged to Simeon, whose territory is reckoned as part of the former (Josh. xix. 4; cp. 1 Ch. iv. 30). It was at or near the foot of the pass by which the Israelites attempted to enter Palestine, and where they were defeated (Num. xiv. 45; Deut. i. 44); and it was afterwards captured and destroyed by Judah and Simeon (Num. xxi. 3; Judg. 17). The seeming inconsistency between the two last passages may be relieved by supposing that the vow made at the former period was fulfilled at the latter, and the name (the root of which, ח'ר, constantly occurs in the sense of "to devote to destruction," or "utterly to destroy") given by anticipation. It is mentioned in the lists of towns (Josh. xv. 30, xix. 4) next to Ziklag; and it was one of the places friendly to David, to which a share of the spoil, taken from the marauding Amalekites, was sent (1 Sam. xxx. 30). Hormah would appear, from indications in the narrative, to have been not far from Kadesh (cp. Num. xiii. 26, and xiv. 40-45), and in the S.E. portion of the Negeb in the vicinity of Seir (Deut. i. 44; cp. i. 2). But the question of its site—of which, according to Dill-

mann² (on Num. xiv. 45), no trace has been found—forms part of a much larger one: viz., the route by which the Israelites approached the Holy Land [WILDERNESS OF WANDERING]. Robinson (il. 181) identifies Zephath with the well-known pass Es-Süfah, الصفاة, by which travellers from Petra to Hebron ascend to the highest level of the Negeb. This view is challenged by Mr. Wilton (The Negeb, &c., pp. 199, 200) on account of the impracticability of the pass, for a host such as the Israelites were. Mr. Rowlands (Williams' Holy City, i. 464) identifies it with Sebaita, to the S. of Khalasah; and in this he is supported by Prof. Palmer, who gives an interesting description of the ruins (Desert of the Exodus, pp. 373-380). [W.]

HORN. I. LITERAL. (Josh. vi. 4, 5; cp. Ex. xix. 13; 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 K. i. 39; Job xlii. 14.)—Two purposes are mentioned in the Scriptures to which the horn seems to have been applied. Trumpets were probably at first merely horns perforated at the tip, such as are still used upon mountain-farms for calling home the labourers at meal-time. If the A. V. and R. V. (text) of Josh. vi. 4, 5 ("rams' horns," ח'רן) be correct, this would settle the question, some critics taking ח'רל with the Targ. and Rabbis as equivalent to the Arabic رنبلة, ram (see Knobel-Dillmann on Ex. xix. 12), a signification which Fried. Deltzsch (Proleg. cines novem Heb.-Aram. Wörterb. z. A. T. p. 124, n. 2) finds also in the Assyrian ibilu or abilu, the ram as leader of (wild) sheep. Others, however, seem to think that ח'רל has nothing to do with ram (cp. R. V. marg. of Josh. i. c., jubile), and that ח'רן, horn, serves to indicate an instrument which originally was made of horn, though afterwards, no doubt, constructed of different materials (cp. Varr. L. L. v. 24, 33, "cornua quod ea quae nunc sunt ex aere tunc fiebant bubulo e cornu"). [CORNET.] The horns which were thus made into trumpets would probably be those of oxen rather than of rams, the latter scarcely producing a note sufficiently imposing to suggest its association with the fall of Jericho.

The word horn is also applied to a flask, or vessel made of horn, containing oil (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 K. i. 29), or used as a kind of toilet-bottle, filled with the preparation of antimony with which women tinged their eyelashes (Keren-happuch = cosmetic-horn, name of one of Job's daughters, Job xlii. 14). So in English drinking-horn (commonly called a horn). In the same way the Greek κέρας sometimes signifies bugle, trumpet (Xen. Anab. ii. 2, § 4), and sometimes drinking-horn (vii. 2, § 23). In like manner the Latin cornu means trumpet, also oil-cruet (Hor. Sat. ii. 2, 61) and funnel (Virg. Georg. iii. 509).

II. METAPHORICAL. 1. From similarity of form.—To this use belongs the application of the word horn to a trumpet of metal, as already mentioned. Horns of ivory—that is, elephants' teeth—are mentioned in Ezek. xxvii. 15: either metaphorically from similarity of form; or, as seems more probable, from a vulgar error. The horns of the altar (Ex. xxvii. 2) are not supposed to have been made of horn, but to have been metallic projections from the four corners (γωνιαί κερατοειδείς, Joseph. B. J. v. 5, § 6). [ALTAR, p. 101.] The peak or summit of a hill was called a horn (Is. v. 1, where hill = horn in Heb. [see A.V. and R.V. marg.]; cp. κέρας, Xen. Anab. v. 6, § 7, and cornu, Stat. Theb. v. 532; Arab. Kurûn Hattîn, Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii. 370; Germ. Schreckhorn, Wetterhorn, Aarhorn; Celt. cairn). In Hab. iii. 4 ("he had horns coming out of his hand") the context implies rays (R. V. text) of light.

The denominative קֶרַן = "to emit rays," is used of Moses' face (Ex. xxxiv. 29, 30, 35); so all the Versions except Aquila and the Vulgate, which have the translations κερατώδης ἦν, cornuta erat (cp. Knobel-Dillmann in loco). This curious idea has not only been perpetuated by paintings, coins, and statues (Zornius, Biblioth. Antig. i. 121), but has at least passed muster with Grotius (Annot. ad loc.), who cites Aben-Ezra's identification of Moses with the horned Mnevis of Egypt, and suggests that the phenomenon was intended to remind the Israelites of the golden calf! Spencer (Leg. Hebr. iii., Diss. i. 4) tries a reconciliation of renderings upon the ground that cornua = radii lucis; but Spanheim (Diss. vii. 1), not content with stigmatizing the efforts of art in this direction as "praepostera industria," distinctly attributes to Jerome a belief in the veritable horns of Moses. Bishop Taylor, in all good faith, though of course rhetorically, compares the "sun's golden horns" to those of the Hebrew Lawgiver.

2. From similarity of position and use.—Two principal applications of this metaphor will be found—strength and honour. Of strength the horn of the unicorn [UNICORN] was the most frequent representative (Deut. xxxiii. 17, &c.), but not always: cp. 1 K. xxii. 11, where horns of iron, worn defiantly and symbolically on the head, are possibly intended. Expressive of the same idea, or perhaps merely a decoration, is the Oriental military ornament mentioned by Taylor (Calmet's Frag. cxiv.), and the conical cap observed by Dr. Livingstone among the natives of S. Africa, and not improbably suggested by the horn of the rhinoceros, so abundant in that country (see Livingstone's Travels, pp. 365, 450, 557; cp. Taylor, l. c.). Among the Druses upon Mount Lebanon, the married women wear silver horns on their heads. The spiral coils of gold wire projecting on either side from the female head-dress of some of the Dutch provinces are evidently an ornament borrowed from the same original idea.

Heads of modern Asiatics ornamented with horns.

In the sense of honour, the word horn stands for the abstract (my horn, Job xv. 15; all the horns of Israel, Lam. ii. 3), and so for the supreme authority (cp. the story of Cippus, Ovid, Met. xv. 565; and the horn of the Indian Sachem mentioned in Clarkson's Life of Penn.). It also stands for concrete, whence it comes to mean king, kingdom (Dan. viii. 2, &c.; Zech. i. 18; cp. Tarquin's dream in Accius, ap. Cic. Div. i. 22); hence on coins Alexander and the Seleucidae wear horns (see drawing on p. 86), and the former is called in Arabia two-horned (Kor. xviii. 85 sq.), not without reference to Dan. viii.

Out of either or both of these two last metaphors sprang the idea of representing gods with horns. Spanheim has discovered such figures on the Roman denarius, and on numerous Egyptian coins of the reigns of Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines (Diss. v. p. 353). The Bacchus Ταυροκέρας, or cornutus, is mentioned by Euripides (Bacch. 100), and among other pagan absurdities Arnobius enumerates "Dii cornuti" (c. Gent. vi.). In like manner river-gods are represented with horns ("tauriformis Aufidus," Hor. Od. iv. 14, 25; ταυρομορφον ὄμμα Κηφι- σοῦ, Eur. Ion, 1261). For various opinions on the ground-thought of this metaphor, see Notes and Queries, i. 419, 456. Manx legends speak of a tarroo-ushtey, i.e. water-bull (see Cregeen's Manx Dict.). See Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 288; and, for an admirable compendium, with references, Zornius, Bibliotheca Antiquaria, ii. 106 sq. [T. E. B.]

HORNET (חַרְבֵּץ, ḥir'āh; σφηκία; crabro; Arab. زنبور, zauḥūr; Vespa crabro, L.). No question has arisen as to the correctness of the translation, although the word only occurs three times in the O. T. In each passage the ḥir'āh is spoken of as an instrument in God's hand for the punishment and expulsion of the Canaanites: "I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite from before thee" (Ex. xxiii. 28). "The Lord thy God will send the hornet among them" (Deut. vii. 20). "I sent the hornet before you, which drove them out from before you" (Josh. xxiv. 12). Much has been written on the question whether these passages are to be interpreted literally, and whether swarms of hornets did aid in compelling the flight of the Canaanites; or whether their attacks are spoken of metaphorically, as in the case of the expression, "The Amorites . . . came out against you, and chased you as bees do." So in classical writers the ostrus or gadfly is metaphorically used to signify "terror" or "madness." The hornet, it is suggested, may simply mean the panic and alarm with which the approach of the hosts of Israel would inspire the Canaanite. It has also been observed that we have no recorded instance in Scripture history of the intervention of hornets. There does not, however, appear to be much force in this negative argument, for there are recorded instances in profane history of hornets having multiplied to such a degree as to become a pest to the inhabitants. Aelian gives an account (xi. 28) of the people of Megara having been on one occasion driven from their city by a plague of mice, and the inhabitants of Phaselis by swarms of wasps. Upon this Bochart suggests that the story may have arisen from a tradition handed down from their ancestors, as Phaselis was a Phoenician colony, and even as late as the time of Xerxes spoke the pure Phoenician language; and these ancestors may have been fugitive Canaanites. Antenor of Crete, as quoted by Aelian (xvii. 35), tells how the people of Rhaucus in that island were compelled to leave their home in consequence of the attacks of swarms of bees. Herodotus was told that in one part of the Danube the bees occupied the north bank in such numbers that it was impossible to penetrate further. It is known that the furious attacks of hornets, when their nest has been disturbed, will drive cattle and horses to madness, and have frequently caused the death of the animals. In Palestine the hornet is very abundant. That it was equally so in early times we may infer from the name Zoreah, i.e. "place of hornets" (Josh. xv. 23), as well as from the frequent mention of the insect in the Talmudical writers (see Lewysohn, Zool. § 405). There are immense numbers of species of hornet; which is really not a group distinguishable from the wasp, except for its size; and these species are distributed over the whole world excepting the Arctic regions. The different hornets are all included in the insect family Diptopteryga, and sub-family Vespidæ. They vary much in the form and position of their nests and combs. Some construct very large nests underground, others in rocks; others suspend their combs, as does the English Vespa crabro, under slabs of stone or other secure shelter. But all place their combs horizontally with the mouths of the cells downwards. They are never perpendicular, like the combs of bees. I noticed four species of hornet very common in the Holy Land, but did not meet with the British Vespa crabro. All the species were larger than our own. Two of them make nests like our species, suspending them by a papier-maché pillar from a beam or stone or the roof of a cave; the horizontal combs being suspended in the centre, one beneath the other, by a strong papier-maché column. An umbrella-shaped shield of the same material shelters the whole string of combs. The two other species live in larger communities, and construct their paper nests underground, or in cavities of rocks with their combs also placed horizontally. These are sometimes two feet in diameter. Should a horse tread on a nest, it is necessary to fly with all speed, for the combined attack from such a swarm has been known to be fatal. [H. B. T.]

HORONA'IM (חֹרֹנַיִם = two caverns; in Is. T. Ἀρωναιεῖς, A. Ἀδωναιεῖς; in Jer. [v. 5, B.M.A.] Ὀρωναίμ, sometimes Ὀρωναίμ, &c.; Oronaim), a town of Moab named with Zoar and Luhith (Is. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. [LXX. xxxi.] 3, 5, 34), but to the position of which no clue is afforded either by the notices of the Bible or by mention in other works. It seems to have been on an eminence, and approached (like Beth-horon) by a road which is styled the "way" (הַדֶּרֶךְ, Is. xv. 5), or the "descent" (הַיָּרְדָּן, Jer. xlviii. 5). From the occurrence of a similar expression in regard to LUHITH, we might imagine that these two places were sanctuaries, on the high places to which the Eastern worship of those days was so addicted. If we accept the name as Hebrew, we may believe the dual form of it to arise, either from the presence of two caverns in the neighbourhood, or from there having been two towns, possibly an upper and a lower, as in the case of the two Beth-horons, connected by the ascending road. It occurs on the Moabite Stone under the form חֹרֹנַיִם (see MV.¹¹) and as having been taken by king Mesha, either from the Edomites or the Israelites (see Records of the Past, N. S. ii. p. 203); and it is possibly the same place as the Ὀρωναίμ of Josephus (Ant. xiii. 15, § 4; xiv. 1, § 4). Conder (Heth & Moab, p. 403) connects it with Wady Ghûciv, up which runs an ancient road. From Horonaim possibly came Sanballat the Horonite. [G.] [W.]

HORO'NITE, THE (חֹרֹנַיִת; B. δ Ἀρωνεῖς; Horonites), the designation of Sanballat, who was one of the principal opponents of Nehemiah's works of restoration (Neh. ii. 10, 19 xiii. 28). It is derived by Gesenius (Thes. p. 459) from Horonaim the Moabite town, but by Fürst (Handb.) from Horon, i.e. Beth-horon. Which of these is the more accurate is quite uncertain. The former certainly accords well with the Ammonite and Arabian who were Sanballat's comrades; the latter is perhaps more etymologically correct. [G.] [W.]

HORSE. The most striking feature in the Biblical notices of the horse is the exclusive application of it to warlike operations; in no instance is that useful animal employed for the purposes of ordinary locomotion or agriculture, if we except Is. xxviii. 28, where we learn that horses (A. V. "horsemen") were employed in threshing, not however in that case put in the gears, but simply driven about wildly over the strewn grain. This remark will be found to be borne out by the historical passages hereafter quoted; but it is equally striking in the poetical parts of Scripture. The animated description of the horse in Job xxxix. 19-25, applies solely to the war-horse; the "quivering mane" (A. V. "thunder") which "clothes his neck;" his lofty bounds "as a grasshopper;" his hoofs "digging in the valley" with excitement; his terrible snorting—are brought before us, and his ardour for the strife:

He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage;
Neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet.
He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha!
And he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting (A. V.).

So again the bride advances with her charms to an immediate conquest, "as a company of horses" (R. V. "a steed") in Pharaoh's chariots" (Song of Sol. i. 9); and when the Prophet Zechariah wishes to convey the idea of perfect peace, he represents the horse, no more mixing in the fray as before (ix. 10), but bearing on his bell (which was intended to strike terror into the foe) the peaceable inscription "Holiness unto the Lord" (xiv. 20). Lastly, the characteristic of the horse is not so much his speed or his utility, but his strength (Ps. xxxiii. 17, cxlvii. 10), as shown in the special application of the term abbir (אֲבִיר), i. e. strong, as an equivalent for a horse (Jer. viii. 16; xlvii. 3; l. 11).

The terms under which the horse is described in the Hebrew language are usually sūs and pārāsh (פָּרָשׁ). The origin of these terms is not satisfactorily made out; Pott (Etym. Forsch. i. 60) connects them respectively with Susa and Pares, or Persia, as the countries whence the horse was derived; and it is worthy of remark that sūs was also employed in Egypt for a mare, showing that it was a foreign term there, if not also in Palestine. There is a marked distinction between the sūs and the pārāsh: the former were horses for driving in the war-chariot, of a heavy build; the latter were for riding, and particularly for cavalry. This distinction is not observed in the A. V. from the circumstance that pārāsh also signifies "horseman;" the correct sense is essential in the following passages: 1 K. iv. 26, "forty (see below) thousand . . . chariot horses and twelve thousand cavalry horses" (A. V. "horsemen"); Ezek. xxvii. 14, "driving horses and riding (R. V. war-) horses" (A. V. "horsemen"); Joel ii. 4, "as riding horses (A. V. and R. V. text "horsemen," R. V. marg. war-horses), so shall they run;" and Is. xxi. 7, "a train of horses in couples" (A. V. "a chariot with a couple of horsemen"; R. V. text, "a troop, horsemen in pairs"). In addition to these terms we have rēkesh (רֶקֶשׁ), of undoubted Hebrew origin) to describe a swift horse, used for the royal post (Esth. viii. 10, 14; A. V. "mule") and similar purposes (1 K. iv. 28; A. V. "dromedary," R. V. "swift steed"), or for a rapid journey (Mic. i. 13); rammāk (רָמָאֵק), used once for a mare (Esth. viii. 10; A. V. "dromedary," R. V. "the stud"), a Persian word ram; and sūsāh (סוּסָאָה) in Song of Sol. i. 9, where it is regarded in the A. V. as a collective term, "company of horses;" it rather means, according to the received punctuation, "my mare," but still better, by a slight alteration in the punctuation, "mares" (R. V. text "a steed," marg. steeds).

The Hebrews in the patriarchal age, as a pastoral race, did not stand in need of the services of the horse, and for a long period after their settlement in Canaan they dispensed with it, partly in consequence of the hilly nature of the country, which only admitted of the use of chariots in certain localities (Judg. i. 19), and partly in consequence of the prohibition in Deut. xvii. 16, which would be held to apply at all periods. Accordingly they hamstringed the horses of the Canaanites (Josh. xi. 6, 9). It was only on the maritime plains, in the plain of Esdraelon and on the north-eastern frontier, that chariots could be employed in warfare to any purpose. In these, while Israel had neither horses nor chariots, the Canaanites were well supplied with both. Consequently the usual order of successful invasions was reversed. The aboriginal Canaanites were driven out of the hills, but remained in the plains. The mountains were the secure and peaceful, the level and plain district: the insecure, parts of the country. In the story of the conquest by Joshua, we do not find chariots mentioned till, after his subjugation of the central and hill country, Jabin king of Hazor met him in the far north near the waters of Merom, "with horses and chariots very many" (Josh. xi. 4). This was a new feature in the war, and Joshua then received the command to "hough the horses and burn the chariots." Again, after a lapse of another 150 years, the horses of another Jabin king of Canaan were a terror to Israel; "for he had nine hundred chariots of iron, and twenty years he mightily oppressed the children of Israel" (Judg. iv. 3). Then when the swamps and mud of the Kishon had engulfed the chariot-wheels, the horsehoofs were broken by the plunging and trampling of their mighty ones.

David first established a force of cavalry and chariots after the defeat of Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 4), when he reserved a hundred chariots, and, as we may infer, all the horses: for the rendering "houghed all the chariot horses" is manifestly incorrect. Shortly after this Absalom was possessed of some (2 Sam. xv. 1). But the great supply of horses was subsequently effected by Solomon through his connexion with Egypt; he is reported to have had "forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand cavalry horses" (1 K. iv. 26), and it is worthy of notice that these forces are mentioned parenthetically to account for the great security of life and property noticed in the preceding verse. There is probably an error in the former of these numbers; for the number of chariots is given in 1 K. x. 26, 2 Ch. i. 14, as 1400; and consequently if we allow three horses for each chariot, two in use and one as a reserve, as was usual in some countries (Xen. Cyrop. vi. 1, § 27), the number required would be 4,200, or, in round numbers, 4,000, which is probably the correct reading. Solomon also established a very active trade in horses, which were brought by dealers out of Egypt and resold at a profit to the Hittites, who lived between Palestine and the Euphrates. The passage in which this commerce is described (1 K. x. 28, 29) is unfortunately obscure; the tenor of v. 28 seems to be that there was a regularly established traffic (R. V. "The horses which Solomon had were brought out of Egypt"), the Egyptians bringing the horses to a mart in the south of Palestine and handing them over to the Hebrew dealers at a fixed tariff. The price of a horse was fixed at 150 shekels of silver, and that of a chariot at 600; in the latter we must include the horses (for an Egyptian war-chariot was of no great value), and conceive, as before, that three horses accompanied each chariot, leaving the chariot itself at 150 shekels. In addition to this source of supply, Solomon received horses by way of tribute (1 K. x. 25). The force was maintained by the succeeding kings, and frequent notices occur both of riding horses and chariots (2 K. ix. 21, 33, xi. 16), and particularly of war-chariots (1 K. xxii. 4; 2 K. iii. 7; Is. ii. 7). The force seems to have failed in the time of Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 23) in Judah, as it had previously in Israel under Jehoahaz (2 K. xiii. 7). The number of horses belonging to the Jews on their return from Babylon is stated as 736 (Neh. vii. 68).

The northern kingdom was better adapted for the use of cavalry and chariots than the southern; and Ahab, Jehoram, and Jehu are repeatedly mentioned as using chariots for their ordinary mode of travelling. But in the reign of Jehoahaz the son of Jehu, a fatal blow was struck at the power of the Israelitish kingdom, by the annihilation of its cavalry and chariots, only 50 horses and 10 chariots being left (2 K. xiii. 7); and from the sneers of Rabshakeh, it would seem that the southern kingdom was not much better supplied with this military arm.

In the countries adjacent to Palestine, the use of the horse was much more frequent. It was introduced into Egypt probably by the Hyksos, as it is not represented on the monuments before the 18th dynasty (Wilkinson, i. 386 [1878]). At the period of the Exodus horses were abundant there (Gen. xlvii. 17, l. 9; Ex. ix. 3, xiv. 9, 23; Deut. xvii. 17), and subsequently, as we have already seen, they were able to supply the nations of Western Asia. The Jewish kings sought the assistance of the Egyptians against the Assyrians in this respect (Is. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 8; Ezek. xvii. 15). The Canaanites were possessed of them (Deut. xx. 1; Josh. xi. 4; Judg. iv. 3, v. 22, 28), and likewise the Syrians (2 Sam. viii. 4; 1 K. xx. 1; 2 K. vi. 14, vii. 7, 10)—notices which are confirmed by the pictorial representations on Egyptian monuments (Wilkinson, i. 393, 397, 401), and by the Assyrian inscriptions relating to Syrian expeditions. But the cavalry of the Assyrians themselves and other eastern nations was regarded as most formidable; the horses themselves were highly bred, as the Assyrian sculptures still testify, and fully merited the praise bestowed on them by Habakkuk (i. 8), "swifter than leopards, and more fierce than the evening wolves." Their riders "clothed in blue, captains and rulers, all of them desirable young men" (Ezek. xxiii. 6), armed with the "bright sword and glittering spear" (Nah. iii. 3), made a deep impression on the Jews, who, plainly clad, went on foot; as also did their regular array, as they proceeded in couples, contrasting with the disorderly troops of asses and camels which followed with the baggage (Is. xxi. 7, rekeb in this passage signifying rather a train than a single chariot). The number employed by the Eastern potentates was very great, Holofernes possessing not less than 12,000 (Jud. ii. 15). At a later period we have frequent notices of the cavalry of the Graeco-Syrian monarchs (1 Macc. i. 18, iii. 39, &c.).

Under the Romans, that national genius for road-making which has left its traces in the remotest parts of Europe, greatly increased the facilities for the employment of horses even in the most rugged districts of Palestine. The track of the chariot-road to Egypt (Acts viii. 28), first constructed by Solomon, was paved by the Romans; and traces of the wheel-worn pavement, both of this and of several other roads among the hills near Hebron, are still to be seen. In the wilds of Gilead and Bashan, and in the pavement from the ruins of Gadara to the Jordan, and among the theatres and temples of Rabbath Ammon, we mark the wheel-ruts and the worn footholes of the horses, where wheels have never rolled for over 1000 years.

The best horses in Palestine are now supplied from Arabia and Egypt. But the breed of the latter country is now, and probably was in the days when Solomon imported his horses thence, of Arabian origin. East of Jordan almost every man is mounted, and the horse has superseded the dromedary in their predatory warfare. The Syrian baggage horse is from a mixed race, and though not often exceeding 15 hands in height, and of no great speed, yet is endowed with wonderful powers of endurance.

With regard to the trappings and management of the horse, we have little information; the bridle (rēsen) was placed over the horse's nose (Is. xxx. 28), and a bit or curb (mētheg) is also noticed (2 K. xix. 28; Pa. xxxii. 9; Prov. xxvi. 3; Is. xxxvii. 29. In the A. V. it is incorrectly given "bridle," with the exception of Pa. xxxii.). The harness of the Assyrian horses was profusely decorated, the bits being gilt (1 Esd. iii. 6), and the bridles adorned with tassels; on the neck was a collar terminating in a bell, as described by Zechariah (xiv. 20). Saddles were not used until a late period; in the annexed cut one with a pad is represented.

Assyrian horsemen of the time of Sennacherib.

The horsemen were armed with long spears ("the glittering spear," Nah. iii. 3), or with bows, as we see in the Assyrian sculptures. The horses were not shod, and therefore hoofs significant of victory (Rev. vi. 2; xix. 11, 14). Horses and chariots were used also in idolatrous processions, as noticed in regard to the sun (2 K. xxiii. 11). [W. L. B.] [H. B. T.]

as hard "as flint" (Is. v. 28) were regarded as a great merit. The chariot-horses were covered with embroidered trappings—the "precious clothes" manufactured at Dedan (Ezek. xvii. 20): these were fastened by straps and buckles, and to this perhaps reference is made in Prov. xxx. 31, in the term zarzir, "one girded about the loins" (A. V. "greyhound." See GREYHOUND). Thus adorned, Mordecai rode in state through the streets of Shushan (Esth. vi. 9). White horses were more particularly appropriate to such occasions, as being are explained by Bochart to signify Hades (𐤇𐤍𐤅) and the grave, which are never satisfied. This explanation is certainly very ingenious, but where is the necessity to appeal to it, when the important old Versions are opposed to any such interpretation? The bloodsucking leeches, such as Hirudo and Haemopsis, were without a doubt known to the ancient Hebrews; and as the leech has been for ages the emblem of rapacity and cruelty, there is no reason to doubt that this annelid is denoted by 'alūgāh. The Arabs to this day denominate the Limnatis Nilotica, 'alag. As to βῆλλα; sanguisuga; Arab. علق, علقة, 'alag, 'alagah) occurs once only, viz. Prov. xxx. 15, "The horseleach hath two daughters, crying, Give, give." There is no doubt from the identity of the Hebrew and Arabic words that 'alūgāh denotes some species of leech, or rather is the generic term for any bloodsucking annelid, such as Hirudo medicinalis, L. (the medicinal leech), Haemopsis sanguisuga, L. (the horseleech), Bdella Trochetia, and Aulastoma, all found in the marshes and pools of the Bible-lands. Schultens (Comment. in Prov. l. c.) and Bochart (Hieroz. iii. 785) have endeavoured to show that 'alūgāh is to be understood to signify "fate," or "impending misfortune of any kind" (fatum uniusque impendens); they refer the Hebrew term to the Arabic 'alūg, res appensa, affixa homini. The "two daughters" the expression "two daughters," which has been by some writers absurdly explained to allude to "the double tongue" of a leech—this animal having no tongue at all—there can be no doubt that it is figurative (cp. Delitzsch and Strack, Comm. in loco), and is intended, in the language of Oriental hyperbole, to denote its blood-thirsty propensity, evidenced by the tenacity with which a leech keeps its hold on the skin (if Hirudo), or mucous membrane (if Haemopsis). Comp. Horace, Ep. ad Pis. 476; Cicero, Ep. ad Atticum, i. 16; Plantus, Epid. act. iv. sc. 4. The etymology of the Hebrew word, from an unused root which signifies "to adhere," is eminently suited to "a leech." Gesenius (Thees. p. 1038) reminds us that the Arabic 'alūk is explained in Camus by ghūl, "a female monster like a vampire which sucked human blood." The passage in question, however, has simply reference to a "leech." The valuable use of the leech (Hirudo) in medicine, though undoubtedly known to Pliny and the later Roman writers, was in all probability unknown to the ancient Orientals; still they were doubtless acquainted with the fact that leeches of the above-named genus would attach themselves to the skin of persons going barefoot in ponds; and they must have been cognizant of the propensity horseleeches (Haemopsis) have of entering the mouth and nostrils of cattle as they drink. The horseleech (Haemopsis sanguisuga, L.) is very common in all the stagnant waters of Palestine, and our animals frequently suffered from its attacks, as it attaches itself firmly to the inside of the nostril or to the palate, causing much pain and loss of blood. It clings with such tenacity to its hold as to be almost torn in two before it can be detached. The medicinal leech (Hirudo medicinalis, L.) is still more abundant, especially in clear streams, where it is scarcely possible to turn a stone without finding some adhering to its under-surface.

The leeches or blood-sucking worms are annelids with red blood, and no external organs of respiration or branchiae. They can convert the anterior extremity of the body into a suction cavity, or flattened disk round the mouth, which is formed of three horny jaws. They have usually ten eyes; some species only eight. They swim very rapidly, with a serpentine and sinuous bounding of the body. [W. H.] [H. B. T.]

HOSAH (הוּסָה = refuge; B. יְהוּסָה, A. Ḥosā; Hosa), a city of Asher, not identified (Josh. xix. 29), the next landmark on the boundary to Tyre. Conder (PEF. Mem. i. 51) has suggested el-'Ezziyah, but this is very doubtful. [G.] [W.]

HOSAH (הוּסָה = refuge; B. 'Ossā [N. 'Ossā] and 'Issā, A. 'Ossē and 'Ossā; Hosa), a man who was chosen by David to be one of the first doorkeepers (A. V. "porters") to the Ark after its arrival in Jerusalem (1 Ch. xvi. 38). He was a Merarite Levite (xxvi. 10), with "sons and brethren" thirteen, of whom four were certainly sons (vv. 10, 11); and his charge was especially the "gate Shallecheth," and the causeway, or raised road which ascended (v. 16, הַשַּׁלְחֶת הַדָּוָד).

BIBLE DICTIONARY.—VOL. I.

HOSAN'NA (ὡσαννά; neo-Heb. הוֹשַׁנְנָה, from הוֹשִׁיעָה הוֹשִׁיעָה, Ps. cxviii. 25; ὠσαν δὴ, as Theophylact correctly interpreted it), the cry of the multitudes as they thronged in our Lord's triumphal procession into Jerusalem (Matt. xxi. 9, 15; Mark xi. 9, 10; John xii. 13). The Psalm from which it was taken, the 118th, was one with which they were familiar from being accustomed to recite the 25th and 26th verses at the Feast of Tabernacles. On that occasion the Great Hallel, consisting of Psalms cxiii.—cxviii., was chanted by one of the priests, and at certain intervals the multitudes joined in the responses, waving their branches of willow and palm, and shouting as they waved them, Hallelujah, or Hosanna, or "O Lord, I beseech Thee, send now prosperity" (Ps. cxviii. 25). This was done at the recitation of the first and last verses of Ps. cxviii.; but, according to the school of Hillel, at the words "Save now, we beseech Thee" (v. 25). The school of Shammai, on the contrary, say it was at the words "Send now prosperity" of the same verse. Rabban Gamaliel and R. Joshua were observed by R. Akiba to wave their branches only at the words "Save now, we beseech Thee" (Mishna, Succah, iii. 9). On each of the seven days during which the Feast lasted, the people thronged the court of the Temple, and went in procession about the Altar, setting their boughs bending towards it; the trumpets sounding as they shouted Hosanna. But on the seventh day they marched seven times round the Altar, shouting meanwhile the great Hosanna to the sound of the trumpets of the Levites (Lightfoot, Temple Service, xvi. 2). The children also, who could wave the palm branches, were expected to take part in the solemnity (Mishna, Succah, iii. 15; Matt. xxi. 15). From the custom of waving the boughs of myrtle and willow during the service the name Hosanna was ultimately transferred to the boughs themselves, so that according to Elias Levita (Thisbi, s. v.), "the bundles of the willows of the brook which they carry at the Feast of Tabernacles are called Hosannas." The term is frequently applied by Jewish writers to denote the Feast of Tabernacles, the seventh day of the Feast being distinguished as the great Hosanna (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. הוֹשַׁנָּה). It was not uncommon for the Jews in later times to employ the observances of this Feast, which was pre-eminently a feast of gladness, to express their feelings on other occasions of rejoicing (1 Macc. xiii. 51; 2 Macc. x. 6, 7), and it is not, therefore, matter of surprise that they should have done so under the circumstances recorded in the Gospels. [W. A. W.]

HOSE'A, the first in order of the Minor Prophets. 1. His name (הוֹשִׁעַ; LXX. 'Ossē'; Vulg. Osee; hence A. V. Osee in Rom. ix. 25) means deliverance or salvation. It is more correctly transliterated HOSHEA. It is identical with the name originally borne by Joshua (Num. xiii. 16) and that of the last king of Israel (2 K. xv. 30).

* According to Jerome (Comm. on i. 1), the MSS. of the LXX. and Vet. Lat. in his day read Αὐσή, Ause. Cheyne compares the form Ausi of the Assyrian inscriptions (Schrader, Keilschriften, p. 265). This reading is not found in any extant MS. of the LXX. here, but in Num. xiii. 9, 17, all the MSS. read Αὐσή or Αὐσή. Volck in Herzog calls the reading 'Ossē' a hexaplar correction."

2. Of Hosea's life and personal history nothing is known beyond what may be gathered from his Book. But he there tells us of the Divine discipline by which he was educated for his prophetic mission. "He had to understand the principles of his country's history by most fearful passages in his own" (Maurice, Prophets and Kings, p. 203). He took to wife Gomer the daughter of Diblaim. There is no need to suppose that she had already fallen into sin when he married her. She is not directly called "a harlot," but "a wife of whoredom," a woman with a tendency and inclination to sin. She proved unfaithful to him. Then, as he meditated on his bitter lot, he perceived that he had acted as he had done by direction of Jehovah. He recognised that the impulse which had led him to marry her was a Divine voice (i. 2). He realised that his own love for his erring wife, and her unfaithfulness to him, were but a faint reflexion of Jehovah's love for Israel and Israel's unfaithfulness to Jehovah. The experience of his own life impressed upon him this double truth, which underlies the whole of his teaching. For years he bore with her infidelity. She had children, to whom he was directed to give names significant of the judgment (Jezeel) and rejection (Lo-ruhamah, Lo-ammi) of the guilty nation. At last she deserted him altogether. She fell (we are not told how) into slavery. Out of that slavery he was directed to redeem her. He brings her home, and keeps her in seclusion, deprived at once of opportunities for her old sins, and of the legitimate rights of a wife. Meanwhile he waits with tender patience, if perchance her love for him might return. This course of action was designed to symbolise the unflinching love of Jehovah for Israel, and the discipline of exile by which He purposed to wean them from their idolatries, and win back their allegiance.

It is hardly too much to say that the literal interpretation of the narrative is the key to the right understanding of the Book. If we would enter into Hosea's intensity of feeling, we must realise how it had been generated. But it has been so commonly maintained that the narrative of chs. i.-iii. is purely an allegory, that the literal interpretation needs some defence. First, it must be observed that there is no hint in the narrative itself that it is anything but a record of actual occurrences in the Prophet's life. Next, such actual circumstances would be a far more forcible means of education to the Prophet himself, and of instruction to his contemporaries, than any mere vision or allegory. How was he led to represent the covenant relation of Jehovah to Israel as a marriage relation? Granted that the conception of the marriage of the deity with his land was familiar to Semitic nations, why was Hosea specially induced to bring it into prominence, and give it a moral application? His own domestic history supplies the answer. Further, if the narrative were only an allegory, we should naturally expect the wife to bear a significant name as well as the children. But while Jezeel, Lo-ruhamah, and Lo-ammi tell their own story, Gomer bath-Diblaim baffles all attempts to extract from it a reasonable meaning. The natural inference is that it was the actual name of a woman, not part of an allegory. Lastly, the literal interpretation is supported by the parallel of Isaiah's family with their significant names (Is. viii. 1 sq., 18; cp. vii. 3).

The only serious objection to the literal interpretation is the moral objection. How, it is argued, could God, consistently with His holiness, have commanded the Prophet to take an unchaste wife? How could the Prophet, consistently with the fundamental principles of morality, have recognised the command as Divine? The objection is formidable, but it falls to the ground if Gomer had not fallen into sin when Hosea married her. This view, as has already been pointed out, is actually suggested by the language used, and it is in harmony with the symbolism. Her character, like that of Israel when Jehovah chose it to be His people, was still undeveloped. That God should command His servant to enter on a marriage which was to result in a lifelong sorrow is no matter for surprise. It is but an illustration of the principle of sacrifice. Hosea must learn through suffering, that he might be able to teach.

Another, but hardly satisfactory solution of the "moral objection" is offered by some interpreters (e.g., Dr. Pusey, following Jerome and Augustine). Hosea, they suppose, married Gomer with full knowledge of her character, in the hope of reforming her. This, it is urged, would not be immoral, but an act of self-denial. There is, however, no hint of such a purpose in the narrative, nor does it suit the symbolism so well as the view taken above.

The "moral objection" is indeed an objection to the allegorical not less than to the literal interpretation if the action commanded was one repugnant to the moral sense. And if the Prophet had a faithful wife, it seems incredible that he should expose her to suspicion by an allegory which certainly does not bear its allegorical character on the face of it.

Another objection to the literal interpretation is based on the mistaken view that the woman of ch. iii. is not Gomer, but another. The command to take another wife proves, it is said, that no real marriage is intended. But the natural sense of the passage is that Hosea was to take means to recover Gomer, in spite of her infidelity; and the symbolism absolutely requires this interpretation. Jehovah did not purpose to choose another nation to be His people, but to take steps to recall Israel to its allegiance to Him.

For a full discussion see Nowack, Hosea, pp. 48 sq. Cp. Wellhausen in his ed. of Bleek's Einführung, § 208; Prof. Robertson Smith's Prophets of Israel, pp. 178 sq.; Dean Plumptre's suggestive poem "Gomer," in Lazarus and other Poems.

The narrative of his unhappy marriage, and one or two possible allusions to opposition and persecution met with in the fulfilment of his ministry (iv. 4; ix. 7, 8), are the only personal details. In this respect the Book is a remarkable contrast to that of Amos. Yet what is told is enough to bring us into touch and sympathy with the Prophet.

3. It is plain that the sphere of Hosea's ministry was the Northern kingdom. Judah is only mentioned incidentally. In i. 7 the mercy refused to Israel is promised to Judah; in xi. 12—if the precarious rendering of A. V. and R. V. text is retained—Judah is commended for its faithfulness in contrast to the apostasy of Israel. In iv. 15 Judah is bidden to take warning from Israel; in i. 11 the ultimate reunion of the divided kingdoms is predicted. But for the most part Judah is only incidentally introduced as sharing the guilt and destined to share the punishment of Israel (v. 5, 10–14; vi. 4, 11; viii. 14; x. 11; xi. 12 [R. V. marg., which is probably right]; xii. 2). Jerusalem is not once mentioned. On the other hand, Israel, Ephraim, and Samaria are constantly before the Prophet's eyes. It is to them that his prophecy is addressed.

It is equally clear that he was himself a native of the Northern kingdom, and not, like Amos, sent there on a temporary mission. This is evident not so much from particular expressions referring to his own experience (vi. 10, "In the house of Israel I have seen a horrible thing") or betraying his nationality (i. 2, "the land"—the land of Israel; vii. 5, "our king"—the king of Israel), but from the whole tone and contents of the prophecy. "He knows this kingdom, as every line betrays, from personal acquaintance, and in all its relations and circumstances, its joys and its calamities, in the very heart of its aims and its prospects. . . He is acquainted with it from the depths of his heart, and follows all its doings, aims, and fortunes, with the profound feeling gendered of such a sympathy as is conceivable in the case of a native prophet only" (Ewald's Prophets of the Old Testament, i. 211, Eng. tr.). He shows complete familiarity with the internal condition of the kingdom; with the depth and hopelessness of its social corruption; with the crimes of its kings and nobles and priests; with the intrigues of its politicians for alliances with Egypt or Assyria; with the religious apostasy which united a nominal worship of Jehovah with idolatry and Baal-worship and an utter disregard of morality. The picture is drawn with a force and feeling which attest an eye-witness, who felt intensely and bitterly that his own country was being dragged down to ruin by the sins which he rebuked but could not check.

The impression produced by the general tone of the prophecy is confirmed by the geographical references, and by the language of the Book. The places mentioned all belong to the Northern kingdom. Mizpah in Gilead, and Tabor in Galilee, describe the extent of the kingdom from east to west; Samaria is frequently mentioned (vii. 1; viii. 5, 6; x. 5, 7; xiii. 16); Jezreel (i. 4, 5, 11; ii. 22); Shechem (vi. 9); Gilead (vi. 8; xii. 11); Gilgal (iv. 15; ix. 15; xii. 11); Bethel, sometimes sarcastically called Beth-aven (iv. 15; v. 8; x. 5, 8, 15); Gibeah (v. 8; ix. 9; x. 9); Ramah (v. 8). Lebanon supplies him with imagery (xiv. 5–7).

Peculiarities of language indicate Northern authorship. The forms הַרְבֵּי (vi. 9) and $\text{הַרְבֵּי־לְחַיִּים}$ (xi. 3) are Aramaean; and the words נְהַה (v. 13) and שִׁבְבִים (viii. 6), רִתָּה (xiii. 1), not found elsewhere in the O. T., are also Aramaean.

There can then be no reasonable doubt that Hosea not only prophesied to Israel, but was a native and citizen of the Northern kingdom.

Ewald, indeed, maintains that he wrote his Book in Judah, whither he had been compelled to flee from the persecutions of his countrymen. His grounds for this view are as follows. (1) In his earlier prophecies (i.–iii.) Hosea speaks hopefully of Judah (i. 7); in his later prophecies (iii.–xiv.) Judah is represented as corrupt and in danger of falling along with Israel (v. 5, 10, 12–14; vi. 11; viii. 14; x. 11; xi. 12; xii. 2). This change of view was due to closer acquaintance with Judah, gained from actual residence there. (2) The word "there," in vi. 7, 10, ix. 15, xiii. 8, indicates that the writer surveyed the kingdom of Israel from outside. (3) In v. 8 sq. the alarm proceeds from South to North. These arguments are not conclusive. The second and third certainly do not prove that the writer was resident in Judah; and as for the first, it is admitted that chs. iv.–xiv. belong to a later period than chs. i.–iii.; Judah was rapidly deteriorating, and the sterner tone of the Prophet's language was justified. It would seem that the Prophet had become better acquainted with the condition of the Southern kingdom; but it is rash to assume that this could not have been the case without his actually residing there.

Duhm's conjecture (Theologie der Propheten, p. 130 sq.) that Hosea was a priest can only be mentioned here. His reasons are ingenious, but not convincing (cp. Nowack, Hosea, p. viii.).

4. Later traditions about Hosea possess no historical value. His father, Beeri, was identified with the Reubenite prince Beerah, carried captive by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch. v. 6; Yuchasin, f. 12 a), and, according to the Jewish canon that when a prophet's father is mentioned he was also a prophet, Beeri was himself a prophet, though he only uttered two words of prophecy, which are incorporated in Is. viii. 19 and Job xxviii. 25 b (Vayyikra Rabba, c. 15). The patristic accounts name Baalmoth (Ephraim the Syrian on Hos. i. 1) or Belemoth (Pseudo-Epiphanius, de Vitis Proph.; Isidore of Seville, de Vita et Obitu Sanctorum, c. 41), or Belemon (Pseudo-Dorotheus, ap. Chron. Pasch. p. 147), in the tribe of Issachar, as Hosea's birthplace, and relate that he died in peace and was buried in his own land. On the other hand, the Jewish work Shalsheth haqqabbalah (f. 19) relates that he died in Babylon, leaving directions that he should be buried in his native country; that his body was accordingly placed on a camel, which forthwith conveyed it to Safed in Galilee, where it was buried. An Arabic tradition says that he was buried at Almenia near Tripoli; while the traveller Burckhardt relates that his grave was shown by the Arabs in the neighbourhood of the ancient Ramoth-gilead. The student curious in such matters may consult Carpov's Introduction, part iii. p. 274 sq., or Wünsche's Comm. p. iii. sq.

5. The title prefixed to the Book (i. 1) assigns as the date of Hosea's ministry "the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel." According to the commonly received chronology, Jeroboam II. reigned from 825 to 784 B.C.; Uzziah from 810 to 758 B.C.; Hezekiah from 726 to 698 B.C. Recent investigations, however, make it all but certain that Jeroboam's reign must be placed later, and that he did not die until 764 B.C. at the earliest. [CHRONOLOGY.] Two interregnums are assumed in the history of the Northern kingdom during this period: one of eleven years between the death of Jeroboam II. and the accession of Zechariah; and one of nine years after the death of Pekah. These interregnums are inferred from the synchronisms or cross references between the regnal years of the kings of Israel and Judah. But the actual history gives no hint of them. It is implied in 2 Kings xiv. 29 that Zechariah succeeded his father in the usual way; and in 2 Kings xv. 30 that Hoshea ascended the throne immediately after his murder of Pekah. It seems to be tolerably certain that these interregnums should be cut out. Some chronologists go further, and infer from a comparison of the dates on the Assyrian monuments that Jeroboam reigned till 750 B.C. or even later. The period between the death of Jeroboam and the fall of Samaria is thus shortened by twenty or possibly thirty-four years. The decline of Israel was more rapid, and its final ruin followed the denunciations of Hosea more closely, than has commonly been supposed.

How far, it must now be asked, does the statement of the title agree with the internal evidence of the Book?

(1) The prophecies contained in chs. i.-iii. must belong to a period before the extinction of the house of Jehu by the murder of Zechariah (i. 4: cp. Amos vii. 9, 11; 2 K. xv. 10-12). But they cannot be placed later than the time of Jeroboam. The prosperity which marked the reign of that powerful monarch was still unbroken (ii. 5-12); but it had borne evil fruit, and the nation was ripe for punishment. We can hardly be wrong in assigning this part of the Book to the closing years of the reign of Jeroboam.

(2) The rest of the Book (iv.-xiv.) belongs to a later period. It reflects the state of anarchy into which Israel fell after Jeroboam's death, when Zechariah, after six months' reign, was murdered by Shallum, and Shallum in turn, after a month's reign, was murdered by Menahem, who inflicted horrible vengeance on those who refused to support him, and could only maintain himself on the throne by becoming the vassal of Assyria (2 K. xv. 13 sq.).

The state of affairs described in Hosea corresponds strikingly to these circumstances. When once the strong hand of Jeroboam had been removed, evils of every kind broke out without restraint. The king and his court are described as encouraging one another in wickedness, and sunk in debauchery (vii. 3, 5). They pervert justice; they are not leaders but misleaders (iv. 18, v. 10). The priests, instead of rebuking the people's sin, encourage it, because it augments their revenues (iv. 8). Nay, the priest actually turns bandit on his own account (vi. 9). Foul immoralities are shamelessly practised (iv. 10 sq.); fidelity, humanity, piety, have vanished; falsehood and violence are universal (iv. 1 sq.; vi. 8 sq.; vii. 1; x. 4). Men profess to worship Jehovah (viii. 2), and think to propitiate Him by sacrifice (v. 6); but they ignore His real requirements (vi. 6), and are besotted with their senseless idolatries (iv. 17; viii. 4; xiii. 2). The root evil of all is that in their prosperity they have forgotten

Jehovah (iv. 7; viii. 14; xiii. 6); so when danger threatens they look to Assyria and Egypt instead of turning in penitence to Him (v. 4, 13; vii. 11 sq.; viii. 9). They will not tolerate rebuke (iv. 4), but despise and persecute the prophet (ix. 7, 8). For such a nation nothing remains but sharp and speedy judgment.

At the latest these prophecies were all delivered before the fall of Samaria (xiii. 16); but indeed the terminus ad quem of Hosea's ministry may be fixed considerably earlier. The confederacy of Pekah and Rezin against Ahaz drove him to appeal to Assyria for help (2 K. xvi. 7). Tiglath-pileser accordingly invaded the kingdom of Israel, and ravaged and depopulated Northern Palestine, Galilee, and Gilead (2 K. xv. 29), B.C. 734.

Of this invasion, and of this change in the relation between Israel and Assyria, there is no trace in Hosea. He speaks of Gilead as still a part of the Northern kingdom (v. 1; vi. 8; xii. 11; contrast Micah vii. 14), while Assyria is nowhere spoken of as an enemy, but as a worthless and dangerous ally (v. 13; vii. 11; viii. 9; xii. 1; xiv. 3). There is no trace in Hosea of the circumstances which called forth the great prophecies of Isaiah vii. sq.; and his public ministry does not appear to have been continued beyond the reign of Menahem in Israel, and Jotham in Judah. He was thus the contemporary of Amos, Isaiah, and Micah; but the work of Amos was probably ended before that of Hosea began, and Hosea's ministry had closed before Isaiah and Micah had come into prominence.^b

One allusion, indeed, has been supposed to mark a later date. Shalman, who sacked Beth-arbel (x. 14), has been thought to be Shalmaneser IV., the successor of Tiglath-pileser. The reference is too obscure to outweigh the other evidence, and Schrader (*KAT*² p. 440), after stating the objections to the identification of Shalman with any of the Assyrian kings named Shalmaneser, points out that Salamana occurs in an inscription of Tiglath-pileser as the name of a king of Moab. There was an Arbela near Pella on the east of the Jordan, and the reference may be to some well-known episode in the disordered times after the death of Jeroboam. A recent event close at hand would most naturally be mentioned thus incidentally.

How then is the statement of the title to be reconciled with the conclusions drawn from internal evidence, if, on the one hand, the greater part of the Book must be assigned to the period after the reign of Jeroboam, and, on the other hand, no part of it can be placed so late as the time of Hezekiah or even Ahaz? The most probable explanation is that "in the days of Jeroboam" was the original title to the first section of the Book only (i.-iii.), and that "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah" is an addition by a later editor, who wished to mark that Hosea belonged to the same age as Isaiah and Micah (cp. Is. i. 1; Micah i. 1), without necessarily implying that his prophetic work extended throughout the whole of the period.

6. Contents and plan.—The two fundamental ideas of the Book are the unfaithfulness of Israel to Jehovah, and the unquenchable love of Jehovah for Israel. In the first division of the Book (i.—iii.) these ideas are symbolically expressed by the circumstances of the Prophet's domestic life, which have already been discussed.

The same ideas underlie the second division of the Book (iv.—xiv.). It contains a series of discourses, in which the sins of the people in all ranks of life are exposed and censured; warning is given of the inevitable chastisement which must follow; yet hope of final pardon and restoration is held out.

The two divisions are clearly separated. The circumstances of the Prophet's life out of which the teaching of chs. i.—iii. directly springs, are not referred to in chs. iv.—xiv. Internal evidence shows that the first part must be assigned to the closing years of the reign of Jeroboam; the second part to the period subsequent to his death.

Attempts have been made (as by Volck, in Herzog, *RE.*³, following in the main an art. by Delitzsch in the Zeitsch. f. Protestant. u. Kirche, for 1854, xxviii. 98 sq.) to trace a chronological arrangement in the second part. They are, however, unsatisfactory. Some plan and progress of thought may be marked, but no precise and exact division of subject is to be looked for in a Prophet like Hosea, inspired by intense feeling, burning with shame and indignation at the sights he saw, yet yearning with a tender love for the guilty nation. The ideas of Israel's sin and impending punishment are interlaced. The Prophet circles round and round his theme, and constantly recurs to the same thoughts. Three groups of prophecies may perhaps be distinguished. In the first (iv.—viii.), Israel's guilt; in the second (ix.—xi. 11), Israel's punishment; in the third (xi. 12—xiv.), Israel's hope of restoration, come into special prominence.

The following analysis may be a help to study:—

Part I., chs. i.—iii.

(1) The Prophet's domestic relations, symbolical of the unfaithfulness, judgment, and rejection of Israel (i. 2-9). Yet this doom shall one day be reversed and Israel restored (i. 10-ii. 1).^o Abruptly the Prophet reverts to the present, chides Israel for her faithlessness in deserting Jehovah and ascribing her prosperity to the Baalim, and predicts the punishment which awaits her (ii. 2-13). But punishment is for reformation, not destruction. There will be a second Exodus, a fresh wilderness-discipline, a new covenant of universal peace. The ideal relation of Israel to her God will in the end be realised (ii. 14-23).

(2) An interval has elapsed. Gomer has deserted Hosea, and fallen into slavery. But Hosea, at God's command, redeems her and retains her in a state of virtual widowhood, waiting till her affection for him may return. So in captivity Israel will be cut off at once from its idolatries and from the worship of Jehovah, until punishment has done its work and the people repent (iii. 1-5).

Part II., chs. iv.—xiv.

(1) Israel's guilt. The accusation (iv.—viii.).

(a) The corruption of the nation as a whole (iv.).

The prevalent immorality (vv. 1-5) is traced to its source in ignorance, for which selfish and unprincipled priests are to blame, and will suffer (vv. 6-10). The people are wholly abandoned to idolatry and licentiousness (vv. 11-14). Let Judah take warning from the sin of Israel. It is incurable and ripe for punishment (vv. 15-19).

(b) The universal godlessness of the nation, from its rulers downward, and its impending punishment (v.—vii.).

Priests and rulers, instead of helping the nation to amend its ways, have drawn it into sin (v. 1-7). The threatened storm of judgment breaks over Israel and Judah. In vain do they seek help from Assyria. They cannot escape from Jehovah's hand. He will withdraw His presence until they repent, and with contrite hearts turn to Him Who alone can heal (v. 8-vi. 3). But from such a hope the Prophet turns sadly back to the actual present. Israel's goodness is transitory, evanescent. The means by which Jehovah has endeavoured to bring them to repentance have borne no lasting fruit. Their corruption is inveterate (vv. 4-11). The desperate condition of Israel is disclosed when any attempt at reform is made. The rulers delight in the wickedness of the people. The people in turn intrigue against their kings (vii. 1-7). The suicidal policy of seeking help from foreign nations will issue in ruin (vv. 8-16).

(c) Fresh declaration of Israel's sin and punishment (viii.).

The enemy is at hand to avenge the broken covenant. Self-willed secession from the house of David led to idolatry. The idols cannot help, but will themselves be destroyed (viii. 1-7). Their Assyrian alliance will be their ruin. False and formal worship will not avail them. The cities in which they trust will be consumed with fire (vv. 8-14).

(2) Israel's punishment. The sentence (ix.—xi. 11).

Speedily will Israel be driven from its own land into a joyless exile (ix. 1-9). All their past history testifies to the ingratitude with which they have requited Jehovah's love. Rejection is the inevitable result of such continued rebellion (vv. 10-17). Israel's idolatry has increased in proportion to its prosperity. King, idols, altars shall share a common ruin (x. 1-8). Israel has sinned as in ancient days. They have perverted the Divine laws of right. Nation and king shall perish together (vv. 9-15). From the first Jehovah had chosen and guided Israel with loving care; but they abandoned Him, and now they must be punished. Yet He cannot utterly destroy them, and He will one day restore them to their own land (xi. 1-11).

(3) Redemption through judgment. The Restoration (xi. 12—xiv.).

The faithlessness of Israel, and even of Judah, is shown by their idolatries and foreign alliances. Yet the history of their ancestor Jacob should have taught them to trust Jehovah (xi. 12—xii. 6). The chosen people has become no better than a Canaanite, whose only aim is gain; therefore they must return to the wilderness. They have not been left without warning, yet the land is full of idols. Once more the history of Jacob should have taught them Jehovah's goodness. For such flagrant ingratitude nothing remains but punishment (v. 7-14).

^o Prof. Cheyne, following Steiner and Hellprin, would transpose this section to the end of ch. ii., in order to avoid the extreme abruptness of the transitions.

Israel was a mighty nation, but idolatry is its ruin. Jehovah has preserved them from Egypt onwards, yet the more they prospered the more they forsook Jehovah, and now He will turn against them (xiii. 1-8). Israel is doomed; they have turned against their only help. Their self-chosen king cannot save them. Samaria shall be captured with all the worst horrors of war (v. 9-16). Yet let Israel repent and turn from their sins; Jehovah's love will go out to them as of old, and with His blessing the nation will once more flourish (xiv.).

7. Style and literary characteristics.—"Osee," writes St. Jerome, "commaticus est et quasi per sententias loquens" (Praef. ad Os.). "Hoseam perlegentes," says Lowth, "nonnunquam videmur in sparsa quaedam Sibyllae folia incidere" (Praelectiones, p. 220). This abruptness and want of connexion may in part be due to the form in which Hosea's prophecies have come down to us. Even if they were reduced to writing by the Prophet himself (which there seems no reason to doubt, though it is incapable of proof), and not preserved through the recollections of his disciples, they can be but an abstract and outline of the discourses originally delivered, at different times and under different circumstances.

But in the main the style of the Prophet unquestionably reflects his character, and the conditions under which he worked. The tender sensitiveness of his nature had been developed by the discipline of his life. His loyalty to Jehovah fills him with holy indignation at the monstrous ingratitude of his countrymen. He cannot be blind to the enormity of their corruption. He sees that repentance is impossible; that only judgment remains. But he yearns over them with an infinite love and pity. "A divine amazement, anger, and sorrow give him words which roll on in exhaustless stream. Feeling, not reason, guides his pen. He is in no mood for calm reflexion and measured periods. His heart is too full of painful emotion, of heavy foreboding, to unfold his thoughts in long calm sentences, to arrange his words in close and intimate connexion. The thought is too full, the sentence too hasty and abrupt. The discourse often breaks off, as it were, into sobs" (Ewald, Prophets, i. 218). Hence the obscure allusions, the ideas thrown out and left without explanation, the abrupt transitions, which make the Book one of the most difficult in the O. T.

Hosea was gifted with an acute power of observation and rich poetical fancy. He is remarkable for the abundance and boldness of his figures. His language is characterised by striking originality, which disdains to be fettered by too rigid laws of language and grammar. Inversions, anacolutha, ellipses, are frequent, together with paronomasias and plays on words. Peculiar words, or common words in peculiar senses, rare orthographies, unusual constructions, are frequently found. Some at least of these characteristics may be due to his Northern origin (see Simson, p. 35 sq.; Nowack, p. xix. sq.; Cheyne, p. 32 sq.).

8. It is generally thought that Hosea was acquainted with the Book of Amos. Hos. iv. 3 may refer to Amos viii. 8; Hos. iv. 15, x. 5, 8, to Amos i. 5, v. 5 (Beth-aven for Beth-el); Hos. viii. 14 to the refrain in Amos i. 4, 7, 10, 12, 14, ii. 2, 5; Hos. xi. 10 to Amos i. 2 (simile of lion). Hos. xiv. 5-9 may reflect the imagery of Canticles.

Hosea shows, and presumes in his hearers, an intimate knowledge of the past history of Israel. He refers perhaps to the Fall (vi. 7, R. V. text, though the allusion is doubtful; to the destruction of the "cities of the plain" (xi. 8); to Jacob's history (xii. 3, 4, 12); to the Exodus (ii. 15; xi. 1; xii. 9, 13; xiii. 4); to the wanderings in the wilderness (ix. 10, xiii. 5); to the sin of Baal-peor (ix. 10); to the trespass of Achan (ii. 15); to the sin of Gibeah (ix. 9, x. 9); to the self-willed demand for a king (xiii. 10, 11).

A number of parallelisms to the thought and language of the Pentateuch and earlier Historical Books may be collected. Whether Hosea was acquainted with these Books in their present form, or only with documents and traditions out of which they were compiled, is an interesting question which cannot be discussed here (see Sharpe's Hosea, pp. 83 sq., for a full list of passages, and Cheyne's Hosea, pp. 34 sq., for some necessary cautions). But of far more importance than the question of the exact literary form in which Hosea knew it, is the plain fact that Hosea unquestionably regards the past history of Israel as possessing unique religious significance.

9. Numerous allusions in later Books indicate acquaintance with Hosea. Jeremiah, who was in many ways a kindred spirit, appears to have been specially influenced by the Book. The figure of the marriage relation between Jehovah and Israel is taken up and developed in Is. i. liv.; Jer. ii., iii.; Ezek. xvi., xxiii. Cp., too, Is. i. 23 with Hos. ix. 15; Jer. iii. 18, 22 with Hosea i. 11, xiv. 2, 5; Jer. iv. 3 with Hosea x. 12; Jer. viii. 5 with Hosea xi. 5; Jer. ix. 12 with Hosea xiv. 9; Jer. xiv. 10 with Hosea viii. 13, ix. 9; Jer. xxx. 9 with Hosea iii. 5; Ezek. xxxiv. 23 sq. with Hosea iii. 5, ii. 18 sq.; Zech. x. 9 with Hosea ii. 23; Zech. xiii. 2 with Hosea ii. 17; and other passages.

10. Quotations in the N. T.—Hosea xi. 1 is quoted as "fulfilled" in Matt. ii. 15. Our Lord twice appeals to Hosea vi. 6 in Matt. ix. 13, xii. 7; and uses the words of x. 8 in Luke xxiii. 30 (cp. Rev. vi. 16). St. Paul combines Hosea ii. 23 and i. 10 in Rom. ix. 25, 26; and quotes xiii. 14 in 1 Cor. xv. 55. 1 Pet. ii. 10 is a reminiscence of Hosea i. 6, 9; ii. 1, 23. Cp. also Hosea vi. 2 with 1 Cor. xv. 4; xiv. 2 with Heb. xiii. 15.

11. Hosea's teaching is based on the fundamental truth of the covenant which Jehovah has made with Israel (vi. 7; viii. 1); and the nation is regarded as an individual, possessing a continuity of life, and responsible for its acts. This covenant dates from the Exodus (ii. 3; xi. 1; xii. 9, 13; xiii. 4: cp. Ex. iv. 22), though even in earlier days Jehovah had preserved their ancestor Jacob (xii. 3-5, 12). The intimacy of the relation between Jehovah and Israel is expressed by the two figures of marriage and sonship. The figure of sonship implies, on the one hand paternal care, on the other filial obedience; the figure of marriage (impressed on the Prophet's mind by the experience of his own life) adds the thought of an intimate fellowship, a close and indissoluble union, originating in Jehovah's free love and choice, and demanding a response of love from Israel. The obligations of the covenant were embodied in a law, which the priests had neglected to teach (iv. 6), and which Israel had transgressed and despised (viii. 1, 12). The moral requirements of Jehovah are summed up under the heads of "truth, mercy, and the knowledge of God" (iv. 1, vi. 6); "righteousness and mercy" (x. 12); "mercy and judgment" (xii. 6); compare the terms of the new betrothal of the purified people (ii. 19, 20). Specially characteristic of Hosea's teaching is the word hësed (חֶסֶד, ii. 19; iv. 1; vi. 4, 6; x. 12; xii. 6). It is rendered "loving-kindness," "mercy," or "goodness," and it includes the ideas of "love" (ἀγάπη), "piety," or "dutiful regard" of man to his fellow-man. "Jehovah and Israel form, as it were, one community, and hësed is the bond by which the whole community is knit together. It is not necessary to distinguish Jehovah's hësed to Israel, which we would term His grace, Israel's duty of hësed to Jehovah, which we would call piety, and the relation of hësed between man and man, which embraces the duties of love and mutual consideration. To the Hebrew mind these three are essentially one, and all are comprised in the same covenant. Loyalty and kindness between man and man are not duties inferred from Israel's relation to Jehovah, they are parts of that relation; love to Jehovah and love to one's brethren in Jehovah's house are identical (cp. iv. 1 with vi. 4, 6)." (Robertson Smith, Prophets of Israel, p. 162.) It is characteristic of the difference between Amos and Hosea that Amos never uses the word. Amos is a stern preacher of righteousness. He represents Jehovah as the judge of Israel. Hosea goes deeper, and deals with the springs of action. He reveals another side of the Divine character, and introduces the motive of love.

Israel's sins are all summed up in its apostasy from Jehovah. The desertion of Jehovah for Baal and other false gods (i. 2; ii. 2 sq.; iv. 12 sq.; v. 3 sq.; ix. 1); the calf-worship which Hosea condemns as no better than Baal-worship (viii. 5 sq.; xiii. 2); the hankering for foreign alliances, which implied distrust of Jehovah, their natural protector (vii. 11, 13; viii. 9, 10; cp. v. 13; xii. 1; xiv. 3), are all so many acts of unfaithfulness to the marriage tie. The separation of the kingdoms was equally an act of apostasy. The unity of the nation corresponded to the unity of God. Jehovah's spouse should be one people. And idolatry had been the direct consequence of the separation (viii. 4). The deep moral corruption of the nation, about which in its manifold forms Hosea has so much to say, is traced also to the absence of the knowledge of God (iv. 6). It was intimately connected with false worships, for the Phœnician nature worship was essentially immoral.

Hosea's view of Israel's future is rooted in his conviction of the imperishableness of Jehovah's love for Israel (xi. 8 sq.). Chastisement must indeed come, but it will be for correction, not for destruction. The kingdom of Israel must come to an end (iii. 4; x. 3, 7; xiii. 10); Samaria must be destroyed (xiii. 16); Ephraim shall return to Egyptian bondage (ix. 3), and go into captivity in Assyria (ix. 3; xi. 5). But the day of restoration will come (xi. 10 sq.): Israel and Judah will be reunited under the house of David (i. 11; iii. 5); false worship and idolatry will cease (ii. 17; xiv. 8); there will be no more coquetting with foreign nations (xiv. 3); the nation will once more dwell in its own land in peace and prosperity, in perfect harmony with nature and with its God (ii. 18 sq.; iii. 5; xiv. 5 sq.).

The heathen world is not included in Hosea's prospect. His prophecy is limited to Israel. He leaves it to his successors, Isaiah and Micah, to speak of the time when the nations will stream up to Jerusalem to learn Jehovah's law (Is. ii. 2-4; Mic. iv. 1-3); when even Assyria and Egypt, the bitterest enemies of the chosen people, will serve Jehovah (Is. xix. 16 sq.).

12. Commentaries.—A full list of the older commentaries will be found in Rosenmüller's Scholæ, vii. 1, pp. 8 sq., 32 sq.; and of the literature of this century down to 1880 in Nowack's Commentary, pp. xxxv. sq. Of special commentaries on Hosea it may suffice here to mention those of Simson (1851); Wiinsche (1865), interesting for its constant reference to Jewish exegesis; Nowack (1880), most thorough and careful; Scholz (1882); in English, Sharpe, Notes and Dissertations on the Prophecy of Hosea (1884); Cheyne, in The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges (1884), sympathetic and suggestive; and (unrivalled as a general survey) Prof. Robertson Smith's Prophets of Israel, Lect. IV. Cp. also Driver, LOT. ch. vi. [A. F. K.]

HOSEN (Dan. iii. 21), plur. form of A.-S. hose. The word originally meant any kind of covering for the legs, and not merely stockings as now (Lumby, Glossary of Bible Words, s. n., in Eyre and Spottiswoode's "Teacher's Bible").

HOSHAI'AH (הוֹשַׁיָּהוּ = Jah hath saved; Osaïas). 1. (᾽Ασαΐδ.) A man who assisted in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem after it had been rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 32). He led the princes (נְשִׂימָי) of Judah in the procession, but whether he himself was one of them we are not told.

2. The father of a certain Jezeaniah, or Azariah, who was a man of note after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xlii. [LXX. xlix.] 1 [T. Μαασαίος, A. Μαασαίος, N. ᾽Ασαίος], xliii. [LXX. l.] 2 [T. and A. as before, N. Μαασαίος, N. Μαασαίος]).

HOSHAMA (הוֹשָׁמָה = Jah hath heard; B. ᾽Οσαμῶθ, A. ᾽Οσαμῶθ, Sama), one of the sons of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin, the last king of Judah but one (1 Ch. iii. 18). It is worthy of notice that, in the narrative of the capture of Jeconiah by Nebuchadnezzar, though the mother and the wives of the king are mentioned, nothing is said about his sons (2 K. xxiv. 12, 15). In agreement with this is the denunciation of him as a childless man in Jer. xxii. 30. There is good reason for suspecting some confusion in the present state of the text of the genealogy of the royal family in 1 Ch. iii.; and these facts would seem to confirm it.

HOSHEA (חֹשֶׁהָ = healing; Ὠσηέ; Osee), the 19th, last, and best king of Israel. He succeeded Pekah, whom he slew in a successful conspiracy, thereby fulfilling a prophecy of Isaiah (Is. vii. 16). Although Josephus calls Hoshea a friend of Pekah (φίλου τινὸς ἐπιβουλεύσαντος αὐτῷ, Ant. ix. 13, § 1), we have no ground for calling this "a treacherous murder" (Prideaux, i. 16). It took place B.C. 737, "in the twentieth year of Jotham" (2 K. xv. 30), i.e. "in the twentieth year after Jotham became sole king," for he only reigned sixteen years (2 K. xv. 33). But there must have been an interregnum of at least eight years before Hoshea came to the throne, which was not till B.C. 729, in the twelfth year of Ahaz (2 K. xvii. 1: we cannot, with Clericus, read fourth for twelfth in this verse, because of 2 K. xviii. 9). This way of reconciling the apparent discrepancy between the passages has been adopted by Usher, Des Vignoles, Tiele, &c. (Winer, s. v. Hoseas). The other methods suggested by Hitzig, Lightfoot, &c., are mostly untenable (Keil on 2 K. xv. 30).

The true aspect of Hoshea's elevation comes to us from the Assyrian inscriptions. Tiglath-pileser records that in his twelfth year (B.C. 734) he advanced as far as Gaza, capturing Gal[eed] and [A]bel on the way (see 2 K. xv. 29, 30), and "the land of the house of Omri, the distant . . . the whole of its inhabitants with their possessions to Assyria I deported. Pekah, their king, I slew. Hosea over them I appointed. Ten . . . I received from them" (Schrader, Cuneiform Inscriptions, p. 255). It appears from this inscription that Hoshea was raised to the throne because he stood at the head of the Assyrian party in Ephraim, whereas Pekah was in alliance with Rezin, king of Damascus. Tiglath-pileser took Damascus in 732, and Hoshea was probably one of the vassal kings who there waited upon him, though he is not mentioned as Ahaz ("Joahaz") is by the conqueror.

It is expressly stated (2 K. xvii. 2) that Hoshea was not so sinful as his predecessors. According to the Rabbis, this superiority consisted in his removing from the frontier-cities the guards placed there by his predecessors to prevent their subjects from worshipping at Jerusalem (Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 22, quoted by Prideaux, i. 16), and in his not hindering the Israelites from accepting the invitation of Hezekiah (2 Ch. xxx. 10), nor checking their zeal against idolatry (id. xxxi. 1). This encomium, however, is founded on the untenable supposition that Hezekiah's Passover preceded the fall of Samaria [HEZEKIAH], and we must be content with the general fact that Hoshea showed a more theocratic spirit than the former kings of Israel. The compulsory cessation of the calf-worship may have removed his greatest temptation, for Tiglath-pileser had carried off the golden calf from Dan some years before (Sed. Ol. Rab. 22), and that at Bethel was taken away by Shalmaneser in his first invasion (2 K. xvii. 3; Hos. x. 14; Prideaux, l. c.). But, whatever may have been his excellences, he still "did evil in the sight of the Lord," and it was too late to avert retribution by any improvements.

In the third year of his reign (B.C. 726) Shalmaneser IV., impelled probably by mere thirst of conquest, came against him, cruelly stormed the strong caves of Beth-arbel (Hos. x. 14), and made Israel tributary (2 K. xvii. 3) for three years. At the end of this period, encouraged perhaps by the revolt of Hezekiah, Hoshea entered into a secret alliance with So, king of Egypt (who was either the Σεύχος of Manetho, and son of Σαβακῶς, Herod. ii. 137; Keil, Vitringa, Gesenius, &c.; Jahn, Hebr. Com. § xl.; or else Sabaco himself, Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 308 [1878]; Ewald, Gesch. iii. 610), to throw off the Assyrian yoke. The alliance did him no good; it was revealed to the court of Nineveh by the Assyrian party in Ephraim, and Hoshea was immediately seized as a rebellious vassal, shut up in prison, and apparently treated with the utmost indignity (Mic. v. 1). If this happened before the siege (2 K. xvii. 4), we must account for it either by supposing that Hoshea, hoping to dissemble and gain time, had gone to Shalmaneser to account for his conduct, or that he had been defeated and taken prisoner in some unrecorded battle. That he disappeared very suddenly, like "foam upon the water," we may infer from Hos. x. 7, xiii. 11. The siege of Samaria lasted three years; for that "glorious and beautiful city" was strongly situated like "a crown of pride" among her hills (Is. xxviii. 1-5). During the course of the siege Shalmaneser must have died, for it is certain that Samaria was taken by his successor Sargon in B.C. 722, who thus laconically describes the event in his Annals:—"Samaria I looked at, I captured; 27,280 men (families?) who dwelt in it I carried away. I constructed fifty chariots in their country . . . I appointed a governor over them, and continued upon them the tribute of the former people" (Botta, 145, 11, quoted by Dr. Hincks, J. of Sac. Lit. Oct. 1858; Layard, Nin. and Bab. i. 148). This was probably B.C. 721 or 720. For the future history of the unhappy Ephraimites, the places to which they were transplanted by the policy of their conqueror and his officer, "the great and noble Assnapper" (Ezra iv. 10), and the nations by which they were superseded, see SAMARIA. Of the subsequent fortunes of Hoshea we know nothing. He came to the throne too late, and governed a kingdom torn to pieces by foreign invasion and intestine broils. Sovereign after sovereign had fallen by the dagger of the assassin; and we see from the dark and terrible delineations of the contemporary Prophets [HOSEA, MICAH, ISAIAH], that murder and idolatry, drunkenness and lust, had eaten like "an incurable wound" (Mic. i. 9) into the inmost heart of the national morality. Ephraim was dogged to its ruin by the apostate policy of the renegade who had asserted its independence (2 K. xvii.; Joseph. Ant. ix. 14; Prideaux, i. 15 sq.; Keil, On Kings, ii. 50 sq., Engl. ed.; Jahn, Hebr. Com. § xl.; Ewald, Gesch. iii. 607-613; Rosenmüller, Bibl. Geogr. ch. ix., Engl. transl.; Rawlinson, Herod. i. 149). [F. W. F.]

HOSHEA (חֹשֶׁהָ = healing). The name is precisely the same as that of the Prophet known to us as HOSEA). 1. The son of Nun, i.e. Joshua (Deut. xxxiii. 44; and also in Num. xiii. 8, A. V. ΟΣΗΑ, R. V. Hoshea). It was probably his original name, to which the Divine name of Jah was afterwards added—Jehoshua, Joshua—"Jehovah's help." The LXX. in this passage misses the distinction, and have Ἰησοῦς; Vulg. Josue.

2. (Ὀσῆ; Osee.) Son of Azaziah (1 Ch. xxvii. 20); like his great namesake, a man of Ephraim, ruler (νάγιδ) of his tribe in the time of king David.

3. (B. Ὀσηθά, A. Ὀσηέ; Osee.) One of the heads of the "people"—i.e. the laymen—who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 23). [W. A. W.] [F.]

HOSPITALITY. The rites of hospitality are to be distinguished from the customs prevailing in the entertainment of guests [FOOD; MEALS], and from the laws and practices relating to charity, almsgiving, &c. Hospitality was regarded as one of the chief virtues by most nations of the ancient world, and especially by peoples of the Semitic stock; but that it was not characteristic of the latter alone is amply shown by the usages of the Greeks and even of the Romans. Race undoubtedly influences its exercise, and it must also be ascribed in no small degree to the social state of a nation. Thus the desert tribes have always placed the virtue higher in their esteem than the townfolk of the same descent as themselves; and in our own day, though an Arab townsman is hospitable, he entertains notions on the subject different from those of the Arab of the desert (the Bedawi). The former has fewer opportunities of showing his hospitality; and when he does so, he does it not so much with the feeling of discharging an obligatory act as of performing a social duty. With the advance of civilisation the calls of hospitality become less and less urgent. The dweller in the wilderness, however, finds the entertainment of wayfarers to be a part of his daily life, and that to refuse it is to deny a common humanity. Viewed in this light, the notions of the Greeks and of the Romans must be appreciated as the recognition of the virtue where its necessity was not of the urgent character that it possesses in the more primitive lands of the East. The ancient Egyptians resembled the Greeks; but, with a greater exclusiveness, they limited their entertainments to their own countrymen, being constrained by the national and priestly abhorrence and dread of foreigners. This exclusion throws some obscurity on their practices in the discharge of hospitality; but otherwise their customs in the entertainment of guests resembled those well known to classical scholars—customs probably derived in a great measure from Egypt.

While hospitality is acknowledged to have been a wide-spread virtue in ancient times, we must concede that it flourished chiefly among the race of Shem. The O. T. abounds with illustrations of the religious ordinance to use hospitality, and of the strong national belief in its importance: so, too, in the writings of the N. T.; and though the Eastern Jews of modern times dare not entertain a stranger lest he be an enemy, and the long oppression they have endured has begotten that greed of gain that has made their name a proverb, the ancient hospitality still lives in their hearts. The desert, however, is yet free; it is as of old a howling wilderness; and hospitality is as necessary and as freely given as in patriarchal times. Among the Arabs we find the best illustrations of the old Bible narratives, and among them see traits that might besem their ancestor Abraham.

The laws respecting strangers (Lev. xix. 33, 34) and the poor (Lev. xxv. 14 sq.; Deut. xv. 7), and concerning redemption (Lev. xxv. 23 sq.), &c., are framed in accordance with the spirit of hospitality; and the strength of the national feeling regarding it is shown in the incidental mentions of its practice. In the Law, compassion to strangers is constantly enforced by the words, "for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (cp. Lev. xix. 34). And before the Law, Abraham's entertainment of the Angels (Gen. xviii. 1 sq.), and Lot's (xix. 1), are in exact agreement with its precepts and with modern usage. So Moses was received by Jethro, the priest of Midian, who reproached his daughters, though he believed him to be an Egyptian, saying, "And where is he? why is it that ye have left the man? call him, that he may eat bread" (Ex. ii. 20). The story of Joseph's hospitality to his brethren, although he knew them to be such, appears to be narrated as an ordinary occurrence; and in like manner Pharaoh received Jacob with a liberality not merely dictated by his relationship to the benefactor of Egypt. Like Abraham, "Manoah said unto the Angel of the Lord, I pray thee, let us detain thee until we shall have made ready a kid for thee" (Judg. xiii. 15); and, like Lot, the old man of Gibeah sheltered the Levite when he saw him, "a wayfaring man in the street of the city: and the old man said, Whither goest thou? and whence comest thou? . . . Peace be with thee; howsoever, let all thy wants lie upon me; only lodge not in the street. So he brought him into his house, and gave provender unto the asses; and they washed their feet, and did eat and drink" (Judg. xix. 17, 20, 21).

In the N. T. hospitality is yet more markedly enjoined; and in the more civilised state of society which then prevailed, its exercise became more a social virtue than a necessity of patriarchal life. The good Samaritan stands for all ages as an example of Christian hospitality, embodying the command to love one's neighbour as oneself; and Christ's charge to the disciples strengthened that command: "He that receiveth you receiveth Me, and he that receiveth Me receiveth Him that sent Me . . . And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water [only], in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward" (Matt. x. 42). The neglect of Christ is symbolised by inhospitality to our neighbours, in the words "I was a stranger, and ye took Me not in" (Matt. xxv. 43). The Apostles urged the Church to "follow after hospitality," using the forcible words τὴν φιλοξενίαν διώκοντες (Rom. xii. 13; cp. 1 Tim. v. 10); to remember Abraham's example, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained Angels unawares" (Heb. xiii. 2); to "use hospitality one to another without grudging" (1 Pet. iv. 9); while a Bishop must be a "lover of hospitality" (Tit. i. 8; cp. 1 Tim. iii. 2). The practice of the early Christians was in accord with these precepts. They had all things in common, and their hospitality was a characteristic of their belief.

If such has been the usage of Biblical times, it is in the next place important to remark how hospitality was shown. In the patriarchal ages we may take Abraham's example as the most fitting, as we have of it the fullest account; and by the light of Arab custom we may see, without obscurity, his hastening to the tent-door to meet his guests, with the words, "My lord, if now I have found favour in thy sight, pass not away, I pray thee, from thy servant: let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree, and I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts." "And," to continue the narrative in the vigorous language of the A. V., "Abraham hastened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth. And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetched a calf tender and good, and gave it unto a young man, and he hastened to dress it. And he took butter and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them; and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat." A traveller in the Eastern desert may see, through the vista of ages, this far-off example in its living traces. "Hospitality," says Lane, "is a virtue for which the natives of the East in general are highly and deservedly admired; and the people of Egypt are well entitled to commendation on this account. A word which signifies literally 'a person on a journey' (musâfir) is the term most commonly employed in this country in the sense of a visitor or guest. There are very few persons here who would think of sitting down to a meal, if there was a stranger in the house, without inviting him to partake of it, unless the latter were a menial, in which case he would be invited to eat with the servants. It would be considered a shameful violation of good manners if a Muslim abstained from ordering the table to be prepared at the usual time because a visitor happened to be present. Persons of the middle classes in this country, if living in a retired situation, sometimes take their supper before the door of their house, and invite every passenger of respectable appearance to eat with them." This is very commonly done among the lower orders. In cities and large towns claims on hospitality are infrequent, as there are many wakâlahs or khâns, where strangers may obtain lodging; and food is very easily procured: but in the villages travellers are often lodged and entertained by the Sheykh or some other inhabitant; and if the guest be a person of the middle or higher classes, or even not very poor, he gives a present to the host's servants, or to the host himself. In the desert, however, a present is seldom received from a guest. By a Sunnah law a traveller may claim entertainment, of

* "It is said to have been a custom of some of the Barmekes (the family so renowned for their generosity) to keep open house during the hours of meals, and to allow no one who applied at such times for admission to be repulsed."—Lane's Thousand and One Nights, ch. v. note 97.

any person able to afford it to him, for three days. The account of Abraham's entertaining the three Angels, related in the Bible, presents a perfect picture of the manner in which a modern Bedawi sheykh receives travellers arriving at his encampment. He immediately orders his wife or women to make bread, slaughters a sheep or some other animal, and dresses it in haste, and bringing milk and any other provisions that he may have ready at hand, with the bread and the meat which he has dressed, sets them before his guests. If these be persons of high rank, he stands by them while they eat, as Abraham did in the case above alluded to. Most Bedawis will suffer almost any injury to themselves or their families rather than allow their guests to be ill-treated while under their protection. There are Arabs who even regard the chastity of their wives as not too precious to be sacrificed for the gratification of their guests (see Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins, &c., 8vo ed., i. 179, 180); and at an encampment of the Bishârin, I ascertained that there are many persons in this great tribe (which inhabits a large portion of the desert between the Nile and the Red Sea) who offer their unmarried daughters (cp. Gen. xxi. 8; Judg. xix. 24) to their guests, merely from motives of hospitality, and not for hire" (Mod. Eg. ch. xiii.). Lane adds that there used to be a very numerous class of persons, called Tufailis, who lived by sponging, presuming on the well-known hospitality of their countrymen, and going from house to house where entertainments were being given. The Arabs along the Syrian frontier usually pitch the Sheykh's tent towards the west, that is, towards the inhabited country, to invite passengers and lodge them on their way (Burckhardt's Notes on the Bedouins, &c., 8vo ed., i. 33); it is held to be disgraceful to encamp in a place out of the way of travellers; and it is a custom of the Bedawis to light fires in their encampments to attract travellers, and to keep dogs which, besides watching against robbers, may, in the night-time, guide wayfarers to their tents. Hence a hospitable man is proverbially called "one whose dogs bark loudly." ^b Approaching an encampment, the traveller often sees several horsemen coming towards him, and striving who shall be first to claim him as a guest. The favourite national game of the Arabs before Islam illustrates their hospitality. It was called "Maisir," and was played with arrows, some notched and others without marks. A young camel was caught and killed, and divided into twenty-four portions: those who drew marked arrows had shares in proportion to the number of notches; those who drew blanks paid the cost of the camel among them. Neither party, however, ate of ^b The time of entertainment, according to the precept of Mohammad, is three days, and he permitted a guest to take this right by force; although one day and one night is the period of the host's being "kind" to him (Mishkât el-Musâdib, ii. 329). Burckhardt (Notes on the Bedouins, &c. i. 178, 179) says that a stranger without friends in a camp alights at the first tent, where the women, in the absence of the owner, provide for his refreshment. After the lapse of three days and four hours, he must, if he would avoid censure, either assist in household duties, or claim hospitality at another tent.

the flesh of the camel, which was always given to the poor; and "this they did out of pride and ostentation," says Sale, "it being reckoned a shame for a man to stand out, and not venture his money on such an occasion." Sale, however, is hardly philosophical in this remark, which concerns only the abuse of a practice originally arising from a national virtue: but Mohammad forbade the game, with all other games of chance, on the plea that it gave rise to quarrels, &c. (Sale's Preliminary Discourse, p. 96, ed. 1836, and Koran, ch. ii. and v.).

The Oriental respect for the covenant of bread and salt, or salt alone, certainly sprang from the high regard in which hospitality was held. Even accidentally to taste another's salt imposes this obligation; and to so great an extent is the feeling carried that a thief has been known to give up his booty in obedience to it. Thus Al-Jaith As-Saffar, when a robber, left his booty in the passage of the royal treasury of Sig'istan; accidentally he stumbled over, and, in the dark, tasted a lump of rock-salt: his respect for his covenant gained his pardon, and he became the founder of a royal dynasty. The Arab peculiarity was carried into Spain by the so-called Moors.

For the customs of the Greeks and Romans in the entertainment of guests, and the exercise of hospitality generally, the reader is referred to the Dict. of Gr. & Rom. Antiq., art. Hospitium. They are incidentally illustrated by passages in the N. T., but it is difficult to distinguish between those so derived and the native Oriental customs which, as we have said, are very similar. To one of the customs of classical antiquity a reference is supposed to exist in Rev. ii. 17: "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth, saving he that receiveth [it]." [E. S. P.]

HO'THAM (חֹתָם = signet ring; B. Χωθάν, A. Χωθάμ; Hotham), a man of Asher; son of Heber, of the family of Beriah (1 Ch. vii. 32).

HO'THAN, R. V. HOTHAM (חֹתָן; B. Κωθάν, A. Χωθάν; Hotham), a man of Aroer, father of Shama and Jehiel, two of the heroes of David's guard (1 Ch. xi. 44). The substitution of Hothan for Hotham is an error which has been retained in the A. V. from the edition of 1611 till now. Cp. the rendering of the LXX. both of this and the preceding name.

HO'THIR (חֹתִיר, ? = fulness; B. ᾠθηρεί, Ἡθεί, A. Ἰωθερί, Ἰεδρί; Othir), the thirteenth son of HEMAN, "the king's seer" (1 Ch. xxv. 4), and therefore a Kohathite Levite. He had the charge of the twenty-first course of the musicians in the service of the Tabernacle (xxv. 28).

HOUGH (pron. hock) from the A.-S. hoh = the ham of the leg. The word is applied in Josh. xi. 6, 9; 2 Sam. viii. 4, to cutting the hamstrings of an animal and thus disabling it (see Lumbly, Gloss. of Bible Words, s. n., in Eyre and Spottiswoode's "Teacher's Bible"). [F.]

HOURL (שָׁעָה, שְׂעוּתָה, Chald.). This word is first found in Dan. iii. 6, iv. 19, 33, v. 5; and it occurs several times in the Apocrypha (Judith xiv. 8; 2 Esd. ix. 44). It seems to be a vague expression for a short period, and the frequent phrase "in the same hour" means "immediately": hence we find שָׁעָה substituted in the Targum for מִיָּדָא, "in a moment" (Num. xvi. 21, &c.). ὥρα is frequently used in the same way by the N. T. writers (Matt. viii. 13; Luke xii. 39, &c.). It occurs in the LXX. as a rendering for various words meaning time, just as it does in Greek writers long before it acquired the specific meaning of our word "hour." Sā'ah is still used in Arabic both for an hour and a moment.

The ancient Hebrews were probably unacquainted with the division of the natural day into twenty-four parts. The general distinctions of "morning, evening, and noonday" (Ps. lv. 17) were sufficient for them at first, as they were for the early Greeks (Hom. Il. xxi. 111); afterwards the Greeks adopted five marked periods of the day (Jul. Pollux, Onom. i. 68; Dio Chrysost. Orat. ii. de Glor.), and the Hebrews parcelled out the period between sunrise and sunset into a series of minute divisions distinguished by the sun's course [DAY], as is still done by the Arabs, who have stated forms of prayers for each period (Lane's Mod. Eg. i. ch. 3).

The early Jews appear to have divided the day into four parts (Neh. ix. 3), and the night into three watches (Judg. vii. 19) [DAY; WATCHES], and even in the N. T. we find a trace of this division in Matt. xx. 1-5. There is, however, no proof of the assertion sometimes made, that ὥρα in the Gospels may occasionally mean a space of three hours.

The Greeks adopted the division of the day into twelve hours from the Babylonians (Herod. ii. 109; cp. Rawlinson, Herod. ii. p. 334). At what period the Jews became first acquainted with this way of reckoning time is unknown, but it is generally supposed that they too learnt it from the Babylonians during the Captivity (Wahner, Ant. Hebr. § v. ch. i. 8, 9). They may have had some such division at a much earlier period, as has been inferred from the fact that Ahaz erected a sun-dial in Jerusalem, the use of which had probably been learnt from Babylon. There is, however, the greatest uncertainty as to the meaning of the word שָׁעָה (A. V. "degrees," Is. xxxviii. 8). [DIAL.] It is strange that the Jews were not acquainted with this method of reckoning even earlier; for, although a purely conventional one, it is naturally suggested by the months in a year. Sir G. Wilkinson thinks that it arose from a less obvious cause (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 334). In whatever way originated, it was known to the Egyptians at a very early period. They had twelve hours of the day and of the night (called Nau = hour), each of which had its own genius, drawn with a star on its head. The word is said by Lepsius to be found as far back as the 5th dynasty (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 135).

[The Romans had two methods of reckoning the hours of the day: one, in common with other nations and in general use, from sunrise to sunset; the other, peculiar to themselves and adapted to legal and technical purposes (Bilfinger, Der bürgerliche Tag, p. 198 sq.), from midnight to midnight. St. John is usually thought to have adopted this latter reckoning, but the question is very complicated. See Westcott on St. John xix., Add. note; Cross in Class. Rev., June 1891; and Dods, The Gospel of St. John, i. 132.—F.]

There are two kinds of hours, viz. (1) the astronomical or equinoctial hour, i.e. the twenty-fourth part of a civil day, which, although "known to astronomers, was not used in the affairs of common life till towards the end of the 4th century of the Christian era" (Dict. of Gr. & Rom. Ant. s. v. Hora); and (2) the natural hour (which the Rabbis called שעות טבעיות, καρπικαὶ or temporales), i.e. the twelfth part of the natural day, or of the time between sunrise and sunset. These are the hours meant in the N. T., Josephus, and the Rabbis (John xi. 9, &c.; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 4, § 3), and it must be remembered that they perpetually vary in length, so as to be very different at different times of the year. Besides this, an hour of the day would always mean a different length of time from an hour of the night except at the equinox. From the consequent uncertainty of the term there arose the proverbial expression "not all hours are equal" (R. Joshua ap. Carpov. App. Crit. 345). At the equinoxes the third hour would correspond to 9 o'clock; the sixth would always be at noon. To find the exact time meant at other seasons of the year we must know when the sun rises in Palestine, and reduce the hours to our reckoning accordingly. [DAY.] (Wiener, s. vv. Tag, Uhren; Jahn, Arch. Bibl. § 101.) What horologic contrivances the Jews possessed in the time of our Lord is uncertain; but we may safely suppose that they had gnomons, dials, and clepsydræ, all of which had long been known to the Persians and other nations with whom they had come in contact. Of course the first two were inaccurate and uncertain indications, but the water-clock by ingenious modifications, according to the season of the year, became a very tolerable assistance in marking time. Mention is also made of a curious invention called צָרוּר שָׁעָה, by which a figure was constructed so as to drop a stone into a brazen basin every hour, the sound of which was heard for a great distance and announced the time (Otho, Lex. Rab. s. v. Hora).

For the purposes of prayer the old division of the day into four portions was continued in the Temple service, as we see from Acts ii. 15, iii. 1, x. 9. The Jews supposed that the third hour had been consecrated by Abraham, the sixth by Isaac, and the ninth by Jacob (Kimchi; Schoettgen, Hor. Hebr. ad Acts iii. 1). It is probable that the canonical hours observed by the Roman Catholics (of which there are eight in the twenty-four) are derived from these Temple hours (Moses and Aar. iii. 9).

The Rabbis pretend that the hours were divided into 1080 חלקים (minutes) and 56,848 רע"ט (seconds), which numbers were chosen because they are so easily divisible (Gem. Hier. Berachoth, 2, 4; in Reland, Ant. Hebr. iv. 1, § 19). [F. W. F.]

HOUSE (בַּיִת; oikos; domus; Chald. בֵּית, to pass the night, Gesen. Thes. p. 191 b), a dwelling in general, whether literally, as house, tent, palace, citadel, tomb; derivatively, as tabernacle, temple, heaven; or metaphorically, as family. Although, in Oriental language, every tent (see Gesen. p. 32) may be regarded as a house (Harmer, Obs. i. 194), yet the distinction between the permanent dwelling-house and the tent must have taken rise from the moment of the division of mankind into dwellers in tents and builders of cities, i.e. of permanent habitations (Gen. iv. 17, 20; Is. xxxviii. 12). The Hebrews did not become habitually dwellers in cities till the sojourn in Egypt and after the conquest of Canaan (Gen. xlvii. 3; Ex. xii. 7; Heb. xi. 9), while the Canaanites as well as the Assyrians were from an earlier period builders and inhabitants of cities, and it was into the houses and cities built by the former that the Hebrews entered to take possession after the conquest (Gen. x. 11, 19, xix. 1, xxiii. 10, xxiv. 20; Num. xi. 27; Deut. vi. 10, 11). The private dwellings of the Assyrians and Babylonians have altogether perished, but the solid material of the houses of Syria, east of the Jordan, may perhaps have preserved entire specimens of the ancient dwellings, even of the original inhabitants of that region (Porter, Damascus, ii. 195, 196; Graham in Camb. Essays, 1859, p. 160, &c.; cp. Buckingham, Arab Tribes, pp. 171, 172).

In inferring the plan and arrangement of ancient Jewish or Oriental houses, as alluded to in Scripture, from existing dwellings in Syria, Egypt, and the East in general, allowance must be made for the difference in climate between Egypt, Persia, and Palestine, a cause from which would proceed differences in certain cases of material and construction, as well as of domestic arrangement.

1. The houses of the rural poor in Egypt, as well as in most parts of Syria, Arabia, and Persia, are for the most part mere huts of mud, or sun-burnt bricks. In some parts of Palestine and Arabia stone is used, and in certain districts caves in the rock are used as dwellings (Amos v. 11; Bartlett, Walks, &c., p. 117; CAVES). The houses are usually of one story only, viz. the ground-floor, and sometimes contain only one apartment. Sometimes a small court for the cattle is attached; and in some cases the cattle are housed in the same building, or the people live on a raised platform, and the cattle round them on the ground (1 Sam. xxviii. 24; Irby and Mangles, p. 70; Jolliffe, Letters, i. 43; Buckingham, Arab Tribes, p. 170; Burckhardt, Travels, ii. 119; Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 72). In Lower Egypt the oxen occupy the width of the chamber farthest from the entrance, which is built of brick or mud, about four feet high, and the top is often used as a sleeping-place in winter. The windows are small apertures high up in the walls, sometimes grated with wood (Burckhardt, Travels, i. 241, ii. 101, 119, 301, 329; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 44). The roofs are commonly but not always flat, and are usually formed of a plaster of mud and straw laid upon boughs or rafters; and upon the flat roofs, tents or "booths" of boughs or rushes are often raised to be used as sleeping-places in summer (Irby and Mangles, p. 71; Niebuhr, Descr. pp. 49, 53; Layard, Nin. & Bab. p. 112; Nineveh, i. 176; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 280; Travels, i. 190; Van Egmont, ii. 32; Malan, Magdala & Bethany, p. 15). To this description the houses of ancient Egypt and also of Assyria, as represented in the monuments, in great measure correspond (Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, pt. ii. pl. 49, 50; bas-relief in Brit. Mus. Assyrian Room, No. 49; 1st Egypt. Room, case 17; Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 13 [1878]; Martineau, East. Life, i. 19, 97). In the towns the houses of the inferior kind do not differ much from the above description, but they are sometimes of more than one story, and the roof-terraces are more carefully constructed. In Palestine they are often of stone (Jolliffe, i. 26).

rank. The prevailing plan of Eastern houses of this class presents, as was the case in ancient Egypt, a front of wall, whose blank and mean appearance is usually relieved only by the door and a few latticed and projecting windows (Views in Syria, ii. 25). Within this is a court or courts with apartments opening into them. Some of the finest houses in the East are to be found at Damascus, where in some of them are seven such courts. When there are only two, the innermost is the harim, in which the women and children live, and which is jealously secluded from the entrance of any man but the master of the house (Burckhardt, Travels, i. 188; Van Egmont, ii. 246, 253; Shaw, p. 207; Porter, Damascus, i. 34, 37, 60; Chardin, Voyages, vi. 6; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 179, 207). Over the door is a projecting window with a lattice more or less elaborately wrought, which, except in times of public celebrations, is usually closed (2 K. ix. 30; Shaw, Travels, p. 207; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 27). The doorway or door bears an inscription from the Kur'an, as the ancient Egyptian houses had inscriptions over their doors, and as the Israelites were directed to write sentences from the Law over their gates. [GATE.] The entrance is usually guarded within from sight by a wall or some arrangement of the passages. In the passage is a stone seat for the porter and other servants (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 32; Shaw, Trav. p. 207; Chardin, Voy. iv. 111). Beyond this passage is an open court like the Roman impluvium, often paved with marble. Into this the principal apartments look, and are either open to it in front, or are entered from it by doors. An awning is sometimes drawn over the court, and the floor strewn with carpets on festive occasions (Shaw, p. 208). On the ground-floor there is generally an apartment for male visitors, called mandarah.

having a portion of the floor sunk below the rest called durkā'ah. This is often paved with marble or coloured tiles, and has in the centre a fountain. The rest of the floor is a raised platform called livān, with a mattress and cushions at the back on each of the three sides. This seat or sofa is called divān. Every person on entrance takes off his shoes on the durkā'ah before stepping on the livān (Ex. iii. 5; Josh. v. 15; Luke vii. 38). The ceilings over the livān and durkā'ah are often richly panelled and ornamented (Jer. xxii. 14). [CEILING.] The stairs to the upper apartments are in Syria usually in a corner of the court (Robinson, iii. 302). When there is no upper story, the lower rooms are usually loftier. In Persia they are open from top to bottom, and only divided from the court by a low partition (cp. Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 8-10 [1878]; Chardin, iv. 119; Burckhardt, Travels, i. 18, 19; Views in Syria, i. 56). Around part, if not the whole, of the court is a verandah, often nine or ten feet deep, over which, when there is more than one floor, runs a second gallery of like depth with a balustrade (Shaw, p. 208). Bearing in mind that the reception room is raised above the level of the court (Chardin, iv. 118; Views in Syria, i. 56), we may, in explaining the circumstances of the miracle of the paralytic (Mark ii. 3; Luke v. 18), suppose, 1. that our Lord was standing under the verandah, and the people in front in the court. The bearers of the sick man ascended the stairs to the roof of the house, and taking off a portion of the boarded covering of the verandah, or removing the awning over the impluvium, τὸ μέσον, in the former case let down the bed through the verandah roof, or in the latter, down by way of the roof, διὰ τῶν κεράμων, and deposited it before the Saviour (Shaw, p. 212). 2. Another explanation presents itself in considering the room where the company were assembled as the σπρεῖνον, and the roof opened for the bed to be the true roof of the house (Trench, Miracles, p. 199; Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 39). 3. And one still more simple is found in regarding the house as one of the rude dwellings now to be seen near the Sea of Galilee, a mere room "10 or 12 feet high and as many or more square," with no opening except the door. The roof, used as a sleeping-place, is reached by a ladder from the outside, and the bearers of the paralytic, unable to approach the door, would thus have ascended the roof, and, having uncovered it (ἐξορύττες), let him down into the room where our Lord was (Miss Rogers, Dom. Life in Palestine, p. 47; Malan, l. c.).

The stairs to the upper apartments or to the roof are often shaded by vines or creeping plants, and the courts, especially the inner ones, planted with trees. The court has often a well or tank in it (Ps. cxviii. 3; 2 Sam. xvii. 18; Russell, Aleppo, i. 24, 32; Wilkinson, i. 6-8 Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 32; Views in Syria, i. 56).

Kā'ah of House in Cairo. (Lane.)

Besides the mandarrah, there is sometimes a second room, either on the ground or upper floor, called Kā'ah, fitted with divāns, and at the corners of these rooms portions taken off and enclosed form retiring rooms (Lane, i. 39; Russell, i. 31, 33).

When there is no second floor, but more than one court, the women's apartments, harim, harem or haram (حريم and حرم, secluded, or prohibited, with which may be compared the Hebrew Armon, ארמון, Stanley, S. & P. App. § 82), are usually in the second court; otherwise they form a separate building within the general enclosure, or are above on the first floor (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 179, 207; Views in Syria, i. 56). The entrance to the harem is crossed by no one but the master of the house and the domestics belonging to the female establishment. Though this remark would not apply in the same degree to Jewish habits, the privacy of the women's apartments may possibly be indicated by the "inner chamber" (רַחֲצֵי; ταμείον; cubiculum) resorted to as a hiding-place (1 K. xx. 30, xxii. 25; see Judg. xv. 1). Solomon, in his marriage with a foreigner, introduced also foreign usage in this respect, which was carried farther in subsequent times (1 K. vii. 8; 2 K. xiv. 15). [WOMEN.] The harem of the Persian monarch (חַמְמַת; δ γυναικῶν; domus feminarum) is noticed in the Book of Esther (ii. 3).

When there is an upper story, the Ká'ah forms the most important apartment, and thus probably answers to the ὑπερφῶν, which was often the "guest-chamber" (Luke xxii. 12; Acts i. 13, ix. 37, xx. 8; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 154; Miss Rogers, pp. 130, 177; Robinson, ii. 229). The windows of the upper rooms often project one or two feet, and form a kiosk or latticed chamber, the ceilings of which are elaborately ornamented (Lane, i. 27; Russell, i. 102; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 190). Such may have been the "chamber in the wall" (עֲלֵי; ὑπερφῶν; coenaculum; Gesen. p. 1030) made, or rather set apart for Elisha, by the Shunammitte woman (2 K. iv. 10, 11). So also the "summer parlour" of Eglon (Judg. iii. 20, 23, but see Wilkinson, i. 11), the "loft" of the widow of Zarephath (1 K. xvii. 19). The "lattice" (שַׁבְּכָה; δικτυστόν; cancelli) through which Ahabziah fell, perhaps belonged to an upper chamber of this kind (2 K. i. 2), as also the "third loft" (τρίστερον) from which Eutychus fell (Acts xx. 9; comp. Jer. xxii. 13). There are usually no special bed-rooms in Eastern houses, and thus the room in which Ishboeth was murdered was probably an ordinary room with a diván, on which he was sleeping during the heat of the day (2 Sam. iv. 5, 6; Lane, i. 41).

Sometimes the diván is raised sufficiently to allow of cellars underneath for stores of all kinds (ταμεία, Matt. xxiv. 26; Russell, i. 32).

The outer doors are closed with a wooden lock, but in some cases the apartments are divided from each other by curtains only (Lane, i. 42; Chardin, iv. 123; Russell, i. 21).

There are no chimneys, but fire is made when required with charcoal in a chafing-dish; or a fire of wood might be kindled in the open court of the house (Luke xxii. 55; Russell, i. 21; Lane, i. 41; Miss Rogers, p. 153; Chardin, iv. 120).

Besides the mandarah, some houses in Cairo have an apartment called mak'ad, open in front to the court, with two or more arches, and a railing; and a pillar to support the wall above (Lane, i. 38). It was in a chamber of this kind, probably one of the largest size to be found in a palace, that our Lord was being arraigned before the high-priest, at the time when the denial of Him by St. Peter took place. He "turned and looked" on Peter as he stood by the fire in the court (Luke xxii. 56, 61; John xviii. 24), whilst He Himself was in the "hall of judgment," the mak'ad. Such was the "porch of judgment" built by Solomon (1 K. vii. 7), which finds a parallel in the golden alcove of Mohammed Uzbek (Ibn Batuta, Trav. p. 76, ed. Lee).

Before quitting the interior of the house, we may observe that on the diván the "corner" is the place of honour (cp. Amos iii. 12, the "couch" [R. V.] being the divan), which is never quitted by the master of the house in receiving strangers (Russell, i. 27; Miss Rogers, pp. 168-171; Malan, Tyre and Sidon, p. 38). The roofs of Eastern houses are, as has been said, mostly flat, though there are sometimes domes over some of the rooms. The flat portions are plastered with a composition of mortar, tar, ashes, and sand, which in time becomes very hard, but when not laid on at the proper season is apt to crack in winter, and the rain is thus admitted. In order to prevent this, every roof is provided with a roller, which is set at work after rain. In many cases the terrace roof is little better than earth rolled hard. On ill-compacted roofs grass is often found springing into a short-lived existence (Prov. xix. 13, xxvii. 15; Ps. cxxix. 6, 7; Ia. xxxvii. 27; Shaw, p. 210; Lane, i. 27; Robinson, iii. 39, 44, 60).

In no point do Oriental domestic habits differ more from European than in the use of the roof. Its flat surface is made useful for various household purposes, as drying corn, hanging up linen, and preparing figs and raisins (Shaw, p. 211; Burckhardt, Trav. i. 191). The roofs are used as places of recreation in the evening, and often as sleeping-places at night (2 Sam. xi. 2, xvi. 22; Dan. iv. 29; 1 Sam. ix. 25, 26; Job xvii. 18; Prov. xxi. 9; Shaw, p. 211; Russell, i. 35; Chardin, iv. 116; Layard, Nineveh, i. 177; Robinson, ii. 234). They were also used as places for devotion, and even idolatrous worship (Jer. xxxii. 29, xix. 13; 2 K. xxiii. 12; Zeph. i. 5; Acts x. 9). At the time of the Feast of Tabernacles, booths were erected by the Jews on the tops of their houses, as in the present day huts of boughs are sometimes erected on the housetops as sleeping-places, or places of retirement from the heat in summer time (Neh. viii. 16; Burckhardt, Syria, p. 280). As among the Jews the seclusion of women was not carried to the extent of Mohammedan usage, it is probable that the house-top was made, as it is among Christian inhabitants, more a place of public meeting, both for men and women, than is the case among Mohammedans, who carefully seclude their roofs from inspection by partitions (Burckhardt, Trav. i. 191; cp. Wilkinson, i. 23). The Christians at Aleppo, in Russell's time, lived contiguous, and made their house-tops a means of mutual communication to avoid passing through the streets in time of plague (Russell, i. 35). In the same manner the house-top might be made a means of escape by the stairs by which it was reached without entering any of the apartments of the house (Matt. xxiv. 17, x. 27; Luke xii. 3).

Both Jews and heathens were in the habit of wailing publicly on the house-tops (Is. xv. 3, xxii. 1; Jer. xlviii. 38). Protection of the roof by parapets was enjoined by the Law (Deut. xxii. 8). The parapets thus constructed, of which the types may be seen in ancient Egyptian houses, were sometimes of open work, and it is to a fall through or over one of these that the injury by which Ahaziah suffered is sometimes ascribed (Shaw, p. 211). To pass over roofs for plundering purposes, as well as for safety, would be no difficult matter (Joel ii. 9). In ancient Egyptian and also in Assyrian houses a sort of raised story was sometimes built above the roof, and in the former an open chamber, roofed or covered with awning, was sometimes erected on the house-top (Wilkinson, i. 9; Layard, Mon. of Nin. ii. pl. 49, 50).

There are usually no fire-places, except in the kitchen, the furniture of which consists of a sort of raised platform of brick with receptacles in it for fire, answering to the "boiling places" (מִבְּשִׁילֹת; μαγειρεία; culinae) of Ezekiel (xlv. 23; Lane, i. 41; Gesen. p. 249; Miss Rogers, p. 153).

Special apartments were devoted in larger houses to winter and summer uses (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Amos iii. 15; Chardin, iv. 119).

The ivory house of Ahab was probably a palace largely ornamented with inlaid ivory. [PALACE.]

The circumstance of Samson's pulling down the house by means of the pillars, may be explained by the fact of the company being assembled on tiers of balconies above each other, supported by central pillars on the basement; when these were pulled down, the whole of the upper floors would fall also (Judg. xvi. 26; Shaw, p. 211).

Houses for jewels and armour were built and furnished under the kings (2 K. xx. 13). The draught house (מִתְּרֵי לְוָיִט; κοπρών; latrinae) was doubtless a public latrine, such as exists in modern Eastern cities (2 K. x. 27; Russell, i. 34).

Leprosy in the house was probably a nitrous effluence on the walls, which was injurious to the salubrity of the house, and whose removal was therefore strictly enjoined by the Law (Lev. xiv. 34, 55; Kitto, Phys. Geogr. of Pal., p. 112; Winer, s. v. Häuser; Michaelis, Laws of Moses, iii. 297; see Defoe, Plague of London, p. 137).

The word בֵּית is prefixed to words constituting a local name, as Bethany, Bethhoron, &c. In modern names it is represented by Beit, as Beitlahm. [H. W. P.]

HOUSE OF GOD. The expression occurs in the A. V. of Judg. xx. 18, 26, xxi. 2, as a translation of בֵּית יְהוָה. The R. V. renders the Hebrew more correctly "Bethel" (see B. D., Amer. ed.). [F.]

HUK'KOK (חֻקֹּק; ? = rock excavation; Β' Ἰακῶνα, A. Ἰακῶν; Hucosa), a place on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34) named next to Aznoth-Tabor. It is mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (*OS.*² p. 261, 82; p. 166, 7; Εἰκῶν, Ioc), but in such a manner as to show that they knew nothing of it but from the text. By Hap-Parchi in 1320, and in this century by Wolcott and by Robinson, Hukkok has been recovered in Yákúk, a village in the mountains of Naphtali, west of the upper end of the Sea of Galilee, about 7 miles S.S.W. of Safed, and at the head of Wady el-Amúd, though Dillmann² considers this too far north. An ancient Jewish tradition locates here the tomb of Habakkuk (Zunz, in B. Tudeia, ii. 421; Schwarz, p. 182; Robinson, iii. 81, 82; PEF. Mem. i. 364; Guérin, Galilée, i. 354 sq.). [G.] [W.]

HUK'KOK (חֻקֹּק; B. Ἰακῶν, A. Ἰακῶν; Hucosa), a name which in 1 Ch. vi. 75 is substituted for Helkath in the parallel list of the Gershonite cities in Asher, in Josh. xxi. 31.

HUL (חֻל; Oḅā, in 1 Ch., B. om., A. Oḅḅ; Hul; cp. 1 Ch. i. 17), the second son of Aram, and grandson of Shem (Gen. x. 23). The geographical position of the people whom he represents is not well decided. Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 4) and Jerome fix it in Armenia; Schulthens (Parad. p. 262) on etymological grounds (as though the name = חֻל, sand) proposes the southern part of Mesopotamia (cp. the name of the district Hulija in the Assyrian inscriptions; see Delitzsch [1887] and Dillmann² in loco); Von Bohlen (Introd. to Gen. ii. 249) places it in the neighbourhood of Chaldaea. Some favour the district about the roots of Lebanon, where the names Ard el-Húleh, a district to the north of Lake Merom; Oḅḅāḅa, a town, or locality, noticed by Josephus (Ant. xv. 10, § 3), between Galilee and Trachonitis; and Golan, and its modern form Jaulán, bear some affinity to the original name of Hul, or, as it should rather be written, Chul. [W. L. B.] [W.]

HUL'DAH (חֻלְדָּה; Ὀλδα; Olda), a prophetess, whose husband Shallum was keeper of the wardrobe in the time of king Josiah, and who dwelt in the suburb (Rosenmüller ad Zeph. i. 10) of Jerusalem. While Jeremiah was still at Anathoth, a young man unknown to fame, Huldah was the most distinguished person for prophetic gifts in Jerusalem; and it was to her that Josiah had recourse when Hilkiah found a book of the Law, to procure an authoritative opinion on it (2 K. xxii. 14; 2 Ch. xxxiv. 22). The name is found in Palmyrene inscriptions (MV.¹¹), and on coins such as that of a Nabatean queen contemporary with Pompey (Riehman, HWB. s. n.). [W. T. B.] [F.]

HUM'TAH (חֻמְתָּה; B. Εδμά, A. Kammatá; Athmatha), a city of Judah, one of those in the mountain-district, the next to Hebron (Josh. xv. 54). It was not known to Eusebius and Jerome (see *OS.*² p. 241, 53; p. 130, 20; Ἀμμαθά, Amatthar), nor has it since been identified. There is some resemblance between the name and that of Kimath (Kimáth), one of the places added by the Vat. LXX. to the list in the Hebrew text of 1 Sam. xxx. 27-31. [G.] [W.]

HUNTING. The objects for which hunting is practised, indicate the various conditions of society and the progress of civilisation. Hunting, as a matter of necessity, whether for the extermination of dangerous beasts, or for procuring sustenance, betokens a rude and semi-civilised state; as an amusement, it betokens an advanced state. In the former, personal prowess and physical strength are the qualities which elevate a man above his fellows and fit him for dominion, and hence one of the greatest heroes of antiquity is described as a "mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. x. 9), while Ishmael, the progenitor of a wild race, was famed as an archer (Gen. xxi. 20), and Esau, holding a similar position, was "a cunning hunter, a man of the field" (Gen. xxv. 27). The latter state may be exemplified, not indeed from Scripture itself, but from contemporary records. Among the accomplishments of Herod, his skill in the chase is particularly noticed; he kept a regular stud and a huntsman (Joseph. Ant. xvi. 10, § 3), followed up the sport in a wild country (Ant. xv. 7, § 7) which abounded with stags, wild asses, and bears, and is said to have killed as many as forty head in a day (B. J. i. 21, § 13). The wealthy in Egypt and Assyria followed the sports of the field with great zest; they had their preserves for the express purpose of preserving and hunting game (Wilkinson's Anc. Egypt. i. 215 [1878]; Xen. Cyrop. i. 4, § 5, 14), and drew from hunting scenes subjects for decorating the walls of their buildings, and even the robes they wore on state occasions.

The Hebrews, as a pastoral and agricultural people, were not given to the sports of the field; the density of the population, the earnestness of their character, and the tendency of their ritual regulations, particularly those affecting food, all combined to discourage the practice of hunting; and perhaps the examples of Ishmael and Esau were recorded with the same object. There was no lack of game in Palestine; on their entrance into the land, the wild beasts were so numerous as to be dangerous (Ex. xxiii. 29); the utter destruction of them was guarded against by the provisions of the Mosaic Law (Ex. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 7). Some of the fiercer animals survived to a late period, as lions (Judg. xv. 5; 1 Sam. xvii. 34; 2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 K. xiii. 24, xx. 36) and bears (1 Sam. xvii. 34; 2 K. ii. 24). Jackals (Judg. xv. 4) and foxes (Cant. ii. 15) were also numerous; hart, roebuck, and fallow deer (Deut. xii. 15; 1 K. iv. 23) formed a regular source of sustenance, and were possibly preserved in enclosures. The manner of catching these animals was either by digging a pitfall (תַּחְשֵׁשׁ), which was the usual manner with the larger animals, as the lion (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; Ezek. xix. 4, 8); or secondly by a trap (תַּב), which was set under ground (Job xviii. 10), in the run of the animal (Prov. xxii. 5), and caught it by the leg (Job xviii. 9); or lastly by the use of the net, of which there were various kinds, as for the gazelle (?) (Is. li. 20, A. V. "wild bull," R. V. "antelope"), and other animals of that class. [NET.] The method in which the net was applied is familiar to us from the descriptions in Virgil (Aen. iv. 121, 151 sq., x. 707 sq.); it was placed across a ravine or narrow valley, frequented by the animals for the sake of water, and the game was driven in by the hunters and then despatched either with bow and arrow, or spears (cp. Wilkinson, i. 214). The game selected was generally such as was adapted for food (Prov. xii. 27), and care was taken to pour out the blood of these as well as of tame animals (Lev. xvii. 13).

Birds formed an article of food among the Hebrews (Lev. xvii. 13), and much skill was exercised in catching them. The following were the most approved methods. (1) The trap (תַּב), which consisted of two parts: a net, strained over a frame, and a stick to support it, but so placed that it should give way at the slightest touch; the stick or springe was termed שֵׁשֶׁת (Amos iii. 5, "gin"; Ps. lxi. 22, "trap"); this was the most usual method (Job xviii. 9; Eccles. ix. 12; Prov. vii. 23). (2) The snare (סִמְצָא, from סָמַצָא, to braid; Job xviii. 9, A. V. "robber," R. V. "gin"), consisting of a cord (לֶבַח, Job xviii. 10; cp. Ps. xviii. 5, cxvi. 3, cxl. 5), so set as to catch the bird by the leg. (3) The net, which probably resembled those used in Egypt, consisting of two sides or frames, over which network was strained, and so arranged that they could be closed by means of a cord: the Hebrew names are various. [NET.] (4) The decoy, to which reference is made in Jer. v. 26, 27—a cage of a peculiar construction (בַּיִת)—was filled with birds, which acted as decoys; the door of the cage was kept open by a piece of stick acting as a springe (תַּחְשֵׁשׁ), and closed suddenly on the entrance of a bird. The partridge appears to have been used as a decoy (Eccles. xi. 30). [W. L. B.]

HUPHAM (חֻפְּהָם, ?) = inhabitant of the coast, Gen.; LXX. om.; Hupham, a son of Benjamin, founder of the family (Mishpachah) of the HUPHAMITES (Num. xxvi. 39). In the lists of Gen. xli. and 1 Ch. vii. the name is given as HUPPIM, which see.

HUPHAMITES, THE (חֻפְּהָיִים; LXX. om.; Huphamitae), descendants of HUPHAM of the tribe of Benjamin (Num. xxvi. 39).

HUPPAH (הַפָּה = a covering; B. Ὀρχοφόρα, A. Ὀρφοά, Hoppah), a priest in the time of David, to whom was committed the charge of the thirteenth of the twenty-four courses in the service of the House of God (1 Ch. xxiv. 13).

HUPPIM (חֻפִּים = coverings; Gen. xli. 21, A. Ὀφμίμν, D. Ὀφμίμν; Ophim; 1 Ch. vii. 12, B. Ἀφμίμν, A. Ἀφμίμν; Hapham), head of a Benjamite family. According to the text of the LXX. in Gen., a son of Bela [BELA], but according to Ch. a son of Ir or Iri, who was one of the sons of Bela. The sister of Huppim married into the tribe of Manasseh. HUR (חֹר, Hur). 1. ("Ἰσρ; Joseph. Ἰσρος.) A man who is mentioned with Moses and Aaron on the occasion of the battle with Amalek at Rephidim (Ex. xvii. 10), when with Aaron he stayed up the hands of Moses (v. 12). He is mentioned again in xxiv. 14, as being, with Aaron, left in charge of the people by Moses during his ascent of Sinai. It would appear from this that he must have been a person connected with the family of Moses and of some weight in the camp. The latter would follow from the former. The Jewish tradition, as preserved by Josephus (Ant. iii. 2, § 4), is that he was the husband of Miriam, and (iii. 6, § 1) that he was identical with

2. (חור.) The grandfather of Bezaleel, the chief artificer of the Tabernacle—"son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah" (Ex. xxxi. 2, xxxv. 30, xxxviii. 22), the full genealogy being given on each occasion (see also 2 Ch. i. 5). In the lists of the descendants of Judah in 1 Ch. the pedigree is more fully preserved. Hur there appears as one of the great family of Pharez. He was the son of Caleb ben-Hezron, by a second wife, Ephrath (ii. 19, 20; cp. v. 5, also iv. 1), the first fruit of the marriage (ii. 50, iv. 4), and the father, besides Uri (v. 20), of three sons, who founded the towns of Kirjath-jearim, Beth-lehem, and Beth-gader (v. 51). Hur's connexion with Beth-lehem would seem to have been of a closer nature than with the others of these places, for he himself is emphatically called "Abi-Beth-lehem"—the "father of Bethlehem" (iv. 4). Certainly Beth-lehem enjoyed, down to a very late period, a traditional reputation for the arts which distinguished his illustrious grandson. Jesse, the father of David, is said to have been a weaver of the veils of the Sanctuary (Targ. Jonathan, 2 Sam. xxi. 19), and the dyers were still lingering there when Benjamin of Tudela visited Bethlehem in the 13th century.

In the Targum on 1 Ch. ii. 19 and iv. 4, Ephrath is taken as identical with Miriam: but this would be to contradict the more trustworthy tradition given above from Josephus.

In his comments on 1 Ch. iv. 1 (Quaest. Hebr. in Paralip.), Jerome overlooks the fact that the five persons there named as "sons" of Judah are really members of successive generations; and he attempts, as his manner is, to show that each of them is identical with one of the immediate sons of the Patriarch. Hur he makes to be another name for Onan.

3. (חור, Joseph. Ὀβρης.) The fourth of the five "kings" (חורים); LXX. and Joseph. Ant. iv. 7, § 1, βασιλεύς of Midian, who were slain with Balaam after the "matter of Peor" (Num. xxxi. 8). In a later mention of them (Josh. xiii. 21) they are called "princes" (חורים) of Midian and "dukes" (חורים); not the word commonly rendered "duke," but probably with the force of dependence, see Keil on Josh. l. c. and Dillmann² on Num. l. c.; LXX. ἑραπα) of Sihon king of the Amorites, who was killed at the same time with them. No further light can be obtained as to Hur.

4. (BA. omit.) Father of Rephaiah, who was ruler of half of the environs (חור) A. V. "part," R. V. "district") of Jerusalem, and assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the wall (Neh. iii. 9).

5. (B. Βαυβρ.) The "son of Hur"—Ben-Chur—was commissariat officer for Solomon in Mount Ephraim (1 K. iv. 8). The LXX. A. gives the word Ben both in its original and its translated form (βεν υἱος Ὀρ), a not infrequent custom with them. Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 3) has Ὀβρης as the name of the officer himself. The Vulg. (Benhur) follows the Hebrew, and is in turn followed in the margin of the A. V. It is remarkable that the same form is observed in giving the names of no less than five out of the twelve officers in this list. [G.] [W.]

HUR'AI (חוראי; B. Ὀβρῆι, A. -πῆ; Hurai), one of David's guard—Hurai of the torrents of Gaash—according to the list of 1 Ch. xi. 32. In the parallel catalogue of 2 Sam. xxiii. 30 the R is changed to D, as is frequently the case, and the name stands as HIDDAI. Kennicott has examined the discrepancy, and, influenced by the readings of some of the MSS. of the LXX., decides in favour of Hurai as the genuine name (Dissert. p. 194).

HUR'AM (חורם, Ges. [MV.¹¹ = nobly born, but possibly an abbreviation for חורמם, or חורם]; Assyr. Hurammu; B. Ὀρμῆ, Ἄ. Ἱωρμῆ; Huram). 1. A Benjamite; son of Bela, the first-born of the Patriarch (1 Ch. viii. 5).

2. The form in which the name of the king of Tyre in alliance with David and Solomon—and elsewhere given as HIRAM—appears in Chronicles. (a.) At the time of David's establishment at Jerusalem (1 Ch. xiv. 1). In the A. V. and R. V. the name is Hiram, in accordance with the Kethib or original Hebrew text (חורם); but in the marginal correction of the Masorets (Qeri) it is altered to Huram (חורח), the form which is maintained in all its other occurrences in these Books. The LXX. Χερμύμ, Vulg. Hiram, and Targum, all agree with the Kethib. (b.) At the accession of Solomon (2 Ch. ii. 3, 11, 12; viii. 2, 18; ix. 10, 21: in each of these cases also the LXX. has BA. Χερμύμ, and the Vulg. Hiram).

3. The same change occurs in Chronicles in the name of Hiram the artificer, which is given as Huram in the following places: 2 Ch. ii. 13; iv. 11, 16. In the first and last of these a singular title is given him—the word Ab, "father"—"Hiram my father,"^a and "Hiram his father." No doubt this denotes the respect and esteem in which he was held, according to the similar custom of the people of the East at the present day.^b There also the LXX. and Vulgate follow the form Hiram, [G.] [F.]

HUR'I (חור'י = linen-weaver; B. Ὀβρῆι, A. Ὀβρῆι; Hur'i), a Gadite; father of Abihail, a chief man in that tribe (1 Ch. v. 14).

HUSHAH (חושא; = haste; Ὠσάδ; Hosa),^a a name which occurs in the genealogies of the tribe of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 4)—"Ezer, father of ^a The A. V. and R. V. (text) of 2 Ch. ii. 13 take the words "of Hiram my father's" to mean the late king; but this is unnecessary, and the Hebrew will bear the rendering given above (R. V. marg.).

^b Analogous to this, though not exactly similar, is Joseph's expression (Gen. xlv. 8), "God hath made me a father unto Pharaoh." Cp. also 1 Macc. xi. 32; where note the use of the two terms "cousin" (συγγενής, v. 31) and "father" (v. 32). Somewhat analogous, too, is the use of terms of relationship—"brother," "cousin"—in legal and official documents of our own and other countries.

Hushah." It may well be the name of a place, like Etam, Gedor, Beth-lehem, and others, in the preceding and succeeding verses; but we have no means of ascertaining the fact, since it occurs nowhere else. For a patronymic possibly derived from this name, see HUSHATHITE.

HU'SHAI (חֲשִׂיָּהוּ = quick; B. Χουσαι, A. [sometimes] and Joseph. Χουσι; Chusai), an Archite, i.e. possibly an inhabitant of a place called Erec (2 Sam. xv. 32 sq.; xvi. 16 sq.). He is called the "friend" of David (2 Sam. xv. 37: in 1 Ch. xxvii. 33, the word is rendered "companion;" cp. Joseph. Ant. vii. 9, § 2: the LXX. has a strange confusion of Archite and ἀρχι-εραῖπος = chief friend). To him David confided the delicate and dangerous part of a pretended adherence to the cause of Absalom. His advice was preferred to that of Ahithophel, and speedily brought to pass the ruin which was intended. His son Baana was one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K. iv. 16). Hushai himself was probably no longer living; at any rate his office was filled by another (1 K. iv. 5). [T. E. B.]

HU'SHAM (חֲשָׁמַי, in Chronicles חֲשָׁמַי = quick; 'Asûm; Husam), one of the kings of Edom, before the institution of monarchy in Israel (Gen. xxvi. 34, 35; 1 Ch. i. 45, 46). He is described as "Husham of the land of the Temanite;" and he succeeded Jobab, who is taken by the LXX. in their addition to the Book of Job to be identical with that Patriarch.

HU'SHATHITE, THE (חֲשִׂיָּתִי, and twice in Chronicles חֲשִׂיָּתִי; de Husati, Husathites), the designation of two of the heroes of David's guard. 1. SIBBECHAI (2 Sam. xxi. 18 [B. δ' Ἀσραβαὲλ, A. Ἀουσαρραβεὲς]; 1 Ch. xi. 29 [B. δ' Ἀθελ, N. δ' Ἰαβελ, A. δ' Ἀσωθί], xx. 4 [B. Θωραβελ, A. δ' Οθραβί], xxvii. 11 [B. δ' Ἰσραβελ, A. om.]). In the last of these passages he is said to have belonged to the Zarhites; that is, (probably) to the descendants of Zerach of the tribe of Judah. So far this is in accordance with a connexion between this and HUSHAI; a name, apparently of a place, in the genealogies of Judah. Josephus, however (Ant. vii. 12, § 2), mentions Sibbechai as a Hittite.

2. (B. Ἀνωθεῖρης [bis], A. Ἀνωθεῖρης and Ἀσωθεῖρης; de Husati.) A patronymic applied to one MEBUNNAI (2 Sam. xxiii. 27), a corruption of SIBBECHAI (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the B.B. of Samuel, in loco).

HU'SHIM. 1. (חֲשִׂיָּהוּ; 'Asûm; Husim.) In Gen. xli. 23, "the children of (חֲשִׂיָּהוּ) Dan" are said to have been Hushim. The name is plural, as if of a tribe rather than an individual, which perhaps is one way of accounting for the use of the plural in "children" (for another view see Knobel in Dillmann* on Gen. xxxvi. 25). In the list of Num. xvi. 42 the name is changed to SHUHAM.

Hushim figures prominently in the Jewish traditions of the recognition of Joseph, and of Jacob's burial at Hebron. See the quotations from the Midrash in Weil's Bib. Legends, p. 88, note, and the Targum Pseudojon. on Gen. i. 13. In the latter he is the executioner of Esau.

2. (חֲשִׂיָּהוּ, i.e. Chushshim; B. om., A. Ἀροβ, Hasim), a member of the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Ch. vii. 12); and here again apparently (as the text now stands) the plural nature of the name is recognised, and Hushim is stated to be "the sons of (Bene) Aher" (see Bertheau in Exeg. Hdbuch. ad loc.).

3. (חֲשִׂיָּהוּ and חֲשִׂיָּהוּ: B. in v. 8, Σωσίμ, in v. 11 Ὀσίμην, A. Ὀσίμ; Husim, but in v. 11 Mehusim, by inclusion of the Hebrew participle.) The name occurs again in the genealogy of Benjamin, but there as that of one of the two wives of Shaharaim (1 Ch. viii. 8), and the mother of two of his sons (v. 11). In this case the plural significance of the name is not alluded to.

HUSKS. By this word the A. V. and R. V. texts have rendered κερῶνια in Luke xv. 16, correctly explained in the R. V. margin, pods of the carob tree. The tree is mentioned in this single passage in Scripture. It is also known as the locust tree (Ceratonia siliqua, L.), belonging to the botanical order Leguminosae. The name carob tree is derived from the Talmudic חַרְבֵּב, chârâb;

Arabic خروب, charrûb, churnûb, whence too the Italian caroubi. It is one of the most common trees in Egypt and in Palestine from Hebron northwards, and is a very conspicuous and attractive feature in the landscape, with its dense, deep-green foliage. The leaves are pinnate, like those of our ash-tree, but more ovate and very dark, glossy, and evergreen. The carob blossoms in February, and from April to June yields enormous quantities of pods. These are flat and narrow, from 6 to 10 inches in length, and shaped like a horn, whence the Greek name. When ripe, they are of a dark purple colour, but when green and tender, they have an agreeable, sweet taste. They are often chewed, or steeped in water to supply a pleasant drink, like the tamarind of the West Indies, which they somewhat resemble in flavour.

Pliny (v. 24) writes, "Haud procul abesse videntur, et prædulces siliquæ, nisi quod in iis cortex ipse manditur." The Mishna mentions the carob beans as common food for cattle (Shabb. 24, § 2). Columella in his treatise on husbandry speaks of the carob tree as affording food for swine: "Nemora sunt convenientissima quæ vestiuntur . . . tamaricibus" (i.e. the carob) (De Re Rust. vii. 9). Our Lord in the parable represents the prodigal, when reduced to the most abject misery, as fain to fill his belly with the husks: and so we find it spoken of in classical authors as the food of the very poorest. Horace writes of the poor poet, "Vivit siliquis et pane secundo" (Ep. ii. i. 123). So Persius of the youths who hand themselves over to the training of the Stoics—

"Insomnis quibus et detonsa juvenus Invigilat, siliquis et grandi pasta potenta."
(Sat. iii. 64.)

And Juvenal, "Sed laudem siliquas occultus ganeo" (xi. 58).

These "husks" are still to be seen on the stalls in every Eastern bazaar, and are still especially used by the Christians for feeding pigs. The writer has seen in the woods north-east of Acre, herds of swine feeding under the carob trees. The carob tree is grown in all the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. Large quantities of the beans are exported from Malta to England, for feeding horses, under the name of locust beans. The tree is sometimes called "St. John's bread," from the tradition that its fruit was the locusts on which the Baptist was sustained in the wilderness. But the locust of the Gospel history was, as all commentators now are agreed, the ordinary insect of that name, and which the Arabs commonly use as food. [H. B. T.]

HUZ (חז, i.e. Uz, as in R. V., in which form the name is uniformly given elsewhere in the A. V.; A. Ωξ; Hus), the eldest son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. xxii. 21). [Buz; Uz.]

HUZZAB (חזב; ἡ ἑβραϊστίς; miles captivus) was, according to the general opinion of the Jews (Buxtorf's Lexicon ad voc. חזב), the queen of Nineveh at the time when Nahum delivered his prophecy (ii. 7). This view was also adopted by the A. V. (text) and R. V. (text), and has been defended by Ewald. Many modern expositors, however, incline to the belief that Huzzab here is not a proper name at all, but the Hophal of the verb חזב (Buxtorf, Gesenius), and this is allowed as possible by the marginal reading of the A. V., that which was established, and of the R. V., it is decreed, following Gesenius. The Assyrian historical inscriptions reveal to us no such royal name as Huzzab, either of king or queen, so that the marginal renderings (cp. also the LXX.), which translate the word, are certainly to be preferred.

[G. R.] [T. G. P.]

HYAENA. Authorities are at variance as to whether the term šabū'a (שׁבּוּעָא) in Jer. xii. 6 means a "hyaena," as the LXX. has it (balyn), or a "speckled bird," as in the Vulgate, A. V. and R. V. The etymological force of the word is equally adapted to either, the hyaena being restaked. The only other instance in which it occurs is as a proper name, Zeboim (1 Sam. xiii. 18, "the valley of hyaenas." Aquila; Neh. xi. 34). The Talmudical writers describe the hyaena by no less than four names, of which šabū'a is one (Lewysohn, Zool., § 119). The Arabic name ذئب, dhāb, seems allied to it. The opinions of Bochart (Hieroz. ii. 163) and Gesenius (Thez. p. 1149) are in favour of the same view; nor could any room for doubt remain, were it not for the word 'ayit (אֵיט; A. V. "bird") connected with it, which in all other passages refers to a bird. The hyaena was common in ancient as in modern Egypt, and is constantly depicted on monuments (Wilkinson, i. 213, 225 [1878]). The sense of the passage in Jeremiah implies a fierce strong beast, not far below the lion in the parallel passage (v. 8): the hyaena fully answers to this description. Though cowardly in his nature, he is very savage when once he attacks, and the strength of his jaws is such that he can crunch the thigh-bone of an ox (Livingstone's Travels, p. 600). The striped hyaena (Hyaena striata, L.) is very common in every part of Palestine. I have met with it in localities as distinct in character as Beersheba, the Jordan Valley, Jerusalem, Mount Carmel, and Tabor. The country affords it peculiar facilities, for its favourite home is in caves or rock-hewn tombs, with which the land is honeycombed. But where these are not, it resides indifferently in woods, thickets or deserts. It rarely attacks living prey, unless very hard driven by hunger, but feeds on carrion and especially on bones, which it collects and stores in its caves. I have found seven camels' skulls together in a hyaena's den. But it is detested as the most unclean of animals, more particularly from its habit of prowling about burial-grounds and exhuming the corpses. Even when the grave is protected by heavy stones, the hyaenas will burrow alongside, and so drag forth the body. The hyaena is in fact the Oriental incarnation of a ghou!; and I know not a sound more ghostly than the wail of this beast in the dead of night, when encamped in some lonely desert. [W. L. B.] [H. B. T.]

HYDAS'PES ("Ἰδάσπης), a river noticed in Judith i. 6, in connexion with the Euphrates and Tigris. It is uncertain what river is referred to; the well-known Hydaspes of India (the Jhelam of the Panjāb) is too remote to accord with the other localities noticed in the context. It may be an error for the Choaspes of Susiana. The Syriac has Ulai, the Eulaeus of Pliny (Hist. Nat. vi. 31; cp. Dan. viii. 2), which Ball thinks to be probably the original word here (see Speaker's Comm. on Judith, i. c.). Zöckler ("Die Apokryphen d. A. T." in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Komm., in loco) thinks that the choice lies between the Choaspes and the Eulaeus. [W. L. B.] [F.]

HYMENAE'US ("Ἥμέναιος), the name of a person occurring twice in the Pastoral letters which, we believe, were written by St. Paul to Timothy; the first time classed with Alexander, and with him "delivered to Satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme" (1 Tim. i. 20); and the second time classed with Philetus, and with him charged with having "erred concerning the truth, saying that the resurrection" past already," and with having thereby "overthrown the faith of some" (2 Tim. ii. 17, 18). These latter expressions, coupled with "the shipwreck of faith" attributed to Hymenaeus in the context of the former passage (v. 19), surely warrant our understanding both passages of the same person, notwithstanding the interval between the dates of the two letters. When the first was written, he had already made one proselyte; before the second was penned he had seduced another: and if so, the only points further to be considered are, the error attributed to him, and the sentence imposed upon him.

I. The error attributed to him was one that had been in part appropriated from others, and has frequently been revived since with additions. What initiation was to the Pythagoreans, wisdom to the Stoics, science to the followers of Plato, contemplation to the Peripatetics, that "knowledge" (γνώσις) was to the Gnostics. As there were likewise in the Greek schools those who looked forward to a complete restoration of all things (ἀνοκατάστασις, v. Heyne ad Virg. Ecl. iv. 5, cp. Aen. vi. 745): so there was "a regeneration" (Tit. iii. 5; Matt. xix. 28), "a new creation" (2 Cor. v. 17, see Alford ad loc.; Rev. xxi. 1), "a kingdom of heaven and of Messiah or Christ" (Matt. xiii.; Rev. vii.)—and herein popular belief among the Jews coincided—unequivocally propounded in the N. T.; but here with this remarkable difference, namely, that, in a great measure, it was present as well as future—the same thing in germ that was to be had in perfection eventually. "The kingdom of God is within you," said our Lord (Luke xvii. 21). "He that is spiritual judgeth all things," said St. Paul (1 Cor. ii. 15). "He that is born of God cannot sin," said St. John (1 Ep. iii. 9). There are likewise two deaths and two resurrections spoken of in the N. T.; the first of each sort, that of the soul to and from sin (John iii. 3-8), "the hour which now is" (ibid. v. 24, 25, on which see Aug. De Civ. Dei, ix. 6); the second, that of the body to and from corruption (1 Cor. xv. 36-44; also John v. 28, 29), which last is prospective. Now as the doctrine of the resurrection of the body was found to involve immense difficulties even in those early days (Acts xvii. 32; 1 Cor. xv. 35: how keenly they were pressed may be seen in St. Aug. De Civ. Dei, xxii. 12 sq.), while on the other hand there was so great a predisposition in the then current philosophy (not even extinct now) to magnify the excellence of the soul above that of its earthly tabernacle, it was at once the easier and more attractive course to insist upon and argue from the force of those passages of Holy Scripture which enlarge upon the glories of the spiritual life that now is, under Christ, and to pass over or explain away allegorically all that refers to a future state in connexion with the resurrection of the body. In this manner we may derive the first errors of the Gnostics, of whom Hymenaeus was one of the earliest. They were on the spread when St. John wrote; and his grand-disciple, St. Irenaeus, compiled a voluminous work against them (Adv. Haer.). A good account of their full development is given by Gieseler, E. H., Per. I. Div. I. § 44 sq.

II. As regards the sentence passed upon him

—it has been asserted by some writers of eminence (see Corn. à Lapede ad 1 Cor. v. 5), that the "delivering to Satan" is a mere synonym for ecclesiastical excommunication. Such can hardly be the case. The Apostles possessed many extraordinary prerogatives, which none have since arrogated. Even the title which they bore has been set apart to them ever since. The shaking off the dust of their feet against a city that would not receive them (Matt. x. 14), even though the same injunction was afterwards given to the Seventy (Luke x. 11), and which St. Paul found it necessary to act upon twice in the course of his ministry (Acts xiii. 51 and xviii. 6), has never been a practice since with Christian ministers. "Anathema," says Bingham, "is a word that occurs frequently in the ancient canons" (Antiq. xvi. 2, 16), but the form "Anathema Maranatha" is one that none have ever ventured upon since St. Paul (1 Cor. xvi. 22). As the Apostles healed all manner of bodily infirmities, so they seem to have possessed and exercised the same power in inflicting them,—a power far too perilous to be continued when the manifold exigencies of the apostolical age had passed away. Ananias and Sapphira both fell down dead at the rebuke of St. Peter (Acts v. 5, 10); two words from the same lips, "Tabitha, arise," sufficed to raise Dorcas from the dead (ibid. ix. 40). St. Paul's first act in entering upon his ministry was to strike Elymas the sorcerer with blindness, his own sight having been restored to him through the medium of a disciple (ibid. ix. 17, xiii. 11); while soon afterwards we read of his healing the cripple of Lystra (ibid. xiv. 8). Even apart from actual intervention by the Apostles, bodily visitations are spoken of in the case of those who approached the Lord's Supper unworthily, when as yet no discipline had been established: "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and a good number (ἰκανοί, in the former case it is πολλοί) sleep" (1 Cor. xi. 30).

On the other hand, Satan was held to be the instrument or executioner of all these visitations. Such is the character assigned to him in the Book of Job (i. 6-12, ii. 1-7). Similar agencies are described in 1 K. xxii. 19-22 and 1 Ch. xxi. 1. In Ps. lxxviii. 49, such are the causes to which the plagues of Egypt are assigned. Even our Lord submitted to be assailed by him more than once (Matt. iv. 1-10; Luke iv. 13 says, "departed from Him for a season"); and "a messenger of Satan was sent to buffet" the very Apostle whose act of delivering another to the same power is now under discussion. At the same time large powers over the world of spirits were authoritatively conveyed by our Lord to His immediate followers (to the Twelve, Luke ix. 1; to the Seventy, as the results showed, ibid. x. 17-20).

It only remains to notice five particulars connected with its exercise, which the Apostle himself supplies. 1. That it was no mere prayer, but a solemn authoritative sentence, pronounced in the Name and power of Jesus Christ (1 Cor. v. 3-5). 2. That it was never exercised upon any without the Church: "them that are without God judgeth" (ibid. v. 13), he says in express terms. 3. That it was "for the destruction of the flesh," i.e. some bodily visitation. 4. That it was for the improvement of the offender; that "his spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (ibid. v. 5); and that "he might learn not to blaspheme" while upon earth (1 Tim. i. 20). 5. That the Apostle could in a given case empower others to pass such sentence in his absence (1 Cor. v. 3, 4).

Thus, while the "delivering to Satan" may resemble ecclesiastical excommunication in some respects, it has its own characteristics likewise, which show plainly that one is not to be confounded or placed on the same level with the other. Nor again does St. Paul himself deliver to Satan all those in whose company he bids his converts "not even to eat" (1 Cor. v. 11). See an able review of the whole subject by Bingham, Antiq. vi. 2, 15. [EXCOMMUNICATION.] [E. S. Ff.]

HYMN. This word is not used in the English Version of the O. T., and only twice in the N. T. (Ephes. v. 19; Col. iii. 16); though in the original of the latter the derivative verb occurs in three places (Matt. xxvi. 30, cp. Mark xiv. 26; Acts xvi. 25; Heb. ii. 12). The LXX., however, employ it freely in translating the Heb. names for almost every kind of poetical composition (Schleusn. Lex. ὕμνος). In fact the word does not seem to have had for the LXX. any very special meaning; and they called the Heb. book of Tehillim the Book of Psalms, not of Hymns. Accordingly the word psalm had for the later Jews a definite meaning, while the word hymn was more or less vague in its application, and capable of being used as occasion should arise. If a new poetical form or idea should be produced, the name of hymn, not being embarrassed by a previous determination, was ready to associate itself with the fresh thought of another literature. And this seems to have been actually the case.

Among Christians the Hymn has always been something different from the Psalm: a different conception in thought, a different type in composition. There is some dispute about the hymn sung by our Lord and His Apostles on the occasion of the Last Supper; but even supposing it to have been the Hallel, or Paschal Hymn, consisting of Pas. cxiii.—cxviii., it is obvious that the word hymn is in this case applied not to an individual Psalm, but to a number of Psalms chanted successively, and altogether forming a kind of devotional exercise which is not unaptly called a hymn. The prayer in Acts iv. 24—30 is not a hymn, unless we allow non-metrical as well as metrical hymns. It may have been a hymn as it was originally altered; but we can only judge by the Greek translation, and this is without metre, and therefore not properly a hymn. In the jail at Philippi (Acts xvi. 25), Paul and Silas "sang hymns" (R. V.; "praises," A. V.) unto God, and so loud was their song that their fellow-prisoners heard them. This must have been what we mean by singing, and not merely recitation. It was in fact a veritable singing of hymns. And it is remarkable that the noun hymn is only used in reference to the services of the Greeks, and in the same passages is clearly distinguished from the psalm (Ephes. v. 19; Col. iii. 16), "psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs."

It is probable that no Greek version of the Psalms, even supposing it to be accommodated to the Greek metres, would take root in the affections of the Gentile converts. It was not only a question of metre, it was a question of tune; and Greek tunes required Greek hymns. So it was in Syria. Richer in tunes than Greece, for Greece had but eight, while Syria had 275 (Benedict. Pref. vol. v. Op. Eph. Syr.), the Syrian hymnographers revelled in the varied luxury of their native music; and the result was that splendid development of the Hymn, as moulded by the genius of Bardesanes, Harmonius, and Ephrem Syrus. In Greece the eight tunes which seem to have satisfied the exigencies of church-music were probably accommodated to fixed metres, each metre being wedded to a particular tune. This is also the case in the German hymnology, where certain ancient tunes are recognised as models for the metres of later compositions, and their names are always prefixed to the hymns in common use.

It is worth while inquiring what profane models the Greek hymnographers chose to work after. In the old religion of Greece the word hymn had already acquired a sacred and liturgical meaning, which could not fail to suggest its application to the productions of the Christian muse. So much for the name. The special forms of the Greek hymn were various. The Homeric and Orphic hymns were written in the epic style, and in hexameter verse. Their metre was not adapted for singing; and therefore, though they may have been recited, it is not likely that they were sung at the celebration of the mysteries. We turn to the Pindaric hymns, and here we find a sufficient variety of metre, and a definite relation to music. These hymns were sung to the accompaniment of the lyre; and it is very likely that they engaged the attention of the early hymn-writers. The dithyramb, with its development into the dramatic chorus, was sufficiently connected with musical traditions to make its form a fitting vehicle for Christian poetry; and there certainly is a dithyrambic savour about the earliest known Christian hymn, as it appears in Clem. Alex. pp. 312, 313, ed. Potter.

The first impulse of Christian devotion was to run into the moulds ordinarily used by the worshippers of the old religion. This was more than an impulse, it was a necessity, and a two-fold necessity. The new spirit was strong; but it had two limitations: the difficulty of conceiving a new musico-poetical literature; and the quality so peculiar to devotional music, of lingering in the heart after the head has been convinced and the belief changed. The old tunes would be a real necessity to the new life; and the exile from his ancient faith would delight to hear on the foreign soil of a new religion the familiar melodies of home. Archbishop Trench has indeed laboured to show that the reverse was the case, and that the early Christian shrank with horror from the sweet, but polluted, enchantments of his unbelieving state. We can only assent to this in so far as we allow it to be the second phase in the history of hymns. When old traditions died away, and the Christian acquired not only a new belief, but a new social humanity, it was possible, and it was desirable too, to break for ever the attenuated thread that bound him to the ancient world. And so it was broken; and the trochaic and iambic metres, unassociated as they were with heathen worship, though largely associated with the heathen drama, obtained an ascendancy in the Christian Church. In 1 Cor. xiv. 26 allusion is made to improvised hymns, which being the outburst of a passionate emotion would probably assume the dithyrambic form. But attempts have been made to detect fragments of ancient hymns conformed to more obvious metres in Ephes. v. 14; Jas. i. 17; Rev. i. 8 sq., xv. 3. These pretended fragments, however, may with much greater likelihood be referred to the swing of a prose composition unconsciously culminating into metre. It was in the Latin Church that the trochaic and iambic metres became most deeply rooted, and acquired the greatest depth of tone and grace of finish. As an exponent of Christian feeling they soon superseded the accidental hexameters; they were used mnemonically against the heathen and the heretics by Commodianus and Augustine. The introduction of hymns into the Latin Church is commonly referred to Ambrose. But it is impossible to conceive that the West should have been so far behind the East: similar necessities must have produced similar results; and it is more likely that the tradition is due to the very marked prominence of Ambrose as the greatest of all the Latin hymnographers.

The trochaic and iambic metres, thus impressed into the service of the Church, have continued to hold their ground, and are in fact the 7's, S.M., C.M., and L.M. of our modern hymns; many of which are translations, or at any rate imitations, of Latin originals. These metres were peculiarly adapted to the grave and sombre spirit of Latin Christianity. Less ecstatic than the varied chorus of the Greek Church, they did not soar upon the pinion of a lofty praise, so much as they drooped and sank into the depths of a great sorrow. They were subjective rather than objective; they appealed to the heart more than to the understanding; and if they contained less theology, they were fuller of a rich and Christian humanity. Cp. HYSSOP (ἕζωβ, 'ezōb; ὑσσώπος). Perhaps no plant mentioned in the Scriptures has given rise to greater differences of opinion than this. The question of the identification of the 'ezōb of the Hebrews with any plant known to modern botanists was thought by Casaubon "adæo difficilis ad explicandum, ut videatur Esaias expectandus, qui certi aliquod nos doceat." Had the botanical works of Solomon survived, they might have thrown some light upon it. The chief difficulty arises from the fact that in the LXX. the Greek ὑσσώπος is the uniform rendering of the Hebrew 'ezōb, and that this rendering is endorsed by the Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 19, 21), when speaking of the ceremonial observances of the Levitical law. Whether, therefore, the LXX. made use of the Greek ὑσσώπος as the word most nearly resembling the Hebrew in sound, as Stanley suggests (S. & P. p. 21, note), or as the true representative of the plant indicated by the latter, is a point which, in all probability, will never be decided. Botanists differ widely even with regard to the identification of the ὑσσώπος of Dioscorides. The name has been given to the Satureia Graeca and the S. Juliana, to neither of which it is appropriate, and the hyssop of Italy and South France is not met with in Greece, Syria, or Egypt. Daubeny (Lect. on Rom. Husbandry, p. 313), following Sibthorpe, identifies the mountain-hyssop with the Thymbra spicata, but this conjecture is disapproved of by Kühn (Comm. in Diosc. iii. 27), who in the same passage gives it as his opinion that the Hebrews used the Origanum Aegyptiacum in Egypt, the O. Syriaicum in Palestine, and that the hyssop of Dioscorides was the O. Smyrnaicum. The Greek botanist describes two kinds of hyssop, ὄρωβη and κηπευτή, and gives πεσαλέμ as the Egyptian equivalent. The Talmudists make the same distinction between the wild hyssop and the garden-plant used for food.

The 'ezōb was used to sprinkle the doorposts of the Israelites in Egypt with the blood of the Paschal lamb (Ex. xii. 22); it was employed in the purification of lepers and leprous houses (Lev. xiv. 4, 51), and in the sacrifice of the red heifer (Num. xix. 6). In consequence of its detergent qualities, or from its being associated with the purificatory services, the Psalmist makes use of the expression, "purge me with 'ezōb" (Ps. li. 7). It is described in 1 K. iv. 33 as growing on or near walls. In John ix. 29 the phrase ὑσσώπῳ περιβήτες corresponds to περιβέλις καλάμῳ in Matt. xxvii. 48 and Mark xv. 36. If therefore καλάμῳ be the equivalent of ὑσσώπῳ, the latter must be a plant capable of producing a stick three or four feet in length.

Five kinds of hyssop are mentioned in the Talmud. One is called חַיִּיט simply, without any epithet: the others are distinguished as Greek, Roman; wild hyssop, and hyssop of Cochali (Mishna, Negaim, xiv. 6). Of these the four last mentioned were profane; that is, not to be employed in purifications (Mishna, Parah, xi. 7). Maimonides (de Vacca Rufa, iii. 2) says that the hyssop mentioned in the Law is that which was used as a condiment. According to Porphyry (De Abstin. iv. 7), the Egyptian priests on certain occasions ate their bread mixed with hyssop; and the ḡatar, or wild marjoram, with which it has been identified, is often an ingredient in a mixture called dukka, which is to this day used as food by the poorer classes in Egypt (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 200). It is not improbable, therefore, that this may have been the hyssop of Maimonides, who wrote in Egypt; more especially as R. D. Kimchi (Lex. s. v.), who reckons seven different kinds, gives as the equivalent the Arabic ḡatar, origanum, or marjoram, and the German Dosten or Wohlgemuth (Rosenm. Handb.). With this agrees the Tanchum Hieros. MS. quoted by Gesenius. So in the Judæo-Spanish version, Ex. xii. 22 is translated "y tomarédes manojo de origano." But Dioscorides makes a distinction between origanum and hyssop when he describes the leaf of a species of the former as resembling the latter (cp. Plin. xx. 67), though it is evident that he, as well as the Talmudists, regarded them as belonging to the same family. In the Syriac of 1 K. iv. 33 hyssop is rendered by ܠܘܥ, lüfö, "houseleek," although in other passages it is represented by ܠܘܝ, züfö, which the Arabic translation follows in Ps. li. 9 and Heb. ix. 19, while in the Pentateuch it has za'tar for the same. Patrick (on 1 K. iv. 33) was of opinion that 'ezöb is the same as the Ethiopic 'azab ('azöb), which represents the hyssop of Ps. li. 9, as well as ἡδυόσμον, or mint, in Matt. xxiii. 23.

Bochart decides in favour of marjoram, or some plant like it (Hieroz. i. b. 2, c. 50), and to this conclusion, it must be admitted, all ancient tradition points. The monks on Jebel Musa give the name of hyssop to a fragrant plant called ja'deh, which grows in great quantities on that mountain (Robinson, Bibl. Res. i. 157). Celsius (Hierobot. i. 423), after enumerating eighteen different plants, thyme, southernwood, rosemary, French lavender, wall rue, and the maidenhair fern among others, which have been severally identified with the hyssop of Scripture, concludes that we have no alternative but to accept the Hyssopus officinalis, "nisi velimus apostolum corrigere qui τὸ צִיִּן ὕσσωπος reddit Heb. ix. 19." He avoids the difficulty in John xix. 29 by supposing that a sponge filled with vinegar was wrapped round a bunch of hyssop, and that the two were then fastened to the end of a stick. Dr. Kitto conceived that he had found the peculiarities of the Hebrew 'ezöb in the Phytolacca decandra, a native of America. Tremellius and Ben Zeb render it by "moss." It has been reserved for the ingenuity of a German to trace a connexion between Aesop, the Greek fabulist, and the 'ezöb of 1 K. iv. 33 (Hitzig, Die Sprüche Salomo's, Einl. § 2).

An elaborate and interesting paper by the late Dr. J. Forbes Royle, On the Hyssop of Scripture, in the Journ. of the Roy. As. Soc. viii. 193-212, goes far to throw light upon this difficult question. Dr. R., after a careful investigation of the subject, arrived at the conclusion that the hyssop is no other than the caper-plant, or Capparis spinosa of Linnaeus. The Arabic name of this plant, 'asaf, by which it is sometimes, though not commonly, described, bears considerable resemblance to the Hebrew. It is found in Lower Egypt (Forskäl, Flor. Eg.-Arab.; Plin. xiii. 44). Burckhardt (Trav. in Syr. p. 536) mentions the 'aszef as a tree of frequent occurrence in the valleys of the peninsula of Sinai, "the bright green creeper which climbs out of the fissures of the rocks" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 21, &c.), and produces a fruit of the size of a walnut, called by the Arabs Felfel Jibbel, or mountain pepper (Shaw, Spec. Phytogr. Afr. 39). Dr. R. thought this to be undoubtedly a species of capparis, and probably the caper-plant. The Capparis spinosa was found by M. Bové (Rel. d'un Voy. Botan. en Eij., &c.) in the desert of Sinai, at Gaza, and at Jerusalem. Lynch saw it in a ravine near the convent of Mar Saba (Exped. p. 388). It is thus met with in all the localities where the 'ezöb is mentioned in the Bible. With regard to its habitat, it grows in dry and rocky places and on walls: "quippe quum capparis quoque seratur siccis maxime" (Plin. xix. 48). De Candolle describes it as found "in muris et rupestribus." The caper-plant was believed to be possessed of detergent qualities. According to Pliny (xx. 59), the root was applied to the cure of a disease similar to the leprosy. Lamarck (Enc. Botan. art. Caprier) says, "Les capriers . . . sont regardés comme . . . antiscorbutiques." Finally, the caper-plant is capable of producing a stick three or four feet in length. Pliny (xiii. 44) describes it in Egypt as "firmioris ligni frutex," and to this property Dr. Royle attaches great importance, identifying as he does the ὕσσωπος of John xix. 29 with the καλάμπος of Matthew and Mark. He thus concludes: "A combination of circumstances, and some of them apparently too improbable to be united in one plant, I cannot believe to be accidental, and have therefore considered myself entitled to infer, what I hope I have succeeded in proving to the satisfaction of others, that the caper-plant is the hyssop of Scripture." Whether his conclusion is sound or not, his investigations are well worthy of attention; but it must be acknowledged that, setting aside the passage in John xix., which may possibly admit of another solution, there seems no reason for supposing that the properties of the 'ezöb of the Hebrews may not be found in some one of the plants with which the tradition of centuries has identified it. That it may have been possessed of some detergent qualities which led to its significant employment in the purificatory service is possible; but it does not appear from the narrative in Leviticus that its use was such as to call into action any medicinal properties by which it might have been characterised. In the present state of the evidence, therefore, there does not seem sufficient reason for departing from the old interpretation, which identified the Greek ὕσσωπος with the Hebrew צִיִּן. [W. A. W.]

Admitting the identity of צִיִּן and ὕσσωπος, there seems no historical or other ground, beyond the conjectures of modern botanists, for identifying the ὕσσωπος of the ancients with the genus of labiate plants to which the name of Hyssopus has been applied; or Satureia, allied to the mints. The rendering of צִיִּן by ὕσσωπος seems to have had no stronger foundation than the similarity of sound. But surely the key to the signification of the Hebrew should first be looked for in its cognate Arabic. And here we find ازوف, azuf, the identical word as the name of the familiar and well-known caper (Capparis spinosa, L.). Next, comparing all the passages in which 'ezöb is mentioned, we find that it was a plant that grew in Egypt, that it grew also in the desert of Sinai and in Palestine, that it grew out of chinks in walls and cliffs—for "Solomon spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall" (1 K. iv. 33)—and that it was capable of producing a stem of some length. None of these conditions meet in any species of Satureia or Hyssopus, but they do in asaf of the Arabs. The caper is plentiful in the chinks of ruins in Egypt. It is a striking feature in the Sinaitic desert. Dean Stanley remarks, "The lasaf or asaf, the caper plant, the bright green creeper, which climbs out of the fissures of the rocks in the Sinaitic valleys, has been identified, on grounds of great probability, with the hyssop or 'ezob of Scripture, and thus explains whence came the green branches used, even in the deserts, for sprinkling the water over the tents of the Israelites" (S. & P. p. 21). So in the deserts of North Africa, after travelling for hours without detecting a green leaf, I have often in some desolate gorge been arrested by the patches of deepest green clinging here and there to the face of the cliff, in startling contrast to all around, and without a trace of moisture to nourish their verdure. The caper hangs from the walls of Jerusalem, and especially about the old Temple area. It clings to the rocks in the gorge of the Kedron. On the face of the Mons Quarantania, overhanging Jericho, it lets down its festoons of gauzy blossom in the month of January. It trails its branches, several feet long, on the sands of the plain of Shittim, and at the south-east of the Dead Sea. The leaves of the caper are ovate, and the stem has short recurved spines below the junction of each leaf. The blossom is very open, loose, and white, with many long straggling lilac stamens. The fruit is a pod, of the shape and size of a walnut. The blossom bud is the caper of commerce.

Caper-berry is the rendering in R. V. of רְבִיבִיזִים, 'adivōmāh, A. V. "desire," κάρπαις, capparis, in Eccles. xii. 5, "The grasshopper shall be a burden, the caper-berry shall fail," the only passage where the word occurs. The Revisers are supported by Vallesius, Ursinus, and other critics. The sense according to this rendering is that the caper, which was eaten before meals as a provocative to appetite, shall fail to stimulate the declining powers of the aged. On this use of the caper Plutarch remarks: Πολλοὶ τῶν ἀποστίνων, ἐλαίου ἀλμύδα λαμβάνοντες, ἢ κάρπαιον γενυσάμενοι ταχέως ἀνέλαβον καὶ παρεστήσαντο τὴν ὕψην (Sympos. vi. 2). [H. B. T.]

IBHAR (יְבֵאָר) = [God] chooses: in Sam. B. 'Ibedar, A. 'Iebār; in Ch. B. Badar, A. 'Iebādār: Syr. Jucobor; Jebahar, Jebaar, one of the sons of David, mentioned in the lists next after Solomon and before Elishua (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Ch. iii. 6, xiv. 5). Ibar was born in Jerusalem, and from the second of these passages it appears that he was the son of a wife and not of a concubine. He never comes forward in the history in person, nor are there any traditions concerning him. For the genealogy of David's family, see DAVID.

IB'LEAM (יְבֵלְעָם): in Josh. B. and A. omit; in Judg. 'Ieblaam; in 2 K. B. 'Eκβλαάμ, A. 'Iβλαάμ: Jeblaam, a city of Manasseh, with villages or towns (Heb. "daughters") dependent on it (Judg. i. 27). Though belonging to Manasseh, it appears not to have lain within the limits allotted to that tribe, but to have been situated in the territory of either Issachar or Asher (Josh. xvii. 11). It is not said which of the two, though there is no doubt from other indications that it was the former. The ascent of GUR, the spot at which Ahaziah received his death-wound from the soldiers of Jehu, was "at (בְּ) Ibleam" (2 K. ix. 27), somewhere near the present Jenin, probably to the north of it, about where the village Jelameh now stands. Conder (Hbk. p. 407), Tristram (Holy Places, p. 221), Riehlm (HWB.), and others (cp. Dillmann² on Josh. i. c.) identify it with Bel'ameh to the south of Jenin; but neither of these places meet the requirements of the narrative so well as Jelameh, which is on the natural road from Jezreel to Judah.

In the list of cities given out of Manasseh to the Kohathite Levites (1 Ch. vi. 70), BILEAM is mentioned, answering to Gath-rimmon in the list of Josh. xxi. Bileam is possibly a mere alteration of Ibleam, though this is not certain.

[G.] [W.]

IBNEI'AH (יְבְנֵי אֵה) = Jah builds; B. Bavadu, A. 'Iebvad; Jobania, son of Jeroham, a Benjamite, who was a chief man in the tribe apparently at the time of the first settlement in Jerusalem (1 Ch. ix. 8).

IBNI'JAH (יְבְנֵי יָה) = Jah builds; B. Bavudā, A. 'Iebavaal; Jebania, a Benjamite (1 Ch. ix. 8).

IB'RI (יְבְרִי; B. 'Abal, A. 'Oβδī; Hebri), a Merarite Levite of the family of Jaaziah (1 Ch. xxiv. 27), in the time of king David, concerned in the service of the house of Jehovah.

The word is precisely the same as that elsewhere rendered in the A. V. "Hebrew."

IB'ZAN (יְבְזָן; B. 'Abasār, A. 'Eseβōn; Joseph. Ἀβάζης; Abesan), a native of Bethlehem, who judged Israel for seven years after Jephthah (Judg. xii. 8, 10). He had thirty sons and thirty daughters, and took home thirty wives for his sons, and sent out his daughters to as many husbands abroad. He was buried at Bethlehem. From the non-addition of "Ephratah," or "Judah," after Bethlehem, and from Ibzān having been succeeded by a Zebulonite, it seems pretty certain that the Bethlehem here meant is that in the tribe of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15; see Joseph. Ant. v. 7, § 73). [Nöldeke and Budde (Die BB. Richter u. Samuel, p. 97) are disposed to attach but little value to Ibzān's history.—F.] There is not a shadow of probability in the notion which has been broached as to the identity of Ibzān with Boaz (יְבֹז). The history of his large family is singularly at variance with the impression of Boaz given us in the Book of Ruth. [A. C. H.]

I-CHABOD (יְחָבֹד), from יָח [shortened from יָח], the ordinary negative in Ethiopic and Phœnician [cp. R. V. marg. and see MV.¹¹], and יְבֹד, "glory," Gesen. p. 79, inglorious; B. Oβαιβαραχβῶθ, A. Oβαιχαβῶθ, which seems to be derived from יָח, "woe" [cp. oval in 1 Sam. iv. 8, Gesen. p. 39]; Ichabod, the son of Phinehas, and grandson of Eli. In giving birth to him his mother died of grief at the news of the sudden deaths of her husband and father-in-law. His brother's name was Ahijah (1 Sam. iv. 21; xiv. 3). [H. W. P.]

plain, on the central table-land of Asia Minor, and not far to the north of the chain of Taurus. This level district was anciently called LYCAONIA. Xenophon (Anab. i. 2, 19) reckons Iconium as the most easterly town of PHTYRIA; but all other writers speak of it as being in Lycaonia, of which it was practically the capital. It was on the great line of communication between Ephesus and the western coast of the peninsula on one side, and Tarsus, Antioch, and the Euphrates on the other. We see this indicated by the narrative of Xenophon (l. c.) and the letters of Cicero (ad Fam. iii. 8, v. 20, xv. 4). When the Roman provincial system was matured, some of the most important roads intersected one another at this point, as may be seen from the map in Leake's Asia Minor. These circumstances should be borne in mind, when we trace St. Paul's journeys through the district. Iconium was a well-chosen place for missionary operations. The Apostle's first visit was on his first circuit, in company with Barnabas; and on this occasion he approached it from Antioch in Pisidia, which lay to the west. From that city he had been driven by the persecution of the Jews (Acts xiii. 50, 51). There were Jews in Iconium also; and St. Paul's first efforts here, according to his custom, were made in the synagogue (xiv. 1). The results were considerable both among the Hebrew and Gentile population of the place (ib.). We should notice that the working of miracles in Iconium is emphatically mentioned (xiv. 3). The intrigues of the Jews again drove him away; he was in danger of being stoned, and he withdrew to LYSTRA and DERBE, in the eastern and wilder part of Lycaonia (xiv. 6). Thither also the enmity of the Jews of Antioch and Iconium pursued him; and at Lystra he was actually stoned and left for dead (xiv. 19). After an interval, however, he returned over the old ground, revisiting Iconium and encouraging the Church which he had founded there (xiv. 21, 22). These sufferings and difficulties are alluded to in 2 Tim. iii. 11; and this brings us to the consideration of his next visit to this neighbourhood, which was the occasion of his first practically associating himself with St. TIMOTHY. Paul left the Syrian Antioch, in company with Silas (Acts xv. 40), on his second missionary circuit; and travelling through CILICIA (xv. 41), and up through the passes of Taurus into Lycaonia, approached Iconium from the east, by Derbe and Lystra (xvi. 1, 2). Though apparently a native of Lystra, Timothy was evidently well known to the Christians of Iconium (xvi. 2); and it is not improbable that his circumcision (xvi. 3) and ordination (1 Tim. i. 18, iv. 14, vi. 12; 2 Tim. i. 6) took place there. On leaving Iconium, St. Paul and his party travelled to the N.W.; and the place is not mentioned again in the sacred narrative, though there is little doubt that it was visited by the Apostle again in the early part of his third circuit (Acts xviii. 23). From its position it could not fail to be an important centre of Christian influence in the early ages of the Church. The curious apocryphal legend of St. Thecla, of which Iconium is the scene, must not be entirely passed by. The "Acta Pauli et Theclae" are given in full by Grabe (Spicil. vol. i.) and by Jones (On the Canon, vol. ii.

353-411). It is natural here to notice one geographical mistake in that document, viz. that Lystra is placed on the west instead of the south. In the declining period of the Roman empire, Iconium was made a colonia. In the Middle Ages it became a place of great consequence, as the capital of the Seljuk sultans. Hence the remains of Seljuk architecture, which are conspicuous here, and which are described by many travellers. Koniëh is still a town of considerable size (Leake, Tour in Asia Minor, p. 49; Hamilton, Researches in Asia Minor, ii. 205; Texier, Asie Mineure, p. 661 sq.; Murray, Hbk. to Asia Minor; Ramsay, The Histor. Geography of Asia Minor, pp. 332, 377-8, 393-5). [J. S. H.] [W.] ID'ALAH (יְדָלָה); B. 'Ιερειχός, A. 'Iadāh; Jedala and Jerāla), one of the non-identified cities of the tribe of Zebulun, named between Shimron and Bethlehem (Josh. xix. 15; see Dillmann² in loco). Neubauer (Géog. de Talmud, p. 189) gives the name as Yidalah, or "according to the Talmud, Hiriyeh." Schwarz (H. L. p. 137) and Van de Velde (Map, 1866) would identify it with Kh. Kireh, S. of Tell Keimūn, Jokeam. But this is too far from Shimron and Bethlehem, and Conder (PEF. Mem. i. 288) identifies it, with more probability, with the ruins el-Huwārah, south of Beit Lahn, Bethlehem. It is not named in the Onomasticon. [G.] [W.] ID'BASH (יְדָבָשׁ); B. 'Ιαβδς, A. 'Iyabds; Jedebos), one of the three sons of Abi-Etam—"the father of Etam"—among the families of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 3). The Sepeltonie is named as his sister. This list is probably a topographical one, a majority of the names being those of places.

ID'DO. 1. (יְדֹדוֹ); B. 'Αχά, A. Zadōc; Addo). The father of Abinadab, one of Solomon's monthly purveyors (1 K. iv. 14).

2. (יְדֹדוֹ); A. 'Aḏḏi, B. 'Aḏei; Addo). A descendant of Gershom, son of Levi (1 Ch. vi. 21). In the reversed genealogy (v. 41) the name is altered to UDATAH, and we there discover that he was one of the forefathers of Asaph the seer.

3. (יְדֹדוֹ); BA. 'Iadḏal; Jaddo). Son of Zechariah, ruler (nāḡid) of the tribe of Manasseh east of Jordan in the time of David (1 Ch. xxvii. 21).

4. (יְדֹדוֹ), i.e. Ye'doi; but in the correction of the Keri יְדֹדוֹ, Ye'do; BA. 'Iodhā; Addo). A seer (נָחֵם) whose "visions" (חֲזוֹנִים) against Jeroboam incidentally contained some of the acts of Solomon (2 Ch. ix. 29). He also appears to have written a chronicle or story (Midrash, Gesen. p. 357; Driver, LOT. p. 497) relating to the life and reign of Abijah (2 Ch. xiii. 22), and also a book "concerning genealogies," in which the acts of Rehoboam were recorded (xii. 15). These books are lost, but they may have formed part of the foundation of the existing Books of Chronicles (Bertheau, Chron. Introd. § 3). The mention of his having prophesied against Jeroboam probably led to his identification in the ancient Jewish traditions (Jerome, Quaest. Hebr. in 2 Ch. xii. 15, Jaddo; Joseph. Ant. viii. 3, § 5, 'Iadḏh) with the "man of God" out of Judah who denounced the altar of that king (1 K. xii. 1). He has also been identified with Oded (see Jerome on 2 Ch. xv. 1), and by the best texts of the LXX. (see above) with Joel.

5. (אִדּוֹ, in Zech. י"ד; in Ezra, B. 'אדוֹ, A. 'אדוֹ; Addo.) The grandfather of the Prophet Zechariah (Zech. i. 1, 7), although in other places Zechariah is called "the son of Iddo" (Ezra v. 1, vi. 14). Iddo returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 4), and in the next generation — the "days of Joiakim," son of Jeshua (vs. 10, 12)—his house was represented by Zechariah (v. 14). In 1 Esd. vi. 1, the name is ADDO.

6. (דָּדָּו; LXX. om.; Eddo.) The chief of those who assembled at Casiphia, at the time of the second caravan from Babylon, in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus B.C. 458. He was one of the Nethinim, of whom 220 responded to the appeal of Ezra to assist in the Return to Judaea (Ezra viii. 17; cp. v. 20). In the Apocr. Esdras the name is SADDEUS and DADDEUS. [G.] [W.]

IDOL, IMAGE. As no less than twenty-one different Hebrew words have been rendered in the A. V. either by "idol" or "image," and that by no means uniformly, it will be of some advantage to attempt to discriminate between them, and assign, as nearly as the two languages will allow, the English equivalents for each. But, before proceeding to the discussion of those words which in themselves indicate the objects of false worship, it will be necessary to notice a class of abstract terms, which, with a deep moral significance, express the degradation associated with it, and stand out as a protest of the language against the enormities of idolatry. Such are—

1. אָוֶן, 'aven, rendered elsewhere "nought," "vanity," "iniquity," "wickedness," "sorrow," &c., and—once only—"idol" (Is. lxvi. 3). The primary idea of the root seems to be emptiness, nothingness, as of breath or vapour; and, by a natural transition, in a moral sense, wickedness in its active form of mischief, and then, as the result, sorrow and trouble. Hence 'aven denotes a vain, false, wicked thing, and expresses at once the essential nature of idols, and the consequences of their worship. The character of the word may be learnt from its associates. It stands in parallelism with דָּפֶן, 'ephēs (Is. xli. 29), which, after undergoing various modifications, comes at length to signify "nothing;" with לְהֶבֶל, 'hēbel, "breath" or "vapour," itself applied as a term of contempt to the objects of idolatrous reverence (Deut. xxxii. 21; 1 K. xvi. 13; Ps. xxxi. 6; Jer. viii. 19, x. 8); with שְׁוֵא, 'shēu, "nothingness," "vanity;" and with שֶׁגֶר, 'shēger, "falsehood" (Zech. x. 2): all indicating the utter worthlessness of the idols to whom homage was paid, and the false and delusive nature of their worship. It is employed in an abstract sense to denote idolatry in general in 1 Sam. xv. 23. There is much significance in the change of name from Bethel to Bethaven, the great centre of idolatry in Israel (Hos. iv. 15, x. 5). Cp. also the use of אָוֶן for אֵל (Heliopolis), and the implied sense of a city of idols (Ezek. xxx. 17).

2. אִלָּן, 'ēl, is thought by some to have a sense akin to that of שֶׁגֶר, 'shēger, "falsehood," with which it stands in parallelism in Job xiii. 4, and would therefore much resemble 'ēven, as applied to an idol. Delitzsch (on Hab. ii. 18) derives it from the negative particle אַל, 'al, "die Nichtigen" (cp. MV.¹¹ s. n. אִלָּן, ii.). The word occurs in the Sabæan inscriptions under the form אִלָּן, as the plural of אֵל, 'gods' (cp. Bāthgen, Beitr. z. Semit. Religionsgeschichte, p. 129), and this may be said to strengthen the contention of those who make אִלָּן a diminutive of אֵל, "god," the additional syllable indicating the greatest contempt. In this case the signification above mentioned is a subsidiary one. The word is applied to the idols of Egypt and Phœnicia (Is. xix. 3; Jer. xiv. 14), Noph or Memphis (Ezek. xxx. 13). In strong contrast with Jehovah it appears in Ps. xc. 5, xcvi. 7; the contrast probably being heightened by the resemblance between 'ēlīm and 'ēdōīm. A somewhat similar play upon words is observable in Hab. ii. 18, אִלָּן אִלָּן, 'ēlīm 'ēlēmīm ("dumb idols," A. V.).

3. אִמּוֹת, 'ēmāh, in plural אִמּוֹת, "terrors" (R. V. marg.), and hence an object of horror or terror (Jer. l. 38), in reference either to the hideousness of the idols or to the gross character of their worship. In this respect it is closely connected with—

4. מִפְּלֵגֶת, 'miphlēgēth, a "fright," "horror," applied to the idol of Maachah, probably of wood, which Asa cut down and burned (1 K. xv. 13; 2 Ch. xv. 16; in both places, R. V. "an abominable image"). The opinion, advanced by Movers, that this was the Phallus, the symbol of the productive power of nature (Phœn. i. 571), cannot be maintained (cp. Keil on 1 K. i. c., and Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, i. 437). In 2 Ch. xv. 16, the Vulg. rendering "simulacrum Priapi" (cp. Hor., "furum aviumque maxima formido") does not bear such an application. The LXX. had a different reading, which it is not easy to determine. They translate in 1 K. xv. 13 the same word both by σύνδος (with which corresponds the Syr. אִדּוֹ, 'idō, "a festival," reading perhaps אִדּוֹ, 'āsereth, as in 2 K. x. 20; Jer. ix. 2) and καταβύσεις (Luc. καταλύσεις), while in Chronicles it is εἰδωλον. Possibly in 1 K. xv. 13 they may have read מִפְּלֵגֶת, 'mēpūllāthāh (see other conjectures in Klostermann in loco [Strack u. Zöckler, Kgf. Komm.]), for מִפְּלֵגֶת, 'miphlēgēth, as the Vulg. specum, of which "simulacrum turpissimum" is a correction.

With this must be noticed, though not actually rendered "image" or "idol,"

5. אִשְׁתֵּי, 'ōsheth, "shame," or "shameful thing" (R. V.; Jer. iii. 24, xi. 13; Hos. ix. 10), applied to Baal or Baal-Peor, as characterising the obscenity of his worship.

With 'ēlīl is found in close connexion—

6. גִּילּוּלִים, gillulim, also a term of contempt, but of uncertain origin (Ezek. xxx. 13). The Rabbinical authorities, referring to such passages as Ezek. iv. 2, Zeph. i. 17, have favoured the interpretation given in the margin of the A. V. to Deut. xxix. 17, “dungy gods” (Vulg. sordes, sordes idolorum, 1 K. xv. 12). Gesenius (Thes.) gives his preference to the rendering “stones, stone gods,” thus deriving it from גַּל, gal, “a heap of stones,” while MV.¹¹ prefers “clods.” Idols were frequently symbolized in the conical stone (e.g. of Astarte) or in the cairn of stones, alike animated by a god (see Robertson Smith, i. 189 sq.). The expression is applied, principally in Ezekiel, to false gods and their symbols (Deut. xxix. 17; Ezek. viii. 10, &c.). It stands side by side with other contemptuous terms in Ezek. xvi. 36, xx. 8; as for example פִּלְשֵׁתִים, shēšetim, “filth,” “abomination” (Ezek. viii. 10), and

7. The cognate פִּרְשָׁה, shiqqas, “filth,” “impurity,” especially applied, like shēšetim, to that which produced ceremonial uncleanness (Ezek. xxxvii. 23; Nah. iii. 6), such as food offered in sacrifice to idols (Zech. ix. 7; cp. Acts xv. 20, 29). As referring to the idols themselves, it primarily denotes the obscene rites with which their worship was associated, and hence, by metonymy, is applied both to the objects of worship and also to their worshippers, who partook of the impurity, and thus “became loathsome like their love,” the foul Baal-Peor (Hos. ix. 10).

We now come to the consideration of those words which more directly apply to the images or idols, as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshipped through them. These may be classified according as they indicate that the images were made in imitation of external objects, and to represent some idea or attribute; or as they denote the workmanship by which they were fashioned. To the first class belong—

8. סִמֶּל, sēmel, or לְמֶדֶה, sēmel (with which Gesenius compares as cognate סֵלֶם, sēlem, the Lat. similis, the Greek ὁμοίωσις), signifies a “likeness,” “semblance,” especially that of a statue (Baudissin in MV.¹¹). It is used in the same sense both of male and females in Phoenician inscriptions (MV.¹¹). The Targ. in Deut. iv. 16 gives סִמָּה, sūrah, “figure,” as the equivalent; while in Ezek. viii. 3, 5 it is rendered by סֵלֶם, sēlam, “image.” In the latter passages the Syriac has ܩܘܕܡܝܬܐ, qōdīmō, “a statue” (the στήλη of the LXX.), which more properly corresponds to mazzēbāh (see No. 15 below); and in Deut. סִמָּה, gēnēs, “kind” (= γένος).

The word in 2 Ch. xxxiii. 7 (לְפָנֵי אַרְבַּע פָּנִים) is rendered by the Syriac “images of four faces,” the latter words representing the one under consideration. In 2 Ch. xxxiii. 15 the Syriac adopts “carved images,” following the LXX. τὸ γλυπτόν. On the whole the Gk. eikōn of Deut. iv. 16, 2 Ch. xxxiii. 7, and the simula- crum of the Vulgate (2 Ch. xxxiii. 15), most nearly resemble the Hebrew sēmel.

9. סֵלֶם, sēlem (Ch. סֵלֶם, sēlem; Assy. šalmu) is by lexicographers connected with סֵל, šēl, “a shadow.” It is the “image” of God in which man was created (Gen. i. 27; cp. Wisd. ii. 23), distinguished from מַדְמֹנִית, dēmūth, or “likeness,” as an “image” is distinguished from the “idea” which it represents (Schmidt, de Imag. Dei in Hom. p. 84), though it would be rash to insist upon this distinction. In the N. T. eikōn appears to represent the latter (Col. iii. 10; cp. LXX. of Gen. v. 1), as ὁμοίωμα the former of the two words (Rom. i. 23, viii. 29; Phil. ii. 7), but in Heb. x. 1 eikōn is opposed to σκία as the substance to the unsubstantial form, of which it is the perfect representative. The LXX. render dēmūth by ὁμοίωσις, ὁμοίωμα, εἰκόν, δμοιος, and sēlem most frequently by eikōn, though ὁμοίωμα, εἰδωλον, and τύπος also occur. But whatever abstract term may best define the meaning of sēlem, it is unquestionably used to denote the visible forms of external objects, and is applied to figures of gold and silver (1 Sam. vi. 3; Num. xxxiii. 52; Dan. iii. 1), such as the golden image of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as to those painted upon walls (Ezek. xxxiii. 14). “Image” perhaps most nearly represents it in all passages. In Sabæan and Palmyrene inscriptions it represents an “image” (MV.¹¹), but in the Teima inscriptions it is the name of a god probably imported from Aramaic belief, whose picture is portrayed on a stele (Bäthgen, pp. 80-1). סֵלֶם, applied to the human countenance (Dan. iii. 19), signifies the “expression” and corresponds to the ἰδέα of Matt. xviii. 3, though dēmūth agrees rather with the Platonic usage of the latter word.

10. מִדְּבַר, tēmūnāh, rendered “image” (R. V. “form”) in Job iv. 16; elsewhere “similitude” (Deut. iv. 12), “likeness” (Deut. v. 8): “form” or “shape” would be better. In Deut. iv. 16 it is in parallelism with מַדְמֹנִית, tabnūth, literally “built;” hence “plan,” or “model” (2 K. xvi. 10; cp. Ex. xx. 4; Num. xii. 8).

11. צַבָּע, ‘āzāb, 12. צַבָּע, ‘āzēb (Jer. xii. 28), or 13. צַבָּע, ‘āzēb (Is. xlviii. 5), “a figure,” all derived from a root צָבַע, ‘āzāb, “to work,” or “fashion” (akin to צָבַע, chāzāb, and the like), are terms applied to idols as expressing that their origin was due to the labour of man. The verb in its derived senses indicates the sorrow and trouble consequent upon severe labour, but the latter seems to be the radical idea. If the notion of sorrow were the more prominent, the words as applied to idols might be compared with ‘āzēb above. In Is. lviii. 3 it is rendered in the Peshitto “idols” (A. V. and R. V. “labours”), but the reading was evidently different. In Ps. cxxxix. 24, צַבָּע, ‘āzēb, is “idolatry.”

14. צֶרֶף, šir, once only applied to an idol (Is. xlv. 16; LXX. εἰδωλον, as if εἰδωλον, tytīm). The word usually denotes “a pang,” but in this instance is probably connected with the roots צָרַף, šūr, and צָרַף, yāzār, and signifies “a shape” or “mould,” and hence an “idol.”

15. מַצֵּבָה, massebah, anything set up, a "statue" (= מַצֵּבָה, nesib, Jer. xliii. 13; A. V. "images" [marg. statues], R. V. "pillars" [marg. obelisks]), applied variously; e.g. to a monolithic pillar or a memorial stone like those erected by Jacob on four several occasions (Gen. xxviii. 18 [see Dillmann³ in loco; Dillmann² on Deut. xvi. 22], xxi. 45, xxv. 14, 15) to commemorate a crisis in his life, or to mark the grave of Rachel; or to such cairns of stones as were set up by Joshua (Josh. iv. 9) after the passage of the Jordan and at Shechem (xxiv. 26), and by Samuel when victorious over the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 12). When solemnly dedicated, they were anointed with oil, and libations were poured upon them. The word is applied to denote the obelisks which stood at the entrance to the temple of the Sun at Heliopolis (Jer. xliii. 13; see R. V. marg.), two of which were a hundred cubits high and eight broad, each of a single stone (Her. ii. 111). It is also used of the statues of Baal (2 K. iii. 2), whether of stone (2 K. x. 27) or wood (v. 26), which stood in the innermost recess of the temple at Samaria. Movers (Phoen. i. 674) conjectures that the latter were statues or columns distinct from that of Baal, which was of stone and conical (p. 673), like the "meta" of Paphos (Tac. Hist. ii. 3), and probably therefore belonging to other deities who were his πάρεδροι or σύμβουμοι. The Phoenicians consecrated and anointed stones like that at Bethel, which were called, as some think, from this circumstance Baetylia. Many such are said to have been seen on the Lebanon, near Heliopolis, dedicated to various gods, and many prodigies are related of them (Damascius in Photius, quoted by Bochart, Canaan, ii. 2). The same authority describes them as astrolites, of a whitish and sometimes purple colour, spherical in shape, and about a span in diameter. The Palladium of Troy, the black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca, said to have been brought from heaven by the Angel Gabriel, the cone of Elagabalus at Emesa, and the stone at Ephesus "which fell down from Jupiter" (Acts xix. 35), are examples of the belief, anciently so common, that the gods dwelt in the stone; and, at the sanctuary, established stated relations with men and accepted their service (Robertson Smith, i. 190). In the older worship of Greece, stones, according to Pausanias (vii. 22, § 4), occupied the place of images. Those at Pharae, about thirty in number and quadrangular in shape, near the statue of Hermes, received divine honours from the Pharians, and each had the name of some god conferred upon it. The stone in the temple of Jupiter Ammon (umbilico maxime similis), enriched with emeralds and gems (Curt. iv. 7, § 31); that at Delphi, which Saturn was said to have swallowed (Paus. Phoc. 24, § 6); the black stone of pyramidal shape in the temple of Juggernaut, and the holy stone at Pessinus in Galatia, sacred to Cybele, show how widely spread and almost universal were these ancient objects of worship (cp. Dillmann³ and Delitzsch [1887] on Gen. xxviii. 18).

Closely connected with these "statues" of Baal, whether in the form of obelisks or otherwise, were

16. חַמְמָנִים, chammānim, rendered in the margin of most passages sun-images. The word has given rise to considerable discussion, much of which is now obsolete (see 1st edit. of this work). In the Vulgate it is translated thrice simulacra, thrice delubra, and once fana. The LXX. give τεμένη twice, εἰδωλα twice, ξύλινα χειροποίητα, ββελάγματα, and τὰ ἰψήλα. With one exception (2 Ch. xxxiv. 4, which is evidently corrupt) the Syriac has vaguely either "fears," i.e. objects of fear, or "idols." The Targum in all passages translates it by חַמְמָנִים, chānims-nesayyā, "houses for star-worship," a rendering which Rosenmüller supports. Chammān is now recognised as a title of Baal in the Phœnician and Palmyrene inscriptions in the sense of "Dominus Solaris," and Chammānim is the term descriptive of the statues or columns erected for his worship (cp. Spencer, de Legg. Hebr. ii. 25; Michaelis, Suppl. ad Lex. Hebr. s. v.), like the pyramids or obelisks of Egypt. Movers, in his discussion of Chammānim, says, "These images of the fire-god were placed on foreign or non-Israelitish altars, in conjunction with the symbols of the nature-goddess Asherah, as σύμβουμοι (2 Ch. xiv. 3, 5, xxxiv. 4, 7; Is. xvii. 9, xxvii. 9), as was otherwise usual with Baal and Asherah" (Phoen. i. 441. Cp. Bähgen, p. 25 sq.). They are mentioned with the Asherim, and the latter are coupled with the statues of Baal (1 K. xiv. 23; 2 K. xxiii. 17). The chammānim and statues are used promiscuously (cp. 2 K. xxiii. 14, and 2 Ch. xxiv. 4; 2 Ch. xiv. 3 and 5), but are never spoken of together. He is supported by the Palmyrene inscription at Oxford, alluded to above, which has been thus rendered: "This column (מַצֵּבָה, Chammānā), and this altar, the sons of Malchū, &c., have erected and dedicated to the Sun." The Veneto-Greek Version leaves the word untranslated in the strange form ἀκάρβαρες. From the expressions in Ezek. vi. 4, 6, and Lev. xxvi. 30, it may be inferred that these columns, which perhaps represented a rising flame of fire and stood near or upon the altar of Baal (2 Ch. xxxiv. 4), were of wood or stone. Dillmann³ (on Is. xvi. 22) defines the Chammānim as idolatrous Masseböth (No. 15) specially connected with Baal.

17. מַשְׁכִּית, maskith, occurs in Lev. xxvi. 1; Num. xxiii. 52; Ezek. viii. 12: "device" most nearly suits all passages (cp. Ps. lxxiii. 7; Prov. xviii. 11, xxv. 11). This word has been the fruitful cause of as much dispute as the preceding. The general opinion appears to be that מַשְׁכִּית, eben maskith, signifies a stone with figures graven upon it. Ben Zeb explains it as "a stone with figures or hieroglyphics carved upon it," and so Michaelis; and it is maintained by Movers (Phoen. i. 105) that the baetylia or columns with painted figures, the "lapides effigati" of Minucius Felix (c. 3), are these "stones of device," and that the characters engraven on them are the ἱερὰ στοιχεῖα, or characters sacred to the several deities. The invention of these characters, which is ascribed to Taaut, he conjectures originated with the Seres. Gesenius explains it as a stone with the image of an idol, Baal or Astarte, and refers to his Mon. Phoen. 21-24 for others of similar character (see MV.¹¹ s. n.). The Targum and Syr., Lev. xxvi. 1, give "stone of devotion," and the former in Num. xxxiii. 52 has "house of their devotion," where the Syr. only renders "their objects of devotion." For the former the LXX. have λίθος σκοπός (Vulg. lapis insignis), and for the latter τὰς σκοπιάς αἰρών (Vulg. tituli), connecting the word with the root שָׁכַח, "to look," a circumstance which has induced Saalschütz (Mos. Recht. pp. 382-385) to conjecture that 'eben maskith was originally a smooth elevated stone employed for the purpose of obtaining from it a freer prospect, and of offering prayer in prostration upon it to the deities of heaven. Hence, generally, he concludes that it signifies a stone of prayer or devotion, and that the "chambers of imagery" of Ezek. viii. 7 are "chambers of devotion." The renderings of the last-mentioned passage in the LXX. and Targum are curious, as pointing to a variant reading מְשַׁכְּחוֹתוֹ, or more probably מְשַׁכְּבוֹתוֹ. Saalschütz's idea—if simplified to suggest a stone visible from a distance, or a stone which attracts attention (cp. Knobel-Dillmann on Lev. l. c.)—is preferred by some to that of Gesenius.

18. תְּרָפִים, terāphim. [TERAPHIM.]

The terms which follow have regard to the material and workmanship of the idol rather than to its character as an object of worship.

19. פֶּסֶל, pēsel, and 20. פְּסִלִים, pesilim, usually translated in the A. V., "graven or carved images." In two passages the latter is ambiguously rendered "quarries" (Judg. iii. 19, 26, A. V. and R. V.), following the Targum, but there seems no reason for departing from the ordinary signification. In the majority of instances the LXX. have γλυπτόν, once γλίμμα. The verb is employed to denote the finishing which the stone received at the hands of the masons, after it had been rough-hewn from the quarries (Ex. xxxiv. 4; 1 K. v. 32). It is probably a later usage which has applied pēsel to a figure cast in metal, as in Is. xl. 19, xliv. 10. These "sculptured" images were apparently of wood, iron, or stone, covered with gold or silver (Deut. vii. 25; Is. xxx. 22; Hab. ii. 19), the more costly being of solid metal (Is. xl. 19). They could be burnt (Deut. vii. 5; Is. xlv. 20; 2 Ch. xxxiv. 4), or cut down (Deut. xii. 3) and pounded (2 Ch. xxxiv. 7), or broken in pieces (Is. xxi. 9). In making them, the skill of the wise iron-smith (Deut. xxvii. 15; Is. xl. 20) or carpenter, and of the goldsmith, was employed (Judg. xvii. 3, 4; Is. xli. 7), the former supplying the rough mass of iron beaten into shape on his anvil (Is. xliv. 12), while the latter overlaid it with plates of gold and silver, probably from Tarshish (Jer. x. 9), and decorated it with silver chains. The image thus formed received the further adornment of embroidered robes (Ezek. xvi. 18), to which possibly allusion may be made in Is. iii. 19. Brass and clay were among the materials employed for the same purpose (Dan. ii. 33, v. 23).^a A description of the three great images of Babylon on the top of the temple of Belus will be found in Diod. Sic. ii. 9 (cp. Layard, Nin. ii. 433). The several stages of the process by which the metal or wood became the "graven image" are so vividly described in Is. xliv. 10-20, that it is only necessary to refer to that passage, and we are at once introduced to the mysteries of idol manufacture, which, as at Ephesus, "brought no small gain unto the craftsmen."

^a Possibly pēsel denotes by anticipation the molten image in a later stage, after it had been trimmed into shape by the caster.

^b Images of glazed pottery have been found in Egypt (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. iii. 90 [large ed.]; cp. Wisd. xv. 8).

21. מַסֶּכֶה, nēsek, or מַסֶּכֶה, nēsek, and 22. מַסֶּכֶה, massekāh, are evidently synonymous (Is. xli. 29, xlvi. 5; Jer. x. 14) in later Hebrew, and denote a "molten" image. Massekāh is frequently used in distinction from pēsel or pesilim (Deut. xxvii. 15; Judg. xvii. 3, &c.). The golden calf which Aaron made was fashioned with "the graver" (מַסֶּכֶה, chēret), but it is not quite clear for what purpose the graver was used (Ex. xxxii. 4). The chēret (cp. Gk. χαράττω) appears to have been a sharp-pointed instrument, used like the stylus for a writing implement (Is. viii. 1). Whether then Aaron, by the help of the chēret, gave to the molten mass the shape of a calf, or whether he made use of the graver for the purpose of carving hieroglyphics upon it, has been thought doubtful. The Syr. has moū, tūpsō (τύπος), "the mould," for chēret. But the expression wayyāqar, decides that it was by the chēret, in whatever manner employed, that the shape of a calf was given to the metal.

In N. T. εἰκών is the "image" or head of the emperor on the coinage (Matt. xxii. 20).

Among the earliest objects of worship, regarded as symbols of deity, were, as has been said above, the meteoric stones which the ancients believed to have been the images of the gods fallen down from heaven (cp. Robertson Smith, i. pp. 185-195). From these they transferred their regard to rough unhewn blocks, to stone columns or pillars of wood, in which the divinity worshipped was supposed to dwell, and which were consecrated, like the sacred stone at Delphi, by being anointed with oil, and crowned with wool on solemn days (Paus. Phoc. 24, § 6). Tavernier (quoted by Rosenmüller, Alt. & N. Morgenland, i. § 89) mentions a black stone in the pagoda of Benares which was daily anointed with perfumed oil, and such are the "Lingams" in daily use in the Siva worship of Bengal (cp. Arnobius, i. 39; Min. Fel. c. 3). Such customs are remarkable illustrations of the solemn consecration by Jacob of the stone at Bethel, as showing the religious reverence with which these memorials were regarded. And not only were single stones thus honoured, but heaps of stone were, in later times at least, considered as sacred to Hermes (Hom. Od. xvi. 471; cp. Vulg. of Prov. xxvi. 8, "sicut qui mittit lapidem in acervum Mercurii"), and to these each passing traveller contributed his offering (Cruzer, Symb. i. 24). The heap of stones which Laban erected to commemorate the solemn compact between himself and Jacob, and on which he invoked the gods of his fathers, is an instance of the intermediate stage in which such heaps were associated with religious observances before they became objects of worship. Jacob, for his part, dedicated a single stone as his memorial, and called Jehovah to witness, thus holding himself aloof from the rites employed by Laban, which may have partaken of his ancestral idolatry. [JEGAR-SAHADUTHA.]

Of the forms assumed by the idolatrous images we have not many traces in the Bible.* Ea, the water-god of the Babylonians, was a human figure terminating in a fish [DAGON]; and that the Syrian deities were represented in later times in a symbolical human shape we know for certainty. The Hebrews imitated their neighbours in this respect as in others (Is. xliv. 13; Wisd. xiii. 13), and from various allusions we may infer that idols in human forms were not uncommon among them, though they were more anciently symbolised by animals (Wisd. xiii. 14), as by the calves of Aaron and Jeroboam, and the brazen serpent which was afterwards applied to idolatrous uses (2 K. xviii. 4; Rom. i. 23). When the image came from the hands of the maker, it was decorated richly with silver and gold, and sometimes crowned (Epist. Jer. 9); clad in robes of blue and purple (Jer. x. 9), like the draped images of Pallas and Hera (Müller, Hand. d. Arch. d. Kunst, § 69), and fastened in the niche appropriated to it by means of chains and rails (Wisd. xiii. 15), in order that the influence of the deity which it represented might be secured to the spot. So the Ephesians, when besieged by Croesus, connected the wall of their city by means of a rope to the temple of Aphrodite, with the view of ensuring the aid of the goddess (Her. i. 26); and for a similar object the Tyrians chained the stone image of Apollo to the altar of Hercules (Curt. iv. 3, § 15). Some images were painted red (Wisd. xiii. 14), like those of Dionysus and the Bacchantes, of Hermes, and the god Pan (Paus. ii. 2, § 5; Müller, Hand. d. Arch. d. Kunst, § 69). This colour was formerly considered sacred. Pliny relates, on the authority of Verrius, that it was customary on festival days to colour with red-lead the face of the image of Jupiter, and the bodies of those who celebrated a triumph (xxxiii. 36). The figures of Priapus, the god of gardens, were decorated in the same manner ("ruber custos," Tibull. i. 1, 18). Among the objects of worship enumerated by Arnobius (i. 39) are bones of elephants, pictures, and garlands suspended on trees, the "rami coronati" of Apuleius (de Mag. c. 56).

When the process of adorning the image was completed, it was placed in a temple or shrine appointed for it (oikla, Epist. Jer. 12, 19; oikma, Wisd. xiii. 15; εἰδωλεῖον, 1 Cor. viii. 10; see Stanley's note on the latter passage). In Wisd. xiii. 15, oikma is thought to be used contemptuously, as in Tibull. i. 10, 19, 20—"cum paupere cultu stabat in exiguus ligneus aede deus" (Fritzsche and Grimm, Handb. in loco), but the passage quoted is by no means a good illustration. From these temples the idols were sometimes carried in procession (Epist. Jer. 4, 26) on festival days. Their priests were maintained from the idol treasury, and feasted upon the meats which were appointed for the idol's use (Bel and the Dragon, vv. 3, 13; see Speaker's Comm. in loco). These sacrificial feasts formed an important part of the idolatrous ritual [IDOLATRY], and were a great stumbling-block to the early Christian converts. They were to the heathen, as Dean Stanley has well observed, what the observance of circumcision and the Mosaic ritual were to the Jewish converts, and it was for this reason that St. Paul especially directed his attention to the subject, and laid down the rules of conduct contained in his First Letter to the Corinthians (viii.-x.). [W. A. W.] [F.]

IDOLATRY (the A. V. rendering of תְּרָפִים, tērāphim, R. V. "teraphim," in 1 Sam. xv. 23), strictly speaking, denotes the worship of deity in a visible form, whether the images to which homage is paid are symbolical representations of the true God, or of the false divinities which have been made the objects of worship in His stead. With its origin and progress the present article is not concerned. The former is lost amidst the dark mists of antiquity,* and the latter is rather the subject of speculation than of history. But under what aspect it is presented to us in the Scriptures, how it affected the Mosaic legislation, and what influence it had on the history of the Israelites, are questions which may be more properly discussed, with some hope of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. Whether, therefore, the deification of the powers of nature, and the representation of them under tangible forms, preceded the worship of departed heroes, who were regarded as the embodiment of some virtue which distinguished their lives, is not in this respect of much importance. Some Jewish writers, indeed, grounding their theory on a forced interpretation of Gen. iv. 26, assign to Enos, the son of Seth, the unenviable notoriety of having been the first to pay divine honours to the host of heaven, and to lead others into the like error (Maimon. de Idol. i. 1). R. Solomon Jarchi, on the other hand, while admitting the same verse to contain the first account of the origin of idolatry, understands it as implying the deification of men and plants. Arabic tradition, according to Sir W. Jones, connects the people of Yemen with the same apostasy. The third in descent from Joktan, and therefore a contemporary of Nahor, took the surname of Abdu Shams, or "servant of the sun," whom he and his family worshipped, while other tribes honoured the planets and fixed stars (Hales, Chronol. ii. 59, 4to ed.). Nimrod, again, to whom is ascribed the introduction of Sabianism, was after his death transferred to the constellation Orion, and on the slender foundation of the expression "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi. 31) is built the fabulous history of Abraham and Nimrod, narrated in the legends of the Jews and Mussulmans (Jellinek, Bet ha-Midrash, i. 23; Weil, Bibl. Leg. pp. 47-74; Hyde, Rel. Pers. c. 2).

I. But, descending from the regions of fiction to sober historic narrative, the first undoubted allusion to idolatry or idolatrous customs in the Bible is in the account of Rachel's stealing her father's teraphim (Gen. xxxi. 19), a relic of the worship of other gods, whom the ancestors of the Israelites served "on the other side of the river, in old time" (Josh. xxiv. 2). By these household deities Laban was guided, and these he consulted as oracles (obs. מַלְאָכִים, Gen. xxx. 27, A. V. "learned by experience," R. V. "divined"), though without entirely losing sight of the God of Abraham and the God of Nahor, to Whom he appealed when occasion offered (Gen. xxxi. 53), while he was ready, in the presence of Jacob, to acknowledge the benefits conferred upon him by Jehovah (Gen. xxx. 27). Such, indeed, was the character of most of the idolatrous worship of the Israelites. Like the Cuthean colonists in Samaria, who "feared Jehovah and served their own gods" (2 K. xvii. 33), they blended in a strange manner a theoretical belief in the true God with the external reverence which, in different stages of their history, they were led to pay to the idols of the nations by whom they were surrounded. For this species of false worship they seem, at all times, to have had an incredible propensity. On their journey from Shechem to Bethel, the family of Jacob put away from among them "the gods of the foreigner:" not the teraphim of Laban, but the gods of the Canaanites through whose land they passed, and the amulets and charms which were worn as the appendages of their worship (Gen. xxxv. 2, 4). And this marked feature of the Hebrew character is traceable throughout the entire history of the people. During their long residence in Egypt, the country of symbolism, they defiled themselves with the idols of the land, and it was long before the taint was removed (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 7). To these gods Moses, as the herald of Jehovah, flung down the gauntlet of defiance (Kurtz, Gesch. d. Alt. B. ii. 86), and the plagues of Egypt smote their symbols (Num. xxxiii. 4). Yet, with the memory of their deliverance fresh in their minds, their leader absent, the Israelites clamoured for some visible shape in which they might worship the God Who had brought them up out of Egypt (Ex. xxxii). Aaron lent himself to the popular cry, and chose as the symbol of deity one with which they had long been familiar—the calf—embodiment of Apis, and emblem of the productive power of nature. But, with a weakness of character to which his greater brother was a stranger, he compromised with his better impulses by proclaiming a solemn feast to Jehovah (Ex. xxxii. 5). How much of the true God was recognised by the people in this brutish symbol it is impossible to conceive; the festival was characterised by all the shameless licentiousness with which idolatrous worship was associated (v. 25), and which seems to have constituted its chief attraction. But on this occasion, as on all others, the transgression was visited with swift vengeance, and three thousand of the offenders were slain. For a while the erection of the Tabernacle, and the establishment of the worship which accompanied it, satisfied that craving for an outward sign which the Israelites constantly exhibited; and for the remainder of their march through the desert, with the dwelling-place of Jehovah in the midst of them, they did not again degenerate into open apostasy. But it was only so long as their contact with the nations was of a hostile character that this seeming orthodoxy was maintained. The charms of the daughters of Moab, as Balaam's bad genius foresaw, were potent for evil: the Israelites were "yoked to Baal-Peor" in the trammels of his fair worshippers, and the character of their devotions is not obscurely hinted at (Num. xxv.). The great and terrible retribution which followed left so deep an impress upon the hearts of the people that, after the conquest of the Promised Land, they looked with an eye of terror upon any indications of defection from the worship of Jehovah, and denounced as idolatrous a memorial so slight as the altar of the Reubenites at the passage of Jordan (Josh. xxii. 16).

During the lives of Joshua and the elders who outlived him, they kept true to their allegiance; but the generation following, who knew not Jehovah, nor the works He had done for Israel, swerved from the plain path of their fathers, and were caught in the toils of the foreigner (Judg. ii.). From this time forth their history becomes little more than a chronicle of the inevitable sequence of offence and punishment. "They provoked Jehovah to anger . . . and the anger of Jehovah was hot against Israel, and He delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them" (Judg. ii. 12, 14). The narratives of the Book of Judges, contemporaneous or successive, tell of the fierce struggle maintained against their hated foes, and how women forgot their tenderness and forsook their retirement to sing the song of victory over the oppressor. By turns each conquering nation strove to establish the worship of its national god. During the rule of Midian, Joash the father of Gideon had an altar to Baal, and an Asherah (Judg. vi. 25), though he proved but a lukewarm worshipper (v. 31). Even Gideon himself gave occasion to idolatrous worship; yet the epoch which he made from the spoils of the Midianites was perhaps but a votive offering to the true God (Judg. viii. 27). It is not improbable that the gold ornaments of which it was composed were in some way connected with idolatry (cp. Is. iii. 18-24); and that from their having been worn as amulets, some superstitious virtue was conceived to cling to them even in their new form. But though in Gideon's lifetime no overt act of idolatry was practised, he was no sooner dead than the Israelites again returned to the service of the Baalim; and, as if in solemn mockery of the covenant made with Jehovah, chose from among them Baal Berith, "Baal of the Covenant" (cp. Zeus ἑρκυας), as the object of their special adoration (Judg. viii. 33). Of this god we know only that his temple, probably of wood (Judg. ix. 49), was a stronghold in time of need, and that his treasury was filled with the silver of the worshippers (ix. 4). Nor were the calamities of foreign oppression confined to the land of Canaan. The tribes on the east of Jordan went astray after the idols of the land, and were delivered into the hands of the children of Ammon (Judg. x. 8). But they put away from among them "the gods of the foreigner," and with the baseborn Jephthah for their leader gained a signal victory over their oppressors. The exploits of Samson against the Philistines, though achieved within a narrower space and with less important results than those of his predecessors, fill a brilliant page in his country's history. But the tale of his marvellous deeds is prefaced by that ever-recurring phrase, so mournfully familiar, "the children of Israel did evil again in the eyes of Jehovah, and Jehovah gave them into the hand of the Philistines." Thus far idolatry is a national sin. The episode of Micah, in Judg. xvii.-xviii., sheds a lurid light on the secret practices of individuals, who without formally renouncing Jehovah, though ceasing to recognise Him as the theocratic King (xvii. 6), linked with His worship the symbols of ancient idolatry. The house of God, or sanctuary, which Micah made in imitation of that at Shiloh, was decorated with an ephod and teraphim dedicated to God, and with a graven and molten image consecrated to some inferior deities (Selden, de Dis Syris, synt. i. c. 2). It is a significant fact, showing how deeply rooted in the people was the tendency to idolatry, that a Levite, who, of all others, should have been most sedulous to maintain Jehovah's worship in its purity, was found to assume the office of priest to the images of Micah; and that this Levite, priest afterwards to the idols of Dan, was no other than Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Moses. Tradition says that these idols were destroyed when the Philistines defeated the army of Israel and took from them the Ark of the covenant of Jehovah (1 Sam. iv.). The Danites are supposed to have carried them into the field, as the other tribes bore the Ark, and the Philistines the images of their gods, when they went forth to battle (2 Sam. v. 21; Lewis, Orig. Hebr. v. 9). But the Seder Olam Rabba (c. 24) interprets "the captivity of the land" (Judg. xviii. 30) of the captivity of Manasseh; and Benjamin of Tudela mistook the remains of later Gentile worship for traces of the altar or statue which Micah had dedicated, and which was worshipped by the tribe of Dan (Selden, de Dis Syr. synt. i. c. 2; Stanley, S. & P. p. 398). In later times the practice of secret idolatry was carried to greater lengths. Images were set up on the corn-floors, in the wine-vats, and behind the doors of private houses (Is. lviii. 8; Hos. ix. 1, 2); and to check this tendency the statute in Deut. xxvii. 15 was originally promulgated.

Under Samuel's administration a fast was held, and purificatory rites performed, to mark the public renunciation of idolatry (1 Sam. vii. 3-6). But in the reign of Solomon all this was forgotten. Each of his many foreign wives brought with her the gods of her own nation; and the gods of Ammon, Moab, and Zidon were openly worshipped. Three of the summits of Olivet were crowned with the high-places of Ashtoreth, Chemosh, and Molech (1 K. xi. 7; 2 K. xxiii. 13), and the fourth, in memory of his great apostasy, was branded with the opprobrious title of the "Mount of Corruption." Rehoboam, the son of an Ammonite mother, perpetuated the worst features of Solomon's idolatry (1 K. xiv. 22-24); and in his reign took place the great schism in the national religion: when Jeroboam, fresh from his recollections of the Apis worship of Egypt, erected golden calves at Bethel and at Dan, and by this crafty state-policy severed for ever the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (1 K. xii. 26-33). To their use temples were consecrated, and the service in their honour was studiously copied from the Mosaic ritual. High-priest himself, Jeroboam ordained priests from the lowest ranks (2 Ch.

xi. 15); incense and sacrifices were offered, and a solemn festival appointed, closely resembling the Feast of Tabernacles (1 K. xii. 23, 33; cp. Amos iv. 4, 5). [JEROBOAM.] The worship of the calves, "the sin of Israel" (Hos. x. 8), which was apparently associated with the goat-worship of Mendes (2 Ch. xi. 15; Herod. ii. 46) or of the ancient Sabii (Lewis, Orig. Hebr. v. 3), and the Asherim (1 K. xiv. 15; A. V. "groves"), ultimately spread to the kingdom of Judah, and centred in Beersheba (Amos v. 5, vii. 9). At what precise period it was introduced into the latter kingdom is not certain. The Chronicles tell us how Abijah taunted Jeroboam with his apostasy, while the less partial narrative in 1 Kings represents his own conduct as far from exemplary (1 K. xv. 3). Asa's sweeping reform spared not even the idol of his grandmother Maachah, and, with the exception of the high-places, he removed all relics of idolatrous worship (1 K. xv. 12-14), with its accompanying impurities. His reformation was completed by Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xvii. 6).

The successors of Jeroboam followed in his steps, till Ahab, who married a Sidonian princess, at her instigation (1 K. xxi. 25) built a temple and altar to Baal, and revived all the abominations of the Amorites (1 K. xxi. 26). For this he attained the bad pre-eminence of having done "more to provoke Jehovah, the God of Israel, to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him" (1 K. xvi. 33). Compared with the worship of Baal, the worship of the calves was a venial offence, probably because it was morally less detestable and also less anti-national (1 K. xii. 28; 2 K. x. 28-31). [ELIJAH, p. 907.] Henceforth Baal-worship became so completely identified with the northern kingdom that it is described as walking in the way or statutes of the kings of Israel (2 K. xvi. 3; xvii. 8), as distinguished from the sin of Jeroboam, which ceased not till the Captivity (2 K. xvii. 23), and the corruption of the ancient inhabitants of the land. The idolatrous priests became a numerous and important caste (1 K. xviii. 19), living under the patronage of royalty, and fed at the royal table. The extirpation of Baal's priests by Elijah, and of his followers by Jehu (2 K. x.), in which the royal family of Judah shared (2 Ch. xxii. 7), was a deathblow to this form of idolatry in Israel, though other systems still remained (2 K. xiii. 6). But while Israel thus sinned and was punished, Judah was more morally guilty (Ezek. xvi. 51). The alliance of Jehoshaphat with the family of Ahab transferred to the southern kingdom, during the reigns of his son and grandson, all the appurtenances of Baal-worship (2 K. viii. 18, 27). In less than ten years after the death of that king, in whose praise it is recorded that he "sought not the Baalim," nor walked "after the deed of Israel" (2 Ch. xvii. 3, 4), a temple had been built for the idol, statues and altars erected, and priests appointed to minister in his service (2 K. xi. 18). Jehoiada's vigorous measures checked the evil for a time, but his reform was incomplete, and the high-places still remained, as in the days of Asa, a nucleus for any fresh system of idolatry (2 K. xii. 3). Much of this might be due to the influence of the king's mother, Zibiah of Beersheba, a place intimately connected with the idolatrous defection of Judah (Amos viii. 14).

After the death of Jehoiada, the princes prevailed upon Joash to restore at least some portion of his father's idolatry (2 Ch. xxiv. 18). The conquest of the Edomites by Amaziah introduced the worship of their gods, which had disappeared since the days of Solomon (2 Ch. xxv. 14, 20). After this period even the kings who did not lend themselves to the encouragement of false worship had to contend with the corruption which still lingered in the hearts of the people (2 K. xv. 35; 2 Ch. xxvii. 2). Hitherto the Temple had been kept pure. The statues of Baal and the other gods were worshipped in their own shrines, but Ahaz, who "sacrificed unto the gods of Damascus, which smote him" (2 Ch. xxviii. 23), and built altars to them at every corner of Jerusalem, and high-places in every city of Judah, replaced the brazen Altar of burnt-offering by one made after the model of "the altar" of Damascus, and desecrated it to his own uses (2 K. xvi. 10-15).^b

The conquest of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser was for them the last scene of the drama of abominations which had been enacted uninterruptedly for upwards of 250 years. In the northern kingdom no reformer arose to vary the long line of royal apostates; whatever was effected in the way of reformation, was done by the hands of the people (2 Ch. xxxi. 1). But even in their captivity they helped to perpetuate the corruption. The colonists, whom the Assyrian conquerors placed in their stead in the cities of Samaria, brought with them their own gods, and were taught at Bethel by a priest of the captive nation "the manner of the God of the land," the lessons thus learnt resulting in a strange admixture of the calf-worship of Jeroboam with the homage paid to their national deities (2 K. xvii. 21-41). Their descendants were in consequence regarded with suspicion by the elders who returned from the Captivity with Ezra, and their offers of assistance rejected (Ezra iv. 3).

The first act of Hezekiah on ascending the throne was the restoration and purification of the Temple, which had been dismantled and closed during the latter part of his father's life (2 Ch. xxviii. 24, xxix. 3). The multitudes who flocked to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover, so long in abeyance, removed the idolatrous altars of burnt-offering and incense erected by Ahaz (2 Ch. xxx. 14). The iconoclastic spirit was not confined to Judah and Benjamin, but spread throughout Ephraim and Manasseh (2 Ch. xxxi. 1), and to all external appearance idolatry was extirpated. But the reform extended little below the surface (Is. xxix. 13). Among the leaders of the people there were many in high position who conformed, to the necessities of the time (Is. xxviii. 14), and under Manasseh's patronage the false worship, which had been merely driven into obscurity, broke out with tenfold virulence. Idolatry of every form, and with all the accessories of enchantments, divination, and witchcraft, was again rife; no place was too sacred, no associations too hallowed, to be spared the contamination. If the conduct of Ahaz in erecting an altar in the Temple-court is open to a charitable construction, Manasseh's was of no doubtful character. The two courts of the Temple were profaned by altars dedicated to the host of heaven, and the image of the Asherah polluted the holy place (2 K. xxi. 7; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 7, 15; cp. Jer. xxxii. 34). Even in his late repentance he did not entirely destroy all traces of his former wrong. The people, easily swayed, still burned incense on the high places; but Jehovah was the ostensible object of their worship. The king's son sacrificed to his father's idols, but was not associated with him in his repentance, and in his short reign of two years restored all the altars of the Baalim, and the images of the Asherah. With the death of Josiah ended the last effort to revive among the people a purer ritual, if not a purer faith. The lamp of David, which had long shed but a struggling ray, flickered for a while and then went out in the darkness of Babylonian Captivity.

But foreign exile was powerless to eradicate the deep inbred tendency to idolatry. One of the first difficulties with which Ezra had to contend, and which brought him well-nigh to despair, was the haste with which his countrymen took them foreign wives of the people of the land, and followed them in all their abominations (Ezra ix.). The priests and rulers, to whom he looked for assistance in his great enterprise, were among the first to fall away (Ezra ix. 2, x. 18; Neh. iv. 17, 18, xiii. 23). Even during the Captivity the devotees of false worship plied their craft as prophets and diviners (Jer. xxix. 8; Ezek. xiii.), and the Jews who fled to Egypt carried with them recollections of the material prosperity which attended their idolatrous sacrifices in Judah, and to the neglect of which they attributed their exiled condition (Jer. xlv. 17, 18). The conquests of Alexander in Asia caused Greek influence to be extensively felt, and Greek idolatry to be first tolerated, and then practised, by the Jews (1 Macc. i. 43-50, 54). The attempt of Antiochus to establish this form of worship was vigorously resisted by Mattathias (1 Macc. ii. 23-26), who was joined in his rebellion by the Assidaeans (v. 42), and destroyed the altars at which the king commanded them to sacrifice (1 Macc. ii. 25, 45). The erection of synagogues (cp. Schürer, Gesch. d. jüd. Volkes im Zeitalt. J. Christi, ii. 358) has been assigned as a reason for the comparative purity of the Jewish worship after the Captivity (Prideaux, Conn. i. 374), while another cause has been discovered in the hatred for images acquired by the Jews in their intercourse with the Persians.

It has been a question much debated whether the Israelites were ever so far given up to idolatry as to have lost all knowledge of the true God. It would be hard to assert this of any nation, and still more difficult to prove. That there always remained among them a faithful few, who in the face of every danger adhered to the worship of Jehovah, may readily be believed, for even at a time when Baal-worship was most prevalent there were found 7,000 in Israel who had not bowed before his image (1 K. xix. 18). But there is still room for grave suspicion that among the masses of the people, though the idea of a Supreme Being—of Whom the images they worshipped were but the distorted representatives—was not entirely lost, it was so obscured as to be but dimly apprehended. And not only were the ignorant multitude thus led astray, but the priests, scribes, and prophets became leaders of the apostasy (Jer. ii. 8). Warburton, indeed, maintained that they never formally renounced Jehovah, and that their defection consisted “in joining foreign worship and idolatrous ceremonies to the ritual of the true God” (Div. Leg. B. v. § 3). But one passage in their history, though confessedly obscure, seems to point to a time when, under the rule of the judges, “Israel for many days had no true God, and no teaching priest, and no law” (2 Ch. xv. 3). There can be no doubt that much of the idolatry of the Hebrews consisted in worshipping the true God under an image, such as the calves at Bethel and Dan (Jos. Ant. viii. 8, § 5; δαυδαίσις ἐρωτύλου τῆ θεῆς), and by associating His worship with idolatrous rites (Jer. xli. 5) and places consecrated to idols (2 K. xviii. 22). From the peculiarity of their position they were never distinguished as the inventors of a new pantheon, nor did they adopt any one system of idolatry so exclusively as ever to become identified with it.* But they no sooner came in contact with other nations than they readily adapted themselves to their practices, the old spirit of antagonism died rapidly away, and intermarriage was one step to idolatry.

^b The Syr. supports the rendering of בְּכֶרֶךְ in v. 15, which the A. V. and R. V. have adopted—"to enquire by": but Kell translates the clause, "it will be for me to consider," i.e. what shall be done with the altar, in order to support his theory that this altar erected by Ahaz was not directly intended to profane the Temple by idolatrous worship. But it is clear that something of an idolatrous nature had been introduced into the Temple, and was afterwards removed by Hezekiah (2 Ch. xxxi. 5; cp. Ezra vi. 21, ix. 11). It is possible that this might have reference to the brazen serpent.

II. The old religion of the Semitic races consisted, in the opinion of Movers (Phoen. i. c. 5), in the deification of the powers and laws of nature; these powers being considered either as distinct and independent, or as manifestations of one supreme and all-ruling being. In most instances the two ideas were co-existent. The deity, following human analogy, was conceived as male and female: the one representing the active, the other the passive principle of nature; the former ‘the source of spiritual, the latter of physical life. The transference of the attributes of the one to the other resulted either in their mystical conjunction in the hermaphrodite, as the Persian Mithra and Phoenician Baal, or the two combined to form a third, which symbolized the essential unity of both.† With these two supreme beings all other deities are identical; so that in different nations the same nature-worship appears under different forms, representing the various aspects under which the idea of the power of nature is presented. The sun and moon were early selected as outward symbols of this all-pervading power, and the worship of the heavenly bodies was not only the most ancient but the most prevalent system of idolatry. Taking its rise, according to a probable hypothesis, in the plains of Chaldea, it spread through Egypt, Greece, Scythia, and even Mexico and Ceylon. It was regarded as an offence amenable to the civil authorities in the days of Job (xxi. 26–28), and one of the statutes of the Mosaic Law was directed against its observance (Deut. iv. 19; xvii. 3); the former referring to the star-worship of Arabia, the latter to the concrete form in which it appeared among the Syrians and Phoenicians. It is probable that the Israelites learnt their first lessons in sun-worship from the Egyptians, in whose religious system that luminary, as Osiris, held a prominent place. The city of On (Bethshemesh or Heliopolis) took its name from his temple (Jer. xliii. 13), and the wife of Joseph was the daughter of his priest (Gen. xli. 45). The Phoenicians worshipped him under the title of “Lord of heaven,” יהוה שמים, Ba'al-shāmāyim (Βαελσαμυμ, acc. to Sanchoniatho in Philo-Byblius; cp. Büthgen, p. 23, and Index, s. n. “Sonnengottheit”), and Adon (cp. Büthgen, p. 41), the Greek Adonis, and the Thammuz of Ezekiel (viii. 14). [THAMMUZ.] Under the form of appellatives the Sun was worshipped as Molech or Milcom by the Ammonites, and as Chemosh by the Moabites. The Hadad of the Syrians is by some thought to be the same deity [see HADAD], whose name is traceable in Benhadad, Hadadezer, and Hadad or Adad, the Edomite. The Assyrian Bel or Belus is another form of Baal. According to Philo (de Vit. Cont. § 3; but see p. 998, col. 2), the Essenes were wont to pray to the sun at morning and evening (Joseph. B. J. ii. 8, § 5). By the later kings of Judah, sacred horses and chariots were dedicated to the sun-god, as by the Persians (2 K. xxiii. 11; Bochart, Hieroz. pt. 1, b. ii. c. xi.; Selden, de Dis Syr. ii. 8), to march in procession and greet his rising (R. Sol. Jarchi on 2 K. xxiii. 11). The Massagetæ offered horses in sacrifice to him (Strabo, xi. p. 513), on the principle enunciated by Macrobius (Sat. vii. 7), “like rejoiceth in like” (“similibus similia gaudet;” cp. Her. i. 216), and the custom was common to many nations.

The moon, worshipped by the Phoenicians under the name of Astarte (Lucian, de Dea Syria, c. 4. Cp. Büthgen, p. 31, &c.), or Baaltis, the passive power of nature, as Baal was the active (Movers, i. 149), and known to the Hebrews as Ashtoreth (see s. n.), the tutelary goddess of the Sidonians, appears early among the objects of Israelitish idolatry. But this Syro-phoenician worship of the sun and moon was of a grosser character than the pure star-worship of the Magi, which Movers distinguishes as Upper Asiatic or Assyro-Persian, and was equally removed from the Chaldean astrology and Sabianism of later times. The former of these systems tolerated no images or altars, and the contemplation of the heavenly bodies from elevated spots constituted the greater part of its ritual.

But, though we have no positive historical account of star-worship before the Assyrian

* As the Moabites with the worship of Chemosh (Num. xxi. 29).

† This will explain the occurrence of the name of Baal (see s. n.) with the masculine and feminine articles in the LXX.: cp. Hos. xi. 2; Jer. xix. 5; Rom. xi. 4. Philochorus, quoted by Macrobius (Sat. iii. 8), says that men and women sacrificed to Venus or the Moon, with the garments of the sexes interchanged, because she was regarded both as masculine and feminine (see Selden, de Dis Syr. ii. 2). Hence Lunus and Luna.

period,* we may infer that it was early practised in a concrete form among the Israelites from the allusions in Amos v. 26 and Acts vii. 42, 43. Even in the desert they are said to have been given up to worship the host of heaven, while Chiun and Remphan have on various grounds been identified with the planet Saturn. It was to counteract idolatry of this nature that the stringent law of Deut. xvii. 3 was enacted; and with the view of withdrawing the Israelites from undue contemplation of the material universe, Jehovah, the God of Israel, is constantly placed before them as Jehovah Zebaoth, Jehovah of Hosts, the King of Heaven (Dan. iv. 35, 37), to Whom the heaven and heaven of heavens belong (Deut. x. 14). However this may be, Movers (Phoen. i. 65, 66) contends that the later star-worship, introduced by Ahaz and followed by Manasseh, was purer and more spiritual in its nature than the Israelite-Phoenician worship of the heavenly bodies under symbolical forms, as Baal and Asherah; and that it was not idolatry in the same sense that the latter was, but of a simply contemplative character. He is supported, to some extent, by the fact that we find no mention of any images of the sun or moon or the host of heaven, but merely of vessels devoted to their service (2 K. xxiii. 4). But there is no reason to believe that the divine honours paid to the "Queen of Heaven," A. V. text and R. V. (or as others render, "the frame" or "structure of the heavens;," see A. V. marg.)* were equally dissociated from image worship. Sir H. Layard (Nin. ii. 451) discovered a bas-relief at Nimroud, which represented four idols carried in procession by Assyrian warriors. One of these figures he identifies with Hera, the Assyrian Astarte, represented with a star on her head (Amos v. 26), and with the "queen of heaven," who appears on the rock-tablets of Pterium "standing erect on a lion, and crowned with a tower, or mural coronet," as in the Syrian temple of Hierapolis (Id. p. 456; Lucian, de Dea Syria, 31, 32). But, in his remarks upon a figure which resembles the Rhea of Diodorus, Sir H. Layard adds, "The representation in a human form of the celestial bodies, themselves originally but a type, was a corruption which appears to have crept at a later period into the mythology of Assyria; for, in the more ancient bas-reliefs, figures with caps surmounted by stars do not occur, and the sun, moon, and planets stand alone" (Id. pp. 457, 458).

The allusions in Job xxxviii. 31, 32 (see Dillmann ⁴ in loco) are too obscure to allow any inference to be drawn as to the mysterious influences which were held by the old astrologers to be exercised by the stars over human destiny,

* Balthgen, p. 107, points out the existence of star-worship among the Nabateans of Sinai.

⁴ Jer. vii. 18; xlix. 19. In the former passage some MSS. have מלכת מלכת (see Baer's text of Jeremiah, p. 89), a reading supported by the LXX.,

τη σπαρτιᾶ, as well as by the Syr.  pūlchôn, its equivalent. But in the latter they both agree in the rendering "queen." The "queen of heaven" is identified with Athar-Astarte, which as Atar-Samain is frequently mentioned in the inscriptions of Assurbanipal, and was the goddess of the N. Arabian Kedarænes (cp. Schrader, KAT., 2 p. 414; Balthgen, p. 69).

nor is there sufficient evidence to connect them with anything more reconite than the astronomical knowledge of the period. The same may be said of the poetical figure in Deborah's chant of triumph, "the stars from their high-ways warred with Sisera" (Judg. v. 20). In the later times of the monarchy, Mazzaloth, the planets, or the zodiacal signs, received, next to the sun and moon, their share of popular adoration (2 K. xxiii. 5); and the history of idolatry among the Hebrews shows at all times an intimate connexion between the deification of the heavenly bodies, and the superstition which watched the clouds for signs, and used divination and enchantments. It was but a step from such culture of the sidereal powers to the worship of Gad and Meni, Babylonian divinities (see Balthgen, pp. 79, 80), symbols of Venus or the moon, as the goddess of luck or fortune. Under the latter aspect, the moon was revered by the Egyptians (Macrob. Sat. i. 19); and the name Baal-gad has been thought to be an example of the manner in which the worship of the planet Jupiter as the bringer of luck was grafted on the old faith of the Phoenicians. The false gods of the colonists of Samaria were sometimes connected with Eastern astrology: Adrammelech, Movers regards as the sun-fire—the Solar Mars—and Anammelech the Solar Saturn (Phoen. i. 410, 411), but modern research seems opposed to this identification (see Pinches, s. nn. ADRAMMELECH, ANAMMELECH). The Vulgate rendering of Prov. xxvi. 8, "sicut qui mittit lapidem in acervum Mercurii," follows the Midrash on the passage quoted by Rashi, and requires merely a passing notice (see Selden, de Dis Syris, ii. 15; Maim. de Idol. iii. 2; Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. מַרְקוּלִים).

Beast-worship, as exemplified in the calves of Jeroboam and the dark hints which seem to point to the goat of Mendes, has already been alluded to (cp. Robertson Smith, i. 278 sq.). There is no actual proof that the Israelites ever joined in such worship,* though Ahaziah sent stealthily to Baalzebub, the fly-god of Ekron (2 K. i.), and in later times the brazen serpent became the object of idolatrous homage (2 K. xviii. 4). But whether the latter was regarded with superstitious reverence as a memorial of their early history, or whether incense was offered to it as a symbol of some power of nature, cannot now be exactly determined. The threatening in Lev. xxvi. 30, "I will put your carcases upon the carcases of your idols" (cp. Knobel-Dillmann in loco), may possibly be a protest against the tendency to regard animals, as in Egypt, as the symbols of deity (Robertson Smith, i. pp. 208, 283). Certain it is that "all the great deities of the Northern Semites had their sacred animals, and were themselves worshipped in animal form, or in association with animal symbols, down to a late date" (Robertson Smith, i. 270).

Of pure hero-worship among the Semitic races

* Some have explained the allusion in Zeph. i. 9, as referring to a practice connected with the worship of Dagon; cp. 1 Sam. v. 5. The allusion is more likely a mere proverbial expression (see Orelli on Zeph. i. c. in Strack u. Zöckler's Köf. Komm.). The Syrians, on the authority of Xenophon (Anab. i. 4, § 9), paid divine honours to fish (see Robertson Smith, i. 160, n. 1).

we find no trace. Moses, indeed, seems to have entertained some dim apprehension that his countrymen might, after his death, pay him more honours than were due to man; and the anticipation of this led him to review his own conduct in terms of strong reprobation (Deut. iv. 21, 22). The expression in Ps. cvi. 28, "they ate the sacrifices of the dead," is in all probability metaphorical (see Delitzsch² in loco), and Wisd. xiv. 15 refers to a later practice due to Greek influence. The rabbinical commentators discover in Gen. xlviii. 16 an allusion to the worshipping of Angels (cp. Col. ii. 18), while they defend their ancestors from the charge of regarding them in any other light than mediators, or intercessors with God (Lewis, Orig. Hebr. v. 3). It is needless to add that their inference and apology are equally groundless. With like probability has been advanced the theory of the demon-worship of the Hebrews, the only foundation for it being two highly poetical passages (Deut. xxiii. 17 [see Dillmann² in loco]; Ps. cvi. 37). It is possible that the Persian dualism is hinted at in Is. xlv. 7 (Delitzsch⁴), but not probable (Dillmann⁴).

But if the forms of the false gods were manifold, the places devoted to their worship were almost equally numerous. The singular reverence with which trees have in all ages been honoured (see Robertson Smith, i. Index, s. c. Trees) is not without example in the history of the Hebrews. The terebinth at Mamre, beneath which Abraham built an altar (Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 18), and the memorial grove planted by him at Beersheba (Gen. xxi. 33), were intimately connected with patriarchal worship, though in after-ages his descendants were forbidden to do that which he did with impunity, in order to avoid the contamination of idolatry.³ As a symptom of their rapidly degenerating spirit, the oak of Shechem, which stood in the sanctuary of Jehovah (Josh. xxiv. 26), and beneath which Joshua set up the stone of witness, perhaps appears in Judges (ix. 37; cp. Bertheau²) as (R. V.) "the oak (not "plain," as in A. V.) of Meonenim" (R. V. marg. augurs).¹ Mountains and high places were chosen spots for offering sacrifice and incense to idols (1 K. xi. 7, xiv. 23); and the retirement of gardens and the thick shade of woods offered great attractions to their worshippers (2 K. xvi. 4; Is. i. 29; Hos. iv. 13). It was the ridge of Carmel which Elijah selected as the scene of his contest with the priests of Baal, fighting with them the battle of Jehovah as it were on their own ground. [CARMEL.] Carmel was regarded by the Roman historians as a sacred mountain of the Jews (Tac. H. ii. 78; Suet. Vesp. 7). The host of heaven was worshipped on the housetop (2 K. xxiii. 12; Jer. xix. 3, xxxii. 29; Zeph. i. 5). In describing the sun-worship of the Nabataeans, Strabo (xvi. p. 784) mentions two characteristics which strikingly illustrate the worship of Baal. They built their altars on the roofs of houses, and offered on them incense and libations daily. On the wall of his city, in the sight of the besieging armies of Israel and Edom, the king of Moab offered his eldest son as a burnt-offering. The Persians, who worshipped the sun under the name of Mithra (Strabo, xv. p. 732), sacrificed on an elevated spot, but built no altars or images.

The priests of the false worship are sometimes designated Kemarim (כַּמְרִים; see MV.¹¹), a word of Syriac origin, to which different meanings have been assigned. It is applied to the non-Levitical priests who burnt incense on the high-places (2 K. xxiii. 5) as well as to the priests of the calves (Hos. x. 5); and the corresponding word is used in the Peshitto (Judg. xviii. 30) of Jonathan and his descendants, priests to the tribe of Dan, and in Targ. Onkelos (Gen. xlvii. 22) of the priests of Egypt. The Rabbis, followed by Gesenius, have derived it from a root signifying "to be black," and without any authority assert that the name was given to idolatrous priests from the black vestments which they wore. But white was the distinctive colour in the priestly garments of all nations from India to Gaul, and black was only worn when they sacrificed to the subterranean gods (Bähr, Symb. ii. 87, &c.). That a special dress was adopted by the Baal-worshippers, as well as by the false prophets (Zech. xiii. 4), is evident from 2 K. x. 22; the vestments were kept in an apartment of the idol temple, under the charge probably of one of the inferior priests. Micah's Levite was provided with appropriate robes (Judg. xvii. 11). The "strange (R. V. "foreign") apparel" mentioned in Zeph. i. 8 refers doubtless to a similar dress, adopted by the Israelites in defiance of the sumptuary law in Num. xv. 37-40.

In addition to the priests there were other persons intimately connected with idolatrous rites, and the impurities from which they were inseparable. Both men and women consecrated themselves to the service of idols (Robertson Smith, i. 133): the former as קַדְשִׁים, qedeshim, for which there is reason to believe the A. V. (Deut. xxiii. 17; see the Heb. or R. V. marg.) has not given too harsh an equivalent; the latter as קַדְשֹׁת, qedeshôth, who wore shrines for Astarte (2 K. xxiii. 7), and resembled the êralpai of Corinth, of whom Strabo (viii. p. 378) says there were more than a thousand attached to the temple of Aphrodite. Egyptian prostitutes consecrated themselves to Isis (Juv. vi. 489, ix. 22-24). The same class of women existed among the Phoenicians, Armenians, Lydians, and Babylonians (Her. i. 93, 199; Strabo, xi. p. 532; Epist. of Jerem. v. 43). They are distinguished from the public prostitutes (Hos. iv. 14) and associated with the performances of sacred rites, just as in Strabo (xii. p. 559) we find the two classes co-existing at Comana, the Corinth of Pontus, much frequented by pilgrims to the shrine of Aphrodite.¹ The wealth thus obtained flowed into the treasury of the idol temple, and against such a practice the injunction in Deut. xxiii. 18 is directed. The class of persons alluded to was composed of foreigners (Lucian, de Syra Dea, c. 5); and from the juxtaposition of prostitution and the idolatrous rites against which the laws in Lev. xix. are aimed, it is probable that, next to its immorality, one main reason why it was visited with such stringency was its connexion with idolatry (cp. 1 Cor. vi. 9).

But, besides these accessories, there were the ordinary rites of worship which idolatrous systems had in common with the religion of the Hebrews. Offering burnt sacrifices to the idol gods (2 K. v. 17), burning incense in their honour (1 K. xi. 8), and bowing down in worship before their images (1 K. xix. 18) were the chief parts of their ritual; and from their very analogy with the ceremonies of true worship were more seductive than the grosser forms. Nothing can be stronger or more positive than the language in which these ceremonies were denounced by Hebrew Law. Every detail of idol-worship was made the subject of a separate enactment, and many of the laws, which in themselves seem trivial and almost absurd, receive from this point of view their true significance. We are told by Maimonides (Mor. Neb. c. 12) that the prohibitions against sowing a field with mingled seed, and wearing garments of mixed material, were directed against the practices of idolaters, who attributed a kind of magical influence to the mixture (Lev. xix. 19; Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. ii. 18. Cp. Knobel-Dillmann in loco). Such, too, were the precepts which forbade that the garments of the sexes should be interchanged (Deut. xxiii. 5; Maimon. De Idol. xii. 9). According to Macrobius (Sat. iii. 8), other Asiatics when they sacrificed to their Venus changed the dress of the sexes. The priests of Cybele appeared in women's clothes, and used to mutilate themselves (Creuzer, Symb. ii. 34, 42): the same custom was observed "by the Ithyphalli in the rites of Bacchus, and by the Athenians in their Ascophoria" (Young, Idol. Cor. in Rel. i. 105; cp. Lucian, de Dea Syra, c. 15). The Israelites were prohibited for three years after their conquest of Canaan from eating of the fruit-trees of the land (Lev. xix. 23). Some interpret this as a protection against contamination, the cultivation of the trees having been attended with magical rites; others consider it and such prohibitions as follow precautions to propitiate the Divine powers (Robertson Smith, i. 148-9, 444). They were forbidden to "round the corner of the head," and to "mar the corner of the beard" (Lev. xix. 27), as the Arabians did in honour of their gods (Her. iii. 8, iv. 175). Hence, the phrase קָרַן אֶת-כּוֹנֵן, qesūse phē'āh, (literally) "shorn of the corner," is especially applied to idolaters (Jer. ix. 26, xv. 23; Robertson Smith, i. 307). Spencer (de Leg. Hebr. ii. 9, § 2) explains the law forbidding the offering of honey (Lev. ii. 11; see HONEY) as intended to oppose an idolatrous practice. Strabo describes the Magi as offering in all their sacrifices libations of oil mingled with honey and milk (xv. p. 733). Offerings in which honey was an ingredient were made to the inferior deities and the dead (Hom. Od. x. 519; Porph. de Antr. Nymph. c. 17). So also the practice of eating the flesh of sacrifices "over the blood" (Lev. xix. 26; Ezek. xxxiii. 25, 26) was, according to Maimonides, common among the Zabii (Robertson Smith, i. 324). Spencer gives a double reason for the prohibition: that it was a rite of divination, and divination of the worst kind, a species of necromancy by which they attempted to raise the spirits of the dead (cp. Hor. Sat. i. 8). There are supposed to be allusions to the practice of necromancy in Is. lxxv. 4, or at any rate to superstitious rites in connexion with the dead (see Delitzsch⁴ in loco). The grafting of one tree upon another was forbidden, because among idolaters the process was accompanied by gross obscenity (Maim. Mor. Neb. c. 12). Cutting the flesh for the dead (Lev. xix. 28; 1 K. xviii. 28), and making a baldness between the eyes (Deut. xiv. 1), were associated with idolatrous rites; the latter being a custom among the Syrians (Sir G. Wilkinson in Rawlinson's Herod. ii. 158, note. Cp. Robertson Smith, i. 304). The thrice-repeated and much-versed passage, "Thou shalt not see the kid in his mother's milk" (Ex. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 26; Deut. xiv. 21), interpreted by some as a precept of humanity, but more probably a prohibition against some ancient form of sacrifice (Robertson Smith, i. 204), is explained by Cudworth by means of a quotation from a Karaitic commentary which he had seen in MS.:—"It was a custom of the ancient heathens, when they had gathered in all their fruit, to take a kid and boil it in the dam's milk, and then in a magical way go about and besprinkle with it all the trees and fields and gardens and orchards; thinking by this means they should make them fructify, and bring forth again more abundantly the following year" (On the Lord's Supper, c. 2).^b The law which regulated clean and unclean meats (Lev. xx. 23-26) may be considered both as a sanitary regulation and also as having a tendency to separate the Israelites from the surrounding idolatrous nations. It was with the same object, in the opinion of Michaelis, that while in the wilderness they were prohibited from killing any animal for food without first offering it to Jehovah (Laws of Moses, trans. Smith, art. 203). The mouse,¹ one of the unclean animals of Leviticus (xi. 29), was sacrificed by the ancient Magi (Is. lxvi. 17; Movers, Phoen. i. 219). It may have been some such reason as that assigned by Lewis (Orig. Hebr. v. 1), that the dog was the symbol of an Egyptian deity, which gave rise to the prohibition in Deut. xxiii. 18. Movers says that the dog was offered in sacrifice to Moloch (i. 404).^{as}

¹ An illustration, though not an example, of this is found in the modern history of Europe. At a period of great profligacy and corruption of morals, licentiousness was carried to such an excess in Strasburg that the public prostitutes received the appellation of the scallions of the cathedral (Hiller, Phil. of Hist. ii. 441).

^b Dr. Thomson mentions a favourite dish among the Arabs called lebū simāḥ, to which he conceives allusion is made (The Land and the Book, i. 136).

¹ The swine, the dog, fish, the mouse, the horse, and the dove were unclean animals sacrificed among Semites (Robertson Smith, i. 272 sq.).

swine to the moon and Dionysus by the Egyptians, who afterwards ate of the flesh (Her. iii. 47; Is. lxxv. 4). Eating of the things offered was a necessary appendage to the sacrifice (cp. Ex. xviii. 12, xxxii. 6, xxxiv. 15; Num. xxv. 2, &c.). Among the Persians the victim was eaten by the worshippers, and the soul alone left for the god (Strabo, xv. 732). "Hence it is that the idolatry of the Jews in worshipping other gods is so often described synecdochically under the notion of feasting. Is. lvii. 7, 'Upon a high and lofty mountain thou hast set thy bed, and thither wentest thou up to offer sacrifice;' for in those ancient times they were not wont to sit at feasts, but lie down on beds or couches. Ezek. xxxiii. 41; Amos ii. 8, 'They laid themselves down upon clothes laid to pledge by every altar,' i.e. laid themselves down to eat of the sacrifice that was offered on the altar: cp. Ezek. xviii. 11" (Cudworth, ut supra, c. 1; cp. 1 Cor. viii. 10). The Israelites were forbidden "to print any mark upon them" (Lev. xix. 28; in symbol of self-dedication to a deity; cp. Robertson Smith, i. 316, n. 1), because it was a custom of idolaters to brand upon their flesh some symbol of the deity they worshipped, as the ivy-leaf of Bacchus (3 Macc. ii. 29). According to Lucian (de Dea Syria, 59) all the Syrians wore marks of this kind on their necks and wrists (cp. Is. xlv. 5; Gal. vi. 17; Rev. xiv. 1, 11). Many other practices of false worship are alluded to, and made the subjects of rigorous prohibition, but none are more frequently or more severely denounced than those which peculiarly distinguished the worship of Molech. The worship of this idol was polluted by the foul stain of human sacrifice (Deut. xii. 31; 2 K. iii. 27; Jer. vii. 31; Ps. cvi. 37; Ezek. xxxiii. 39; cp. Mic. vi. 7). Nor was this practice confined to the rites of Molech; it extended to those of Baal (Jer. xix. 5), and the king of Moab (2 K. iii. 27) offered his son as a burnt-offering to his god Chemosh. The Phœnicians, we are told by Porphyry (de Abstin. ii. c. 56), on occasions of great national calamity sacrificed to Kronos one of their dearest friends. This custom cannot be denied, if it may be explained as a "straining the gift-theory of sacrifice to cover rites to which it had no legitimate application" (Robertson Smith, i. 376). Kissing the images of the gods (1 K. xix. 18; Hos. xiii. 2), hanging votive offerings in their temples (1 Sam. xxxi. 10), and carrying them to battle (2 Sam. v. 21), as the Jews of Maccabæus' army did with the things consecrated to the idols of the Jamnites (2 Macc. xii. 40), are usages connected with idolatry which are casually mentioned, though not made the objects of express legislation. But soothsaying, interpretation of dreams, necromancy, witchcraft, magic, and other forms of divination, are alike forbidden (Deut. xviii. 9; 2 K. i. 2; Is. lxxv. 4; Ezek. xxi. 21). The history of other nations—and indeed the too common practice of the lower class of the population of Syria at the present day—shows us that such a statute as that against bestiality (Lev. xviii. 23) was not unnecessary (cp. Her. ii. 46; Rom. i. 26). Purificatory rites in connexion with idol-worship, and eating of forbidden food, were visited with severe retribution (Is. lxxvi. 17). It is evident, from the context of Ezek. viii. 17, that the votaries of the sun, who worshipped with their faces to the east (v. 16), and "put the branch to their nose," did so in observance of some idolatrous rite. Movers (Phœn. i. 66) unhesitatingly affirms that the allusion is to the branch Barsom, the holy branch of the Magi (Strabo, xv. p. 733; Spiegel, Eran. Alterthumskunde, iii. 571), and is followed by most modern commentators. The waving of a myrtle branch, says Maimonides (de Idol. vi. 2), accompanied the repetition of a magical formula in incantations. An illustration of the usage of boughs in worship will be found in the Greek Ikernpía (Aesch. Eum. 43, Suppl. 192; Schol. on Aristoph. Plut. 383; Porphyry. de Ant. Nymph. c. 33). For detailed accounts of idolatrous ceremonies, reference must be made to the articles upon the several idols.

III. It remains now briefly to consider the light in which idolatry was regarded in the Mosaic code, and the penalties with which it was visited. If one main object of the Hebrew polity was to teach the unity of God, the extermination of idolatry was but a subordinate end. Jehovah, the God of the Israelites, was the civil head of the State. He was the theocratic King of the people, Who had delivered them from bondage, and to Whom they had taken a willing oath of allegiance. They had entered into a solemn league and covenant with Him as their chosen King (cp. 1 Sam. viii. 7), by Whom obedience was requited with temporal blessings, and rebellion with temporal punishment. This original contract of the Hebrew government, as it has been termed, is contained in Ex. xix. 3-8, xx. 2-5; Deut. xxix. 10-xxx. 12, 13; Neh. ix. 38), it was kept with unwavering constancy on the part of Jehovah. To their kings He stood in the relation, so to speak, of a feudal superior: they were His representatives upon earth, and with them, as with the people before, His covenant was made (1 K. iii. 14, vi. 11). Idolatry, therefore, to an Israelite was a state offence (1 Sam. xv. 23),^a a political crime of the gravest character, high treason against the majesty of his King. It was a transgression of the covenant (Deut. xvii. 2), "the evil" pre-eminently in the eyes of Jehovah (1 K. xxi. 25), opp. to צדק, "the right" (2 Ch. xxvii. 2). But it was much more than all this. While the idolatry of foreign nations is stigmatised merely as an abomination in the sight of God, which called for His vengeance, the sin of the Israelites is regarded as of more glaring enormity and greater moral guilt. In the figurative language of the Prophets, the relation between Jehovah and His people is represented as a marriage bond (Is. liv. 5; Jer. iii. 14), and the worship of false gods with all its accompaniments (Lev. xx. 56) becomes then the greatest of social wrongs (Hos. ii. ; Jer. iii., &c.). This is beautifully brought out in Hos. ii. 16, where the heathen name Baali, "my master," which the apostate Israel had been accustomed to apply to her foreign possessor, is contrasted with Ishi, "my man," "my husband," the native word which she is to use when restored to her rightful husband, Jehovah. Much of the significance of this figure was unquestionably due to the impurities of idolaters, with whom such corruption was of no merely spiritual character (Ex. xxiv. 16 ; Num. xxv. 1, 2, &c.), but manifested itself in the grossest and most revolting forms (Rom. i. 26-32).

^a The point of this verse is lost in the A. V.: it should be "for the sin of witchcraft (is) rebellion; and idolatry (lit. vanity) and teraphim (are) stubbornness" (cp. R. V.). The Israelites, contrary to command, had spared of the spoil of the idolatrous Amalekites to offer to Jehovah, and thus associated His worship with that of idols.

Regarded in a moral aspect, false gods are called "stumbling blocks" (Ezek. xiv. 3), "lies" (Amos ii. 4 ; Rom. i. 25), "horrors" or "frights" (1 K. xv. 13 ; Jer. l. 38), "abominations" (Deut. xxix. 17, xxxii. 16 ; 1 K. xi. 5 ; 2 K. xxiii. 13), "guilt" (abstract for concrete, Amos viii. 14, מִצְרָתַי, ashmah, cp. 2 Ch. xxix. 18, perhaps with a play on Ashima, 2 K. xvii. 30. Cp. Schrader, KA'. p. 283) ; and with a profound sense of the degradation consequent upon their worship, they are characterised by the Prophets, whose mission it was to warn the people against them (Jer. xlv. 4), as "shame" (Jer. xi. 13 ; Hos. ix. 10). As considered with reference to Jehovah, they are "other gods" (Josh. xxiv. 2, 16), "strange gods" (Deut. xxxii. 16), "new gods" (Judg. v. 8), "devils,—not God" (Deut. xxxii. 17 ; 1 Cor. x. 20, 21) ; and, as denoting their foreign origin, "gods of the foreigner" (Josh. xxiv. 14, 15).^a Their powerlessness is indicated by describing them as "gods that cannot save" (Is. xlv. 20), "that made not the heavens" (Jer. x. 11), "nothing" (Is. xli. 24 ; 1 Cor. viii. 4), "wind and emptiness" (Is. xli. 29), "vanities of the heathen" (Jer. xiv. 22 ; Acts xiv. 15) ; and yet, while their deity is denied, their personal existence seems to have been acknowledged (Kurtz, Gesch. d. A. B. ii. 86, &c.), though not in the same manner in which the pretensions of local deities were reciprocally recognised by the heathen (1 K. xx. 23, 28 ; 2 K. xvii. 26). Other terms of contempt are employed with reference to idols, אֱלֹהִים, 'elūim (Lev. xix. 4), and גִּלְלֹתַי, gillūlat (Deut. xxix. 17), to which different meanings have been assigned, and many which indicate ceremonial uncleanness. [IDOL, pp. 1419, 1420.]

Idolatry, therefore, being from one point of view a political offence, could be punished without infringement of civil rights. No penalties were attached to mere opinions. For aught we know, theological speculation may have been as rife among the Hebrews as in modern times, though such was not the tendency of the Semitic mind. It was not, however, such speculations, heterodox though they might be, but overt acts of idolatry, which were made the subjects of legislation (Michaelis, Laws of Moses, art. 245, 246). The first and second commandments are directed against idolatry of every form. Individuals and communities were equally amenable to the rigorous code. The individual offender was devoted to destruction (Ex. xxiii. 20) ; his nearest relatives were not only bound to denounce him and deliver him up to punishment (Deut. xiii. 2-10), but their hands were to strike the first blow when, on the evidence of two witnesses at least, he was stoned (Deut. xvii. 2-5). To attempt to seduce others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (Deut. xiii. 6-10). An idolatrous nation shared a similar fate. No facts are more strongly insisted on in the O. T. than that the extermination of the Canaanites was the punishment of their idolatry (Ex. xxxiv. 15, 16 ; Deut. vii., xii. 29-31, xx. 17), and that the calamities of the Israelites were due to the same cause (Jer. ii. 17). A city guilty of idolatry was looked upon as a cancer of the State ; it was considered to be in rebellion, and treated according to the laws of war. Its inhabitants and all their cattle were put to death. No spoil was taken, but everything it contained was burnt with it ; nor was it allowed to be rebuilt (Deut. xiii. 13-18 ; Josh. vi. 26). Saul lost his kingdom, Achan his life, and Hiel his family, for transgressing this Law (1 Sam. xv. ; Josh. vii. ; 1 K. xvi. 34). The silver and gold with which the idols were covered were accursed (Deut. vii. 25, 27). And not only were the Israelites forbidden to serve the gods of Canaan (Ex. xxiii. 24), but even to mention their names ; that is, to call upon them in prayer or any form of worship (Ex. xxiii. 13 ; Josh. xxiii. 7). On taking possession of the land, they were to obliterate all traces of the existing idolatry ; statues, altars, pillars, idol-temples, every person and everything connected with it, were to be swept away (Ex. xxiii. 24, 32, xxxiv. 13 ; Deut. vii. 5, 25, xii. 1-3, xx. 17), and the name and worship of the idols blotted out. Such were the precautions taken by the framer of the Mosaic code to preserve the worship of Jehovah, the true God, in its purity. Of the manner in which his descendants have "put a fence" about "the Law" with reference to idolatry, many instances will be found in Maimonides (de Idol.). They were prohibited from using vessels, scarlet garments, bracelets, or rings, marked with the sign of the sun, moon, or dragon (vii. 10) ; trees planted or stones erected for idol-worship were forbidden (viii. 5, 10) ; and, to guard against the possibility of contamination, if the image of an idol were found among other images intended for ornament, they were all to be cast into the Dead Sea (vii. 11).

IV. Much indirect evidence on this subject might be supplied by an investigation of proper names. Sir H. Layard has remarked, "According to a custom existing from time immemorial in the East, the name of the Supreme Deity was introduced into the names of men. This custom prevailed from the banks of the Tigris to the Phœnician colonies beyond the Pillars of Hercules ; and we recognise in the Sardanapalus of the Assyrians, and the Hannibal of the Carthaginians, the identity of the religious system of the two nations, as widely distinct in the time of their existence as in their geographical position" (Nin. ii. 450). The hint which he has given can be but briefly followed out here. Traces of the sun-worship of the ancient Canaanites remain in the nomenclature of their country. Beth-Shemesh, "house of the sun," En-Shemesh, "spring of the sun," and Ir-Shemesh, "city of the sun," whether they be the original Canaanitish names or their Hebrew renderings, attest the reverence paid to the source of light and heat, the symbol of the fertilising power of nature. Samson, the Hebrew national hero, took his name from the same luminary, and was born in a mountain-village above the modern 'Ain Shems (En-Shemesh; Thomson, The Land and the Book, ii. 361). The name of Baal, the sun-god, is one of the most common occurrence in compound words, and is often associated with places consecrated to his worship, and of which perhaps he was the tutelary deity. Bamoth-Baal, "the high-places of Baal;" Baal-Hermon, Beth-Baal-Meon, Baal-Gad, Baal-Hamon, in which compound the names of the sun-god of Phoenicia and Egypt are associated; Baal-Tamar, and many others, are instances of this.* Nor was the practice confined to the names of places: proper names are found with the same element. Esh-baal, Ish-baal, &c., are examples. The Amorites, whom Joshua did not drive out, dwelt on Mount Heres, in Ajalon, "the mountain of the sun" [TIMNATH-HERES]. Here and there we find traces of the attempt made by the Hebrews, on their conquest of the country, to extirpate idolatry. Thus Baalah or Kirjath-Baal, "the town of Baal," became Kirjath-Jearim, "the town of forests" (Josh. xv. 60). The Moon, Astarte or Ashtaroth, gave her name to a city of Bashan (Josh. xiii. 12, 31), and it is not improbable that the name Jericho may have been derived from being associated with the worship of this goddess. [JERICHO.] Nebo, whether it be the name under which the Chaldeans worshipped the Moon or the planet Mercury, enters into many compounds: Nebu-zaradan, Samgar-nebo, and the like. Bel is found in Belshazzar, Belteshazzar, and others. Baladan, in Merodach-Baladan, is simply the Babylonian abil-iddina, "gave a son." The father of Merodach-Baladan, whose name was probably the same, is called Baladan, as in Heb. El-nathan might be called Nathan (see KAT., p. 339). Hadad, Hadadezer, Benhadad, are derived from the tutelar deity of the Syrians, and in Nergalsharezar we recognise the god of the Cushites. Chemosh, the fire-god of Moab, appears in Carchemish, and Peor in Beth-Peor. Malcam, a name which occurs but once, and then of a Moabite by birth, may have been connected with Molech and Milcom, the abomination of the Ammonites. A glimpse of star-worship may be seen in the name of the city

^a In the A. V. the terms שָׂר, sār, "strange," and נֹכְרִי or נֹכְרִי, nokri, "foreign," are not uniformly distinguished, and the point of a passage is frequently lost by the interchange of one with the other, or by rendering both by the same word. So Ps. lxxxi. 9 should be, "There shall not be in thee a strange god, nor shalt thou worship a foreign g-d."

Chesil, the Semitic Orion, and the month Chisleu, without recognising in Rahab "the glittering fragments of the sea-snake trailing across the northern sky." It would perhaps be going too far to trace in Engedi, "spring of the kid," any connexion with the goat-worship of Mendes, or any relics of the wars of the giants in Rapha and Rephaim. But there are fragments of ancient idolatry in other names in which it is not so impalpable. Ishbosheth is identical with Esh-baal, and Jerubbesheth with Jerubbaal, and Mephibosheth and Meribbaal are but two names for one person (cp. Jer. xi. 13). The worship of the Syrian Rimmon appears in the names Hadad-Rimmon and Tabrimmon; and if, as some suppose, it be derived from רִמּוֹן, Rimmōn, "a pomegranate-tree," we may connect it with the towns of the same name in Judah and Benjamin, with En-Rimmon and the prevailing tree-worship. It is impossible to pursue here this investigation: the hints which have been thrown out may prove suggestive (cp. Robertson Smith, i. Index, s. v. "Theophorous proper names;" Bächtgen, p. 140). [W. IDU'EL (Ἰδουήλος; Eccelon), 1 Esd. viii. 43. [ARIEL, 1.]

IDUMÆA (Mark iii. 8), or

IDUME'A, R. V., in each case, EDM (Ἰδουμαία; ἡ Ἰδουμαία; Idumæa, Edom), Is. xxiv. 5, 6; Ezek. xxxv. 15, xxxvi. 5; 1 Macc. iv. 15, 29, 61, v. 3, vi. 31; 2 Macc. xii. 32. [EDOM.]

IDUME'ANS (οἱ Ἰδουμαῖοι; Idumæi), 2 Macc. x. 15, 16. [EDOM.]

IG-AL (יְגָל; = [God] redeems). 1. (LXX. [v. 8], B. Ἰαδὰ, AF. Ἰγὰ; Igal, Igaal.) Son of Joseph, of the tribe of Issachar; chosen by Moses to represent that tribe among the spies who went up from Kadesh to search the Promised Land (Num. xiii. 7).

2. One of the heroes of David's guard, son of Nathan of Zobah (2 Sam. xxiii. 36, Gadl). In the parallel list of 1 Ch. the name is given as "Joel the brother of Nathan" (xi. 38, Ἰωήλ). Kennicott, after a minute examination of the passage both in the original and in the ancient Versions, decides in favour of the latter as most like the genuine text (Dissertation, pp. 212-214).

This name is really identical with IGEAL.

IGDALI'AH (יְגַדְלִי'א; = Jehovah is great; Γεδολίας; Jegedeliás), a prophet or holy man—"the man of God"—named once only (Jer. xxxv. 4), as the father of Hanan, in the chamber of whose sons, the Bene-Hanan, in the house of Jehovah, Jeremiah had that remarkable interview with the Rechabites which is recorded in that chapter.

IG-EAL, R. V. IGAL (יְגָל; Ἰωήλ; Jegaal), a son of Shemaiah; a descendant of the royal house of Judah (1 Ch. iii. 22). According to the present state of the text of this difficult genealogy, he is fourth in descent from Zerubabel; but, according to Lord A. Hervey's plausible alteration, he is the son of Shimei, brother to Zerubabel, and therefore but one generation distant from the latter (Genealogy of our Lord, pp. 107-109). The name is identical with IGAL; and, as in 1 Ch. xi. 38, the LXX. give it as Joel.

* That temples in Syria, dedicated to the several divinities, did transfer their names to the places where they stood, is evident from the testimony of Lucian, an Assyrian himself. His derivation of Hiera from the temple of the Assyrian Hera shows that he was familiar with the circumstance (de Dea Syr. c. 1). Balsampas (= Bethabemesh), a town of Arabia, derived its name from the sun-worship (Vossius, de Theol. Gent. ii. c. 8), like Kir Heres (Jer. xlviii. 31) in Moab.

IIM, R. V. IYIM (אִיִּם = stone heaps). 1. (Gal; Iicabarim.) The partial or contracted form of the name IJE-ABARIM, one of the later stations of the Israelites on their journey to Palestine (Num. xxxiii. 45). In the Samaritan Version Iim is rendered by Caphrāni, "villages;" and in the Targum Pseudojon. by Megizāthā, "narrow passes" (die Engpässe). But in no way do we gain any clue to the situation of the place.

2. (LXX. v. 29, B. Βακάκ, A. Ἀβέλου; Iim.) A town in the extreme south of Judah, named in the same group with Beersheba, Hormah, &c. (Josh. xv. 28). The Peshitto Syriac Version has Elin, ܐܠܝܢ. No trace of the name has yet been discovered in this direction. [G.] [W.]

IJE-ABA'RIM, R. V. IYE-ABA'RIM (אִיֵּי אַבָּרִים) IY, with the definite article, Iye habarim = the heaps, or ruins, of the further regions [as distinct from the Ijim of Judah, Josh. xv. 29]; Jerome ad Fabiolam, aceruos lapidum transeuntium; in xxi. B. Χαλγαι, AF¹⁴, Ἀχελγαι, in xxxiii. BA. Gal; Jeabarim and Iicabarim, one of the later halting-places of the children of Israel as they were approaching Palestine (Num. xxi. 11, xxxiii. 44). It was next beyond Oboth, and the station beyond it again was the Wādy Zared—the torrent of the willows—probably one of the streams which run into the S.E. angle of the Dead Sea. Between Ije-abarim and Dibongad, which succeeds it in Num. xxxiii., the Zared and the Arnon have to be inserted from the parallel accounts of xxi. and Deut. ii.; Dibongad and Almon-Diblathaim, which lay above the Arnon, having in their turn escaped from the two last-named narratives. Ije-abarim was on the boundary—the E. or S.E. boundary—of the territory of Moab; not on the pasture-lands of the Mishor, the modern Belka, but in the midbar, the waste uncultivated "wilderness" on its skirts (xxi. 11). Moab they were expressly forbidden to molest (Deut. ii. 9-12); but we may perhaps be allowed to conclude from the terms of v. 13, "now rise up" (אִדְדוּ), that they had remained on his frontier in Ije-abarim for some length of time. Nothing more than a general identification of its situation has been attempted (cp. Dillmann² on Num. xxi. 11, "somewhere near the Wādy el Ahsa"), nor has the name been found lingering in the locality, which, however, has yet to be explored. If there is any connexion between the Ije-abarim and the Harabarim, the mountain-range opposite Jericho, then Abarim is doubtless a general appellation for the whole of the highland east of the Dead Sea. [ABARIM.]

The rendering given by the LXX. is remarkable. Gal is no doubt a version of Iye (see this developed in OS.² p. 241, 57)—the Ain being converted into G: but whence does the Ἀχελ come? Can it be the vestige of a nachal—"torrent" or "wādy"—once attached to the name? The Targum Pseudojon. has Megizāthā 'Ibdra'z, "the narrow pass of Abarim."

In Num. xxxiii. 45 it is given in the shorter form of IIM. [G.] [W.]

I'JON (יִּיּוֹן = ruins; in 1 and 2 K., B. 'Aiv, A. Naiv; in 2 Ch., B. 'Iw, A. Aiwōn; Ahion, Aion), a town in the north of Palestine, belonging to the tribe of Naphtali. It was taken and plundered by the captains of Benhadad, along with Dan and other store-cities of Naphtali (1 K. xv. 20; 2 Ch. xvi. 4). It was plundered a second time by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. xv. 29). We find no farther mention of it in history. At the base of the mountains of Naphtali, a few miles N.W. of the site of Dan, is a fertile and beautiful little plain called Merj 'Ayūn. (عَيُون مَرْج; the Arabic word عَيُون, though different in meaning, is radically identical with the Heb. יִּיּוֹן); and near its northern end is a large mound called Tell Dibbin. This, in all probability, is the site of the long-lost Ijon (Robinson's Palestine, iii. 375; Porter, Hbk. to S. and P.; Guérin, Gallée, ii. 280; Kiehm, IWB. s. v.). Conder (Hbk. p. 415) suggests el-Khūm, a village N.E. of the Merj 'Ayūn. [J. L. P.] [W.]

IK'KESH (עִקְשׁ = perverse; in 2 Sam. B. Elkad, A. 'Ekkās, in 1 Ch. xi. LXX. om., in xxvii. BA. 'Ekkās; Acces), the father of IRA the Tekoite, one of the heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Ch. xi. 28, xxvii. 9).

I'LAI (אֵילַי = ? most high; BN. 'Hael; Ila), an Ahoite, one of the heroes of David's guard (1 Ch. xi. 29). In the list of 2 Sam. xxiii. the name is given as ZALMON (Luc. Ἀλλυμόν). Kennicott (Dissertation, pp. 187-9) examines the variations at length, and decides in favour of Ila as the original name.

ILLYRICUM (Ἰλλυρικόν), an extensive district lying along the eastern coast of the Adriatic from the boundary of Italy on the north to Epirus on the south, and contiguous to Moesia and Macedonia on the east: it was divided by the river Drilo into two portions,—Illyris Barbara, the northern, and Illyris Graeca, the southern. Within these limits was included Dalmatia, which appears to have been used indifferently with Illyricum for a portion, and ultimately for the whole of the district. St. Paul records that he preached the Gospel "round about unto Illyricum" (Rom. xv. 19): he probably uses the term in its most extensive sense, and the part visited (if indeed he crossed the boundary at all) would have been about Dyrrachium. IMAGE. [IDOL]

IM'LA (אִמְלָא = fulness; B. 'Iemads (v. 7), -d (v. 8), A. 'Iemad; Jemla), father or progenitor of Micaiah, the prophet of Jehovah, who was consulted by Ahab and Jehoshaphat before their fatal expedition to Ramoth-gilead (2 Ch. xviii. 7, 8). The form IM'LAH (אִמְלָה); B. 'Iemlas [v. 8], -a [v. 9], A. 'Iemad; Jemla) is employed in the parallel narrative (1 K. xxii. 8, 9).

IMMANUEL (אִמְּנוּאֵל, or in two words in many MSS. and editions, אִמְּנוּ וְאֵל; Ἐμμανουήλ; Immanuel), the symbolical name given by the prophet Isaiah to the child who was announced to Ahaz and the people of Judah, as the sign which God would give of their deliverance from their enemies (Is. vii. 14). It is applied by the Apostle St. Matthew to the Messiah, born of the Virgin (Matt. i. 23). By the LXX. in one passage (Is. vii. 14), and in both passages by the Vulg., Syr., and Targ., it is rendered as a proper name; but in Is. viii. 8 the LXX. translate it literally $\mu\epsilon\theta' \eta\mu\omega\nu \delta \theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$. The verses in question have been the battle-field of critics for centuries, and in their discussions there has been no lack of the odium theologianum. As early as the times of Justin Martyr the Christian interpretation was attacked by the Jews, and the position which they occupied has of late years been assumed by many continental theologians. Before proceeding to a discussion, or rather to a classification, of the numerous theories of which this subject has been the fruitful source, the circumstances under which the prophecy was delivered claim especial consideration.

In the early part of the reign of Ahaz the kingdom of Judah was threatened with annihilation by the combined armies of Syria and Israel. A hundred and twenty thousand of the choice warriors of Judah, all "sons of might," had fallen in one day's battle. The Edomites and Philistines had thrown off the yoke (2 Ch. xiii.). Jerusalem was menaced with a siege; the hearts of the king and of the people "shook, as the trees of a forest shake before the wind" (Is. vii. 2). The king had gone to "the conduit of the upper pool," probably to take measures for preventing the supply of water from being cut off or falling into the enemy's hand, when the Prophet met him with the message of consolation. Not only were the designs of the hostile armies to fail, but within sixty-five years the kingdom of Israel would be overthrown. In confirmation of his words, the Prophet bids Ahaz ask a sign of Jehovah, which the king, with pretended humility, refused to do. After administering a severe rebuke to Ahaz for his obstinacy, Isaiah announces the sign which Jehovah Himself would give unasked: "Behold!

the virgin (הַיְהוּדָה , hā-'almāh) is with child and beareth a son, and she shall call his name Immanuel."

The interpreters of this passage are naturally divided into three classes, each of which admits of subdivisions, as the differences in detail are numerous. The first class consists of those who refer the fulfilment of the prophecy to a historical event, which followed immediately upon its delivery. The majority of Christian writers, till within the last fifty years, form a second class, and apply the prophecy exclusively to the Messiah; while a third class, almost equally numerous, agree in considering both these explanations true, and hold that the prophecy had an immediate and literal fulfilment, but was completely accomplished in the miraculous conception and birth of Christ. Among the first are numbered the Jewish writers of all ages, without exception. Jerome refutes, on chronological grounds, a theory which was current in his day amongst the Jews that the prophecy had reference to Hezekiah, the son of Ahaz, who, from a comparison of 2 K. xvi. 2 with xviii. 2, must have been nine years old at the time it was delivered. The force of his argument is somewhat weakened by the evident obscurity of the numbers in the passages in question, from which we must infer that Ahaz was eleven years old at the time of Hezekiah's birth. By the Jews in the Middle Ages this explanation was abandoned as untenable, and in consequence some, as Rashi and Aben Ezra, refer the prophecy to a son of Isaiah himself, and others to a son of Ahaz by another wife, as Kimchi and Abarbanel. In this case, the 'almāh' is explained as the wife or betrothed wife of the Prophet, or as a later wife of Ahaz. Kelle (Ges. Comm. über den Jesaja) degrades her to the third rank of ladies in the harem (cp. Cant. vi. 28). Hitzig (Der Proph. Jesaja) rejects Gesenius' application of 'almāh' to a second wife of the Prophet, and interprets it of the prophetess mentioned in viii. 3. Hendewerk (Des Proph. Jesaja Weissag.) follows Gesenius. In either case the Prophet is made to fulfil his own prophecy. Isenbiehl, a pupil of Michaelis, defended the historical sense with considerable learning, and suffered unworthy persecution for expressing his opinions. The 'almāh' in his view was some Hebrew girl who was present at the colloquy between Isaiah and Ahaz, and to whom the Prophet pointed as he spoke. This opinion was held by Bauer, Cube, and Rosenmüller (1st ed.). Michaelis, Eichhorn, Paulus, and Ammon, give her a merely ideal existence; whilst Umbreit allows her to be among the bystanders, but explains the pregnancy and birth as imaginary only. Interpreters of the second class, who refer the prophecy solely to the Messiah, of course understand by the 'almāh' the Virgin Mary. Among these, Vitringa (Obs. Sacr. v. c. 1) vigorously opposes those who, like Grotius, Pellicanus, and Tirinus, conceded to the Jews that the reference to Christ Jesus was not direct and immediate, but by way of typical allusion. For, he maintains, a young married woman of the time of Ahaz and Isaiah could not be a type of the Virgin, nor could her issue by her husband be a figure of the child to be born of the Virgin by the operation of the Holy Ghost. Against this hypothesis of a solely Messianic reference, it is objected that the birth of the Messiah could not be a sign of deliverance to the people of Judah in the time of Ahaz. In reply to this, Theodoret advances the opinion that the birth of the Messiah involved the conservation of the family of Jesse, and therefore by implication of the Jewish state. Cocceus argues on the same side, that the sign of the Messiah's birth would intimate that in the interval the kingdom and state of the Jews could not be alienated from God, and besides it confirms v. 8, indicating that before the birth of Christ Judaea should not be subject to Syria, as it was when Archelaus was removed, and it was reduced to the form of a Roman province. Of all these explanations Vitringa disapproves and states his own conclusion, which is also that of Calvin and Piscator, to be the following:—In v. 14–16, the Prophet gives a sign to the pious in Israel of their deliverance from the impending danger, and in v. 17, &c. announces the evils which the Assyrians, not the Syrians, should inflict upon Ahaz and such of his people as resembled him. As surely as Messiah would be born of the Virgin, so surely would God deliver the Jews from the threatened evil. The principle of interpretation here made use of is founded by Calvin on the custom of the Prophets, who confirmed special promises by the assurance that God would send a redeemer. But this explanation involves another difficulty, besides that which arises from the distance of the event predicted. Before the child shall arrive at years of discretion the Prophet announces the desolation of the land whose kings threatened Ahaz. By this Vitringa understands that no more time would elapse before the former event was accomplished than would intervene between the birth and youth of Immanuel, an argument too far-fetched to have much weight. Hengstenberg (Christology, ii. 44–66, Eng. trans.) supports to the full the Messianic interpretation, and closely connects vii. 14 with ix. 6. He admits frankly that the older explanation of vs. 15, 16 has exposed itself to the charge of being arbitrary, and confidently propounds his own method of removing the stumbling-block. “In v. 14 the Prophet had seen the birth of the Messiah as present. Holding fast this idea and expanding it, the Prophet makes him who has been born accompany the people through all the stages of its existence. We have here an ideal anticipation of the real incarnation . . . What the Prophet means, and intends to say here is, that, in the space of about a twelvemonth, the overthrow of the hostile kingdoms would already have taken place. As the representative of the contemporaries, he brings forward the wonderful child who, as it were, formed the soul of the popular life. . . . In the subsequent prophecy, the same wonderful child, grown up into a warlike hero, brings the deliverance from Asshur, and the world’s power represented by it.” The learned Professor thus admits the double sense in the case of Asshur, but denies its application to Immanuel. It would be hard to say whether text or commentary be the more obscure.

* 'Almāh denotes a girl of marriageable age, but not married, and therefore a virgin by implication. It is never even used, as בְּתוּלָה , bethūlāh, which more directly expresses virginity, of a bride or betrothed wife (Joel i. 8). 'Almāh and bethūlāh are both applied to Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 16, 43), as apparently convertible terms; and in addition to the evidence from the cognate languages, Arabic and Syriac, we have the testimony of Jerome (on Is. vii. 14) that in Punic Alma denoted a virgin.

In view of the difficulties which attend these explanations of the prophecy, the third class of interpreters above alluded to have recourse to a theory which combines the two preceding, viz. the hypothesis of the double sense. They suppose that the immediate reference of the Prophet was to some contemporary occurrence, but that his words received their true and full accomplishment in the birth of the Messiah. Jerome (Comm. in Esaiam, vii. 14) mentions an interpretation of some Judaizers that Immanuel was the son of Isaiah, born of the prophetess, as a type of the Saviour, and that his name indicates the calling of the nations after the Word became flesh and dwelt among us. Something of the same kind is proposed by Dathe; in his opinion “the miracle, while it immediately respected the times of the Prophet, was a type of the birth of Christ of the Virgin Mary.” Dr. Pye-Smith conjectured that it had an immediate reference to Hezekiah, “the virgin” being the queen of Ahaz; but, like some other prophetic testimonies, had another and a designed reference to some remoter circumstance, which when it occurred would be the real fulfilment, answering every feature and filling up the entire extent of the original delineation (Script. Test. to the Messiah, i. 357, 3rd ed.). A serious objection to the application of the prophecy of Hezekiah has already been mentioned. Kennicott separates v. 16 from the three preceding, applying the latter to Christ, the former to the son of Isaiah (Sermon on Is. vii. 13–16).

Such in brief are some of the principal opinions which have been held on this important question [see also the summary in Delitzsch⁴ and Dillmann⁵ on Is. vii. 14; cp. ISAIAH, p. 1457]. From the manner in which the quotation occurs in Matt. i. 23, there can be no doubt that the Evangelist did not use it by way of accommodation, but as having in view its actual accomplishment. Whatever may have been his opinion as to any contemporary or immediate reference it might contain, this was completely obscured by the full conviction that burst upon him when he realised its completion in the Messiah. What may have been the light in which the promise was regarded by the Prophet’s contemporaries, we are not in a position to judge; the hypothesis of the double sense satisfies most of the requirements of the problem, and as it does less violence to the text than the others which have been proposed, and is at the same time supported by the analogy of the Apostle’s quotations from the O. T. (Matt. ii. 15, 18, 23; iv. 15), we accept it as approximating most nearly to the true solution. [MESSIAH; PROPHECY.] [W. A. W.]

IMMER. 1. Ἰμμερ, ? = eloquent: in 1 Ch. ix. 12, B. Ἐμῆρ, A. Ἐμῆρ; in Neh. xi. 13, BA. omit: Emmer, apparently the founder of an important family of priests, although the name does not occur in any genealogy which allows us to discover his descent from Aaron (1 Ch. ix. 12; Neh. xi. 13). This family had charge of, and gave its name to, the sixteenth course of the service (1 Ch. xxiv. 14). From them came Pashur, chief governor of the Temple in Jeremiah’s time, and his persecutor (Jer. xx. 1). They returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Ezra ii. 37; Neh. vii. 40). Zadok ben-Immer repaired his own house (Neh. iii. 29), and two other priests of the family put away their foreign wives (Ezra x. 20). But it is remarkable that the name is omitted from the list of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah, and also of those who came up with Zerubbabel and Jeshua, and who are stated to have had descendants surviving in the next generation—the days of Joiakim (see Neh. xii. 1, 10, 12–21). [IMMER.] Different from the foregoing must be

2. (In Ezra B. Ἐμῆρ, A. Ἐμῆρ; in Neh. B. Ἰεμῆρ, A. Ἐμῆρ: Emer, Emmer), apparently the name of a place in Babylonia from which certain persons returned to Jerusalem with the first caravan, who could not satisfactorily prove their genealogy (Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61). In 1 Esdras the name is given as Ἀαδρ.

IM'NA (יִמְנָה) = holding back; Ἰμνά; Jemna, a descendant of Asher, son of Helem, and one of the "chief princes" of the tribe (1 Ch. vii. 35; cp. v. 40).

IM'NAH (יִמְנָה), ? = good fortune; A. Ἰεμνά, B. Ἰμνά; Jemna). 1. The first-born of Asher (1 Ch. vii. 30). In the Pentateuch the name (identical with the present) is given in the A. V. as JIMNAH.

2. (B. Αἰμνά, A. Ἰεμνά.) Kore ben-Imnah, the Levite, assisted in the reforms of Hezekiah (2 Ch. xxxi. 14).

IMPLEAD (Acts xix. 38), a technical term (like the ἐγκαλεῖν of the Greek text), replaced in the R. V. and explained by "accuse." [F.]

IM'RAH (יִמְרָה) = obstinacy; B. Ἰμράφ, A. Ἰεμρά; Jamra), a descendant of Asher, of the family of ZOPHAH (1 Ch. vii. 36), and named as one of the chiefs of the tribe.

IM'RI (יִמְרִי) = eloquent. 1. (B. Ἀμρεί, A. ορι; Omrāi.) A man of Judah of the great family of Pharez (1 Ch. ix. 4).

2. (B.N. Ἀμραπέ, A. Μαράπ; Amri.) Father or progenitor of ZACCUR, who assisted Nehemiah in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 2).

INCENSE, קְטוֹרֶת (qetōrāh), Deut. xxxiii. 10; קְטוֹרֶת (qetōreth), Ex. xxv. 6, xxx. 1, &c.;

לְבוֹנָה (lebōnāh), Is. xliii. 23, lx. 6, &c. The incense employed in the service of the Tabernacle was distinguished as קְטוֹרֶת הַסַּמִּימִם (qetōreth hassammim, Ex. xxv. 6), from being compounded of the perfumes stacte, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense. All incense which was not made of these ingredients was called קְטוֹרֶת זָרָה (qetōrāh zārāh, Ex. xxx. 9), and was forbidden to be offered. According to Rashi on Ex. xxx. 34, the above-mentioned perfumes were mixed in equal proportions, seventy manehs being taken of each. They were compounded by the skill of the apothecary, to whose use, according to Rabbinical tradition, was devoted a portion of the Temple, called, from the name of the family whose especial duty it was to prepare the incense, "the house of Abtines." So in the large temples of India "is retained a man whose chief business it is to distil sweet waters from flowers, and to extract oil from wood, flowers, and other substances" (Roberts, Orient. Iilus. p. 82). The priest or Levite to whose care the incense was entrusted, was one of the fifteen מְמַנְחִים (memunnim), or prefects of the Temple. Constant watch was kept in the house of Abtines that the incense might always be in readiness (Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. s. v. אֲבָתִינִים).

In addition to the four ingredients already mentioned Jarchi enumerates seven others, thus making eleven, which the Jewish doctors affirm were communicated to Moses on Mount Sinai. Josephus (B. J. v. 5, § 5) mentions thirteen. The proportions of the additional spices are given by Maimonides (Helē hammiqdash, ii. 2, § 3) as follows:—Of myrrh, cassia, spikenard, and saffron, sixteen manehs each; of costus twelve manehs, cinnamon nine manehs, sweet bark three manehs. The weight of the whole confection was 368 manehs. To these was added the fourth part of a cab of salt of Sodom, with amber of Jordan, and a herb called

"the smoke-raiser" (שֵׁטֶלֶה עָשָׁן, ma'āleh 'āshān), known only to the cunning in such matters, to whom the secret descended by tradition. In the ordinary daily service one maneh was used, half in the morning and half in the evening. Allowing then one maneh of incense for each day of the solar year, the three manehs which remained were again pounded, and used by the high-priest on the Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 12). A store of it was constantly kept in the Temple (Jos. B. J. vi. 8, § 3).

The incense possessed the threefold characteristic of being salted (not tempered as in A. V.), pure, and holy. Salt was the symbol of incorruptness, and nothing, says Maimonides, was offered without it, except the wine of the drink-offerings, the blood, and the wood (cp. Lev. ii. 13). The expression בַּד בְּבַד (bad bebād, Ex. xxx. 34) is interpreted by the Chaldee "weight by weight,"—that is, an equal weight of each (cp. Jarchi in loco); and this rendering is adopted by our Versions (A. V. and R. V. "like weight." Cp. Knobel-Dillmann in loco). Others however, and among them Aben Ezra and Maimonides, consider it as signifying that each of the spices was separately prepared, and that all were afterwards mixed. The incense thus compounded was specially set apart for the service of the sanctuary: its desecration was punished with death (Ex. xxx. 37, 38); as in some part of India, according to Michaelis (Mosaisch. Recht, art. 249), it was considered high treason for any person to make use of the best sort of Calambak, which was for the service of the king alone.

Aaron, as high-priest, was originally appointed to offer incense, but in the daily service of the second Temple the office devolved upon the inferior priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot (Mishna, Yoma, ii. 4; Luke i. 9), each morning and evening (Abarbanel on Lev. x. 1). A peculiar blessing was supposed to be attached to this service; and in order that all might share in it, the lot was cast among those who were "new to the incense," if any remained (Mishna, Yoma, l. c.; Bartenora on Tamid, v. 2). Uzziāh was punished for his presumption in attempting to infringe the prerogatives of the descendants of Aaron, who were consecrated to burn incense (2 Ch. xxvi. 16-21; Joseph. Ant. ix. 10, § 4). The officiating priest appointed another, whose office it was to take the fire from the brazen Altar. According to Maimonides (Tmid. Umus, ii. 8, iii. 5), this fire was taken from the second pile, which was over against the S.E. corner of the Altar of burnt-offering, and was of fig-tree wood. A silver shovel (מַחְטָה, machtāh) was first filled with the live coals, and afterwards emptied into a golden one, smaller than the former, so that some of the coals were spilled (Mishna, Tamid, v. 5, Yoma, iv. 4; cp. Rev. viii. 5). Another priest cleared the golden Altar from the cinders which had been left at the previous offering of incense (Mishna, Tamid, iii. 6, 9; vi. 1).

The times of offering incense were specified in the instructions first given to Moses (Ex. xxx. 7, 8). The morning incense was offered when the lamps were trimmed in the Holy place, and before the sacrifice, when the watchmen set for the purpose announced the break of day (Mishna, Yoma, iii. 1, 5). When the lamps were lighted "between the evenings," after the evening sacrifice and before the drink-offerings were offered, incense was again burnt on the golden Altar, which "belonged to the oracle" (1 K. vi. 22), and stood before the veil which separated the Holy place from the Holy of Holies, the Throne of God (Rev. viii. 4; Philo, de Anim. Idon. § 3).

When the priest entered the Holy place with the incense, all the people were removed from the Temple, and from between the porch and the Altar (Maimon. Tamid. Unus. iii. 3; cp. Luke i. 10). The incense was then brought from the house of Abtines in a large vessel of gold called קַפְּחִי (kaphi), in which was a phial (קִיפִי, bāzīk, properly "a salver") containing the incense (Mishna, Tamid, v. 4). The assistant priests who attended to the lamps, the clearing of the golden Altar from the cinders, and the fetching fire from the Altar of Burnt-offering, performed their offices singly, bowed towards the Ark of the covenant, and left the Holy place before the priest, whose lot it was to offer incense, entered. Profound silence was observed among the congregation who were praying without (cp. Rev. viii. 1), and at a signal from the prefect the priest cast the incense on the fire (Mishna, Tamid, v. 3), and bowing reverently towards the Holy of Holies retired slowly backwards, not prolonging his prayer that he might not alarm the congregation, or cause them to fear that he had been struck dead for offering unworthily (Lev. xvi. 13; Luke i. 21; Mishna, Yoma, v. 1). When he came out, he pronounced the blessing in Num. vi. 24-26, the "magrephah" sounded, and the Levites burst forth into song, accompanied by the full swell of the Temple-music, the sound of which, say the Rabbins, could be heard as far as Jericho (Mishna, Tamid, iii. 8). It is possible that this may be alluded to in Rev. viii. 5. The priest then emptied the censer in a clean place, and hung it on one of the horns of the Altar of Burnt-offering.

On the Day of Atouement the service was different. The high-priest, after sacrificing the bullock as a sin-offering for himself and his family, took incense in his left hand and a golden shovel filled with live coals from the west side of the brazen Altar (Jarchi on Lev. xvi. 12) in his right, and went into the Holy of Holies. He then placed the shovel upon the Ark between the two bars. In the second Temple, where there was no Ark, a stone was substituted. Then sprinkling the incense upon the coals, he stayed till the house was filled with smoke, and walking slowly backwards came without the veil, where he prayed for a short time (Maimonides, Yom hakkippur, quoted by Ainsworth on Lev. xvi.; Outram, de Sacrificiis, i. 8, § 11).

The offering of incense has formed a part of the religious ceremonies of most ancient nations

(see the useful note in Knobel-Dillmann on Ex. xxx. 34). The Egyptians burnt resin in honour of the sun at its rising, myrrh when in its meridian, and a mixture called Kuphi at its setting (cp. Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 265). Plutarch (de Is. et Os. cc. 52, 80) describes Kuphi as a mixture of sixteen ingredients. "In the temple of Sirva incense is offered to the Lingam six times in twenty-four hours" (Roberta, Orient. Illus. p. 468). It was an element in the idolatrous worship of the Israelites (Jer. xi. 12, 17, xlviii. 35; 2 Ch. xxxiv. 25).

With regard to the symbolical meaning of incense, opinions have been many and widely differing. While Maimonides regarded it merely as a perfume designed to counteract the effluvia arising from the beasts which were slaughtered for the daily sacrifice, other interpreters have allowed their imaginations to run riot, and vied with the wildest speculations of the Midrashim. Philo (Quis rer. div. haer. sif. § 41, p. 501) conceives the stacte and onycha to be symbolical of water and earth; galbanum and frankincense of air and fire. Josephus, following the traditions of his time, believed that the ingredients of the incense were chosen from the products of the sea, the inhabited and the uninhabited parts of the earth, to indicate that all things are of God and for God (B. J. v. 5, § 5). As the Temple or Tabernacle was the palace of Jehovah, the theocratic King of Israel, and the Ark of the covenant His throne, so the incense, in the opinion of some, corresponded to the perfumes in which the luxurious monarchs of the East delighted. It may mean all this, but it must mean much more. Grotius, on Ex. xxx. 1, says the mystical signification is "sursum habenda corda." Cornelius à Lapide, on Ex. xxx. 34, considers it as an apt emblem of propitiation, and finds a symbolical meaning in the several ingredients. Fairbairn (Typology of Scripture, ii. 320), with many others, looks upon prayer as the reality of which incense is the symbol, founding his conclusion upon Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, 4. Bähr (Symb. d. Mos. Cult. vol. i, c. vi. § 4) opposes this view of the subject, on the ground that the chief thing in offering incense is not the producing of the smoke, which presses like prayer towards heaven, but the spreading of the fragrance. His own exposition may be summed up as follows. Prayer, among all Oriental nations, signifies calling upon the name of God. The oldest prayers consisted in the mere enumeration of the several titles of God. The Scripture places incense in close relationship to prayer, so that offering incense is synonymous with worship. Hence incense itself is a symbol of the name of God. The ingredients of the incense correspond severally to the perfections of God, though it is impossible to decide to which of the four names of God each belongs. Perhaps stacte corresponds to יהוה (Jehovah), onycha to יְהוֹיָדָם (Elōhīm), galbanum to חַי (chai), and frankincense to קָדוֹשׁ (qādōsh). Such is Bähr's exposition of the symbolism of incense, rather ingenious than logical. Looking upon incense in connexion with the other ceremonial observances of the Mosaic ritual, it would rather seem to be symbolical, not of prayer itself, but of that which makes prayer acceptable, the intercession of Christ. In Rev. viii. 3, 4, the incense is spoken of as something distinct from, though offered with, the prayers of all the saints (cp. Luke i. 10); and in Rev. v. 8 it is the golden vials, and not the odours or incense, which are said to be the prayers of saints. Ps. cxli. 2, at first sight, appears to militate against this conclusion; but if it be argued from this passage that incense is an emblem of prayer, it must also be allowed that the evening sacrifice has the same symbolical meaning. INDIA (Ἰνδία, i.e. Hōddū; ἡ Ἰνδική; India). The name of India does not occur in the Bible before the Book of Esther, where it is noticed as the limit of the territories of Ahasuerus in the east, as Ethiopia was in the west (i. 1; viii. 9); the names are similarly connected by Herodotus (vii. 9). The Hebrew form "Hōddū" is an abbreviation of Hōndū, which is identical with the indigenous names of the river Indus, "Hindu" or "Sindhu," and again with the ancient name of the country as it appears in the Vendidad, "Hapta Hendu" (see *M.V.*¹). The native form "Sindus" is noticed by Pliny (vi. 23). The India of the Book of Esther is not the peninsula of Hindostan, but the country surrounding the Indus—the Panjāb, and perhaps Scinde—the India which Herodotus describes (iii. 98) as forming part of the Persian empire under Darius, and the India which at a later period was conquered by Alexander the Great. The name occurs in the inscriptions of Persepolis and Naksh-i-Rustam, but not in those of Behistūn (Rawlinson, Herod. ii. 485). In 1 Macc. viii. 8 India is reckoned among the countries which Eumenes, king of Pergamus, received out of the former possessions of Antiochus the Great. It is clear that India proper cannot be understood, inasmuch as this never belonged either to Antiochus or Eumenes. Rawlinson (Speaker's Comm. in loco) and Zückler (Kögl. Komm. in loco) consider the expression a mistake due to the ignorance of the writer or historically incorrect. Other explanations offered are not satisfactory: the Eneti of Paphlagonia have been suggested, but these people had disappeared long before (Strab. xii. 534): the India of Xenophon (Cyrop. i. 5, § 3; iii. 2, § 25), which may have been above the Carian stream named Indus (Plin. v. 29, probably the Calbis), is more likely; and the emendation "Mysia and Ionia" for Media and India is but a guess. [IONIA.] A more authentic notice of the country occurs in 1 Macc. vi. 37, where Indians are noticed as the drivers of the war-elephants introduced into the army of the Syrian king (see also 1 Esd. iii. 2; Esth. xiii. 1, xvi. 1).

But though the name of India occurs so seldom, the people and productions of that country must have been tolerably well known to the Jews. There is undoubted evidence that an active trade was carried on between India and Western Asia: the Tyrians established their depôts on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and procured "horns of ivory and ebony," "brodered work and rich apparel" (Ezek. xxvi. 15, 24), by a route which crossed the Arabian desert by land, and then followed the coasts of the Indian Ocean by sea. The trade opened by Solomon with Ophir through the Red Sea chiefly consisted of Indian articles, and some of the names even of the articles—'alghummim, "sandal wood;" gōphim, "apes;" tukkiyim, "peacocks" (1 K. x. 22)—are of Tamul origin (Humboldt, Kosmos, ii. 133); to which we may add the Hebrew name of the "topaz," pitdāh, derived from the Sanscrit pita. There is a strong probability that productions of yet greater utility were furnished by India through Syria to the shores of Europe, and that the Greeks derived both the term κασσίτερος (cp. the Sanscrit kastira), and the article it represents, "tin," from the coasts of India, or of the Malayan Peninsula. (For many notices relating to trade routes between the E. and W., see Yule, Cathay and the Way thither.) The connexion thus established with India led to the opinion that the Indians were included under the ethnological title of Cush (Gen. x. 6), and hence the Syrian, Chaldean, and Arabic Versions frequently render that term by India or Indians, as in 2 Ch. xxi. 16; Is. xi. 11, xviii. 1; Jer. xiii. 23; Zeph. iii. 10. For the connexion which some have sought to establish between India and Paradise, see EDEN. [W. L. B.] [W.] INFIDEL. The word occurs in the A. V. of 2 Cor. vi. 15 and 1 Tim. v. 8. The R. V. replaces it in both cases by "unbeliever," a term which is more correct, and in the passage in 2 Cor. preserves the alliteration. [F.]

INHERITANCE. [HEIR.]

INK, INKHORN. [WRITING.]

INN (יָלֵד, mālōn; κατάλυμα, πανδοκείον). The Hebrew word thus rendered literally signifies "a lodging-place for the night."^a Inns, in our sense of the term, were, as they still are, unknown in the East, where hospitality is religiously practised. The khans, or caravanserais, are the representatives of European inns, and these were established but gradually. It is doubtful whether there is any allusion to them in the O. T. The halting-place of a caravan was selected originally on account of its proximity to water or pasture, by which the travellers pitched their tents and passed the night. Such was undoubtedly the "inn" (R. V. "lodging-place") at which occurred the incident in the life of Moses, narrated in Ex. iv. 24. It was probably one of the halting-places of the Ishmaelitic merchants who traded to Egypt with their camel-loads of spices. Moses was on his journey from the land of Midian, and the merchants in Gen. xxxvii. are called indiscriminately Ishmaelites and Midianites. At one of these stations, too, the first which they reached after leaving the city, and no doubt within a short distance from it, Joseph's brethren discovered that their money had been replaced in their wallets (Gen. xlii. 27).

Increased commercial intercourse, and in later times religious enthusiasm for pilgrimages,^b gave ^a In the language of the A. V. "to lodge" has the force of remaining for the night. The word יָלֵד is rendered in 1 K. xix. 9 "lodge;" in Gen. xix. 2 "tarry all night;" cp. also Jer. xiv. 8, &c.

^b The erection of hospitals in the Middle Ages was due to the same cause. Paula, the friend of Jerome, built several on the road to Bethlehem; and the Scotch and Irish residents in France erected hospitals for the rise to the establishment of more permanent accommodation for travellers. On the more frequented routes, remote from towns (Jer. ix. 2), caravanserais were in course of time erected, often at the expense of the wealthy. The following description of one of those on the road from Baghdad to Babylon will suffice for all:—"It is a large and substantial square building, in the distance resembling a fortress, being surrounded with a lofty wall, and flanked by round towers to defend the inmates in case of attack. Passing through a strong gateway, the guest enters a large court, the sides of which are divided into numerous arched compartments, open in front, for the accommodation of separate parties and for the reception of goods. In the centre is a spacious raised platform, used for sleeping upon at night, or for the devotions of the faithful during the day. Between the outer wall and the compartments are wide vaulted arcades, extending round the entire building, where the beasts of burden are placed. Upon the roof of the arcades is an excellent terrace, and over the gateway an elevated tower containing two rooms—one of which is open at the sides, permitting the occupants to enjoy every breath of air that passes across the heated plain. The terrace is tolerably clean; but the court and stabling below are ankle-deep in chopped straw and filth" (Loftus, Chaldea, p. 13). The great khans established by the Persian kings and great men, at intervals of about six miles on the roads from Baghdad to the sacred places, are provided with stables for the horses of the pilgrims. "Within these stables, on both sides, are other cells for travellers" (Layard, Nin. and Bab. p. 478, note). The "stall" or "manger," mentioned in Luke ii. 7, was probably in a stable of this kind (see Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, i. 184; Farrar, Life of Christ, p. 2 [pop. ed.]). Such khans are sometimes situated near running streams, or have a supply of water of some kind, but the traveller must carry all his provisions with him (Ouseley, Trav. in Persia, i. 261, note). At Damascus the khans are, many of them, substantial buildings; the small rooms which surround the court, as well as those above them which are entered from a gallery, are used by the merchants of the city for depositing their goods (Porter's Damascus, i. 33). The uekdehs of modern Egypt are of a similar description (Lane, Mod. Eg. ii. 10).

"The house of paths" (Prov. viii. 2, ἐν οἴκῳ διόδων, Vers. Ven.), where Wisdom took her stand, is understood by some to refer appropriately to a khan built where many ways met and frequented by many travellers. A similar meaning has been attached to כְּמִתָּהוּם, gerúth Kimhām, "the hostel of Chimhām" (Jer. xli. 17) beside Bethlehem, built by the liberality of the son of Barzillai for the benefit of those who were going down to Egypt (Stanley, S. & P. p. 163; App. § 90). The Targum says, "which David gave to Chimhām, son of Barzillai the Gileadite" (cp. 2 Sam. xix. 37, 38). With regard to this passage in Jer., the ancient Versions are strangely at variance. The LXX. (xlvi. 17) had evidently another reading with \beth and λ transposed, which they left untranslated, Τῆ γαβηρωχαυδα, A. γηβηρωθχαυδαμ, N. γηβανρωχαυδ. The Vulgate, if intended to be literal, must have read 'בְּכַן לְיָמֵי', peregrinantes in Chanaam. The Arabic, following the Alexandrian MS., read it ἐν γῆ Βηρωθχαυδαμ, "in the land of Berothchamaam." The Syriac has ܒܝܢܝܘܬܝܢ , b'edré, "in the threshing-floors," as if ܒܝܢܝܘܬܝܢ , begornóth. Josephus had a reading different from all, ܒܝܢܝܘܬܝܢ , begidróth, "in the folds of" Chimhām; for he says the fugitives went "to a certain place called Mandra" (Μάνδρα λεγόμενον, Ant. x. 9, § 5), and in this he was followed by Aquila and the Hexaplar Syriac.

The παδοκεῖον (Luke x. 34) probably differed from the κατάλυμα (Luke ii. 7) in having a "host" or "innkeeper" (παδοκεύς, Luke x. 35), who supplied some few of the necessary provisions, and attended to the wants of travellers left to his charge. The word has been adopted in the later Hebrew, and appears in the Mishna (Yebamoth, xvi. 7) under the form פּוֹנְדֵקִי, pündak, and the host is פּוֹנְדֵקִי, pündakí. The Jews were forbidden to put up their beasts at establishments of this kind kept by idolaters (Aboda Zara, ii. 1). It appears that houses of entertainment were sometimes, as in Egypt (Her. ii. 35), kept by women, whose character was such that their evidence was regarded with suspicion. In the Mishna (Yebamoth, xvi. 7) a tale is told of a company of Levites who were travelling to Zoar, the City of Palms, when one of them fell ill on the road and was left by his comrades at an inn, under the charge of the hostess (פּוֹנְדֵקִית, pündekíth = παδοκευρία). On their return to enquire for their friend, the hostess told them he was dead and buried, but they refused to believe her till she produced his staff, wallet, and roll of the Law. In Josh. ii. 1, זֹנָאָה, zónáh, the term applied to Rahab, is taken by Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 2) to mean an innkeeper, and it is rendered in the Targum of Jonathan יֹנְדֵקִיתָא, pündekíthā, a term both for the zónáh and "a woman who keeps an inn" (according to Dillmann³). So in Judg. xi. 1, of the mother of Jephthah; of Delilah (Judg. xvi. 1) and the two women who appealed to Solomon (1 K. iii. 16). The words, in the opinion of Kimchi on Josh. ii. 1, appear to have been synonymous.

In some parts of modern Syria a nearer approach has been made to the European system. In all villages not provided with a khan, the Sheikh's house (menzou) becomes the place of entertainment of all strangers who are not visiting at the house of friends. The stranger is supplied with provisions and fodder if required, which he pays for at the usual rates (see B. D., Amer. ed.). [W. A. W.] [F.]

INSTANT, INSTANTLY. A word employed by our translators in the N. T. with the force of urgency or earnestness, to render five distinct Greek words. We still say "at the instance of;" but as that sense is no longer attached to "instant"—though it is still to the verb "insist," and to other compounds of the same root, such as "persist," "constant"—it has been thought advisable to notice its occurrences. They afford an interesting example, if an additional one be needed, of the close connexion which there is between the Authorised Version and the Vulgate; the Vulgate having, as will be seen, suggested the word in three out of its five occurrences.

1. σπουδαίως — "they besought Him instantly" (Luke vii. 4). This word is elsewhere commonly rendered "earnestly," and is so rendered here by R. V.

2. ἐπέκειντο, from ἐπικέμαι, to lie upon:—"they were instant with loud voices" (Vulg. instabant), Luke xiii. 23. This might be rendered "they were pressing" (as in c. 1).

3. ἐν ἔκτελει, "instantly (R. V. 'earnestly') serving God" (Acts xxvi. 7). The metaphor at the root of this word is that of stretching—on the stretch. Elsewhere in the A. V. it is represented by "fervently."

4. προσκαρτεροῦντες, "continuing instant" (Rom. xii. 12); Vulg. instantes. Here the adjective is hardly necessary, the word being elsewhere rendered by "continuing," or, to preserve the rhythm of so familiar a sentence, "continuing stedfastly" (as Acts ii. 42), and so R. V. in Rom.

5. ἐπίστηθι, from ἐπιστάμαι, to stand by or upon—"be instant in season, out of season" (2 Tim. iv. 2); Vulg. insta. Four verses further on it is rendered "is at hand." The sense is "stand ready"—"be alert" for whatever may happen. Of the five words this is the only one which contains the same metaphor as "instant."

In Luke ii. 38, "that instant" is literally, as in R. V., "that very hour,"—αὐτῆ ᾗ ὥρᾳ.

[G.] [W.]

ΙΟΝΙΑ (Ἰωνία). The substitution of this word for ἡ Ἰωνία in 1 Macc. viii. 8 (E. V. "India") is a conjecture of Grotius without any authority of MSS. It must be acknowledged, however, that the change removes a great difficulty, especially if, as the same commentator suggests, Μυσία [MYRIA] be substituted for Μηδεία or Μηδία in the same context. The passage refers to the cession of territory which the Romans forced Antiochus the Great to make; and it is evident that India and Media are nothing to the purpose, whereas Ionia and Mysia were among the districts cis Taurum, which were given up to Eumenes.

As to the term Ionia, the name was given in early times to that part of the western coast of Asia Minor which lay between Aeolis on the north and Doris on the south. These were properly ethnological terms, and had reference to the tribes of Greek settlers along this shore. Ionia, with its islands, was celebrated for its twelve, afterwards thirteen, cities; five of which, Ephesus, Smyrna, Miletus, Chios, and Samos, are conspicuous in the N. T. In Roman times Ionia ceased to have any political significance, being absorbed in the province of Asia. The term, however, was still occasionally used, as in Joseph. Ant. xvi. 2, § 3, from which passage we learn that the Jews were numerous in this district. This whole chapter in Josephus is very interesting, as a geographical illustration of that part of the coast. [JAVAN.] [J. S. H.] [W.]

ΙΠΗΘΕΔΑΪΑΗ (Ἰπηθεδαία) = (whom) Jehovah frees; B. Ἰπεθεδαία, A. Ἰεφθαία; Jephthah, a descendant of Benjamin, one of the Beneshashak (1 Ch. viii. 25); specially named as a chief of the tribe, and as residing in Jerusalem (cp. v. 28).

IR (יר, ?) = city, town; B. Ἰράμ, A. ? Ἰράδ Hir, 1 Ch. vii. 12. [IRI.]

IRA (אִירָא = watchful; Ira). 1. (BA. Eiras.) "The Jairite," named in the catalogue of David's great officers (2 Sam. xx. 26) as "priest to David" (יְרִיאָה); and so in R. V.; A. V. "a chief ruler"). The Peshitto Version for "Jairite" has "from Jathir," i.e. probably JATTIR, where David had found friends during his troubles with Saul. [JAIRITE.] If this can be maintained, and it certainly has an air of probability, then this Ira is identical with

2. (In Sam. BA. Eiras; in Ch. B. Ἰράδ, A. —as, N. Id.) "Ira the Ithrite" (as in R. V., יְרִיתִירָא; A. V. omits the article), that is, the Jattirite, one of the heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Ch. xi. 40). [ITHRITE; JATTIR; JETHER.]

3. (In Sam. BA. Eiras; in 1 Ch. xi. BNA. Ἰραδ, in 1 Ch. xxvii. B. Ἰραδ, A. Eira; Hira.) Another member of David's guard, a Tekoite, son of Ikesh (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Ch. xi. 28). Ira was leader of the sixth monthly course of 24,000, as appointed by David (1 Ch. xxvii. 9).

IRAD (יִרְאָד, ?) = swift [see MV.¹¹]; Γαυδῶδ in both MSS.; Joseph. Ἰραδῆης; Syr. Idar; Irad, son of Enoch; grandson of Cain, and father of Mehujael (Gen. iv. 18).

IRAM (אִירָם; A. Zafwel, DE. Zafwel in Gen. 1. c.; but B. Zafwel, A. Ἡράμ in Ch. 1. c.; Hiram), an Edomite "duke," or rather emir or tribal prince (Gen. xxvi. 43; 1 Ch. i. 54). The list of eleven (originally doubtless twelve) tribal princes of Esau in Gen. xxxvi. 40–43, a section assigned to P, is expressly stated to give the names "according to their clans," and "their places" or "seats." Thus Iram, for instance, is the designation at once of the emir, of his clan or tribe, and of their territory in the land of Edom.

The name of Iram, as the present writer believes, is identical with that of the king of Edom, who paid tribute to Sennacherib, and whom he calls Ai-ram-mu māt U-du-um-ma-ai, "Airam the Edomite" (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 54). See Bab. and Or. Record, 1889, p. 55. [C. J. B.]

IR-HA-HE'RES (עִיר הַחֶרֶס, עִיר הַחֶרֶס; אִירַס אֶסְעֶאָס; Civitas Solis), an appellation or name of a city in Egypt (Is. xix. 18). The reading עִיר הַחֶרֶס, "City of destruction," has the weight of manuscript authority; the reading עִיר הַחֶרֶס, "City of the Sun," is not without manuscript support besides that of the Vulgate and Talmud. [The LXX., in fact, supports it; for its reading ἀεσάατ is only an inversion of הַחֶרֶס, which the translator read הַחֶרֶס (for ח = κ, cp. פסח, φασάκ.)]

The prophecy in which Ir-ha-heres is mentioned is the close of "the burden of Egypt," or is a separate prediction; the separate part or new prophecy being contained in vv. 16 or 18-25. It has even been held to be of the Maccabaean period, in consequence of the supposed reference to the temple of Onias. This view requires the assumption that in this period there was a reasonable prospect of the religious harmony of Israel, Egypt, and Syria, by which we are to understand the Assyria of the prophecy. The party of Onias may have had some hopes of proselytism in Egypt, but there is not a trace of any such idea as to Syria. The prediction is clearly Messianic, and did not receive its fulfilment in a Jewish sense. The critical questions that have arisen being however due to the building of the temple of Onias, the history of that event must be noticed in brief. During the Syrian oppression, a certain Onias, of the stock of the high-priests, fled to Egypt. He had been prevented from holding the high-priesthood by Antiochus Epiphanes, and Ptolemy Philometor kindly received him, and granted him permission to build a temple for the Egyptian Jews at a place in the east of the Delta. No doubt a large emigration had taken place in B.C. 170 and for a short time after, as the settlement of a colony and the consequent building of a temple must have preceded the cleansing and dedication of the Temple at Jerusalem by Judas Maccabaens in B.C. 165, and must certainly have followed its desecration in B.C. 168. The Jewish establishment in the west of the Delta was manifestly schismatic, and there is no trace of any relation with the powerful and learned community of Alexandria, which was always anxious that the central authority of Jerusalem should regard it as orthodox, in order that its freedom in philosophy might not be limited. Our knowledge of the colony of Onias is derived from Josephus, who evidently uses traditional material in the narrative of the foundation of the temple. Evidently it produced no literature: all that has survived has been discovered by Mr. Naville in the inscriptions in the necropolis of the city of Onias. Pending their publication, more cannot be ventured on than this, that the names seem rather Palestinian than Alexandrian, but that the use of πίστis and χάρις, both in the Alexandrian sense, point to the influence of the great Egyptian colony.

* As Ewald has pointed out, the Septuagint Zaphōr or Zaphon is not really the equivalent of Iram, but preserves the name of the missing twelfth chief and his clan, viz. זַפְחֹ (Heb. זַפְחֹ, cv. 11, 15), Iram being accidentally omitted.

According to the tradition reported by Josephus, Onias pointed to the prophecy of Isaiah as a prediction and justification of his project. Great use has been made of this in the criticism as to the origin of the different names of the city spoken of by the Prophet. According to Geiger, the LXX. retains the true reading, "righteousness," altered into "destruction" in disparagement, and again changed to "sun" by the Egyptian Jews. Cheyne remarks on this: "To me the Sept. reading looks more like a retort upon the Palestine Jews for expounding Ir-ha-heres in a manner uncomplimentary to Onias." He adds this bold remark: "Very possibly the Book of Isaiah was translated into Greek at Leontopolis" (The Prophecies of Isaiah, ii. 4th ed. p. 152). It must be remarked that we have no evidence of literary activity in this colony, and that it is impossible that the same translator should have rendered the same Hebrew appellation by πόλις δικαιοσύνης of Jerusalem in i. 26, and by πόλις ἀσεδέκ of the Egyptian city in xix. 18, when he had changed the text to introduce the epithet he thus left untranslated. It is possible that the more liberal views which prevailed after the fall of the Jewish polity induced some editors to see a fulfilment of the prophecy in the settlement of the colony of Onias, and even in its temple: hence perhaps the alternative reading, supported by the nearness of the city of Onias to Heliopolis. I'RI (B. Ὀύρειδ, A. Ὀύρι; Jorus). 1 Esd. viii. 62. This name answers to URIAH in Esra (viii. 33).

IRI'JAH (יְרִיָּהוּ = Jehovah seeth; Σαροβία, A. Σαροβίδης; Jerias), son of Shelemiah, a "captain of the ward" (בַּעַל פֶּקֶדוֹת), who met Jeremiah in the gate of Jerusalem called the "gate of Benjamin," accused him of being about to desert to the Chaldeans, and led him back to the princes (Jer. xxxvii. 13, 14).

IR-NA'HASH (עִיר נָחַשׁ = serpent-city; πόλις Naās; Urbs Naas; R. V. marg., the city of Nahash), a name which, like many other names of places, occurs in the genealogical lists of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 12). Tehinnah Abi Ir-nahash—"father of Ir-nahash"—was one of the sons of Eshton, all of them being descendants of Chelub (v. 11). But it seems impossible to connect this special genealogy with the general genealogies of Judah, and it has the air of being a fragment of the records of some other family, related, of course, or it would not be here, but not the same. May not "Shuah, the brother of Chelub" (v. 11), be Shuah the Canaanite, by whose daughter Judah had his three eldest sons (Gen. xxxviii. 2, &c.), and these verses be a fragment of Canaanite record preserved amongst those of the great Israelite family, who then became so closely related to the Canaanites? True, the two Shuahs are written differently in Hebrew—שׁוּחַ and שׁוּחָה; but considering the early date of the one passage and the corrupt and incomplete state of the other, this is perhaps not irreconcilable.

No trace of the name of Ir-nahash attached to any site has been discovered. Jerome's interpretation (Qu. Hebr. ad loc.)—whether his own or a tradition, he does not say—is that Ir-nahash is Bethlehem, Nahash being another name for Jesse. Conder (Hbk. p. 415) suggests as a possible identification Deir Nakhkhaās, near Beit Jūrin. [NAHASH.] [G.] [W.]

IR-ON (יְרִחוֹן; B. Κερωέ, A. Ἰαριών; Jeron), one of the cities of Naphtali, named between En-hazor and Migdal-el (Josh. xix. 38); it is now Yārin (PEF. Mem. i. 258). [G.] [W.]

IRON (בַּרְזֶל, barzel; Ch. פְּרִיזָה, par's'la; σίδηρος), mentioned with brass as the earliest of known metals (Gen. iv. 22). As it is rarely found in its native state, but generally in combination with oxygen, the knowledge of the art of forging iron, which is attributed to Tubal Cain, argues an acquaintance with the difficulties which attend the smelting of this metal. Iron melts at a temperature of about 3000° Fahrenheit, and to produce this heat large furnaces supplied by a strong blast of air are necessary. But, however difficult it may be to imagine a knowledge of such appliances at so early a period, it is perfectly certain that the use of iron is of extreme antiquity, and that therefore some means of overcoming the obstacles in question must have been discovered. What the process may have been is left entirely to conjecture; a method is employed by the natives of India, extremely simple and of great antiquity, which, though rude, is very effective, and suggests the possibility of similar knowledge in an early age of civilization (Ure, Dict. Arts and Sciences, art. Steel). The smelting furnaces of Aethalia, described by Diodorus (v. 13), correspond roughly with the modern bloomeries, remains of which still exist in this country (Napier, Metalurgy of the Bible, p. 140). Malleable iron was in common use, but it is doubtful whether the ancients were acquainted with cast-iron. The allusions in the Bible supply the following facts:—

The natural wealth of the soil of Canaan is indicated by describing it as "a land whose stones are iron" i.e. iron-stones (Deut. viii. 9). By this Winer (RWB. art. Eisen), followed by modern critics (see Dillmann² in loco), understands the basalt which predominates in the Hauran. It was the material of which Og's bedstead (Deut. iii. 11) was made, and contains a large percentage of iron. Some consider that the expression is a poetical figure. Pliny (xxxvi. 11), who is quoted as an authority, says indeed, that basalt is "ferrei coloris atque duritie," but does not hint that iron was ever extracted from it. The Book of Job contains passages which indicate that iron was a metal well known. Of the manner of procuring it, we learn that "iron is taken from dust" (xxviii. 2). It does not follow from Job xix. 24, that it was used for a writing implement, though such may have been the case, any more than that adamant was employed for the same purpose (Jer. xvii. 1), or that shoes were shod with iron and brass (Deut. xxxiii. 25). Indeed, iron so frequently occurs in poetic figures, that it is difficult to discriminate between its literal and metaphorical sense. In such passages as the following, in which a "yoke of iron" (Deut. xviii. 48) denotes hard service; "a rod of iron" (Ps. ii. 9), a stern government; "a pillar of iron" (Jer. i. 18), a strong support; "and threshing instruments of iron" (Amos i. 3), the means of cruel oppression,—the hardness and heaviness (Ecclus. xxii. 15) of iron are so clearly the prominent ideas, that though it may have been used for the instruments in question, such usage is not of necessity indicated. The "furnace of iron" (Deut. iv. 28; 1 K. viii. 51) is a figure which vividly expresses hard bondage, as represented by the severe labour which attended the operation of smelting. Iron was used for chisels (Deut. xxvii. 5), or something of the kind; for axes (Deut. xix. 5; 2 K. vi. 5, 6; Is. x. 34; Hom. Il. iv. 485); for harrows and saws (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Ch. xx. 3); for nails (1 Ch. xxii. 3), and the fastenings of the Temple; for weapons of war (1 Sam. xvii. 7; Job ix. 24), and for war chariots (Josh. xvii. 16, 18; Judg. i. 19, iv. 3, 13). The latter were plated or studded with it. Its usage in defensive armour is implied in 2 Sam. xxiii. 7 (cp. Rev. ix. 9), and as a safeguard in peace it appears in fetters (Ps. cv. 18), prison-gates (Acts xii. 10), and bars of gates or doors (Ps. cvii. 16; Is. xlv. 2), as well as for surgical purposes (1 Tim. iv. 2). Sheet-iron was used for cooking utensils (Ezek. iv. 3^a; cp. Lev. vii. 9), and bars of hammered iron are mentioned in Job xl. 18, though here the LXX. perversely render σίδηρος χυτός, "cast-iron." That it was plentiful in the time of David appears from 1 Ch. xxii. 3. It was used by Solomon, according to Josephus, to clamp the large rocks with which he built up the Temple mount (Ant. xv. 11, § 3); and by Hezekiah's workmen to hew out the conduits of Gihon (Ecclus. xlviii. 17). Images were fastened in their niches in later times by iron brackets or clamps (Wisd. xiii. 15). Agricultural implements were early made of the same material. In the treaty made by Porsena was inserted a condition like that imposed on the Hebrews by the Philistines, that no iron should be used except for agricultural purposes (Plin. xxxiv. 39).

The market of Tyre was supplied with bright or polished iron by the merchants of Dan and Javan (Ezek. 'xxvii. 19). Some, as the LXX. and Vulg., render this "wrought iron:" so De Wette, "geschmiedetes Eisen." The Targum has "bars of iron," which would correspond with the stricturæ of Pliny (xxxiv. 41). But Kimchi (Lex. s. v.) expounds נִשְׁפָּן, 'ashôth, as "pure and polished" (= Span. acero, steel), in which he is supported by R. Sol. Parchon, and by Ben Zeb, who gives "glänzend" as the equivalent (cp. the Homeric αἰὼν σίδηρος, Il. vii. 475). If the Javan alluded to were Greece, and not, as Bochart (Phaleg, ii. 21) seems to think, some place in Arabia (so Orelli in loco, in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Komm. z. A. T.), there might be reference to the iron mines of Macedonia, spoken of in the decree of Aemilius Paulus (Liv. xlv. 29); but Bochart urges as a very strong argument in support of his theory that, at the time of Ezekiel's prophecy, the Syrians did not depend upon Greece for a supply of cassia and cinnamon, which are associated with iron in the merchandise of Dan and Javan, but that rather the contrary was the case. Pliny (xxxiv. 41) awards the palm to the iron of Serica, that of Parthia being next in excellence. The Chalybes of the Pontus were celebrated as workers in iron in very ancient times (Aesch. Prom. 733). They were identified by Strabo with the Chaldaei of his day (xii. 549), and the mines which they worked were in the mountains skirting the sea-coast. The produce of their labour is supposed to be alluded to in Jer. xv. 12, as being of superior quality. Iron mines are still in existence on the same coast, and the ore is found "in small nodular masses in a dark yellow clay which overlies a limestone rock" (Smith's Geog. Dict., art. Chalybes).

It was for a long time supposed that the Egyptians were ignorant of the use of iron, and that the allusions in the Pentateuch were anachronisms, as no traces of it have been found in their monuments; but in the sepulchres at ^a The passage of Ezekiel is illustrated by the screens behind which the archers stand in the representations of a siege on the Nimroud sculptures.

Thebes butchers are represented as sharpening their knives on a round bar of metal attached to their aprons, which from its blue colour is presumed to be steel. The steel weapons on the tomb of Rameses III. are also painted blue; those of bronze being red (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. 155 [1878]). One iron mine only has been discovered in Egypt, which was worked by the ancients. It is at Hammami between the Nile and the Red Sea; the iron found by Mr. Burton was in the form of specular and red ore (Id. iii. 246). That no articles of iron should have been found is easily accounted for by the fact that it is easily destroyed by exposure to the air and moisture. According to Pliny (xxxiv. 43), it was preserved by a coating of white lead, gypsum, and liquid pitch. Bitumen was probably employed for the same purpose (xxxv. 52). The Egyptians obtained their iron almost exclusively from Assyria Proper in the form of bricks or pigs (Layard, Nin. ii. 415). Specimens of Assyrian iron-work overlaid with bronze were discovered by Sir H. Layard, and are now in the British Museum (Nin. and Bab. p. 191). Iron weapons of various kinds were found at Nimroud, but fell to pieces on exposure to the air. Some portions of shields and arrow-heads (Id. pp. 194, 596) were rescued, and are now in England. A pick of the same metal (Id. p. 194) was also found, as well as part of a saw (p. 195), and the head of an axe (p. 357), and remains of scale-armour and helmets inlaid with copper (Nin. i. 340). It was used by the Etruscans for offensive weapons, as bronze for defensive armour. The Assyrians had daggers and arrow-heads of copper mixed with iron, and hardened with an alloy of tin (Layard, Nin. ii. 418). So in the days of Homer war-clubs were shod with iron (Il. vii. 141); arrows were tipped with it (Il. iv. 123); it was used for the axles of chariots (Il. v. 723), for fetters (Od. i. 204), for axes and bills (Il. iv. 485; Od. xxi. 3, 81). Adrastus (Il. vi. 48) and Ulysses (Od. xxi. 10) reckoned it among their treasures, the iron weapons being kept in a chest in the treasury with the gold and brass (Od. xxi. 61). In Od. i. 184, Mentès tells Telemachus that he is travelling from Taphos to Tamese to procure brass in exchange for iron, which Eustathius says was not obtained from the mines of the island, but was the produce of piratical excursions (Millin, Mineral. Hom. p. 115, 2nd ed.). Pliny (xxxiv. 40) mentions iron as used symbolically for a statue of Hercules at Thebes (cp. Dan. ii. 33, v. 4), and goblets of iron as among the offerings in the temple of Mars the Avenger, at Rome. Alyattes the Lydian dedicated to the oracle at Delphi a small goblet of iron, the workmanship of Glaucus of Chios, to whom the discovery of the art of soldering this metal is attributed (Her. i. 25). The goblet is described by Pausanias (x. 16). From the fact that such offerings were made to the temples, and that Achilles gave as a prize of contest a rudely-shaped mass of the same metal (Il. xxiii. 826), it has been argued that in early times iron was so little known as to be greatly esteemed for its rarity. That this was not the case in the time of Lycurgus is evident, and Homer attaches to it no epithet which would denote its preciousness (Millin, p. 106). There is reason to suppose that the discovery of brass preceded that of iron (Lucr. v. 1292), though little weight can be attached to the line of Hesiod often quoted as decisive on this point (Op. et Dies. 150). The Dactyli Idaei of Crete were supposed by the ancients to have the merit of being the first to discover the properties of iron (Plin. vii. 57; Diod. Sic. v. 64), as the Cyclopes were said to have invented the iron-smith's forge (Plin. vii. 57). According to the Arundelian Marbles, iron was known B.C. 1370, while Larcher (Chronol. d'Hérod. 570) assigns a still earlier date, B.C. 1537. Enough has been said to prove that the allusions to iron in the Pentateuch and other parts of the O. T. are not anachronisms.

There is considerable doubt whether the ancients were acquainted with cast-iron. The rendering given by the LXX. of Job xl. 18, as quoted above, seems to imply that some method nearly like that of casting was known, and is supported by a passage in Diodorus (v. 13). The inhabitants of Aethalia traded with pig-iron in masses like large sponges to Dicaearchia and other marts, where it was bought by the smiths and fashioned into various moulded forms (πλάσματα παντοδαπά).

In Eccles. xxxviii. 28, we have a picture of the interior of an iron-smith's (Is. xlv. 12) workshop. The smith, parched with the smoke and heat of the furnace, sits beside his anvil and contemplates the unwrought iron, his ears are deafened with the din of the heavy hammer, his eyes are fixed on his model, and he never sleeps till he has accomplished his task. [STEEL.] [W. A. W.]

IR-PE-EL (יְרֵפֵאֵל = Jehovah heals; Καφάρ, A. Ἰερφαήλ; Jarophel), one of the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 27), occurring in the list between Rekem and Taralah. No certain trace has yet been discovered of its situation, but Major Conder has suggested the village of Rāfāt, north of el-Jib, Gibeon (PEF. Mem. iii. 13, 154). It will be observed that the Ir in this name is radically different from that in the names Ir-nahash, Ir-shemesh, &c. [G.] [W.]

IR-SHE-MESH (שֵׁמֶשׁ יִרָא = city of the sun; B. πόλις Σαμμαίς, A. πόλις Σαμές; Hersemes, id est, Civitas Solis), a city of the Danites (Josh. xix. 41), probably identical with BETH-SHEMESH, Ain Shems, and, possibly, connected with MOUNT HERES (Judg. i. 35), the "mount of the sun." Beth-shemesh is probably the later form of the name. In other cases Beth appears to have been substituted for other older terms [see BAAL-MEON, &c.], such as Ir or Ar, a very ancient word. [G.] [W.]

I'RU (יְרֵא; B. Ἰρα, A. Ἰρα; Hir), the eldest son of the great Caleb son of Jephunneh (1 Ch. iv. 15.) The name is probably Ir, the vowel at the end being merely the conjunction "and," properly belonging to the following name.

ISAAC (יִצְחָק, or יִצְחָק; Ἰσαάκ; Isaac; "the Laughter," i.e. the Joyous or Happy One),

* Cp. the Syriac form ܝܨܚܩܐ. The corresponding Hebrew form occurs only in Amos vii. 9, 16; Jer. xxxiii. 26; Ps. cv. 9.

the son born to Abraham and Sarah in their old age, to be the "Heir of the Promises," to the exclusion of Hagar's son Ishmael (Gen. xv. 1-6; xviii. 9 sqq.; xxi. 12).

The Biblical recollections of Isaac are far less lively and copious than those of Abraham and of Jacob. The life is comprised in Gen. xxi.-xxxv. 29; but the greater part of these chapters is concerned less with Isaac's own fortunes than with those of his parents and progeny. The narratives relating to this patriarch are, as usual, of a composite character [GENESIS]; and though the hand of the compiler has pruned away some of the discrepancies between the various traditions, others have been suffered to survive in the ultimate form of the story. Let us first consider the reasons assigned or suggested for the name of Isaac, "the Laughter," or "he who laughs" (קִיץ), from קָצַץ, "to laugh". According to P (Gen. xvii. 17), "Abraham fell on his face and laughed," when he heard that a son was to be born to him; whence, as the story implies (v. 19), the child was to be called Isaac (Heb. יִצְחָק, qa. "Laughter." According to J (Gen. xviii. 12), Sarah laughed to herself when she overheard the promise to her husband, and then denied the fact through fear. According to E (Gen. xii. 6), Sarah exclaimed at the birth of her son: "Laughter (קִיץ) hath Elohim made for me" (= perhaps, "Elohim hath made me to laugh," as A. V.; or else, "Elohim hath caused laughter at me"; cp. the next clause, which Budde with some reason assigns to J, assuming that it originally followed v. 7: "whoever heareth of it will laugh at me," καταγελοῦσαί μου, LXX.). But presently E gives another glance at the meaning of the name. In v. 9, Sarah sees Ishmael קָצַץ, either "laughing" (Kautzsch) or "jesting" (xix. 14), or "playing" (add, "with Isaac her son," LXX. παίζοντα μετὰ Ἰσαὰκ τοῦ υἱοῦ ἑαυτῆς).

These divergences, which are characteristic enough of the Oriental indifference to verbal consistency of statement so long as picturesque allusions are secured, troubled the mind of St. Jerome in the fourth century, who argues manfully for the suggestion of P (Quaest. Heb. in Gen.), while Josephus in the first had affirmed that of J (Ant. i. 12, § 2).

It is doubtful whether Isaac, which does not occur as the name of any other individual in either Testament, although like Abraham, Jacob, David, and other great names of the heroic past, it was revived in the later period of Judaism, was originally a theophoric name, as Jacob appears to have been [JACOB]. No trace of a proper name formed by composition of the root קָצַץ with either El or Jah (Jehoh, or -jahu, -jah) is to be found. Not that such a combination of ideas would necessarily have been repugnant to the ancient Hebrew mind. Indeed an approach to it is seen in the words of Ps. ii. 4: יָצַחַק יְהוָה בַּשָּׁמַיִם יִשְׂכַּח, "He that sitteth in the heavens laugheth." Goldziher, who cites this line, supposes that Isaac was originally the smiling sun of myths and poetry (Myth. Heb. pp. 92 sqq., E. Tr.). The name, however, may very well have had an original mythical reference, and yet be that of a historical personage or people, or of a famous chief and his tribe. And it must be said that the learned Arabist's attempts to explain or claim as mythical features such very natural details as Isaac's marriage with Rebekah,^b his preference for Esau, his blindness in old age, are far from striking one as inevitable or convincing (op. cit. pp. 106 sqq.). In any case, little is gained in the way of insight into the Biblical narratives or illustration of their sources, by a precarious comparison of these old national and tribal designations* and reminiscences with the meagre and monotonous conceptions of solar mythology.

Other grounds have been alleged for recognising in the story of Isaac a sort of Euhemeristic treatment of primitive legends about the gods and heroes, and thus resolving the Hebrew patriarch into a metamorphosed deity. An original identity has been assumed of the Biblical relation of the sacrifice of Isaac with a somewhat apocryphal Phoenician counterpart. The legend of "El offering his only son Jeud upon the mountains of Canaan" (Sayce; cp. Selden, de dis Syris, Syntagma i. 97) has been supposed to supply the primitive basis of the narrative which in Gen. xxii. has been brought down from the world of gods to that of men. The Phoenician legend is given by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. iv. 16; i. 10) as an extract from Sanchoniathon; and without committing ourselves to the questionable assertion that it is only "a singular and inaccurate version of the offering of Isaac," we may at least mention that the work of Sanchoniathon was a late forgery by Philo of Byblus (see Von Gutschmid, Encyc. Brit. art. Phœnicia, Religion). The mere fact that a myth was current in Byblus, to the effect that the divine founder of the town was the first to sacrifice "an only son or a virgin daughter to the supreme god," does not seem to carry us far on the road to a positive identification of the much older narrative in Genesis with a local Phoenician legend obviously intended to lend a religious sanction to child-sacrifice. The moral of the Hebrew story is the exact contrary (vid. infr.).

Prof. Robertson Smith thinks there is a sacrificial air about the scene in which Jacob approaches his father with the dish of young goats' flesh in order to win his blessing. In particular, the wearing of the skins of the slaughtered kids recalls a similar feature of heathen ritual. The Assyrian Dagon-worshipper offered the mystic fish-sacrifice to the Fish-god draped in a fish-skin, and the Cypriotes wore sheep-skins when offering a sheep to the ^b Explained as the marriage of the Sun with "the fruitful, rich earth," after C. P. Tiele.

* Isaac appears as a national designation in Amos, who calls the people of the northern kingdom "House of Isaac," and their sanctuaries "the high places of Isaac" (Amos vii. 9, 16). Isolated as these expressions are, they are important as implying a nomenclature which may have been familiar in the days of Amos (8th cent. B.C.). The passages Amos v. 5, viii. 14, indicate a reference to Bethel, Gilgal, Samaria, Dan, as well as Beersheba, in the latter phrase.

That Isaac was something more than a private individual is evident from his alliance on equal terms with the king of Gerar. It is remarkable that, save in the single passage Jer. xxxiii. 26, Isaac is not named again in the whole volume of the Prophets.

Sheep-goddess. According to Philo Byblius (Euseb. Praep. Evang. i. 10, 10), it was the god Usouï (that is, Esau, as Scaliger suggested) who first taught men to clothe themselves in the skins of beasts taken in hunting, and to pour out their blood sacrificially before sacred stones (Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, pp. 417, 448).⁴

If, however, we are to recognise in these traits of the story glimpses of some old myth about the Father of Israel and Edom, it must be admitted that neither of the two old Hebrew writers (J, E) whose accounts are so curiously interwoven in Gen. xvii., appears to have had any perception of the true significance of the story. It is, in fact, evident that their intention was to illustrate, as in the subsequent account of the shepherd tricks by which Jacob contrived to transfer to himself the ownership of Laban's flocks and herds, the supreme craft of Jacob's character, which on this occasion secured the blessing of a reluctant father. The broad fact of history which lay before these Israelite chroniclers was the former greatness (Gen. xxxvi.) and subsequent decline of Edom, Israel's elder brother; in other words, the transfer of Divine favour from the elder to the younger people: and what they have given us is apparently the traditional explanation of the fact current and popular in their day.

To return to the narrative: after Isaac's birth we are told of his weaning feast, and of the dismissal of Hagar and Ishmael at Sarah's bidding, sanctioned by Elohim on the ground that Isaac was to be the father of Abraham's true offspring (Gen. xxi. 8-12, E). At the time, Abraham was living at Beer-sheba (v. 33, J; cp. xxii. 19, E). Then follows immediately* what may be called the one distinctive event in the otherwise somewhat colourless life of Isaac; the sacrifice begun but not consummated on the unnamed mountain in "the land of Moriah" (xxii. 1-14, E; 15-18, J, perhaps expanded or recast by the compiler of JE; v. 19, E. So Driver, LOT.; see note infra). The beautiful narrative of the obedience of Abraham, the childlike submission of Isaac, the sudden arrest of the bloody rite at the moment of execution by the Angel of Jahvah, and the substitution of a ram for the human victim, has naturally been a favourite with Christian writers of all ages, many of whom have seen in Isaac a type of our Lord (for the Apostolic use of the incident, see Heb. xi. 17-19). Here, it seems necessary to ask what the narrative signified to the original narrator; a question on which there is, happily, little or no difference of opinion among scholars. The intervention of JAHVAH at the crisis of Isaac's fate (xxii. 11), whereas Elohim who had instigated the sacrifice is alone mentioned up to that point (vv. 1, 3, 8, 9), can hardly be accidental. It is, in fact, quite clear that the intention is to reveal Jahvah, the God of Israel, as opposed to the dreadful rites of human sacrifice which were commonly rendered to the elohim of Canaan, and which the bené Israel were from time to time tempted to copy. With this agrees the memorial name which Abraham gives to the high place, Jahvah-jir'eh (in contrast with, e.g., El-elohé-Israelael, xxxiii. 20), which is evidently the author's resolution of Moriah (Mori-jah = Mor'i-Jah, as if, "Provided of Jah").⁵

* Josephus, probably from a Haggadic source, says that Isaac was twenty-five years old at this time (Ant. . 13, § 2).

It was, perhaps, hardly possible in the writer's time to represent the conflict of religious ideas in any more direct way. The impulse to sacrifice children was not a thing of mere antiquarian speculation even in the time of the literary prophets and the later monarchy (Mic. vi. 7; 2 K. iii. 27, xvi. 3, xvii. 17, xviii. 10; cp. Lev. xviii. 21; Judg. xi. 31, 39). And if in some perilous

Kautzsch and Socin think the מריה is due to R (either of JE or of P), ascribing the etymology in v. 14 to R, and vv. 14-18 to the same hand. But the explanation מריה=מוריה is quite in the manner of J; in fact, if מריה will be omitted, a characteristic feature of the narrative will be eliminated, and the point of the allusions (v. 8) "God will provide him the lamb" (וַיִּרְאֶה לְיִצְחָק) (v. 14) "Abraham called the name of that place Jahvah-jir'eh," will be quite lost. It would seem, therefore, that Driver's analysis is preferable.

Perhaps the proverb current in the writer's day (v. 14) should rather be pointed בַּהֲרֵי יְהוָה יִרְאֶה; "the mountain Jahvah will provide;" "the mountain being a metaphorical designation of a difficulty which can only be overcome by Divine intervention (Zech. iv. 7; Matt. xxi. 21). Otherwise, keeping the traditional pointing of the verb as a reflexive, we might render, "In the mountain Jahvah is seen" (or, "leteth Himself be seen"), i.e. revealeth His Will, as in the matter of child-sacrifice on this occasion; as if Moriah meant "vision of Jah." So the LXX. has ἐν τῷ ὄρει κνισος ὠσθη.

Perhaps, however, the true sense of v. 14 is "which name is still given to (ל) (ב) the hill where Jahvah appeareth" (cp. 2 Ch. iii. 1); a gloss on the preceding words.

juncture of public affairs a zealot for the honour of Jahvah, in advocating such an extreme proof of devotion, could appeal to an oracle of Elohim, could cite some ancient law prescribing these dreadful rites,^a could even relate a tradition that in the remote past the great father of Israel had been moved to offer his only son for a burnt-offering at a well-known high place, and had only been stayed from his purpose by the direct interposition of the satisfied Deity; a more enlightened teacher, putting a different construction on the facts, might affirm that this very tradition proved that the God of Israel, the Merciful and Compassionate, had by that intervention once for all dispensed his people from such an inhuman obligation, and, as in the case of Abraham, would always accept the will for the deed.

It is difficult to read the narrative of Gen. xxii. without recalling a famous passage of the prophet Micah (vi. 1-8), which, although referring to another historical episode, may yet be held to include the present one in its outlook. As Abraham is directed by Elohim—that is to say, either by an oracle in His Name, or by an inward impulse—to offer his son “upon one of the mountains”; so Micah apostrophizes the mountains (vi. 1, 2), which were the scene of the popular sacrifices, calling upon them to hear an old prophetic declaration of the futility of that worship with its rites of blood. A ram is accepted in the stead of Isaac: but the Prophet affirms that no burnt offerings, whether of thousands of rams, or even of the first-born son, can avail to atone for sin. What Jahvah really requires of man is not these, but doing justice and loving mercy and walking humbly with God.

To resume the thread of the story of Isaac. Abraham “while he yet lives” dismisses the sons of his inferior wives, to settle in “the east country” at a distance from Isaac his heir. Isaac dwells by the well Lahai-roi, in the vicinity of Beersheba (Gen. xxv. 1-6, 11 b; J).^b Then, in his extreme age, Abraham sends his principal slave to Aram-Naharaim, to the city of Nachor, to take a wife for Isaac of his own Aramean kindred. The man successfully accomplishes his mission, and returns with Rebekah, or rather Ribkah, bath Bethuel ben Nachor. There is nothing in the whole idyllic story of the servant’s journey and its incidents and results, which can be fairly said to contradict the truth of Oriental ways and ideas, nor the facts of pious experience (ch. xxiv., J).^c

^a See Ex. xxii. 29, “The firstborn of thy sons shalt thou give unto Me,” and compare the excommunication of the ruthless demand of the older Law, Ex. xiii. 1. See also Kuenen, RI. i. 237-240; Geiger, Das Judenthum, i. 61; Goldzher, Myth. Hebr. pp. 45 sqq.

^b We assume, with Driver (cp. Wellhausen, and Kautzsch and Socin), that an accidental transposition has occurred in Gen. xxiv.-xxvi. The original order is thus restored: xxv. 1-6, 11 b; xxiv. (for xxiv. 36 presupposes xxv. 5); xxvi. 1-33; xxv. 21-26 a, 27-34, upon which xxvii. naturally follows.

^c The Heb. text at the close of the narrative has unfortunately suffered some degree of corruption (certainly in v. 62 a; cp. the LXX. and Sam.). Some critics, as Wellhausen, Kautzsch and Socin, suppose a gap at the end of v. 61, after the words, “and the servant took Rebekah and went” It is suggested that R

We pass on to the story of the famine and Isaac’s sojourn in Gerar (xxvi. 1-33, mostly J).^x The statement of v. 2 that Jahvah appeared unto Isaac may best be understood of a dream or “vision of the night” (cp. v. 24). In Gerar Isaac imitates the timid ruse which his father is said to have practised on two similar occasions, once in Egypt (Gen. xii.) and again in Gerar (Gen. xx.), and evasively declares that Rebekah is his “sister.” He is found out by Abimelech the king of Gerar, who rebukes him for the deceit, and then charges his people not to molest him. It is needless to attempt to palliate Isaac’s conduct, which does not seem to have greatly shocked the old narrators of Genesis (E and J). We will only observe that it would be a moral and theological anachronism to assume in the case of Isaac or of Abraham that strict sense of the obligation of veracity which belongs to a far more advanced stage of religious culture. Indeed, there are many indications that throughout the O. T. period verbal deceit was not looked upon with any high degree of reprobation (e.g. Josh. ii. 4, sqq.; Judg. iv. 18, v. 24; 1 Sam. xvi. 2, xx. 5, 6, 28; Jer. xxxviii. 26, 27).

The truth of the incident itself has been doubted, because of the similarity of the three narratives (Gen. xii., xx., xxvi.). Kuenen, however, asks, “Why should there be no historical fact at the foundation of the threefold tradition of the violation [sic] of Abraham’s or Isaac’s wife?” (RI. i. 113). And Ewald, who considers that the narrative “as it stands in Gen. xx. is Canaanitish and primeval” (HI. i. 293, Eng. Tr.), sees nothing unsuited to the times in the story; though he holds that Gen. xii. is merely a modification of the passage in Gen. xx., and Gen. xxvi. 7-11 “an application by others of the same story to Rebekah also.” Wellhausen remarks: “The stories about Abraham and those about Isaac are so similar that they cannot possibly be held to be independent of each other. The stories about Isaac, however, are more original, as may be seen in a striking way on comparing Gen. xx. 2-16 with xxvi. 6-12. The short and profane (?) version, of which Isaac is the hero, is more lively and pointed; the long and edifying version in which Abraham replaces Isaac, makes the danger not possible but actual, thus necessitating the intervention of the Deity and so bringing about a glorification of the patriarch, which he little deserved” (HI. p. 320, n. 1). To us, this contrast of E with J appears to be somewhat subjective.

omitted J’s account of the death of Abraham, because he wished to insert P’s account of the same event a little further on in the narrative (xxv. 7-11a, P). The obscure term לָמַח (v. 63) is rendered “to lament,” i.e. for his father’s death (correcting לָמַח, “his father,” for לָמַח, “his mother,” in v. 67); a sense which it may bear (cp. Job vii. 11, Ps. lv. 17), and which appears, upon the whole, preferable (Ewald, Knobel, Dillmann) to the “meditate” of LXX., Vulgate, and A. V.

^x Ascribed to J, with a few insertions by R; e.g. the Redactor has added a note to v. 1, to the effect that this famine was not the same as the one which happened in Abraham’s time: see xii. 10 sqq. The preliminary Divine Promise to Isaac, xxvi. 3 b-5, would also appear to have been “expanded or recast” by the same hand.

The Divine care of Isaac is certainly implied in the second narrative (xxvi. 12; cp. vv. 2a, 3a, 10), and it is difficult to see the relevance of the epithet "profane," or that the one account is more lively and pointed than the other. Why, moreover, may not the same or a similar tradition have been preserved about the behaviour of both patriarchs under similar or identical circumstances?¹ The narrative further tells of Isaac's sowing and reaping in the land of Gerar, and growing so rich in flocks and herds and slaves as to stir the envy of the Philistines. The statements (vv. 15, 18) that they had stopped up the wells dug by Abraham, and that Isaac dug these wells again, and gave them the names that his father had given them, are thought to have been added by R, for the sake of harmony with the previous account of Abraham's digging the wells (xxi. 25 sqq. See Driver, LOT; Kautzsch and Socin, ad loc.). The ill-feeling culminates in Abimelech's request that Isaac would depart; and Isaac removes his camp to a distance. His camping-grounds are marked by the successive digging of the wells Esek (Strife), Sitnah (Enmity), and Rehoboth (Room), which he so names because the men of Gerar quarrelled for possession of the former two, but not for the third. The patriarch finally removes to Beer-sheba. Jahvah appears to him "in that night" (the night of his arrival), and promises him numerous offspring for Abraham's sake. He builds an altar, pitches tent, and digs a well there. (Perhaps xxi. 33 originally belonged here.) Abimelech and his wazir Achuzzath and his general Pikol now pay him a visit, and make a treaty with him (against Egypt?). The same day Isaac's slaves tell him, "We have found water." Isaac names the new well Sheba (an allusion to the shebū'oth or oaths with which the treaty was ratified); whence the place gets its name, Beer-sheba (Gen. xxvi. 1 ac, 2a, 3a, 6-33; J). With this should be compared E's account of the origin of the name (xxi. 22-32).^m Upon the entire narrative (Gen. xxvi. 1; cp. xii. 10 sqq., xx., xxi. 22 sqq.) Riehm observes that it, for the most part, consists only of side-pieces to traditions about Abraham; showing "how the special relation into which God had entered with Abraham and his posterity manifested itself plainly in the life of Isaac, and how the promises were, in a measure, already fulfilled to him, so that even envious and quarrelsome neighbours recognised in him the blessed of Jehovah, and had to seek his alliance (cp. especially xxvi. 28 sq., as the beginning of the fulfilment of the promise given in xii. 2 sq., and appropriated to Isaac in xxvi. 4)."

There follows a brief mention of Isaac's inter-

^m Sheba, "seven," was perhaps the designation of a god, as in Babylonian (3 R 66, 12d). So Arba, "four," denoted a god, in the name Arba-ūu, Arbelā (cp. Kirjath-Arba); and "six" denoted Rimmon, "fifteen" Ishtar, and so on.

cession for his barren wife, and of the premonitory struggle of the twin babes within her; of the oracle about their future, and the circumstances of their birth (xxv. 21-26a, J). In the anecdote of Jacob's purchase of the birthright (vv. 27-34, J), the only reference to Isaac is the statement that he preferred the elder twin Esau, for venison was to his taste (v. 28). Then we have, in a graphic narrative, compounded from J and E, the account of Jacob's winning by fraud the blessing of Isaac (xxvii. 1-45), who was now old and blind with age, and whose death was expected in the near future (vv. 2, 10, 41). Because of Esau's anger, Rebekah, who had planned the deception, bids Jacob fly to her brother Laban at Charran, who, according to Oriental ideas, would be bound to give him an asylum.

From this point, the composite narrative of Genesis is mainly occupied with the fortunes of Jacob. In the older sections (J, E) the name of Isaac occurs only in such expressions as "the God of Isaac" (xviii. 13; cp. xxxii. 10; J), "the Dread" of Isaac" (xxi. 53; cp. v. 42; E). It would seem to have been taken for granted by the older accounts that Isaac had died during the long interval of Jacob's sojourn in Paddan-Aram; perhaps, indeed, soon after the Blessing of Jacob, which gives the impression of the closing scene of Isaac's life (cp. the parallel, ch. xlvi.). On the other hand, the narrative of P represents Isaac himself as sending Jacob to Paddan-Aram, through apprehension not of Esau's vengeance but of a Canaanitish marriage (xxviii. 1 sqq., P). This account appears to be wholly independent of JE's episode of the Blessing of Jacob in the previous chapter. The author knows nothing of the wiles by which Jacob secured it, to the indignation, one would have supposed, of Isaac, whose good intentions towards his favourite Esau were thus thwarted for ever. At this time, according to P, Isaac was a hundred years old (cp. xxvi. 34 sq. with xv. 26 b). According to the same source, when Jacob left Paddan-Aram, his purpose was "to go to Isaac his father in the land of Canaan" (xxxi. 18); and the life of Isaac is concluded in the following terms (xxv. 27-29): "And Jacob came unto Isaac his father, unto Mamre, unto Kirjath-Arba, which is Hebron, where Abraham and Isaac sojourned. And the days of Isaac were an hundred and fourscore years. And Isaac gave up the ghost, and died, and was gathered unto his fellow tribesmen, being old and full of days: and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him." Now, according to E (xxxi. 38, 41), Jacob had served Laban "full twenty years." Even after allowing a period of several years for the homeward journey of Jacob's by no means inconsiderable following, there is still a wide difference between the numbers of P and E. The former makes Isaac a hundred years old when Jacob goes to Paddan-Aram, and a hundred and eighty when he dies, immediately, as it would seem, after Jacob's return. Thus Jacob's absence covers some eighty years instead of the twenty of E. And further, the long period (whether of eighty or of twenty years) during which Isaac survives after Jacob's departure, though nothing is said of him or his doings throughout the entire interval, is hardly consistent with the indications of ch. xxvii., where Isaac in old age and blindness lies expecting his death (v. 2: "I know not the day of my death"), and desires, as was the custom, to give the last blessing to his elder son before he dies (v. 4: "that my soul may bless thee before I die"; cp. also vv. 7, 10, 41). Here again there is evident a conflict of tradition. Some have thought to get rid of the difficulty by the idea of Isaac's unexpected recovery from a dangerous illness. But his extreme age and blindness and general decrepitude, and the survival of his appetite for venison and wine (v. 25), are circumstances which do not seem to agree very well with such a view; while the entire absence of any statement either of his having fallen sick, or of his recovery, or of the incidents of his renewed existence during the twenty (or eighty) years that followed, is decidedly against it. Eighty, or, for that matter, twenty years, is a long time even in a comparatively uneventful life; and must surely have been marked by some incidents as worthy of notice as those previously recorded of Isaac.* But it is perfectly evident that the traditions left us are only the stray relics of far more opulent treasures of ancient story.

If it is necessary to indicate the general impression left upon the mind by the figure of Isaac, so far as it is possible to realize his personality without drawing too much upon imagination or upon the expanding and harmonizing work of later ages, we may borrow Wellhausen's language so far as to say that he is a peace-loving shepherd, inclined to live quietly beside his tents, anxious to steer clear of strife and clamour, and to avoid appeals to force. He serves Jehovah in essentially the same way as his descendants in historical times; religion with him does not consist of sacrifice alone, but also of an upright conversation and trustful resignation to God's Providence (Hl. p. 320 sq.). As Riehm has observed, Isaac is "Jehovah's servant" (Ex. xxxii. 13; Deut. ix. 27), who stands continually under God's guidance, and follows it with willing faithfulness (xxvi. 2); who receives revelations and promises (xxvi. 24), whose prayers are answered (xxv. 21), and who remains the prophetic mouth-piece of the counsels of God, not only in the blessing which he utters knowingly and intentionally (xxvii. 39 sqq.), but also and even in that which he pronounces involuntarily (xxvii. 27 sqq.; cp. John xi. 51). He evinces a tender attachment, outlasting death, for the mother (xiv. 67, if the reading be sound) who had been so zealous for his rights and welfare (xxi. 10), and a pious memory of his father Abraham (xxvi. 18). He is an example of single wedlock, in marked contrast with his father and his sons (see Riehm, HWB.). The unconscious irony of the episode in which against his will he is made to execute the Divine Purpose by blessing his younger son, is remarkable. Like the story of Joseph, the narrative seems to enforce the moral of many another Oriental tale; the moral that human opposition is powerless to thwart the decrees of Heaven, and is, in fact, made use of to accomplish them.

The following remarks from the former edition of this work are valuable, as illustrating the various modes in which the religious thought of the past has laboured to find prophetic types and allegories in the incidents recorded of Isaac:—"The typical view of Isaac is barely referred to in the N. T.; but it is drawn out with minute particularity by Philo and those interpreters of Scripture who were influenced by Alexandrian philosophy. Thus in Philo, Isaac=laughter=the most exquisite enjoyment=the soother and cheerer of peace-loving souls, is foreshadowed in the facts that his father had attained 100 years (the perfect number) when he was born, and that he is specially designated as given to his parents by God. His birth from the mistress of Abraham's household symbolizes happiness proceeding from predominant wisdom. His attachment to one wife (Rebekah=perseverance) is contrasted with Abraham's multiplied connexions and with Jacob's toil-won wives, as showing the superiority of Isaac's heaven-born, self-sufficing wisdom, to the accumulated knowledge of Abraham and the painful experience of Jacob. In the intended sacrifice of Isaac Philo sees only a sign that laughter=rejoicing is the prerogative of God, and is a fit offering to Him, and that He gives back to obedient man as much happiness as is good for him. Clement of Rome (ch. 31), with characteristic soberness, merely refers to Isaac as an example of faith in God. In Tertullian he is a pattern of monogamy and a type of Christ bearing the cross. But Clement of Alexandria finds an allegorical meaning in the incidents which connect Abimelech with Isaac and Rebekah (Gen. xxvi. 8) as well as in the offering of Isaac. In this latter view he is followed by Origen, and by Augustine, and by Christian expositors generally. The most minute particulars of that transaction are invested with a spiritual meaning by such writers as Rabanus Maurus, in Gen. § iii. Abraham is made a type of the First Person in the blessed Trinity, Isaac of the Second; the two servants dismissed are the Jewish sects who did not attain to a perception of Christ in His humiliation; the ass bearing the wood is the Jewish nation, to whom were committed the oracles of God which they failed to understand; the three days are the Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Christian dispensations; the ram is Christ on the Cross; the thicket they who placed Him there. Modern English writers hold firmly the typical significance of the transaction, without extending it into such detail (see Pearson on the Creed, i. 243, 251, ed. 1843; Fairbairn's Typology, i. 332). A recent writer (A. Jukes, Types of Genesis), who has shown much ingenuity in attaching a spiritual meaning to the characters and incidents in the Book of Genesis, regards Isaac as representing the spirit of sonship, in a series in which Adam represents human nature, Cain the carnal mind, Abel the spiritual, Noah regeneration, Abraham the spirit of faith, Jacob the spirit of service, Joseph suffering or glory. With this series may be compared the view of Ewald (Gesch. i. 387-400), in which the whole patriarchal family is a prefigurative group, comprising twelve members with seven distinct modes of relation: 1. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are three fathers, respectively personifying active power, quiet enjoyment, success after struggles, distinguished from the rest as Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses among the heroes of the Iliad, or as the Trojan Anchises, Aeneas, and Ascanius, and mutually related as Romulus, Remus, and Numa; 2. Sarah, with Hagar, as mother and mistress of the household; 3. Isaac as child; 4. Isaac with Rebekah as the type of wedlock (cp. Alterthümer, p. 233); 5. Leah and Rachel the plurality of coequal wives; 6. Deborah as nurse (cp. Anna and Caieta, Aen. iv. 654, and vii. 1); 7. Eliezer as steward, whose office is compared to that of the messenger of the Olympic deities."—[W. T. B.]

* If Isaac lived to a hundred and eighty, he must, according to the chronological data of Genesis, have outlived the sale of Joseph by some twelve or thirteen years, and have survived pretty nearly if not quite to the time of his grandson's elevation in Egypt! As Riehm observes, the figures belong to different sources, and therefore must not be combined as if they belonged to one and the same account.

Upon a review of the whole account of Isaac preserved in Genesis, it is clear (i) that it supplies but a fragmentary and episodic narrative,—a mosaic composed of unequal pieces collected from independent sources; (ii) that the data of the various sources sometimes conflict with each other in a remarkable manner. The facts certainly suggest that, while fuller accounts relating to Isaac must have once been known to popular tradition,^p the historians of Israel only thought it to the purpose to give a few reminiscences by way of introduction to the life of Jacob, their own special ancestor. Isaac was the father of Edom as well as of Israel: he represents a stage of national development when the two brother stocks had not yet separated into distinct and rival peoples. Perhaps, therefore, if the lost "wisdom" of Edom had survived, we might have been able to fill up the blanks in the Biblical story of the common Father of the two nations. That wisdom can hardly have been entirely of the gnomic order; nor is it likely that it was exhibited only in the concerns of statecraft. The kingdom of Edom doubtless had its patriotic poets and annalists, as had the younger kingdom of Israel (Gen. xxxvi. 31-39; Jer. xlix. 7; Obad. v. 8; Job iv. 1).

^p Ewald thinks not; on the ground that "if Isaac was in truth what his name—the Laughing, that is the kind and gentle—implies; if he, among the three Patriarchs, passed pre-eminently for the type of that kindly and quiet nature which preserves the possession of its inherited share of worldly goods through unpretending goodness and constant fidelity, the old legends could hardly have anything very remarkable or varied to relate of him. As rightful son and heir, he had no need by great deeds or great qualities to win for himself what was already his" (III. i. 339). But, we may ask, whence then the long relations of the sacrifice, and of the servant's journey to Charran to woo a wife for Isaac? And whence the metrical oracle to Rebekah concerning her unborn babes? These things certainly resemble extracts from older and fuller traditional histories. The casual mention of Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, who dies in Jacob's camp (xxxv. 8, E), and whose memory is perpetuated by the Allén-bákith near Bethel, points in the same direction. How came she to be in Jacob's company? and why is she mentioned at all, unless more were once known and told about her?

As Isaac represents the stage before the parting of the two peoples, it seems worthy of note that the narratives of Genesis place the patriarch exactly where this fact would lead us to look for him. Isaac dwells not in the north nor in middle Palestine, but always in the Negeb or south country; a dry parched region in which a few oases and wells made life possible for a pastoral chief and his tribe. From the neighbourhood of the well Lahai-rot he moves westward to Gerar; then follows the course of the Wady in a south-eastern direction; then proceeds to Rehoboth, and thence NE. to BEERSHEBA, whose ancient sanctuary is the only one which tradition ascribed to his special foundation (xxv. 11 b; xxvi. 1, 6, 17, 22-25; xxiv. 62, cp. xxi. 33; J). There are, moreover, certain indications of an advance from the purely pastoral and nomadic stage of life. Isaac is not, indeed, represented as permanently settled in any one of his southern haunts; but he practises husbandry with profit where occasion serves (xxvi. 12), and he is a wine-drinker (xxvii. 25, with which contrast the milk, curdled and sweet, of xviii. 8), and used to daintier fare than is customary with the mere wandering shepherd (xxvii. 3; 4, 9, 14).

[C. J. B.]

ISAIAH. The name Isaiah (יִשְׁעִיָּהוּ) signifies either Jahu saves (יָצַו, kal, for hiph'il, as in יִשְׁעִיָּהוּ הוֹשִׁיעַ, &c.), or יִשְׁעִיָּהוּ יוֹשֵׁב, σωτηρία Κυρίου. the salvation or help of Jahveh. A reference to the meaning of the name is probably found in Is. viii. 18. The name itself was common (1 Ch. xxv. 3, 15; xxvi. 25). The shortened form, יִשְׁעִיָּה, is employed in 1 Ch. iii. 21; Ezra viii. 7, 19; Neh. xi. 7. In the latter passages the R. V. gives the name Jeshaiah. The LXX. usually transliterate it 'Hofafas, occasionally also 'Iofas, 'Iofas, 'Iofas, 'Iofas, 'Iofas, 'Iofas. The Vulg. write Isaias, or in various editions Esaias, and Osaias. According to Klostermann, the analogies of such names as Jazaniah (יִזְנְיָהוּ), Ishmael, and Ishmaiah, Jahziel (יִחְזִיָּהוּ) and Jahzeiah (יִחְזִיָּהוּ), with others, which names are prayers for children so named, point rather to a derivation from יִשְׁעִיָּה, to behold, to have respect to (Gen. iv. 4). In that case the name should be pointed יִשְׁעִיָּהוּ יוֹשֵׁב, or shortened יִשְׁעִיָּה. Isaiah corresponds in signification with יִשְׁעִיָּהוּ, Elisha, although the latter fact is no proof that it was compounded of יִשְׁעִיָּהוּ; the יִשְׁעִיָּה in Elisha being probably derived from יִשְׁעִיָּה or יִשְׁעִיָּה. Hence the traditional vocalisation is preferable.

Isaiah the prophet was son of Amoz (אֲמוֹז), which signifies strong. The latter is not to be identified with Amos (אֲמוֹס, burden-bearer), who lived much earlier. The LXX. transliterated both names 'Awas, and hence the confusion. Nothing is known of Isaiah's father. The Rabbis maintained that he was a prophet, on the assumption that whenever the name of a prophet's father occurs in Scripture, that father was also a prophet. The notion that Amoz and Amaziah (אֲמַצְיָהוּ) the king of Judah were brothers was suggested by the similarity of name, but is unsupported by any evidence.

Isaiah's house was situated in the lower part of Jerusalem (see 2 K. xx. 4, R. V.). Hence Ewald and Knobel supposed the name "valley of vision" was given to that quarter of the city, where probably other prophets also lived. It is, however, more likely the name refers to the "valley" in which the final struggle of ch. xxii. is depicted. נַחֲלֵי רְאִיּוֹן, "valley of vision," is analogous to the נַחֲלֵי הַחֲרִיבָה, "valley of decision" (Joel iv. 14), although the meaning of decision is not, with Bredenkamp, to be extracted from חֲרִיבָה.

The wife of Isaiah is termed a prophetess (viii. 3), although it is not clear whether she was so called merely because her husband was a prophet, or because she herself was endowed with the gift of prophecy, like Huldah (2 K. xxii. 14) and other women. Isaiah's two sons, who were regarded as gifts from God, were given names which contained a summary of Isaiah's mission. These were Shear-jashub, "a remnant shall return" (vii. 3), and Maher-shalal-hash-baz, "haste spoil, speed booty" (viii. 3). Some maintain that Isaiah had a third son, named Immanuel (vii. 14), the child of a second wife, in which case that son must have been born before Maher-shalal-hash-baz. But there are weighty reasons against that conjecture.

In i. 1 it is stated that Isaiah "saw" his visions concerning Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. An account is given in ch. vi. of the "vision" by which Isaiah was called to the prophetic office. The vision was "seen" "in the year that king Uzziah died." The year in question has been variously reckoned as B.C. 758 or 740, the latter being the more probable, for Isaiah was probably not an old man at the time of the invasion of Sennacherib (B.C. 701). As no mention is made of "the days of Manasseh," it has often been maintained that Isaiah died prior to the close of Hezekiah's reign. All, however, that can be affirmed from the superscription in Is. i. 1, assuming its correctness, is that the Book to which it was affixed contains no vision later than the reign of Hezekiah. The tradition concerning his death, referred to in the Talmud, and current in the Christian Church, is that he was slain during the bloody persecution in the early days of Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 16; xxiv. 4), having been "sawn asunder." Heb. xi. 37 probably refers to that tradition, for no other instance of such a death is recorded in legend.

The story of Isaiah's martyrdom has been highly embellished by later tradition. It was known to Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. 120), Tertullian (De patientia, 14), and other early Christian writers. The wooden saw (ἡ ξυλίνη) of Justin Martyr may be a legendary embellishment of a woodman's saw. The apocryphal work, The Ascension of Isaiah, which narrates the whole story, is, as Dillmann has satisfactorily proved, a pseudepigraph written in Christian times. The legend has been still further improved on in fragments of Targums (cp. that given in Lagarde's Proph. Chald., 1872, p. xxxiii.).

Chapter vi. is the only chapter of Isaiah which can with any degree of probability be assigned to the reign of Uzziah. The bulk of his prophecies in their present shape belong to Hezekiah's reign. Several were composed in the reign of Ahaz, notably chs. vii.-ix., and possibly chs. ii.-v. None of the prophecies contained in the Book bear the impress of Jotham's reign. It is, however, possible that several prophecies delivered in Jotham's reign may have been revised at a later time by the Prophet. Such re-edited prophecies would naturally bear the impress of the later, not that of the earlier, period.

In the Jewish canon the Books of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel are arranged in the order of historical sequence. The same order is followed in the LXX., save that the Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets is placed before the three great Prophets; the Books of Baruch, Lamentations, and the Epistle of Jeremiah being put between Jeremiah and Ezekiel in their supposed historical order. The historical arrangement is as old as the days of Ben Sira (see Eclus. xlviii. 22-25, xlix. 6-10). Another order is mentioned in Baba Bathra, 14 a; namely, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, and the Minor Prophets. But, as Klostermann has pointed out, the latter arrangement is simply based on the principle of placing the longer Books before the shorter. Isaiah exceeds Jeremiah in the number of chapters (having 66 chapters in place of the 52 of the latter), although, if the number of the verses or pages be considered, the Book of Jeremiah exceeds Isaiah. Jeremiah (exclusive of Lamentations) contains 1365 verses, Isaiah 1295, Ezekiel 1273, and the Book of the Twelve 1050. Thus calculated, Isaiah stands second. If, however, the actual size of the first three Books be computed by pages, Isaiah ranks third, and the list would stand in the order given in Baba Bathra. The number of the Sedarim, into which the Books are divided in the Hebrew, corresponds with the result drawn from pagination. Jeremiah contains 31 Sedarim, Ezekiel 29, Isaiah 26, and the Book of the Twelve 21. Hence the order of Baba Bathra is that of length or size. Other more artificial reasons have, however, been assigned. The passage of Baba Bathra will be found translated and commented on in the Excursus on The Talmud and the Old Test. Canon, appended to my commentary on the Book of Koheleth.

Lightfoot and others have unsuccessfully made use of the order in Baba Bathra to get over the difficulty connected with the quotation from Jeremiah in Matt. xxvii. 9. Equally mistaken are the attempts of Gesenius, &c., to construct thereon an argument for the post-exilic redaction of Isaiah.

Three portions of 2 Kings—namely, chs. xviii. 13, 17-37, xix., xx.—are quoted almost verbatim from Is. xxxvi.-xxxix. The psalm of Hezekiah is peculiar to the Book of Isaiah. Reference is made to Isaiah in 2 Ch. xxvi. 22 and xxxii. 32. In the former Isaiah is said to have written "the acts of Uzziah, first and last." The reading of that passage is uncertain (see LXX. and Vulg.). In 2 Ch. xxxii., "the vision of Isaiah, the son of Amoz the prophet," is evidently the Book of Isaiah's prophecies. The difficulty in the second part of that verse, connected with the reading וְנִי סֵפֶר עָלַי, does not affect the statement of the first part.

The superscription in Is. i. 1 presents serious difficulties. It does not adequately describe even the prophecies of the first portion (chs. i.-xxxv.). Those chapters contain not only prophecies "concerning Judah and Jerusalem," but prophecies also concerning Ephraim or Israel and the surrounding nations, with others of wider scope. Nor does the title suit even the first chapter (the second chapter has a title of its own); for the words "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah" prove that that superscription was designed to be the title of the entire Book. It cannot, therefore, be regarded in its present shape as genuine.

The opening chapter is well characterised by Ewald as "the great Arraignment." Heaven and earth are called upon to judge the cause between Jehovah and His people. The chapter vividly describes Israel's sin, and announces the Divine vengeance, which was however to lead to the purification of Israel and the transformation of Zion into a city of righteousness. The storm described had already burst forth. All Judah, with the exception of Jerusalem, was in the hands of the enemy. Hence the original composition of the chapter can scarcely (as Caspari and Kay suppose) be assigned to the times of Jotham and Uzziah when Judah was in a state of prosperity. At such a time the prophecy, even as a vision of coming judgment, would scarcely have been intelligible. According to Gesenius, Knobel, Delitzsch, and Dillmann, the vision was composed in the days of Ahaz, during the invasion of Judah by the united Syrian and Israelite army. Vitringa, Hitzig, Ewald, Nägelsbach, and Wellhausen preferably assign the chapter to the time of Hezekiah. It cannot have been composed after the invasion of Sennacherib. The chapter expresses only a general hope of deliverance, and contains no reference to the victorious overthrow of the Assyrians. Notwithstanding the arguments adduced by Cheyne, the prophecy cannot well be assigned to the time of Sargon's invasion, but must have been composed when the fenced cities of Judah had all successively fallen before the foe, and when the city of Jerusalem was the last remaining bulwark of the land.

We are therefore disposed, with Bredenkamp, to regard the prophecy as composed when Sennacherib, as stated in his own inscription, had shut up Hezekiah "as a bird in a cage at Jerusalem," and had even given part of Jewish territory to the kings of the Philistines. But, though originally composed at that period, there is no difficulty in regarding the chapter as placed in its present position by Isaiah himself as a suitable introduction to his collected prophecies. Alterations may have been made in its phraseology when thus re-edited. The picture is too vivid to be regarded as an ideal sketch painted in the prosperous days of Uzziah or Jotham. It is natural to suppose that Isaiah put forth a collection of his prophecies after the overthrow of the Assyrian foe, which was the grandest victory vouchsafed since the deliverance of Israel from Egyptian bondage. Isaiah's subsequent prophecies derive no small portion of their imagery from that wondrous manifestation of the "God of judgment" (Is. xxx. 18) in aid of His people. We are indisposed, therefore, to lay stress on every expression, or to argue on the assumption that the prophecies were necessarily preserved even by the Prophet himself in the exact form in which they were originally delivered.

In the historical notices of the Book of Kings no mention is made of the fenced cities of Judah having been burned with fire. Such an additional detail, however, presents no difficulty. The description in Is. i. of the deeds of murder and villainy practised by judges and nobles, and of the prevalent idolatry, has often been regarded as inconsistent with the composition of the piece in the reign of Hezekiah. But though generally suppressed, such malpractices may have even then been common, and Isaiah would naturally regard the Assyrian invasion as a judgment for such transgression, whether past or present. The public practice of idolatry in gardens and groves dedicated to Asherah was put an end to by Hezekiah. But idolatry must have been still practised in private, and have been popular with the nobility, if we are to account for the fearful outbreak which took place in the beginning of Manasseh's reign.

The second chapter of Isaiah has no connexion with ch. i. It commences with a superscription of its own, which was probably intended to include chs. ii.-iv. inclusive. The vision must have been originally composed at a period of prosperity. The land of Judah is described as full of silver and gold. Horses and chariots were in abundance everywhere. The daughters of Zion, proud and haughty, revelled in all kinds of luxury and display. Idolatry was rife among both rich and poor; magic and divination were largely practised. The nation still owned its "ships of Tarshish." Consequently Elath, the sea-port on the north end of the Gulf of Akaba which had been recovered by Uzziah (2 K. xiv. 22), had not then ceased to belong to the kingdom of Judah, as related in 2 K. xvi. 6. The reading in that passage is, however, to be corrected as in the margin of the R. V. The prophecy must therefore have been delivered in the early part of the reign of Ahaz, prior to the reverses which befel the nation in the latter years of that monarch. It cannot have been delivered during the reigns of Uzziah or Jotham, who discouraged idolatry; for the idolatry denounced was not idolatry practised in secret by the few, but idolatry common among the nation.

The opening verses of ch. ii., namely verses 2-4, are almost identical with Micah iv. 1-3. As Micah and Isaiah were contemporary Prophets, the phenomenon has been variously explained. Critics have maintained that Isaiah quoted from Micah, not only because the passage harmonizes better with the context of Micah, but also because of certain peculiarities of expression in the original which tend to show that it is a quotation. Micah's prophecy was, however, delivered in "the days of Hezekiah, king of Judah" (Jer. xxvi. 18; Micah iii. 12); and as Is. ii. cannot (from the reasons already set forth) have been composed later than the early part of the reign of Ahaz, Isaiah could not have quoted the passage from that special prophecy of Micah. Similar instances of quotations occur in other parts of Scripture (cp. Obad. vv. 5, 6 with Jer. xlix. 9, 10; 1 Pet. v. 5-9 with Jas. iv. 6-10; or 2 Pet. ii. with the Epistle of Jude). It is probable that the view defended by Cheyne and others is correct; namely, that Isaiah and Micah made use of the words of an earlier prophet, whose closing words (Micah iv. 4) were omitted by Isaiah as unsuited to the solemn denunciations he had to tack on to the quotation. If, as Bredekamp observes, ch. i. begins with what may be regarded almost as a quotation from Moses (cp. i. 2 with Deut. xxxii. 1), why should not ch. ii. similarly commence with a prediction of one of the older prophets?

No objection can be made to Cheyne's translation, "the mountain of Jehovah's house shall be fixed at the head of the mountains," so far as the rendering of the preposition in בְּרֹאשׁ הַר is concerned (cp. 1 Sam. ix. 22; Amos vi. 7). But that translation presents too realistic a picture, and suggests an allusion to heathen mythology which is wholly unnecessary. The picture, like those in v. 26, xi. 10, is purely poetical. The Prophets Isaiah, Ezekiel, and Zechariah use language in their ideal descriptions of the future, which, if taken literally, would predict the actual elevation of the temple mountain above all the other mountains. Such language, however, was only used figuratively.

The future predicted by Isaiah and Micah as a future which must have appeared to "the men of the world" at that time as the veriest day-dream. It was that "a law would go forth from Zion, and the word of Jehovah from Jerusalem;" that Israel and the Nations would ultimately form one united community, of which Jehovah would be the Judge and King; that under His rule and arbitration wars would ultimately cease, and universal peace prevail. The marvellous fulfilment of the first portion of this prophecy in the salvation which has come from the Jews to the Gentile world needs here only to be referred to.

In his further discourse, the Prophet contrasts the fallen state of Israel with its glorious future, and urges the house of Jacob to walk themselves "in the light" vouchsafed to them by Jehovah. He describes how Israel had fallen short of the ideal presented in the Law. In place of being a hardy agricultural race, satisfied with the riches provided by nature, Israel had become "like all the nations" (1 Sam. viii. 20), and had followed them on the way to ruin. Luxury had overspread the land. Wealth produced love of display. Magic and divination were introduced from "the east." "The land was full of idols," to be seen alike in the houses of the poor and in the palaces of the rich. The wicked walked on every side, and vileness was exalted among the sons of men (Ps. xii. 8). Men, high and low, basely prostrated themselves before the works of their own hands, and thus dragged down upon themselves heavy chastisement. Jehovah would, therefore, arise to shake terribly the land. Nature and art, both alike made subservient to idolatry, would be given over to destruction. Lofty mountains would be abased, trees felled, high towers overthrown. Strong walls, ships of Tarshish, treasures of art, would all alike perish, levelled in the dust or otherwise destroyed, in the universal ruin brought about by "the day of Jehovah."

The ejaculation "Cease ye from man in whose nostrils is (only) a breath, for at what ought he to be accounted?" is suitably interposed between two portions of this prophecy. Whatever earthly riches or glory man may have, without God, apart from God, man is of no account. The verse is omitted in the LXX., and Diestel and Cheyne regard it as an interpolation, harmonizing badly with the description of the day of Jehovah. Dillmann, however, observes that there is no object for an interpolation in the passage, while the thought expressed in the verse is striking and fully worthy of Isaiah. Dillmann compares ii. 9, 11; v. 15; xxxi. 3.

The details of the judgment of "the day of Jehovah" are given in ch. iii. The commonwealth would be overthrown, every "stay and staff" broken. The leaders of the people in the field and in the council-chamber would be cut off. Among the latter the prophets and diviners are mentioned. Children become princes, babes bear rule. Anarchy and confusion follow, until any decently-attired man begged to act as ruler of the ruined land would be forced to decline the task, inasmuch as even such a person would be forced to confess that in spite of outward appearance, his house, too, would be found equally destitute of bread or clothing. For the abrupt manner in which the illustration is introduced, compare Zech. xiii. 3-6.

"The day of Jehovah" would affect not only men, but also women. Delicately brought-up women experience then in full measure the descent of Jehovah's retributive justice. Their pride and haughtiness are abased to the dust, their ornaments stripped off; their bodies afflicted with disease. As the men are described looking vainly about for a ruler, so the women are depicted as looking out eagerly for merely nominal husbands.

"The day of Jehovah" would thus be terrible to all. Yet, to use the expression of Zechariah, "in the eventide there would be light." Mercy would succeed judgment, a day of building up would follow a day of casting down. A remnant would be saved, who would trust in Jehovah, and not in carved images, who would return to the simplicity commended in the Law, and at last reap the blessing from above. The barren and devastated land would yield its increase, the hills and valleys be covered with beautiful shoots, "the fruit of the land be excellent and comely for the escaped of Israel." The old signs of Jehovah's Presence would be again vouchsafed. Guilt removed, sin washed away, there would be a new creation; the cloudy pillar by day and the shining of flaming fire by night would again be seen; and over all the glory an abiding canopy.

The exposition of "the branch of Jehovah" in iv. 2, as the personal Messiah, in accordance with the later usage of Jeremiah and Zechariah, cannot be proved to be the original signification of the prophecy. The parallel expression "the fruit of the land" shows that the passage in Isaiah really refers to vegetation. The human nature of our Lord is not pointed at under the expression "the fruit of the land," nor can that interpretation be justified by a reference to Ezek. xvii. 5. But though not in accordance with Isaiah's mode of thought, the use of similar phraseology in a metaphorical sense by the later prophets justifies such an allegorical accommodation of the passage, inasmuch as similar language is employed in Rev. xxii. 2.

The fifth chapter is an independent prophecy, unconnected, save in the expression of somewhat similar ideas, with those which precede or follow. The closing sentence of v. 25 is, however, employed afterwards as the refrain of a later prophecy (ix. 12, 21; x. 4, 12, 17, 21).

Chapter v. is a vision of judgment, in which no ray of promise appears. It opens with a striking parable in the form of a love-song. That song of unrequited love is succeeded by six woes pronounced against national sins. (1) Against covetous land-grabbers, vv. 8-10. (2) Against drunkards and revellers, vv. 11-17. The first two woes are described in detail. The great mansions built by avaricious land-owners will become a desolation; the curse of barrenness is to rest upon the ill-gotten fields. The revellers are to be carried off into captivity; starvation follows after gluttony; in place of a multitude of drunkards are seen crowds of persons parched with thirst. Sheol, or the Under-world, opens her mouth without measure for an ungodly people, and into its yawning abyss descend their splendour and multitude and joy. (3) The third woe is against ungodly scoffers, vv. 18, 19. (4) The fourth woe is pronounced on those who dare impiously to confound the distinction between good and evil, v. 20. (5) The fifth is directed against those who are wise in their own eyes, and whose "folly" becomes "evident unto all men" (see v. 21). (6) The sixth and last is directed against corrupt judges, and men of might whose strength was exhibited only in their ability to imbibe strong drink, and who shamelessly sold justice for bribes, vv. 22, 23. The fire of the Divine indignation burns up as stubble all such unrighteous judges. They are "left neither root nor branch;" the roaring flame consumes the branches above, and rottenness destroys the roots below (cp. Mal. iii. 19).

The closing verses (vv. 25-30) describing the hurricane of wrath sweeping over the nation are particularly fine. Jehovah lifts up a banner to marshal the avengers, to draw together nations from far against His degenerate people. Like a bee-master with his pipe, the Lord collects the foes in swarms against His land. No warrior is missing in those hostile ranks, no one stumbles in the way. The anxiety of the foe for battle is so intense that they do not slumber or sleep; no one looses the girdle from his loins, or unbinds his sandals. With arrows sharpened, bows bent, horses' hoofs hard as flint, the adversaries of Israel enter the land, the noise of their chariot-wheels like the whirlwind. The roar of the approaching enemies is like the roaring of lions,—like the thundering roar of the waves of the sea dashing over the land. The sun of Judah and Israel sinks in blood below the horizon. Everywhere are darkness and sorrow; the light is darkened above, by means of the thick clouds which cover the heavens with a darkness which can be felt.

Isaiah's call to the prophetic office forms the subject of ch. vi., although that chapter has been less fitly explained as only describing Isaiah's call to a particular mission. The vision was beheld in the year that king Uzziah died, probably before the death of that monarch.

If the reading of 2 Ch. xxvi. 22 be correct, Isaiah wrote a history of the events of Uzziah's reign. Uzziah reigned fifty years, and during his reign the kingdom of Judah flourished, while the kingdom of Israel for a great portion of the same period was the scene of anarchy and confusion. Uzziah succeeded in the wars which he undertook, and so powerfully strengthened the defences of Judah that "his name spread far abroad."

Although young, Isaiah appears to have been a person of some importance during the reign of Uzziah, and probably regarded the condition of Judah with pride and satisfaction. The vision recorded in ch. vi. showed him that God "seeth not as man seeth." In spite of its outward prosperity the Jewish state was honeycombed with corruption, and tottering to ruin.

The incidents recorded in the chapter were presented not in a dream, but in an ecstatic vision, during which the prophet was "in the spirit" (ἐν πνεύματι), and "saw" and "heard" what could not have been perceived with the natural senses. It is probable that the Hebrew prophets "saw" in visions much concerning which they afterwards "spoke," and their prophetic discourses may in many cases have been but the interpretation of what was "seen" in the ecstatic state.

In the vision of ch. vi. Isaiah was transported to the Temple above, of which the Temple in Jerusalem was but a representation. The scene presented was not that of an Oriental monarch on his throne, attended by courtiers. There is no trace in the vision of reports being presented from different countries (as in Zechariah's vision of the angelic riders), nor is it necessary to explain v. 8 as a consultation of the king with his trusted servants. Such a view is wholly inadequate. In the heavenly Temple the symbols of the Ark of the covenant and its mercy-seat were not seen, but "the things signified" thereby—namely, the throne of Jehovah "high and lifted up"—were "beheld" by the prophet. Seraphim took the place of Cherubim. The latter were probably the emblems of creation in its highest form, and corresponded with "the four living creatures" of Ezekiel, and τὰ τέσσαρα ζῶα of the Apocalypse. Seraphim are nowhere else mentioned; but in the vision they acted as "ministering spirits" attending on Jehovah's commands, and for that purpose hovered over and below the throne.

Friedr. Delitzsch connects the שֵׁרָפִים of Isaiah with the שֵׁרָפִים הַנְּחֹשִׁים הַנִּזְרָזִים, fiery serpents, of Num. xxi. 6, and Cheyne regards the prophet as making use of the symbol of seraphim, which, in the "popular mythic" form of speech, represented "the serpent-like lightning." But Isaiah's opening vision suggests a contrast between the earthly and the heavenly Temples. In the Holy of Holies on earth Jehovah was supposed to be throned above or upon the Cherubim, whose eyes were directed toward the mercy-seat, which covered the tables of the covenant. In the Temple of Isaiah's vision there was no distinction between the Holy place and the most Holy. There was but one הִיבֵל or vaos, which was completely filled with the train of Jehovah's robe. In the sanctuary above the Altar of Incense was the sole furniture; while the golden Altar of Incense was the most conspicuous piece which belonged to the הַיְכָל of the Temple in Jerusalem. Hence we adhere to the view which connects the name seraphim with the Arabic شرف, to be high, to be noble, and would compare with Bredenkamp the רמים, or high ones, mentioned Job xxi. 22, or the princes, הישרים, spoken of in Dan. x. 13.

The cry of the seraphim, "Holy, holy, holy is Jahveh Tzeboath, the whole earth is full of His glory," corresponds in its first clause with that of "the four living beings," in Rev. iv. 8, "who have no rest day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God, the Almighty." For Κύριος in the latter passage is the rendering of יהוה; ὁ Θεός is the אלהי understood in the Isaianic phrase; and δ παντοκράτωρ, the Almighty, is the LXX. rendering of צבאות (cp. Amos iv. 13; Jer. v. 14, xv. 16, &c.). The close connexion of Is. vi. 3 with Ps. xxix. 10 is also not to be lost sight of.

In whatever manner the expression "hosts" may be explained, it is clear that the phrase יהוה צבאות is an abbreviation of the fuller יהוה אלהי צבאות, Jehovah the God of hosts. The full phrase occurs in 2 Sam. v. 10; 1 K. xix. 10, 14; Jer. v. 14, xv. 16, xxxv. 17, xlv. 7; Hosea xii. 6; Amos v. 15, vi. 8; Ps. lxxxix. 9. Writers who use the full phrase also make use of abbreviated forms. Thus יהוה צבאות frequently occurs in Jeremiah, while אלהי צבאות, with the omission of Jehovah, occurs in Amos iv. 13, v. 14, 27; Jer. xxxviii. 17. A still fuller phraseology is found in Amos v. 16, יהוה

נאם-אדני יהוה, Jehovah, the God of hosts, the Lord; and in Amos iii. 13, יהוה אלהי צבאות אדני

אלהי הצבאות, The utterance of the Lord Jehovah, the God of hosts. The same phrase occurs in Amos vi. 14 with the omission of אדני (Lord); and, with אדני (Lord) at the beginning, and the omission of אלהי (God) in the middle, in Amos ix. 5. Other phrases into which Jehovah Tzeboath enters are יהוה צבאות

יהוה אלהים על ישראל, Jehovah of hosts is God over Israel, 2 Sam. vii. 26; or יהוה צבאות אלהי

ישראל, Jehovah of hosts is the God of Israel, 1 Ch. xvii. 24; and in several passages of Jeremiah, e.g. xlii. 15, 18. Isaiah uses יהוה צבאות, the Lord Jehovah of hosts, in ch. iii. 15, x. 23, 24, &c., which also occurs in Jer. xlv. 10. Unique is יהוה אדני צבאות in Is. x. 16. In the Psalms we find יהוה אלהים צבאות, Pss. lix. 6, lxxx. 5, 20, lxxxiv. 9; and in Ps. lxxx. 8, 15, אלהים צבאות. These instances in the Psalter are the only passages which tell in favour of Luzzatto's view; namely, that Tzeboath in process of time was regarded as a proper name, as it is notably in the LXX. The "hosts" have been variously explained to mean (1) the angels, (2) the armies of Israel, and (3) the stars of heaven, the last being perhaps the most probable view, in which case the formula "Jehovah the God of hosts" is like "the God of heaven," an affirmation that the stars and all other powers are entirely under the control of God as their Creator.

At the cry of the Seraphim (הַסֵּרָפִים), either collective, or as Cheyne explains it, "of each one that cried", the foundations of the thresholds were moved, and the house (הַבַּיִת, i. q.

הַהֵיכָל) was filled with smoke (עָשָׁן), similar in some respects, though not identical with the עָשָׁן mentioned in Ex. xl. 34, 35, and 1 K. viii. 10). The smoke may have come from the Altar of Incense, although that is somewhat uncertain. It must not be identified with the smoke mentioned in Rev. viii. 3, 4, which was occasioned by the petitions of saints below. The "smoke" in Isaiah's vision accompanied the songs of praise of the Seraphim. Cheyne compares Rev. xv. 8, where it should be noted that the language of Ex. xl. 34 is partly quoted.

The proclamation of Jehovah's holiness convinced Isaiah of his own sin and of that of his people. The conviction found expression in the cry of v. 5. The Targum considers that Isaiah had contracted the guilt referred to by not reproving Uzziah for the sin recorded in 2 Ch. xxvi. 16-21. This exegesis is founded upon an erroneous connexion of the verb נְתַמְתִּי ("I am undone") with the idea of dumbness, silence (as if, "I was dumb"). Isaiah's cry of "woe" was immediately followed by the Divine exhibition of mercy. One of the Seraphim flew straightway to the Prophet with a live coal taken with the tongs from the Altar of Incense. The application of the coal of fire (cp. Jer. i. 9) had a purifying effect (similar to that caused by the רִיחַ בַּעַר, the spirit of burning, mentioned in iv. 4). "Lo this hath touched thy lips, and thine iniquity is taken away and thy sin is covered." The load of guilt being thus removed, Isaiah, when invited, boldly accepted the Divine commission, and became the Prophet of Jehovah.

The word יֶצֶפֶה, generally translated coal, is a noun of unity, indicating a single hot stone, from יָצַף. The two Hebrew words have their corresponding equivalents in Arabic; namely, رِزْفٌ and رِزْفَةٌ. رِزْفٌ, save as the proper name of Saul's concubine (Rizpah), is found only in this passage; and יָצַף, the name of an Assyrian city, Rezeph, occurs as an ordinary noun only in the plural in the expression רִצְפִים עֹנֶת (1 K. xix. 6), a cake baked upon hot stones. The Rabbinical authorities explain both words to mean coals (cp. ἄσθρανίδ, John xxi. 9), and so the LXX. But the other Greek translators in Isaiah have more precisely ψήφος (Vulg. calculus). As the fire in the heavenly Temple was a Divine emanation, whence its purifying power, the word seems deliberately used in Isaiah in the technical signification hot-stone, in which it is commonly employed in Arabic. There is no allusion, as Ewald and Cheyne suppose, to the unhewn stones of which altars were originally built (Ex. xx. 25). For although רִצְפֶה, with raphē, is used in Ezekiel and elsewhere in the sense of a patement composed of stones, the רִצְפֶה of Isaiah was not any part of the Altar itself, but a hot-stone which took the place of coals, and which is distinctly stated to have been taken with the tongs "from off (מִן־הָאֵשׁ) the altar."

The section of Isaiah's prophecies which comprises chs. vii.—xii. has been suitably designated "the Book of Immanuel." The first portion of these, including chs. vii.—ix. 6, probably belongs to the time of the Syro-Ephraimitic war. It commences with an historical introduction, which, owing to the employment of the third person, has been by some critics considered not to have been the work of Isaiah. Cp., however, Is. xx.; Hos. i. 2; Amos vii. 12, 14, &c. On account of the fragmentary character belonging to these prophecies, and their looseness in style, Guthe, Stade, Cheyne, and others, suppose them to have been collected by Isaiah's disciples, and thus to lack the arrangement of the master. The force of such critical arguments is, however, justly denied by Dillmann. Ewald conjectures that the historical notices met with in these chapters were originally fuller.

The Syro-Ephraimitish war took place B.C. 737–734. According to the Assyrian inscription (see Schrader, Die Keilinschriften u. A. T., English translation by Whitehouse, on 2 K. xv.), Tiglath-pileser commenced his campaign against Palestine with the capture of Gaza in 734, after which he overran the land of Israel. Pekah king of Israel, an enemy of Assyria, was slain by Hoshea, who, placing himself at the head of a party favourably disposed to Assyria, succeeded to the throne of Israel and became a nominal vassal of Tiglath-pileser. In the following years the Assyrian monarch crushed Rezin king of Syria, and put an end to the kingdom of which Damascus was the capital. The alliance, therefore, between Pekah king of Israel and Rezin king of Syria, and the war which they jointly waged against Judah, must have occurred prior to 734.

The coalition between the kings of Syria and Israel had for its primary object the conquest of Judah. The allied monarchs conspired together to overthrow the Davidic dynasty, and intended to place on the throne of Judah an obscure chieftain, known as the Son of Tabeel. They appear also to have designed to throw off the yoke of Assyria, of which empire, according to Assyrian inscriptions, both were nominal vassals. Rezin assisted in the capture of Elath, the Jewish port on the Gulf of Akaba, which was restored by him to Edom; for it is tolerably clear that in 2 K. xvi. 6 the reading דְּמִן (Edom) is to be preferred to that of אֲרָם (Aram or Syria). The probable object, therefore, of the coalition was to weld together the Philistines, Edomites, and possibly Egypt also (cp. vii. 18), into a strong confederacy against the advance of Assyria.

In endeavouring as a king of Northern Israel, for the first time since the great disruption, to root out the Davidic dynasty in Judah, Pekah may have sought to give a deathblow to the Messianic expectations cherished more or less in the sister-kingdom. It is not a little significant that, notwithstanding the idolatry re-established by Ahaz, Isaiah should have been bidden at that crisis to proffer the help of Jehovah. He was accompanied on the occasion by his son Shear-jashub, whose name (a-Remnant-shall-return) was a standing prediction of combined judgment and mercy.

The Prophet boldly informed the Jewish monarch that the alliance between Syria and Israel would not stand. He described Rezin and Pekah as "two tails of smoking firebrands," destined soon to die out, however brightly they might blaze up for a moment. "Within sixty and five years" Ephraim, strangely leagued with an idolatrous nation for the extinction of the Messianic hope, would be "broken in pieces that it be not a people." This denunciation has often presented a difficulty to critics. What, under such circumstances, was Ahaz likely to care for what might happen in sixty-five years? But the prophecy was not given with the object of winning over Ahaz. It was a solemn declaration that the kingdom of Israel had filled up the measure of its iniquity. The words with which the Prophet concluded the announcement (see v. 9) contained a solemn warning to the Divinely-established House of David. Sixty and five years from 736, the second year of Ahaz's reign (14 of Ahaz + 29 of Hezekiah + 22 of Manasseh = 65), span the period up to the times of Esarhaddon (2 K. xvii. 24; Ezra iv. 2) and of Assurbanipal (identical with Asnapper, Ezra iv. 10), his co-regent and successor, when the kingdom of Samaria was colonised with a mixture of Gentile nations, and Ephraim ceased to be a people. It is needless to mention that the passage has been rejected by some critics as an interpolation, and adduced by others as a proof that the whole prophecy must have been composed after that exile.

Ahaz gave little heed to the Prophet. It is possible that, although greatly alarmed at the confederacy, he had some reliance on the military strength of the kingdom, which as organized by Uziah had been so strong as to deter Tiglath-pileser from assailing Judah (see Schrader, p. 253, Eng. trans., vol. i. p. 245). Moreover Ahaz had already probably opened communications with the great king of Assyria. Whatever were his expectations, the opening of the campaign was disastrous. The account given in Chronicles (2 Ch. xxviii.) is not generally relied on, although, due allowance being made for the mistakes in numbers, Caspari in his monograph gives strong arguments in support of its credibility. The Chronicler states that the Jewish army was almost annihilated, one of the king's sons was slain on the field, and a huge number of prisoners were taken captive. A subsequent siege of Jerusalem proved, however, unsuccessful (2 K. xvi. 5). Hence the Syrians and Israelites, who appear to have carried on separate warlike operations, retired for a short time from Jewish territory. Their southern allies, however, the Edomites and Philistines (2 Ch. xxviii. 17, 18), invaded the land, and Judah was greatly distressed.

Under such national trials, Isaiah seems a second time to have sought an interview with Ahaz, when he offered to adduce a sign of his Divine commission "either in the depth or in the height above." According to the narrative, Ahaz never doubted the possibility of the sign being afforded, but feared to behold it (J. D. Michaelis). Already in league with the king of Assyria, whose armies were on the march to his assistance, he "dealt wantonly in Judah, and trespassed sore against the Lord" (2 Ch. xxviii. 19). He refused the Prophet's offer, hypocritically pretending that he would not commit the sin for which Israel in early days had been punished so severely (Ex. xvii. 7; Deut. vi. 16). Notwithstanding the idolatries of that monarch, Isaiah had spoken to him of "Jehovah thy God." The worship of Jehovah never seems to have been abandoned during all the apostasies of Israel and Judah. They, like the colonists of Samaria, were eclectics in religion (2 K. xvii. 33). The Prophet now addressed him and the royal family in different language: "Hear ye now, House of David! Is it a small thing that ye should weary men" (alluding to the gross acts of injustice committed in the land) "that ye will weary my God also? Therefore Jehovah Himself shall give you a sign: Behold the maiden shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel."

The "sign from heaven" once rejected was offered no more. Another "sign," attended not with "outward show," would in due season be vouchsafed to those that waited for redemption in Israel (cp. viii. 16-18). Even the iniquity of the House of David would not keep back the "gift" from being bestowed in its season, "for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. xi. 29). Messiah, the Child of the House of David, and the Child of Israel, also, in consequence of the sin both of the family of David and of the people of Israel, would be revealed in troublous times. The "salvation of Jehovah" would be granted in a day of dire affliction. A day of darkness would come upon the land, more gloomy than that of the great schism which rent the twelve tribes of Israel into two antagonistic kingdoms. Ere a day of grace would dawn, the land would be treated like a leper covered with leprosy (Lev. xiv. 9). Before the day of its recovery, Jehovah would shave it clean with "the razor" of the king of Assyria, "hired" by Ahaz in his infatuation. The armies of Egypt and Assyria would both cover the land, numerous as flies and bees, until it would be wasted and its cities destroyed. Immanuel would be born in a day of adversity; and when old enough to discern between good and evil, that royal Child, the long-expected One, would, in a wasted land, be forced to subsist on sour milk and honey. Made like in all things to His people, He would learn, like them, obedience in the school of suffering. Messiah's advent to an unbelieving people would be preceded by, and accompanied with, bitter sorrows. A day of wrath would precede the day of mercy.

The prophecy was thus an ideal description. The picture of the future was painted upon the lines of the Prophet's own present. The Messianic character of the prophecy, often denied, is now generally acknowledged. The supposed reference to the Virgin-birth in Is. vii. 14 was long regarded as the main point of the prophecy. That point is not now considered to possess the importance assigned to it by the older commentators. The significance of the prophecy does not rest upon the translation of הַעַלְמָה as "the virgin." With the glorious light cast upon our Lord's history after His Resurrection by the fact of His miraculous Incarnation, then only made known to the disciples in general, it was natural to see a deeper meaning in the terms of the O. T. prediction. But the Hebrew student must admit that the idea of virginity is not conveyed by the word made use of; and there are other weighty reasons which lead to the conclusion that such could not have been the "sign" referred to. Like the Hebrew prophets in general, and the Apostles in later days, Isaiah cherished the hope of witnessing himself the dawn of the Messianic day. All attempts, however, to explain "the maiden" as the consort of Ahaz, or as a second wife of the Prophet, are now generally discarded. The most satisfactory view is that which considers the mother of the Messiah to be distinctly pointed to, and hence the article is used, although the particular individual signified was unknown. She whose Son, as "the seed of the woman," was to bruise the serpent's head, was fitly designated "the Maiden," as the link by which the blessing was to descend. The Book of Immanuel describes in ideal terms the Messiah as born in adversity, the predestined Child of the maiden of the House of David (ch. vii.), and the Child too of the people of Israel born for adversity. The Child Himself is therefore addressed as He to Whom the land rightfully belonged; for Isaiah's ejaculation (ch. viii. 8) may well be regarded in one aspect as a Divinely inspired cry to Immanuel, that He would look in pity upon the sorrows of His own country (cp. John i. 11, R. V.; see Westcott).

God would not cast off His people. Deliverance would be vouchsafed, for the sake of the Child who was to be born, the Son that was to be given. The Assyrian invader, after a time of success, would be overthrown suddenly, as in "the day of Midian" (ch. ix.). A vivid description is next drawn of the victorious march of the Assyrian through the land to his grave in sight of Jerusalem (ch. x.). For from the stump of Jesse's tree, felled though it was on account of long-continued sins, a Shoot would come forth, and a Branch out of its roots would bear glorious fruit (ch. xi.). The redemption would be in due season complete and final; the long-looked-for King would redeem Israel from all their enemies, and unite in one the scattered people. The world would be subject to His sway, and universal peace brought in. The redemption when completed would cast into the shade the great deliverance vouchsafed to Israel at the Red Sea, and in praise thereof the Book of Immanuel closes with a song of salvation (ch. xii.).

It must not be forgotten that Micah, the contemporary of Isaiah, represents the Messiah as the Child of Israel. The travelling woman of Micah iv. 9, 10, is the community or Church of Israel, also described in Is. lxi. 7, 8, as bringing forth children. Hence there is much to be said in favour of the view adopted by von Hofmann, Köhler, and Weir, that "the maiden" of Is. vii. is Israel viewed as the bride of Jehovah. Cheyne's objection that "this figure of speech is reserved for the higher style of prophecy," is of little weight when it is remembered that Micah and Isaiah were fellow-Prophets, and that the imagery of the one might well be employed by the other, even in comparatively prosaic passages. It may also be questioned whether such an ideal description of the future as that in Is. vii. 14, viewed in connexion with the subsequent context, is not itself an instance of "the higher style."

The prophecies in chs. xiii.—xxiii. treat chiefly of the Gentile nations. Isaiah's prophecies concerning the nations, like the similar predictions in Jeremiah (xlvi.—li.) and Ezekiel (xxv.—xxxii.), are grouped together. The prophecy of ch. xxii. is exceptional in its character. Such an arrangement of prophecies according to subject-matter, and not in chronological order, is suggestive of the hand of an editor.

Several of the prophecies in this group are assigned by critics of eminence to a post-exilian date. It has been plausibly argued that in the time of Isaiah the power hostile to Judah was Assyria, and not Babylon. It is, therefore, somewhat strange that Isaiah should denounce Babylon (chs. xiii., xiv.) as the oppressor and ruler of all the kingdoms of the earth, when Babylon never attained such a position in his lifetime. It is still more strange that the Prophet should speak of Babylon as a power actually keeping the Jews in exile, at a time when the people of Judah had not yet been carried into captivity.

Reference is unquestionably made in ch. xi. to a wholesale deportation of Israel from Palestine, and among the countries mentioned from whence the exiles were to be restored the land of Shinar or Babylonia is not forgotten. Critics, however, like Stade and Giesebrecht, have maintained that chs. xi. 10—xii. 6 are not Isaianic. Among the points unfavourable to its genuineness Giesebrecht adduces the "combination of the idea of the Messiah and of the idea of universalism" in v. 11; the sense in which the expression "remnant of the people" is employed in vv. 11 and 16; the countries in "the four corners of the earth" from whence the Israelites were to be restored; together with the union of contradictory ideas, such as the universal monarchy of the prophetic Son of David with the notion of a narrow Israelitish kingdom, described in v. 14. Hence Giesebrecht assigns the passage to an imitator of Isaiah in post-exilian days.

On the other hand it may be argued that the whole passage bears the impress of pre-exilian times. Shinar, though mentioned, occupies a subordinate place to Assyria. Assyria and Egypt are spoken of as the chief foes of Israel; the name of Babylon does not occur in the prophecy; while the Philistines, with Edom and Moab, are brought into a prominence which a writer of post-exilian times could not have dreamed of assigning to them.

That Isaiah foresaw the wholesale deportation of Israel is plain from passages admittedly genuine, such as vi. 11, 12, vii. 17, viii. 4-7. The Babylonian Captivity is alluded to distinctly in the historical appendix to the first part of Isaiah at ch. xxxix. Hence it is not after all so strange that the Prophet, in a collected edition of his prophecies put forth probably some time after the deliverance from Sennacherib, should have also predicted Babylon's overthrow. If the captivity of Judah was foreseen by him, it was necessary that he should also speak of a restoration. That Jehovah would not for ever forsake His people was a truth enunciated by Samuel (1 Sam. xii. 22), and never lost sight of by the subsequent prophets. It was an article of Israel's faith.

Isaiah's prophecies concerning the nations deal mainly with the nations mentioned in the close of ch. xi.—although the order in which they are mentioned is not the same as in that chapter. Thus Assyria is spoken of in xiv. 24-27; Philistia in xiv. 28-32; Moab in chs. xv., xvi.; Cush or Ethiopia in ch. xviii.; Egypt in chs. xix., xx. In the later chapters of the group Elam is mentioned in combination with Media (xxi. 2, xxii. 6; cp. xiii. 17), and Edom in xxi. 11, 12. The prophecy against Damascus in ch. xvii. is one which very naturally follows the Book of Immanuel, where Syria comes so prominently on the scene; and Tyre, against which the prophecy of ch. xxiii. is directed, may be regarded as included in "the coast lands" referred to in xi. 11.

Babylon was not in Isaiah's time regarded as a different empire from that of Assyria, although, like many other provinces of the Assyrian empire, Babylon might be restive under the Assyrian yoke. Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, after his campaign against Chaldea, assumed the title of "king of Sumir and Akkad," i.e. of Babylonia (Schrader, KAT. p. 249). Consequently it is not strange that after the prediction of the overthrow of Assyria in the Book of Immanuel, the Book of the Nations should begin with the prediction of Babylon's downfall (ch. xliii.), or even that the dirge over Babylon (xiv. 3-23) should immediately be followed by an utterance concerning the overthrow of the Assyrian upon the holy mountains (xiv. 24-27).

It is easy to assert that those passages are but instances in which prophecies, widely differing in date, have been pieced together by a post-exilian editor. But the Jews of post-exilian days clearly distinguished between the empires of Assyria and Babylon. It was very different in the time of Isaiah. It mattered little to a Jew of that period whether the centre of the great Eastern empire—which, like a huge boa constrictor, was strangling the Jewish nationality—were fixed at Nineveh on the Tigris or at Babylon on the Euphrates.

It has been argued that Isaiah predicted only the overthrow of a particular Assyrian king, and not the overthrow of the Eastern empire. If however, as we maintain, the second half of ch. xi. be genuine, the overthrow of both the Assyrian and Egyptian powers is predicted as among the results connected with the coming forth of the Shoot out of the stem of Jesse. Micah, Isaiah's contemporary, similarly predicts the overthrow of Assyria as brought about by Messiah (Micah v. 4-6). And alongside of that prophecy, Micah further speaks of the poor daughter of Zion forced in her pains of travail to go forth out of the city of Jerusalem, compelled to dwell in the field, carried off as a captive to Babylon, and there finally rescued and redeemed from the hands of her enemies (Micah iv. 10).

Consequently, according to the evidence of the received texts of Isaiah and Micah, no marked distinction was drawn in the days of Hezekiah between Assyria and Babylon. A critic is not justified in tampering with the prophetic text, on the ground of a theoretical assumption of interpolations, so as to force it into harmony with his theories. On the other hand, if the general integrity of the prophetic books is to be upheld, attention must be called to the fact that the prophecies of the Old Testament contain more of the ideal element than popularly imagined. The reader of the Bible must be trained to observe that literal predictions are the exception and not the rule. The glowing prophecy of Isaiah which depicts Sennacherib's march upon Jerusalem (Is. x. 28-34), and his equally grand description of the overthrow of the Assyrian king before its walls (Is. xxxi. 27-33), were not literally fulfilled. Sennacherib probably did not march against Jerusalem by the route described in ch. x., while all the details of the latter passage (ch. xxxi.) did not actually take place (see Driver's Isaiah, Life and Times, pp. 61, 73). No attempt was ever made in later days to "touch up" those prophecies of Isaiah, in order to make them coincide better with the actual facts of history, which fact speaks volumes for the general integrity of the text. Such details were regarded by the Prophet and his disciples as but the pictorial filling up of the picture "seen" in prophetic "vision." These ideal portions are of the utmost importance, because they are evidences that the prophecies were delivered prior to the events predicted. The "supernatural" element in each prophecy is to be looked for in the prophecy viewed as a whole, and not in its mere descriptive details, which are, more or less, simply pictorial.

It would, if space permitted, be easy to show that the prophecies concerning Babylon in chs. xiii. and xiv. present marked characteristics of Isaiah's diction. Although some weight is to be assigned to arguments drawn from such peculiarities, the critic must be on his guard against the attempt so constantly made to assign "to each prophet his own Lexicon" (Bredenkamp). It is therefore more important to observe that this prophecy about Babylon is not deficient in the purely ideal element. When Cyrus captured Babylon with his army of Medes and Persians, he did not destroy that city. The prophecy of ch. xiii. was not fulfilled in the letter, but fully accomplished in the spirit. If written prior to Babylon's capture, it exhibits all the marks of supernatural inspiration. Babylon after its capture by Cyrus sank to rise no more. That city never regained the position of being the capital of an empire. Strabo describes it as lying waste in the century prior to the Christian era, although centuries later it became a seat of Jewish learning. Bredenkamp calls attention to the fact that in the predictions of Babylon's downfall by Isaiah or Jeremiah, the union of Elam and Media is not spoken of, although Cyrus was a Persian (Elamite). The fact is a strong argument in favour of the composition of those predictions prior to the Exile. For it is scarcely necessary to observe that the prediction in Is. xxi. 2 does not refer to the final successful coalition against Babylon.

The ideas presented in the opening of ch. xiv. are peculiar, and scarcely harmonize with those of ch. xiii. They may, however, have been written by the Prophet at a later period to form a kind of framework in which to insert his dirge over Babylon. That dirge is assigned by many critics to the time of Nebuchadnezzar, but there is no serious difficulty in the way of regarding it as Isaianic. The details given in xiv. 19, 20, are purely ideal. The king of Babylon is only a personification of the empire over which that king ruled. There is no evidence to show that the scene portrayed of the royal corpse cast forth from its grave was realised as a fact of history.

The superscription assigns the prophecy against Philistia (xiv. 28-32) to the year of Ahaz's death. "The rod" (טֹבֵטֵט) which smote the Philistines is often interpreted of Ahaz, who with the aid of Assyria repelled the Philistine invasion. It is, however, preferably explained as a prophecy not of any particular king but of the House of David. The Davidic family for centuries (2 Ch. xxvi. 6, 7) kept the Philistines in subjection. The rod or sceptre of David was "broken" by the "serpent" of Assyria (Tiglath-pileser, or Shalmaneser), although Assyria had been "hired" (cp. vii. 20) to uphold the Davidic throne. Judah had become an Assyrian vassal. The "adder" and "the fiery-flying serpent" are best explained (with Cheyne and Driver) as referring to Sargon (see Schrader, KAT. p. 396), or even Sennacherib, for those Assyrian monarchs crushed the Philistines under foot. In the expressions "from the root" (שִׁטְרֵי) and also "and his fruit" (פְּרִיָּהּ), distinct allusions seem made to xi. 1, though not altogether identical in meaning. The "rod" (טֹבֵטֵט) and its smiting are mentioned in xi. 4. Delitzsch, after the Targum, explains the "fiery-flying serpent" of Messiah. The "rod" in the hand of the Assyrian, wherewith he "smote" the Philistines, was "Jehovah's indignation" (see x. 5, cp. cv. 24-26); and the Messiah, whether recognised or not, was the real source of all deliverances vouchsafed to the Lord's people, and hence was appealed to by the Prophet in the day of calamity (viii. 8) as one able to deliver His land, or one for whose sake Jehovah might grant deliverance.

Chs. xv., xvi. contain a prophecy against Moab. The prophecy in xvi. 13, 14 is generally admitted to be Isaianic. Most critics, however, think that the rest of ch. xv., xvi. is the work of an earlier prophet re-edited by Isaiah (cp. the R. V. xvi. 13). The prophecy is later than the time of Mesha, although seven of the proper names here mentioned are found on the Mesha-stone. Ch. xvi. 1 refers to the tribute once paid by Mesha to Judah (2 K. iii. 4), which Moab is now advised again to pay. The Moabites according to the prophecy were in possession of territory north of the Arnon which formerly belonged to the tribes of Reuben and Gad. This fact is, as Bredenkamp remarks, in favour of the Isaianic composition. For the tribes of Reuben and Gad had been carried away captive by Tiglath-pileser, and Moab was afterwards free to extend her territories in that direction. Sennacherib boasts (Schrader, KAT. p. 291) that Camosadab king of Moab paid him tribute. Nothing has yet been discovered which casts light upon the events predicted in xvi. 14.

Ch. xvii. 1-11 depicts "the burden upon Damascus." That title only describes part of the prediction, which is mainly occupied with a description of the overthrow of the kingdom of Israel, united with Syria against Judah (ch. vii.). The prophecy was probably composed about the time of Tiglath-pileser's campaign against Syria and Israel. Israel's ruin is predicted, but notes of mercy mingle with those of judgment in vv. 6-8.

The passage that follows (xvii. 12-14) is one of considerable beauty. It does not seem to be connected with the prophecy which precedes, and does not belong to that which follows. It is one of Isaiah's striking miniatures of the overthrow of Sennacherib's army. There is no necessity to regard it as a fragment of some larger prophecy. The Prophet probably inserted the piece in this place of his gallery to mark the contrast between the fates of Israel and of Judah when they severally came into collision with the might of Assyria. The moral of the lesson is too evident to need comment.

The following chapter (ch. xviii.) contains a reference to the same grand event. The picture describes Ethiopia with its swarms of flies. Isaiah appears well acquainted with the land and its inhabitants: for v. 2 in a few master-strokes delineates the appearance of the Ethiopians, the general features of their land, and their fleet of papyrus canoes. Shabataka, then monarch of Egypt, was more of an Ethiopian than an Egyptian prince (Cheyne). The Prophet represents the king of Ethiopia in the act of collecting an army to co-operate against the king of Assyria when startled by the news of the disaster before Jerusalem. The victory of Jehovah is described as announced by an ensign lifted up on the mountain, and by the blowing of the trumpet in the land. In consequence of that overthrow many nations brought gifts unto Jerusalem (2 Ch. xxxii. 23), and among them were probably the representatives of Ethiopia.

The next prophecy concerns Egypt: xix. 1-15 describes the judgment; xix. 16-25 its results. The former is regarded by most critics as Isaianic, although some dispute that point. The Egyptian and Assyrian inscriptions have thrown considerable light upon the historical references of the chapter (Cheyne), although the points of contact cannot here be noticed. The drying up of the Nile is not a literal prediction; but a symbolical description of the wasting away of that once mighty empire. Egypt was symbolised by the Nile, while the Euphrates in viii. 7, 8 is the symbol of Assyria.

The authorship of the second part (xix. 16-25) is called in question by many critics. The commendatory manner in which v. 19 speaks of "an altar" in the land of Egypt, and of the erection of a sacred "pillar" (מַצֵּבָה), notwithstanding the prohibitions as to pillars in Lev. xvii. and Deut. xii. 3, 4, has occasioned no little difficulty. It must, however, be observed that the Prophet regards the "pillar" only as "a sign," or pillar of remembrance, and by no means as the mark of "a high place." The "altar" he speaks of was in like manner only an altar of "witness," like that of 'Ed. The reference to Josh. xxii. is unmistakable. Both the "altar" and "pillar" in the prophetic picture were "signs" that Egypt would in future days be a centre of pure worship. By the "pillar at the border thereof," Egypt was ecclesiastically annexed to Canaan; as were the territories across the Jordan by the altar of 'Ed (Josh. xxii.). Hence the prediction of five cities speaking the language of Canaan (cp. Zeph. iii. 9) is simply an illustration of that spiritual annexation. It must not be viewed as a literal prediction. The reading of v. 18 seems corrupt. The prophecy, though purely symbolical, was no doubt made use of in later times to support the erection of a Jewish temple in Egypt in B.C. 160. The LXX. referred the prophecy to that event, and accordingly altered the phrase "city of destruction" in v. 18 into מְצֻרֵי צָדִיק, "city of righteousness." The manner in which Assyria and Egypt are spoken of in vv. 23-25 forcibly recalls the picture in xiv. 2. They are not, however, identical. The reference to Assyria would have been an anachronism in B.C. 160.

Ch. xx., though following ch. xix., contains an earlier prophecy of Isaiah concerning the conquest of Egypt by Assyria. The Tartan, or Assyrian commander-in-chief, is not to be identified with the Tartan mentioned in 2 K. xviii. 17. The title "the Tartan" does not occur in the parallel passage in Is. xxxvi. 2. "The Tartan" of ch. xx. was sent by Sargon, the predecessor of Sennacherib, against the Philistines prior to the Assyrian operations against Egypt. An influential party in Jerusalem relied on an alliance with Egypt and Ethiopia as the strongest bulwark against Assyria. To indicate the downfall of Egypt and Ethiopia, Isaiah for three years walked up and down in the garb of a captive in the streets of Jerusalem, having laid aside both his outer rough garment of sackcloth ("nivhad," cp. 1 Sam. xix. 24, Amos ii. 16, Micah i. 8) and his sandals. On the difficulties connected with the reading "three years," and on the attempts to obviate them, whether by the Hebrew punctuators, who disconnect the word "barefoot" from the "three years" following, or by critics who conjecturally read "three days" in the place of "three years," see Cheyne's Commentary.

The prophecy against Babylon (xxi. 1-10) probably refers to the siege which happened in Isaiah's lifetime, when Sargon captured that city and defeated Merodach-baladan. The latter monarch afterwards recovered much of his former power, and was formidable in the reign of Sennacherib (Is. xxxix.). At the time of this prophecy many Jewish statesmen longed for the success of Merodach-baladan, as a check to the growing power of Assyria. Isaiah, however, predicted the failure of that monarch's attempts against Assyria. The language used by Isaiah shows his sympathy with the natural sentiments of his nation, though from a higher standpoint he recognised the need of Judah's being taught by bitter experience to lean only on her God.

The superscription (xxi. 1) is somewhat enigmatical, though picturesque like the prophecy itself. The Euphrates, like the Nile (xviii. 2; xix. 5), was sometimes styled "a sea." The land of Chaldea was termed the "sea-land" (mât tidm-tiv, מַתְּ תִדְמ־תִּיב, Schrader, KAT. p. 353). Few prophecies so distinctly convey the impression that what is described was actually "seen" in prophetic vision, and afterwards recalled to mind and expounded. The pictures presented to the Prophet's view did not represent what actually took place at the conquest of Babylon. The details, like similar details in the Apocalypse, are ideal; the prophecy true, but symbolical.

Ch. xxi. 11-17 contains two prophecies, the first of Edom under the symbolical appellation of Dumah, silence; the second concerning Arabia, i.e. Tema and Kedar. The answer to inquiring Edomites was to the effect that their day of prosperity would soon close in night, but that a day of grace was not yet over, if they were disposed to make use of it. Nothing definite is known as to the events noted in the second prediction as shortly to come to pass.

Ch. xxii. is also concerned with the nations who suffered bitterly from the "overwhelming scourge" which passed through them, and then descended upon Jerusalem. This is probably the reason why the prophecy occupies its special position in the Book. It is, however, strictly speaking, a "domestic prediction." "The valley of vision" has sometimes been explained to signify the low-lying quarter of the city in which the Prophet beheld his "visions," or some "valley" in prophetic "vision" where the contest here described seemed to take place. The prophecy depicts Jerusalem. It may refer to some event which occurred during the invasion of Sennacherib, or (as Cheyne supposes) during the earlier invasion of Sargon. That monarch styles himself "he who subdued the land of Judah whose position is remote" (Schraeder, p. 188). The history, however, of that campaign is not given in the Kings, and all details are wanting.

Ch. xxii. 15-25 contains a denunciation of Shebna, who was then over the treasury. That statesman's deposition is predicted, and the promotion of Eliakim to office. While the personal integrity of the latter is praised, he was solemnly warned that his partiality for his relations would in turn bring about his own downfall. There are no means of tracing the accomplishment of these particular prophecies.

The "Book of the Nations" closes with a description of the fate of Tyre (ch. xxiii.). The authorship of this highly-finished piece is much disputed, chiefly because of the mention made of the Chaldeans in v. 13. The language is, however, decidedly Isaianic, and no convincing arguments have been adduced against the traditional view. The date of the prophecy cannot be absolutely determined, nor can the fulfilment of the prediction in all its details be pointed out. No light has yet been cast upon the predictions of the closing verses. It may, however, safely be affirmed (even against Ewald and Cheyne) that the seventy years of Tyre's desolation (vv. 15-17) have no connexion with the seventy years of Judah's exile predicted by Jeremiah.

The next section of the Book, comprising chs. xxiv.-xxvii. inclusive, might almost be styled the Apocalypse of Isaiah. It has, as Delitzsch justly remarks, no counterpart in the O. T., except Zech. ix.-xiv., and that only to a partial extent. Though admirably suited to the place it occupies in the Book, it is not placed in its chronological order, whether as regards its composition or subject-matter. The Isaianic authorship of the portion has been disputed, because the historical situation depicted does not correspond with the events of Isaiah's time. Moreover the character of the section, although confessedly abounding with phrases peculiar to Isaiah, wholly differs from the other Isaianic prophecies.

These arguments, however, are not conclusive. The prominence given to Moab (xxv. 10-12) is in favour of Isaiah's authorship. If Isaiah really predicted the Babylonian Captivity, the reference to Israel's three great enemies—Egypt, Assyria, and Babylon—in xxvii. 1 agrees with his historical standpoint, and xxv. 6 proves that the writer lived at Jerusalem. Wellhausen maintains that the ideal of the older prophets was the establishment of the Davidic kingdom and monarchy on a grander scale, and that the Prophets only dreamed Apocalyptic dreams when they lost hold of that historical environment (Proleg., pp. 444-5). If Wellhausen's canon be accepted, the genuineness of the prophecy is indefensible. But that canon is purely arbitrary. Wellhausen summarily rejects as interpolations all the passages which can be adduced as evidence against his theory. There is, however, nothing really opposed to the admission of the Isaianic authorship of the prophecy, unless it be assumed that whatever savours of "the supernatural" is necessarily spurious.

The prophecy is, however, not literal. It is in the grandest sense ideal. It does not describe the devastation only of "the land" of Israel or Judah. That "land," indeed, is not forgotten; it is prominently before the Prophet's mind. But the thought which filled his soul was that of a world (תבל) collapsing into ruin. The days of Noah are recalled to mind: "the windows on high are opened" (xxiv. 18), "the everlasting covenant" then made is now "dissolved" (xxiv. 5), and the curse devours the earth once more (v. 6), chaos (תהום) coming again into view (v. 10).

The catastrophe being thus world-wide, "the remnant" of vv. 13-15 is not exclusively that of the Jewish nation. "Few are left" among the peoples (העמים), vv. 6, 13 (cp. Matt. xxiv. 22). Hence the voices of the remnant that escape arise from the western sea and from the lands of the rising sun (Delitzsch). The city of confusion (תהום) is neither Babylon nor Jerusalem, but the idealised "capital of the God-estranged world" (Delitzsch), distinguished only for pictorial effect from the world with which in many aspects it may be identified. A world estranged from God has ever a tendency to relapse into the chaos from whence it arose. The final victory described by the Prophet is delineated by him as achieved both in heaven above and in earth beneath. Angels and kings are described as hurled together into the prison, from whence they are to be brought forth to judgment, when order and beauty are re-established, and Jehovah "shall reign before His ancients gloriously."

This picture of "the last things" is unique. There is, however, nothing improbable in such a vision of final victory being revealed to the Prophet for his consolation after the Assyrian deliverance, when led to contemplate the dark storm-clouds which soon began again to gather over the horizon.

The hymn of praise which follows (xxv. 1-5) describes Jehovah's mercy in the midst of trouble, and the feast made for all peoples on Mount Zion. Zion is not always to be a stone of stumbling, but a source of rejoicing. All peoples are to rejoice in her. Death will be swallowed up, and the veil of ignorance and sorrow drawn off from all eyes.

Beneath the mountain on which the joyous feast is held, a striking contrast is depicted. At the close of ch. xxx. "tabrets and harps" are represented as sending forth melody on the mountain above, while at its foot the funeral pile is made ready for the Assyrian king. It is kindled by the breath of Jehovah "like a stream of brimstone." Similarly in ch. xxv., Moab, Israel's haughty foe, is seen trodden down, at the foot of the mountain, like straw in the water of earth's dung-pit. In vain Moab spreads forth his hands to swim, for he is trampled under, and stifled beneath the fetid water.

A third hymn of praise follows (xxvi. 1-7). Zion is described as surrounded by the walls and bulwarks of salvation. The ideas presented under other phraseology in xxxiii. 20, 21, are repeated almost in identical language in lx. 18. Through the gates and doors of the city, stream in "the righteous nation which keepeth truth." Vc. 8-11 describe either the Prophet's past or present trials, the thoughts of which dimmed awhile the view of future glory. Faith, however, bursts forth victoriously from v. 12 onwards, rising almost to the level of New Testament revelation. "The dead" of v. 14 are not merely Israel's oppressors. The Prophet's gaze is fixed on the distant future. The faith that believes in Jehovah bringing His people down to Sheol is compelled to affirm a bringing up from Hades (1 Sam. ii. 6), in the same way that the faith that foresaw the national captivity prophesied a glorious Return. Hofmann rightly maintains (Schriftbeweis, ii. 461) that a belief in the resurrection of the dead is no mere product of oriental days. It is no light borrowed from Zoroaster. The revivification of the dead was often obscured by the clouds that shut out the world beyond. The awakening of the dead to consciousness and life was, perhaps, thought of in Old Testament days as limited to Israel, and the resurrection of all men was not clearly revealed. But the fact of a life beyond the grave, and of deliverance from Sheol, was surely, though slowly, recognised as a necessity of faith.

The language in which Old Testament Psalmists and Prophets speak of the state of the dead in the Under-world is not, indeed, to be regarded as literal. The Church of Hades is described in Is. xxvi. as a woman traveling with child, awaiting the time of her delivery. Bredenkamp calls attention to the fact that Isaiah's similitude is expanded in 4 Ezra (2 Esdras) iv. 35-42. As Daniel looked forward, after a period of rest, to stand in his lot at the end of the days (Dan. xii. 13), so in an ecstasy of believing rapture, Isaiah cries out to the longing Church of Hades (cp. 1 Thess. iv. 14-18): "Thy dead shall live, my dead body" (there is no necessity to view the expression as collective) "shall arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust, for thy dew (the dew of Jehovah) is as a dew of herbs!" It is a dew which falls upon the grass, and makes it spring up luxuriously, or "a dew of lights" (cp. Jas. i. 17), "so full of the light of life that it draws forth the shades even from the dark womb of the Under-world" (Cheyne). "The earth shall cast forth the dead," also from its womb (cp.

Rev. xx. 13). Numerous as the dew-drops from the womb of the morning, are the youths that range themselves under the banner of Messiah (Ps. cx. 3). So the dew of Jehovah, in the morning of Resurrection, shall bring forth a mighty army from the womb of Earth and Hades.

The burst of rapture is succeeded (vc. 20, 21) by an exhortation to the people of Jehovah. A further descent in the sobriety of language marks ch. xxvii., the Prophet being actuated by the principle enunciated by St. Paul in 2 Cor. v. 13. Ch. xxvii., however, possesses beauties of its own, and the fourth song of thanksgiving (contained in vc. 2-5) is not a little striking. The rest of the chapter is devoted to setting forth practical lessons, and is finally brought to an end by another picture, not so apocalyptic in its colouring, of the day of deliverance.

The next group of prophecies comprises chs. xxviii.-xxxv. Delitzsch terms xxviii.-xxxiii. "the book of woes," owing to the five woes with which each of these five chapters severally begins; these prophecies were delivered at various times, but were placed together owing to the similarity in their contents. The internal evidence of xxviii. 1-6 proves, as Driver remarks, the chapter to "have been written prior to the fall of Samaria in 722, and therefore during the reign of Shalmaneser IV." Jerusalem is warned of Samaria's sin and of her approaching ruin. The words of mockery and scorn with which the prophet's messages were received by the people of Jerusalem are re-echoed, and turned back upon those mockers "with a new and terrible significance." The exact significance of the monosyllabic words used in v. 10, and repeated in v. 13, is a matter of some uncertainty. Their general meaning is clear. The Jews were warned that, if they despised the repetition of Jehovah's message as monotonous, they would as captives in a strange land and in a strange tongue be compelled to hearken to the harsh monotones of commands from the lips of foreign taskmasters. Judah relied on the help of Egypt in her struggle against Assyria. That hope, the Prophet pointed out, was a delusion. She had, however, if she only knew it, surer ground of confidence. Jehovah had laid in Zion "for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone of sure foundation." This was not Zion itself, or her Temple, but the Davidic house, from whence Messiah was to arise. The N. T. interpretation gives the true explanation of v. 16 (Rom. ix. 33; 1 Pet. ii. 6). The nation of Israel was eternal, the Davidic throne indestructible, if the nation only relied on her God. If not, she would be compelled to learn in days of sorrow the lessons which might have been learned in days of prosperity. Prophetic lessons of wisdom for the present and of consolation for the future are presented by the common operations of husbandry, for what seems the severest treatment of the grain tends to provide bread for the use of man. Similarly "the holy seed," purified by affliction and taught in adversity, will one day be perfected, and become a blessing to the nations (vc. 23-29). The Apostle Paul's exclamation (Rom. xi. 33-36) is a fitting parallel to, and commentary upon, v. 29.

Ch. xxix., though referring also to the Assyrian invasion, was written at a later period, and predicts the desolation which Sennacherib's invasion would bring on the land. Ariel, which more probably signifies "hearth of God" (cp. xxxi. 9) than "lion of God," is used to designate Jerusalem, which, though highly favoured, would be brought down by sin, and afterwards redeemed by God's mercy. The Prophet denounces the secret plottings with Egypt (v. 15), which were bringing the country to the verge of ruin; though he predicts a marvellous deliverance within the course of a year (xxxix. 1), which would be accompanied with blessed results. In ch. xxx. the embassy sent to Egypt is derided by the Prophet, who points out the disobedient character of the people who desired to have "smooth things" spoken to them. The consequence of their folly would be, that they would be compelled to experience God's heavy chastisements before the day of repentance and of mercy. At the close of the chapter, Isaiah's finest imagery is employed to sketch the path along which the nations were to be lured to destruction, when Jahveh would go forth for the redemption of His people. He is described as an indignant hero striding forth to the battle-field, a mightier than Samson, whose arms would bring salvation. Amid the storm stroke upon stroke descends upon the mighty foe. And as those mighty blows break the enemy in pieces, tabrets and harps resound with melody from the walls of Jerusalem, where the afflicted people recognise that their Lord has gone forth to the battle. The funeral pile is depicted as already constructed for the reception of the carcasses of the fallen foes, for the king and his glorious host. In the valley of Tophet beneath the holy city, the pile is lighted to consume the relics of the enemy. The prophecy is highly figurative and not literal, though in very essence fulfilled: "The Assyrian soldiers, cut down in their ranks like sheaves of corn, were gathered in that spot into the threshing-floor (Micah iv. 12), and laid in their last earthly beds along the sides of that deep valley. Sennacherib's death at Nineveh was the direct result of his discomfiture before Jerusalem" (Wright's Biblical Essays, p. 126).

The same thoughts under different imagery form the subject of ch. xxxi., while ch. xxxii. depicts the salutary result of this judgment and deliverance upon both king and people. The opening verses of ch. xxxii. were by the older commentators generally regarded as Messianic, but they are not Messianic in their primary signification, although some of the features characteristic of Messianic times (ch. xi.) reappear here. All temporal deliverances, however, more or less distinctly foreshadow that final salvation. Some critics, like Stade, regard the chapter as post-exilian, but there is no real necessity for such a supposition. Although we have no historical narrative to guide us, we may fairly assume that Hezekiah was, after that "crowning mercy," enabled to rule with a firmer hand, and suppressed many of the oppressions whereby the nobles of Jerusalem unjustly and ignobly oppressed their poorer brethren. True nobility for a season at least was seen to consist in executing righteousness. The rebukes administered to the careless women of Jerusalem at the close of the chapter (vv. 9-20), and the manner in which Isaiah insists on the necessity of an outpouring of the Spirit from on high on all the people, all show plainly that, although he could vividly paint the ideal, the Prophet was not forgetful of the low spiritual character of the people in general.

Ch. xxxiii. presents another grand picture of the same period. The fresh details here depicted upon the prophetic canvas are interesting. The scorn with which Hezekiah's messengers of peace were received by the Assyrian king, and the lamentation of the people when all attempts at negotiations with the cruel foe proved to be in vain, are vividly set forth. In v. 14 the dejection caused by the sight of the perpetual burnings of cities and villages is well portrayed. Never was a grander illustration afforded of the truth that man's day of adversity is God's day of opportunity (cp. xxx. 18, xxxiii. 10, 11). The closing verses of the chapter, with the description of Jahveh as the judge, the general, the king, and deliverer of His people, are peculiarly fine.

The next two chapters (xxxiv. and xxxv.) differ considerably from the preceding, and are in many respects of an apocalyptic character. They are, therefore, assigned by critics who follow Wellhausen's dictum to the post-exilian age. There are no doubt "striking parallels between chs. xxxiv., xxxv. and Zephaniah, and between ch. xxxiv. and parts of Jeremiah (xvi. 3-12, xxv. 1. and li.), which are of great critical importance" (Cheyne). But as Caspari has pointed out, and others before and after him, not a few eschatological points are to be found in the previous chapters of Isaiah. Cp. the healing of the deaf and blind (xxix. 18; xxxii. 3, 4), the transformation of the wilderness (xxxii. 15), the springing up of water (xxx. 25). Cp. also the marvellous pictures in chs. xxiv.-xxvii., and especially the contrasted picture in ch. xxvi. The favourite style of criticism is a kind of reasoning in a circle. It is assumed, first of all, as an axiom, that the second portion of Isaiah is post-exilian; and next that every part of the first portion of the Book which presents any similarities to the second is also non-Isaianic. The argument frequently proceeds upon a number of unproved assertions, while those who ask for proofs are accused of the lack of "sound judgment," and informed that the question has been finally decided.

Many wrongs committed by the Edomites against Judah were fresh in the memory of the men of Isaiah's time. This makes it easy to understand why Edom is used in ch. xxxiv. to designate the foes of Jahveh's people, and why the different fates of the two kindred peoples are so often contrasted. The story of Gen. xix. and the Song of Moses in Deut. xxxii. (cp. especially vv. 41-43) were distinctly in the Prophet's mind. The ideal character of chs. xxxiv. and xxxv. must be insisted on. It is impossible to regard such statements as designed to be understood literally.

Chs. xxxvi.-xxxix. are an historical supplement to the first part of the Book of Isaiah. This appendix presents not a few difficulties. Its outlines may have been drawn up by the Prophet; but if so, it has certainly been added to by later writers. The murder of Sennacherib, recorded in ch. xxxvii., took place in B.C. 682-1, after the death of Isaiah. The narrative is in the main identical even in verbiage with that in the Kings. There are, however, notable differences. The three verses 2 K. xviii. 14-16 do not occur in Isaiah, and are different in style, the name of Hezekiah himself being there spelled in a peculiar manner. The psalm of Hezekiah (Is. xxxviii. 9-20) is peculiar to Isaiah, while the account of Hezekiah's sickness is shorter than that in the Kings. The prophecy (xxxix. 22-35) is certainly Isaianic. The narrative in the Kings appears to be the original, that in Isaiah the copy. The latter, however admirably suited it may be to the place it occupies, dates in its present shape from post-exilic days.

The account of Sennacherib's campaign presented in the Assyrian inscriptions differs in some respects from the Biblical. Driver regards both accounts as imperfect, though in substantial agreement. The Assyrian inscriptions deal with the entire campaign; the Biblical account is mainly concerned with the expedition against Judah. It is not improbable that the Assyrian account has, as Schrader supposes, transposed the order of events so as to gloss over the disaster before Jerusalem.

The chief difficulty is in reference to the time when the invasion occurred. The Bible places it in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah; that monarch reigned only twenty-nine years. His life was, according to ch. xxxviii., prolonged for fifteen years after the overthrow of Sennacherib. But the Assyrian account places the invasion in the spring of 701; that is, in the very last year of Hezekiah. Consequently Hezekiah must have reigned considerably longer, and Manasseh's reign (stated at fifty-five years) must be reduced, or the events recorded in chs. xxxviii., xxxix. as having occurred after Sennacherib's defeat must have preceded that event. There is much to be said in favour of the former hypothesis, though the latter is adopted by Delitzsch, v. Orelli, and others. Cheyne, too, considers Merodach-baladan's embassy from Babylon to have preceded the invasion of Sennacherib. Following up the hints originally given by Hincks, Cheyne supposes the events of 2 K. xviii. 14-16 to refer to an invasion in the reign of Sargon. There are as yet scarcely sufficient data on which to base any definite conclusion on these points. The embassy of Merodach-baladan, so far as the history of that remarkable antagonist of Assyria is known to us, may just as well have followed as preceded the defeat of Sennacherib.

The second part of the Book of Isaiah, containing chs. xl.-lxvi., is generally regarded by modern critics as the work of another writer. This is the view now almost universally adopted. Scholars of unimpeachable orthodoxy, who firmly believe in the Divine inspiration of the Book (as Delitzsch, Oehler, v. Orelli, and Bredekamp), and some who long defended the genuineness of this portion, have at last yielded to the prevalent opinion. The arguments in support of the theory are in themselves cumulative, and derived from three distinct lines of evidence: namely, (1) the subject-matter of the prophecy, (2) its literary style, and (3) the theological ideas which characterise it.

1. The theme of the chapters is the restoration of Israel from Babylon. In these chapters no reference is made to the existence of the Assyrian empire, which was so powerful in the days of Isaiah. The Babylonian empire is spoken of as bearing rule over Israel. The Assyrian empire is, however, in one place referred to as having oppressed Israel in days gone by (lii. 4). The "old waste places" of Jerusalem are repeatedly mentioned (lviii. 12), along with "the waste cities and the desolations of former generations" (lxi. 4). In a prayer addressed to Jahveh, the lamentation is put into the lips of the nation: "The holy and beautiful house where our fathers praised Thee is burned with fire, and all our pleasant things are laid waste" (lxiv. 10). Israel is throughout depicted as actually in captivity, while there is no prophecy of the Exile as an event still future. The oppression of the Chaldeans is so keenly felt that Zion exclaims, "The Lord hath forgotten me" (lxix. 14). The very days of exile are described as almost over; the destined deliverer, Cyrus, is at hand, whom the Almighty had been leading on in a wondrous career of victory (xli. 1-7), in order that he might burst open Babylon's gates of brass (xlv. 1-4), overturn her idols (ch. xlvi.), and dash to the ground the "virgin daughter of Babylon." All those events, too, are stated to have been pre-arranged with the object of Jacob's deliverance (xlv. 4), and of the restoration of Israel "not for price, nor for reward." The coming deliverer was even to build the walls of Jerusalem, and to lay the foundations of the temple. Cyrus and Babylon, however, entirely disappear from view after ch. xlix. Grandeur and loftier visions than float before the Prophet's eye, who winds up his predictions with a picture of the future Zion, thoughts of which again and again have crossed his mind at various portions of the earlier chapters.

To ascribe a prophecy possessing such peculiarities to Isaiah, who lived in the Assyrian period, is, it is argued, contrary to all analogy. Prophets do, indeed, occasionally throw themselves forwards to an ideal standpoint, and from it depict the future. Such transferences are, however, only transient. "No such sustained transference to the future" can be pointed out "as would be implied if these chapters were by Isaiah, or for the detailed and definite description of the circumstances of a distant age" (Driver). If other Prophets predict the Restoration, they predict also the Exile, as in the cases of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. But in the second part of Isaiah the Captivity is spoken of as something present under which Israel was then suffering.

On the other hand, it may be fairly asked, if the second portion be supposed to have been written by the writer of the first portion of the Book, what need was there for that Prophet to repeat again and again his predictions of a coming exile? If, as is abundantly proved from passages in the first portion, the Prophet was able to transfer himself for a "transient" period to the standpoint of the future, what improbability is implied in the supposition that, after long pondering over the subject, he should have composed prophecies written entirely from that standpoint? It must be borne in mind, whatever theory of authorship be adopted, the second portion of Isaiah is a work sui generis. It is not a work which would have been expected from a writer at Babylon prior to the Restoration, and still less one who lived after that event. To this point we shall presently allude.

There are many passages in the first portion of the Book which predict a coming exile and a future restoration. Such thoughts underlie portions of the introductory chapters (cp. iii. 25, 26). The Captivity is distinctly spoken of at the end of the song of the vineyard (v. 5 sq.) and in the verses which follow after (v. 13-17). It is referred to in Isaiah's opening vision (vi. 11, 12). Captivity and restoration are mentioned in ii. 11 sq. We do not refer to the sayings in xxx. 12 or xxxii. 14, because they have probably a different force. If ch. xiii. be Isaianic, the judgment on Babylon is there distinctly predicted; and Israel's Captivity in Babylon must have been prophesied by Isaiah, if xxxix. 6, 7 be regarded as historically true.

There are, moreover, portions in the second part of the Book which have distinctly a pre-exilic stamp. Ewald and Bleek regard ch. lvi. and a portion of ch. lvii. as predictions of an age prior to the Exile. Ch. lix. and most of ch. lxxv. have also been assigned by other critics to the same period. The phenomena of the second part of the Book (if that portion be regarded as a whole) are not so very distinct from those of the other Prophets. The writer does occasionally refer to the circumstances of his age, and permits us now and then to see that, though generally writing from the standpoint of the Exile, he was himself living before the event had actually taken place, which he yet foresaw to be certain.

The fact must also be borne in mind, to which Bredekamp and others have called attention, that the author of the second part, amid all his denunciations against idolatry, does not show that acquaintance with the land or religion of Babylon which an exile in Babylon would naturally have displayed, and which is actually shown by Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and other Prophets.

If moreover we compare these chapters of Isaiah with the prophecies of Micah, the contemporary of Isaiah, the substance of their prophecies appears to be the same. Micah gives the same vivid picture of the future glory (iv. 1-6), found in the early part of Isaiah. He then transfers himself to the days of gloom and captivity, speaks of a coming restoration (iv. 6-7), predicts the recovery by Zion of her former dominion forfeited because of sin (iv. 8), depicts Zion in sorrow and travail (iv. 9), which bitter "pains" were to be the birth-throes of a glorious future (iv. 10)—a picture somewhat similar to that in Isaiah lxxvi. 5-9. The nation, however, must go to Babylon, and in that place its redemption would take place (iv. 10). The designs of Israel's foes are sketched out (Micah iv. 11), which they in their blindness fancy they can carry out (Micah iv. 12; cp. Is. li. 17-23). Then follows a prediction of the sudden and unexpected victory of Zion (cp. Is. lvi. 5, 6 with Micah iv. 12, 13 and v. 18). Zion would be victorious, though brought into great extremities—the Deliverer would come at last (Micah iv. 13—v. 5). Later on in the prophecy, the ruin of Israel, then actually impending, is spoken of (Micah v. 10-15). And it is worthy of note that if Isaiah does not forget to allude to the oppression of the Assyrian (in lii. 4), the thoughts of Isaiah's contemporary also recur to that Assyrian foe, as an enemy which would only be completely vanquished by the Messiah (Micah v. 5, 6).

The fact is that in both the first and second portions of Isaiah, and in Micah, the same apocalyptic "dreams" are to be found. Visions of mercy and judgment strangely commingling,—visions which come and go, and again reappear, but by no means always in chronological order.

This argument is, of course, based on the text of the Prophet Micah as handed down to us; not on that Prophet's writings as revised by critics. We are aware that critics would erase from the page of Micah the clause that speaks of the Babylonish Captivity, on the ground of its want of harmony with the immediate context. We cannot coincide with that opinion. We look with suspicion on the plan of revising old texts with the view of bringing them into harmony with modern critical conjectures, and thus unduly tampering with documentary evidence. There is too great a tendency to treat the Books of the Prophets as heaps of broken fragments, thrown to a great extent promiscuously together, out of which the critic has to select according to fancy those "remains" which appear to him to be genuine. Such is the position taken up by no less a critic than Giesebrecht in his Beiträge zur Jesaiakritik (cp. p. 86). One may confidently predict that criticism will return at no distant time to safer and surer principles.

2. Another independent line of argument which, it is affirmed, leads also to a conclusion fatal to the Isaianic authorship of this portion, is drawn from its literary style. It ought, however, to be clearly understood that the critics of to-day do not affirm that the Hebrew of the second portion of Isaiah belongs necessarily to a later period. From a purely linguistic point of view, it may now safely be affirmed that the Hebrew of both portions as we have it belongs substantially to one and the same era. The difference in literary style between the first and the second portions is, however, undeniable, and that difference can be well understood by students of the Bible who may be acquainted only with English. Isaiah's style exhibits certain marked peculiarities. He makes use of allusions and illustrations found in no other O. T. writer. It can be shown that a number of these occur in the first part of the book, and are conspicuously absent from the second, in which portion "new images and phrases are found instead." A list of these phenomena will be found in Driver's Introduction. Some of them may be fairly accounted for by the change of both subject and standpoint; but the force of the argument of course lies in its cumulative character.

We admit the fact of the existence of such phenomena, but question the conclusions drawn therefrom. In the earlier portion of his life, Isaiah had to denounce prevalent sins, especially that of idolatry, and to predict coming judgment. The Prophet was then one of the foremost counsellors of the state. He spoke of "the judge standing at the door," of the executors of God's wrath as having already begun their fatal work. Denunciation was the staple theme then of his discourses. Terse, sharp, and compact sentences were well fitted to such a mission. Force and power had to be called into play. But, on the hypothesis of the Isaianic composition of the second part, the circumstances were completely altered when the Prophet in his old age penned those predictions. He was no longer a leader of the people. Though in or about Jerusalem, he had retired from public life, to some spiritual "Patmos," where he brooded over the future, and on the mount of vision dreamed apocalyptic dreams and jotted down those musings. Transported in thought to the distant future, he sat down "in spirit" among the exiles of Israel, and, the storm having already spent its violence, consoles them with bright hopes of the future. It was quite natural for the Prophet then to speak of Jahveh's majesty in opposition to the vain gods of the heathen. Like Paul in the shipwreck, he reminds the people of the future of Jahveh's faithfulness to His ancient covenant, which was not forgotten notwithstanding that He had "hid for a moment His face" from His people. The theme of the Prophet at that time was of the days of restoration which he had previously predicted, but which were now to be set forth as close at hand. In such descriptions a "warm and impassioned rhetoric," a "flowing style," "pathos" in all its depth and winsomeness, were what was essentially required.

3. It is further argued, that "the theological ideas" presented in the second part of the Book, "in so far as they are not of that fundamental kind common to the Prophets generally," when compared with those of the former portion are "much larger and fuller;" and further, that those truths are not merely "affirmed," but are "made the subject of reflexion and argument" (Driver). But such phenomena are not opposed to the traditional hypothesis. If a nation, which it was foreseen would be driven into captivity because of aggravated offences, was at last to be raised from the position of slaves to that of free men, would it not be necessary to dilate somewhat fully on the absolute vanity of the gods of their conquerors, and on the might, majesty, and infinity of the Most High? It was not the Divine plan when rescuing His people from captivity "a second time" to do so by a display of miraculous power. The comparatively brief period during which the nation was in captivity in Babylon, compared with the centuries of Egyptian bondage, and the comparative liberty enjoyed under that second period of serfdom, may have rendered external miracles unnecessary in the day of "glorious Return." But if the Most High was to work by stirring "the hearts of His faithful people," it was necessary that some Prophet, in anticipation of that day of liberty, should draw out from the admitted principles of revelation the lessons likely to awaken, elevate, comfort, and console the exiles of Israel at the great foreseen crisis. It mattered not for that special purpose whether the work were performed by an Isaiah of Jerusalem or an Isaiah of Babylon. But we object to inventing a new prophet, of whose existence history and tradition are alike silent, and to dub the new creature of critical invention by the name of "the great Unknown," or even by that of "Isaiah of Babylon."

If Isaiah could project himself, as it were, into the future, and under Divine inspiration lay up store for the coming days of spiritual dearth, there is little difficulty to be found in the fact that the picture of the Messianic King, so often presented before, should be let to drop out of sight; and that he should be led on to paint for those in servitude that masterpiece of "the suffering Servant," wounded for offences not His own, Who was to "make intercession for the transgressors." The second part of Isaiah moves unquestionably "in a different region of thought;" but this phenomenon, often dwelt upon as if it were a discovery of modern times, has at all times been more or less observed, and is quite consistent with the hypothesis that Isaiah was the author also of the second part.

Certain characteristics common to both portions have induced critics who have abandoned the idea of Isaiah's authorship to maintain that the writer of the second portion was one of the later scholars of Isaiah. The following list, which might considerably be added to, is given by Bredenkamp:—"The commencement of ch. xl. sounds almost like a continuation of the close of the first part (xxxv. 3 sq.). The close of both portions presents a judgment upon Edom (cp. ch. xxxiv. with ch. lxiii.). Two sentences, almost word for word, are found in both parts: cp. lxxv. 25 with xi. 9, and lv. 11 with xxxv. 10. Many thoughts peculiar to Isaiah found in the first portion recur in the second, and expressions such as the Holy One of Israel (קדוש יִשְׂרָאֵל), King (מֶלֶךְ), used of God; the figure anadiplosis (cp. vii. 9, xviii. 2, 7, xxi. 11, xxviii. 10, 13, xxxi. 1, xl. 1, xli. 24, xliiii. 11, 25, xlvi. 11, &c.) are met with in both parts." The second portion does not present the appearance of being one continuous prophecy, although the prophecies which it contains run mainly on one grand theme. Those prophecies are most certainly not vaticinia post eventum. For no one who had witnessed the scenes of the Return, as narrated in the pages of Ezra and Nehemiah, could have indulged in the gorgeous ideal pictures of the second part of Isaiah. And although we admit that glosses pointing out fulfilments are occasionally to be found in the text, and on such a principle would explain the mention of Cyrus by name, we cannot regard the second portion as non-Isaianic.

The difficulties which beset the theory that the name of a prophet of the very foremost rank (like the author of these chapters) could have entirely vanished from the memory of the people who were awakened and aroused to action by his songs are much more serious than those which attend on the traditional view.

The second part of Isaiah falls into three divisions:—(1) chs. xl.–xlvi. treat of the Return, the mission of "the Servant of Jahveh" in general, the mission of Cyrus in particular, Babylon's downfall, and the folly of idolatry. (2) chs. xlix.–lv., the Servant and His mission in more detail, with Israel's weakness and sin. To this are added several chapters (lvi.–lix.) loosely connected together. (3) chs.

lx.-lxvi. describe the Zion of the future, its light and glory—the inner and the outer restoration and purification.

(1) The mission of comfort—ch. xl. Contrast the ideas with those in Lam. i. 2, 9, 16, 17, 21, &c. Jahveh returns to His people; hence days of mourning are at an end. A way is made for Him in the wilderness. Valleys are exalted, mountains levelled, crooked paths made straight. The glory of the Lord is revealed, and all flesh together behold it. A voice cries: Israel's foes are mortal, while Jahveh's word stands fast. His promises are irrevocable. His messengers on the mountains proclaim to Jerusalem and her sister cities, "Behold thy God." The arm of the Mighty has wrought salvation. Israel is brought back as the reward of victory. Jahveh leads them along gently, as a shepherd does sheep, not to be overdriven (Gen. xxxiii. 13). He is wise and strong, though the idols to which men liken Him are very vanity. He gives strength to the faint, and to those that wait on Him.

Ch. xli. 1-7 depicts a judgment scene. Jahveh commands silence. The nations are summoned to reply. Who stirred up Cyrus, the conqueror from the East? Who prepared him for his work and led him on to victory? The answer is: "I Jahveh, the first and the last, I am He." The terrified nations made "new gods" (cp. Judg. v. 8), but Cyrus' course of conquest and victory was arrested by no such devices.

While the nations are alarmed, Israel is comforted. Israel, Jahveh's servant (v. 8), is not forgotten. His Redeemer remembers the "worm Jacob;" and, while nations are trodden like straw (cp. xxv. 10), Zion is "a sharp threshing instrument, which shall thresh the mountains and beat them small" (v. 15; cp. Micah iv. 11-13). Israel is apparently victorious on a battle-field, but the scene is rapidly transformed: caravans of exiles, poor and needy, traverse a wilderness, seeking water but finding none, when suddenly springs burst forth, and along their path plants and trees appear with grateful shade. Israel once more recognises that it is Jahveh Who is leading them through the wilderness.

But the judgment scene reappears (xli. 21 sq.). The nations and their gods are summoned: "Jahveh judgeth among the gods" (Ps. lxxxii. 2; cp. Ps. xc. 3, xvi. 4, 5, xvii. 6-9). But those "things of nothing" cannot speak. Their work is nought, they cannot show that they are gods (v. 23). Jahveh as Judge answers (vv. 25-29): "I have raised up one from the north, and he is come." Cyrus is represented (v. 25) as already present. His victories were foreknown and predicted by Jahveh, Who is the first that gives to Zion (so Dillmann) a "behold, behold them (i.e. thy children, xlix. 18; lx. 4), and to Jerusalem one that brings good tidings" (see xl. 9). Of all the gods of the nations not one can utter a word.

"The Servant of Jahveh" (spoken of in xli. 8, 9) now appears on the scene (xlii. 1 sq.). The same appellation is applied to Israel (xli. 8, 9; xlii. 19; xlv. 1, 2, 21; xlv. 4; xlviii. 20), but the Personal Servant is a distinct character. Israel and "the Servant" are the two witnesses (xliii. 10) adduced to give evidence.

Verses 1-7 reveal "the Servant" as distinct from the nation. His mission concerned Israel and the nations. Israel was, indeed, chosen as Jahveh's servant, to be a blessing to all the nations. But Israel failed to perform that mission, fainted, and was weary (xl. 27 sq.). The personal "Servant" would not fail nor be discouraged until His work was done (xlii. 4). Israel longed to destroy her adversaries (Num. xxiv. 8); this Servant would bless them altogether (xlii. 1-3, 6, 7), for He teaches the Gentiles religion and restores Israel (cp. xlix. 6). Such are the points referred to, and "the far-reaching prevision of the prophet deserves notice" (Driver). The Servant is called, upheld and kept by Jahveh "to be a covenant of the people" (v. 6). Jahveh will not give His glory to another, nor His praise unto graven images (v. 8).

"The former things" (xlii. 9) are the Divine prophecies fulfilled in former days, and not predictions concerning Cyrus' early victories. God's prophecies were fulfilled in the past, and the fresh predictions now uttered would be accomplished in their season (Bredenkamp). Cp. xliii. 12, 13, 18, 19.

The "new song" in xlii. 10-12 reminds one of xxiv. 14-16. Verses 13-17 depict Jahveh going forth as "the mighty man" (נַחֲשׁוֹן) to execute vengeance. Before Him mountains are laid waste, all herbage withers, rivers become islands, pools are dried up, that He may bring the blind by a way they know not, and lead back His people. The expression "I will not forsake thee" (v. 16) is a quotation from Josh. i. 6. A comparison is mentally drawn between the deliverance out of Egypt and that from Babylon (cp. xi. 11 sq.). The pictures presented in vv. 22-25 recall incidents of the days of the Judges.

The description of the blindness and perverseness of Israel in the character of Jahveh's servant harmonises with its context. The "deaf" and "blind" servant of vv. 19, 20 is not Messiah, but the nation which had promised obedience at Sinai, and is consequently described as "he who is at peace with Me" (R. V. Cp. xxvii. 5). The part, עַבְדִּי (v. 19, found there only), is explained by Ewald, Cheyne, &c., as synonymous with Moslem, sur-rendered (to God's service). But the verb, as Dillmann notes, occurs in that meaning only in Arab. and Aram.; and in those languages only in hiphil. Hence the translation of the R. V. ("he that is at peace with Me") is better, and is that of Gesenius, Delitzsch, and Dillmann. The Personal Servant of Jahveh opens blind eyes, but the nation is blind; the nation is hid in prison houses (v. 22), but the Servant leads prisoners out of captivity. He is the Deliverer, Israel the delivered. The "practical incompetence" of Israel to perform such duties necessitated His mission.

But however blind and weak Israel is, although punished (vv. 24, 25) for her offences, Divine mercy begins with her. Ch. xliii. describes Jahveh leading forth His people. According to the Divine plan, the Persian must set them free, even though Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba (Merue in Ethiopia) be granted as Cyrus' reward (cp. Ezek. xxix. 20). The blind must see, the deaf hear (v. 8). Another judgment session is pictured (vv. 8-13). Nations and peoples assemble. They are called on to produce their witnesses of similar fulfilments, "that they may be justified" by the witnesses listening to the statements and affirming their truth. No witnesses can be adduced. Jahveh's two witnesses, Israel and His Servant, are again produced, that by comparison of prophecy and accomplishment men may acknowledge that Jahveh is "the same" (אני ה' "I am He"), present "yesterday" in prophecy, "to-day" (היום), xliii. 13) in redemption, "for ever" working for His people. Heb. xiii. 8 seems an imitation of this passage.

The march from Babylon to Jerusalem is again (xl. 14-21) described in words which recall Israel's ancient history. The transformation scenes, before depicted in ch. xxxv., xli. 17-20, reappear. The closing verses (22-28) are not a polemic against the sacrificial ritual, but prove that the neglect of God's outward worship shows that the redemption granted is an act of grace. The absence of all reference to the fact that sacrifices could not be offered to Jahveh in Babylon is in favour of the Isaianic authorship.

Ch. xli. shows that notwithstanding Israel's sin the Unchangeable did not forget His chosen. Blessings were in store for them. Water would be poured upon the thirsty, streams upon the dry ground, language which is explained of a pouring out of the Spirit of God. Hence Israel's young men (cp. Ps. cx. 3) range themselves on the side of Jahveh (v. 5). Israel need not fear. Her King and Redeemer promises prosperity, and Israel is witness that there is no god beside Him (vv. 6-8). Idols are nothing; they cannot aid their votaries. The folly of idolatry is again dwelt on, more fully than in xl. 18 sq., or in xli. 5-7. God's forgiving grace is set forth in magnificent language in vv. 21-23, and the chapter closes with the Divine commission given to Cyrus as Jahveh's Shepherd to lead home His flock. Cyrus is here first mentioned by name (vv. 24-28).

While we admit the possibility of the revelation to the Prophet of the name of Cyrus, an examination of the passages in which it occurs favours the view that not only the name Cyrus but some of the details in those prophecies are later insertions belonging to a time when text and comments were interwoven together. The "calling by name" spoken of in xlv. 3, 4, means more than a prediction of the name of the conqueror, as the use of that expression in reference both to Israel and the Personal Servant might suffice to prove (cp. xliiii. 1; xlix. 1).

The commission to Cyrus is given in xlv. 1-8. To the title of honour, "my shepherd," is there added משיח (xlv. 1), "his anointed." This is the only place in Isaiah where Messiah occurs, and the only passage where a heathen king is called by that term. Cyrus was probably a monotheist, although for political reasons represented in his cylinder as a worshipper of Bel, Nebo, and Merodach, the gods of Babylon. In the light of recent discovery it is questionable whether the older interpreters were correct in expounding xlv. 27 of the literal drying up of the Euphrates (cp. the figurative use of that expression in Zech. x. 11), or whether xlv. 1, 2 can be regarded as predicting literally the carrying of the gods of Babylon into captivity.

The expression "though thou hast not known Me," repeated twice for emphasis (xlv. 4, 5), ought to have warned commentators against supposing that Cyrus was a worshipper of Jahveh. His employment of the sacred Name in the proclamation (set forth Ezra i. 2 sq.), if an exact copy of Cyrus' edict be there given, was but another case of political expediency. The expressions used in v. 7, interpreted in the light of Lam. iii. 38 and Amos iii. 6, contain no reference to the Persian theological dualism.

Verse 8 is a short hymn of great beauty. Vv. 9-17 condemn those who murmur against the Divine method of Israel's redemption by the instrumentality of a heathen monarch (see Dillmann's Commentary). It is absurd for a potsherd to dictate to the potter how to perform his work. The simile is common to both parts of Isaiah (xxix. 16, lxiv. 7), and occurs in Jer. xviii. 6, xix. 1 sq., Rom. ix. 20 sq. Jahveh chose His own instrument, and through Cyrus He accomplished Israel's deliverance.

Cyrus did not, however, himself rebuild Jerusalem or the Temple. Bald literal exposition would ruin all Hebrew prophecy. The statements respecting the Sabeans (v. 14) also cannot be understood literally. The Sabeans, as representatives of the Gentiles, are described as voluntarily becoming Israel's slaves by adopting her religion, and thus recognising that there is no other God and that Israel is His people. So correctly Hitzig, Delitzsch, Cheyne, and Dillmann.

The references to the history of creation in Genesis in xlv. 18-20 are noteworthy. If creation began with chaos (אֵתֶר, v. 18) earth was not left in that condition or in darkness (אֵתֶר, Gen. i. 2). Jahveh's creative word said not to "the seed of Jacob . . . seek Me in a waste (אֵתֶר)." Creation and redemption reveal a God Who speaks and it is done, Who commands and it stands fast. Israel's redemption is eternal, "an everlasting salvation" (v. 17), and consequently, as Cheyne observes, is "spiritual as well as temporal." Hence the salvation that comes from the Jews, and is designed for "all the ends of the earth" (v. 22), is applied by St. Paul (Rom. xiv. 9-12) to the eternal kingdom of the Lord's Christ. The Pauline comparison of creation and redemption (2 Cor. iv. 5, 6) is perhaps borrowed from Isaiah.

Idolatry has, indeed, reduced earth to chaos and darkness, for there can be no deliverance so long as men "pray to a god that cannot save" (xlv. 20), to idols which can be carried on the backs of beasts of burden (xlvi. 1), and go themselves into captivity (see before on xlv. 1). Idolaters carry their idols, but Jahveh carries His people (vv. 3 sq.). He can carry, aye He can deliver them. Cp. Num. xi. 12; Deut. i. 31, xxxiii. 11; Hos. xi. 3.

The folly of idolaters is depicted again in vv. 6, 7. These remarks are closely connected with the subject treated of. Idolatry is condemned not so dissimilarly in i. 29-31; ii. 18-21; xvii. 7-11; xxi. 9; xxx. 22; xxxi. 6, 7. The play upon words in xlv. 1, the expression "house of Jacob and all the remnant of the house of Israel," the irony that pervades the whole passage—all these are indicative of Isaiah's pen. To him the land of the Persian conqueror was "a far country" (v. 11, cp. xiii. 5). A post-exilic prophet would hardly thus have expressed himself. The use of לָרֵי to indicate the Divine purpose, and its combination with the other verbs in that verse, are Isaianic touches (cp., with Delitzsch, xxii. 11; xxxvii. 26). It would have been strange if the text had not been interlarded with post-exilic comments—comments so frequently repeated for the consolation of the exiles that they were regarded at least as part of the original. Cyrus is forcibly described as a ravenous bird or vulture from the east descending upon the Babylonian carcass, though it may be fanciful to see any reference here to the standard of Cyrus, the golden spread eagle on the lofty spear (Xenoph. Cyropaed. vii. cap. i. 4).

The song (ch. xlvii.) on the downfall of Babylon is particularly fine. The proud daughter of the Chaldeans is commanded by Jahveh to descend from her throne, and take the place of the meanest slave. Stripped of her veil and train, she is compelled to grind the meal, to bare her legs, to wade through waters, and to endure dishonour. Verse 4 is no doubt a later insertion from "a marginal note" (Cheyne), for the speaker throughout ch. xlvii. is Jahveh. The song is Isaianic; v. 4, and probably v. 6, later insertions. Verse 5 may be compared with xiii. 19; and v. 14 recalls v. 24 and other passages. Verse 8 is quoted by Zephaniah ii. 15—not the only quotation which that Prophet makes from Isaiah. No enchantments can avert the Divine judgment; not even the world-wide commerce of Babylon can rescue her from her doom (vv. 12–15).

Ch. xlviii. is a comment on the previous prophecies. The phraseology is Isaianic, worked over by a later hand, prophetic text and prophetic comment being so intermixed that they cannot be separated. Verse 1 does not distinguish between Israel and Judah, but claims for Judah the title and inheritance of Israel. Such expressions need not indicate a pre-exilic author. The idea of "the ten lost tribes" is purely mythical. All Israelites after the Exile were termed "Jews," and one-fourth of the first returning exiles were not members of the two tribes (see my Bampton Lectures, p. 278 sq.). The expression "holy city" (Dan. ix. 24; Neh. xi. 1) occurs in v. 2, lii. 1, and in plur. in lxiv. 10 (cp. Zech. ii. 16). The "former things" (v. 3) need not be limited to the prophecies concerning the Assyrian invasion (Klost., Brendenkamp). The "new things" (v. 6) refer to the deliverance through Cyrus. Idolatry was rife enough among Israel in Babylon (v. 5; cp. Ezek. xx. 30 sq.). The accomplishment of the "former things" should lead Israel to trust in the "new things" promised (v. 6). According to v. 7, the fulfilment had already begun. Hence the use of לָרֵי . Israel did not hear or know of such things before; it did not comprehend the meaning of the events then transpiring. The nation was still unfaithful. Captivity had not purified it. God melted the nation in that furnace, "but not for silver" produced thereby. Ewald and Dillmann regard קַסְפָּה (v. 10) as the ḥ pretii; Delitzsch, Cheyne, and R. V., less suitably, as ḥ essentialis ("not as silver"). See i. 22, 25, and cp. Jer. vi. 29, 30. The restoration was an act of grace performed for the glory of God, and not for the merit of Israel.

The hand of the post-exilic enlarger is seen in the exhortations vv. 12–22. But the thoughts and verbiage are still mainly Isaianic. The expression concerning Cyrus, "Jahveh hath loved him" (v. 14), is striking. Cyrus would execute Jahveh's purposes upon Babylon, and the arm of the Almighty judgment would descend on the Chaldeans. We can touch but lightly on much that is remarkable. Dillmann is right in maintaining that, notwithstanding v. 16 b, Jahveh is throughout the speaker. If Jahveh rained down brimstone and fire out of heaven from Jahveh (Gen. xix. 24), why should not Jahveh be represented as sending Jahveh and His Spirit on a mission of mercy to teach and to redeem His people? Prophetic poetry often expresses profound theology. The path of peace is that of obedience (v. 18), and "there is no peace, saith Jahveh, unto the wicked."

(2) In the second portion, chs. xlix.–li., the names of Babylon, Israel's oppressor, and that of Cyrus, her Gentile deliverer, completely vanish. A greater than Cyrus and a grander mission are there depicted. The Servant of Jahveh is described as a polished shaft from the Divine quiver, called, like Jeremiah (i. 5), from the womb to be a prophet to the isles and peoples; his mouth is a sharp sword (v. 1, 2) to slay the wicked (cp. xi. 4). The coming Prophet is distinguished from Israel (vv. 6, 8, 9), and yet addressed as "My servant Israel" (v. 3). That appellation, though unique, presents no difficulty. Why should not Messiah be called by the name of Israel as well as by that of Adam or of David? The title Servant of Jahveh is bestowed alike on prophet and people; and the name Israel may well be given to one described in this prophecy as having "power with God and prevailing" (Gen. xxxii. 28).

The Servant is the Restorer of Israel (xlix. 5). But that is not large enough for His powers. He is to be the Light of the Gentiles, the Saviour of the world (v. 6). Despised by man, abhorred by Israel, a servant of rulers, kings and princes yet fall down before Him (v. 7). Described (xlii. 4) as never failing nor discouraged, He complains (xlix. 4) that His labour is in vain. The "crying" is heard and answered (v. 8), for the Servant's work cannot be unsuccessful. Notice how early those dark shadows appear which envelope the Servant in ch. liii. The delineation is throughout a strange blending of humiliation and glory.

The Servant was given "as a covenant to the people" (xlix. 8). This is repeated from xlii. 6. The Restoration of Israel is described (vv. 9–12) in language like that of ch. xxxv. The multitude of rescued Israelites gathered from all quarters (as in xi. 10–16) is exhibited to Zion's astonishment, who imagined that the Lord had forgotten her. Here also is a strange blending of opposites. The nations carry back in their bosoms or on their shoulders the sons and daughters of Israel (vv. 22, 23); but the captives are also spoken of (vv. 24–26) as torn by the arm of the Mighty One of Israel from the grasp of their foes.

Jahveh had not cast off His people. The temporary divorce was Israel's act (l. 1, 2). Though when called back Israel did not hearken, the Unchangeable was still omnipotent to save (vv. 3, 4). The Servant is re-introduced again (in vv. 4, 5). He speaks and explains His actions. Divine inspiration was imparted to Him, not only in night visions, but in daily open intercourse with Jahveh. Bitter were His sorrows, disgraceful His treatment by men (vv. 6, 7). Undismayed, however, by sufferings, the Servant knows that Jahveh will help and justify, and therefore boldly defies all His adversaries (vv. 7-9). The note of defiance sounded by the Master was caught up by the great disciple (Rom. viii. 31 sq.). Both the ecclesia pressa of the Old and New Testament days have similar experiences, and therefore their sorrows and joys may be expressed in the same language. The Servant of v. 10 is not, as Cheyne suggests, the writer of the prophecy, but the speaker of vv. 4-5. To His speech, however, the writer utters an Amen in the exhortation (vv. 10, 11), in which, like the Psalmist (ii. 10-12), he urges to faith and obedience. Those who gird themselves with fire-brands to destroy God's people (Ps. vii. 13) shall be driven into the destruction they deserve.

Ch. li. is addressed to Israel κατὰ πνεῦμα. Jahveh, or the Servant as His Representative, is the speaker. Vv. 7, 8 are an echo of the Servant's words in l. 9. The analogy of Heb. i. 10 sq. would justify a similar explanation of vv. 4-6. In v. 5 the phraseology employed in reference to the Servant in xlii. 4 recurs, and in v. 16 that found before in xlix. 2, 3. The stories of Eden (v. 3), of Abraham and Sarah (v. 2), of the Law (v. 4), Egypt's overthrow (v. 9) and of the passage of the Red Sea (vv. 10-15), are all alluded to as reasons for comfort. Heaven and earth pass away (v. 6), God's words stand fast (cp. Luke xxi. 33). The ideas of v. 11 are a repetition of xxxv. 10. The passage is Isaianic, though portions are like Jeremiah. Cp. v. 15 with Jer. xxxi. 35; and the scenes presented in Jer. xxv. 15-18, 27, 28, with vv. 17, 21-23. Jeremiah may have quoted from Isaiah.

In lii. 1-12 Zion is aroused by a new cry to awake, for salvation is nigh at hand. The day of liberty has dawned. No compensation will be made to her oppressor for releasing her from bondage. Egypt and Assyria both oppressed her without cause, and so did Babylon. God's Name was blasphemed; that Name would now be honoured. Part of the scene is ideally laid in Palestine. Zion in ruins is the slumbering Jerusalem awakened by watchers on the mountains surrounding her, who announce, "Thy God reigneth." These are not, as Cheyne suggests, "ideal supersensible beings," "angelic remembrancers." It may be well to caution some that Dan. iv. 17 (in Heb. v. 14) is not analogous, for "watchers" there is a very different word. A part of the scene is laid in Babylon. The Israelites are bidden to go forth from thence, and carry back "the vessels of Jahveh" to Jerusalem. The Levitical ritual is alluded to in v. 11; the march from Babylon being there contrasted with, and compared to, the memorable march out of Egypt (v. 12).

With the הנה ישכיל עברי of lii. 13 a new sub-section commences, which ends with liii. 12. The passage is theologically connected with the preceding, but otherwise marked off from it. The subject is different. The linguistic peculiarities of the piece are so striking that some critics have regarded it as an interpolation. The style is "obscure and awkward" (Delitzsch), notwithstanding that several phrases already used of the Servant reappear. The passage breaks the connexion between lii. 12 and ch. liv. It was probably composed by the Prophet after some vision which he "saw," but which, however, he does not describe but expound. Believers in the N. T. revelation may well imagine that the Prophet himself did not understand its full import (1 Pet. i. 11, 12). The enigma could not be solved until seen in the light of the Cross.

It is impossible to attempt a satisfactory sketch of the exegesis of the passage. We agree with those (1) who view it as a distinct Messianic prophecy. It may, perhaps (as Ewald suggests), contain reminiscences of a martyr scene in the days of Manasseh. The marked individuality of the description has led (2) able commentators to expound it of individual kings or prophets. Of such explanations the only one really worthy of mention is that of R. Saadiah, who considered Jeremiah its subject. Parallel passages in Jeremiah can be adduced which correspond strikingly with its expressions. Grotius upheld this view, and afterwards Bunsen, whose exposition is commended though not entirely endorsed by Rowland Williams (Essays and Reviews). (3) The attempt to explain the section of the Hebrew prophets is now abandoned. (4) Equally hopeless is the attempt to interpret it of Israel in general, as the guiltless martyrdom of the world. The idea is opposed to the view of Israel as the "sinful nation" given in both parts of the Book. (5) Some critics still, however, maintain that the picture drawn is that of the righteous in Israel, the Israel κατὰ πνεῦμα. The doctrine of v. 6 is, as Cheyne observes, fatal to that theory. (6) The opinion generally held by modern critics is that the ideal and not the actual Israel is here depicted, purified by afflictions and made an instrument of blessing to the world. This ideal Israel, amid all national apostasies or disasters, is regarded as always present before God and contemplated by Him with pleasure. This view is substantially that of Wellhausen, Cheyne, and Dillmann, though with modifications of detail. Bredenkamp remarks well that this picture of a mere abstraction "corresponds well with the meditation of a philosopher, but not with that of a Prophet."

Against the Messianic interpretation it is maintained that Messiah is not mentioned in the second part of Isaiah (lv. 4 is questionable), and that there is no passage which distinctly identifies Messiah with the Servant. It must be remembered, however, that a victorious King and an afflicted sin-bearing Sufferer could not be depicted in one view. The identification of the two ex hypothesi was not possible prior to the Resurrection of our Lord. It is further urged that the Servant is represented not as a future individual but as one actually present. That, however, does not hinder the passage from being a prophecy of future days. For both the sufferings and exaltation are represented as simultaneously present to the prophetic eye. The Prophet saw in the one picture the sufferings borne, the work done, the reward bestowed, the portion assigned, the spoil divided. This does not prove that the Prophet depicted events of his own time. The passage can in no wise represent the state of Israel in the day of the Restoration from Babylon.

Much may be said in favour of each of the views defended by critics. The Messianic interpretation unites all those points together. The Prophet evidently describes what he "saw." Every description of Messiah's sufferings must to some extent describe the sufferings of His nation, or of those individual followers who follow in His steps, as the Messiah does in theirs. The passages from Jeremiah adduced by Bunsen might be utilised in favour of the Isaianic authorship. Although the passage as a whole cannot be explained of the sufferings of the righteous, the Book of Daniel (xii. 3) apparently refers to liii. 11 as illustrating their work. The sporadic references to the Isaianic prophecy of the Servant in the Book of Wisdom (chs. ii. iii. iv. v.) show that the prophecy was then explained of the righteous in Israel. The LXX. translation of the prophecy follows in the same track, and modifies passages accordingly. Such was the natural line of exegesis prior to Christ. The perplexed inquiry of every deep thinker is, however, summed up in the question of the eunuch, who reading the passage with the comment of the LXX. asked, "Of whom speaketh the Prophet this? of himself, or of some other?" (Acts vii. 34). That earnest student saw clearly that the sufferings of an individual, and of an individual only, were pourtrayed upon the sacred page.

All the men of the N. T. expound the passage of Messiah. John the Baptist refers to it in his exclamation recorded in John i. 29; St. Matthew regards it as a prediction of Christ, the healer of disease (Matt. viii. 17). Our Lord alludes to the prophecy on several occasions (Mark ix. 12; Luke xxii. 37; prob. also Luke xxiv. 26). Both St. Paul (Rom. iv. 25) and St. Peter (1 Ep. ii. 21-25) quote it. See also the references in Acts iii. 13, 26 ("His Servant," R. V.), iv. 27; 1 Cor. xv. 3, &c.

The section depicts a stricken leper, disfigured so as to be scarcely human. Hence the Babylonian Talmud gives "the Leprous One" as a name of Messiah (Sanh. 98 b). But the wisdom of the "stricken" Sufferer followed by His exaltation "startles many nations." The translation "sprinkle," despite its difficulties, has much to commend it. Kings shut their mouths in astonishment at what they see and hear; while penitent Israel mourns its ill-treatment of the Sufferer. Including himself among his people (cp. vi. 5), the Prophet breaks into lamentations (liii. 1-3): "Who among us believed that which we heard" in the prophecies concerning this Righteous One? To whom was the arm of the Lord revealed in His exaltation? "For He grew up before Him (Jahveh) as a (slender) twig." The Servant was under Jahveh's protection in both His humiliation and glory. The statement is not "strangely inconsistent" (Cheyne); although if purely conjec-ral emendations were admissible, and in such a prophesy they are scarcely so, the emendation suggested by Ewald and Cheyne, "before us," i.e. in our streets, is perhaps more natural. The description "as a root out of a dry ground" is peculiarly Isaianic (cp. on the "root" xi. 1, 10, and Rev. v. 5, xxii. 6). The dry ground corresponds to the stump of Jesse's tree. "He hath no form nor comeliness, and when we see Him there is no beauty that we should desire Him." This historic present may be also rendered as a past, for the ill-treatment in v. 3 is described as something already past. "He was despised and rejected of men," or rather "deserted of men" (Cheyne), as Job xix. 14 explains the passage. The use of עָנָן shows that the reference is to the conduct of the great ones in Israel (Delitzsch). "A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," or rather, "a man of pains and familiar with sickness" (Cheyne). The objections of the Jewish controversialists against the Christian interpretation are easily met. Luke vi. 19, viii. 46, with Matt. viii. 17, show that our Lord's exertion of His healing power was not without having an effect on His own bodily frame. Moreover, "familiar with sickness" is part of the picture of the stricken leper from whom men averted their faces (cp. Job xxx. 10, xix. 13-19; Lam. iv. 15). The "mystery" is partly explained in vv. 4-6. The Servant's sufferings were vicarious, endured for His people. Wünsche enumerates the twelve distinct assertions contained in the chapter "of the vicarious character of the sufferings of the Servant" (Cheyne). Such language proves the prophecy to depict an individual.

The lamentation of Israel closes with the recognition that the Servant's sufferings were endured for her sake. The Prophet then narates at length the Servant's sinlessness and the indignities He endured (cr. 7-9). "He was oppressed," as if by slave-drivers (עָנָן; cp. Exod. iii. 7; Job iii. 18), "yet he humbled himself" (Niphal tolerativum; see Delitzsch, Cheyne), "and opened not his mouth" (cp. Ps. xxxviii. 14; xxxix. 9). "As a lamb that is led to the slaughter, and as a sheep that before her shearers is dumb; yea, He opened not His mouth" (R. V.). Jeremiah in xi. 9 seems to refer to this passage. But the conclusion of that verse forbids us to see in him the accomplishment of the prophecy. The Servant's humiliation was voluntary; there was a restraint of "power," a restraint of love (cp. Matt. xxvi. 53). "Through oppression, and through a judgment"—a judicial sentence—"He was taken away," condemned to death; "and as for His generation," or those who lived in His day (cp. Jer. ii. 31), "who among them considered that He was cut off from the land of the living? For the transgression of My people was He stricken!" The Messianic interpretation is quite unaffected whether עָנָן in the last clause be viewed as singular or plural. If the translation "who shall declare His generation" be preferred, Ps. xxii. 30 supplies a sufficient commentary. The prophecy is too striking to be regarded only as "a presentiment of the historical Redeemer."

With our present text, v. 9 must be rendered, "and one assigned His grave with the wicked (plural), and with a rich (man) in his deaths (emphatic plural, of violent death), because (or 'although') He had done no violence, neither was any deceit in His mouth." Rich is not, indeed, a suitable parallel to wicked, while the form of the sentence does not admit of its being explained as containing a contrast. The clause simply connects the two statements, which coincide remarkably with the Gospel history, and ought not to be tampered with by critical conjectures.

The concluding verses unfold the Divine purpose in such sufferings. The Servant is mystically identified with Israel, and therefore can offer Himself as a sin-offering. His vicarious sin-offering (חַטָּאת) expiates their guilt; His trespass-offering (עֲוֹן, v. 10) makes satisfaction (see Delitzsch). Cheyne well compares v. 10 with the phrase used by our Lord, τιθέναι τὴν ψυχὴν (John x. 11). Mediaeval Jewish controversialists argued from v. 10, that Messiah would have children. The original, however, is "a seed," not "his seed" (cp. Ps. xxii. 30). The closing verses speak of the Servant's exaltation anticipated in lii. 13, 14. מְרִיבִי, many, ought to be uniformly translated throughout. It is anarthous in lii. 14, and liii. 12 at end. It has the article in liii. 11, and in the beginning of v. 12; and qualifies "nations" in lii. 15. The Pauline use of οἱ πολλοί in Rom. vi. 15-19 is the key to its meaning. The Servant's continued intercession (פְּדוּתָא, v. 12; cp. Jer. xv. 11) is affirmed. Cp. Luke xxiii. 34; Acts v. 31. The Hebrew Prophets were not restrained by modern ideas of literary harmony; and if clauses occur in such a prophecy more suitable to priest than victim, they should be left intact, for the Redeemer is portrayed under both characters.

The six chapters which follow (ch. liv.-lix.) are not closely connected. Ch. liv. would suitably follow lii. 12. The ideal or spiritual Zion is addressed throughout. "The Servant of Jahveh" occurs no more, though "servants of Jahveh" are spoken of (v. 17; cp. lxxv. 13 sq.). "The suffering and glory of the Servant and the servants are similar, but not identical" (Bredenkamp). Wellhausen regards ch. liv. to lvi. 8 "to some extent as a sermon on the text lii. 13—liii. 12;" but this is, as Cheyne observes, in the interests of his theory that the Servant is not an individual. There is nothing in ch. liv. opposed to the Isaianic authorship.

Chapter lv. is complete in itself. It is a discourse designed to stir up faith in coming deliverance. God's purposes are sure, and the exiles shall return (vv. 8-13). It may have also a higher meaning. The similarity to ch. xxv. is in favour of the authorship of Isaiah. Critics differ whether David or Messiah is the subject of v. 3. The former is the better view (cp. 2 Sam. vii. 12-16). Ps. lxxxvi. may serve as commentary. The Davidic covenant is, however, only fulfilled in Messiah. By virtue of his religion (Ps. xviii. 43) David was a witness as well as a ruler. Rev. i. 5, iii. 14 refer to this passage, and Hengstenberg has properly called attention to Christ's words before Pilate (John xviii. 37).

Chapter lvi. 1-8 refers to the Israelites in Babylon, where some of them were forcibly made eunuchs. Isaiah's prophecy (ch. xxxix. 7) makes it natural for him to drop some words of comfort for those that would be so cruelly treated. Eunuchs were shut out from the congregation of Israel (Deut. xxiii. 1). But the restrictions of the Mosaic law, both as to eunuchs and foreigners, are represented as abolished for those who keep the Lord's sabbaths. The advent of the day is predicted when Israel's outcasts, with "the nations," would worship in the Temple. The conceptions of the Prophet are identical with those in ii. 2, 3.

Very different in character is lvi. 9—lvii. 21. It seems out of place here. Ewald, with other critics, regard it as decidedly pre-exilian, if not Isaianic. It speaks of Israel's watchmen as dumb dogs. The wild beasts are invited to devour the flock. The righteous perish, and idolatry in its vilest and most cruel form erects its head. Verse 14 seems an interpolation; but lvii. 15-21 is a prophecy of final salvation, probably Isaianic, and inserted here in order that Israel, after contemplating her sin, might yet have hope in God.

Chapter lviii. is a penitential discourse wholly different. Formality in religion, trust in external fasts, combined with neglect of the poor and afflicted, is here denounced. The subject-matter harmonizes with i. 10-20. If the chapter be Isaianic, v. 12 must be a later insertion. The need of θρησκεία καθάρη καὶ ἀλατρός (Jas. i. 27) is a doctrine not peculiarly suggestive of a time of exile.

Many critics regard ch. lix. as a continuation of ch. lviii. But this is scarcely possible. The sins described are crimes of violence, murder, and robbery. Ewald long ago maintained the colouring to be pre-exilic. The correspondence with Isaianic portions is very marked. Bredenkamp notes that v. 18 re-echoes i. 24 b, and v. 20 reminds of i. 27. Vv. 19, 20 recall xxx. 27, 28, 33. The mention of serpents, bears, doves, &c., and the description of armour are all Isaianic. The section speaks no doubt of judgment, leading to repentance, and v. 12 sq. is a penitential confession of sin. But the same mention of mercy and judgment, of the destruction of sinners, and of the salvation of the penitent, is exhibited in i. 27, 28. Verse 20 is regarded as Messianic in Rom. xi. 26, and referred to the Second Advent. A Redeemer

(יְהוָה) is to come to Zion, to a repentant people, for, as Cheyne observes, "the Messianic promises to Israel are only meant for a converted and regenerated people."

The last seven chapters of Isaiah (chs. lx.-lxvi.) describe the renovated Jerusalem. As Babylon was commanded to descend from the throne to the dungeon (ch. xlvi.), Zion is bidden to arise from slavery, and behold light and glory streaming in upon her. There is more predicted than the return of Solomonic prosperity (cp. v. 17 with 1 K. x. 21). The vision is of the last things seen in Old Test. light. Zion's walls are rebuilt by the nations who once demolished them in anger. For the nations with their kings, willing or unwilling (v. 10), bring back to Jerusalem Israel's exiles, with silver and gold, and sacrifices innumerable. Vv. 18-20 describe, however, more than earthly glory, and the Seer of Patmos has, therefore, employed Isaiah's language in relating his N. T. visions (Rev. xxi. 23-26; xxii. 5). The similitudes of vv. 6, 7 are pre-exilian, though some have imagined a reference (in v. 8) to the names of the walls of Babylon (cp. Schrader, KAT. on 1 K. vii. 21). The actual appears amid the ideal; for amid strains of peace there are notes of war (see v. 12 and cp. Zech. xiv. 17, 18).

The speaker in ch. lxi. is probably the Prophet himself, although the words suit the Servant who is also Prophet; and consequently were suitably quoted as fulfilled in the synagogue of Nazareth (Luke iv. 16-22. Cp. Heb. i. 1 sq.). The statement in reference to the Gentiles in v. 5 is in a lower strain than in other places (cp. lxvi. 21). The reference to the old ruins in v. 4 is not necessarily post-Babylonian. The Prophet is also speaker in lxiii. 1-5, the language of which is Isaianic and highly figurative. The name Hephzibah, mentioned v. 4, was that of Hezekiah's queen (2 K. xxi. 1). The "watchers" in v. 6 are not Angels (Ewald and Cheyne). It is, as Bredekamp observes, not ruins which are there spoken of, but the walls of a city actually standing. In the name "Forsaken One" (v. 40; cp. v. 12) there may lurk a reference to some lost tale concerning Jehoshaphat's mother (1 K. xxi. 42). Note the recurrence in v. 11 of the words of xl. 10, and in v. 12 of the ideas presented in iv. 3, xxxv. 10.

Ch. lxiii. 1-6 is a fitting parallel to ch. xxiv. Its Isaianic character is confessed even by some modern critics. A post-exilian author would scarcely express himself thus. There are several of the plays upon words so characteristic of Isaiah. Calvin long ago protested against the idea that these verses were prophetic of Calvary. It is a prophecy of a day of vengeance on Edom and on the nations (v. 6). Their downfall must precede Israel's revival. The language and phraseology reappear in Rev. xix. It is probable that lxiii. 7-14 with lxiv. is a post-exilian meditation. Vv. 18, 19, with lxiv. 9-12, must have been composed at the close of the Babylonian Captivity. The references in the prayer to Israel's ancient history are most interesting.

Ch. lxv. 1-7 is not, properly speaking, an answer to the prayer of the preceding chapter, though possibly inserted by the editor with that intent. The whole style of thought is pre-exilian. The sins described are those so common in the last days of Israel's commonwealth. Ezekiel speaks of such as then practised in Jerusalem. Judgments are denounced upon the guilty idolaters, though God's "servants" are remembered in mercy, and "the remnant" protected. For the righteous days of blessing are predicted—new heavens and a new earth (vv. 17, 18). The scenery of ch. xi. is repeated. No mention is made here of exiles, of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. A fairer vision floats before the Prophet's view, that of a world with the curse removed.

It is not easy to assign a satisfactory date to ch. lxvi., or to summarize it in a few sentences. If composed after the Return, its statements would have been too glaringly opposed to what men's eyes then beheld. It appears to us Isaianic, though probably "worked over" by a later hand. It describes the glories of the Return, and the exclusion of the sinners from the congregation of the holy. The destruction of these ungodly is represented as taking place on earth. But the visions, though connected with the real, are concerned with matters beyond those of earth. Both in describing blessings and judgments there is no fixed line of demarcation between the things seen and those not seen.

Literature.—It is impossible here to give anything like a complete survey of the extensive literature of the Book. Passing over the Patristic commentaries, among the Jewish may be mentioned those of Abarbanel (Lat. transl. 1520), Rashi (Lat. transl. by Breithaupt, 1713), Kimchi (Lat. transl. 1774), Ibn Ezra (transl. into Engl. by Friedländer, 1873-1877). Calvin's Comm. is still of value; Vitringa's, 2 vols. fol., 1714, 1720, and 1715, 1722. Bp. Lowth's Comm. is antiquated; Gesenius, Comm. 1821; Hitzig, 1833; Drechsler, began 1845, compl. 1857; P. Schegg, 2 vols., 1850; Henderson (English), 1857; and still better J. A. Alexander, 2 vols. 1846, and edit. by Edie, 1865; S. D. Luzzato (Italian), 1855-1866; Ewald's Propheten, 1867, 1868, translated into English, and published by Williams & Norgate; A. Knobel, 1861, revised by Diestel, 1872, and re-written as an independent work by Dillmann, 1890. This latter is most important. Nägelsbach's Comm. in Lange's Bibelwerk, 1877, contains much that is important; it has been translated into English. Kay wrote in the Speaker's Comm., and T. R. Birks independently. Franz Delitzsch's great Comm. has been often revised; the 4th edit. appeared in 1889, and has been transl. and edited in English with a preface by S. R. Driver, 1890, 1891. The ablest English Comm. is that of T. K. Cheyne, 2 vols., 5th edit., 1889. Bredekamp's Comm., short but suggestive, appeared in 1887. The Comm. of von Orelli in 1887, transl. into English, and publ. by T. & T. Clark. Myrberg, in Swedish, 1888. Canon Rawlinson has written on Isaiah in the Pulp. Comm. Fresh and interesting are the vols. of G. A. Smith, 1889. Important, too, in this matter, is the new translation of the Bible by distinguished scholars (Die Heilige Schrift des A. T., 1890-2), edited by Kautzsch, with critical notes on the dates of each portion.

The student should consult all the various Introductions, especially that of Driver, 1891, 4th edit., 1892; and though brief, that of Cornill, 1891, if its conclusions are far too negative: also Driver's Isaiah, Life and Times, 1888; A. H. Sayce, with similar title, 1889; Sir E. Strachey, Jewish Hist. and Politics, 2nd edit. 1874; Klosterman's article in Herzog-Plitt; Cornill, in Stade's Zeitschrift, 1884. Among the most important monographs are the 2 vols. on Isaiah liii. according to the Jewish Interpreters, Text by A. Neubauer, transl. by Driver and Neubauer, edit. by Pusey, 1876, 1877; Urwick, The Servant of Jehovah, 1877; Prof. Forbes of Aberdeen, On the Servant of the Lord, in Isaiah xl.-lxvi., 1890; J. Barth, Beiträge, 1885, and F. Giesebrecht's Beiträge, 1890; H. Guthe, Das Zukunftsbild des Jes., 1885; Grätz in Monatschrift, 1886, and in Jewish Quarterly, 1891 (on Is. xxxiv., xxiv.); T. K. Cheyne in same Review, on the Critical Problems of Second Part; Löhr on Is. xl.-xlvi., 1878-1880. A. Wünsche, Leiden des Messias, 1870, and G. F. Dalman, Isaiah liii., 1890, are highly important. C. P. Caspari, Beiträge, 1848, and his Syr. Eph. Krieg, 1849, are still valuable; Reinke's Mess. Weissagungen, von Hofmann's works, and Hengstenberg's Christology contain much that is still worth study.

IS-CAH (יִסְכָּה); 'Ισκά; Jesca, daughter of Haran the brother of Abram, and sister of Milcah and of Lot (Gen. xi. 29). In the Jewish traditions as preserved by Josephus (Ant. i. 6, § 5), Jerome (Quaest. in Genesim), and the Targum Pseudo-jonathan—not to mention later writers—she is identified with SARAI; an identification not now maintained (see Dillmann⁶ in loco).

ISH-BAH (יִשְׁבָּח; = praising; A. 'Ισβαβ, B. Μαπέθ; Iesba), a man in the line of Judah, commemorated as the "father of Eshtemoa" (1 Ch. iv. 17); but from whom he was immediately descended is, in the very confused state of this part of the genealogy, not to be ascertained. The most plausible conjecture is that he was one of the sons of Mered by his Egyptian wife BITHIAH (see Bertheau, Chronik, in loco; accepted by Keil, Oettli, &c.).

ISH-BAK (יִשְׁבַּק; A. 'Ισβακ, D. 'Ισβαύκ, B. Σοβακ; Jesbac), a people of Northern Arabia, whose origin is attributed to the marriage of Abraham with Keturah (קֵטוּרָה, "incense"); Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Ch. i. 32. An Assyrian inscription enables us to identify Ishbak. In his first year (859 B.C.) Shalmaneser II. crossed the Orontes in Northern Syria, to operate against Sapalulme, king of the Patinal, amongst whose allies he names Sa(n)gara (Shangar) of Carchemish, Pichirim of Cilicia, and Bur-anate (perhaps = בִּרְעָנָה, "son of Anath;"; cp. "Shangar, son of Anath," Judg. v. 6) of the land of Isbuk* (māt la-as-bu-qa-ai: 3 R. 7, 54). Ishbak probably adjoined Shuah (the Assyrian Sūhu), his brother tribe, whose seats lay along the west bank of the Euphrates between the Balich and the Habor, on the confines of Coele-Syria, and near the caravan route from Damascus through Palmyra to the Great River (see Friedrich Delitzsch, Assyriologische Notizen zum alten Testament, ZK. ii. 92). * The spelling agrees with the LXX. variants 'Ισβαύκ, 'Ισβαύκ, and indicates that the Hebrew pointing should rather be יִשְׁבַּק. In the same way the spelling Hirōm (1 K. vii. 40) instead of Hiram is confirmed by the Assyrian Hirām (Ḫi-ru-um-mu), as well as by the Εἱρμός of Josephus.

battle, but was slain by Abishai (2 Sam. xvi. 16, 17). The words יִשְׁבִּי בְנוֹב are now, however, usually read not as a man's name, but (= יִשְׁבִּי בְנוֹב) "they dwell in Gob," and are placed after עִמּוֹ ("with him") in v. 15 (cp. Wellhausen and Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the B.B. of Sam. in loco). [F.]

ISH-BO'SHETH (יִשְׁבִּשֶׁת; 'Ισβοσθί; Ishobeth), the youngest of Saul's four sons, and his legitimate successor. His name appears (1 Ch. viii. 33, ix. 39) to have been originally Esh-baal, עֶשְׁבַּע, "the man" of Baal." Whether this indicates that Baal was used as equivalent to Jehovah, or that the reverence for Baal still lingered in Israelitish families, is uncertain; but it can hardly be doubted that the name (Ish-bosheth, "the man of shame") by which he is commonly known must have been substituted for the original word, with a view of removing the scandalous sound of Baal from the name of an Israelitish king, and superseding it by the contemptuous word (Bosheth = "shame") which was sometimes used as its equivalent in later times (Jer. iii. 24, xi. 13; Hos. ix. 10). A similar process appears in the alteration of Jerubbaal (Judg. viii. 35) into Jerubesheth (2 Sam. xi. 21); Meri-baal (2 Sam. iv. 4) into Mephibosheth (1 Ch. viii. 34, ix. 40). The last three cases all occur in Saul's family. He was thirty-five years of age at the time of the battle of Gilboa, in which his father and three eldest brothers perished; and therefore, according to the law of Oriental though not of European succession, ascended the throne, as the eldest of the royal family, rather than Mephibosheth, son of his elder brother Jonathan, who was a child of five years old. He was immediately taken under the care of Abner, his powerful kinsman, who brought him to the ancient sanctuary of Mahanaim on the east of the Jordan, beyond the reach of the victorious Philistines (2 Sam. ii. 8). There was a momentary doubt even in those remote tribes whether they should not close with the offer of David to be their king (2 Sam. ii. 7, iii. 17). But this was overruled in favour of Ishbosheth by Abner (2 Sam. iii. 17), who then for five years slowly but effectually restored the dominion of the house of Saul over the Transjordanic territory, the plain of Esdraelon, the central mountains of Ephraim, the frontier tribe of Benjamin, and eventually "over all Israel" (except the tribe of Judah, 2 Sam. iii. 9). Ishbosheth was then "forty years old when he began to reign over Israel, and reigned two years" (2 Sam. iii. 10). This form of expression is used only for the accession of a fully recognised sovereign (cp. in the case of David, 2 Sam. ii. 4 and v. 4).

During these two years he reigned at Mahanaim, though only in name. The wars and negotiations with David were entirely carried on by Abner (2 Sam. ii. 12; iii. 6, 12). At length Ishbosheth accused Abner (whether rightly or wrongly does not appear) of an attempt on his father's concubine, Rizpah; which, according to Oriental usage, amounted to treason (2 Sam. iii. 7: cp. 1 K. ii. 13; 2 Sam. xvi. 21, xx. 3). Abner resented this suspicion in a burst of passion, which vented itself in a solemn vow to transfer the kingdom from the house of Saul to the house of David. Ishbosheth was too much cowed to answer; and when, shortly afterwards, through Abner's negotiation, David demanded the restoration of his former wife, Michal, he at once tore his sister from her reluctant husband, and committed her to Abner's charge (2 Sam. iii. 14, 15).

The death of Abner deprived the house of Saul of their last remaining support. When Ishbosheth heard of it, "his hands were feeble and all the Israelites were troubled" (2 Sam. iv. 1).

In this extremity of weakness he fell a victim to a revenge, probably, for a crime of his father. The guard of Ishbosheth, as of Saul, was taken from their own royal tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch. xii. 29). But amongst the sons of Benjamin were reckoned the descendants of the old Canaanitish inhabitants of Beeroth, one of the cities in league with Gibeon (2 Sam. iv. 2, 3). Two of the Beerothites, Baana and Rechab, in remembrance, it has been conjectured, of Saul's slaughter of their kinsmen the Gibeonites, determined to take advantage of the helplessness of the royal house to destroy the only representative that was left, excepting the child Mephibosheth (2 Sam. iv. 4). They were "chiefs of the marauding troops" which used from time to time to attack the territory of Judah (cp. 2 Sam. iv. 2, iii. 22; where the same word מַרְבָּזִים is used; Vulg. principes latronum). [BENJAMIN; GITTAIM.] They knew the habits of the king and court, and acted accordingly. In the stillness of an Eastern noon they entered the palace, as if to carry off the wheat which was piled up near the entrance. The female slave, who, as usual in Eastern houses, kept the door, and was herself sifting the wheat, had, in the heat of the day, fallen asleep at her task (2 Sam. iv. 5, 6, in LXX. and Vulg.). They stole in, and passed into the royal bedchamber, where Ishbosheth was asleep on his couch. They stabbed him in the stomach, cut off his head, made their escape, all that afternoon, all that night, down the valley of the Jordan (Arabah, A. V. "plain;" 2 Sam. iv. 7), and presented the head to David as a welcome present. They met with a stern reception. David rebuked them for the cold-blooded murder of an innocent man, and ordered them to be executed; their hands and feet were cut off, and their bodies suspended over the tank at Hebron. The head of Ishbosheth was carefully buried in the sepulchre of his great kinsman Abner, at the same place (2 Sam. iv. 9-12).* [A. P. S.]

ISH-I (יִשִּׁי = my help; Jesi). 1. (B. 'Ise-mah; A. 'Iseel.) A man of the descendants of Judah, son of Appaim (1 Ch. ii. 31); one of the great house of Hezron, and therefore a near connexion of the family of Jesse (cp. vv. 9-13). The only son here attributed to Ishi is Sheshan.

2. (B. 'Seel; A. 'Es.) In a subsequent genealogy of Judah we find another Ishi, with a son Zoheth (1 Ch. iv. 20). There does not appear to be any connexion between the two.

3. (B. 'Isebeth; A. 'Iseel.) Four men of the Bene-Ishi, of the tribe of Simeon, are named in 1 Ch. iv. 42 as having headed an expedition of 500 of their brethren, who took Mount Seir from the Amalekites, and made it their own abode.

4. (B. 'Seel; A. 'Iseel.) One of the heads of the tribe of Manasseh on the east of Jordan (1 Ch. v. 24).

I-SHI (יִשִּׁי; δ ἀνήρ μου; Vir meus). This word has no connexion whatever with the foregoing. It occurs in Hos. ii. 16, and signifies "my man," "my husband." It is the Israelite term, in opposition to BAALI, the Canaanite term, with the same meaning, though with a significance of its own. See p. 1399, where the nature of the difference between the two appellations is connected with the general teaching.

ISHIAH, R. V. ISSHIAH (יִשִּׁיָּהּ), i.e. Ishiyah = Jehovah lends; B. Eluid, A. 'Iseia), the fifth of the five sons of Izrahiah; one of the heads of the tribe of Issachar in the time of David (1 Ch. vii. 3).

The name is identical with that elsewhere given as ISHIAH, ISSIAH, JESIAH.

ISHI'JAH, R. V. ISSHIAH (יִשִּׁיָּהּ); B. 'Iseuid, A. 'Iseuia; Josue, a lay Israelite of the Bene-Harim, who had married a foreign wife, and was compelled to relinquish her (Ezra x. 31). In Edras the name is ASEAS.

This name appears in the A. V. under the various forms of ISHIAH, ISSIAH, JESIAH.

ISH-MA (יִשְׁמָאֵל) = waste, desert, Ges.; 'Iesud, B. 'Paryud, A. 'Iesud; Jesema, a name in the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 3). The passage is very obscure, and in many cases it is difficult to know whether the names are the names of persons or of places. Ishma and his companions appear to be closely connected with Bethlehem (see v. 4).

ISH'MAEL (יִשְׁמָאֵל) = God heareth; 'Ise-mah; Ismael; cp. Gen. xvi. 11), the son of Abraham by Hagar, his concubine, the Egyptian; born, according to P, when Abraham was four-score and six years old (Gen. xvi. 15, 16). Ishmael was the first-born of his father: of whom (ch. xv.) we read that he was then childless, and there is no apparent interval for the birth of any other child; nor does the teaching of the narrative, besides the precise enumeration of the sons of Abraham as the father of the faithful, admit of the supposition. The saying of Sarah, also, when she gave him Hagar, supports the inference that until then he was without children. When we are told that Abraham "again took a wife" (xxv. 1, J), viz. Keturah, no note of time is added; but it appears to be implied that it was after the death of Sarah. The conception of Ishmael led to the flight of Hagar [HAGAR]; and it was during her wandering in the wilderness that the Angel of the Lord commanded her to return to her mistress, and gave her the promises, "I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude" (Gen. xvi. 10. R); "Behold, thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael, because the Lord hath heard thy affliction. And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren" (xvi. 11, 12, J). The well Lahai-roi is said to have got its name from Hagar's vision, as though the name Beer lahai roi meant "Well of the Living One that seeth me," or "Well of living after seeing (God)." It is not, however, necessary to regard such suggestions as more than illustrative plays on similar-sounding words. It has been conjectured that Lahai-roi really means "Jawbone of the antelope"; roi being perhaps an obsolete term akin to the Arabic arwiyya (cp. Reh, roe): see Judg. xv. 17 sqq.; Wellhausen, III. p. 326.

Ishmael was born in Abraham's house, when he dwelt "by the oaks (or terebinths) of Mamre" (xiii. 18; xviii. 1, J); and was circumcised at the age of thirteen (xvii. 25, P). With the institution of the covenant, God renewed His promise respecting Ishmael. In answer to Abraham's entreaty, when he cried, "Oh that Ishmael might live before Thee!" God assured him of the birth of Isaac, and said, "As for Ishmael, I have heard thee: behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes (or emirs, tribal chiefs) shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation" (xvii. 18, 20. The whole chapter belongs to P). Before this time, Abraham seems to have regarded his first-born child as the heir of the promise, his belief in which was counted unto him for righteousness (xv. 6, J); and although that faith shone yet more brightly after his passing weakness when Isaac was first promised, his love for Ishmael is recorded in the narrative of Sarah's expulsion of the latter: "And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight because of his son" (xii. 11, E).

Ishmael does not again appear in the narrative until the weaning of Isaac. The latter was born, according to P, when Abraham was a hundred years old (xii. 5); and as the weaning, according to Eastern usage, would take place when the child was between two and three years old, Ishmael must be supposed to have been then between fifteen and sixteen years of age. This necessary inference from the chronological data of P does not, however, agree very well with the statement of E (xii. 14), which according to the LXX. should be read as follows: "And Abraham rose early in the morning, and took bread and a skin of water, and gave them to Hagar; and the boy he set upon her shoulder, and sent her away." The present Hebrew text is obviously faulty, and appears to be due to some transcriber who felt the difficulty of putting a lad of sixteen upon his mother's shoulder. But the subsequent statement that "she threw the boy under one of the shrubs" (v. 15), seems to imply that she was carrying him; and the language of v. 20 hardly allows us to suppose that Ishmael was already a young man. When the difference of sources is recognised, such discrepancies of statement cease to embarrass us [ISAAC].

At the "great feast" made in celebration of the weaning, Sarah had seen Ishmael "laughing" (A. V. "mocking"; R. V. marg. "plying").^a Thereupon, she urged Abraham to cast out him and his mother. The patriarch, comforted by God's renewed promise that of Ishmael He would make a nation, sent them both away, and they departed and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba. Here the water being spent in the bottle, Hagar cast her son under one of the desert shrubs, and went away a little distance, "for she said, Let me not see the death of the child," and wept. "And God heard the voice of the lad, and the Angel of the Lord called to Hagar out of heaven," renewed the promise already thrice given, "I will make him a great nation," and "opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water." Thus miraculously saved from perishing by thirst, "God was with the lad; and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderness; and became an archer." It is doubtful whether the wanderers halted by the well, or at once continued their way to the "wilderness of Paran," where, we are told in the next verse to that just quoted, he dwelt, and where "his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt" (Gen. xii. 9-21, E). This wife of Ishmael is not elsewhere mentioned; she was, we must infer, an Egyptian; and this second infusion of Hamitic blood into the progenitors of the Arab nation, Ishmael's sons, is a fact that has been generally overlooked. No record is made of any other wife of Ishmael, and failing such record, the Egyptian would seem to have been the mother of his twelve sons, and one daughter (cp. the twelve sons and one daughter assigned to Israel also). This daughter, however, is called the "sister of Nebajoth" (Gen. xxviii. 9); a limitation of the parentage of the brother and sister which probably points to a different mother for Ishmael's other sons.^b It must not be forgotten that terms denoting various degrees of blood-relationship are used in these narratives to express the local and political relations of kindred tribes and their subdivisions. In O. T. language, the founder of a town, or the eponymous chief of the tribe that was settled there, is called the "father" of the place; and the outlying dependencies are called its "daughters." A newer or otherwise inferior clan or tribe in a confederacy is regarded as sprung from the common ancestor through a foreign wife or a "concubine." The old Arab writers use a similar terminology.

Of the later life of Ishmael nothing is related in the older sections of Genesis (J, E). According to P, he was present with Isaac at the burial of Abraham (Gen. xxv. 9); and Esau contracted an alliance with him when he "took unto the wives which he had Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael Abraham's son, the sister of Nebajoth, to be his wife;" and this did Esau because the daughters of Canaan pleased not Isaac and Rebekah, and Jacob in obedience to

^a St. Paul appears to follow Jewish tradition or exegesis, when he speaks of Ishmael as "persecuting" Isaac (Gal. iv. 29). Sarah's motive was perhaps a mother's jealousy.

^b According to Rabbinical tradition, Ishmael put away his wife and took a second; and the Arabs, probably borrowing from the above, assert that he twice married: the first wife being an Amalekite, by whom he had no issue; and the second, a Joktanite, of the tribe of Jurhum (Mir-ât 'az-Zamân, MS., quoting a tradition of Muhammad Ibn-Is-hâk.)

their wishes had gone to Laban to obtain of his daughters a wife (xxviii. 6-9, P). The death of Ishmael is recorded in a previous chapter, after the enumeration of his sons, as having taken place at the age of a hundred and thirty-seven years (xxv. 17, P).

It remains for us to consider, 1, the place of Ishmael's dwelling; and, 2, the names of his children, with their settlements, and the nation sprung from them.

1. From the narrative of his expulsion, we learn that Ishmael first went into the wilderness of Beersheba, and thence, but at what interval of time is uncertain, removed to that of Paran. His continuance in these or the neighbouring places seems to be proved by his having been present at the burial of Abraham—for it must be remembered that in the East sepulture follows death after a few hours' space—and by Esau's marrying his daughter at a time when he (Esau) dwelt at Beersheba: the tenor of the narrative of both these events favouring the inference that Ishmael settled not far from the neighbourhood of Abraham and Isaac. There are, however, other passages which must be taken into account. It is prophesied of him (xvi. 12, J) that "he shall dwell in face of all his brethren" (i.e. near them, but independent of them. Hart vor ihnen, Dillmann; others, as Tuch and Delitzsch, östlich von, "eastward of.") Cp. also xxv. 18, which, however, is hopelessly obscure, and probably corrupt). He was the first Abrahamic settler in the east country. In xxv. 6 (R) it is said, "But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away from Isaac his son, while he yet lived, eastward, unto the east country." The "east country" perhaps was restricted in early times to the wildernesses of Beersheba and Paran, and it afterwards seems to have included those districts (though neither supposition necessarily follows from the above passage); or, Ishmael removed to that east country, northwards, without being distant from his father and his brethren; each case being agreeable with Gen. xxv. 6. The appellation of the "east country" became afterwards applied to the whole desert extending from the frontier of Palestine east to the Euphrates, and south probably to the borders of Egypt and the Arabian peninsula (cp. Dillmann, ad loc. cit., who says that Arabia in general, including Arabia Deserta and the Syrian desert, is intended). This question is discussed in art. BENE-KEDEM; and it is interwoven, though obscurely, with the next subject, that of the names and settlements of the sons of Ishmael. See also KETURAH, &c.; for the "brethren" of Ishmael, in whose presence he dwelt, included the sons of Keturah.

2. The sons of Ishmael were, Nebajoth his first-born, Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, Kedemah (Gen. xxv. 13-15, P), and he had a daughter named Mahalath (xxviii. 9, P), the sister of Nebajoth, before mentioned.* The sons are enumerated with the statement that "these are their names, in their villages, and in their encampments; twelve emirs according to their kindreds" (or tribal communities, מִשְׁבָּטִים; originally perhaps, motherhoods), xxv. 16, P. The sons of Ishmael here appear as partly settled in open country places, and partly living in temporary camping-grounds like the Bedawis at the present day. "They dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before (i.e. east of) Egypt, as thou goest unto Assyria" (xxv. 18) [but see the remark on this passage, above]; and it is certain, in accordance with this statement of their limits [see HAVILAH, SHUR], that they stretched in very early times across the desert to the N.W. coast of the Persian Gulf, peopled the north and west of the Arabian peninsula, and eventually formed the chief element of the Arab nation. Their language, which is generally acknowledged to have been the Arabic commonly so called, has been adopted with insignificant exceptions throughout Arabia. It has been said that the Bible requires the whole of that nation to be sprung from Ishmael, and the fact of a large admixture of Joktanite and even Cushite peoples in the south and south-east has been regarded as a suggestion of scepticism. Yet not only does the Bible contain no warrant for the assumption that all Arabs are Ishmaelites; but the characteristics of the Ishmaelites, strongly marked in all the more northern tribes of Arabia, and perfectly according with the oracle (Gen. xvi. 12), "he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him," become weaker in the south, and can scarcely be predicated of all the peoples of Joktanite and other descent. Some of the bené Ishmael, indeed, became settled, and attained to a certain degree of civilisation [DUMAH, NEBAJOTH, TEMA]. The true Ishmaelites, however, and even tribes of very mixed race, have always been, for the most part, thoroughly "wild men," living by warlike forays and plunder; dreaded by their neighbours; dwelling in tents, with hardly any household chattels, but rich in flocks and herds, migratory, and recognising no law but the authority of the chiefs of their tribes. Even the religion of Muhammad is held in light esteem by many of the more remote tribes, among whom the ancient usages of their people obtain in almost their old simplicity, besides idolatrous practices altogether repugnant to Muhammanism as they are to the faith of the patriarchs; practices which may be ascribed to the influence of the Canaanites, of Moab, Ammon, and Edom, with whom, by intermarriages, commerce, and war, the tribes of Ishmael must have had long and intimate relations.

The term ISHMAELITE (יִשְׁמָאֵלִי) occurs on several occasions: Gen. xxvii. 25, 27, 28, xxxix. 1; Judg. viii. 24; Ps. lxxxiii. 6. From the context of the first two instances, it seems to have been a comprehensive name for the Abrahamic

Dillmann observes, the divergences presented by these passages are to be traced to differences of tradition or of theory, rather than to be explained away by the assumption that Esau had five wives, or that their names were changed, or that they had double names, or that the names have been corrupted by copyists.

* In Gen. xxxvi. 3, the Redactor speaks of Basemath the daughter of Ishmael, the sister of Nebajoth, as a wife of Esau (cp. also vv. 10, 17). In xxvi. 34, P had written "Basemath, the daughter of Elon the Hittite." As peoples of the east country, the Bene-Kedem, or the northern Arabs generally, so that the Midianites might be included under it. In the third instance the name is applied in its strict sense to the Ishmaelites. It is also applied to Jether, the father of Amasa by David's sister Abigail (1 Ch. ii. 17.) [THRA; JETHER.] Cp. also 1 Ch. xxviii. 30.

The notions of the Arabs respecting Ishmael (إسماعيل) are partly derived from the Bible, partly from the Jewish Rabbis, and partly from native traditions. The origin of many of these traditions is obscure, but a great number may be ascribed to the fact of Muhammad's having for political reasons claimed Ishmael for his ancestor, and striven to make out an impossible pedigree; while both he and his followers have, as a consequence of accepting this assumed descent, sought to exalt that ancestor. Another reason may be safely found in Ishmael's acknowledged headship of the naturalised Arabs, and this cause existed from the very period of his settlement. [ARABIA.] Yet the rivalry of the Joktanite kingdom of Southern Arabia, and its intercourse with classical and medieval Europe, the wandering and unsettled habits of the Ishmaelites, their having no literature, and as far as we know only a meagre oral tradition, all contributed, till the importance it acquired with the promulgation of Al-Islâm, to render our knowledge of the Ishmaelitic portion of the people of Arabia, before Muhammad, lamentably defective. That they maintained, and still maintain, a patriarchal and primitive form of life is known to us. Their religion, at least in the period immediately preceding Muhammad, was in Central Arabia chiefly the grossest fetishism, probably learnt from aboriginal inhabitants of the land; southwards it diverged to the cosmic worship of the Joktanite Himyarites (though these were far from being exempt from fetishism), and northwards (so at least in ancient times) to an approach to that true faith which Ishmael may be supposed to have carried with him, and which his descendants thus gradually lost [see Wellhausen, Encyc. Brit. xvi. 546 sq.]. This last point is curiously illustrated by the numbers who, in Arabia, became either Jews (Caraites) or Christians (though of a very corrupt form of Christianity), and by the movement in search of the faith of the patriarchs which had been put forward, not long before the birth of Muhammad, by men not satisfied with Judaism or the corrupt form of Christianity with which alone they were acquainted. This movement first aroused Muhammad, and was afterwards the main cause of his success.

The Arabs believe that Ishmael was the first-born of Abraham, and the majority of their doctors (but the point is in dispute) assert that this son, and not Isaac, was offered by Abraham in sacrifice.⁴ The scene of this sacrifice is Mount 'Arafât, near Mecca, the last holy place visited by pilgrims, it being necessary to the completion of pilgrimage to be present at a sermon delivered there on the 9th of the Muhammadan month

Dhu-l-Hagġah, in commemoration of the offering, and to sacrifice a victim on the following evening after sunset, in the valley of Mina. The sacrifice last mentioned is observed throughout the Muslim world, and the day on which it is made is called "The Great Festival" (Mr. Lane's Mod. Egypt. ch. iii.). Ishmael, say the Arabs, dwelt with his mother at Mecca, and both are buried in the place called the Hîgr, on the north-west (termed by the Arabs the north) side of the Caaba, and enclosed by a curved wall called the Hatim. Ishmael was visited at Mecca by Abraham, and they together rebuilt the temple, which had been destroyed by a flood. At Mecca, Ishmael married a daughter of Mudâd or Al-Mudâd, chief of the Joktanite tribe G'urhum [ALMODAD; ARABIA], and had thirteen children (Mir-ât 'az-Zamân MS.); which agrees with the Biblical number, if we include the daughter.

Muhammad's descent from Ishmael is totally lost, for an unknown number of generations before 'Adnân, of the twenty-first generation before the prophet: from him downwards the latter's descent is, if we may believe the genealogists, fairly proved. But we have evidence far more trustworthy than that of the genealogists; for while most of the natives of Arabia are unable to trace up their pedigrees, it is scarcely possible to find one who is ignorant of his race, seeing that his very life often depends upon it. The law of blood-revenge necessitates his knowing the names of his ancestors for four generations, but no more; and this law, obtaining from time immemorial, has made any confusion of race almost impossible. This law, it should be remembered, is not a law of Muhammad, but an old pagan law that he endeavoured to suppress, but could not. In casting doubt on the prophet's pedigree, we must add that this cannot affect the proofs of the chief element of the Arab nation being Ishmaelite (and so too the tribe of Quraish, of which was Muhammad). Although partly mixed with Joktanites, they are more mixed with Keturites and other races; the characteristics of the Joktanites, as before remarked, are widely different from those of the Ishmaelites; and whatever theories may be adduced to the contrary, we believe that the Arabs, from physical characteristics, language, the concurrence of native traditions (before Muhammadanism made them untrustworthy), and the testimony of the Bible, are mainly and essentially Ishmaelite.

2. One of the sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul through Merib-baal, or Mephibosheth (1 Ch. viii. 38, ix. 44). See the genealogy, under SAUL.

3. (B. omits; Ismahel.) A man of Judah, whose son or descendant ZEBADIAH was ruler (זבדי) of the house of Judah in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xix. 11).

6. The son of Nethaniah; a perfect marrel of craft and villainy, whose treachery forms one of the chief episodes of the history of the period immediately succeeding the first fall of Jerusalem. His exploits are related in Jer. xl. 7-xli. 15, with a short summary in 2 K. xxv. 23-25, and they read almost like a page from the annals of the Indian mutiny.

His full description is "Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, of the seed royal"* of Judah (Jer. xli. 1; 2 K. xxv. 25). Whether by this is intended that he was actually a son of Zedekiah, or one of the later kings, or, more generally, that he had royal blood in his veins—perhaps a descendant of ELISHAMA, the son of David (2 Sam. v. 16)—we cannot tell. During the siege of the city he had, like many others of his countrymen (Jer. xl. 11), fled across the Jordan, where he found a refuge at the court of Baalis, the then king of the Bene-Ammon (Jos. Ant. x. 9, § 2). Ammonite women were sometimes found in the harems of the kings of Jerusalem (1 K. xi. 1), and Ishmael may have been thus related to the Ammonite court on his mother's side. At any rate he was instigated by Baalis to the designs which he accomplished but too successfully (Jer. xl. 14; Ant. x. 9, § 3). Several bodies of Jews appear to have been lying under arms in the plains on the S.E. of the Jordan,^f during the last days of Jerusalem, watching the progress of affairs in Western Palestine, commanded by "princes" (מְצֻדִים; R. V. "captains"), the chief of whom were Ishmael and two brothers, Johanan and Jonathan, sons of Kareah. Immediately after the departure of the Chaldean army these men moved across the Jordan to pay their respects to GEDALIAH, whom the king of Babylon had left as superintendent (פָּקִיד) of the province. Gedaliah had taken up his residence at MIZPAH, a few miles north of Jerusalem, on the main road, where Jeremiah the prophet resided with him (xl. 6). The house would appear to have been isolated from the rest of the town. We can discern a high enclosed courtyard and a deep well within its precincts. The well was certainly (Jer. xli. 9; cp. 1 K. xv. 22), and the whole residence was probably, a relic of the military works of Asa king of Judah.

Ishmael made no secret of his intention to kill the superintendent, and usurp his position. Of this Gedaliah was warned in express terms by Johanan and his companions; and Johanan, in a secret interview, foreseeing how irreparable a misfortune Gedaliah's death would be at this juncture (Jer. xl. 15), offered to remove the danger by killing Ishmael. This, however, Gedaliah, a man evidently of a high and unsuspecting nature, would not hear of (xl. 16). See the amplification in Jos. Ant. x. 9, § 3). They all accordingly took leave. Thirty days after (Ant. x. 9, § 4), in the seventh month (xli. 1), on the third day of the month—so says the tradition—Ishmael again appeared at Mizpah, this time accompanied by ten men, who were, according to the Hebrew text, "princes (R. V. "chief officers") of the king" (אֲדָרְיָהוּ וְעָרְיָהוּ), though this is omitted by the LXX. and by Josephus. Gedaliah entertained them at a feast (xli. 1). According to the statement of Josephus, this was a very lavish entertainment, and Gedaliah became much intoxicated. It must have been a private one, for before its close Ishmael and his followers had murdered Gedaliah and all his attendants with such secrecy that no alarm was given outside the room. The same night he killed all Gedaliah's establishment, including some Chaldean soldiers who were there. Jeremiah appears fortunately to have been absent, and, incredible as it seems, so well had Ishmael taken his precautions that for two days the massacre remained perfectly unknown to the people of the town. On the second day Ishmael perceived from his elevated position a large party coming southward along the main road from Shechem and Samaria. He went out to meet them. They proved to be eighty devotees, who with rent clothes, and with shaven beards, mutilated bodies, and other marks of heathen devotion, and weeping^g as they went, were bringing frankincense and oblations to the ruins of the Temple. At his invitation they turned aside to the residence of the superintendent. And here Ishmael put into practice the same stratagem which on a larger scale was employed by Muhammad Ali in the massacre of the Mamelukes at Cairo in 1806. As the unsuspecting pilgrims passed into the courtyard^h he closed the entrances behind them, and there he and his band butchered the whole number: ten only escaped by the offer of heavy ransom for their lives. The seventy corpses were then thrown into the well which, as at Cawnpore, was within the precincts of the house, and which was completely filled with the bodies. It was the same thing that had been done by Jehu—a man in some respects a prototype of Ishmael—with the bodies of the forty-two relatives of Ahaziah (2 K. x. 14). This done he descended to the town, surprised and carried off the daughters of king Zedekiah, who had been sent there by Nebuchadnezzar for safety, with their eunuchs and their Chaldean guard (xli. 10,

* יָרֵעַ הַמֶּלֶךְ. Jerome (Qu. Hebr. on 2 Ch. xxviii. 7) interprets this expression as meaning "of the seed of Molech." He gives the same meaning to the words "the king's son" applied to Masselah in the above passage. The question is an interesting one, and has been revived by Geiger (Urschrift, &c. p. 307), who extends it to other passages and persons. [MOLECH.] Jerome (as above) further says—perhaps on the strength of a tradition—that Ishmael was the son of an Egyptian slave, Gera: as a reason why the "seed royal" should bear the meaning he gives it. This the writer has not hitherto succeeded in elucidating.

^f So perhaps, taking it with the express statement of xl. 11, we may interpret the words "the forces which were in the field" (Jer. xl. 7, 13), where the term rendered "the field" (אֲדָרְיָהוּ) is one used to denote the pasture-grounds of Moab—the modern Belka—oftener than any other district (see Gen. xxxvi. 35; Num. xxi. 20; Ruth i. 1, and passim; 1 Ch. viii. 8; and Stanley's S. & P. App. § 15). The persistent use of the word in the semi-Moabite Book of Ruth is alone enough to fix its meaning.

^g This is the LXX. version of the matter—αὐτοὶ ἐπορεύοντο καὶ ἔκλαιον. The statement of the Hebrew text and A. V. that Ishmael wept is unintelligible.

^h The Hebrew has יָרֵעַ—"the city" (A. V. v. 7). This has been read by Josephus κῆρυξ—"courtyard." The alteration carries its genuineness in its face. The same change has been made by the Masorets (Qeri) in 2 K. xx. 4.

16), and all the people of the town, and made off with his prisoners to the country of the Ammonites. Which road he took is not quite clear; the Hebrew text and LXX. say by Gibeon,—that is, north; but Josephus, by Hebron, round the southern end of the Dead Sea. The news of the massacre had by this time got abroad, and Ishmael was quickly pursued by Johanan and his companions. Whether north or south, they soon tracked him and his unwieldy booty, and found them reposing by some copious waters (דִּבְרֵי מַיִם). He was attacked, two of his bravoes slain, the whole of the prey recovered, and Ishmael himself, with the remaining eight of his people, escaped to the Ammonites, and thenceforward passes into the obscurity from which it would have been well if he had never emerged.

Johanan's foreboding was fulfilled. The result of this tragedy was an immediate panic. The small remnants of the Jewish commonwealth—the captains of the forces, the king's daughters, the two prophets Jeremiah and Baruch, and all the men, women, and children—at once took flight into Egypt (Jer. xli. 17; xliii. 5-7); and all hopes of a settlement were for the time at an end. The remembrance of the calamity was perpetuated by a fast—the fast of the seventh month (Zech. vii. 5; viii. 19), which is to this day strictly kept by the Jews on the third of Tishri (see Reland, Antiq. iv. 10; Kimchi on Zech. vii. 5). The part taken by Baalis in this transaction apparently brought upon his nation the denunciations both of Jeremiah (xlix. 1-6) and the more distant Ezekiel (xxv. 1-7), but we have no record how these predictions were accomplished. [G.] [W.]

ISHMA'IAH (יִשְׁמָאֵל), i.e. Ishmayahu, = Jehovah hears; Σαυαλας; Jesmaias), son of Obadiah: the ruler of the tribe of Zebulun in the time of king David (1 Ch. xxvii. 19).

ISH'MEELITE AND ISH'MEELITES, R.V. ISH'MAELITE AND ISH'MAELITES (יִשְׁמְעֵלִיתִים and יִשְׁמְעֵלִיתִים) respectively; LXX. Ἰσμαηλιτῆς, -ται [usually; Ismaelithes, Ismeelitae]; the form—in agreement with the vowels of the Hebrew—in which the descendants of Ishmael are given in a few places in the A.V.: the former in 1 Ch. ii. 17; the latter in Gen. xxxvii. 25, 27, 28, xxxix. 1.

ISH'MERAI (יִשְׁמֵרַי), if = יִשְׁמֵרַי = whom Jehovah keeps; B. Σαμαρῆλ, A. Ἰεσσαμῆρι; Jesamari), a Benjamite; one of the family of Elpaal, and named as a chief man in the tribe (1 Ch. viii. 18).

ISH-OD (יִשְׁחֹד), i.e. Ish-hod = man of renown; B. Ἰσαδῆκ, A. Χούδ; virum decorum), one of the tribe of Manasseh on the east of Jordan, son of Hammoleketh, i.e. the Queen, and, from his near connexion with Gilead, evidently an important person (1 Ch. vii. 18).

ISH-PAN (יִשְׁפָּן); B. Ἰσφάν, A. Ἐσφάν; Jespham), a Benjamite, one of the family of Shashak; named as a chief man in his tribe (1 Ch. viii. 22).

ISH-TOB (יִשְׁטוֹב; B. Ἰστωβ, ... Ἰστωβ, Jos. Ἰστωβος; Istob), apparently one of the small kingdoms or states which formed part of the general country of Aram, named with Zobah, Rehob, and Maacah (2 Sam. x. 6, 8), and probably situated east of Jebel Hawra. [ARAM.] In the parallel account of 1 Ch. xix. Istob is omitted. By Josephus (Ant. vii. 6; § 1) the name is given as that of a king. But though in the ancient Versions the name is given as one word, it is probable that it should be rendered, as in R. V., "the men of TOB," a district mentioned also in connexion with Ammon in the records of Jephthah, and again perhaps, under the shape of TOBIE or TUBIENI, in the history of the Maccabees. [G.] [W.]

ISHU'AH, R. V. ISH'VAH (יִשְׁוֵא = peaceful [M.V.¹¹]; A. Ἰεσσαῖ, D. Ἰεσουῖ; Jessua), the second son of Asher (Gen. xlii. 17). In the genealogies of Asher in 1 Ch. vii. 30 (B. Ἰσουῖ, A. Ἰεσουῖ) the name, though identical in the original, is in the A. V. given as ISUAH (R. V. Ishvah). In the lists of Num. xxvi., however, Ishuah is entirely omitted.

ISH'UAI, R. V. ISH'VI (יִשְׁוֵי = peaceful; B. Ἰσουί, A. Ἰεσουί; Jessui), the third son of Asher (1 Ch. vii. 30), founder of a family bearing his name (Num. xxvi. 44; A. V. "Jesuites," R. V. "Ishvites"). His descendants, however, are not mentioned in the genealogy in Chronicles. His name is elsewhere given in the A. V. as ISUI, JESUI, and (another person) ISHUI.

ISH'UL, R. V. ISH'VI (יִשְׁוֵי = peaceful; B. Ἰεσσουῖ, A. Ἰσουί, Joseph. Ἰεσουῖς; Jessui), the second son of Saul by his wife Ahinoam (1 Sam. xiv. 49, cp. v. 50): his place in the family was between Jonathan and Melchishua. In the list of Saul's genealogy in 1 Ch. viii. and ix., however, the name of Ishui is entirely omitted; and in the sad narrative of the battle of Gilboa his place is occupied by Abinadab (1 Sam. xxxi. 2). We can only conclude that he died young. The same name is elsewhere given in the A. V. as ISUI and ISHUI. [G.] [W.]

ISLE (Ἰ; more frequently in the plural, Ἰ; νησος). The radical sense of the Hebrew word seems to be land places, as opposed to water, and in this sense it occurs in Is. xlii. 15. Hence it means secondarily any maritime district, whether belonging to a continent or to an island: thus it is used of the shore of the Mediterranean (Is. xx. 6 [R. V. "coastland"], xxiii. 2, 6 [R. V. marg. coastland]), and of the coasts of Elishah (Ezek. xxvii. 7), i.e. of Greece and Asia Minor. In this sense it is more particularly restricted to the shores of the Mediterranean, sometimes in the fuller expression "islands of the sea" (Is. xi. 11), or "isles of the Gentiles" (Gen. x. 5; cp. Zeph. ii. 11), and sometimes simply as "isles" (Ps. lxxii. 10; Ezek. xxvi. 15, 18, xxvii. 3, 35, xxxix. 6; Dan. xi. 18): an exception to this, however, occurs in Ezek. xxvii. 15, where the shores of the Persian Gulf are intended. Occasionally the word is specifically used of an island, as of Caphtor or Crete (Jer. xlvii. 4), and Chittim or Cyprus (Ezek. xxvii. 6; Jer. ii. 10), or of islands as opposed to the mainland (Esth. x. 1). But more generally it is applied to any region separated from Palestine by water, as fully described in Jer. xiv. 22, "the isles which are beyond the sea," which were hence regarded as the most remote regions of the earth (Is. xxiv. 15, xlii. 10, lix. 18; compare the expression in Is. lxvi. 19, "the isles afar off") and also as large and numerous (Is. xl. 15; Pa. xcvi. 1): the word is more particularly used by the Prophets (see J. D. Michaelis, Spicilegium, i. 131-142). In many of the above passages the R. V. uses the term "coastlands," either in the margin or in the text. [W. L. B.]

ISMACHIAH (יִשְׁמַחִיאַח), i.e. Ismac-yahu = whom Jehovah supports; B. Ζαμαχειδ, Α. -χια; Jesmachias, a Levite who was one of the overseers (דְּוִיָּדָה) of offerings, during the revival under king Hezekiah (2 Ch. xxxi. 13).

ISMAEL. 1. (Ἰσμαήλ; Ismaël.) Judith ii. 23. Another form for the name ISHMAEL, son of Abraham.

2. (Ἰσμαήλος; Hismaenis.) 1 Esd. ix. 22. [ISHMAEL, 5.]

ISMAIAH, R. V. ISHMAIAH (יִשְׁמַאיָהוּ) = Jehovah hears; BA. Ζαμαίας, Ν. Ζαμεύς; Samaias, a Gibeonite, one of the chiefs of those warriors who relinquished the cause of Saul, the head of their tribe, and joined themselves to David, when he was at Ziklag (1 Ch. xii. 4). He is described as "a hero (Gibbor) among the thirty and over the thirty"—i.e. David's body-guard: but his name does not appear in the lists of the guard in 2 Sam. xxiii. and 1 Ch. xi. Possibly he was killed in some encounter before David reached the throne.

ISH-PAH, R. V. ISH-PAH (יִשְׁפָּאֵחַ) [see MV. 11]; B. Ζαφάν, Α. Ἐσφάχ; Jespha, a Benjamite, of the family of Beriah; one of the heads of his tribe (1 Ch. viii. 16).

ISRAEL (יִשְׂרָאֵל; Ἰσραήλ; Israel). In times strictly historical, the collective or national designation of the brother tribes who came out of Egypt (Hos. ii. 15, xi. 1, xii. 9, 13), and whose eponymous ancestor was Jacob-Israel, after whom they called themselves Bēnē Yisrā'el, "the sons of Israel," or simply Israel (cp. Gen. xxxiv. 7; xlviii. 20; xlix. 7). According to an exquisitely beautiful and profoundly significant tradition, preserved in the older stratum of Genesis (Gen. xxii. 25-32, J), and cited with one or two important variations by the early prophet Hosea (Hos. xii. 3, 4), Jacob, "the wandering Aramean" (יִצְחָק) of the Deuteronomist (Deut. xxvi. 5), received this name of Israel after his mysterious conflict at Peniel or Peniel, upon the borders of the Holy Land [JACOB]. Since in the monarchical period the northern and larger group of Israelitish tribes was designated Israel, in distinction from the kingdom of Judah, it might be conjectured that Israel was, in fact, an ancient name of middle and northern Palestine; but as no trace of this has been found in Egyptian records, nor in the oldest cuneiform documents that refer at all to the country [HEBREW],^a we seem obliged to conclude that Israel was not a name indigenous to Canaan, but really peculiar to the confederacy of tribes that emerged from the Sinaitic peninsula, and gradually effected its conquest.

The etymological meaning of this name, so glorious in the records of revelation, is not easy to determine. According to the analogy of similar proper names, it might be El striveth or doeth battle ("Es streitet Gott," Nestle, Israel. Eigennamen, p. 60 sq.); cp. Jerubbaal (i.e. בַּעַל בְּנֵטַל, "Baal contendeth"). If we prefer to regard the first element as a verbal noun (like Izhar or Yishār, Isaac or Yisḥāq), we may render El's warrior or Soldier of God ("pugnator, miles Dei," Gesen. Theas. 1338 b; "Gotteskämpfer," Kautzsch; so Ewald, H. I. i. 344). This would suit very well with the implications of the fragmentary reference, Gen. xlviii. 22 (E), where Jacob speaks of having wrested Shechem from the Amorites with sword and bow; and some such reason as this may perhaps have been assigned for the name in the original form of the passage, Gen. xxxv. 10 (P). On the other hand, El striveth or is a warrior is in perfect harmony with such expressions as "Jahvah is a Man of War" (Ex. xv. 3; cp. Hos. xii. 6); "The God of the hosts of Israel" (1 Sam. xvii. 45); and the frequent Jahvāh Šebā'ōth (i.e. Jahvāh 'Elohē Šebā'ōth), "The Lord (God) of Hosts." But it can hardly be said that the interpretation put upon the name both by the Jahvist (Gen. xxiii. 29) and by the Prophet Hosea (Hos. xii. 4: יְהוָה אֱלֹהֵינוּ, "he strove with Elohim") is grammatically impossible (cp. Ewald, Lehrb. § 282).^b That Israel was the name of the undivided nation in the time of the first kings (Saul, David, Solomon) hardly requires proof (see 2 Sam. i. 24, xxiii. 3). After the division of the kingdom, the northern monarchy came to be known as Israel and the House of Israel (cp. the Assyrian designation of it, "House of Omri"); while the Davidic kingdom of the south was called Judah or the House of Judah (Hos. i. 4, 6, iv. 15, v. 5, 12; Amos ii. 4, 6, v. 1, vii. 11, 17; but cp. iii. 1, ix. 7). Naturally, however, where the contrast was necessary, the same restriction of the title Israel was observed even in the previous time (e.g. 1 Sam. xi. 2; 2 Sam. i. 12, ii. 4, xx. 1). Indeed the partial isolation of Judah may be traced back through the period of the Judges to the beginnings of the conquest of the land west of the Jordan. Judah

^a The earliest occurrence of the name Israel in Assyrian records is the mention of Ahab of Israel (Ahabbu mal Sir'īlāi or Sir'īlāi) by Shalmaneser (circ. 854 B.C.), if Schrader's transcription be accepted as correct. In the same century the northern kingdom is called Israel by Mesha king of Moab, who names both Omri and Ahab in his famous inscription.

^b The strange explanation, "the man that sees God," which St. Jerome says was in vogue in his day, may be accounted for by a confusion of the roots sār, "to strive" (יָרָם); Hor. xii. 6), and sār, "to see" (יָרָם); Num. xxiv. 17), which in the unpointed text are exactly alike. In his own view, he combines the sense of יָרָם, "to be a prince" (Judg. ix. 22; but also "to strive," Hos. xli. 6), with that of יָרָם, "to strive," though he renders the name "Prince with God" (Quaest. Heb. in Gen.)—a curious instance of exegetical vacillation.

was the first to part company with the other tribes, and to win possession of that hill-country which was to be his permanent territory (Judg. i. 3, 19). Neither he, nor "his brother Simeon" who had shared in the enterprise, is named in the Song of Deborah (Judg. v.). Wellhausen accordingly thinks that this "secession" of Judah, Simeon, (and Levi) from the remaining tribes was the origin of the division of the nation into Israel and Judah (H. I. p. 441). But the primal unity, however loose, was never forgotten; and Isaiah could speak of "the two houses of Israel" (Is. viii. 14), and could call Judah "the remnant of Israel" (Is. x. 20).

The latest historian, whose compilation is dismembered in the Canon into the Books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah, sometimes calls the Judean state Israel, even when referring to the pre-exilic period (2 Ch. xi. 3, xii. 1, xv. 17, xix. 8, xxi. 2, 4, xxiii. 2; Ezra ii. 2, iii. 1, ix. 1; but cp. 2 Ch. xxx. 1, 5, 10; Ezra x. 7, 9). The Chronicler has also a peculiar use of the term "Israel," to denote the lay folk as distinct from the priestly orders (1 Ch. ix. 2; Ezra vi. 16, ix. 1; Neh. xi. 3). In the Maccabean age, the old name, so rich in inspiring memories, was naturally revived (1 Macc. i. 11, 20, 30 sq., ii. 70, iii. 35, iv. 11, 30 sq.); and the coins of the Hasmonean princes bore the legend "shekel of Israel." Israel, in truth, never ceased to be the name to which the highest associations of religious and patriotic feeling clung inseparably; hence the psalms of every age almost without exception (Ps. lxxvi. 1) speak of Israel, not of Judah.^a The later prophetic use of the term Israel (e.g. Is. xlix. 3) prepared the way for St. Paul's distinction between "Israel after the flesh" and the true spiritual Israel (cp. John i. 47). [C. J. B.]

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.^a 1. The prophet Ahijah of Shiloh, who was commissioned in the latter days of Solomon to announce the division of the kingdom, left one tribe (Judah) to the House of David, and assigned ten to Jeroboam (1 K. xi. 31, 35). These were probably Joseph (= Ephraim and Manasseh), Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, Naphtali, Benjamin, Dan, Simeon, Gad, and Reuben; Levi being intentionally omitted. Eventually, the greater part of Benjamin, and probably the whole of Simeon and Dan, were included as if by common consent in the kingdom of Judah. With respect to the conquests of David, Moab appears to have been attached to the kingdom of Israel (2 K. iii. 4); so much of Syria as remained subject to Solomon (see 1 K. xi. 24) would probably be claimed by his successor in the northern kingdom; and Ammon, though connected with Rehoboam as his mother's native land (2 Ch. xii. 13), and though afterwards tributary to Judah (2 Ch. xxvii. 5), was at one time allied (2 Ch. xx. 1), we know not ^a So far as they belong to the period of the Judean monarchy, this may, perhaps, be partly explained by the fact that the house of David never formally surrendered its claim to rule the entire nation.

^b The political aspect of the periods included in this article is presented by Wellhausen (summarily) in "Israel" (Encycl. Brit.), by Stade (more in detail) in his Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, and by Ederheim, Bible History. The student will further turn to Ederheim for a careful presentment of the religious aspect.

how closely, or how early, with Moab. The sea-coast between Achcho and Japho remained in the possession of Israel.

2. The population of the kingdom is not expressly stated; and in drawing any inference from the numbers of fighting-men, we must bear in mind that the numbers in the Heb. text of the O. T. are strongly suspected to have been subjected to extensive, perhaps systematic, corruption. Forty years before the disruption the census taken by direction of David gave 800,000 according to 2 Sam. xxiv. 9, or 1,100,000 according to 1 Ch. xxi. 5, as the number of fighting-men in Israel. Jeroboam, B.C. 938, brought into the field an army of 800,000 men (2 Ch. xiii. 3). The small number of the army of Jehoahaz (2 K. xiii. 7) is to be attributed to his compact with Hazael; for in the next reign Israel could spare a mercenary host ten times as numerous for the wars of Amaziah (2 Ch. xxv. 6). If in B.C. 957 there were actually under arms 800,000 men of "twenty years old and above" (Num. i. 3; 2 Ch. xxv. 5) in Israel, the whole population may perhaps have amounted to at least three millions and a half. Later observers have echoed the disappointment with which Jerome from his cell at Bethlehem contemplated the small extent of this celebrated country (Ep. 129, ad Dardan. § 4). The area of Palestine proper, from Dan to Beersheba, was—west of the Jordan—6,000 square miles, or about the size of the Principality of Wales; east of the Jordan the habitable district was about 4,000 square miles. At the time of the disruption the area claimed for Israel would have been about 7,500 square miles, not including Syria (cp. Conder, Handbook to the Bible, p. 204; and for remarks on the density of the population, pp. 271-3, 281).

3. SHECHEM was the first capital of the new kingdom (1 K. xii. 25), venerable for its traditions, and beautiful in its situation. Subsequently Tirzah, whose loveliness had fixed the wandering gaze of Solomon (Cant. vi. 4), became the royal residence, if not the capital, of Jeroboam (1 K. xiv. 17) and of his successors (xv. 33; xvi. 8, 17, 23). Samaria, uniting in itself the qualities of beauty and fertility, and a commanding position, was chosen by Omri (1 K. xvi. 24), and remained the capital of the kingdom until it had given the last proof of its strength by sustaining for three years the onset of the hosts of Assyria. Jezreel was probably only a royal residence of some of the Israelitish kings. It may have been in awe of the ancient holiness of Shiloh, that Jeroboam forbore to pollute the secluded site of the Tabernacle with the golden calves. He chose for the religious capitals of his kingdom Dan, the old home of northern schism, and Bethel,^b a Benjamite city not far from Shiloh, and marked out by history and situation as the rival of Jerusalem.

4. The disaffection of Ephraim and the northern tribes having grown in secret under the prosperous but burdensome reign of Solomon, broke out at the critical moment of that great monarch's death. It was just then that Ephraim, the centre of the movement, found in Jeroboam an instrument prepared to give expression to the rivalry of centuries, with sufficient ability and application to rise him to high station, with the stain of treason on his name, and with the bitter recollections of an exile in his mind. Judah and Joseph were rivals from the time that they occupied the two prominent places, and received the amplest promises in the blessing of the dying patriarch (Gen. xlix. 8, 22). When the twelve tribes issued from Egypt, only Judah and Joseph could each muster above 70,000 warriors. In the desert and in the conquest, Caleb and Joshua, the representatives of the two tribes, stand out side by side eminent among the leaders of the people. The blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 13) and the divine selection of Joshua inaugurated the greater prominence of Joseph for the next three centuries. Othniel, the successor of Joshua, was from Judah: the last, Samuel, was born among the Ephraimites. Within that period Ephraim supplied at Shiloh (Judg. xxi. 19) a resting-place for the Ark, the centre of divine worship; and a rendezvous or capital at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 1; Judg. ix. 2) for the whole people. Ephraim arrogantly claimed (Judg. viii. 1, xii. 1) the exclusive right of taking the lead against invaders. Royal authority was offered to one dweller in Ephraim (viii. 22), and actually exercised for three years by another (ix. 22). After a silent, perhaps sullen, acquiescence in the transfer of Samuel's authority with additional dignity to a Benjamite, they resisted for seven years (2 Sam. ii. 9-11) its passing into the hands of the popular Jewish leader, and yielded reluctantly to the conviction that the sceptre which seemed almost within their grasp was reserved at last for Judah. Even in David's reign their jealousy did not always slumber (2 Sam. xix. 43); and though Solomon's alliance and intercourse with Tyre must have tended to increase the loyalty of the northern tribes, they took the first opportunity to emancipate themselves from the rule of his son. Doubtless the length of Solomon's reign, and the clouds that gathered round the close of it (1 K. xi. 14-25), and possibly his increasing despotism (Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii. 395), tended to diminish the general popularity of the house of David; and the idolatry of the king alienated the affection of religious Israelites. But none of these was the immediate cause of the disruption. No aspiration after greater liberty, political privileges, or aggrandizement at the expense of other powers, no spirit of commercial enterprise, no breaking forth of pent-up energy seems to have instigated the movement. Ephraim proudly longed for independence, without considering whether or at what cost he could maintain it. Shechem was built as a capital, and Tirzah as a residence, for an Ephraimite king, by the people who murmured under the burden imposed upon them by the royal state of Solomon. Ephraim felt no patriotic pride in a national splendour of which Judah was the centre. The dwelling-place of God when fixed in Jerusalem ceased to be so honourable to him as of old. It was ancient jealousy rather than recent provocation, the opportune death of Solomon rather than unwillingness to incur taxation, the opportune return of a persecuted Ephraimite rather than any commanding genius for rule which Jeroboam possessed, that finally broke up the brotherhood of the children of Jacob. It was an outburst of human feeling so soon as that divine influence which restrained the spirit of disunion was withdrawn in consequence of the idolatry of Solomon, so soon as that stern prophetic Voice which had called Saul to the throne under a protest, and David to the throne in repentance, was heard in anger summoning Jeroboam to divide the kingdom.

5. The kingdom of Israel developed no new power. It was but a portion of David's kingdom deprived of many elements of strength. Its frontier was as open and as widely extended as before; but it wanted a capital for the seat of organised power. Its territory was as fertile and as tempting to the spoiler, but its people were less united and patriotic. A corrupt religion poisoned the source of national life. When less reverence attended on a new and unconsecrated king, and less respect was felt for an aristocracy reduced by the retirement of the Levites, the army which David found hard to control rose up unchecked in the exercise of its wilful strength; and thus eight houses, each ushered in by a revolution, occupied the throne in quick succession. Tyre ceased to be an ally when the alliance was no longer profitable to the merchant-city. Moab and Ammon yielded tribute only while under compulsion. A powerful neighbour, Damascus, sat armed at the gate of Israel; and, beyond Damascus, might be discerned the rising strength of the first great monarchy of the world.

These causes tended to increase the misfortunes and to accelerate the early end of the kingdom of Israel. It lasted 216 years, from B.C. 938 to B.C. 722, about two-thirds of the duration of its more compact neighbour Judah.

But it may be doubted whether the division into two kingdoms greatly shortened the independent existence of the Hebrew race, or interfered with the purposes which, it is thought, may be traced in the establishment of David's monarchy. If among those purposes were the preservation of the true religion in the world, and the preparation of an agency adapted for the diffusion of Christianity in due season, then it must be observed—first, that as a bulwark providentially raised against the corrupting influence of idolatrous Tyre and Damascus, Israel kept back that contagion from Judah, and partly exhausted it before its arrival in the south; next, that the purity of Divine worship was not destroyed by the excision of those tribes which were remote from the influence of the Temple, and by the concentration of priests and religious Israelites within the southern kingdom; and lastly, that to the worshippers at Jerusalem the early decline and fall of Israel was a solemn and impressive spectacle of judgment,—the working out of the great problem of God's toleration of idolatry. This prepared the heart of Judah for the revivals under Hezekiah and Josiah, softened them into repentance during the Captivity, and strengthened them for their absolute renunciation of idolatry, when after seventy years they returned to Palestine, to teach the world that there is a spiritual bond more efficacious than the occupancy of a certain soil for keeping up national existence, and to become the channel through which God's greatest gift was conveyed to mankind. [CAPTIVITY.]

6. The detailed history of the kingdom of Israel will be found under the names of its nineteen kings. [See also EPHRAIM.] A summary view may be taken in four periods:—

(a.) B.C. 938–888. Jeroboam had not sufficient force of character in himself to make a lasting impression on his people. A king, but not a founder of a dynasty, he aimed at nothing beyond securing his present elevation. Without any ambition to share in the commerce of Tyre, or to compete with the growing power of Damascus, or even to complete the humiliation of the helpless monarch whom he had deprived of half a kingdom, Jeroboam acted entirely on a defensive policy. He attempted to give his subjects a centre which they wanted for their political allegiance, in Shechem or in Tirzah. He sought to change merely so much of their ritual as was inconsistent with his authority over them. But as soon as the golden calves were set up, the priests and Levites and many religious Israelites (2 Ch. xi. 16) left their country, and the disastrous emigration was not effectually checked even by the attempt of Baasha to build a fortress (2 Ch. xvi. 6) at Ramah. A new priesthood was introduced (1 K. xii. 31) absolutely dependent on the king (Amos vii. 13), not forming as under the Mosaic law a landed aristocracy, not respected by the people, and unable either to withstand the oppression or to strengthen the weakness of a king. A priesthood created and a ritual devised for secular purposes had no hold whatever on the conscience of the people. To meet their spiritual cravings a succession of prophets was raised up, great in their poverty, their purity, their austerity, their self-dependence, their moral influence, but imperfectly organised,—a rod to correct and check the civil government, not, as they might have been under happier circumstances, a staff to support it. The army soon learned its power to dictate to the isolated monarch and disunited people. Baasha in the midst of the army at Gibbethon slew the son and successor of Jeroboam; Zimri, a captain of chariots, slew the son and successor of Baasha; Omri, the captain of the host, was chosen to punish Zimri; and after a civil war of four years he prevailed over Tibni, the choice of half the people.

(b.) B.C. 888–843. For forty-five years Israel was governed by the house of Omri, the second founder of the kingdom. That sagacious king pitched on the strong hill of Samaria as the site of his capital. Damascus, which in the days of Baasha had proved itself more than a match for Israel, now again assumed a threatening attitude. Edom and Moab showed a tendency to independence, or even aggression. Hence the princes of Omri's house cultivated an alliance with the contemporary kings of Judah, which was cemented by the marriage of Jehoram and Athaliah, and marked by the community of names among the royal children. Ahab's Tyrian alliance strengthened him with the counsels of the masculine mind of Jezebel, but brought him no farther support. The subsequent rejection of the God of Abraham, under the disguise of abandoning Jeroboam's unlawful symbolism, and adopting Baal as the god of a luxurious court and subservient populace, led to a reaction in the nation, to the moral triumph of the prophets in the person of Elijah, and to the extinction of the house of Ahab in obedience to the bidding of Elisha.

(c.) B.C. 843–743. Unparalleled triumphs, but deeper humiliation, awaited the kingdom of Israel under the dynasty of Jehu. The worship of Baal was abolished by one blow; but, so long as the kingdom lasted, the people never rose superior to the debasing form of religion established by Jeroboam. Hazael, the successor of the two Benhadads, the ablest king of Damascus, reduced Jehoahaz to the condition of a vassal, and triumphed for a time over both the disunited Hebrew kingdoms. Almost the first sign of the restoration of their strength was a war between them; and Jehoash, the grandson of Jehu, entered Jerusalem as the conqueror of Amaziah. Jehoash also turned the tide of war against the Syrians; and Jeroboam II., the most powerful of all the kings of Israel, captured Damascus, and recovered the whole ancient frontier from Hamath to the Dead Sea. In the midst of this long and seemingly glorious reign the prophet Amos uttered his warnings. The short-lived greatness expired with the last king of Jehu's line.

(d.) B.C. 743–722. Military violence, it would seem, broke off the hereditary succession after the obscure and probably convulsed reign of Zachariah. An unsuccessful usurper, Shallum, was followed by the cruel Menahem, who, being unable to make head against the first attack of Assyria under Pul (Tiglath-pileser II.), became the agent of that monarch for the oppressive taxation of his subjects. Yet his power at home was sufficient to insure for his son and successor Pekahiah a ten years' reign, cut short by a bold usurper, Pekah. Abandoning the northern and Transjordanic regions to the encroaching power of Assyria under Tiglath-pileser, he was very near subjugating Judah, with the help of Damascus, now the coequal ally of Israel. But Assyria interposing summarily put an end to the independence of Damascus, and perhaps was the indirect cause of the assassination of the baffled Pekah. The irresolute Hoshea, the next and last usurper, became tributary to his invader, Shalmaneser IV., betrayed the Assyrian to the rival monarchy of Egypt, and was punished by the loss of his liberty, and by the capture by Sargon, after a three years' siege, of his strong capital, Samaria. Some gleanings of the ten tribes yet remained in the land after so many years of religious decline, moral debasement, national degradation, anarchy, bloodshed, and deportation. Even these were gathered up by the conqueror and carried to Assyria, never again, as a distinct people, to occupy their portion of that goodly and pleasant land which their forefathers won under Joshua from the heathen. ISRAELITE (יִשְׂרָאֵלִי; B. Ἰσραηλιτης; de Israëliti). In 2 Sam. xvii. 25, Ithra is called "the Israelite" (R. V. and LXX. B.). The true reading is "the Ishmaelite" (cp. LXX. A. and 1 Ch. ii. 17). "Israelite" is also the A. V. rendering of יִשְׂרָאֵלִי (R. V. "man of Israel") in Num. xxv. 14, and of Ἰσραηλιτης in John i. 47, Rom. xi. 1. "Israelites" is the translation of יִשְׂרָאֵלִי, used collectively in many passages (e.g. Ex. ix. 7; Josh. iii. 17; 1 Sam. ii. 14; 2 Sam. iv. 1; 2 K. iii. 24; 1 Ch. i. 2);—of Ἰσραηλ in Bar. iii. 4; 1 Macc. i. 43, &c.;—of ισραηλ in Judith vi. 14; 1 Macc. vii. 23;—and of Ἰσραηλιται in Rom. ix. 4; 2 Cor. xi. 22. [F.]

ISRAELITISH (יִשְׂרָאֵלִי, B. Ἰσραηλιτῆς; Israelitis). The designation of a woman whose son was stoned for blasphemy (Lev. xxiv. 10).

IS'SACHAR (יִשָּׂשכָר, i.e. Issacar—such is the invariable spelling of the name in the Hebrew, the Samaritan Codex and Version, the Targums of Onkelos and Pseudojonathan, but the Masorets have pointed it so as to supersede the second S, יִשָּׂשכָר, Issa[s]car: Ἰσσάχαρ; Rec. Text of N. T. Ἰσασχαρ, but Cod. C. Ἰσαχαρ; Joseph. Ἰσσάχαρις: Issachar), the ninth son of Jacob and the fifth of Leah; the first born to Leah after the interval which occurred in the births of her children (Gen. xxx. 17; cp. xxix. 35). As is the case with each of the sons, the name is recorded as bestowed on account of a circumstance connected with the birth. But, as may be also noticed in more than one of the others, two explanations seem to be combined in the narrative, which even then is not in exact accordance with the requirements of the name. "God hath given me my hire (יִשָּׂשכָר, sācār) . . . and she called his name Issāchar," is the record; but in v. 18 that "hire" is for the surrender of her maid to her husband—while in v. 14-17 it is for the discovery and bestowal of the mandrakes. Besides, as indicated above, the name in its original form—Issacar—rebels against this interpretation, an interpretation which to be consistent requires the form subsequently imposed on the word, Is-sachar.*

* The words occur again almost identically in 2 Ch.

The allusion is not again brought forward as it is with Dan, Asher, &c., in the blessings of Jacob and Moses. In the former only it is perhaps allowable to discern a faint echo of the sound of "Issachar" in the word shicmo—"shoulder" (Gen. xlix. 15).

Of Issachar the individual we know nothing. In Genesis he is not mentioned after his birth, and the few verses in Chronicles devoted to the tribe contain merely a brief list of its chief men and heroes in the reign of David (1 Ch. vii. 1-5).

At the descent into Egypt four sons are ascribed to him, who founded the four chief families of the tribe (Gen. xli. 13; Num. xxvi. 23, 25; 1 Ch. vii. 1). Issachar's place during the journey to Canaan was on the east of the Tabernacle with his brothers Judah and Zebulun (Num. ii. 5), the group moving foremost in the march (x. 15), and having a common standard which, according to the Rabbinical tradition, was of the three colours of sardine, topaz, and carbuncle, inscribed with the names of the three tribes, and bearing the figure of a lion's whelp (see Targum Pseudojon. on Num. ii. 3). At this time the captain of the tribe was Nethaneel ben-Zuar (Num. i. 8, ii. 5, vii. 18, x. 15). He was succeeded by Igal ben-Joseph, who went as representative of his tribe among the spies (xiii. 7), and he again by Paltiel ben-Azzan, who assisted Joshua in apportioning the land of Canaan (xxxiv. 26). Issachar was one of the six tribes who were to stand on Mount Gerizim during the ceremony of blessing and cursing (Dent. xxvii. 12). He was still in company with Judah, Zebulun being opposite on Ebal. The number of the fighting men of Issachar when taken in the census at Sinai was 54,400. During the journey they seem to have steadily increased, and after the mortality at Peor they amounted to 64,300, being inferior to none but Judah and Dan—to the latter by 100 souls only. The numbers given in 1 Ch. vii. 2, 4, 5, probably the census of Joab, amount in all to 145,600.

The Promised Land once reached, the connexion between Issachar and Judah seems to have closed, to be renewed only on two brief occasions, which will be noticed in their turn. The intimate relation with Zebulun was, however, maintained. The two brother-tribes had their portions close together, and more than once they are mentioned in company. The allotment of Issachar lay above that of Manasseh. The specification of its boundaries and contents is contained in Josh. xix. 17-23. But to the towns there named must be added Daberath, given in the catalogue of Levitical cities (xxi. 28; Jarmuth here is possibly the Remeth of xix. 21), and five others—Beth-shean, Ibleam, End-or, Taanach, and Megiddo. These last, though the property of Manasseh, remained within the limits of Issachar (Josh. xvii. 11; Judg. i. 27), xv. 7 and Jer. xxxi. 16: יִשָּׂשכָר יִשָּׂשכָר = "there is a reward for," A. V. "shall be rewarded."

An expansion of the story of the mandrakes, with curious details, will be found in the Tetamentum Issachar, Fabricius, Cod. Pseudepigr. pp. 620-23. They were ultimately deposited "in the house of the Lord," whatever that expression may mean.

and they assist us materially in determining his boundary. In the words of Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 22), "it extended in length from Carmel to the Jordan, in breadth to Mount Tabor." In fact it consisted of the plain of Esdraelon or Jezreel, and probably that of Dothan also. The south boundary we can trace by En-gannim, the modern Jenin, at the foot of the heights which form the southern enclosure to the Plain; and then further westward by Taanach and Megiddo, the authentic fragments of which still stand on the same heights as they trend away to the hump of Carmel. On the north the territory ceased with the plain, which is there bounded by Tabor, the outpost of the hills of Zebulun. East of Tabor the hill-country continued so as to screen the tribe from the Sea of Galilee, but a wide and gently sloping valley on the S.E. led to Bethshean and the upper part of the Jordan valley. West of Tabor again, a little to the south, is Chesulloth, the modern Issal, close to the traditional "Mount of Precipitation;" and hence the boundary probably ran in a slanting course till it joined Mount Carmel, where the Kishon (Josh. xix. 20) worked its way below the eastern bluff of that mountain—and thus completed the triangle at its western apex. Nazareth lies among the hills, a few miles north of the so-called Mount of Precipitation, and therefore escaped being in Issachar. Almost in the centre of the territory stood Jezreel, on a low swell, attended on the one hand by the eminence of Mount Gilboa, on the other by that now called ed-Duhy, or "little Hermon," the latter having Shunem, Nain, and Endor on its slopes,—names which recall some of the most interesting and important events in the history of Israel.

This territory was, as it still is, among the richest land in Palestine. Westward was the famous plain which derived its name, the "seed-plot of God"—such is the signification of Jezreel—from its fertility, and the very weeds of which at this day testify to its enormous powers of production (Stanley, S. & P., p. 348). [ESDRAELON; JEZREEL.] On the north is Tabor, which even under the burning sun of that climate retains the glades and dells of an English wood (ib. p. 350). On the east, behind Jezreel, is the opening which conducts to the plain of Jordan—to that Bethshean which was proverbially among the Rabbis the gate of Paradise for its fruitfulness. It is this aspect of the territory of Issachar which appears to be alluded to in the Blessing of Jacob. The image of the "strong-boned he-ass" (אֵסֶן הַחֵמֶשׁ) —the large animal used for burdens and field-work, not the lighter and swifter she-ass for riding—"couching down between the two hedge-rows"^b (R. V. "sheepfolds"), chewing the cud of stolid ease and quiet—is very applicable, not only to the tendencies and habits, but to the very size and air of a rural agrarian people, while the sequel of the verse is no less suggestive of the certain result of such tendencies when unrelieved by any higher aspirations: "He saw a resting-place that was good and the land that it was pleasant; and he bowed his shoulder to bear and became a servant under task work" (R. V.)—the task-work imposed on him by the various marauding tribes who were attracted to his territory by the richness of the crops. The Blessing of Moses completes the picture. He is not only "in tents"—in nomad or semi-nomad life—but "rejoicing" in them; and it is perhaps not straining a point to observe that he has by this time begun to lose his individuality. He and Zebulun are mentioned together as having part possession in the holy mountain of Tabor, which was on the frontier line of each (Deut. xxxiii. 18, 19). We pass from this to the time of Deborah: the chief struggle in the great victory over Sisera took place on the territory of Issachar, "by Taanach at the waters of Megiddo" (Judg. v. 19); but the allusion to the tribe in the song of triumph is of the most cursory nature, not consistent with its having taken any prominent part in the action.

One among the Judges of Israel was from Issachar—TOLA (Judg. x. 1); but beyond the length of his sway we have only the fact recorded that he resided out of the limits of his own tribe—at Shamir in Mount Ephraim. By Josephus he is omitted entirely (see Ant. v. 7, § 6). The census of the tribe taken in the reign of David has already been alluded to. It is contained in 1 Ch. vii. 1-5, and an expression occurs in it which testifies to the nomadic tendencies above noticed. Out of the whole number of the tribe no less than 36,000 were marauding mercenary troops—"bands" (עֲבָדֵי) —a term applied to no other tribe in this enumeration, though elsewhere to Gad, and uniformly to the irregular bodies of the Bedawi nations round Israel.⁴ This was probably at the close of David's reign. Thirty years before, when two hundred of the head men of the tribe had gone to Hebron to assist in making David king over the entire realm, different qualifications are noted in them—they "had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do . . . and all their brethren were at their commandment." What this "understanding of the times" was we have no clue. By the later Jewish interpreters it is explained as skill in ascertaining the periods of the sun and moon, the intercalation of months, and dates of solemn feasts, and the interpretation of the signs of the heavens (Targum ad loc.; Jerome, Quaest. Heb.). Josephus (Ant. vii. 2, § 2) gives it as "knowing the things that were to happen;" and he adds that the armed men who came with these leaders were 20,000. One of the wise men of Issachar, according to an old Jewish tradition preserved by Jerome (Quaest. Heb. on 2 Ch. xvii. 16), was Amasiah, son of Zichri, who with 200,000 men offered himself to Jehovah in the service of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xvii. 16): but this is very questionable, as the movement appears to have been confined to Judah and Benjamin. The ruler of the tribe at this time was Omri, of the great family of Michael (1 Ch. xxvii. 18; cp. vii. 3). May he not have been the forefather of the king of Israel of the same name—the founder of the "house of Omri" and of the "house of Ahab," the builder of Samaria, possibly on the same hill of Shamir on which the Issacharite judge, Tola, had formerly held his court? But whether this was so or not, at any rate one dynasty of the Israelite kings was Issacharite. BAASHA, the son of Ahijah, of the house of Issachar, a member of the army with which Nadab and all Israel were besieging Gibbethon, apparently not of any standing in the tribe (cp. 1 K. xvi. 2), slew the king, and himself mounted the throne (1 K. xv. 27, &c.). He was evidently a fierce and warlike man (xvi. 29; 1 Ch. xvi. 1), and an idolater like Jeroboam. The Issacharite dynasty lasted during the twenty-four years of his reign and the two of his son Elah. At the end of that time it was wrested from Elah by the same means that his father had acquired it, and Zimri, the new king, commenced his reign by a massacre of the whole kindred and connexions of Baasha—he left him "not even so much as a dog" (xvi. 11). ELISHA, being from Abel-meholah, may be said to have been of Issachar.

One more notice of Issachar remains to be added to the meagre information already collected. It is fortunately a favourable one. There may be no truth in the tradition just quoted that the tribe was in any way connected with the reforms of Jehoshaphat, but we are fortunately certain that, distant as Jezreel was from Jerusalem, they took part in the Passover with which Hezekiah sanctified the opening of his reign. On that memorable occasion a multitude of the people from the northern tribes, and amongst them from Issachar, although so long estranged from the worship of Jehovah as to have forgotten how to make the necessary purifications, yet by the enlightened wisdom of Hezekiah were allowed to keep the Feast; and they did keep it seven days with great gladness—with such tumultuous joy as had not been known since the time of Solomon, when the whole land was one. Nor did they separate till the occasion had been signalled by an immense destruction of idolatrous altars and symbols, "in Judah and Benjamin, in Ephraim and Manasseh," up to the very confines of Issachar's own land—and then "all the children of Israel returned every man to his possession into their own cities" (2 Ch. xxxi. 1). It is a satisfactory farewell to take of the tribe. A few years later Sargon king of Assyria had taken Samaria after three years' siege, and with the rest of Israel had carried Issachar away to his distant dominions. There we must be content to leave them until, with the rest of their brethren of all the tribes of the children of Israel (Dan only excepted), the twelve thousand of the tribe of Issachar shall be sealed in their foreheads (Rev. vii. 7).

2. A Korhite Levite, one of the doorkeepers (A. V. "porters") of the house of Jehovah, seventh son of OBED-EDOM (1 Ch. xxvi. 5).

[G.] [W.]

* לָמַס עֲבָרֵי. By the LXX. rendered ἀνήρ γεωργός.

Cp. their similar rendering of עֲבָדֵי (A. V. "servants" and "husbandry") in Gen. xxvi. 14.

ISSHIAH (יִשְׁשִׁיָּהּ = whom Jehovah leads). 1. (B. omits, A. 'Iesias; Jesias.) A descendant of Moses by his younger son Eliezer; the head of the numerous family of Rehabiah, in the time of David (1 Ch. xxiv. 21; cp. xxiii. 17, xxvi. 25). His name is elsewhere given as JESHAIAH.

2. (B. 'Isid, A. 'Asia; Jesia.) A Levite of the house of Kohath and family of Uzziel; named in the list of the tribe in the time of David (1 Ch. xxiv. 25).

ISSUE RUNNING (צִיָּו, צִיָּו). The texts Lev. xv. 2, 3, xxii. 4; Num. v. 2 (and 2 Sam. iii. 29, where the malady is invoked as a curse), are probably to be interpreted of gonorrhoea. In Lev. xv. 3 a distinction is introduced, which merely means that the cessation of the actual flux does not constitute ceremonial cleanness, but that the patient must bide the legal time, seven days (v. 13), and perform the prescribed purifications and sacrifice (v. 14). See, however, Surenhusius's preface to the treatise Zabim of the Mishna, where another interpretation is given. As regards the specific varieties of this malady, it is generally asserted that its most severe form (gon. virulenta) is modern, having first appeared in the 15th century. Chardin (Voyages en Perse, ii. 200) states that he observed that this disorder was prevalent in Persia, but that its effects were far less severe than in Western climates. If this be true, it would go some way to explain the alleged absence of the gon. virul. from ancient nosology, which found its field of observation in the East, Greece, &c.; and to confirm the supposition that the milder form only was the subject of Mosaic legislation: cp. Num. xxv. 1, 9; Josh. xxii. 17, where at any rate some persistent malady is intended. But, beyond this, it is probable that diseases may appear, run their course, and disappear, and, for want of an accurate observation of their symptoms, leave no trace behind them. The "bed," "seat," &c. (Lev. xv. 5, 6, &c.), are not supposed by that law to have been contagious, but the defilement is extended to them merely to give greater prominence to the ceremonial strictness with which the case was ruled. In the woman's "issue" (v. 19) the ordinary menstruation seems alone intended, supposed prolonged (v. 25) to a morbid extent. The scriptural handling of the subject not dealing, as in the case of leprosy, in symptoms, it seems gratuitous to detail them here: those who desire such knowledge will find them in any compendium of therapeutics (see Biblical - Talmudische Medicin, iii., B, c). The ref. are Joseph. de B. J. v. 5, 6, vi. 9, 3; Mishna, Zabim. ii. 2, Chelim. i. 3, 8; Maimon. ad Zabim. ii. 2: whence we learn that persons thus affected might not ascend the Temple mount, nor share in any religious celebrations, nor even enter Jerusalem. See also Michaelis, Laws of Moses, iv. 282. [H. H.]

ISTALCURIUS. In 1 Esd. viii. 40, the "son of Istalcurus" (A. 'Istaklōros, B. 'Istaklōkos) is substituted for "and Zabbud" of the corresponding list in Ezra (viii. 14). The Qeri has Ziccur instead of Zabbud, and of this there is perhaps some trace in Istalcurus.

IS'UAH, R. V. ISHVAH (יִשְׁוֹהַ, peaceful; B. 'Isouā, A. 'Iesouā; Jesua), second son of Asher (1 Ch. vii. 30). Elsewhere in the A. V. his name, though the same in Hebrew, appears as ISHUAH.

IS'UI, R. V. ISHVI (יִשְׁוִי; BA. 'Iesūi; Jesui), third son of Asher (Gen. xli. 17); founder of a family called after him, though in the A. V. appearing as THE JESUITES (Num. xxvi. 44; R. V. "Ishvites"). Elsewhere the name also appears as ISHUAI.

ITALIAN BAND (Acts x. 1). [ARMY.]

ITALY (Ἰταλία; Italia). This word is used in the N. T. in the usual sense of the period, i.e. in its true geographical sense, as denoting the whole natural peninsula between the Alps and the Straits of Messina. For the progress of the history of the word, first as applied to the extreme south of the peninsula, then as extended northwards to the right bank of the Po, see the Dict. of Gk. & Rom. Geogr. s. n. From the time of the close of the Republic it was employed as we employ it now. In the N. T. it occurs three, or indeed, more correctly speaking, four times. In Acts x. 1, the Italian cohort at Caesarea (ἡ σκείρα ἢ καλονομένη Ἰταλική, A. V. "Italian band"), consisting, as it doubtless did, of men recruited in Italy, illustrates the military relations of the imperial peninsula with the provinces. [ARMY.] In Acts xviii. 2, where we are told of the expulsion of Aquila and Priscilla with their compatriots "from Italy," we are reminded of the large Jewish population which many authorities show that it contained. Acts xvii. 1, where the beginning of St. Paul's voyage "to Italy" is mentioned, and the whole subsequent narrative, illustrate the trade which subsisted between the peninsula and other parts of the Mediterranean. And the words in Heb. xiii. 24, "They of Italy (οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας) salute you," whatever they may prove for or against this being the region in which the letter was written, are interesting as a specimen of the progress of Christianity in the West.

[J. S. H.] [W.]

I-THAI (Ἰθάκη; B. Aipei, N. Aibei, A. 'Hōoi; Ethai), a Benjaminite, son of Ribai of Gibeah, one of the heroes of David's guard (1 Ch. xi. 31). In the parallel list of 2 Sam. xxiii. 29 the name is given as ITTAI. Kennicott decides that the form Ithai is the original (Dissertation, ad loc.).

I-THAMAR (Ἰθάμαρ; 'Ithamar; Ithamar), the youngest son of Aaron (Ex. vi. 23). After the deaths of Nadab and Abihu (Lev. x. 1), Eleazar and Ithamar, having been admonished to show no mark of sorrow for their brothers' loss, were appointed to succeed to their places in the priestly office, as they had left no children (Ex. xxviii. 1, 40, 43; Num. iii. 3, 4; 1 Ch. xxiv. 2). In the distribution of services belonging to the Tabernacle and its transport on the march of the Israelites, the Gershonites had charge of the curtains and hangings, and the Merarites of the pillars, cords, and boards, and both of these departments were placed under the superin-tendance of Ithamar (Ex. xxxviii. 21; Num. iv. 21-33). These services were continued under the Temple system, so far as was consistent with its stationary character, but, instead of being appropriated to families, they were divided by lot; the first lot being taken by the family of Eleazar, whose descendants were more numerous than those of Ithamar (1 Ch. xxiv. 4, 6). The high-priesthood passed into the family of Ithamar in the person of Eli, but for what reason we are not informed. It reverted into its original line in the person of Zadok, in consequence of Abiathar's participation in the rebellion of Adonijah. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy delivered to Samuel against Eli (1 Sam. ii. 31-35; 1 K. ii. 26, 27, 35; Joseph. Ant. viii. 1, § 3).

A descendant of Ithamar, by name Daniel, is mentioned as returning from captivity in the time of Artaxerxes (Ezra viii. 2). [H. W. P.]

I-THI-EL (יְתִי־אֵל, ? = יְתִי אֵל = God is with me; BA. Αἰθήλα, Ν. Σεθιήλα; Etheel). 1. A Benjamite, son of Jesaiah (Neh. xi. 7).

2. (LXX. omits; Vulg. translates, cum quo est Deus.) One of two persons—Ithiel and Ucal—to whom Agur ben-Jakeb delivered his discourse (Prov. xxx. 1). [UCAL]

ITH-MAH (יְתִמָּה, (?) = orphanhood; BN. Ἰθεμά, A. Ἰθεμά; Jethma), a Moabite, one of the heroes of David's guard, according to the enlarged list of Chronicles (1 Ch. xi. 46). Possibly he attached himself to David when David visited the king of Moab at Mizpeh with his father and mother.

ITH-NAN (יְתַנָּן, ?) in both MSS. of the LXX. the name is corrupted by being attached to that next it: B. Ἀσπιωδαν, A. Ἰθνα(φ: Jethnam), one of the towns in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 23), named with Kedesh and Telem (cp. 1 Sam. xv. 4), and therefore probably on the borders of the desert, if not actually in the desert itself. No trace of its existence has yet been discovered; nor does it appear to have been known to Jerome. [G.] [W.]

ITH-RA (יְתִרָה, ? = abundance: in Sam. B. Ἰθέρ, A. Ἰθέρ, in Ch. vice versa; Joseph. Ant. vii. 10, § 1, Ἰεθάρρος; Jetra), an Israelite (2 Sam. xvii. 25) or Ishmaelite (1 Ch. ii. 17, "Jether the Ishmeelite"); the father of Amasa by Abigail, David's sister. He was thus brother-in-law to David and uncle to Joab, Abishai, and Asahel, the three "sons of Zeruiah." There is no absolute means of settling which of these—Israelite or Ishmaelite—is correct: but there can be little doubt that the latter is so (so A. in 2 Sam.); the fact of the admixture of Ishmaelite blood in David's family being a fit subject for notice in the genealogies, whereas Ithra's being an Israelite would call for no remark. [JETHER.] Another Ishmaelite is mentioned among David's subjects in 1 Ch. xxvii. 30. [G.] [W.]

ITH-RAN (יְתִרָן). 1. A. Ἰεθράν, B. Γεθράμ (1 Ch. i. 41); Jethram, Jethran. Ithran ben Dishon ben Seir was a clan or sub-tribe of the Horites or Troglodyte aborigines of the hill-country of Seir, whom the Edomites dispossessed (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 21, 26; Deut. ii. 12).

2. B. Θερά, A. Ἰέθρ; Jethran. Ithran (or Jether) ben Zophah ben Helem (or Hotham?) ben Heber ben Beriah ben Asher; a chief and house or clan of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch. vii. 37, 38). The list in this chapter, vv. 30-39, was once probably continuous. The corruptions of some of the names can be explained; e.g. Hotham for Helem is due to a copyist's eye having wandered to ahotham, "their sister," v. 30 or v. 32 (see the notes ad loc. in Bp. Ellicott's O. T. Commentary).

The names Jethro (see Ex. iv. 18) and Ithra (2 Sam. xvii. 25; cp. 1 K. ii. 5) as well as Ithran (cp. 1 Ch. vii. 38) are only variations of Jether. [C. J. B.]

ITH-RE-AM (יְתִר־אָם = residue of the people: in 2 Sam. B. Ἰεθεράμ, A. Ελεθεράμ; in 1 Ch. B. Ἰθαράμ, A. Ἰεθράμ; Joseph. Γεθράμυς; Jethraam), a son of David, born to him in Hebron, and distinctly specified as the sixth, and as the child of "Eglah, David's wife" (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Ch. iii. 3). In the ancient Jewish traditions Eglah is said to have been Michal, and to have died in giving birth to Ithream.

ITH'RITE, THE (יְתִרִי, ?) in 2 Sam. B. Αἰθεραῖος, A. ὁ Ἰεθραῖος, in 1 Ch. B. Ἰθρηλ, Ν. Ἰθ-, A. Ἰεθρηλ; Jethrites, Jethraeus), the native of a place, or descendant of a man, called Iether (according to the Hebrew mode of forming derivatives); the designation of two of the members of David's guard, Ira and Gareb (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Ch. xi. 40). The Ithrite (A. V. "Ithrites;" BA. Αἰθαλεῖμ; Jethrei) is mentioned in 1 Ch. ii. 53 as among the "families of Kirjath-jearim;" but this does not give us much clue to the derivation of the term, except that it fixes it as belonging to Judah. The two Ithrite heroes of David's guard may have come from JATHIR, in the mountains of Judah, one of the places which were the "haunt" of David and his men in their freebooting wanderings, and where he had "friends" (1 Sam. xxx. 27; cp. v. 31). Ira has been supposed to be identical with "Ira the Jairite," David's priest (2 Sam. xx. 26)—the Syriac Version reading "from Jathir" in that place. But nothing more than conjecture can be arrived at on the point (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the B. B. of Samuel, in loco).

IT'TAH-KAZIN, R. V. ETH-KAZIN (יְתַתָּה קַצִּין; B. ἐπι πόλιν Κασσίμ; A. Κασίμ; Thacasin), one of the landmarks of the boundary of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 13), named next to Gath-hepher. Like that place (A. V. "Gittah-hepher"), the name is probably Ethkazin (as in R. V.), with the Hebrew particle of motion (ah) added—i.e. "to Eth-kazin." Taken as Hebrew, the name may bear the interpretation time of a judge (Ges. Thes. p. 1083 b. See Dillmann² in loco). It has not been identified. [G.] [W.]

IT'TAI (יְתַתָּי). 1. (Ἰθθ, and so Josephus; B. Σεθελ, A. Ἰθθελ; Ethai). ἸΤΤΑΙ THE GITTITE, i.e. the native of Gath, a Philistine in the army of king David. He appears only during the revolution of Absalom. We first discern him on the morning of David's flight, while the king was standing under the olive-tree below the city, watching the army and the people defile past him. [See DAVID, p. 730.] Last in the procession came the 600 heroes who had formed David's band during his wanderings in Judah, and had been with him at Gath (2 Sam. xv. 18; cp. 1 Sam. xxiii. 13, xxvii. 2, xxx. 9, 10; and see Joseph. Ant. vii. 9, § 2). Amongst these, apparently commanding them, was Ittai the Gittite (v. 19). He caught the eye of the king, who at once addressed him and besought him as "a stranger and an exile," and as one who had but very recently joined his service, not to attach himself to a doubtful cause, but to return "with his brethren" and abide with the king* (vv. 19, 20). But Ittai is firm; he is the king's slave (עַבְדֵּי, A. V. "servant"), and wherever his master goes he will go. Accordingly he is allowed by David to proceed, and he passes over the Kedron before the king (xv. 22, LXX. See Driver in loco), with all his men, and "all the little ones that were with him." These "little ones" (בְּנֵי הַבָּיִת, "all the children") must have been the families of the band, their "households" (1 Sam. xxvii. 3). They accompanied them during their wanderings in Judah, often in great risk (1 Sam. xxx. 6), and they were not likely to leave them behind in this fresh commencement of their wandering life.

When the army was numbered and organised by David at Mahanaim, Ittai again appears, now in command of a third part of the force, and (for the time at least) enjoying equal rank with Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. xviii. 2, 5, 12). But here, on the eve of the great battle, we take leave of this valiant and faithful stranger; his conduct in the fight and his subsequent fate are alike unknown to us. Nor is he mentioned in the lists of David's captains and of the heroes of his body-guard (see 2 Sam. xxiii.; 1 Ch. xi.), lists which are possibly of a date previous to Ittai's arrival in Jerusalem.

An interesting tradition is related by Jerome (Quaest. Hebr. on 1 Ch. xx. 2). "David took the crown off the head of the image of Milcom (A. V. 'their king'). But by the Law it was forbidden to any Israelite to touch either gold or silver of an idol. Wherefore they say that Ittai the Gittite, who had come to David from the Philistines, was the man who snatched the crown from the head of Milcom; for it was lawful for a Hebrew to take it from the hand of a man, though not from the head of the idol." The main difficulty to the reception of this legend lies in the fact that if Ittai was engaged in the Ammonite war, which happened several years before Absalom's revolt, the expression of David (2 Sam. xv. 20), "thou camest but yesterday," loses its force. However, these words may be merely a strong metaphor, implying that he was not a native of Israel.

From the expression "thy brethren" (xv. 20) we may infer that there were other Philistines besides Ittai in the six hundred; but this is uncertain. Ittai was not exclusively a Philistine name, nor does "Gittite"—as in the case of Obed-edom, who was a Levite—necessarily imply Philistine parentage. Still David's words, "stranger and exile," seem to show that he was not an Israelite.

2. (B. Ἰταίης, A. Ἰταί; Ittai) Son of Ribai, from Gibeah of Benjamin; one of the thirty heroes of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 29). In the parallel list of 1 Ch. xi. the name is given as ITHAI. [G.] [W.]

ITURAEA (Ἰτουραία), a district on the north-eastern border of Palestine (Strabo, xvi. 2, § 18; Pliny, v. 19), which, with Trachonitis, belonged to the tetrarchy of Philip (Luke iii. 1). The Ituraeans were descended from JETUR (יֶטֶר), a son of Ishmael, who gave his name, like the rest of his brethren, to the little province he colonised (Gen. xv. 15, 16; cp. 1 Ch. i. 31). They therefore belonged to the Arab race; and Strabo couples them with the Arabians, whilst Dion Cassius calls them Arabs. After the Israelites had settled in Canaan, a war broke out between the tribes east of Jordan and the Hagarites (or Ishmaelites), Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab. The latter were conquered, and the children of Manasseh "dwelt in the land: they increased from Bashan unto Baal-Hermon and Senir, and unto Mount Hermon" (1 Ch. v. 19-23). Jetur is not again mentioned in the Bible; but during the Asmonaeon period, according to Josephus, the Ituraeans were conquered by Aristobulus I. (B.C. 105), who took part of their territory, and compelled them to fly or to be circumcised (Ant. xiii. 11, § 3). The mountain district was in the hands of Ptolemaeus, ruler of Chalcis, who combined with other petty princes in raids that rendered the whole country, from Byblus and Berytus to Damascus, unsafe (Strabo, xvi. 2, §§ 10, 18, 20; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 16, § 3; xiv. 7, § 4). When Pompey came into Syria, Ituraea was ceded to the Romans (Appian, Mithr. 106), but Ptolemaeus was allowed, on payment of 1,000 talents, to retain his position as a vassal chief (Ant. xiv. 3, § 2). Ptolemaeus was succeeded by his son Lysanias, who was killed by M. Antonius at the instigation of Cleopatra, to whom the province, called by Dion Cassius (xix. 32) "Ituraean Arabia," was given (Ant. xv. 4, § 1; Appian, B. C. v. 7). At a later date Ituraea passed into the hands of a certain Zenodorus, who, to increase his income, made common cause with the robbers. Augustus, consequently, took (B.C. 23) Auranitis, Bateana, and Trachonitis away from him and gave them to Herod (Ant. xv. 10, § 1); and on the death of Zenodorus, three years later, added those of his possessions which lay between Trachonitis and Galilee, and contained Ulatha and Paneas (Ant. xv. 10, § 3). It is omitted by Josephus from the list of districts received by Philip on his father's death, unless it be included under the term Paneas (Ant. xvii. 8, § 1; B. J. ii. 6, § 3). According to Dion Cassius (lix. 12), it was given by Caligula to a certain Soemus, after that emperor had granted the greater portion of the tetrarchy of Philip to Agrippa (Ant. xviii. 6, § 10; xix. 8, § 2). Finally, under Claudius, it became part of the province of Syria (Tac. Ann. xii. 23; Dion Cass. l. c.).

Ituraea was a mountainous country with numerous large caverns (Strabo, l. c.); and its inhabitants, a bold robber race, were daring plunderers and skilful archers (Cicero, Phil. ii. 44; Virgil, Georg. ii. 448; Lucan, vii. 230, 514). Apuleius (Flor. i. 6) calls them frugum pauperes Ityraei; and their modern representatives appear to be the Druses. The boundaries of Ituraea cannot be defined with precision; but the district apparently lay between the Upper Jordan and Damascus, and included the southern slopes of Anti-Libanus.

In this position, S.W. of Damascus, is the modern province of Jedûr (جيدور), which corresponds to the Hebrew Jetur (יֵטוּר). Wetzstein (Reisebericht, p. 90 sq.) identifies Ituraea with Jebel Drûz in the Hauran; Riehms (HWB. s. v.) considers Libanus and Anti-Libanus to have been the special possession of the Ituraeans; and Reland (Pal. p. 106) and Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. s. v. Ituraea) suppose that it was included in Auranitis. Jedûr is table-land with an undulating surface, and has little conical and cup-shaped hills at intervals. The southern section of it has a rich soil, well watered by numerous springs and streams from Hermon. The greater part of the northern section is wild and rugged. The rock is all basalt, and the formation similar to that of the Lejah. [ARGOB.] There are about twenty inhabited villages (Burckhardt, Trav. p. 286; Porter, Damascus, ii. 272: see also Münter, de Reb. Itur. Havre, 1824; Schenkel, Bib. Lex. s. v.; Kiepert, Lehrb. d. alt. Geog. p. 169). [J. L. P.] [W.]

IVAH (IV'VAH) or A'VA (AV'VA) (יְוָה or נְוָה; 'Ašd or 'Aid; Ava). Ivah is mentioned twice (2 K. xviii. 34 and xix. 13; cp. also Is. xxxvii. 13), both times in connexion with Hena and Sepharvaim. Ava is mentioned once (2 K. xvii. 24), in connexion with Babylon and Cuthah, as one of the places from which the Assyrian king Sargon transplanted the inhabitants to Samaria. Ivah and Ava have generally been regarded as one and the same place, and have been identified with the modern Hit (the "Is of Herodotus), with the Ahava (הַחַוָּה) of Ezra viii. 15, &c. These identifications, however, are very doubtful, for it cannot be regarded as certain whether the city lay, like Arpad and Hamath, in Syria, or, like Cuthah, in Babylonia. Its position, however, is probably limited to one or other of these two districts.

Notwithstanding the likeness of the forms Ava and Ivah, it is not impossible that two distinct places are really meant, and to this possibility colour is given by the fact that the LXX. puts Aba for Ivah, and Aia for Ava. The inhabitants of the latter place (Auwim, אַוּיִם, Gr. Ebaioi) are mentioned (2 K. xvii. 31) as having been transplanted to Samaria, whither they took the worship of their two principal gods, Nibcnaz and Tartak. [T. G. P.]

IVORY (יָבֵן, shên, in all passages except 1 K. x. 22, and 2 Ch. ix. 21, where יָבֵן, shen-habbim, is so rendered). The word shên literally signifies the "tooth" of any animal, and hence more especially denotes the substance of the projecting tusks of elephants. There is no sufficient reason for believing the ancients to have been ignorant of the fact that ivory is a tusk and not a horn. Critics are now generally agreed that יָבֵן is identical with the Sanskrit śhas, "an elephant," a name preserved with scarcely any change in the Cingalese of Ceylon and the modern vernacular of Malabar; identified conjecturally by Sir H. Rawlinson with habba, which occurs in Assyrian inscriptions, and which he interprets as meaning "elephant." But the Assyrian term is al-ab, and "ivory" is shin al-ab, "tooth of elephant" (see Schrader, KA T. on 1 K. x. 22). Keil (on 1 K. x. 22) derives the Hebrew from the Coptic ebou. The name in 1 K. x. 22 shows that the Israelites as early as the time of Solomon were aware of the fact that ivory was a tusk, not a horn. It is true that at a much later date, Ezekiel speaks of קַרְנֹת יָבֵן (xxvii. 15), but the term "horn" is merely applied to the shape of the tusk, not to its growth, and the expression is literally "horns of tooth." The classical writers from the earliest times seem to have been aware of the true character of ivory. Pliny, e.g., speaking (viii. 4) of ivory says, "Quæ Juba cornua appellat, Herodotus tanto antiquior, et consuetudo melius, dentes." It was suggested in Gesenius' Thesaurus (s. v.) that the original reading may have been יָבֵן הַיָּבֵן, "ivory, ebony" (cp. Ezek. xxvii. 15), but Gesenius afterwards stated his preference for the present text, "Magis hoc placet, quam quod olim suspicabar" (Lexicon, p. 1026). Hitzig (Isaiah, p. 643), without any authority, renders the word "nubischen Zahn." The Targum Jonathan on 1 K. x. 22 has יָבֵן דְּפִיל, "elephant's tusk," while the Peshitto gives simply "elephants." In the Targum of the Pseudo-Jonathan, Gen. l. 1 is translated, "and Joseph placed his father upon a bier of שְׁנָרְפִין" (shindāphin), which is conjectured to be a valuable species of wood, but for which Buxtorf, with great probability, suggests as another reading יָבֵן דְּפִיל, "ivory."

The Assyrians appear to have carried on a great traffic in ivory. Their early conquests in India had made them familiar with it, and (according to one rendering of the passage) their artists supplied the luxurious Tyrians with carvings in ivory from the isles of Chittim (Ezek. xxvii. 6). On the obelisk in the British Museum the captives or tribute-bearers are represented as carrying tusks. Among the merchandise of Babylon, enumerated in Rev. xviii. 12, are included "all manner vessels of ivory." The skilled workmen of Hiram, king of Tyre, fashioned the great ivory throne of Solomon, and overlaid it with pure gold (1 K. x. 18; 2 Ch. ix. 17). The ivory thus employed was supplied by the caravans of Dedan, a tribe of merchant traffickers, settled somewhere in the deserts of Mesopotamia (Is. xxi. 13; Ezek. xxvii. 15), or was brought with apes and peacocks by the navy of Tharshish (1 K. x. 22). The Egyptians at a very early period made use of this material in decoration. The cover of a small ivory box in the Egyptian Collection at the Louvre is "inscribed with the prænomen Nefar-ka-re, or Neper-cheres, adopted by a dynasty found in the upper line of the tablet of Abydos, and attributed by M. Bunsen to the fifth . . . In the time of Thothmes III. ivory was imported in considerable quantities into Egypt, either 'in boats laden with ivory and ebony' from Ethiopia, or else in tusks and cups from the Ruten-nu. . . The celebrated car at Florence has its lynch-pins tipped with ivory" (Birch, in Trans. of Roy. Soc. of Lit. iii. 2nd series). The specimens of Egyptian ivory work, which are found in the principal museums of Europe, are, most of them, in the opinion of Dr. Birch, of a date anterior to the Persian invasion, and some even as old as the 18th dynasty.

The ivory used by the Egyptians was principally brought from Ethiopia (Herod. iii. 114), though their elephants were originally from Asia. The Ethiopians, according to Diodorus Siculus (l. 55), brought to Sesostris "ebony and gold, and the teeth of elephants." Among the tribute paid by them to the Persian kings were "twenty large tusks of ivory" (Herod. iii. 97). In the Periplus of the Red Sea (c. 4), attributed to Arrian, Coloe (Callai) is said to be "the chief mart for ivory." It was thence carried down to Adouli (Zulla, or Thulla), a port on the Red Sea, about three days' journey from Coloe, together with the hides of hippopotami, tortoise-shell, apes, and slaves (Plin. vi. 34). The elephants and rhinoceroses, from which it was obtained, were killed further up the country, and few were taken near the sea, or in the neighbourhood of Adouli. At Ptolemais Theron was found a little ivory like that of Adouli (Peripl. c. 3). Ptolemy Philadelphus made this port the depôt of the elephant trade (Plin. vi. 34). According to Pliny (viii. 10), ivory was so plentiful on the borders of Ethiopia that the natives made door-posts of it, and even fences and stalls for their cattle. The author of the Periplus (c. 16) mentions Rhapta as another station of the ivory trade, but the ivory brought down to this port is said to have been of an inferior quality, and "for the most part found in the woods, damaged by rain, or collected from animals drowned by the overflow of the rivers at the equinoxes" (Smith, Dict. Geogr. art. Rhapta). The Egyptian merchants traded for ivory and onyx stones to Barygaza, the port to which was carried down the commerce of Western India from Ozene (Peripl. c. 49).

In the early ages of Greece ivory was frequently employed for purposes of ornament. The trappings of horses were studded with it (Hom. Il. v. 584): it was used for the handles of keys (Od. xxi. 7), and for the bosses of shields (Hes. Sc. Herc. 141, 142). An interesting allusion to the use of ivory is found in Ps. xlv. 8, "ivory palaces," which probably mean boxes or cases veneered with ivory, an art in which the Phoenicians excelled, and in which boxes the robes of the wealthy were stored, along with perfumes, myrrh, aloes, and cassia. The "ivory house" of Ahab (1 K. xxii. 39) was probably a palace, the walls of which were panelled with ivory, like the palace of Menelaus described by Homer (Odys. iv. 73; cp. Eur. Iph. Aut. 583, ελεφαννοδέτροι δόμοι). In this fashion Ahab was followed by his luxurious nobles. Cp. Amos iii. 15). Beds inlaid or veneered with ivory were in use among the Hebrews (Amos vi. 4. I have seen a chamber in a wealthy house, both in Damascus and Tarabûs, panelled with alternate veneers of ebony and ivory to the height of 3 or 4 feet from the floor. Such doubtless was the ivory palace of Ahab: cp. Hom. Od. xxiii. 200), as also among the Egyptians (cp. Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. ii. 111). The practice of inlaying and veneering wood with ivory and tortoise-shell is described by Pliny (xvi. 84). The great ivory throne of Solomon, the work of the Tyrian craftsmen, has been already mentioned (cp. Rev. xx. 11); but it is difficult to determine whether the "tower of ivory" of Cant. vii. 4 is merely a figure of speech, or whether it had its original among the things that were. By the luxurious Phoenicians ivory was employed to ornament the boxwood rowing benches (or "hatches" according to some) of their galleys (Ezek. xxvii. 6). Many specimens of Assyrian carving in ivory have been found in the excavations at Nimroud, and among the rest some tablets "richly inlaid with blue and opaque glass, lapis-lazuli, &c." (Bonomi, Nineveh and its Palaces, p. 334; cp. Cant. v. 14). Part of an ivory staff, apparently a sceptre, and several entire elephants' tusks, were discovered by Sir H. Layard in the last stage of decay, and it was with extreme difficulty that these interesting relics could be restored (Nin. & Bab. p. 195). [W. A. W.] [H. E. T.]

IVY (κισσός; hedera), the common Hedera helix, of which the ancient Greeks and Romans describe two or three kinds, which appear to be only varieties. Mention of this plant is made only in 2 Macc. vi. 7, where it is said that the Jews were compelled, when the feast of Bacchus was kept, to go in procession carrying ivy to this deity, to whom it is well known this plant was sacred. Ivy, however, though not mentioned by name, has a peculiar interest to the Christian, as forming the "corruptible crown" (1 Cor. ix. 25) for which the competitors at the great Isthmian games contended, and which St. Paul so beautifully contrasts with the "incorruptible crown" which shall hereafter encircle the brows of those who run worthily the race of this mortal life. In the Isthmian contests the victor's garland was either ivy or pine. Ivy can scarcely be included among the plants of Palestine, as it only occurs in Lebanon, and not further south. Its range extends over the whole of Southern and Central Europe, the lower ranges of the Himalayas, North China, and Japan. [H. B. T.]

IZEHAR. The form in which the name Ishar is given in the A. V. of Num. iii. 19 only. In v. 27 the family of the same person is given as Izeharites. The Hebrew word is the same as IZHAR.

IZEHARITES. [IZHARITES.]

IZ-HAR (spelt by A. V. Izehar in Num. iii. 19, 27; in Heb. always יִזְחָר = oiz; LXX. var. Ἰσσαράρ and Ἰσαράρ; Jesaar, Isaar), son of Kohath, grandson of Levi, uncle of Aaron and Moses, and father of Korah (Ex. vi. 18, 21; Num. iii. 19, xvi. 1; 1 Ch. vi. 2, 18). But in 1 Ch. vi. 22 (see in Swete the var. readings of the LXX.) Aminadab is substituted for Izhar, as the son of Kohath and father of Korah, in the line of Samuel. This, however, must be an accidental error of the scribe, as in v. 38, where the same genealogy is repeated, Izhar appears again in his right place (see Burrington's Genealogies of the O. T.). Izhar was the head of the family of the IZHARITES or IZEHARITES (Num. iii. 27; 1 Ch. xxvi. 23, 29), one of the four families of the Kohathites. [A. C. H.]

IZHARITES (יִזְחָרִיתִים), a family of Kohathite Levites, descended from Izhar, the son of Kohath (Num. iii. 27; B. δ Ζαφίελς, B^{ab}. Ἰσσαφείς). In the reign of David, Shelomith was the chief of the family (1 Ch. xxiv. 22; B. Ἰσσαφεί, A. Ἰσσαφεί), and with his brethren had charge of the treasure dedicated to the use of the Temple (1 Ch. xxvi. 23 [B. Ἰσσοδαρ, A. -], 29 [B. Ἰσσαφεί, A. Ἰκααφί]).

IZRAH'IAH (יִזְרַחִיָּה) = Jehovah will cause to spring forth; B. Ζαπειά, A. Ἰεζραία; Izrahia), a man of Issachar, one of the Bene-Uzzi, and father of four, or five—which, is not clear—of the principal men in the tribe (1 Ch. vii. 3).

IZ'RAHITE, THE (יִזְרַחִיָּה), i.e. "the Izrah" = יִזְרַחִיָּה [Tregelles]; B. δ Ἐσραΐε, A. Ἰεζραΐα; Jezerites), the designation of Shamhuth, the captain of the fifth monthly course as appointed by David (1 Ch. xvii. 8). The Hebrew name is probably equivalent to יִזְרַחִיָּה (v. 13), i.e. the interpretation put on it in the A. V. Its real force is Zerahite, or one of the great Judaic family of Zerah—the Zarhites.

IZ'RI (יִזְרִירִי), i.e. "the Itsrite;" B. Ἰεσδρεί, A. -ρά; Isari), a Levite, leader of the fourth course or ward in the service of the House of God (1 Ch. xxv. 11). In v. 3 he is called ZERI.

J

JAK'AKAN (יַאֲכָן; BA. Ἰακείμ; Jacan), the forefather of the Bene-Jaakan, round whose wells the children of Israel encamped after they left Mosera, and from which they went on to Hor-Hagidgad (Deut. x. 6). Jaakan was son of Ezer, the son of Seir the Horite (1 Ch. i. 42; B. om., A. Ἰακάν). The name is here given in the A. V. as JAKAN, though without any reason for the change. In Gen. xxxvi. 27 it is in the abbreviated form of AKAN. The site of the wells has not been identified. Some suggestions will be seen under BENE-JAAKAN. [G.] [W.]

JAAK'O'BAH (יַאֲכָבָה; B. Ἰακαβά, A. Ἰακαβά; Jacoba), one of the princes (נְסִיכֵי) of the families of Simeon (1 Ch. iv. 36). Excepting the termination, the name is identical with that of JACOB.

JALA (נְזִיָּה = wild she-goat; B. Ἰελά, NA. Ἰεάη; Jahala). Bene-Jaala were among the descendants of "Solomon's slaves" who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 58). The name also occurs as JA'ALAH (יַעֲלָה; B. Ἰελά, A. Ἰελά; Jala), Ezra ii. 56; and in *Esdra*s as JEEL.

JA'ALAM (יַעֲלָם; AD. Ἰεγλάμ; Thelon, Thelom), a "son" of Esau by his wife AHOLIBAMA (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; cp. 1 Ch. i. 35), and an Edomite phylarch (A. V. "duke") or chief of a thousand (a subdivision of the tribe; cp. Micah v. 2). From Gen. xxxvi. 2 (reading with Michaelis and most modern critics "Horite" for "Hivite": cp. vv. 20, 24, 25), it would appear that Jaalam was a clan of mixed Horite and Edomite origin. [C. J. B.]

JA'ANAI (יַעֲנַי, for יַעֲנַיָּה = Jehovah answers; B. Ἰανεί, A. Ἰαναι; Janai), a chief man in the tribe of Gad (1 Ch. v. 12). The LXX. have connected the following name, Shaphat, to *Jaana*i, and rendered it Ἰανεί δ γραμματεὺς.

JA'ARE-O'REGIM (יַעֲרֵי אֹרֵגִים; BA. Ἀρωπυγέμ; Saltus polymitarius), according to the present text of 2 Sam. xxi. 19, a Bethlehemite, and the father of Elhanan who slew Goliath (the words "the brother of" are added in the A. V.). In the parallel passage, 1 Ch. xx. 5, besides other differences, Jair is found instead of Jaare, and Oregim is omitted. Oregim is not elsewhere found as a proper name, nor is it a common word; and occurring as it does without doubt at the end of the verse (A. V. "weavers"), in a sentence exactly parallel to that in 1 Sam. xvii. 7, it is not probable that it should also occur in the middle of the same (see Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of the B.B. of Samuel in loco). The conclusion of Kennicott (Dissertation, p. 80) appears a just one—that in the latter place it has been interpolated from the former, and that Jair or Jaor is the correct reading instead of Jaare. [ELHANAN, p. 899.] Still the agreement of the ancient Versions with the present Hebrew text affords a certain corroboration to that text, and should not be overlooked. [JAIR.]

The Peshitto, followed by the Arabic, substitutes for Jaare-Oregim the name "Malaph the weaver," to the meaning of which we have no clue. The Targum on the other hand, doubtless anxious to avoid any apparent contradiction of the narrative in 1 Sam. xvii., substitutes David for Elhanan, Jesse for Jaare, and is led by the word Oregim to relate or possibly to invent a statement as to Jesse's calling—"And David son of Jesse, weaver of the veils of the house of the sanctuary, who was of Bethlehem, slew Goliath the Gittite." By Jerome Jaare is translated by saltus, and Oregim by polymitarius (cp. Quest. Hebr. on both passages). In Josephus's account (Ant. vii. 12, § 2) the Israelite champion is said to have been "Nephan the kinsman of David" (Νεφάνος δ συγγενὴς αὐτοῦ); the word kinsman perhaps referring to the Jewish tradition of the identity of Jair and Jesse, or simply arising from the mention of Bethlehem.

In the received Hebrew text Jaare is written with a small or suspended R, showing that in the opinion of the Masorets that letter is uncertain. [G.] [F.]

JA'ASAU, R. V. JAASU (יַעֲשָׂו, but the Qeri has יַעֲשָׂו, i.e. Jaasai = Jehovah works [MV.¹¹]; and so the Vulg. Jasi, one of the Bene-Bani who had married a foreign wife, and had to put her away (Ezra x. 37). In the parallel list of 1 Esdras the name is not recognizable. The LXX. supplied different vowels,—καὶ ἐποίησαν = יָשִׁי.

JA-ASIE'EL (יָשִׁי'ֵאל = God works; B. 'Ασειήρ, A. 'Ασιήλ; Jasiel), son of the great Abner, ruler (רִבֵּנִי) or "prince" (רֶמֶשׁ) of his tribe of Benjamin, in the time of David (1 Ch. xxvii. 21).

JA-A-ZAN'IAH (יְהוֹנָתָן and יְהוֹנָתָן = Jehovah hears). 1. YAAZAN-YAHU (A. 'Ιεζωνίας, B. 'Οζωνίας; Jezonias), one of the "captains of the forces" who accompanied Johanan ben-Kareah to pay his respects to Gedaliah at Mizpah after the fall of Jerusalem (2 K. xxv. 23), and who appears afterwards to have assisted in recovering Ishmael's prey from his clutches (cp. Jer. xli. 11). After that he probably went to Egypt with the rest (Jer. xliii. 4, 5). He is described as the "son of the (not 'a') Maachathite." In the narrative of Jeremiah the name is slightly changed to JEZANIAH.

2. YAAZAN-YAHU ('Ιεζωνίας, A. 'Ιεζωνίας; Jezonias), son of Shaphan: leader of the band of seventy of the elders of Israel, who were seen by Ezekiel worshipping before the idols on the wall of the court of the House of Jehovah (Ezek. viii. 11). It is possible that he is identical with

3. YAAZAN-YAH ('Ιεζωνίας; Jezonias), son of Azur; one of the "princes" (רִבֵּנִי) of the people against whom Ezekiel was directed to prophesy (Ezek. xi. 1).

4. YAAZAN-YAH ('Ιεζωνίας; Jezonias), a Rechabite, son of Jeremiah. He appears to have been the sheikh of the tribe at the time of Jeremiah's interview with them (Jer. xxxv. 3). [JEHONADAB.] [G.] [F.]

JA'AZER and JA'ZER = helper, Ges. The form of this name is much varied both in the A. V. and the Hebrew, though the one does not follow the other. In Num. xxxii. it is twice given Jazer, and once (v. 35) Jaazer (R. V. Jazer), the Hebrew being in all three cases יָזֶר. In Num. xxi. 32 it is Jaazer (R. V. Jazer); but in Josh., in 2 Sam. xxiv., Isaiah, and Jeremiah, Jazer: the Hebrew in all these is יָזֶר. In Chronicles it is also Jazer; but here the Hebrew is in the extended form of יָזֶרֶת, a form which the Samar. Codex also presents in Num. xxxii. The LXX. have 'Ιαζήρ, but once, 2 Sam. xxiv. 5, 'Ελιέζερ, A. 'Ελιάζερ—including the affixed Heb. particle; and, in 1 Ch. vi. 81, B. Γαζήρ; xxvi. 31, B. Πιαζήρ, A. 'Ιαζήρ; Joseph. 'Ιαζαρός; Ptolem. Γάζαρος: Vulg. Jazer, Jaser, Jazer. A town on the east of Jordan, in or near to Gilend (Num. xxiii. 1, 3; 1 Ch. xxvi. 31). We first hear of it as being in the possession of the Amorites, and as taken by Israel after Heshbon, and on their way from thence to Bashan (Num. xxi. 32)*. It was rebuilt subsequently by the children of Gad (xxiii. 35), and was on or near their frontier and a prominent place in their territory (Josh. xiii. 25; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5). It was allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 39; 1 Ch. vi. 81), but in the time of David it would appear to have been occupied by Hebronites, i.e. descendants of Kohath (1 Ch. xxvi. 31). It seems to have given its name to a district of dependent or "daughter" towns (Num. xxi. 32, A. V. "villages"; 1 Macc. v. 8), the "land of Jazer" (Num. xxxii. 1). In the "burdens" proclaimed over Moab by Isaiah and Jeremiah, Jazer is mentioned so as to imply that there were vineyards there, and that the cultivation of the vine had extended thither from SIBMAH (Is. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlvi. 32). In the latter passage, as the text at present stands, mention is made of the "Sea of Jazer" (יָם יָזֶר). This may have been some pool (Delitzsch⁴ on Is. l. c.) or lake of water, or possibly is an ancient corruption of the text, the LXX. having a different reading—πάλυς 'I. (see Gesenius, Jesaja, p. 550; Dillmann⁵ in loco). Jazer was taken and burnt by Judas Maccabaeus after he had defeated the Ammonites under Timotheus (Joseph. Ant. xii. 8, § 1).

Jazer was known to Eusebius and Jerome, and its position is laid down with minuteness in the Onomasticon as 10 (or 8, s. voc. "A(σπ) Roman miles west of Philadelphia (Ammin) and 15 from Heshbon, and as the source of a river which falls into the Jordan (OS,² p. 267, 98; p. 235, 25). The Jazer of Eusebius is either the extensive ruin Kh. Sár, westward of Ammin, or Al-es-Sireh, immediately west of the perennial spring 'Ain es-Sir, the head of the stream in W. es-Sir, which answers to the ποταμὸς μέγιστος of Eusebius (PEF. Mem. East. Pal. p. 153). Seetzen, who first noticed these places in 1806 (Reisen, 1854. i. 397-8) calls them Szar and Szir (صير):

cp. Burckhardt (Syr. p. 364). Merrill (E. of Jordan, p. 405) mentions "two ponds or little lakes" near Jazer (Sár). Conder (PEF. Mem. East. Pal. p. 91) proposes to identify Jazer with Beit Zer'ah, about 2½ m. N.E. of Heshbon, but this seems too near that place to meet the requirements of Num. xxi. 24-32, and to be called "J. of Gilead" (1 Ch. xxvi. 32). Burckhardt (p. 355) suggests 'Ain Hazir, a fine spring S. of es-Salt, the water of which runs to Wady Sh'ab. In the Targum Pseudo-Jonathan, Jazer is identified with Machaerus (Neubauer, Geog. du Tal. p. 28). [G.] [W.]

JA-AZIE'AH (יְהוֹאֲזִיָּהוּ, i.e. Ya'aziyahu = Jehovah comforts; A. 'Οζία, B. 'Οζίαυ; Oziau), apparently a third son, or a descendant, of Merari the Levite, and the founder of an independent house in that family (1 Ch. xxiv. 26, 27); neither he nor his descendants are mentioned elsewhere (cp. the lists in xxiii. 21-23; Ex. vi. 19, &c.). The word Beno (בְּנֵי) which follows Jaaziah, should probably be translated "his son" (cp. the LXX.), i.e. the son of Merari.

JA-AZIE'EL (יְהוֹאֲזִיָּעֵל = God comforts; B. 'Οζειήλ, A. 'Ιηούλ; Jaziel), one of the Levites of the second order who were appointed by David to perform the musical service before the Ark (1 Ch. xv. 18). If AZIEL in e. 20 is a contracted form of the same name—and there is no reason to doubt it (cp. Jesharelah and Asharelah, 1 Ch. xxv. 2, 14)—his business was to “sound the psaltery on Alamoth.”

* In Num. xxi. 24, where the present Hebrew text has יָזֶר (A. V. "strong"), the LXX. have 'Ιαζήρ.

JAB'AL (יָבָל) = a leader [MV.¹¹]; A. 'ιωβέλ, E. -גָּב; Jabel, son of Lamech and Adah, brother of Jubal, father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle (Gen. iv. 20). Abel before him had kept sheep, but Jabal, as remarked by Bochart, is to be regarded as having commenced the pastoral life in its nomad or more extended sense, not simply feeding sheep about a settled home, in a farm as we might say, but leading flocks and various herds about from pasture to pasture, encamping patriarchally among them (Bochart, Hierozoicon, lib. ii. c. 34, vol. i. pp. 517, 518, ed. Rosenmüller, 1793). Other etymologies and deductions may be seen in Delitzsch [1887] and Dillmann⁸ in loco.

[W. L. B.] [C. H.]

JAB'BOK (יַבְבֹּק), a play upon “the wrestling” [cp. MV.¹¹]; 'יאבֹּךְ; Jaboc, Jeboc, a stream which intersects the hill-country of Gilead (cp. Josh. xii. 2 and 5), and falls into the Jordan about 21 miles N. of the Dead Sea. There is some difficulty in interpreting two or three passages of Scripture in which the Jabbok is spoken of as “the border of the children of Ammon.” The following facts may perhaps throw some light upon them:—The Ammonites at one time possessed the whole country between the rivers Arnon and Jabbok, from the Jordan on the west to the wilderness on the east. They were driven out of it by Sihon king of the Amorites; and he was in turn expelled by the Israelites. Yet long subsequent to these events, the country was popularly called “the land of the Ammonites,” and was even claimed by them (Judg. xi. 13–22). For this reason the Jabbok is still called “the border of the children of Ammon” in Deut. iii. 16 and Josh. xii. 2. Again, when the Ammonites were driven out by Sihon from their ancient territory, they took possession of the eastern plain, and of a considerable section of the eastern defiles of Gilead, around the sources and upper branches of the Jabbok. Rabbath-Ammon, their capital city (2 Sam. xi.), stood within the mountains of Gilead, and on the banks of a tributary to the Jabbok. This explains the statement in Num. xxi. 24—“Israel possessed his (Sihon's) land from Arnon unto Jabbok, unto the children of Ammon (עַרְבֵי-עַמּוֹן), for the border of the children of Ammon was strong”—the border among the defiles of the upper Jabbok was strong. This also illustrates Deut. ii. 37, “Only to the land of the children of Ammon thou camest not near; all the side of the river Jabbok (בְּלִיַד נַחַל יַבְבֹּק), and the cities of the hill country, and wheresoever the Lord our God forbid us” (R. V.).

It was on the north bank of the Jabbok that Jacob, after a night of wrestling with God, received the name Israel (Gen. xxxii. 22); and this river afterwards became, towards its western part, the boundary between the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Josh. xii. 2, 5). Eusebius rightly places it between Gerasa and Philadelphia (*OS.*² p. 266, 78); and at the present day it separates the province of Belka from Jebel 'Ajlún. Its modern name is Wády Zerka. It rises in the plateau east of Gilead, and receives many tributaries from both north and south in the eastern declivities of the mountain-range—one of these comes from Gerasa, another from Rabbath-Ammon ('Ammán). The stream from 'Ain 'Ammán, which is well stocked with fish, disappears, in autumn, about 1½ m. below the town. It reappears at 'Ain Ghazal, and, after flowing 5 m., again sinks below the ground. It is only at 'Ain ez-Zerka, near Kal'at ez-Zerka, that it becomes perennial, and it is there a broad, rapid and clear stream, running through a deep valley to the Jordan. Throughout the lower part of its course it is fringed with thickets of cane and oleander, and the banks above are clothed with oak-forests. In the Jordan Valley it is a broad stream, but fordable (PEF. Mem. E. Pal. p. 5; Robinson, Phys. Geog., p. 161; Merrill, E. of Jordan, p. 269 sq.). The “ford” of Jabbok was probably close to the spot at which the river issues from the hills, where there is now a ford. [J. L. P.] [W.]

JAB'ESH (יַבֵּשׁ) = dry; B. 'יאבֵּשׁ, A. 'אבֵּשׁ [v. 10], 'יאבֵּשׁ; Joseph. 'יאבֶּשׁος; Jabes). 1. Father of SHALLUM, the fifteenth king of Israel (2 K. xv. 10, 13, 14).

2. B. 'יאבֵּשׁ; A. in 1 Sam. Eiaβels, in 1 Ch. 'יאבֵּשׁ. The short form of the name JABESH-GILEAD (1 Sam. xi. 1, 3, 5, 9, 10; xxxii. 12, 13; and 1 Ch. x. 12).

JABESH-GIL'EA'D (יַבֵּשׁ גִּלְעָד), also יַבֵּשׁ, 1 Sam. xi. 1, 9, &c. = dry, from יַבֵּשׁ, “to be dry;” Judg. xxi. 8–14, 1 Sam. xi. 1, 2 Sam. xxi. 12, [B.A. 'יאבֵּשׁ] Γαλαδ; 1 Sam. xi. 9, [B. 'יאבֵּשׁ, A. Eiaβels] Γαλαδ; 1 Sam. xxxi. 11, 2 Sam. ii. 4, 5, [B. 'יאבֵּשׁ, A. Eiaβels] τῆς Γαλααδῆτιδος [B. -βελ-]; 1 Ch. x. 11, Γαλαδ; Joseph. 'Ιδβισος; Jabes Galaad, or Jabesh in the territory of Gilead [GILEAD]. It is first mentioned in connexion with the cruel vengeance taken upon its inhabitants for not coming up to Mizpeh on the occasion of the fierce war between the children of Israel and the tribe of Benjamin. Every male of the city was put to the sword, and all virgins—to the number of 400—seized to be given in marriage to the 600 men of Benjamin that remained (Judg. xxi. 8–14). Nevertheless the city survived the loss of its males; and being attacked subsequently by Nahash the Ammonite, gave Saul an opportunity of displaying his prowess in its defence, and silencing all objections made by the children of Belial to his sovereignty (1 Sam. xi. 1–10). Neither were his exertions on behalf of this city unrequited; for when he and his three sons were slain by the Philistines in Mount Gilboa, the men of Jabesh-Gilead came by night and took down their corpses from the walls of Bethshan, where they had been exposed as trophies; then burnt the bodies, and buried the bones under a tree near the city—observing a strict funeral fast for seven days (1 Sam. xxxi. 11–13; 1 Ch. x. 11, 12). David does not forget to bless them for this act of piety towards his old master and his more than brother (2 Sam. ii. 4, 5); though he afterwards still remains translated to the ancestral sepulchre in the tribe of Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 12–14). The site of the city is not defined in the O. T.; and Josephus only mentions that it was the chief town of the Gileadites, and noted in his day for the courage and strength of its people (Ant. vi. 5, § 1; 14, § 8). Eusebius, however (OS. p. 242, 97; p. 269, 81), places it beyond Jordan, 6 miles from Pella on the mountain-road to Gerasa; where its name is probably preserved in the Wady el-Yabis, which, flowing from the east, enters the Jordan below Bethshan or Scythopolis. According to Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res. iii. 319), the ruin ed-Deir, on the S. side of the Wady, still marks its site (Tristram, Bib. Places, p. 327; Riehm, HWB. s. v.). Merrill (American P.E.S. 4th stat. p. 81) suggests Miryamin, about 5 miles from Pella on the road to Gerasa. [E. S. Ff.] [W.]

JABEZ. 1. (יָבֵז), of same meaning as בָּרַךְ [cp. 2]; B. Γαβῆς, A. Γαβθῆς; Jabes). Apparently a place at which the families of the scribes (סֹפְרֵי) resided, who belonged to the families of the Kenites (1 Ch. ii. 55). It occurs among the descendants of Salma, who was of Judah, and closely connected with Bethlehem (v. 51), possibly the father of Boaz; and also—though how is not clear—with Joab. The Targum states some curious particulars, which, however, do not much elucidate the difficulty, and which are probably a mixture of trustworthy tradition and of mere invention based on philological grounds. Rechab is there identified with Rechabiah the son of Eliezer, Moses' younger son (1 Ch. xxvi. 25), and Jabez with Othniel the Kenizzite, who bore the name of Jabez "because he founded by his counsel (עֲצָוָה) a school (סֵדְרָה) of disciples called Tirathites, Shimeathites, and Sucathites." See also the quotations from Talmud, Temurah, in Buxtorf's Lex. col. 966, where a similar derivation is given.

2. (B. Ἰγαβθῆς; A. Ἰαγβθῆς, Γαβθῆς). The name occurs again in the genealogies of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 9, 10), in a passage of remarkable and almost Talmudic detail inserted in a genealogy almost connected with Bethlehem (v. 4). Here a different force is attached to the name. It is made to refer to the sorrow (צָוָה, 'otzeb) with which his mother bore him, and also to his prayer that evil may not grieve (יָבֵז) him. Jabez was "more honourable than his brethren," though who they were is not ascertainable. It is very doubtful whether any connexion exists between this genealogy and that in ii. 50–55. Several names appear in both—Hur, Ephratah, Bethlehem, Zareathites (in A. V. iv. 2, inaccurately, "Zorathites"), Joab, Caleb; and there is much similarity between others, as Rechab and Rechah, Eshton and Eshtaulites; but any positive connexion seems undemonstrable. The Targum repeats its identification of Jabez and Othniel. [G.] [W.]

JABIN (יָבִין = intelligent; B. Ἰαβῆς, F. Ἰαβῆρ; Jabin). 1. King of Hazor, a royal city in the north of Palestine, near the waters of Merom, who organised a confederacy of the northern princes against the Israelites (Josh. xi. 1–3). He assembled an army, which the Scripture narrative merely compares to the sands for multitude (v. 4), but which Josephus reckons at 300,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 20,000 chariots. Joshua, encouraged by God, surprised this vast army of allied forces "by the waters of Merom" (v. 7; near Kelesah, according to Josephus, utterly routed them, cut the hoof-sinews of their horses, and burnt their chariots with fire at a place which from that circumstance may have derived its name of MIRREPHOTH-MAIM (Hervey, Genealogies of our Lord, p. 228). [MIRREPHOTH-MAIM.] It is probable that in consequence of this battle the confederate kings, and Jabin among them, were reduced to vassalage, for we find immediately afterwards that Jabin is safe in his capital. But during the ensuing wars (which occupied some time, Josh. xi. 18), Joshua "turned back," and, perhaps on some fresh rebellion of Jabin, inflicted on him a signal and summary vengeance, making Hazor an exception to the general rule of not burning the conquered cities of Canaan (xi. 14; Joseph. Ant. v. 1, § 18; Ewald, Gesch. ii. 328).

2. (B. Ἰαβῆρ, A. Ἰαβῆρ; Jabin.) A king of Hazor, whose general Sisera was defeated by Barak, whose army is described in much the same terms as that of his predecessor (Judg. iv. 3, 13), and who suffered precisely the same fate. The similarity between the two narratives (Josh. xi.; Judg. iv. v.) is great, and an attentive comparison of them with Josephus (who curiously omits the name of Jabin altogether in his mention of Joshua's victory, although his account is full of details) supplies further points of resemblance. [BARAK; DEBORAH.] It is indeed by no means impossible that in the course of 150 years Hazor should have risen from its ashes, and even re-assumed its pre-eminence under sovereigns who still bore the old dynastic name (cp. Keil on Judg. i. c.). But entirely independent considerations show that the period between Joshua and Barak could not have been 150 years, and indeed tend to prove that those two chiefs were contemporaries (Hervey, Geneal. p. 228); and we are therefore led to regard the two accounts of the destruction of Hazor and Jabin as really applying to the same monarch, and the same event. There is no ground whatever to throw doubts on the historical veracity of the earlier narrative, as is done by Hasse (p. 129), Maurer (ad loc.), Studer (on Judges, p. 90), De Wette (Eintl. p. 231), and by Rosenmüller (Schol. Jos. xi. 11); but when the chronological arguments are taken into consideration, we do not (in spite of the difficulties which still remain) consider Hävernick successful in removing the improbabilities which beset the common supposition that this Jabin lived long after the one which Joshua defeated. On the whole subject see Bertheau* on Judges, p. 82. Budde (Die BB. Richter u. Samuel, p. 105) rejects the narrative as unhistorical. [F. W. F.]

JABNE-EL (יָבְנֵ־אֵל = God builds). The name of two towns in Palestine.

1. (In O. T. B. Λεμνά, A. Ἰαβνῆλ; in Apocr. Ἰαμνῆλα; Jebneel, Jabnia, Jamnia.) One of the points on the northern boundary of Judah, not quite at the sea, though near it* (Josh. xv. 11). There is no sign, however, of its ever having been occupied by Judah. Jose-

* In Josh. xv. 46, after the words "from Ekron," the LXX. adds Ἰαμνῆλα, Jabneh, instead of "even unto the sea;" probably reading יָבְנֵ־אֵל for the present word יָבְנֵ־אֵל.

phus (Ant. v. 1, § 22) attributes it to the Danites. There was a constant struggle going on between that tribe and the Philistines for the possession of all the places in the lowland plain [DAN], and it is not surprising that the next time we meet with Jabneel it should be in the hands of the latter (2 Ch. xxvi. 6). Uzziah dispossessed them of it, and demolished its fortifications. Here it is in the shorter form of JABNEH. In Judith ii. 28, the people of JEMNANAN (BA. 'Ιεμναν, N^o. 'Αμμᾶ), doubtless Jamnia, are represented as trembling at the approach of Holofernes. In its Greek garb, IAMNIA, it is frequently mentioned in the Maccabees (1 Macc. iv. 15, v. 58, x. 69, xv. 40), in whose time it was again a strong place. According to Josephus (Ant. xii. 8, § 6), Gorgias was governor of it; but the text of the Maccabees (2 Macc. xii. 32) has Idumaea. At this time there was a harbour on the coast, to which, and the vessels lying there, Judas set fire, and the conflagration was seen at Jerusalem, a distance of about 28 miles (2 Macc. xii. 8, 9, 40). The harbour is also mentioned by Pliny (H. N. v. 13), who in consequence speaks of the town as double—duae Jamnes (see the quotations in Reland, p. 823); and by Ptolemy (v. 16). Like Ascalon and Gaza, the harbour bore the title of Majumas, perhaps a Coptic word, meaning the "place on the sea" (Reland, p. 590, &c.; Raumer, pp. 174 n., 184 n.; Kenrick, Phoenicia, pp. 27, 29). It is now known as Minet Rūbīn (PEF. Mem. ii. 268). Jamnia was taken by Simon Maccabaeus (Ant. xiii. 6, § 7; B. J. i. 2, § 2), and was apparently one of the "strongholds" that he fortified (Ant. xiii. 5, § 10). In B.C. 63 Pompey took it away from the Jews and handed it over to its own inhabitants (Ant. xiv. 4, § 4); and a few years later, having apparently suffered during the war, it was restored and re-peopled by order of Gabinius (B. J. i. 8, § 4). Augustus gave it to Herod, who left it by will to his sister Salome (Ant. xvii. 8, § 1); and she in turn bequeathed it to Livia, the wife of Augustus (Ant. xviii. 2, § 2; B. J. ii. 9, § 1). Jamnia was one of the towns occupied by Vespasian, as a preliminary to the siege of Jerusalem (B. J. iv. 3, § 2; 8, § 1). At this time it was one of the most populous places of Judaea (Strabo, xvi. 2, § 28; Philo, de Legat. ad Cajum; Reland, p. 823), and contained a Jewish school of great fame, whose learned doctors are often mentioned in the Talmud (Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 141 sq.; Graetz, Gesch. der Juden, vol. iv.; Neubauer, Geog. du Talmud, p. 73 sq.). The great Sanhedrin was also held here. In this holy city, according to an early Jewish tradition, was buried the great Gamaliel; or, according to Sepp (Jer. u. das h. Land, ii. 594), his grandson, the younger Gamaliel. His tomb was visited by Parchi in the 14th cent. (Zunz, in Asher's Benj. of Tudela, ii. 439, 440; also p. 98). In the time of Eusebius, however, it had dwindled to a small place, πολιχνη, merely requiring casual mention (OS. p. 268, 35). Jerome (OS. p. 164, 27) gives the name as Iamnel. One of its Bishops took part in the Council of Nicaea; and in the 6th cent., under Justinian, it was still the seat of a Christian Bishop (Epiphanius, adv. Haer. lib. ii. 730). Under the Crusaders, who supposed the site to be Gath, it bore the corrupted name of Ibelin, and gave a title to a line of Counts, one of whom, Jean d'Ibelin, about 1250, restored to efficiency the famous code of the "Assises de Jérusalem" (Gibbon, ch. 58, ad fin.; also the citations in Raumer, Palästina, p. 185).

According to Josephus (B. J. iv. 11, § 5), Titus marched from Ascalon to Jamnia, and thence to Joppa. Jamnia was MP. 20 from Ascalon, and MP. 12 from Diospolis (Itin. Ant.); or MP. 10 from Azotus, and MP. 12 from Joppa (Tab. Peut.). It is now Yebna, or more accurately Ibna (יבנא), a village about 2 miles from the sea on a slight eminence just south of the Nahr Rūbīn. It is about 12 miles south of Jaffa, 18 from Ascalon, 9 from Esdūd (Azotus), and 10½ from Ludd (Diospolis). The village stands in a conspicuous position on a hill; and there are some interesting remains of a church and other buildings erected by the Crusaders and Saracens (PEF. Mem. ii. 414, 441; Guérin, Judée, ii. 55 sq.).

2. (B. 'Ιεφθαμᾶλ, A. 'Ιαβρηλ; Jebnaël.) One of the landmarks on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33, only). It is named next after Adami-Nekeb, and had apparently Lakkum between it and the "outgoings" of the boundary at the Jordan. But little or no clue can be got from the passage to its situation. Possibly it is the same place which, as 'Ιαμυεία (Vita, § 37) and 'Ιαμυίθ (B. J. ii. 20, § 6), is mentioned by Josephus among the villages in Upper Galilee, which, though strong in themselves (περπαθεὶς ὄβσας), were fortified by him in anticipation of the arrival of the Romans. The other villages named by him in the same connexion are Meroth, Achabare, or the rock of the Achabari, and Seph. It appears to have belonged to Zenodorus, and later to the Tetrarchy of Philip (B. J. ii. 6, § 3: cp. Ant. xv. 10, § 3; xvii. 11, § 4); and is placed by Riehm (s. v.) near Lake Hūleh. The later name of Jabneel was Kefr Yamah,^b the "village by the sea" (Tal. Jer. Megilla, 70 a), a village which Schwarz (p. 144) places on the southern shore of the Sea of Galilee, and Neubauer (Geog. du Talmud, p. 225) identifies with Kefr Yamah, between Mount Tabor and the Lake. This last place is evidently the Yemma, which Guérin (Galilée, i. 268) and Conder (PEF. Mem. i. 365) identify with the Kefr Yamah of the Talmud; but it lies beyond the limits of Upper Galilee, and is not a naturally strong position, such as the Jamnia of Josephus appears to have occupied. ^b Can the name in the Vat. LXX. (given above) be a corruption of this? It can hardly be corrupted from Jamnia or Jabneel.

2. Head of the 21st course of priests in the time of David (1 Ch. ix. 10 [BA. 'Iaxéiv], xxiv. 17 [B. Γαμούλ, A. 'Iaxéiv]). A priest of this name returned from Babylon (Neh. xi. 10). Alcimus (Ἀλκίμος, 1 Macc. vii. 5), to whom Josephus gives an alternative name, Jacimus (Ἰάκιμος, Ant. xii. 9, § 7), high-priest in the Maccabean period, may possibly have been in Hebrew Jachin, though the Greek more properly suggests Jakim.

'Αχιμ, ACHIM (Matt. i. 14), seems also to be the same name. [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JACHINITES, THE (יַחֲזִיטִּים; B. 'Iaxivéi, A. δ' 'Iaxéiv; familia Jachinitarum), the family founded by JACHIN, son of Simeon (Num. xxvi. 12).

JACINTH (ὑάκινθος, hyacinthus; of jacinth, δακύνθωσ, hyacinthinus), a precious stone in the Apocalypse, where there are mentioned breast-plates "of fire, of jacinth, and of brimstone" (ix. 17, it being usually considered that colours or appearances rather than actual substances are here referred to); while a jacinth constitutes the eleventh foundation of the New Jerusalem (xxi. 20). The word does not occur in the A. V. of the Old Testament, but in the LXX. it stands for יַחֲזִיטִּים (A. V. blue), a colour in textile work, at Ex. xxv. 4, xxvi. 1, 31, 36, and many other places. We find also δακύνθωσ in Ex. xxvi. 14 and ὑάκινθος in Ezek. xvi. 10, to mention no other passages, representing the שֶׁפֶף; in A. V. badger's skin; R. V. seal's skin.

By ὑάκινθος the Rabbins translate יַשְׁבֵּן (Ex. xxviii. 19, A. V. agate) the eighth breastplate stone (H. Emanuel, ubi infra, p. 43). About the commencement of the Christian era, Philo-Judaus, apparently referring to the stone, twice speaks of the hyacinth as being compared to, or as being the symbol of, air (ἀήρ), this being dark by nature (μέλας φύσει. De Congressu, and De Mose lib. iii., Op. ed. Mangey, 1742, i. 536, l. 16; ii. 148, l. 40). Pliny, about the period of St. John, describes the hyacinth as allied to the amethyst, but much differing from it in having the violet diluted (N. H. xxxvii. § 122, Sillig). Solinus speaks of the hyacinth as blue (nitore caeruleo), and as highly prized when faultless, but as very subject to imperfection, being for the most part either diluted with violet, or clouded, or melting to a watery paleness; ill adapted for engraving, owing to its hardness, but yielding to the diamond (adamante. Polyhistor., cap. 30, § 32, ed. 1794). Epiphanius in the fourth century (De XII. Gemmis, sec. vii. in Patrol. Gr. xliii. p. 293) says that hyacinths are of different sorts, the most excellent being purplish (δύσσοφφύπλιον), and he conjectures that the obscure stone called ligure in the high-priest's breastplate (Ex. xxxviii. 19) refers to the hyacinth, a view concurred in by E. F. C. Rosenmüller (Mineralogy and Botany of the Bible, p. 35). Late in the same century Heliodorus (Aethiopia, lib. ii. c. 30, l. 41, in Erotici Scriptores, 1856) likens the colour of the hyacinth to that of the seashore under a lofty cliff tinging all below with purple. Isidore of Seville in the seventh century (Etymol. lib. xvi. c. 9, § 3, in Pat. Lat. lxxxiii. 574) writes that the hyacinth, so called after the flower of that name, is found in Ethiopia, having a blue colour (caeruleum colorem), very hard to be engraved, but cut by a diamond (adamante).

These various accounts represent the prevailing colour of the ancient jacinth as inclining to purple; but since Solinus has represented that tint as a fault and the normal colour blue, the hardness also exceptional, some have been led to identify the stone with the modern sapphire (C. W. King, Precious Stones, pp. 194, 195, 1865). The ancient jacinth and the ancient sapphire, however, could not have been identical, since both occur in the foundations of the New Jerusalem.

Modern jacinth is described by Rosenmüller (ubi supr.) as orange-yellow-red; by E. W. Streeter (Precious Stones, p. 199, 1877) as orange-red; by Augusto Castellani (Gems, tr. by Mrs. Brogden, p. 115, 1871) as fine reddish yellow; by Madame Barrera (Gems and Jewels, p. 193, 1860) as of the garnet family, and having when perfect a beautiful orange tint, with a shade of scarlet; by H. Emanuel (Diamonds and Precious Stones, p. 43, 1867) as possessing, in the most valued specimens, the glowing hue of a burning coal. The jacinths at South Kensington are placed within the family of Zircon (oxygen, zirconium, silicon—Zr Si O₂); and of the nine specimens (the largest being nearly the size of a shilling) one might be compared to sherry wine and the rest to port. By A. L. Millin de Grandmaison our stone is described as of a golden red, resembling dark amber, different from the one known by the ancients as hyacinth, which was akin to the amethyst and of a light violet tint (De l'Archéologie des Pierres Gravées, p. 123, ed. 1826). Augusto Castellani considers that the hyacinth of the ancients was not our jacinth, but a corundum, which is crystallized aluminum coloured by an oxide.

The evidence of ancient texts and the opinions of modern experts seem to point to the following conclusion, broadly stated, that the jacinth of the apostolic period was crystallized aluminum, blue in the finest kind, turning to purple in the inferior. Modern jacinth is crystallized zircon and silicon, orange in the most valued specimens, dark pink in the commoner. [C. H.]

JACKAL. R. V. marginal rendering for יַעֲקָל. [Fox.]

JACOB (יַעֲקֹב, seldom יַעֲקֹב; יַאֲכָאֵב; Jacob). The people whom we best know as Israel or the Children of Israel (bené Israel) are often styled and addressed as Jacob, or the Sons of Jacob, or the Seed of Jacob, by their own Psalmists and Prophets. The name Jacob is, in fact, freely used in the O. T. as a poetical and rhetorical equivalent of Israel (e.g. Num. xxiii. 7, 10, 21; xxiv. 5, 17). The precise original meaning of these national designations is difficult to determine. The Biblical allusions are more in the nature of lusus corporum than scientific etymologies. Consequently different implications are seen in both names by different writers, and even by the same writer in different parts of his work (Gen. xxv. 26, xxvii. 36; Hos. xii. 4). An ancient trace of Jacob, as a Palestinian local name, is preserved in the inscriptions of the great Egyptian sovereign, Thothes III. (1503-1449 B.C. Mahler, Zeitsch. Ag. Spr. xxvii. 2, 97 sqq.). In the three lists of captured towns, sculptured on the pylons of the temple at Karnak, the 102nd name is I-ā-q-b ā-ē-l (Mariette, Karnak); that is, probably, יַעֲקֹב־אֵל, Jacob-el.

But although יַעֲקֹב־אֵל, Jacob-el, may be the true Canaanite original of the Egyptian Iaqeb-ēl, it cannot mean "Jacob the god" (Sayce, Hibbert Lectures, p. 51), but "El is (or does)"—whatever is signified by the root יַעֲקֹב, 'aqab. It is a tenable and highly probable opinion that the name Jacob is a familiar abbreviation which has displaced an original Jacob-el; just as Nathan in common use represented Nathan-el or El-nathan, and Hanan El-hanan or Hanan-el. And a local name Jacob-el would be quite parallel to Jiphthah-el, as compared with Jephthah (יִפְתָּח־אֵל, Josh. xix. 14, 27. Cp. פִּתְחָיָה. As a personal designation, Jacob(el) would then belong to the large class of what are called theophoric names. The names יַעֲקֹב־אֵל, 'Akabiah (Aboth, iii. 1), and 'Aqabi-ya-wa (יַעֲקֹב־יְהוָה), recently found in a Babylonian contract (PSBA. Nov. 1892), confirm this view. Such a fact, however, affords no basis for the opinion that the Jacob of Genesis is only an old Canaanitish god who has been metamorphosed or euhemerized into the father of the benē Israel. The suggestion is at once disposed of by the consideration that in this case יַעֲקֹב is predicative, just as יוֹסֵפִים (Joseph) is in the fuller יוֹסֵפִים־אֵל (Josiphiah). The same objection is fatal to Goldziher's identification of Jacob as "the Follower" (that is, as he explains, the Night who follows on the Day), because the root עֲקַב (עֲקַב) means "to follow." It is EL (not Night) who "follows" if Jacob = Jacob-el; and EL is "God" in old Hebrew use (e.g. Gen. xxxv. 1, E.), even if, according to the apocryphal Sanchoiathion and his creator Philo Byblius, it was a proper name in Phoenician, corresponding to the Greek Kronos.

The Arabic root عَقَب, 'aqaba, does, however, suggest what may be the true original sense of the name Jacob. For this verb, which is strictly a denominative from عَقِب, 'aqib, "heel," meaning "to strike a man's heel," and then "to follow at his heels," has also the senses of retribution and requital (iii., iv.). A vestige of this meaning of the root is preserved in the Heb. יַעֲקֹב, 'aqab, "reward" (Ps. xix. 11.). It seems possible, therefore, that Jacob (or Jacob-el) as a personal name originally meant "El rewardeth"; a perhaps likelier view than that which saw in the patriarch's name an anticipation of his crafty conduct. On the other hand, craft and cunning by which he outwits his foes would hardly have seemed to primitive men an improper attribute of the Deity (cp. Job v. 13; Ps. xviii. 24, 26); so that, after all, this may be the original import of the name Jacob* (cp.

* If Jacob-el means "El rewardeth," it is like Meabelemiah, "Jah recompenseth," to which Shallum appears to be related as יַעֲקֹב, 'Akkūb, to Jacob. Gesenius compared the Samaritan יַעֲקֹב (עֲקַב) with Ewald, Hist. i. 346. So Reuss). If Jacob is he who follows at the heels of his foe, or who way-lays and overcomes him by fraud (nachfolgt, nachspürt, nachstellt, belistet)—ideas expressed by the root 'aqab (Knobel, Dillmann)—the name may preserve a reminiscence of the old desert life of Israel. It may perhaps be due to the sinister meaning associated by tradition with the name of Jacob, that it does not reappear as a personal name throughout the O. T. That, however, may rather be a consequence of the fact that, in the popular mind and speech, Jacob commonly denoted the nation. Like many other venerable names of antiquity, its use was revived in the later age of Judaism. [For the N. T. period, see JAMES.]

In the Book of Genesis (our only source, apart from incidental allusions in the Prophets and Psalmists; for nothing which Rabbinical fancy has added to the primary traditions is of the slightest worth) Jacob is the proper father of the Israelitish nation, in contrast with Abraham, who is the common ancestor of Arabian and Aramean stocks as well as of Israel, and with Isaac, the father of the brother-peoples Israel and Edom. Like Abraham and Isaac, Jacob is a peace-loving nomadic chief, "dwelling in tents" (Gen. xxv. 2; xlvii. 3 sqq.), and moving his camp from one pasturage to another, as need required; but sometimes sowing grain and reaping the crop (Gen. xxxvii. 7), as the wandering Bedawi tribes occasionally do at the present day. The story of his life appears, roughly speaking, to be the result of a combination of two principal narratives, which originated in different periods, and are distinguished by striking differences of language and thought, of style and scope [GENESIS]. The more ancient source told how when Isaac was dwelling by the well Beer-lahai-roi (in the neighbourhood of Beersheba), his childless wife became fruitful in consequence of his prayer to Jahvah. Even before birth the twin fathers of Israel and Edom struggled together in the womb; and when the mother went in to inquire of Jahvah, she received in response an oracular foreshadowing of the history of the rival peoples (Gen. xxv. 23):—

"Two nations are in thy womb,
And two peoples from thy bowels forth will part:
And people shall be stronger than people,
And elder shall serve younger."

In due time she bears the twin brethren, the first "red," or ruddy (1 Sam. xvi. 12, xvii. 42; אֲדָמָי, 'admoni, with an allusion to the name אֲדָמָי, 'Ēdom, "all of him like a hairy mantle" (Zech. xiii. 4; שֵׁעָר, sē'ar, "hair," with an allu-

Hebrew יַעֲקֹב, "reward." This pronunciation recalls Prof. Friedrich Delitzsch's interesting suggestion that the well-known clan or tribal name Egibi, which occurs so often in Babylonian business documents of the 6th cent. B.C., is cognate with the Hebrew Jacob. An exact transcription of Jacob is seen in Iqub (I-qu-bu) son of Nabu-nāsir; the name of a witness in a tablet dated in the 18th year of Darius (in the writer's possession). Egibi (Egibu), on the other hand, formally corresponds to the Arabic proper name العاقب. al-'Aqib, cited by Goldziher.

† Jacobah, A. V. Jaakobah, occurs as the name of a Simeonite chief (1 Ch. iv. 36).

sion to the name עֵשָׂו , Seir, Seir), whence he was called Esau (עֵשָׂו : cp. אֵשִׁי , "hairy;"

עֵשִׂי , "hair;"; עֵשׂוֹת , "long hair"); the other was born "with his hand clutching Esau's heel" (קָבַע , aqab, "heel"), whence his name of Jacob (יַעֲקֹב , Ya'aqob; as if, Heel-grasper).

The story passes from infancy to manhood with the brief statement that "the boys grew up, and Esau became a cunning hunter, a man of the field, but Jacob a perfect (gentle or quiet) man, a dweller in tents." It is added that Isaac loved Esau, for venison was to his taste, but the mother preferred Jacob. It is clear from the context that the term "perfect" (טָמִיר) is not used in any high ethical sense, but chiefly connotes the peace-loving temper of the gentle shepherd. It may perhaps include the idea of piety and assiduous worship, which is throughout a feature of Jacob, but does not exclude his equally characteristic love of gain, and the false wiles by which he overreaches his brother, his father, and his father-in-law. This side of him is immediately illustrated by the incident of his purchase of the rights of the first-born. Esau comes in from the field, ready to die with hunger; but Jacob will give him none of his red lentile pottage, till he has sworn to part with the birthright (Gen. xxv. 11 b, 18, 21-26 a, 27-34). It is instructive to note Esau's cry, "Prithee let me swallow some of that red, red fare!" and the comment, "Therefore was he called Edom," or the Red. If the reading "red" be original in v. 25, this is another reason for the name, and that from the pen of the same writer. A discrepancy which did not trouble him need not trouble us; not even when we remember that mountainous Edom is distinguished by its red or ruddy cliffs [EDOM]. We are next told of the trickery by which Jacob contrived to rob Esau of the Blessing (xxvii.). Here the actual difference in the physical characteristics of the lands of Israel and Edom is well brought out in Isaac's contrasted utterances over his two sons. On the one hand, "the land flowing with milk and honey," the fruitful fields and rich pastures and sunny vine-covered slopes: "See, the smell of my son is like the smell of a field which Jahvah hath blessed. And God give thee of the dew of heaven and of the fat lands of the earth, and plenty of corn and new wine!" On the other, the arid cliffs and rocky defiles of Idumea, and the life of the robber-chief: "Lo, far from the fat lands of the earth shall thy dwelling be, and far from the dew of heaven above! And by thy sword shalt thou live" (cp. Mal. i. 2, 3; Obad. v. 3). So also the historical fortunes of each people are again foreshadowed; and the progress of the story is marked by the somewhat fuller detail with which this is done (cp. xxv. 23). To Jacob it is said: "Let peoples serve thee, and kindreds bow down to thee! Become a master unto thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee! Thy cursers be each accurst, and thy blessers blest!" The conquest of Edom by David is plainly meant, just as the final success of Edomitish rebellion is intimated in the words to Esau:

"And thy brother thou shalt serve; and it shall befall, what time thou strainest hard (?), thou wilt burst his yoke from off thy neck" (xxvii. 40; cp. 2 Sam. viii. 13, 14; cp. 1 K. xi. 22, 25, LXX.).

In the course of the story, the writer returns to the name Jacob as expressing in brief the character of the younger brother. "And he (Esau) said, Is not he rightly named Jacob, in that he hath Jacob'd (outwitted) me now twice?" Before, Jacob grasped his brother's heel; now his name has a moral rather than a physical reference.

It seems unnecessary to follow in detail the inimitable narrative which occupies the entire latter half of the Book of Genesis, and which is imprinted indelibly upon the memory of every reader. It may be more useful to ask how far it can be regarded as historical in the modern sense of the word, even though we may not find ourselves able to give any very decided answer to that question. Some critics, as we saw, are disposed to seek the foundation of the whole in a myth which has been mistaken for history. But the story of Jacob is no simple self-consistent mythus of the primitive age. Many traditions of the past relating to local sanctuaries, famous monuments and memorials, sacred trees and wells, are here blended with fragments of ancient popular poetry and true reminiscences of Hebrew history into an exquisite literary unity. To analyse and interpret this narrative is a difficult task, for which an adequate knowledge of Semitic archaeology and philology is one indispensable qualification.

It is clear that even if Jacob were the name of an old deity of the Canaanites, that fact alone would not suffice to resolve the Jacob of Genesis into a purely mythical personage. In antiquity the names of gods were often borne by real men and women. Whether any mythical elements from the common stock of Semitic folk-lore have been received into the popular traditions about the prime fathers of Israel is another question. That vestiges of primitive mythology are traceable in isolated passages of the O. T., is not to be denied (cp. Is. xiv. 9, 13, xix. 1, xxiv. 21 sqq., xxvii. 1; Job xxvi. 12, 13; above all, Gen. ii. 4 b-iii. 24; vi. 1-4, &c.). And it is well known that a halo of legend often surrounds and obscures important historical characters, even of what may be called the modern period. Yet the critics who have done most to revolutionize current conceptions of early Hebrew history have not denied outright the possibility of Jacob's individual existence.* But it is now pretty generally recognised by professional students of Hebrew and Oriental antiquity that the Biblical accounts of the patriarchs have "an ethnological at least quite as much as a personal significance." No one who has consulted such works as the K'atib al-Aghani, or indeed any of the Arabic historiographers, can fail to appreciate the fact, even if owing to the surviving romance of childhood he has missed the abundant indications of it which present themselves in the too familiar texts of Scripture. The practical difficulty in all such ambiguous relations is to separate the personal from the ethnic or tribal history. It is a difficulty due mainly to the natural difference between Eastern and Western modes of thought and speech; and is by no means to be got rid of summarily, by the popular but groundless assumption of the identity of things that are essentially dissimilar. On the other hand, bearing in mind the usual character of Oriental histories, we may be inclined to think that some of the objections raised by critics against the patriarchal traditions are exaggerated. A closer scrutiny of the stories about Jacob, for instance, will perhaps hardly bear out the assertion that he is represented as "not inferior to the prophets of the 8th century B.C. in pureness of religious insight and inward spiritual piety." This may be the ordinary conception of Jacob. Unhistorical religion has read a good deal besides this into the Biblical narratives. But Jacob's piety, his prayers and faith in a protecting Deity, his dreams, his vows, his setting up masséboth or sacred stones and pouring oil on them, are religious phenomena which were doubtless as common in the 18th as in the 8th century before our era. Parallel facts might easily be adduced from contemporary monuments of Egypt and Babylon. We see nothing anachronistic, and much that is perfectly compatible with the ideas and customs of his supposed period, in the older history of Jacob. The superior cunning by which he overreaches all his kin, his marriage with two sisters at the same time (prohibited by the law of Lev. xviii. 18), his sustained disregard of veracity (xxvii. 19 sqq., xxx. 33, 37 sqq., xxxi. 8, 10-12), are certainly no proofs of "pureness of religious insight and inward spiritual piety." The writer whose words we have quoted finds another strong objection in "the familiar intercourse of the Deity with the patriarchs." But here, again, what has rather struck us in the traditional history of Jacob has been the general absence of what Dr. Kuenen's words imply. No doubt, Jacob receives Divine guidance in warnings and promises. But if it be asked in what way, we shall probably not greatly err if we answer by the means known from the later histories, by dreams and priestly oracles and lots.⁴ This is surely presupposed, even when it is not expressly stated, as it is in the case of the important vision at Bethel (xxviii. 10-22). In both J and E that theophany is represented as occurring in sleep; and even in classical times and countries sleeping in the sanctuary was a recognised method of communion with the Unseen.

It is true that "among most of the nations of antiquity we find the belief that many centuries ago the inhabitants of heaven have associated with dwellers upon earth;" and that "we are not in the habit of accepting as history the legends and myths which afford evidence of that belief" (Kuenen, Rel. of Isr. i. 109). But the classical stories are only superficially parallel to the Israelite traditions in their existing form; and any earlier more decidedly mythical form is a matter of pure conjecture. Leaving on one side the accounts of Abraham, let us take the story of the mysterious conflict of Jacob at Penuel (Gen. xxxii. 24-33), to which Kuenen refers.

If the theophany of Beth-el was a dream, may not a dream lie at the basis of this famous episode also? It is in a dream that "the Angel of Elohim" speaks to Jacob, bidding him return to Canaan (xxi. 11 sqq.); and it is "in the visions of night" that Elohim bids him go down into Egypt (xli. 2). It seems a fair inference that, on other occasions also when Jacob is brought into contact with the Unseen, the writer means us to understand the medium of the dream. The fact is evident from the mode in which the vision at Bethel is referred to (xxxv. 1, 7). When we read that "Elohim said to Jacob, Arise, go up to Bethel, and dwell there; and make there an altar to the God (E) who appeared unto thee, when thou fleddest before thy brother Esau"; we see at once that the italicized words, which, apart from the fuller account of xxviii. 11, 12, would inevitably suggest a literal and sensible apparition, indicate, when taken in connexion with that passage, the proper interpretation of similar statements elsewhere. As for the opening statement "Elohim said to Jacob," this may simply be understood of an impulse of conscience (cp. xxviii. 20 sqq.). The patriarch is conceived as his own priest and prophet. Otherwise it would be perfectly agreeable to ancient thought and language to understand the mediation of a priestly oracle.

It is, indeed, a striking fact that the older narrative of Jacob's life contains so little of the marvellous. Any one who will look through the sections attributed to JE, can verify this for himself.⁵ It is nowhere said, nor perhaps implied, that Elohim or Jahvah appeared to Jacob except in dreams. Even the wrestling at Penuel occurs in the night, which suggests the same intention.⁶ It is easy and perhaps natural to exaggerate the general impression of the supernatural made upon ourselves by the story of Jacob. The restraint in this matter noticeable in the older history (JE) ought to be taken into account in any critical estimate of its credibility.

But, this much premised, it stands to reason and common sense that we must make all allowances for literary form and for the individual freedom of writers dealing with a thing so variable as tradition, when we come to consider the details of the story. Here again we are met by verbal assonances which certainly do not suggest a literal record of objective facts. The wrestling (רָבַח, way-y'abek, v. 24; רָבַחְתָּ, bēš'abēkō, v. 25) occurs by the Jabkok (רַבֵּי, Yabbōk, v. 22) and it is thus hinted that the name of the watercourse means "Wrestler," or "Wrestling." The name Israel is connected with Jacob's victory, as though it meant "He hath striven with El," whereas "El striveth" would be more in accordance with the analogy of such formations (cp. Seraiah, "Jah hath striven"; Jerubbaal, "Baal contendeth"; and Ex. xv. 3, Ps. xxiv. 8).⁸ And as Ewald suggests, the incident of the spraining of Jacob's hip may be a trace of "some ancient notion of this patriarch as Limping, connected with the idea of his craftiness and crookedness," taking Jacob to mean "the Crafty;" a common association of ideas in folklore. The local name Penuel further illustrates the use that the Hebrew spirit could make of materials lying ready to its hand. Like Bethel, Mizpah, and Mahanaim, Penuel (Judg. viii. 8) was probably an ancient holy place, which was thus adopted, as it were, by Israelite religion. The name is not peculiar to the land of Israel. A Phœnician promontory was also called "El's Face" or "Presence" (Ἰανὲς, θεοῦ προσώπων, Strabo, xvi. 2, 6, 16, cited by Ewald); and "Presence of the lord [Baal]" (עַלְמַלְכֵּי) was a title of the goddess Ashtoreth. But how different the associations of the name in the Biblical story! As in the second account of Creation, elements furnished by ancient Semitic conceptions are moralised and spiritualised in a manner peculiar to the religion of Israel; so here, if Ewald is right, old materials have been worked up into an unique parable of the loftiest spiritual experience. The religious significance of the episode—the meaning it had for a prophet of the 8th cent. B.C.—is brought out clearly though briefly by Hosea (xii. 3, 4):

⁴ In DRIVER, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament, or Kautzsch and Socin's Die Genesis.

⁵ This is also the most natural explanation of the brief notice, xxxii. 1, 2 (E). The name of Mahanaim, which doubtless like Bethel was an ancient sanctuary, is referred to Jacob's vision of Angels, and his exclamation, "This is Elohim's camp!" But allusion to this name (Two camps) is again made in a different sense (vv. 7, 10. Jacob was still at Mahanaim, v. 14).

⁴ So, e.g., Rebekah "went to inquire of Jahvah," Gen. xxv. 22.

"In the womb he held his brother's heel ('āqāb),
And in his manhood he strove (sārāh; Yisrā'ēl) with Elohim:
Yea, he strove against an Angel, and prevailed:
He wept and made supplication unto him.
At Bethel He did find him,
And there He spake with him."

Thus in the prophet's estimation the wrestling with Elohim was a wrestling of prayer, in which the agony of fear and remorse was overcome by the final triumph of faith. Weeping and supplication, indeed, are incidents hardly congruous with the idea of a merely physical struggle. This addition is further important, in that it seems to prove either that other and fuller versions of the episode existed in Hosea's time, or that he felt at liberty to modify the relation of Genesis for his own purposes. Whatever may be our opinion of the matter, upon a calm survey of the entire patriarchal history, from Gen. xii. onwards, we can hardly fail to be struck by the fact that while visions in broad daylight, theophanies in the strictest sense, seem to be connected with the name of Abraham, nothing of the sort is told of Isaac; and that in spite of the far greater length and richness of detail that distinguish the traditions about Jacob, only a single isolated story can in his case be claimed as a record of an objectively supernatural experience: while, finally, in the life of Joseph the atmosphere of mystery is almost wholly withdrawn, fading like the glories of sunrise into the light of common day.

It is clear that the original tradition does not treat Jacob's successful wiles with Esau and Isaac and Laban as morally reprehensible. It rather recounts them with the same undisguised admiration that an Arab story-teller of to-day might evince in similar narratives. Nor is any hint of disapproval of his polygamous marriages to be detected by the closest scrutiny of any one of the old writers whose hands are discernible in the composition of Genesis. How indeed could we expect it, in face of the immemorial usage of the East? Polygamy, however, has consequences in family life, which must have some representation in every picture that is true to nature; and these may easily be discerned in the story of Jacob. Throughout his family history, indeed, we may perhaps be permitted to see an unavowed purpose of showing how the patriarch's spiritual nature was purified by sorrowful experience, largely due to the reappearance in his sons of those very faults which darkened his own character in earlier life. His old deceits, practised even upon a blind and bedridden father, come home to him in the treachery of Simeon and Levi (Gen. xxxiv.), in the conspiracy against Joseph and the deceit of the bloody coat (ch. xxxvii.). In later times Jewish faith unquestionably drew these and other moral and religious lessons from the life-story of Jacob. His long servitude in Paddan-Aram, for instance, was regarded as a heaven-sent discipline (Judith viii. 26). But the grand lesson of the whole seems to be enunciated in the words of Joseph: "So now it was not you that sent me hither, but Elohim" (xlv. 8); "As for you, ye meant evil against me, but Elohim meant it for good" (l. 20). The Divine purpose of grace cannot be thwarted; human opposition only furthers it (cp. Riehm, HWB., s. v. Jacob).

True, therefore, as it is that the character of Jacob mirrors the historical character of the Israelite people, and that the great events of his life reflect the historical relations of that people with neighbouring and kindred nations; we need not hesitate to use the composite history of the eponymous father of Jacob-Israel in the manner indicated by St. Paul, "for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (2 Tim. iii. 16); in short, for all purposes of religious edification. The idyllic beauty, the majestic simplicity, the broad faithfulness to antique humanity, everywhere evident in this wonderful blend of manifold traditions, but, above all, the diviner meanings with which they have been imbued under the influence of the holy spirit of Hebrew religion, are things which criticism cannot touch, and which no sober critic desires to touch. [C. J. B.]

JACOB'S WELL (πηγή τοῦ Ἰακώβ), the scene of Christ's discourse with the Samaritan woman (John iv. 1-42), was made by the patriarch Jacob (v. 12). It was very deep (v. 11); near the road from Judæa, through Samaria, to Galilee (vv. 3, 4); outside of a city called Sychar; and near the plot of ground in which Joseph was buried (v. 5: cp. Gen. xlviii. 22; Josh. xxiv. 32). There is every reason to believe that Bir Y'akūb, "Jacob's well," near Nābūus, is the place mentioned. It lies at the N.E. foot of Gerizim, near the road, through the hills, from Judæa to Galilee, and there is nowhere else a deep well at which Jesus could have rested when He sent His disciples into the city to buy food (vv. 6, 9). The surroundings are in perfect harmony with the words of Christ. To the E. and S. the eye rests on the fertile plain of el-Mukhnah,—once the pasture-ground of Jacob (Gen. xxxiii. 18; cp. xxxvii. 12), and, when Jesus looked upon it, covered with waving corn ripe for the sickle (v. 35). Northward rises the imposing mass of Mount Ebal, with the village of 'Askar, possibly SYCHAR, at its base, and opposite to it towers Mount Gerizim with the ruins of the Samaritan temple (vv. 20, 21) on its summit. The traditional tomb of Joseph lies in the plain a short distance to the north, and Shechem, though hidden from view by a swell of the ground, is only $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant to the north-west.

In April 1866 a descent of the well was made by Major Anderson, R.E., who found it to be 75 feet deep, and 7 feet 6 inches in diameter. It was then dry, but on the stones at the bottom lay an unbroken earthenware pitcher, which must have fallen when there was some depth of water. The upper portion of the well is sunk through the soil of the valley and is neatly lined with masonry, the lower through compact beds of limestone. Above the mouth of the well is a vaulted chamber, and around it are the ruins of the churches which once covered it (PEF. Mem. ii. 174 sq.). In 1697 the depth according to Maundrell (E. T. p. 435) was 105 ft., and there were 15 ft. of water. There can be little doubt that, although the water does not now always rise above the rubbish that has accumulated in it, the well, if cleared out, would possess an unailing supply.

Jacob's Well.

In 1881, what appears to have been the original stone over the mouth of the well was uncovered (PEFQy. Stat. 1881, p. 212).

The tradition respecting Jacob's Well, in which Christians, Jews, Samaritans, and Muslims agree, goes back at least to the time of Eusebius in the early part of the 4th century (*OS.*² p. 286, 26, s. v. Συχαρ; Itin. Hierosol.). Neither of these writers mentions a church, but Jerome makes Paula visit a church "erected round the well" (Ep. S. Paul. xvi.; cp. *OS.*² p. 185, 31). This church is mentioned, A.D. 570, by Antoninus Martyr (vi.), who states that the well was in front of the altar, and that many sick were healed there. It is described, A.D. 670, by Arculfus as cruciform, and the well was then in the centre of the church and said to be 40 orgyiae, or about 240 ft. deep (ii. 19). The well and church are mentioned, A.D. 754, by Willibald (Hod.); but Saewulf, A.D. 1102, and Abbot Daniel, A.D. 1106, only mention the well, the water of which, the latter says, was "very cold and pleasant to the taste" (p. lxxii.). The church would thus appear to have been destroyed prior to the Crusades, but, according to an anonymous writer, circa A.D. 1130, it must have been rebuilt early in the 12th century (De Vogüé, Eg. de T. S. App. pp. 424, 425), and Idrisi, A.D. 1154, alludes to it as "a fine church" (Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, pp. 511, 512). This later church was probably destroyed after the battle of Hattin, A.D. 1187, as subsequent pilgrims only mention ruins. The altar, however, appears to have been in existence as late as the 17th century (Quaresmius, ii. 800).

It may appear strange that Jacob should have made a well at this spot when there was such an abundant supply of water close at hand in the valley of Shechem; but such a course would not be out of keeping with the custom of nomads. It is characteristic of the prudence and forethought of the Patriarch that, having obtained a parcel of ground at the entrance to the vale, he should have secured, by dint of great toil, a perennial supply of water at a time when the adjacent springs were in the hands of unfriendly, if not openly hostile, neighbours. The action of the woman in going at mid-day to obtain cold fresh water from a deep well is quite natural, and there is no reason to suppose with Furrer (Schenkel, Bib. Lex. s. v.) that Christ's discourse is framed in an ideal picture not drawn with strict accuracy of detail. Cp. Robinson, iii. 107 sq.; Guérin, Samarie, i. 376 sq.; Sepp, ii. 55-57; Riehm, s. v. [W.]

JACUBUS (B. Ἰακώβος, A. Ἰάκωβος; Accubus), 1 Esd. ix. 48. [AKKUB, 4.]

JADA (יָדָא) = [God] hath known; B. Ἰαδᾶε, and at v. 32, B. Ἰδουδά, A. Ἰεδδαέ, son of Onam, and brother of Shammai, in the genealogy of the sons of Jerahmeel by his wife Atarah (1 Ch. ii. 28, 32). This genealogy is very corrupt in the LXX., especially in the Vatican Codex. [A. C. H.]

JADAU (יָדָו), but the Qeri has יָדָו, i.e. Yaddai; B. Διδ, A. Ἰαδέι; Jeddu), one of the Benenebo who had taken a foreign wife, and was compelled by Ezra to relinquish her (Ezra x. 43).

JADDUA (יָדָוָא) = known; B. Ἰαδού, Ἰ. Ἰδοῦα; Jedda). Ἰ. Son and successor in the high-priesthood of Jonathan or Johanan. He is the last of the high-priests mentioned in the O. T., and probably altogether the latest name in the Canon (Neh. xii. 11, 22), at least if 1 Ch. iii. 22-24 is admitted to be corrupt (see Hervey, Geneal. of our Lord, pp. 101, 107). His name marks distinctly the time when the latest additions were made to the Book of Nehemiah and the Canon of Scripture, and perhaps affords a clue to the age of Malachi the Prophet. All that we learn concerning him in Scripture is the fact of his being the son of Jonathan, and high-priest. We gather also pretty certainly that he was priest in the reign of the last Persian king Darius, and that he was still high-priest after the Persian dynasty was overthrown, i.e. in the reign of Alexander the Great. For the expression "Darius the Persian" (Neh. xii. 22) must have been used after the accession of the Grecian dynasty; and had another high-priest succeeded, his name would most likely have been mentioned. Thus far then the Book of Nehemiah bears out the truth of Josephus's history, which makes Jaddua high-priest when Alexander invaded Judaea (Ant. xi. 8, §§ 4, 5). But the story of his interview with Alexander [HIGH-PRIEST, p. 1368] does not on that account deserve credit, nor the story of the building of the temple on Mount Gerizim during Jaddua's pontificate, at the instigation of Sanballat (Jos. Ant. xi. 8, §§ 2, 4), both of which, as well as the accompanying circumstances, are probably derived from some apocryphal book of Alexandrian growth, since lost, in which chronology and history gave way to romance and Jewish vanity. Josephus seems to place the death of Jaddua after that of Alexander (Ant. xi. 8, § 7). Eusebius assigns 20 years to Jaddua's pontificate (Chronicon, lib. ii., sub ann. Abrah. 1678, 1698. in Patrol. Gr. xix. 487, 491); upon which point may further be consulted Selden, De Successione in Pontificatum Ebraeorum, lib. i. cap. vi., Works, ii. pt. i. 112, ed. 1726; Prideaux, Connexion, i. 540, 541, ed. 1838; Hervey, Geneal. of our Lord, p. 323. [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

2. (B. om., יָדָוָא, A. Ἰεδδοῦκ; Jeddua), one of the chiefs of the people, i.e. of the laymen, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 21).

JADON (יָדֹן) = judge; LXX. om.; Jadon), a man who, in company with the Gibeonites and the men of Mizpah, assisted to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 7). His title, "the Meronothite" (cp. 1 Ch. xxvii. 30), and the mention of Gibeonites, would seem to point to a place Meronoth, and that in the neighbourhood of Gibeon; but no such place has yet been traced.

Jadon (Ἰαδών) is the name attributed by Josephus (Ant. viii. 8, § 5) to the man of God from Judah who withstood Jeroboam at the altar at Bethel—probably intending IDDO the seer. By Jerome (Qu. Hebr. on 2 Ch. ix. 29, in Pat. Lat. xxiii. 1390) that seer, who is also identified with the man of God from Judah, is named Jaddo.

JA'EL (יָאֵל); Hex. Syr. Anael; Ἰαήλ; Joseph. Ἰάλη; Jahel), the wife of Heber the Kenite. Heber was the chief of a nomadic Arab clan, who had separated from the rest of his tribe, and had pitched his tent under the oak, which had in consequence received the name (R. V.) of "oak in Zaanaim" (A. V. "plain of Zaanaim," Judg. iv. 11), in the neighbourhood of Kedesh-Naphtali. [HEBER; KENITES.] The tribe of Heber had secured the quiet enjoyment of their pastures by adopting a neutral position in a troublous period. Their descent from Jethro secured them the favourable regard of the Israelites, and they were sufficiently important to conclude a formal peace with Jabin king of Hazor.

In the heading long which followed the defeat of the Canaanites by Barak, Sisera, abandoning his chariot the more easily to avoid notice (cp. Hom. Il. v. 20), fled unattended, and in an opposite direction from that taken by his army, to the tent of the Kenite chieftainess. "The tent of Jael" is expressly mentioned, either because the harem of Heber was in a separate tent (Rosenmüller, Morgenl. iii. 22), or because the Kenite himself was absent at the time. In the sacred seclusion of this almost inviolable sanctuary, Sisera might well have felt himself absolutely secure from the incursions of the enemy (Calmet, Fragm. xiv.); and although he intended to take refuge among the Kenites, he would not have ventured so openly to violate all idea of Oriental propriety by entering a woman's apartments (D'Herbelot, Bibl. Orient. s. v. Haram), had he not received Jael's express, earnest, and respectful entreaty to do so. He accepted the invitation, and she flung the tent-rug* (B. ἐπιβολαῖον; A. δὲββίς) over him as he lay wearily on the floor. When thirst prevented sleep, and he asked for water, she brought him buttermilk in her choicest vessel, thus ratifying with the semblance of officious zeal the sacred bond of Eastern hospitality. Wine would have been less suitable to quench his thirst, and may possibly have been eschewed by Heber's clan (Jer. xxxv. 2). Buttermilk, according to the quotations in Harmer, is still a favourite Arab beverage (Lebbân), and that this is the drink intended we infer from Judg. v. 25, as well as from the direct statement of Josephus (γάλα διεφθορὸς ἤβη, Ant. v. 5, § 4), although there is no reason to suppose with Josephus and the Rabbis (D. Kimchi, Jarchi, &c.) that Jael purposely used it because of its soporific qualities (Bochart, Hieroz. i. 473). But anxiety still prevented Sisera from composing himself to rest, until he had exacted a promise from his protectress that she would faithfully preserve the secret of his concealment; till at last, with a feeling of perfect security, the weary and unfortunate general resigned himself to the deep sleep of misery and fatigue. Then it was that Jael took in her left hand one of the great wooden^b pins (A. V. "nail") which fastened down the cords of the tent (Ex. xxvii. 19; Is. xxii. 23, liv. 2), and in her right hand the mallet (A. V. "a hammer") used to drive it into the ground, and, creeping up to her sleeping and confiding guest, with one terrible blow dashed it through Sisera's temples deep into the earth (cp. Judith xiii. 2, 7, 8). With one spasm of fruitless agony, with one contortion of sudden pain, "at her feet he bowed, he fell; where he bowed, there he fell down dead" (Judg. v. 27). In the A. MS. of the LXX. is found the gloss, "He was convulsed (ἀνεσκήρισε) between her knees, and fainted, and died." She then waited to meet the pursuing Barak, and led him into her tent that she might in his presence claim the glory of the deed!

Many have supposed that by this act she fulfilled the saying of Deborah, that God would sell Sisera into the hand of a woman (Judg. iv. 9; Joseph. v. 5, § 4); and hence they have asserted that Jael was actuated by some Divine and hidden influence. But the Bible gives no hint of such an inspiration, and it is at least equally probable that Deborah merely intended to intimate the share of the honour which would be assigned by posterity to her own exertions. [If further we eliminate the supposition that Jael's act was "not the murder of a sleeping man, but the use of a daring stratagem" (W. R. Smith,² The O. T. in the Jewish Church, p. 132), that act will appear murder in all its naked atrocity.—F.] A fugitive had asked and received dakheel (or protection) at her hands,—he was miserable, defeated, weary,—he was an ally of her husband,—he was her invited and honoured guest,—he was in the sanctuary of the harem,—above all, he was confiding, defenceless, and asleep;—yet she broke her pledged faith, violated her solemn hospitality, and murdered a trustful and unprotected slumberer. Surely we require the clearest and most positive statement that Jael was instigated to such a murder by Divine suggestion.

But it may be asked, "Has not the deed of Jael been praised by an inspired authority?" "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be; blessed shall she be above women in the tent" (Judg. v. 24). Without stopping to ask when and where Deborah claims for herself any infallibility, or whether, in the passionate moment of patriotic triumph, she was likely to pause in such wild times to scrutinise the moral bearings of an act which had been so splendid a benefit to herself and her people, we may question whether any moral commendation is directly intended. What Deborah stated was a fact, viz. that the wives of the nomad Arabs would undoubtedly regard Jael as a public benefactress, and praise her as a popular heroine. If in the mind of Deborah the passionate exultation for natural deliverance overpowered all finer considerations, her words are exactly analogous to the terrible verses of Ps. cxxxvii. 8, 9: "O daughter of Babylon, happy shall be he that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones." If, in the 19th century after Christ, there were many who could give to Charlotte Corday the title of "the Angel of assassination," it is not strange that a thousand years before Christ Jael would find many to extenuate and even to praise her crime. The providence of God sometimes permits the instrumentality of crime in carrying out the Divine purposes, though the moral responsibility of the crime rests (as we see in the case of Jehu) upon its perpetrator. At the same time we must not judge the rude impassioned Bedouin chieftainess by the moral standard of Christianity, or even of later Judaism. She must not be classed with women actuated by a wild thirst for vengeance, like Criemhild in the Nibelungenlied, or even with Aretophila, whom Plutarch so emphatically praises; but rather with a woman like Judith, actuated by an overpowering patriotic impulse.*

The suggestion of Gesenius (Thes. p. 608 b), Hollmann, and others, that the Jael alluded to in Judg. v. 6 is not the wife of Heber, but some unknown Israelitish judge, appears to us extremely unlikely, especially as the name Jael must almost certainly be the name of a woman (Prov. v. 19, A. V. "roe"; cp. Tabitha, Dorcas)—"a fit name for a Bedouin's wife, especially for one whose family had come from the rocks of Engedi, the spring of the wild-goat or chamois." At the same time it must be admitted that the phrase "in the days of Jael" is one which we should hardly have expected. [F. W. F.]

* "Mantle" is here inaccurate, as is the Vulg. pallio and Luther's Mantel. The word is מַנְטֵלָה—with the definite article. It is not found elsewhere, and it is uncertain what the Semical was; but the Syriac ܡܢܬܠܐ suggests something to lie upon. The ᾶ is for o, according to Jewish tradition.

^b πλάσματος, LXX.; but, according to Josephus, σιδῆρον ἄκον.

JĀ'GUR (ג'ג) = lodging place; B. om., A. 'Iayōp; Jagur), a town of Judah, one of those furthest to the south, on the frontier of Edom (Josh. xv. 21). Kabzeel, one of its companions in the list, recurs subsequently; but Jagur is not again met with, nor has the name been encountered in the imperfect explorations of that dreary region. The Jagur, mentioned in the Talmud (Neubauer, p. 69) as one of the boundaries of the territory of Ashkelon, must have been farther to the N.W. [G.] [W.]

JĀH (יָה); Kúpios; Dominus). See JEHOVAH. An abbreviated form of "Jehovah," or rather Jahveh or Jahvah, used only in poetry. It occurs frequently in the Hebrew of the later Psalms, especially in the liturgical phrase Hallelū-Jāh, "Praise ye Jah!" (Yah); but with a single exception (Ps. lxxviii. 4) is rendered LORD in the A. V. The identity of Jah and Jehovah is strongly marked in two passages of Isaiah (xii. 2, xxvi. 4), the force of which is greatly weakened by the English rendering "the LORD." The former of these should be translated "for my strength and song is JAH JEHOVAH" (cp. Ex. xv. 2); and the latter, "Trust ye in Jehovah for ever, for in JAH JEHOVAH is the rock of ages." "Praise ye the LORD," or Hallelūjah, should be in all cases "praise ye Jah." In Ps. lxxxix. 8 [9] Jah stands in parallelism with "Jehovah the God of hosts" in a passage which is wrongly translated in the A. V. It should be "O Jehovah, God of hosts, who like Thee is strong, O Jah!" Cp. R. V. [W. A. W.] [C. J. B.]

JĀ'HATH (יָחַת; see MV.¹¹). 1. (B. 'Iéθ; A. 'Iéθ; Jahath.) Son of Libni, the son of Gershon, the son of Levi (1 Ch. vi. 20, A. V.). He was ancestor to Asaph (v. 43).

2. (BA. 'Iéθ; Leheth.) Head of a later house in the family of Gershon, being the eldest son of Shimei, the son of Laadan. The house of Jahath existed in David's time (1 Ch. xxiii. 10, 11). [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

3. (B. 'Iéθ, A. corrupt [see Swete]; Jahath.) A man in the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 2), son of Reiaiah ben-Shobal. His sons were Ahumai and Lahad, the families of the Zorathites. If Reiaiah and Haroeh are identical, Jahath was a descendant of Caleb ben-Hur. [HAROEH.]

4. (BA. 'Ivδθ.) A Levite, son of Shelomoth, the representative of the Kohathite family of IZHAR in the reign of David (1 Ch. xxiv. 22).

5. (B. 'Ié, A. 'Iéθ.) A Merarite Levite in the reign of Josiah, one of the overseers of the repairs to the Temple (2 Ch. xxxiv. 12).

JĀ'HAZ, also JAHA'ZA, JAHA'ZAH, and JĀH'ZĀH. Under these four forms are given in the A. V. the name of a place which in the Hebrew appears as יָחַז and יָחַזָה, the ה being in some cases—as Num. and Deut.—the particle of motion, but elsewhere an integral addition to the name. It has been uniformly so taken by the LXX., who have Iaazá, and twice Iaazá. JĀHAZ is found in Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Judg. xi. 20; Is. xv. 4; Jer. xlviii. 34. In the two latter only is it יָחַז, without the final ה. In Judg. xi. 20, A. reads Iaazá. The Samaritan Cod. has יָחַזָה; Vulg. Jasa.

At Jahaz the decisive battle was fought between the children of Israel and Sihon king of the Amorites, which ended in the overthrow of the latter and in the occupation by Israel of the whole pastoral country included between the Arnon and the Jabbok, the Belka of the modern Arabs (Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Judg. xi. 20). It was in the allotment of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18), though not mentioned in the catalogue of Num. xxxii.; and it was given with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites (1 Ch. vi. 78; and Josh. xxi. 36, though here omitted in the ordinary Hebrew text).

Jahazah occurs in the denunciations of Jeremiah and Isaiah on the inhabitants of the "plain country," i.e. the Mishor, the modern Belka (Jer. xlviii. 21, 34; Is. xv. 4); and the fact that at this period it was in the hands of Moab agrees with the inscription on "the Moabite stone," in which king Mesha states that he took it from the king of Israel (Records of the Past, N. S., ii. 202).

From the terms of the narrative in Num. xxi. it would appear that Jahaz was situated N. of the Arnon (v. 11); in the vicinity of Pisgah (v. 20); and on or near "the king's highway" (v. 22) by which the Israelites were advancing upon Palestine,—that is, the road from Dibon-gad, through Almon-diblathaim, to the mountains of Abarim, before Nebo (Num. xxxiii. 45-47). The narrative in Deut. ii. also places Jahaz N. of the Arnon; in v. 24 the Israelites are directed to pass over the valley of Arnon, and begin to possess the land of Sihon and contend with him in battle (cp. v. 31); and messengers were not sent to ask Sihon's permission for their passage through his territory until they reached the wilderness (midbar) of Kedemoth (v. 26), a town of Reuben mentioned in the same group with Jahaz (Josh. xiii. 18). The sequence of events seems clear. The Israelites after crossing the Arnon, W. Moab, camped at Dibon, Dhibān, and thence marched directly upon Heshbon by the road through Medeba. Mádeba, which must always have been an important thoroughfare, and later, during the Roman period, became one of the great lines of communication from north to south. At Jahaz, between Kedemoth and Heshbon, and not very far from the latter place and Elealeh, el-'Al (Is. xv. 4; Jer. xlviii. 34), they met and defeated the army which Sihon had assembled for the defence of his capital. In agreement with this view is the statement of Eusebius (OS. p. 267, 94) that Jahaz (Iεσσά) was existing in his day between Medeba and Δηβούς, or, adopting the reading suggested by Reland (p. 825), Εσβούς, Heshbon. The site has not been recovered, but it was possibly at el-Jercineh, or Kefer Abu Sarbat (PEF. Mem. E. Pal. pp. 110, 134, and map). Riehm (HWB. s. v.) places it between Medeba and Dibon; Schwarz (H. L. p. 180) has suggested Jazaza, a village S.W. of Dhibān; Tristram (Bib. Places, p. 355) and Palmer (Desert of Erodus, map), Muhatel el-Haj, on the S. side of the Arnon; Merrill, Ziza, 10 miles S.E. of Hesbān; and Conder, Rujm Makhstiyeh, 9 miles N.E. of the same place (PEF. Mem. E. Pal. p. 279, note. See also Ewald, Geschichte, ii. 267, 271). [G.] [W.]

JA-HA'ZA, R. V. JAHAZ (יָהָז), i.e. Yah-zah; B. באָזאָ, A. 'Iaasá; Jassa, Josh. xiii. 18. [JAHAZ.]

JA-HA'ZAH, R. V. JAHAZ (יָהָז); in Jer. 'Pefás, in both MSS.; Jaser, Jasa, Josh. xxi. 36 (though omitted in the Rec. Hebrew Text, and not recognisable in the LXX.), Jer. xlvi. 21 (R. V. JAHZAH). [JAHAZ.]

JA-HA-ZI'AH (יָהָזִי) = Jehovah seeth; A. 'Iaζias, B. Δαζεία, N. -as; Jaasia, son of Tikvah, apparently a priest; commemorated as one of the four who originally sided with Ezra in the matter of the foreign wives (Ezra x. 15). In Esdras the name becomes EZECHIAS.

JA-HA-ZI'-EL (יָהָזִי־אֵל) = whom God strengthens. 1. (A. 'Ieζiήλ, B. 'Ieζήλ Jehziel.) One of the heroes of Benjamin who deserted the cause of Saul and joined David when he was at Ziklag (1 Ch. xii. 4).

2. (A. 'Oζiήλ, B. 'Ozeήλ; Jaziel.) A priest in the reign of David, whose office it was, in conjunction with Benaiah, to blow the trumpet at the ministrations before the Ark, when David had brought it to Jerusalem (1 Ch. xvi. 6). [HIGH-PRIEST.]

3. (A. 'Iaζiήλ, B. 'Oζiήλ, 'Iaζή; Jahaziel.) A Kohathite Levite, third son of Hebron. His house is mentioned in the enumeration of the Levites in the time of David (1 Ch. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23). [A. C. H.] [W.]

4. (A. 'Oζiήλ, B. 'Ozeήλ; Jahaziel.) Son of Zechariah, a Levite of the Bene-Asaph, who was brought by the Spirit of Jehovah to animate Jehoshaphat and the army of Judah in a moment of great danger; namely, when they were anticipating the invasion of an enormous horde of Moabites, Ammonites, Mehunims, and other barbarians (2 Ch. xx. 14). Ps. lxxxiii. is entitled a Psalm of Asaph; and this, coupled with the mention of Edom, Moab, Ammon, and others, in hostility to Israel, has led some to connect it with the above event. [GEBAL.] But, however desirable, this is very uncertain.

5. (LXX. omits; Ezechiel.) The "son of Jahaziel" was the chief of the Bene-Shecaniah who returned from Babylon with Ezra, according to the present state of the Hebrew text (Ezra viii. 5). But according to the LXX. of, and the parallel passage in, 1 Esd. (viii. 32), a name has escaped from the text, and it should read, "of the Bene-Zathoe (probably ΖΑΤΤΟΥ, Shecaniah son of Jahaziel" (for the Septuagintal variations, see Swete). In the latter place the name appears as JEZELUS.

JAH-DAI (יָהָדַי), ? = יָהָדַי, whom Jehovah leads; B. 'Iησου, A. 'Iadaí; Jahodai, a man who appears to be thrust abruptly into the genealogy of Caleb, as the father of six sons (1 Ch. ii. 47). Various suggestions regarding the name have been made: as that Gazez, the name preceding, should be Jahdai; that Jahdai was a concubine of Caleb, &c.: but these are mere groundless suppositions (see Burrington, i. 216; Bertheau, ad loc.).

JAH-DI'-EL (יָהָדִי־אֵל) = whom God makes joyful; B. 'Elaeήλ, A. 'Elaήλ; Jediel, one of the heroes who were heads of the half-tribe of Manasseh on the east of Jordan (1 Ch. v. 24).

JAH'DO (יָהָדוֹ): A. 'Ieδδαí, as if the name had originally been יָהָדוֹ; cp. JAASAU, JADAU; B. 'Ioupeí: Jeddo, a Gadite named in the genealogies of his tribe (1 Ch. v. 14) as the son of Buz and father of Jeshishai.

JAH-LE-EL (יָהָלֵ־אֵל) = hope in God; in Gen. A. 'Aλοήλ, D. 'Eήλ; in Num. B. 'Aλλήλ; Jahelcl, Jahel, the third of three sons of Zebulun (Gen. xli. 14; Num. xxvi. 26, LXX. v. 22), founder of the family of JAHLEELITES. Nothing is heard of him or of his descendants.

JAH-LE-E'LITES, THE (יָהָלֵ־אֵלִיתַי); B. 'Aλληλεί; Jalcitae. A branch of the tribe of Zebulun, descendants of Jahleel (Num. xxvi. 26, LXX. v. 22).

JAH-MAI (יָהָמַי), ? = יָהָמַי, whom Jehovah guards; B. Elicad, A. 'Iemou; Jemai, a man of Issachar, one of the heads of the house of Tola (1 Ch. vii. 2).

JAH-ZAH (יָהָזָה): A. 'Iaadá; Jassa, 1 Ch. vi. 78. [JAHAZ.]

JAH-ZE-EL (יָהָזֵ־אֵל) = God apportions; 'Aozeήλ; Jasiel, the first of the four sons of Naphtali (Gen. xli. 24), founder of the family of THE JAHZEELITES (יָהָזֵ־אֵלִיתַי, Num. xxvi. 48). His name is once again mentioned (1 Ch. vii. 13; B. Ζαήλ, AF. 'Aoiήλ) in the slightly different form of JAHZIEL.

JAH-ZE-E'LITES, THE (יָהָזֵ־אֵלִיתַי); B. δ Ζαηλί, AF. δ 'Aoiηλί; Jesielitae. A branch of the Naphtalites, descended from Jahzeel (Num. xxvi. 48).

JAH-ZE'RAH (יָהָזֵ־רָאָה); B. 'Ieδpuds, A. 'Ieζpuds; Jezras, a priest, of the house of Immer; ancestor of Maasai (read Maaziah), one of the courses which returned (1 Ch. ix. 12). [JEHOIARIB.] In Neh. xi. 13 he is called יָהָזֵ־רָאָה, AHABAI, and all the other names are much varied. [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JAH-ZI'-EL (יָהָזִי־אֵל) = God beholds; A. 'Iaoteήλ, B. 'Ieoioteήλ; Jasiel, the form in which the name of the first of Naphtali's sons, elsewhere given JAHZEEL, appears in 1 Ch. vii. 13 only.

JAI'R (יָאִיר) = whom Jehovah enlightens; B. 'Iaeip, A. 'Iaeip, -ήρ, -ip; Jair. 1. A man who on his father's side was descended from Judah, and on his mother's from Manasseh. His father was Segub, son of Hezron the son of Pharez, by his third wife, the daughter of the great Machir, a man so great that his name is sometimes used as equivalent to that of Manasseh (1 Ch. ii. 21, 22). Thus on both sides he was a member of the most powerful family of each tribe. By Moses he is called the "son of Manasseh" (Num. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14), and according to the Chronicles (1 Ch. ii. 23) he was one of the "sons of Machir the father of Gilead." This designation from his mother rather than his father, perhaps arose from his having settled in the tribe of Manasseh, east of Jordan. During the conquest he performed one of the chief feats recorded. He took the whole of the tract of ARGOB (Deut. iii. 14), the naturally inaccessible Trachonitis, the modern Lejali; and in addition possessed himself of some nomad villages in Gilead, which he called after his own name, HAVVOTH-JAIR (R. V. Num. xxxii. 41; 1 Ch. ii. 23).^a None of his descendants are mentioned with certainty; but it is perhaps allowable to consider IRA THE JAIRITE as one of them. Possibly another was

2. (BA. Iaelp.) JAIR THE GILEADITE, who judged Israel for two and twenty years (Judg. x. 3-5). He had thirty sons who rode thirty asses (עֲרֵב) and possessed thirty "cities" (עָרֵי) in the land of Gilead, which, like those of their namesake, were called Havvoth-Jair. Possibly the original twenty-three formed part of these. Josephus (Ant. v. 7, § 6) gives the name of Jair as Iaelphas; he declares him to have been of the tribe of Manasseh, and his burial-place, CAMON, to have been in Gilead. [HAVVOTH-JAIR.]

3. (B. Iaelpos, A. Iarpós.) A Benjamite, son of Kish and father of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5). In the Apocrypha his name is given as JAIRUS.

4. (יָיִר), a totally different name from the preceding; B. Iaelp, A. Adelp; Saltus.) The father of Elhanan, one of the heroes of David's army, who killed Lachmi the brother of Goliath (1 Ch. xx. 5). In the original Hebrew text (Kethib) the name is Jaor (יָאֹר). In the parallel narrative of Samuel (2 Sam. xxi. 19) Jaare-Oregim is substituted for Jair. The arguments for each will be found under ELHANAN and JAARE-OREGIM.

In the N. Test., as in the Apocrypha, we encounter Jair under the Greek form of JAIRUS. [G.] [W.]

JAIRITE, THE (יָיִרִי; B. Iaeliv, A. δ' Iaeliv; Jairites). IRA the Jairite was a priest (יָיִר, A. V. "chief ruler") to David (2 Sam. xx. 26). If "priest" is to be taken here in its sacerdotal sense, IRA must have been a descendant of Aaron, in whose line however no Jair is mentioned. But this is not imperative [see PRIEST], and he may therefore have sprung from the great Jair of Manasseh, or some lesser person of the name.

JAIRUS. 1. (Idaipos), a ruler of a synagogue, probably in some town near the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. He was the father of the maiden whom Jesus restored to life (Matt. ix. 18; Mark. v. 22; Luke .viii. 41). The name is probably the Grecised form of the Hebrew JAIR. [JAIR, 3.] [W. T. B.]

JA'KAN (יָקָן; B. Ḍadū, A. Oūdū; Jacan), son of Ezer the Horite (1 Ch. i. 42). The name is identical with that more commonly expressed in the A. V. as JAAKAN. And see AKAN.

^a This verse would seem not to refer to the original conquest of these villages by Jair, as the A. V. represents, but rather to their recapture. The accurate rendering is as in R. V., "And Geshur and Aram took the towns of Jair from them, with Kenath and the villages thereof, even threescore cities" (see also Bertheau, Chronik, p. 16).

JA'KEH (יָקֵחַ), and in some MSS. יָקֵחַ, which is followed by a MS. of the Targum in the Cambridge Univ. Libr., and was evidently the reading of the Vulgate, where the whole clause is rendered symbolically—"Verba Congregatis filii Vomentis"). The A. V. and R. V. of Prov. xxx. 1, following the authority of the Targum and Syriac, have represented this as the proper name of the father of Agur, whose sayings are collected in Prov. xxx., and such is the natural interpretation. But beyond this we have no clue to the existence of either Agur or Jakh. See under AGUR.

JA'KIM (יָקִים) = [God] establishes; B. Iakēmu, A. Ἐλακέμ; Jacim). 1. Head of the 12th course of priests in the reign of David (1 Ch. xxiv. 12). [JEHOIARIB; JACHIN (2).] 2. (Iakēmu.) A Benjamite, one of the Bershimhi (1 Ch. viii. 19). [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JA'LON (יָלוֹן, ? = a lodger; B. Ἀμῶν, A. Ἰαλῶν; Jalon), one of the sons of Ezrah (Heli): a person named in the genealogies of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 17).

JAMBRES. [JANNES AND JAMBRES.]

JAMBRI. Shortly after the death of Judas Maccabæus (B.C. 161), "the children of Jambri" are said to have made a predatory attack on a detachment of the Maccabæan forces and to have suffered reprisals (1 Macc. ii. 36-41). The name does not occur elsewhere, and the variety of readings is considerable: B. Iambri; A. Iambres; alii, Ἀμβροί, Ἀμβροί; Syr. Ambri. Josephus (Ant. xiii. 1, § 2) reads Ἀμαπαλον ῥαίδες, and it seems almost certain that the true reading is Ἀμπί (-es), a form which occurs elsewhere (Joseph. Ant. viii. 15, § 5, Ἀμαπίρος; 1 Ch. xxvii. 18, Heb. Ἀμπί; B. Ἀμπί, A. Ἀμπί; Vulg. Amri; 1 Ch. ii. 4, Ἀμπί).

It has been conjectured (Drusius, Michaelis, Grimm, 1 Macc. ix. 36) that the original text was Ἰδὸν "Idon", "the sons of the Amorites," and that the reference is to a family of the Amorites who had in early times occupied the town Medeba (v. 36) on the borders of Reuben (Num. xxi. 30, 31). [B. F. W.] [C. H.]

JAMES (Ἰάκωβος; Jacobus),* the name of two or more persons mentioned in the N. T.

* The name itself will perhaps repay a few momentary consideration. As borne by the Apostles and their contemporaries in the N. T., it was of course JACOB, and it is somewhat remarkable that in them it reappears for the first time since the patriarch himself. In the unchangeable East St. James is still St. Jacob—Sanctus Jacobus; but no sooner had the name left the shores of Palestine than it underwent a series of curious and interesting changes probably unparalleled in any other case. To the Greeks it became Iάκωβος, with the accent on the first syllable; to the Latins, Jacobus, doubtless similarly accented, since in Italian it is Giacomo or Giaco. In Spain it assumed two forms, apparently of different origins:—Jago—in modern Spanish Diego; Portuguese Nago—and Jayme or Jayme, pronounced Hayme, with a strong initial guttural. In France it became Jacques; but another form was Jame, which

I. JAMES THE SON OF ZEBEDEE. This is the only one of the Apostles of whose life and death we can write with certainty. The little that we know of him we have on the authority of Scripture. All else that is reported is idle legend, with the possible exception of one tale, handed down by Clement of Alexandria to Eusebius, and by Eusebius to us. With this single exception the line of demarcation is drawn clear and sharp. There is no fear of confounding the St. James of the New Testament with the hero of Compostella.

Of St. James's early life we know nothing. We first hear of him A.D. 27, when he was called to be our Lord's disciple; and he disappears from view A.D. 44, when he suffered martyrdom at the hands of Herod Agrippa I. We proceed to thread together the several pieces of information which the inspired writers have given us respecting him during these seventeen years.

I. His history.—In the spring or summer of the year 27, Zebedee,^b a fisherman, but possessed at least of competence (Mark i. 20), was out on the Sea of Galilee, with his two sons, James and John, and some boatmen, whom either he had hired for the occasion, or who more probably were his usual attendants. He was engaged in his customary occupation of fishing, and near him was another boat belonging to Simon and Andrew, with whom he and his sons were in partnership (Luke v. 7, 10). Finding themselves unsuccessful, the occupants of both boats came ashore, and began to wash their nets. At this time the new Teacher, who had now been ministering about six months, and with whom Simon and Andrew, and in all probability John, were already well acquainted (John i. 35-41), appeared upon the beach. He requested leave of Simon and Andrew to address the crowds that flocked around Him from their boat, which was lying at a convenient distance from the shore. The discourse being completed, and the crowds dispersing, JESUS desired Simon to put out into the deeper water, and to try another cast for fish. Though reluctant, Simon did as he was desired, through the awe which he already entertained for One Who, he thought, might possibly be the promised Messiah (John i. 41, 42), and whom even now he addressed as "Rabbi" (ῥαββί, Luke v. 5, the word used by this Evangelist for Παῖς). Astonished at the success of his draught, he beckoned to his partners in the other boat to come and help him and his brother in landing the fish caught. The amazement communicated itself to the sons of Zebedee, and flashed conviction on the souls of all the four fishermen. They had doubted and mused before; now they believed. At His call they left all, and became, once and for ever, His disciples, hereafter to catch men.

This is the call of St. James to the discipleship. It will be seen that we have regarded the events narrated by St. Matthew and St. Mark (Matt. iv. 18-22; Mark i. 16-20) as identical with those related by St. Luke (Luke v. 1-11), in accordance with the opinion of Hammond, John Lightfoot, Maldonatus, Lardner, Tranch, Wordsworth, Mansel, &c.; not as distinct from them, as supposed by Alford, Greswell, Carr, &c.

For a full year we lose sight of St. James. He is then, in the spring of 28, called to the apostleship with his eleven brethren (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 14; Luke vi. 13; Acts i. 13). In the list of the Apostles given us by St. Mark, and in the Book of Acts, his name occurs second, next to that of Simon Peter; in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke it comes third, after SS. Peter and Andrew. It is clear that in these lists the names are not placed at random. In all four, the names of SS. Peter, Andrew, James, and John are placed first; and it is plain that these four Apostles were at the head of the twelve throughout. Thus we see that SS. Peter, James, and John alone were admitted to the miracle of the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark v. 37; Luke viii. 51). The same three Apostles alone were permitted to be present at the Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1; Mark ix. 2; Luke ix. 28). The same three alone were allowed to witness the Agony (Matt. xxvi. 37; Mark xiv. 33). And it was SS. Peter, James, John, and Andrew who asked our Lord for an explanation of His dark sayings with regard to the end of the world and His second coming (Mark xiii. 3). It is worthy of notice that in all these places, with one exception (Luke ix. 28), the name of St. James is put before that of St. John, and that St. John is twice described as "the brother of James" (Mark v. 37; Matt. xvii. 1). This would appear to imply that James, either from age or character, took a higher position than his brother. On the last occasion on which St. James is mentioned (Acts xii. 2) we find this position reversed. That the prominence of these three Apostles was founded on personal character (as out of every twelve persons there must be two or three to take the lead), and that it was not an office held by them "quos Dominus, ordinis servandi causa, caeteris praeponit," as King James I. has said (Praefat. Monitorii [p. 53] to Apol. pro Jur. Fid. ed. 1609), can scarcely be doubted (cf. Eusebius, ii. 14).

It would seem to have been at the time of the appointment of the Twelve Apostles that the name of Boanerges [BOANERGES] was given to the sons of Zebedee, as to the reasons for which several Greek patristic opinions will be found cited in Suicer's Thesaurus, s. v. Sporrh. It might, however, like Simon's name of Peter, have been conferred before, and formally confirmed on their appointment as Apostles. This appears in the metrical life of St. Thomas à Becket by Garner (A.D. 1170-74), quoted in Robertson's Becket, p. 139, note. From this last the transition to our James is easy. When it first appeared in English, or through what channel, the writer has not been able to trace. Possibly it came from Scotland, where the name was a favourite one. It exists in Wycliffe's Bible (1381). In Russia, and in Germany and the countries more immediately related thereto, the name has retained its original form, and accordingly there alone there would seem to be no distinction between Jacob and James; which was the case even in mediæval Latin, where Jacob and Jacobus were always discriminated. Its modern dress, however, sits very lightly on the name; and we see in "Jacobite" and "Jacobin" how ready it is to throw it off, and, like a true Oriental, reveal its original form.—[G.]

^b An ecclesiastical tradition, of uncertain date, places the residence of Zebedee and the birth of St. James at Japhia, now Yafa, near Nazareth. Hence that village is commonly known to the members of the Latin Church in that district as San Giacomo. [JAPHIA.]

name plainly was not bestowed upon them because "divina illorum prædicatione magnum quendam et illustrem sonitum per terrarum orbem data erat" (Victor of Antioch on Mark iii. 17 in La Bigne, Biblioth. Patr., Paris 1609, t. viii. 825 c.), nor ὡς μεγαλοκρήνους καὶ θεολογικωτάτους (Theophylact on Mark iii. 17, in Pat. Gr. cxliii. 523 D), but it was, like the name given to Simon, at once descriptive and prophetic. The "Rock-man" had a natural strength, which was described by his title, and he was to have a Divine strength, predicted by the same title. In the same way the "Sons of Thunder" had a burning and impetuous spirit, which twice exhibits itself in its unchastened form (Luke ix. 54; Mark x. 37; Jerom. c. Pelag. ii. 15, Pat. Lat. cxliii. 551 B), and which, when moulded by the Spirit of God, taking different shapes, led St. James to be the first apostolic martyr, and St. John to become in an especial manner the Apostle of Love.

The first occasion on which this natural character manifested itself in St. James and his brother was at the commencement of our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem in the year 30. He was passing through Samaria; and now courting rather than avoiding publicity, He "sent messengers before His face" into a certain village, "to make ready for Him" (Luke ix. 52). The Samaritans, with their old jealousy strong upon them, refused to receive Him, because He was going to Jerusalem instead of to Gerizim; and in exasperation James and John asked their Master that they might, after the example of Elijah, call down fire to consume them. "But He turned and rebuked them" (Luke ix. 55).

At the end of the same journey a similar spirit appears again. As they went up to Jerusalem our Lord declared to His Apostles the circumstances of His coming Passion, and at the same time strengthened them by the promise that they should sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. These words seem to have made a great impression upon Salome, and she may have thought her two sons quite as fit as the sons of Jonas to be the chief ministers of their Lord in the mysterious kingdom which He was about to assume. She approached therefore, and besought, perhaps with a special reference in her mind to St. Peter and St. Andrew, that her two sons might sit on the right hand and on the left in His kingdom, i.e. according to a Jewish form of expression^a

^a The words "even as Elias did," in v. 54, are omitted in the Sinaitic and the Vatican MSS., and are rejected by Tischendorf and Tregelles and the R. V. Whether they are to stand or no, the reference by the Apostles to the example of Elijah is undoubted. The words of the rebuke as given in the A. V., "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of" (v. 55), are not found in the Sinaitic, the Vatican, the Alexandrine codices, or in the Codex Ephraëmi, but they are in the Codex Bezae. The remaining words, "For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them" (v. 56), have not the authority of the Sinaitic, the Vatican, the Alexandrine, the Ephraëmi, or the Bezae. Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and the R. V. omit the whole of the rebuke; Griesbach and Meyer the last clause of it.

^b The same form is common throughout the East. See Lane's Arab. Nights, iii. 212, &c.

(Joseph. Ant. vi. 11, § 9), that they might be next to the King in honour (Matt. xx. 20). The two brothers joined with her in the prayer (Mark x. 35). The Lord passed by their petition with a mild reproof, showing that the request had not arisen from an evil heart, but from a spirit which aimed too high. He told them that they should drink His cup and be baptized with His baptism of suffering, but turned their minds away at once from the thought of future pre-eminence: in His kingdom none of His Apostles were to be lords over the rest. The indignation felt by the ten would show that they regarded the petition of the two brothers as an attempt at infringing on their privileges as much as on those of St. Peter and Andrew.

From the time of the Agony in the Garden. A.D. 30, to the time of his martyrdom, A.D. 44, we know nothing of St. James, except that after the Ascension he persevered in prayer with the other Apostles, and the women, and the Lord's brethren (Acts i. 13). In the year 44 Herod Agrippa I., son of Aristobulus, was ruler of all the dominions which after the death of his grandfather, Herod the Great, had been divided between Archelaus, Antipas, Philip, and Lysanias. He had received from Caligula, Trichonitis in the year 37, Galilee and Peraea in the year 40. On the accession of Claudius, in the year 41, he received from him Idumæa, Samaria, and Judæa. This sovereign was at once a supple statesman and a stern Jew (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 6, § 7, xix. 5-8): a king with not a few grand and kingly qualities, at the same time eaten up with Jewish pride—the type of a lay Pharisee. "He was very ambitious to oblige the people with donations," and "he was exactly careful in the observance of the laws of his country, keeping himself entirely pure, and not allowing one day to pass over his head without its appointed sacrifice" (Ant. xix. 7, § 3). Policy and inclination would alike lead such a monarch "to vex certain of the Church" (Acts xii. 1); and accordingly, when the Passover of the year 44 had brought multitudes to Jerusalem, he "killed James the brother of John with the sword" (Acts xii. 2). This is all that we know for certain of his death.^a We may notice respecting it, that he perished not by stoning, but by the sword. The Jewish law laid down that if seducers to strange worship were few, they should be stoned; if many, that they should be beheaded. Either therefore Herod intended that James's death should be the beginning of a sanguinary persecution, or he merely followed the Roman custom of putting to death from preference (see Dr. John Lightfoot in loco).

The death of so prominent a champion left a huge gap in the ranks of the infant society, which was filled partly by St. James, the brother of our Lord, who steps forth into greater prominence in Jerusalem, and partly by St. Paul, who had now been seven years a convert, and who shortly afterwards set out on his first apostolic journey.

^a The great Armenian convent at Jerusalem on the so-called Mount Zion is dedicated to "St. James the son of Zebedee." The church of the convent, or rather a small chapel on its north-east side, occupies the traditional site of his martyrdom. This, however, can hardly be the actual site (Williams, Holy City, ii. 65). Its most interesting possession is the chair of the Apostle, a venerable relic, the age of which is perhaps traceable as far back as the fourth century (Williams, p. 560). But as it would seem that it is believed to have belonged to "the first Bishop of Jerusalem," it is doubtful to which of the two Jameses the tradition would attach it.

II. Chronological recapitulation. — In the spring or summer of the year 27 St. James was called to be a disciple of Christ. In the spring of 28 he was appointed one of the Twelve Apostles, and at that time probably received, with his brother, the title of Boanerges. In the autumn of the same year he was admitted to the miraculous raising of Jairus's daughter. In the spring of the year 29 he witnessed the Transfiguration. Very early in the year 30 he asked his Lord to let him call down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritan village. About three months later in the same year, just before the final arrival in Jerusalem, he and his brother made their ambitious request through their mother Salome. On the night before the Crucifixion he was present at the Agony in the Garden. On the day of the Ascension he is mentioned as persevering with the rest of the Apostles and disciples in prayer at Jerusalem. Shortly before the day of the Passover, in the year 44, he was put to death. Thus during fourteen out of the seventeen years that elapsed between his call and his death we do not even catch a glimpse of him.

III. Traditions respecting him.—Clement of Alexandria, in the seventh book of the Hypotyposesis, relates, concerning St. James's martyrdom, that the prosecutor was so moved by witnessing his bold confession that he declared himself a Christian on the spot: accused and accuser were therefore hurried off together, and on the road the latter begged St. James to grant him forgiveness; after a moment's hesitation, the Apostle kissed him, saying, "Peace be to thee!" and they were beheaded together. This tradition is preserved by Eusebius (H. E. ii. 9). There is no internal evidence against it, and the external evidence is sufficient to make it credible, for Clement flourished as early as A.D. 195, and he states expressly that the account was given him by those who went before him.

Epiphanius, without giving or probably having any authority for or against his statement, reports that St. James died unmarried (S. Epiph. adv. Hæc. ii. 4, p. 491, Paris, 1622), and that, like his namesake, he lived the life of a Nazirite (ibid. iii. 2, 13, p. 1045).

The legends which connect St. James with Spain are of two classes, independent of each other and springing from different sources. The first represent him as preaching in the Peninsula during his lifetime; the second tell of the conveyance of his body after his death to Iria Flavia, and its subsequent discovery, loss, and rediscovery. The first mention of his preaching in Spain is found in a treatise attributed to Isidore, Bishop of Seville, A.D. 600–636. This legend found its way into the Roman Breviary in the following form:—"Afterwards he travelled through Spain, and, after preaching the Gospel there, returned to Jerusalem." Baronius, knowing that St. James did not make and could not have made any such visit to Spain, induced Clement VIII., in 1602, to change the reading of the Breviary into: "That he afterwards went to Spain, and there made some converts to the faith, is a tradition of the Church of that province," which in 1608 took the form of: "That he afterwards went to Spain, and made some converts to the faith, is said to be believed among the Spaniards." But on the protest of the Spanish Church this was altered in 1625 to: "Afterwards he went to Spain, and there made some converts to Christ, of whom seven were subsequently ordained Bishops by the Blessed Peter, and were the first to be sent to Spain; then he returned to Jerusalem." This reading, which makes a compromise between Spanish dignity and Roman claims, holds its place in the Breviary at present, together with a statement that "his body was afterwards translated to Compostella, where it is worshipped by vast crowds." The second class of legends, relating to the miraculous translation of his body to Spain, originated with Theodimir, bishop of Iria, in the year 772, and they were confirmed by Pope Leo III. about A.D. 800 in an epistle, in which he says that, after the martyrdom of the Apostle, his disciples took his body to Joppa, where they found a ship waiting for them, in which they placed the body, and sailed to Iria; there they disembarked and proceeded to Liberum Donum (Libredun, afterwards Compostella), destroyed an idol's temple and buried St. James's body in a crypt, his two companions, Theodore and Athanasius, being afterwards buried with him. These three bodies Theodimir found in 772, guided by "a brilliant star which seemed nailed to the sky above the crypt, pointing with its flashing ray to the spot where the sacred remains were buried" (Apostolic Letters of Leo XIII., 1880). Over them Alfonso the Chaste built a church, which was transformed into a cathedral by Diego Galmirez in 1112. The cathedral was ravaged and destroyed by the Moors and by the heretical English, but in 1879 Archbishop Paya y Rico discovered a stone chest full of bones, so broken that there was not a single entire bone (Recuerdos). Out of these pieces were formed three skeletons, and on Nov. 1, 1880, Pope Leo XIII. formally and solemnly declared, as a matter of certain knowledge and a thing that no one might controvert, that these were the skeletons of St. James, Theodore, and Athanasius. See the Roman Breviary (*in Fest. S. Jac. Baronius shows himself ashamed of them; Estius gives them up as hopeless; Tillemont and Gams reject them with as much contempt as their position will allow them to show; and Döllinger, in a lecture at Munich in 1884, says, "That the Apostle James the Great came to Spain to preach the faith contradicts equally the Bible and history. . . . That his body was landed from Palestine on the coast of Galicia, and is there preserved, after having circumnavigated Spain, is a somewhat later invented fable." On the other hand, Popes Leo III. and XIII. have pronounced ex cathedra in their favour.

2. JAMES OF ALPHEAUS. Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13.

3. JAMES THE BROTHER OF THE LORD (Gal. i. 19); and also of Joses,^f Simon, Jude, and some sisters (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3).

4. JAMES OF MARY (Luke xxiv. 10); son of Mary and brother of Joses (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40). Also called THE LITTLE (Mark xv. 40).

5. JAMES, of whom Jude is brother. Jude 1.

6. JAMES, of whom Jude is brother or son. Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13.

7. JAMES (1 Cor. xv. 7), shown by the context to be a Church officer at Jerusalem. Acts xiii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18; Gal. ii. 9, 12.

8. JAMES THE SERVANT OF GOD AND OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST. James i. 1.

Are these distinct personages, or are they the same person differently designated?

We reserve the question of the authorship of the Epistle for the present.

St. Paul identifies for us the Church officer at Jerusalem with the brother of the Lord; that is, No. 7 with No. 3 (see Gal. ii. 9 and 12 compared with i. 19).

If we may translate Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου, Judas the brother, rather than the son of James, we may conclude that 5 and 6 are identical. And that we may so translate it, is proved, if proof were needed, by Winer (Grammar of the Idioms of the N. T., translated by Agnew and Ebbecke, New York, 1850, § lxxvi.), by Hänlein (Handb. der Einl. in die Schriften des Neuen Test., ^f The reading Joseph may be disregarded. In Matt. xiii. 55, the Vatican Codex and the Codex Ephraemi read Ἰωσήφ; the Codex Bezae with seven other uncial MSS. read Ἰωάννης. In the Codex Sinaiticus Ἰωάννης was apparently first written, and this was changed into Ἰωσήφ by the first corrector. In Matt. xxvii. 56, Ἰωσήφ is found in Codex Bezae and the Codex Regius Parisiensis, and the Sinaitic MS. has Μαρία ἡ Ἰωσήφ for Ἰωσήφ μήτηρ. In Mark vi. 3, which is the parallel passage with Matt. xiii. 55, the Sinaitic and two cursive MSS. read Ἰωσήφ. In Mark xv. 40, which is the parallel passage with Matt. xxvii. 56, all the MSS. read Ἰωσήφος or Ἰωσή. It is evident that a scribe would be more likely to write the commoner name Ἰωσήφ in error than the rarer Ἰωσή. There is almost as much authority for Ἰωάννης as for Ἰωσήφ.

Erlangen, 1809), and by Arnaud (Recherches Critiques sur l'Épître de Jude, Strasbourg, 1851).

We may identify the James of whom Jude was brother with the Lord's brother; that is, Nos. 5 and 6 with No. 3, because we know that James the Lord's brother had a brother named Jude.

We may identify James the son of Mary with the Lord's brother; that is, No. 4 with No. 3, because James the son of Mary had a brother named Joses, and so also had James the Lord's brother.

Thus there remain two only, James the son of Alphaeus (No. 2), and James the brother of the Lord (No. 3). Can we, or can we not, identify them? This requires a longer consideration.

I. The Evangelists tell us—(1) that James called the Little and Joses were the sons of Mary (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40), which Mary was the wife of Clopas (John xix. 25); and St. John seems to tell us (but here his words are not free from ambiguity)^g that she was the sister of the Blessed Virgin. The Evangelists tell us—(2) that there were two brothers, James and Joses, who with two other brothers, Jude and Simon, and some sisters, lived at Nazareth with the Virgin Mary (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3). They tell us (3) that there were two brothers, James and Jude, who were Apostles. It would certainly be natural to think that we have here but one family of four brothers and three or more sisters, the children of Clopas and Mary, nephews and nieces of the Virgin Mary. There are difficulties, however, in the way of this conclusion. For (1) the four brethren in Matt. xiii. 55 are described as the brothers (ἀδελφοί) of JESUS, not as His cousins; (2) they are found living as at their home with the Virgin Mary, which seems unnatural if she were their aunt, their mother being, as we know, still alive; (3) James the Apostle is described as the son not of Clopas, but of Alphaeus; (4)

^g In John xix. 25, we read, "Now there stood by the cross of Jesus His mother, and His mother's sister, Mary the wife of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene." Probably it would not have been doubted that three women are here designated—1, the mother of our Lord; 2, her sister, Mary wife of Clopas; 3, Mary Magdalene—had it not been for the difficulty of two sisters being thus represented as bearing the same name of Mary. To obviate this difficulty, it has been suggested that four persons are intended—1, the mother of our Lord; 2, her sister; 3, Mary wife of Clopas; 4, Mary Magdalene; and the sister of St. Mary the Virgin is identified by some with Salome (see Kitto, Lange, Wieseler, Davidson, Meyer, Westcott, Plummer). But first it is not certain that the names of St. Mary the Virgin and of Mary the wife of Clopas were the same, the former being not universally indeed but most generally represented by the word Μαρίαν, the latter by Μαρία, where the difference in sound would be as great as that between our Marianne and Mary, and greater than that between Marlon and Mary (which might well be the name of two sisters); secondly, the improbability of two sisters, called perhaps after Miriam, bearing the same name, is far less than has been supposed (see MARY OF CLEOPHAS); and thirdly, Mary of Clopas and St. Mary may have been sisters, as being the wives of two brothers, Clopas and Joseph having been brothers according to the statement of Hegesippus, whose testimony Bishop Lightfoot "sees no reason for doubting," as he was a younger contemporary, "and is likely to have been well informed" (Dissertation appended to Epist. ad Galat.).

the "brethren of the Lord" (who are plainly James, Joses, Jude, and Simon) appear to be excluded from the Apostolic band by their declared unbelief in his Messiahship (John vii. 3-5) and by being formally distinguished from the disciples by the Gospel-writers (Matt. xii. 48; Mark iii. 33; John ii. 12; Acts i. 14); (5) James and Jude are not designated as the Lord's brethren in the lists of the Apostles; (6) Mary is designated as mother of James and Joses, whereas she would have been called mother of James and Jude, had James and Jude been Apostles, and Joses not an Apostle (Matt. xxvii. 46).

These are the six chief objections which may be made to the hypothesis of there being but one family of brethren named James, Joses, Jude, and Simon. The following answers may be given:—

Objection 1.—"They are called brethren." It is a sound rule of criticism that words are to be understood in their most simple and literal acceptation; but there is a limit to this rule. When greater difficulties are caused by adhering to the literal meaning of a word than by interpreting it more liberally, it is the part of the critic to interpret more liberally rather than to cling to the ordinary and literal meaning of a word. Now it is clearly not necessary to understand ἀδελφοί as "brothers" in the nearest sense of brotherhood. It need not mean more than relative (cp. LXX. Gen. xiii. 8, xiv. 14, xx. 12, xxix. 12, xxxi. 23; Lev. xxv. 48; Deut. ii. 8; Job xix. 13, xlii. 11; Xen. Cyrop. i. 5, § 47; Isocr. Paneg. 20; Plat. Phaed. 57, Crit. 16; see also Cic. ad Att. 15; Tac. Ann. iii. 38; Quint. Curt. vi. 10, § 34; comp. Suicer and Schleusner in voc.). But perhaps the circumstances of the case would lead us to translate it brethren? On the contrary, such a translation appears to produce very grave difficulties. For, first, it introduces two sets of first-cousins, two of them bearing the name of James, two of them that of Joses, without anything to show which are the sons of Clopas and Mary, and which are their cousins; and secondly, it drives us to take our choice between three doubtful and improbable hypotheses as to the parentage of this second James and Joses. There are three such hypotheses:—(a.) The Eastern hypothesis, that they were the children of Joseph by a former wife. This notion originated, according to Origen (on Matt. xiii. 55, Comment. in Matt. t. x. § 17, Op. t. iii. p. 463, in Pat. Gr. iii. 876 c), who adopts it, in the apocryphal Gospel of Peter. Through Origen, and through Epiphanius, who agreed with him (Adv. Haer. lib. i. t. iii. p. 115, Haer. xxviii. § 7, Pat. Gr. xli. 385), the notion was handed on to the later Greek Church. (b.) The Helvidian hypothesis, put forward at first by Bonosus, Helvidius, and Jovinian, and revived by Strauss and Herder in Germany, and by Davidson and Alford in England, that James, Joses, Jude, Simon, and the three sisters, were children of Joseph and Mary. This notion is opposed, whether rightly or wrongly, to the general sentiment of the Christian body in all ages of the Church; like the other two hypotheses, it creates two sets of cousins with the same name: it seems to be scarcely compatible with our Lord's recommending His mother to the care of

St. John at His own death (see Jerome, Op. tom. ii. p. 10); for if, as has been suggested, though with great improbability, her sons might at that time have been unbelievers (Blom, Disp. Theol. p. 67, Lugd. Bat.; Neander, Planting, &c., iv. 1; Davidson, Introd. to N. T. iii. 306, Lond. 1851), JESUS would have known that that unbelief was only to continue for a few days. The argument derived from the expression "first-born son," πρωτότοκος υἱος, in Luke ii. 7, is not now often urged, nor does the ἄνωγος ἕνεκεν of Matt. i. 25 necessarily imply the birth of after children (see Pearson, On the Creed, i. 304, ii. 220). (c.) The Levirate hypothesis may be passed by. It was a mere attempt made in the eleventh century to reconcile the Greek and Latin traditions by supposing that Joseph and Clopas being brothers, Joseph raised up seed to his dead brother (Theoph. in Matt. xiii. 56; Op. tom. i. p. 71, Pat. Gr. cxliiii. 293 A).

Objection 2.—"The four brothers and their sisters are always found living and moving about with the Virgin Mary." If they were the children of Clopas, the Virgin Mary was their aunt by blood or marriage. Her own husband would appear to have died at some time between A.D. 8 and A.D. 26. Nor have we any reason for believing Clopas to have been alive during our Lord's ministry. (We need not pause here to prove that the Cleophas of Luke xxiv. is an entirely different person and name from Clopas.) What difficulty is there in supposing that the two widowed sisters should have lived together, the more so as one of them had but one son, and he was often taken from her by his ministerial duties? And would it not be most natural that two families of first cousins thus living together should be popularly looked upon as one family, and spoken of as brothers and sisters instead of cousins? The same thing occurs commonly in our country villages.

Objection 3.—"James the Apostle is said to be the son of Alphaeus, not of Clopas." But Alphaeus and Clopas are the same name rendered into the Greek language in two different but ordinary and recognised ways, from the Aramaic ܐܢܘܢ or ܐܢܘܢ. (See Mill, Accounts of Our Lord's Brethren vindicated, &c., p. 236, who compares the two forms Clovis and Aloysius.)

Objection 4.—Dean Alford considers John vii. 5, compared with vi. 67-70, to decide that none of the brothers of the Lord were of the number of the Twelve (Proleg. to Ep. of James, G. T. iv. 88, and comm. in loc.). Dr. Plummer takes the same view (Camb. Gk. Test. 1882). If this verse, as Alford states, makes "the crowning difficulty" to the hypothesis of the identity of James the son of Alphaeus, the Apostle, with James the brother of the Lord, the difficulties are not too formidable to be overcome. Many of the disciples having left JESUS, St. Peter bursts out in the name of the Twelve with a warm expression of faith and love (vi. 67-70); and after that—very likely (see Greswell's Harmony) fully six months afterwards—the Evangelist states that "neither did His brethren believe on Him" (vii. 5). Does it follow from hence that all His brethren disbelieved? Let us compare other passages in Scripture. St.

Matthew and St. Mark state that the thieves railed on our Lord upon the cross. Are we therefore to disbelieve St. Luke, who says that one of the thieves was penitent, and did not rail? (Luke xxiii. 39, 40.) St. Luke and St. John say that the soldiers offered vinegar. Are we to believe that all did so? or, as St. Matthew and St. Mark tell us, that only one did it? (Luke xxiii. 36; John xix. 29; Mark xv. 36; Matt. xxvii. 48.) St. Matthew tells us that "His disciples" had indignation when Mary poured the ointment on the Lord's head. Are we to suppose this true of all? or of Judas Iscariot, and perhaps some others, according to John xii. 4 and Mark xiv. 4? It is not at all necessary to suppose that St. John is here speaking of all the brethren. If Josea, Simon, and the three sisters disbelieved, it would be quite sufficient ground for the statement of the Evangelist. The same may be said of Matt. xii. 47, Mark iii. 32, where it is reported to Him that His mother and His brethren, designated by St. Mark (iii. 21) as of παρ' αὐτοῦ, were standing without. Nor does it necessarily follow that the disbelief of the brethren was of such a nature that St. James and St. Jude, Apostles though they were, and vouched for half a year before by the warm-tempered St. Peter, could have had no share in it. "The phrase need not mean more," says Dr. Westcott, "than that they did not sacrifice to absolute trust in Him all the fancies and prejudices which they cherished as to Messiah's office" (Speaker's Commentary, 1880). With regard to John ii. 12, Acts i. 14, we may say that "His brethren" are no more excluded from the disciples in the first passage, and from the Apostles in the second, by being mentioned parallel with them, than St. Peter is excluded from the Apostolic band by the expression "the other Apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas" (1 Cor. ix. 5).

Objection 5.—"If the title of brethren of the Lord had belonged to SS. James and Jude, they would have been designated by it in the list of the Apostles." The omission of a title is so slight a ground for an argument that we may pass this by.

Objection 6.—That Mary the wife of Clopas should be designated by the title of Mary "the mother of James and Josea," to the exclusion of St. Jude, if SS. James and Jude were Apostles, appears to Dr. Davidson (Introd. to N. T., iii. 495) and to Dean Alford (Prolog. to Ep. of James, G. T., iv. 90) extremely improbable. There is no improbability in it, if Josea was, as would seem likely, an elder brother of St. Jude, and next in order to St. James.^b

II. We have hitherto argued that the hypothesis which most naturally accounts for the facts of Holy Scripture is that of the identity of St. James the Little, the Apostle, with St. James the Lord's brother. We have also argued that the six main objections to this view are not valid, inasmuch as they may either be altogether met, or at best throw us back on other hypotheses which create greater difficulties than that under consideration. We proceed to point out some further confirmations of our original hypothesis.

^b [The opposite view that St. James was the real brother of our Lord is maintained by Dr. Farrar in the art. BROTHER, p. 461, and with great learning by Mr. Mayor in the Introduction to his ed. of the Ep. of St. James, Lond. 1892.—THE EDITORS.]

1. It would be unnatural that St. Luke, in a list of twelve persons, in which the name of James twice occurred, with its distinguishing patronymic, should describe one of the last persons on his list as brother to "James," without any further designation to distinguish him, unless he meant the James whom he had just before named. The James whom he had just before named is the son of Alphaeus; the person designated by his relationship to him is Jude. We have reason therefore for regarding Jude as the brother of the son of Alphaeus; on other grounds (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3) we have reason for regarding him as the brother of the Lord: therefore we have reason for regarding the son of Alphaeus as the brother of the Lord.

2. It would be unnatural that St. Luke, after having recognised only two Jameses throughout his Gospel and down to the twelfth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, and having in that chapter narrated the death of one of them (James the son of Zebedee), should go on in the same and following chapters to speak of "James," meaning thereby not the other James, with whom alone his readers are acquainted, but a different James not yet mentioned by him.

3. St. James is represented throughout the Acts as exercising great authority among, or even over, Apostles (Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18): and in St. Paul's Epistles he is placed before even Cephas and John, and declared to be a pillar of the Church with them (Gal. ii. 9-12). It is more likely that an Apostle would hold such a position, than one who had not been a believer till after the Resurrection.

4. St. Paul says (Gal. i. 19), "Other of the Apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother" (Ἄλλων δὲ τῶν ἀποστόλων οὐκ εἶδον εἰ μὴ Ἰάκωβον τὸν ἀδελφὸν τοῦ Κυρίου). This passage seems to assert distinctly that James the Lord's brother was an Apostle—and if so, he was identical with the son of Alphaeus—but it cannot be taken as an incontrovertible statement to that effect, for it is possible that ἀπόστολος may be used in the looser sense (Meyer), though this is not agreeable with the line of defence which St. Paul is here maintaining, viz. that he had received his commission from God, and not from the Twelve (see Thorndike, i. p. 5, Orf. 1844). And again, εἰ μὴ may qualify the whole sentence, and not only the word ἀποστόλων (Mayerdorff, Hist. krit. Einleit. in die Petrin. Schr. p. 52, Hamb. 1833; Neander, Michaelis, Winer, Alford, Davidson). Still this is not often, if ever, the case, when εἰ μὴ follows ἔρερον (Schneckenburger, Adnot. ad Epist. Jac. perpet. p. 144, Stuttg. 1832: see also Winer, Grammatik, 5th ed., p. 647, and Meyer, comm. ad loc.); and if St. Paul had not intended to include St. James among the Apostles, we should rather have expected the singular ἀπόστολον than the plural τῶν ἀποστόλων (Arnaud, Recherches, &c.). The more natural interpretation of the verse would be that which includes James among the Twelve, identifying him with the son of Alphaeus; but, as we have said, such a conclusion does not necessarily follow. Compare, however, this verse with Acts ix. 27, and the probability is increased by several degrees. St. Luke there asserts that St. Barnabas brought Paul to the Apostles, πρὸς τοὺς ἀποστόλους. St. Paul, as we have seen, asserts that during that visit to Jerusalem he saw St. Peter, and none other of the Apostles, save St. James the Lord's brother. SS. Peter and James, then, were the two Apostles to whom St. Barnabas brought St. Paul. Of course, it may be said here also that ἀπόστολοι is used in its lax sense; but it appears to be a more natural conclusion that James the Lord's brother was one of the Twelve Apostles, being identical with James the son of Alphaeus, or James the Little.

III. We must now turn from Scripture to the early testimony of uninspired writers. Here we find four hypotheses—the Hegesippian, the Apocryphal, the Hieronymian, the Helvidian. 1. The Hegesippian, so called after Hegesippus, a Hebrew Christian born about A.D. 100, represents Joseph and Clopas (or Alphaeus) as brothers. Joseph's wife, St. Mary, and Clopas' wife, Mary, were therefore sisters-in-law. James, Josés, Jude, and Simon were the children of Clopas and Mary, nephews and nieces of Joseph, and first cousins of our Lord. Hegesippus states in direct terms that Symeon or Simon, the second Bishop of Jerusalem, was the cousin (ἀνεψίος) of the Lord because son of Clopas, who was His uncle (θελού), and he speaks of Jude not as the brother but as the so-called brother of our Lord (τοῦ κατὰ σάρκα λεγομένου αὐτοῦ ἀδελφοῦ: Euseb. Hist. Eccl. iii. 20, 32, iv. 22). The genealogy according to this hypothesis would be as follows:—

On this hypothesis James the brother of our Lord and James the son of Alphaeus are the same person, being the first cousin of JESUS on the paternal side.

2. The Apocryphal or Origenistic or Epiphianian hypothesis, called Epiphianian by Bishop Lightfoot from its having been warmly advocated by Epiphanius, bishop of Constantia in Cyprus, in the year 367, but better called Apocryphal because originating with the Apocryphal Gospels,¹ or Origenistic because transported from them into the Church by Origen A.D. 250. This represents James, Josés, Jude, Simon, and the sisters to be the children of Joseph by a former wife, and to be called brethren of the Lord in the same way that Joseph was called His father. The genealogy on this hypothesis is—

Epiphanius adds to this genealogical tree by recognising Joseph and Clopas as brothers, sons of Jacob, son of Panther. On this hypothesis, James the brother of our Lord and James the son of Alphaeus were different persons, not related to one another, so far as we are informed by the Apocryphal Gospels, but according to Epiphanius cousins, one of them being the son, the other the nephew, of Joseph.

3. The Hieronymian hypothesis, so called because warmly advocated by St. Jerome, A.D. 382. This represents James, Josés, Jude, Simon, and their sisters to be the children of Mary the sister of St. Mary, and therefore nephews and nieces of St. Mary and first cousins of our Lord on the maternal side. The genealogy on this hypothesis is—

On this hypothesis James the brother of the Lord and James the son of Alphaeus are the same person, being the first cousins of JESUS on the mother's side.

4. The Helvidian hypothesis, so called from Helvidius, who advocated it in a book published about A.D. 380. This represents James, Josés, Jude, Simon, and their sisters to be the children of Joseph and Mary, younger brothers and sisters of JESUS. The genealogy on this hypothesis is—

On this hypothesis, James was real brother to JESUS, and James the son of Alphaeus was no relation to him, so far as we know.

We have to consider with regard to these hypotheses: 1. Which of them is beset with fewest objections and solves most difficulties. 2. What authority they each stand on. We have already argued that the hypothesis which makes James to be the first cousin of our Lord (whether paternal or maternal matter: not for the present) is freer from objections than that which makes him His brother, whether as the child of Joseph by a former marriage, or as the child of Joseph and Mary. We have now to consider the authority which can be claimed for each of the four hypotheses.

The Helvidian hypothesis is first found in Tertullian, if it is found there. Tertullian's words are ambiguous (de Carne Christi, 7, 23; de Monogam. 8; adv. Marc. iv. 19); but as Jerome does not repudiate Helvidius' statement that Tertullian entertained his view, merely saying that he was not a Churchman (adv. Helvid. 17), it is to be supposed that Helvidius was justified in claiming him. Next it was maintained by the Antidicomarianites in Arabia about A.D. 375 (Epiphian. Haeres. 78, 79). Thirdly, it was urged for controversial reasons by Bonosus in Macedonia, and by Helvidius and Jovinian in Italy about the year 380.

The Hieronymian hypothesis rests on the authority of Jerome,¹ who wrote at once against

Helvidius and the Apocryphal hypothesis about the year 382; of Augustine, A.D. 354-430, (contr. Faust. xxii. 35); of Chrysostom, A.D. 347-407 (in Gal. i. 19); and of Theodoret, A.D. 386-458. The weight of the authority of such great names as Augustine and Chrysostom is sought to be lightened by a supposition that they accepted Jerome's view; they may have accepted it, but in that case they must have considered themselves right in doing so, after an examination of the question into which they would have been led by the perusal of his treatise. Theodoret not only adopts the Hieronymian theory, but in set terms rejects the other. The Western Church in general accepted Jerome's view.

The Apocryphal, Origenistic, or Epiphianian hypothesis originated with the Apocryphal Gospels of the second and third centuries—the Gospel of Peter, the Protevangelium, and the rest—all of which show a desire of exhibiting Joseph as an old man at the time of his marriage, lest a doubt or a slur should be thrown on St. Mary's virginity. These Apocryphal statements were taken over and planted within the Church's borders at the end of the third century by Origen. "Some persons," he says, "on the ground of a tradition in the Gospel according to Peter, as it is entitled, or the Book of James (i.e. the Protevangelium), say that the brothers of Jesus were Joseph's sons by a former wife, to whom he was married before Mary. Those who held this view wish to preserve the honour of Mary in virginity throughout . . . And I think it reasonable that as JESUS was the first-fruit of purity and chastity among men, so Mary was among women; for it is not seemly to ascribe the first-fruit of virginity to any other woman but her" (in Matt. xiii. 55, Lightfoot's translation). Thus we see that a statement up to this time confined to those early heretics whose chief object it was to magnify St. Mary, was adopted by Origen, not on the ground of its according with the Church tradition or with Scripture, but because it was "seemly" to ascribe perpetual virginity to St. Mary, and this appeared to be the way to do it. After Origen we find the Apostolical Constitutions (vi. 12) and Victorinus the Philosopher (in Gal. i. 19, apud Maii Script. Vet. nov. coll. Romae, 1828) distinguishing between the brother of the Lord and the Apostle. Hilary of Poitiers accepts the Apocryphal view, A.D. 368 (Comm. in Matt. i. 1). So apparently does Ambrosiaster, about the year 375. Gregory Nyssen at the end of the fourth century follows in the same track, and tries to account for the second pair of Jameses and Josepes (the sons of Mary of Clopas) by identifying their mother Mary with St. Mary, called their mother because she was their stepmother (Op. tom. ii. p. 844, Paris, 1618). Epiphanius' treatise was written against the Antidicomarianites about the year 375. It is for the most part a bald reproduction of the Apocryphal legends, to which he makes some additions from "the traditions of the Jews," and combines with both of these the Church tradition, derived no doubt from Hegesippus, that Clopas and Joseph were brothers, children of Jacob, whom he represents (again from Apocryphal sources) as the son of Panther. He further states in one place that the names of the sisters were Mary and Anna, and in another that they were Mary and Salome. St. Ambrose,

A.D. 382, doubtfully accedes to the Epiphianian view (de Inst. Virg.; Op. tom. ii. p. 260, ed. Din.), which is also supported by Cyril of Alexandria at the beginning of the fifth century (Glaph. in Gen. vii.), and became the generally accepted view of the Oriental Church.

The Hegesippian hypothesis rests on the authority of Hegesippus, and Hegesippus' evidence on this point is such as to outweigh that of all those that have been quoted. In date he is the earliest witness, having probably been a younger contemporary of the sons of Clopas, being born about the year 100; his means of information were infinitely superior to those of others, as he was a Palestinian converted Jew; he had no purpose to serve, like the writers of the Apocryphal Gospels, who are the authors of the Origenistic or Epiphianian hypothesis; and his statement contains within it only one difficulty, namely, that two women should be called by St. John sisters because they were the wives of two brothers. This difficulty, if it be one, is as nothing compared with the difficulty on one side of two sisters bearing the same or nearly the same name, which the Hieronymian hypothesis requires, and, on the other side, of there being two pairs of Jameses and Josepes, which the Apocryphal and the Helvidian hypotheses alike make necessary.* Clement of Alexandria, A.D. 200, has been claimed as a supporter of the Epiphianian view, but he is quoted by Eusebius as saying that "there are two Jameses, one the Just who was thrown down from the pinnacle and beaten to death by a fuller's pole, and another who was beheaded" (Hypotyposis, vii. apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 1). The word used for "are" in that sentence is not merely the copula, but it is γενόμενοι. The writer therefore must have held that there were only two Jameses in all, and in that case the son of Alphaeus and the brother of the Lord must have been identical. It is possible that the passage may be a comment of Eusebius on Clement rather than Clement's own, and this was the opinion of Bishop Pearson (Lect. iv. in Acta Apost., Minor Theol. Works, p. 150, Oxf. 1844), though Bishop Lightfoot is doubtful on the point. Whoever wrote it—that is, either Clement or Eusebius—must be regarded as a supporter of one or other of the two theories which identify the two Jameses. It must be allowed that after Hegesippus himself, the Hegesippian view is not found in its developed form. But this is what might not unreasonably have been expected. For with Hegesippus' generation the memory of the relationship between Joseph and Clopas perished, nor were Hegesippus' writings sufficiently well known to keep it alive.

* Hegesippus is sometimes represented as inconsistent with himself, or as not identifying Clopas and Alphaeus, because he uses the expression "The Church was committed, in conjunction with the Apostles (μετὰ τῶν Ἀποστόλων), to the charge of the Lord's brother James." Here, it is argued, he distinguishes James the brother of the Lord from the Apostle, and therefore he could not have regarded him as the son of Alphaeus, who is acknowledged to be an Apostle. This, however, is not so; for, as Bishop Lightfoot admits, "from this passage no inference can be safely drawn; for, supposing the term 'Apostles' to be here restricted to the Twelve, the expression μετὰ τῶν Ἀποστόλων may distinguish St. James not from but among the Apostles, as in Acta v. 29, 'Peter and the Apostles.'" (Dissertation.)

Room was thus made for the other theories, each of which may be regarded as the product of ingenious minds seeking to account for the statement of Scripture after the clue supplied by Hegesippus was lost. We rank them in the following order in respect to the degree of probability attaching to them:—1. The Hege-sippian. 2. The Hieronymian. 3. The Helvidian. 4. The Apocryphal.

English theological writers have been divided almost equally into those that hold, and those that deny, the identity of the son of Alphaeus and the brother of our Lord, with, however, a preference on the whole for the first hypothesis. See, for example, Hooker, Ecol. Pol. vii. 4, 2, Oxf. 1836; Cosin, Notes, Works, v. p. 198, Oxf. 1855; Lardner, vi. 495, Lond. 1788; Pearson, Minor Works, i. 350, Oxf. 1844, and On the Creed, i. 308, ii. 224, Oxf. 1833; Thorndike, Works, i. 5, Oxf. 1844; Horne, Introd. to H. S. iv. 427, Lond. 1834; Wordsworth, Greek Test. Lond. 1868; Scott, in the Speaker's Commentary, N. T. iv. 112, Lond. 1881; PUNCHARD, in Ellicott's New Testament Commentary, iii. 352—who are in favour of the identity. On the same side are the elder Lightfoot, Witsius, Lampe, Baumgarten, Semler, Gabler, Eichhorn, Hug, Bertholdt, Guericke, Schneckenburger, Meier, Steiger, Hengstenberg, Gieseler, Theile, Lange. On the other hand, Hammond (On Schism, p. 231, Oxf. 1839), Jeremy Taylor (Episcopacy Asserted, § 13, Works, v. p. 50, Lond. 1849), Nelson (Fasts and Festivals, p. 191, Lond. 1805), Bishop Thos. Wilson (Notes on St. James, Works, vi. p. 673, Oxf. 1859), Cave (Life of St. James), Bishop Lightfoot (Epistle to the Galatians, p. 252, Lond. 1884), are in favour of their being distinct persons, with Vossius, Basnage, Valesius, Grotius, and Olshausen. The Helvidian theory is held by Dr. Davidson (Intr. N. T. vol. iii.) and by Dean Alford (Greek Test. iv. 87), with Herder, Bleek, Blom, Schaff, Mayer, Wieseler, Laurent.

The chief treatises on the subject are Blom's De τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς et ταῖς ἀδελφαῖς τοῦ Κυρίου, Leyden, 1839; Dr. Philip Schaff's Das Verhältniss des Jakobus Bruders des Herrn zu Jakobus Alphai, Berlin, 1842, with which however must be compared the same author's Hist. of the Apost. Ch. vol. ii. p. 35, Edinb. 1854, modifying his previous view; Wieseler, Studien u. Kritiken: Ueber die Brüder des Herrn, 1842, p. 71; Dr. Mill's Accounts of our Lord's brethren vindicated, Cambridge, 1843; Alford, as above referred to; Lange's article in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche, Stuttgart, 1856; Schneckenburger's Annotatio ad Epist. Jac. perpetua, Stuttgart, 1832; Arnaud's Recherches Critiques sur l'Épître de Jude, Strasbourg, 1851; Bishop Lightfoot's Dissertation on the Brethren of the Lord appended to the Epistle to the Galatians, Lond. 1884.

Had we not identified James the son of Alphaeus with the brother of the Lord, we should have but little to write of him. When we had said that his name appears twice in the catalogue of the Twelve Apostles, our history of him would be complete. In like manner the early history of the Lord's brother would be confined to the fact that he lived and moved from place to place with his brothers and sisters, and with the Virgin Mary.

JAMES THE LITTLE, THE SON OF ALPHAEUS, THE BROTHER OF THE LORD.—Of James' father

Ἰσίδωρος, rendered by St. Matthew and St. Mark Alphaeus (Ἀλφαῖος), and by St. John Clopas (Κλωπᾶς), we know only (1) that, according to the testimony of Hegesippus (who was likely to be fully informed) and of Epiphanius (who probably retained the ancient tradition on the point and reproduced it, though giving no support to the theory that he was advocating), he was the brother of Joseph and son of Jacob; (2) that he married a Mary, who was either sister by blood to the Virgin Mary, or was regarded as her sister because the two women had married two brothers; (3) that he had by her four sons and three or more daughters. He appears to have died before the commencement of our Lord's ministry, and after his death it would seem that his wife and St. Mary, a widow like herself, and in poor circumstances, lived together in one house, generally at Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 55), but sometimes also at Capernaum (John ii. 12) and Jerusalem (Acts i. 14). It is probable that these cousins (or, as they were usually called, brothers and sisters) of the Lord were older than Himself; as on one occasion we find them, with His mother, indignantly declaring that He was beside Himself, and going out to "lay hold on Him" and compel Him to moderate His zeal in preaching, at least sufficiently "to eat bread" (Mark iii. 20, 21, 31). This looks like the conduct of elders towards one younger than themselves.

Of St. James individually we know nothing till the spring of the year 28, when we find him, together with his younger brother St. Jude, called to the Apostolate. It has been noticed that in all the four lists of the Apostles St. James holds the same place, heading perhaps the third class, consisting of himself, Jude, Simon, and Iscariot; as St. Philip heads the second class, consisting of himself, Bartholomew, Thomas, and Matthew; and Simon Peter the first, consisting of himself, Andrew, James, and John (Alford, in Matt. x. 2). The fact of St. Jude being described by reference to St. James (Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου: that is, "James' St. Jude") shows the name and reputation which St. James had, either at the time of the calling of the Apostles or at the time when St. Luke wrote.

It is not likely (though far from impossible) that SS. James and Jude took part with their brothers and sisters and the Virgin Mary, in trying "to lay hold on" JESUS in the autumn of the same year (Mark iii. 21); and it is likely that it is of the other brothers and sisters, without these two, that St. John says, "Neither did His brethren believe on Him" (John vii. 5), in the autumn of A.D. 29; but the unbelief here attributed to the brethren was not of such a nature as to make it impossible for Apostles to have participated in it. "They ventured to advise and urge when Faith would have been content to wait" (Westcott).

We hear no more of St. James till after the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. At some time in the forty days that intervened between the Resurrection and the Ascension the Lord appeared to him. This is not related by the Evangelists, but it is mentioned by St. Paul (1 Cor. xv. 7); and there never has been any doubt that it was to this St. James rather than to the son of Zebedee that the manifestation was vouchsafed. We may conjecture that it was for the purpose of strengthening him for the high position which he was soon to assume in Jerusalem, and of giving him the instructions on "the things pertaining to the kingdom of God" (Acts i. 3) which were necessary for his guidance, that the Lord thus showed Himself to James.² We cannot fix the date of this appearance. It was probably only a few days before the Ascension; after which we find SS. James, Jude, and the rest of the Apostles, together with the Virgin Mary, St. Simon, and St. Joseph, in Jerusalem, awaiting in faith and prayer the outpouring of the Pentecostal gift.

Again we lose sight of St. James for ten years, and when he appears once more it is in a far higher position than any that he has yet held. In the year 37 occurred the conversion of Saul. Three years after his conversion he paid his first visit to Jerusalem, but the Christians recollected what they had suffered at his hands, and feared to have anything to do with him. St. Barnabas, at this time of far higher reputation than himself, took him by the hand, and introduced him to St. Peter and St. James (Acts ix. 27; Gal. i. 18, 19), and by their authority he was admitted into the society of the Christians, and allowed to associate freely with them during the fifteen days of his stay. Here we find St. James on a level with St. Peter, and with him deciding on the admission of St. Paul into fellowship with the Church at Jerusalem; and from henceforth we always find him equal, or in his own department superior, to the very chiefest Apostles, SS. Peter, John, and Paul. For by this time he had been appointed (at what exact date we know not) to preside over the infant Church in its most important centre, in a position equivalent to that of Bishop. This pre-eminence is evident throughout the after history of the Apostles, whether we read it in the Acts, in the Epistles, or in ecclesiastical writers. Thus in the year 44, when Peter is released from prison, he desires that information of his escape may be given to "James, and to the brethren" (Acts xii. 17). In the year 49 he presides at the Apostolic Council, and delivers the judgment of the Assembly, with the expression δὲ δὲ ἄλλοι ἀπὸ τῶν ἀποστόλων (Acts xv. 13, 19; see St. Chrys. in loc.). In the same year (or perhaps in the year 51, on his fourth visit to Jerusalem) St. Paul recognises James as one of the pillars of the Church, together with Cephas and John (Gal. ii. 9), and places his name before them both. Shortly afterwards it is "certain who came from James," that is, from the mother-Church of Jerusalem, designated by the name of its Bishop, who lead St. Peter into tervergisation at Antioch. And in the year 57 St. Paul pays a formal visit to St. James in the presence of all his presbyters, after having been previously welcomed with joy the day before by the brethren in an unofficial manner (Acts xxi. 18).

Entirely accordant with these notices of Scripture is the universal testimony of Christian antiquity to the high office held by St. James in the Church of Jerusalem. That he was formally appointed Bishop of Jerusalem by the Lord Himself, as reported by Epiphanius (Hæres. lxxviii.), Chrysostom (Hom. xi. in 1 Cor. vii.), Proclus of Constantinople (de Trad. Div. Liturg.), and Photius (Ep. 157), is not certain. Eusebius follows this account in a passage of his history, but says elsewhere that he was appointed by the Apostles (Hist. Eccl. ii. 23). Clement of Alexandria is the first author who speaks of his episcopate (Hypotyposis, Bk. vi. ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 1), and he alludes to it as a thing of which the chief Apostles, SS. Peter, James, and John, might well have been ambitious. The same Clement reports that the Lord, after His Resurrection, delivered the gift of knowledge to St. James the Just, to St. John, and to St. Peter, who delivered it to the rest of the Apostles,³ and they to the Seventy. This at least shows the estimation in which St. James was held. The author to whom we are chiefly indebted for an account of the life and death of St. James is Hegesippus. His narrative gives us such an insight into the position of St. James in the Church of Jerusalem that it is best to let him relate it in his own words:—

Tradition respecting James, as given by Hegesippus.—"With the Apostles, James the brother of the Lord succeeds to the charge of the Church—that James who has been called Just from the time of the Lord to our own days, for there were many of the name of James. He was holy from his mother's womb; he drank not wine or strong drink, nor did he eat animal food; a razor came not upon his head; he did not anoint himself with oil; he did not use the bath. He alone might go into the holy place; for he wore no woollen clothes, but linen. And alone he used to go into the Temple, and there he was commonly found upon his knees, praying for forgiveness for the people, so that his knees grew dry and thin [generally translated hard] like a camel's, from his constantly bending them in prayer, and entreating forgiveness for the people. On account therefore of his exceeding righteousness he was called 'Just' and 'Oblias,' which means in Greek 'the bulwark of the people,' and 'righteousness,' as the prophets declare of him. Some of the seven sects then that I have mentioned enquired of him, 'What is the door of Jesus?' And he said that this man was the Saviour, wherefore some believed that Jesus is the Christ. Now the forementioned sects did not believe in the Resurrection, nor in the coming of One Who shall recompense every man according to his works; but all who became believers believed through James. When many therefore of the rulers believed, there was a disturbance among the Jews, and Scribes, and Pharisees, saying, 'There is a risk that the whole people will expect Jesus to be the Christ.' They came together therefore to James, and said, 'We pray thee, stop the people, for they have gone astray after Jesus as though He were the Christ. We pray thee to persuade all that come to the Passover concerning Jesus: for we all give heed to thee, for we and all the people testify to thee that thou art just, and acceptest not the person of man. Persuade the people therefore not to go astray about Jesus, for the whole people and all of us give heed to thee. Stand therefore on the gable of the Temple, that thou mayest be visible, and that thy words may be heard by all the people; for all the tribes and even the Gentiles are come together for the Passover.' Therefore the forementioned Scribes and Pharisees placed James upon the gable of the Temple, and cried out to him, and said, 'O Just one, to whom we ought all to give heed, seeing that the people are going astray after Jesus who was crucified, tell us what is the door of Jesus?' And he answered with a loud voice, 'Why ask ye me about Jesus the Son of Man? He sits in heaven on the right hand of great power, and will come on the clouds of heaven.' And many were convinced and gave glory to the testimony of James, crying, Hosannah to the Son of David! Whereupon the same Scribes and Pharisees said to each other, 'We have done ill in bringing forward such a witness to Jesus; but let us go up, and throw him down, that they may be terrified, and not believe on him.' And they cried out, saying, 'Oh! oh! even the Just is gone astray.' And they fulfilled that which is written in Isaiah, 'Let us take away the just man, for he is displeasing to us; therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their deeds.' They went up, therefore, and threw down the Just one, and said to one another, 'Let us stone James the Just.' And they began to stone him, for he was not killed by the fall; but he turned round, and knelt down, and cried, 'I beseech thee, Lord God Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.' And whilst they were stoning him, one of the priests, of the sons of Rechab, a son of the Rechabites to whom Jeremiah the prophet bears testimony, cried out and said, 'Stop! What are you about? The Just one is praying for you!' Then one of them, who was a fuller, took the club with which he pressed the clothes, and brought it down on the head of the Just one. And so he bore his witness. And they buried him on the spot by the Temple, and the column still remains by the Temple. This man was a true witness to Jews and Greeks that Jesus is the Christ. And immediately Vespasian commended the siege" (Euseb. ii. 23, and Routh, Rel. Sacr. p. 208, Oxf. 1846).

For the difficulties which occur in this extract, reference may be made to Routh's Reliquiae Sacrae (vol. i. p. 228), and to Stanley's Apostolical Age (p. 319, Oxf. 1847). It represents St. James to us in his life and in his death more vividly than any modern words could picture him. We see him, a married man perhaps (1 Cor. ix. 5), but a rigid and ascetic follower after righteousness, keeping the Nazarene rule, like Anna the prophetess (Luke ii. 37), servicing the Lord in the Temple "with fastings and prayers night and day," regarded by the Jews themselves as one who had attained to the sanctity of the priesthood, though not of the priestly family or tribe, and as the very type of what a righteous or just man ought to be. If any man could have converted the Jews as a nation to Christianity, it would have been St. James.

Josephus' narrative of his death is apparently somewhat different. He says that in the interval between the death of Festus and the coming of Albinus, Ananus the high-priest assembled the Sanhedrin, and "brought before it James the brother of him who is called Christ, and some others, and, having charged them with breaking the laws, delivered them over to be stoned." But if we are to reconcile this statement with that of Hegeippus, we must suppose that they were not actually stoned on this occasion. The historian adds that the better part of the citizens disliked what was done, and complained of Ananus to Agrippa and Albinus, whereupon Albinus threatened to punish him for having assembled the Sanhedrin without his consent, and Agrippa deprived him of the high-priesthood (Ant. xx. 9, § 1). The words "brother of him who is called Christ," are judged by LeClerc, Lardner, &c., to be spurious.

Epiphanius gives the same account that Hegeippus does in somewhat different words, having evidently copied it for the most part from him. He adds a few particulars which are probably mere assertions or conclusions of his own (Haeres. xxix. 4, and lxxviii. 13). Considering St. James to have been the son of Joseph by a former wife, he calculates that he must have been 96 years old at the time of his death; and adds, on the authority, as he says, of Eusebius, Clement, and others, that he wore the πέτραλον on his forehead, in which he perhaps confounds him with St. John (Polyer. apud Euseb. Hist. Eccl. v. 24. But see Valesius' note on Eusebius l. c., and Cotta, de lam. pont. App. Joan. Jac. et Marci, Tub. 1755).

Gregory of Tours reports that he was buried, not where he fell, but on the Mount of Olives,* in a tomb in which he had already buried Zacharias and Simeon (De glor. Mart. i. 27). Eusebius tells us that his chair was preserved down to his time; on which see Heinichen's Excursus (Exc. xi. ad Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 19, vol. iv. p. 957, ed. Burton).

* The monument—part excavation, part edifice—which is now commonly known as the "Tomb of St. James," is on the east side of the so-called Valley of Jehoshaphat, and therefore at a considerable distance from the spot on which the Apostle was killed, which the narrative of Hegeippus would seem to fix as somewhere under the south-east corner of the wall of the Haram, or perhaps further down the slope nearer the "Fountain of the Virgin." [EN-NOGEL.] It cannot at any rate be said to stand "by the Temple." The tradition about the monument in question is that St. James took refuge there after the capture of Christ, and remained, eating and drinking nothing, until our Lord appeared to him on the day of His Resurrection (see Quaresmius, Terrae Sanctae Elucidatio, 1639, lib. iv. cc. 10, 11, t. ii. 258, quoted in Titus Tobler, Die Siloahquelle u. der Oelberg, 1852, p. 299). The legend of his death there seems to be first mentioned by Maundeville (A.D. 1320: see Early Trav. p. 176). By the old travellers it is often called the "Church of St. James."

We must add a strange Talmudic legend, which appears to relate to James. It is found in the Midrash Koheleth, or Commentary on Ecclesiastes, and also in the Tract Abodah Zarah of the Jerusalem Talmud. It is as follows: "R. Eliezer, the son of Dama, was bitten by a serpent; and there came to him Jacob, a man of Capher Secama, to heal him by the name of Jesu the son of Pandera; but R. Ismael suffered him not, saying, 'That is not allowed thee, son of Dama.' He answered, 'Suffer me, and I will produce an authority against thee that it is lawful;' but he could not produce the authority before he expired. And what was the authority?—This: 'Which if a man do, he shall live in them' (Lev. xviii. 5). But it is not said that he shall die in them." The son of Pandera is the name that the Jews have always given to our Lord, when representing Him as a magician. The name of Panther is given in Epiphanius (Hæres. lxxviii.) to the grandfather of Joseph, and by John Damascene (de Fide Orth. iv. 15) to the grandfather of Joachim, the supposed father of the Virgin Mary. For the identification of James of Secama (a place in Upper Galilee) with James the Just, see Dr. W. H. Mill (Historic. Criticism of the Gospel, pp. 225, 360, Camb. ed. 1861). The short passage quoted by Origen and Eusebius as from Josephus, which speaks of the death of James being one of the causes of the destruction of Jerusalem, is not now found in that author, and seems to be spurious (Orig. in Matt. xiii. 55; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 23).

It is possible that there may be a reference to James in Heb. xiii. 7 (see Theodoret in loc.), which would fix his death at some time previous to the writing of that Epistle. His apprehension by Ananus was probably about the year 62 or 63 (Lardner, Pearson, Mill, Whitby, Le Clerc, Tillemont). There is nothing to fix the date of his martyrdom as narrated by Hege-sippus, except that it must have been shortly before the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem. We may conjecture that he was between 70 and 80 years old.^p [F. M.]

JAMES, GENERAL EPISTLE OF.

I. Title.—The Epistles of SS. James, Peter, John, Jude, were known under the name of the Seven Catholic Epistles, by the end of the third century. Eusebius, A.D. 287, speaks of St. James's Epistle as "the first of those that bear the name of Catholic Epistles," and states that those Epistles were seven in number, describing them as "the Seven that are called Catholic" (Hist. Eccl. ii. 23). St. Athanasius in his Catalogue of the Books of the Bible contained in his 39th Festal Letter, written A.D. 365, in like manner speaks of "those that are called the Catholic Epistles of the Apostles, seven in number." Gregory of Nazianzus, A.D. 328, and his contemporary Amphilochius, use a similar expression. Cyril of Jerusalem, who is of about the same date, in giving his Catalogue of the Books of the Bible, writes, "The Seven Catholic Epis-ties of James, and Peter, and John, and Jude" (Catech. Lect. iv. 36). The same list was appended to the Canons of the Council of Laodicea held A.D. 363. Didymus of Alexandria wrote a Commentary on the "Seven Catholic Epistles" about A.D. 350, and Euthalius about a century later. Before the number Seven was fixed as that of the Catholic Epistles, the name Catholic was applied to one or more of them. Origen speaks of "the Catholic Epistle of John," "the Catholic Epistle of Peter," "the Catholic Epistle of Jude;" and his pupil Dionysius, of "the Catholic Epistle of John" (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vii. 25).

What was meant by the term Catholic, whether applied to the Seven Epistles or to any one of them, is rightly explained by Leontius of Byzantium towards the end of the sixth century, when he says, "They are called Catholic or General, because they are not written to one nation, as those of St. Paul, but generally to all" (de Sectis, ii.). Oecumenius in like manner in the tenth century says: "They are called Catholic as being encyclical, for they are not addressed particularly to one nation or city, but generally (καθόλου) to the faithful (Exp. in septem illas quæ Catholicæ dicuntur Epistolæ: in Jac. i. p. 115, Frankf. 1610). The Catholic Epistles follow the Acts in the Alexandrine and Vatican Codices, preceding the Epistles of St. Paul. In the Sinaitic MS. they also follow the Acts, the Epistles of St. Paul being placed before the Acts. The Apostolical Constitutions appear to include the Catholic Epistles with the Acts of the Apostles, under the simple name of the Acts (Const. ii. 57). They are also joined with the Acts by Philastrius, bishop of Bræcia, in the middle of the fourth century, in his treatise on Heresies (Hæres. lxxxviii.); and in the Karkaphensian Syrian Version, at the conclusion of the Catholic Epistles, come the words "The end of the Acts." This close connexion is probably owing to the general or catholic character of James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1 John, and Jude. The authorship of 2 and 3 John (when it came to be acknowledged) was sufficient to cause those Epistles to be classed with 1 John as Catholic, though in their case the word is used with some inexactness.

Origen's title for St. James's Epistle is ἡ φερομένη ἱακώβου ἐπιστολή (Comm. in Joan.), where there is a question whether φερομένη means "ascribed to" (as it probably does), or "current." Eusebius in like manner calls it ἡ λεγομένη ἱακώβου ἐπιστολή (Hist. Eccl. iii. 25).

II. Author.—There are, as we have argued, only two Jameses in the New Testament, James the son of Zebedee and James the son of Alphaeus or Clopas, known as James the Just, and called the brother of the Lord, being his first cousin. The author of the Epistle must be one or other of these two, unless he is an unknown James (Luther); the likelihood of which last hypothesis falls to the ground as soon as the canonical character of the Epistle is admitted. James the son of Zebedee could not have written it, because the date of his death, only seven years after the martyrdom of Stephen, does not give time for the growth of a sufficient number of Jewish Christians, "scattered abroad." External evidence (see Euseb. Hist. Eccl. ii. 23; Alford, Greek Test. iv. p. 23) and internal evidence (see Stanley, Apost. Age, p. 292) point unmistakably to James the Just as the writer, to whom the care of the Jewish Christians, whether residing at Jerusalem or living scattered among the Gentiles, and only visiting that city from time to time, especially belonged in his character of Bishop of Jerusalem.

Authenticity.—In the third book of his Ecclesiastical History, where Eusebius makes his well-known division of the books, or pretended books, of the New Testament into four classes, he places the Gospels, the Acts, the Pauline Epistles, the First Epistle of St. John, the First Epistle of St. Peter, and perhaps the Apocalypse, under the head of ὁμολογούμενα, or “acknowledged” books. In the class of ἀπληρόμενα or “controverted” he places the Epistle of St. James, the Second and Third Epistles of St. John, and the Epistle of St. Jude. Amongst the νόθα or “spurious” he enumerates the Acts of St. Paul, the Shepherd, the Apocalypse of St. Peter, the Epistle of Barnabas, the Teachings of the Apostles, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and perhaps the Apocalypse. The αἰρετικά or “heretical” books consist of the Gospels of Peter, Thomas, Matthias, and others; the Acts of Andrew, John, and others. The ἀπληρόμενα, among which he places the Epistle of St. James, are, he says, γνώριμα ὅμως τοῖς πολλοῖς, whether the expression means that they were acknowledged by, or merely that they were known to, the majority (Hist. Eccl. iii. 25). Elsewhere he says that the Epistle is regarded by some as belonging to the class of νόθα, for this is the meaning of νοθεύεται μὲν (see the notes of Valesius and Heinenich); but he bears witness that it was publicly read in most Churches as genuine (Hist. Eccl. ii. 23), and as such accepts it himself. This then was the state of the question in the time of Eusebius: the Epistle was accepted as canonical, and as the writing of St. James, the brother of the Lord, by the majority, but not universally. In the previous century Origen bears the same testimony as Eusebius (tom. iv. p. 306), and probably, like him, himself accepted the Epistle as genuine (tom. iv. p. 535, &c.). Before this date evidence of its acceptance is supplied in the East by the Peshitto Version, made for Syrian Christians at the beginning of the 2nd century; and in the West, Clement of Rome (Ep. ad Cor. x.), Hermas Pastor (lib. ii., Mand. xii. 5), and Irenaeus (adv. Haer. iv. 16, 2) show themselves acquainted with it. On the other hand, it is ignored by the Muratorian Canon and by Tertullian. The antiquity of the Epistle Dr. Salmon judges to be sufficiently established by external evidence, particularly by the use made of it in Hermas; but at the same time he thinks it had a very limited circulation in early times, and in Alexandria or the West was little known (Introd. to N. T. pp. 562, 565, ed. 1885). It is acknowledged by almost all the Fathers of the fourth century, e.g. Athanasius, Cyril, Gregory Nazianzen, Epiphanius, Amphiloehius, Philastrius, Rufinus, Jerome, Augustine, and Chrysostom. In 397 the Council of Carthage accepted it as canonical, and from that time there has been no further question of its genuineness on the score of external testimony. But at the time of the Reformation the question of its authenticity was again raised, and then upon the ground of internal evidence. Erasmus and Cardinal Cajetan in the Church of Rome, Cyril Lucar in the Greek Church, Luther and the Magdeburg Centuriators among Protestants, all objected to it. Luther pronounced it “a right strawy Epistle,” compared with the Gospel and First Epistle of St. John, the Epistles of St. Paul, and the First Epistle of St. Peter, which he called “the capital Books of the New Testament,” as being sufficient to instruct a Christian fully in the mysteries of the Faith. Accordingly he places the Epistle to the Hebrews, James, Jude, and the Apocalypse after the other Books of the New Testament in his translation, and declines to regard the Epistle of James as apostolic, though he “admires” it “and holds it as good,” and “will forbid no one to place and elevate it as he pleases” (Werke, xiv. 104, 150. See Westcott, The Bible in the Church, ch. x.). The chief objection on internal grounds is a supposed opposition between St. Paul and St. James on the doctrine of Justification, concerning which we shall presently make some remarks. At present we need only say that it is easy to account for the non-universal reception of the Epistle in the early Church, by the fact that it was meant only for Jewish believers, and was not likely therefore to circulate widely among Gentile Christians, for whose spiritual necessities it was primarily not adapted; and that the objection on internal grounds proves nothing except against the objectors, for it really rests on a mistake.

III. Date and Place.—The Epistle was written from Jerusalem, which St. James does not seem to have ever left. There is internal evidence that the writer was one familiar with Palestine and had listened to our Lord’s teaching. The time at which he wrote it has been fixed as late as 62, and as early as 44. Those who see in its writer a desire to counteract the effects of a misconception of St. Paul’s doctrine of Justification by faith, in ii. 14–26 (Wiesinger), and those who see a reference to the immediate destruction of Jerusalem in v. 1 (Macknight), and an allusion to the name Christians in ii. 7 (De Wette), argue in favour of the later date. Bishop Chr. Wordsworth, regarding the Epistle as subsequent to St. Paul’s Epistle to the Romans, is in favour of the year 60. The earlier date is advocated by most recent writers, chiefly on the ground that the Epistle could not have been written by St. James after the Council in Jerusalem, without some allusion to what was there decided, and because the Gentile Christian does not yet appear to be recognised. On these grounds Punchard (Bp. Ellicott’s Commentary on the New Test.) assigns it to the year 44. It is now generally recognised as being the earliest portion of the N. T. (Mayor, Ep. of St. James, p. cxxiv.).

IV. Persons addressed.—St. James tells us that his Epistle is addressed to “the Twelve Tribes scattered abroad” (A. V.), “the Twelve Tribes which are of the Dispersion” (R. V.). The Jewish Dispersion or Diaspora plays a most important part in the spread of the Gospel throughout the world. There were four divisions of this Diaspora in the apostolic times—the Babylonian, the Egyptian, the Syrian, and the Roman. The Babylonian was far the most ancient of the four. It owed its existence to the policy of the Assyrian kings (1 Ch. v. 26; 2 K. xvii. 6, xviii. 11) and the Babylonian Captivity (2 K. xxiv. 16; xxv. 11). The Hebrews carried away by the Assyrians and Babylonians were scattered through Media, Persia, and Parthia, in bodies of varying size, and Babylon became at a later date a famous seat of Jewish learning. Alexander the Great and the Ptolemies formed the Egyptian Diaspora by settling Jews in Egypt, whence they spread along the coast to Cyrene and Tripoli. The Syrian Diaspora owed its existence to Selencus Nicator, who established colonies of Jews in Syria, whence they passed in considerable numbers to Armenia, Asia Minor, and Greece. The Roman Diaspora was of later date than the Epistle of St. James, originating with the conquest of Judæa by Pompey in the year 63. The Jews belonging to the Diaspora, while they were on the one hand "scattered abroad" throughout the length and breadth of the Roman empire, on the other kept up a close connexion with Jerusalem, paying their Temple dues and looking to the High Priest for direction until the fall of the city. Those Jews of the Diaspora that were converted to Christianity would therefore naturally look to the Bishop of Jerusalem as their instructor, and he would feel himself to be their natural guide. It was to them that he addressed this Epistle; not to the unbelieving Jews (Lardner, Macknight, Hug, &c.), but only to believers in Christ, as is proved by i. 1; ii. 1, 7; v. 7. The rich men of v. 1 may be the unbelieving Jews (Stanley, p. 299), but it does not follow that the Epistle was written to them, as it is not unusual for an orator, in denouncing, to use the second person.

V. Contents and Character.—The main object of the Epistle is not to teach doctrine, but to improve morality. St. James is the moral teacher of the N. T.; not in such sense a moral teacher as not to be at the same time a maintainer and teacher of Christian doctrine, but yet mainly in this Epistle a moral teacher, like the author of the Teaching of the Apostles, a generation later. There are two ways of explaining this characteristic of the Epistle. Some commentators and writers see in St. James a man who had not realised the essential principles and peculiarities of Christianity, but was in a transition state, half-Jew and half-Christian. Schneckengerber thinks that Christianity had not penetrated his spiritual life. Neander is of much the same opinion (Pflanzung und Leitung, p. 579). And the same notion may perhaps be traced in Dean Stanley and Dean Alford. But there is another and more natural way of accounting for the fact. St. James was writing for a special class of persons, and knew what that class especially needed; and therefore, under the guidance of God's Spirit, he adapted his instructions to their capacities and wants. Those for whom he wrote were, as we have said, the Jewish Christians whether in Jerusalem or abroad. St. James, living in the centre of Judaism, saw what were the chief sins and vices of his countrymen; and, fearing that his flock might share in them, he lifted up his voice to warn them against the contagion from which they not only might, but did in part, suffer. This was his main object; but there is another closely connected with it. As Christians, his readers were exposed to trials which they did not bear with the patience and faith that would have become them. Here then are the two objects of the Epistle—1, to warn against the sins to which as Jews they were most liable; 2, to console and exhort them under the sufferings to which as Christians they were most exposed. The warnings and consolations are mixed together, for the writer does not seem to have set himself down to compose an essay or a letter of which he had previously arranged the heads; but, like one of the old Prophets, to have poured out what was uppermost in his thoughts, or closest to his heart, without waiting to connect his matter, or to throw bridges across from subject to subject. While, in the purity of his Greek and the vigour of his thoughts, we mark a man of education, in the abruptness of his transitions and the unpolished roughness of his style we may trace one of the family of the Davideans, who disarmed Domitian by the simplicity of their minds and by exhibiting their hands hard with toil (Hegesipp. apud Euseb. iii. 20).

The Jewish vices against which he warns them are—Formalism, which made the service (θρησκεία) of God consist in washings and outward ceremonies, whereas he reminds them (i. 27) that it consists rather in Active Love and Purity (see Coleridge's Aids to Reflection, Aph. 23; note also that the "Active Love" of St. James is analogous in the religious sphere to Bishop Butler's "Benevolence" in morals; and St. James's "Purity" answers to while it transcends Bishop Butler's "Temperance"); Fanaticism, which under the cloak of religious zeal was tearing Jerusalem to pieces (i. 20); Fatalism, which threw its sins on God (i. 13); Meanness, which crouched before the rich (ii. 2); Falsehood, which had made words and oaths playthings (iii. 2-12); Partisanship (iii. 14); Evil-speaking (iv. 11); Boasting (iv. 16); Oppression (v. 4). The great lesson which he teaches them, as Christians, is Patience—Patience in trial (i. 2); Patience in good works (i. 22-25); Patience under provocations (iii. 17); Patience under oppression (v. 7); Patience under persecution (v. 10); and the ground of their Patience is, that the Coming of the Lord draweth nigh, which is to right all wrongs (v. 8).

There are two points in the Epistle which demand a somewhat more lengthened notice. These are (a) ii. 14-26, which has been represented as a formal opposition to St. Paul's doctrine of Justification by Faith, and (b) v. 14, 15, which is quoted as the authority for the Sacrament of Extreme Unction.

(a) Justification being an act not of man but of God, both the phrases "Justification by Faith" and "Justification by Works" are inexact. Justification must either be by Grace, or of Reward. Therefore our question is, Did or did not St. James hold Justification by Grace? If he did, there is no contradiction between the Apostles. Now there is not one word in St. James to the effect that a man can earn his justification by works; and this would be necessary in order to prove that he held Justification of Reward. Still St. Paul does use the expression "justified by faith" (Rom. v. 1), and St. James the expression "justified by works, not by faith only." And here is an apparent opposition. But, if we consider the meaning of the two Apostles, we see that there is no contradiction either intended or possible. St. Paul was opposing the Judaizing party, which claimed to earn acceptance by good works, whether the works of the Mosaic Law, or works of piety done by themselves. In opposition to these, St. Paul lays down the great truth that acceptance cannot be earned by man at all, but is the free gift of God to the Christian man, for the sake of the merits of Jesus Christ, appropriated by each individual, and made his own by the instrumentality of faith. St. James, on the other hand, was opposing the old Jewish tenet that to be a child of Abraham was all in all; that godliness was not necessary, so that the belief was correct. This presumptuous confidence had transferred itself, with perhaps double force, to the Christianized Jews. They had said, "Lord, Lord," and that was enough, without doing the Father's will. They had recognised the Messiah: what more was wanted? They had faith: what more was required of them? It is plain that their "faith" was a totally different thing from the "faith" of St. Paul. St. Paul tells us that what he means by "faith" is a "faith that worketh by love;" but the very characteristic of the "faith" which St. James is attacking, and the very reason why he attacked it, was that it did not work by love, but was a bare assent of the head, not influencing the heart,—a faith such as devils can have, and tremble. St. James tells us that faith which does not influence practice is not sufficient on the part of man for Justification; St. Paul tells us that faith which does influence practice by affecting the heart is sufficient: and the reason why the first will not justify us is, according to St. James, because it lacks that special quality, the addition of which makes it to be the last. See on this subject Bull's Harmonia Apostolica et Examen Censurae; Jeremy Taylor's Sermon on "Faith working by Love," vol. viii. p. 284, Lond. 1850; and, as a corrective of Bull's view, Laurence's Bampton Lectures, iv. v. vi., Oxf. 1820. Dr. Salmon (Introd. p. 575 sq.) has some valuable remarks showing the perfect consistency of St. Paul and St. James in their teaching on Justification.

(b) With respect to v. 14, 15, it is enough to say that the ceremony of Extreme Unction and the ceremony described by St. James differ both in their subject and in their object. The subject of Extreme Unction is a sick man who is about to die; and its object is not his cure. The subject of the ceremony described by St. James is a sick man who is not about to die; and its object is his cure, together with the spiritual benefit of absolution. St. James is plainly giving directions with respect to the manner of administering one of those extraordinary gifts of the Spirit with which the Church was endowed only in the Apostolic age and the age immediately succeeding the Apostles.

VI. Bibliography.—The following expository works on St. James's Epistle may be mentioned as worthy of notice. The Commentary of Oecumenius in Greek, Jacobi Apostoli Epistola Catholica, in Pat. Gr. cxix. 455; Thos. Manton, Practical Commentary on the Epistle of James, 1651; Dr. George Benson's Paraphrasis in Epist. & Jacob., ed. by J. D. Michaelis, Halae Magdeburgicae, 1746; D. J. S. Semler's Paraphrasis Epist. Jac., Halae, 1781; S. F. N. Morus, Praelectiones in Jacobi et Petri Epistolas, Lipsiae, 1794; Schneckenburger's Annotatio ad Epist. Jac. perpetua, Stuttg. 1832; C. G. G. Theile, Commentaria in Epistolam Jacobi, Lips. 1833; Davidson's Introduction to the New Test. vol. iii. p. 296 sq., Lond. 1851; Alford's Greek Test. vol. iv. p. 274, Lond. 1859; Wordsworth's Greek Test., Lond. 1860; The Speaker's Commentary, N. T., iv. p. 105, Lond. 1881; Fillicott's N. T. Commentary, iii. p. 351, Lond. (without date); F. Tilney Bassett, Epistle of St. James, with revised Text and Translation, and Notes Critical and Explanatory, 1876; Dr. George Salmon, A Historical Introduction to the Study of the Books of the New Testament, 1885, pp. 558 sqq.

The following spurious works have been attributed to St. James:—1. The Gospel of James or Protevangelium. 2. Historia de Nativitate Mariae. 3. De miraculis infantiae Domini nostri, &c. Of these, the Protevangelium is worth a passing notice, not for its contents, which are a mere parody on the early chapters of St. Luke, transferring the events which occurred at our Lord's Birth to the birth of St. Mary His mother, but because it appears to have been known so early in the Church. It is possible that Justin Martyr (Dial. cum Tryph. c. 78) and Clement of Alexandria (Strom. lib. viii.) refer to it. Origen speaks of it (in Matt. xiii. 55); Gregory Nyssen (Op. p. 346, ed. Paris), Epiphanius (Haer. lxxix.), John Damascene (Orat. i. ii. in Nativ. Mariae), Photius (Orat. in Nativ. Mariae), and others allude to it. The Protevangelium and other apocryphal writings are the unsuspected source of many legends and beliefs. Thence came, as we have seen that St. Jerome complains, the hypothesis of James, Josep, Jude, Simon, and their sisters being the children of Joseph by a previous marriage, adopted from them by Origen and Epiphanius. Thence too were borrowed all the miraculous and legendary features of the story of St. Mary, which were admitted into the Church after the Nestorian controversies. The Protevangelium was first published in Latin in 1552, in Greek in 1564. The oldest MS. of it now existing is of the 10th century (see J. C. Thilo's Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti, tom. i. pp. 45, 108, 159, 337, Lips. 1832; Salmon's Introd. p. 229; Mayor, Ep. of St. James, Lond. 1892). [F. M.]

JAM'IN (יָמִין = right hand?: B. יַמְיֵל, יַמְיֵלָה; A. יַמְיֵל; Jamīn). 1. Second son of Simeon (Gen. xlii. 10; Ex. vi. 15; 1 Ch. iv. 24), founder of the family of the Jaminites (Num. xxvi. 12).

2. (B. יַמְיֵל; A. יַאֲבֵל.) A man of Judah, of the great house of Hezron; second son of Ram the Jerahmeelite (1 Ch. ii. 27).

3. One of the Levites who under Ezra and Nehemiah read and expounded the Law to the people (Neh. viii. 7). By the LXX. he and most others in this passage are omitted.

JAM'INITES, THE (יַמְיֵלָה; B. δ' יַמְיֵל, A. יַמְיֵל; familia Jaminitorum), the descendants of JAMIN the son of Simeon (Num. xxvi. 12).

JAM'LECH (יַמְלֵךְ = God makes to reign; B. יַמְלֹלֶךְ, A. Ἀμαλῆκ; Jemlech), one of the chief men (דְּנָיִם), A. V. "princes") of the tribe of Simeon (1 Ch. iv. 34), probably in the time of Hezekiah (see v. 41).

JAM'NIA (Ἰαμνία, Ἰαμνεία; Joseph. Ant. ix. 10, § 3, and freq., Ἰαμνεία; Jamnia), 1 Macc. iv. 15; v. 58; x. 69; xv. 40. [JABNEEL.]

JAM'NITES, THE (οἱ ἐν Ἰαμνείᾳ, οἱ Ἰαμνίται; Jamnitae, qui erant Jamniac, qui apud Jamniam fuerunt), 2 Macc. xii. 8, 9, 40. [JABNEEL.]

JAN'NA (Ἰαννά, Ἰαννά), son of Joseph, and father of Melchi, in the genealogy of Christ (Luke iii. 24). It is perhaps only a variation of Joannes or John. [A. C. H.]

JANNES and JAMBRES (Ἰαννης καὶ Ἰαμβρησ, al. Μαμβρησ; Jannes et Mambres), the Egyptian magicians who withstood Moses at the court of Pharaoh. They are so named by St. Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8), though in the early account (Ex. vii. 11) neither their names nor their number are recorded. In the apostolic age Pliny (H. N. xxx. 1, § 11) mentions Jannes (the reading adopted in the latest and best editions, e.g. Detlefsen's, 1871) thus: "Est et alia factio a Mose et Janne et Lotape ac Judaeis pendens, sed multis millibus annorum post Zoroastrem." About the middle of the 2nd century Apuleius (Apol. p. 544, ed. Flor.) places Moses and Jannes among the celebrated magi who lived after Zoroaster. In the period of the Antonines the Pythagorean philosopher Numenius (as quoted by Eusebius, Præp. Ev. ix. 8) in his treatise De Bono made mention of Jannes and Jambres as writers on the religion of Egypt and skilled in magic, resisting Moses. In the middle of the 3rd century the opinion of Origen was (In Matth. § 117 fin., in Pat. Gr. xiii. 1769 c) that St. Paul's information was derived from an apocryphal book (liber secretus) entitled Jannes et Jambres Liber, of which nothing is now known; though it, or some similar work, was circulating in 494 when Pope Gelasius included among the apocryphal books that were to be rejected one bearing the title Poenitentia Jannae et Mambrae (Gelas. Epist. et Decret. in Pat. Lat. lix. 163 A; Mansi, Concil. viii. 151 B). Theodore (on 2 Tim. iii. 8, in Pat. Gr. lxxxii. 847) considered that St. Paul learnt the two names from Jewish unwritten teaching (non scripta doctrina); and this opinion has been adopted by many modern writers. D'Herbelot (in his Biblioth. Orient. pp. 648, 649, ed. 1697, art. Moussa ben Amran) mentions a tradition from Arabic sources that the principal magicians called in to oppose Moses were two brothers, Sabour and Gadour, while two others were Giaath and Mosfa, these latter representing, as D'Herbelot conceives, Jannes and Jambres. Some of the older learning of this subject was collected by J. A. Fabricius, in his Codex Epigraphus Vet. Test., 1713 (vol. ii. pt. 2, p. 813), where the apocryphal book Jannes and Jambres is dealt with. The Rabbinical branch of the subject will be found discussed in Buxtorf's Hebrew and Talmudical Lexicon, Forscher's new edition (1869-75), under the heading יַנְנָה וְיַמְבְּרֵה, Jochanna et Mamre, p. 481. Several passages in Hebrew are adduced showing various readings of the names. The Targum of Jonathan (Ex. vii. 11) gives the names as יַנְנָה וְיַמְבְּרֵה, Jannes et Jambres (Janis and Jambres). J. W. Etheridge's Version of the Targums of the Pentateuch, 1862, i. 461; whereas in the Talmud they are called יַנְנָה וְיַמְבְּרֵה, Jochana et Mamre. Buxtorf considers that the first of the two names has been corrupted from an original יַחְנָה, Jochanan, whence Johannes Riehm likewise (HWB., 1884, s. v.) recognises this difference between the Targumistic and Talmudic forms. To the view which would make the two names indicate the "children of Jambri" (1 Macc. ix. 36, 37) he rightly objects the high probability that the reading there ought to be Ambri. He has no doubt that both Jambres and Mambres have their root in the hiphal form of the Hebrew יַמְבְּרֵה, "to rebel"; while as to Jannes he seeks to show that it is a mutilated form of Jochanan (i. q. Johannes), with a probable meaning of "seducer." For an illustration of his argument, he points to the name Jannaeus borne by the Jewish king Alexander, B.C. 104. On the other hand, there is thought to be some evidence of an Egyptian origin of these names. Naville, in the eighth Memoir of the Egypt Exploration Fund, 1891, which is devoted to the recent excavations of Bubastis, mentions (p. 23) his discovery of the name of a king read by him as Ian-Ra. This king he considers to have been one of the Hyksos dynasty, and his conclusion with regard to his identity is that he was the Ianiās or Avriās, perhaps to be read as Iavpās, mentioned in a fragment of Manetho preserved by Josephus. The place in Josephus is Contr. Apion. lib. i. c. 14; and in the Paris edition of that author, 1845-7, the reading is Iavias. In the same passage as given by Müller in his Fragmenta Historicorum Graec. (Paris, 1848, vol. ii. p. 510) the readings are Iavpās and Iavias. The resemblance of these names (including the one discovered at Bubastis) to Ἰαννης and Ἰαμβρησ may be thought to afford some probability in assigning to the latter an early Egyptian antiquity. For a discussion of the Egyptian magicians, see MAGIC. [C. H.]

JANO'AH (יַנְוָה); B. יַנְוָה, A. יַנְוָה; Janoë), a place apparently in the north of Galilee, or the "land of Naphtali"—one of those taken by Tiglath-pileser in his first incursion into Palestine (2 K. xv. 29). No trace of it appears elsewhere. By Eusebius and Jerome (OS. p. 268, 59; p. 165, 20), and even by Reland (Pal. p. 826), it is confounded with Janohah, in the centre of the country. It is now possibly Yânûh, a village E. of Tyre (P.E.F. Mem. i. 51). [G.] [W.] JANO'HAH, R. V. JANOAH (יַנְוָה), i. e. Yanochah: B. in v. 6 יַנְוָה, but in v. 7 יַנְוָה; A. יַנְוָה; Janoë), a place on the boundary of Ephraim (apparently that between it and Manasseh). It is named between Taanath-Shiloh and Ataroth, the enumeration proceeding from west to east (Josh. xvi. 6, 7). Eusebius (OS. p. 268, 59) places it in Acraabattine, 12 miles east of Neapolis. About 8 miles from Nâbus, and about S.E. in direction, 2 miles from Akrabeh, is the village of Yânûh, doubtless identical with the ancient Janohah. It seems to have been first visited in modern times by

Van de Velde (ii. 303, May 8, 1852; see also Rob. iii. 297). It is on the edge of a deep valley descending sharply eastward towards the Jordan. The modern village is very small, but there are numerous rock-hewn cisterns and caverns of ancient date. On a rocky hill to the E. is a small building sacred to Néby Nân (PEF. Mem. ii. 387; Guérin, Samarie, ii. 6). [G.] [W.]

JANUM, R. V. JANIM (𐤎𐤏), following the Qeri of the Masorets, but in the Kethib it is 𐤎), Janim = slumber: B. 'Ιεμειν, A. 'Iavoum; Janum, a town of Judah in the mountain district, apparently not far from Hebron, and named between Eshean and Beth-tappuah (Josh. xv. 53). It was not known to Eusebius and Jerome (*OS*² p. 268, 46; p. 165, 8), nor does it appear to have been yet met with by any modern investigator. Conder has suggested as a possible identification Beni N'atm, a large village about 3 miles E. of Hebron (PEF. Mem. iii. 303, 304). [G.] [W.]

JAPHETH (B. 'Ιάφεθ), Judith ii. 25; one of the countries to the borders of which Holofernes marched with his army. It was toward the south, "over against Arabia," and was possibly the district of which Javan was the capital. [JAVAN, 2.] For other identifications, see Speaker's Comm. in loco.

JAPHETH (𐤎𐤑; 'Ιάφεθ; Japheth), one of the three sons of Noah, considered by some to have been the eldest, by others the second, and by others the youngest. The last opinion is based on the fact that in every mention of the three together, the order is Shem, Ham, Japheth (Gen. v. 32, vi. 10, vii. 13, ix. 18, x. 1; 1 Ch. i. 4). The reasons for thinking him the eldest are these. (1) When the posterities of the three sons are enumerated, the line of Japheth is taken up first, that of Ham second, and that of Shem third (Gen. x. 2, 6, 21). But the position of Shem here can be otherwise accounted for; namely, by the fact that in his line stands Abraham, whose descent and posterity it is the historian's ultimate object to relate; which being the case, the inversion of the usual order of the brothers, enabling the history to proceed uninterrupted, was but natural. (2) In Gen. x. 21, Shem is called "the brother of Japheth the elder" (A.V., supported by the LXX. and other ancient authorities). But this rendering of the Hebrew is disputed, other Versions, including the Vulgate, making it "the elder brother of Japheth," and this is adopted in the text of the R. V., which relegates the A.V. to the margin. (3) In Gen. ix. 24, Ham (though not named) appears the one alluded to as the "younger son" of Noah; but against this it is argued (vid. Speaker's Comm. in loc.) that the expression, which is literally "little son," could have pointed to Canaan the grandson. On the whole the reason given for regarding Japheth as the third son seems decidedly to outweigh the arguments against it, though the point cannot be considered decided (see Delitzsch [1887] and *Dillmann*² on the passages in Genesis). Japheth, like his two brothers, was born about a century before the Flood (Gen. v. 32; vi. 11), as Josephus also says, placing them in the order—Shem, Japheth, Ham (Ant. i. 4, § 1).

By far the most interesting question however relating to this patriarch is that arising from the prophetic passage (Gen. ix. 27), "God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant." The letters for "shall enlarge" and "Japheth," 𐤎𐤑, are the very same, if the vowel-points be disregarded, in the Targum of Onkelos the prophecy is thus explained—"The Lord shall enlarge Japheth, and He [sc. the Lord] shall make His Shekinah to dwell in the tabernacles of Shem, and Kanaan shall be servant unto them." In the Targum of Jonathan the comment is—"The Lord shall beautify the borders of Japheth, and his sons shall be proselyted and dwell in the schools of Shem, and Kanaan shall be a servant unto them" (J. W. Etheridge's Version of the Targums, 1862, i. 54, 185). In Jonathan the "enlargement" appears pretty much confined to the advantage the Japhetan race was to receive from intercourse with Shem, viz. its religious enlightenment, and this interpretation strikingly harmonizes with such prophecies as Gen. xxii. 18 and Is. lx. 3 sq. The sacred writer when concluding the earlier posterities adds an ethnographical summary for each of the brothers, and the ethnography is in the main still recognisable. In the case of Japheth the dispersion was through seven sons,—Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, Tiras, which names may be separately consulted, and the summary is: "By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations" (Gen. x. 5). This description is commonly understood to indicate the European and N.W. Asiatic coast lands of the Mediterranean, which are to a large extent insular and peninsular. That was as much as the view of the historian at the time of his writing embraced. Josephus (Ant. i. 4, § 6) gives the ethnography of the subject as apprehended by him. Researches of later ages have led ethnologists to regard the Indo-European collection of peoples (including of course their distant oceanic developments of more recent times) as now substantially representing the Japhetan race. A speculation as to how the religious ideas of this great family may be supposed to have been developed from the times of their Noachian progenitor, previous to their enlightenment through direct propagation among them of the knowledge revealed to the line of Shem, may be seen worked out in Alexander William Earl of Crawford's Creed of Japhet, 1891. [C. H.]

JAPHIA (𐤎𐤑𐤁 = splendid; B. ⲉϣϣαλ, A. 'Iaphayal; Japhie). The boundary of Zebulun ascended from Daberath to Japhia, and thence passed to Gath-hepher (Josh. xix. 12). Daberath is now Debúrieh, at the foot of Mount Tabor, and Gath-hepher is probably el Mesh-hed, 2½ miles N. of Nazareth. Japhia is now Yáfa, 1½ miles S.W. of Nazareth. There are few remains of the old town, but a system of domed subterranean chambers, in three storeys, hewn out of the rock,

* It should be remarked that Yáfa, 𐤎𐤑𐤁, is the modern representative of both 𐤎𐤑, i. e. Joppa, and 𐤎𐤑𐤁, Japhia, two names originally very distinct.

is interesting (Rob. ii. 343-4; PEF. Mem. i. 353; Guérin, Galilée, i. 103; Sepp, J. und h. L. ii. 137). Eusebius (*OS.*² p. 269, 69, 'Ιάφεθ) identifies it with Haiifa, Sycaminon ('Ηφά); but this identification, though endorsed by Reland (Pal. p. 826), is neither etymologically nor topographically admissible. Yáfa is probably also the same as the 'Ιαφά which was occupied by Josephus during his struggle with the Romans—"a very large village of Lower Galilee, fortified with walls and full of people" (Vita, § 45; cp. 37, 52, and B. J. ii. 20, § 6), of whom 15,000 were killed and 2,130 taken prisoners by the Romans (B. J. iii. 7, § 31); though if Jefaf be Jotapata, this can hardly be, as the two are about 10 miles apart, and he expressly says that they were neighbours to each other.

A tradition, which first appears in Innominatus iv. (c. 1270) and afterwards in Marino Sanuto and in Sir John Maundeville, makes Yáfa the birthplace of Zebedee and of the Apostles James and John, his sons. Hence it is called by the Latin monks of Nazareth "San Giacomo" (see Quaresmius, Elucidatio, ii. 843; and Early Trav. p. 186). Maundeville calls it the "Castle of Saffra." So too Von Harff, A.D. 1498: "Saffra, eyn casteel van wylcheme Alpheus und Sebedeus geboren waren" (Pilgerfahrt, 195). [G.] [W.]

JAPHIA' (Ἰαφία) = brilliant; B. 'Ιεφθα, A. 'Ιαφίε; Japhia). 1. King of Lachish at the time of the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites (Josh. x. 3); one of the five "kings of the Amorites" who entered into a confederacy against Joshua, and who were defeated at Beth-horon, and lost their lives at Makkedah. The king of Lachish is mentioned more than once in this narrative (vs. 5, 23), but his name occurs only as above.

2. (In 2 Sam. B. 'Ιεφίε, A. 'Αφίε; in 1 Ch. B. 'Ιαφίε, 'Ιαφουό, A. 'Ιαφίε: Japhia.) One of the sons of David, tenth of the fourteen born to him by his wives after his establishment in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Ch. iii. 7, xiv. 6). In the Hebrew form of this name there are no variations. The Peshitto has Nephia, and, in 1 Ch. iii., Nepheg. In the list given by Josephus (Ant. vii. 3, § 3) it is not recognisable: it may be 'Ηναφθήν, or it may be 'Ιεναί. There do not appear to be any traditions concerning Japhia. The genealogy is given under DAVID, p. 729. [G.] [W.]

JAPH-LET (Ἰαφλετ) = whom God delivers: 'Ιαφλήτ; B. 'Ιαφμήλ, 'Αφαλήχ, and 'Ιαφαλήλ; A. 'Ιαφαλήτ: Jephlat), a descendant of Asher through Beriah, his youngest son; named as the father of three Bene-Japhlet (1 Ch. vii. 32, 33).

JAPHLE'TI, R. V. JAPHLETITES, THE (Ἰαφλετι) = "the Japhletite;" B. 'Απταλειμ, A. τοῦ 'Ιεφαλοῦ; Jephleti). The "boundary of the Japhletite" is one of the landmarks on the south boundary-line of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3), west of Beth-horon the lower, and between it and Ataroth. Who "the Japhletite" was who is thus perpetuated we cannot ascertain. Possibly the name preserves the memory of some ancient tribe who at a remote age dwelt on these hills, just as the former presence of other tribes in the neighbourhood may be inferred from the names of Zemaraim, Ophni (the Ophnite), Cephar ha-Ammonai, and others. [BENJAMIN, p. 395, note.] We can hardly suppose any connexion with JAPHLET of the remote Asher (Dillmann² in loco); but the name may be compared with that of Palti (Φάλτι) son of Raphu, a Benjamite who was one of the twelve spies (Num. xiii. 9). No trace of the name has yet been discovered in the district. [G.] [W.]

JAPHO, R. V. JOPPA (Ἰόπη, beauty; 'Ιόπηη; Joppe). This word occurs in the A. V. but once, Josh. xix. 46. It is the accurate representation of the Hebrew word which on its other occurrences is rendered by the better known form of JOPPA (2 Ch. ii. 16; Ezra iii. 7; Jon. i. 3). In its modern garb it is Yáfa (يافا), which is also the Arabic name of JAPHIA, a very different word in Hebrew. [JOPPA; JOPPE.]

JARAH (Ἰάρα), probably a corruption for Ἰάβ; 'Iadd; Jara), one of the descendants of Saul; son of Micah, and great-grandson of Meribaal, or Mephibosheth (1 Ch. ix. 42, cp. v. 40). In the parallel list of ch. viii. the name is materially altered to JEHOADAM.

JAREB (Ἰάρεβ): 'Iapelμ, as if Ἰάρεβ, in both Hos. v. 13 and x. 6; * though Theodoret gives 'Iapelβ in the former passage, and 'Iapelμ in the latter; and Jerome has Jarūb for the Greek equivalent of the LXX.), a name occurring twice: as, "When Ephraim saw his sickness and Judah saw his wound, then went Ephraim to the Assyrian, and sent to king Jareb; yet could he not heal you" (Hos. v. 13); Samaria "shall be carried unto Assyria for a present to king Jareb" (Hos. x. 6). As alternatives for "king Jareb" the A. V. margin gives "the king of Jareb," or "the king that should plead." The R. V. retains the same text, with only one marginal alternative, "a king that should contend;" the translators of both Versions following a correct grammatical instinct in making Jareb a proper name. The Syriac gives Ἰάρεβ, yāreb, as the name of a country, which is applied by Ephrem Syrus to Egypt, and the renderings of the Vulgate, "avenger" ("ad regem ultorem"), which follows Symmachus, as well as those of Aquila (δικαζόμερον) and Theodotus, "judge," are justified by Jerome by a reference to Jerubbaal, the name of Gideon (see the first edition of this work for these and other opinions); but it is best to accept the fact that Hosea calls a contemporaneous monarch of Assyria by the name of Jareb. Such a name has not yet, however, been met with on the monuments of Assyria. Some therefore have identified this monarch with Assurdán (Schrader, *KAT.*² p. 439), others with Pul (or Tiglath-pileser II.: cp. Orelli in loco in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Komm.); while Sayce (Bab. Record, ii. 18, 127, 145) considers it the original name of Sargon. The riddle of the name must still be considered unsolved.

* As an instance of the contrary, see Nεβροδ for Nimrod.

Two mystical interpretations, alluded to by Jerome as current among commentators in his time, are remarkable for the singularly opposite conclusions at which they arrived; the one referring the word to the devil, the other to Christ.

[W. A. W.] [F.]

JARED (יָרֵד), i.e. Jered, as the name is given in A. V. of Ch., but in pause יָרֵד, from which the present form may have been derived, though more probably from the Vulgate: LXX. sometimes 'Iapeð, sometimes 'Iaper [see Swete in loco]; N. T. 'Iapeθ [Westcott and Hort]; Joseph. 'Iapēths; Jared), one of the antediluvian patriarchs, the fifth from Adam; son of Mahalaleel, and father of Enoch (Gen. v. 15, 16, 18, 19, 20; Luke iii. 37). In the lists of Chronicles the name is given in the A. V. JERED.

JARESI'AH, R. V. JAARESHIAH (יְרֵשִׁי'אָה = whom Jehovah nourisheth; A. 'Iapasia, B. 'Iaapaid; Jersia), a Benjamite, one of the Bene-Jeroham; a chief man of his tribe, but of whom nothing is recorded (1 Ch. viii. 27).

JAR-HA (יָרְחָא; 'Iaxhā; Jeraa), the Egyptian servant of Sheshan, about the time of Eli, to whom his master gave his daughter [AHLAI] and heiress in marriage, and who thus became the founder of a chief house of the Jerahmeelites, which continued at least to the time of king Hezekiah, and from which sprang several illustrious persons, such as Zabād in the reign of David, and Azariah in the reign of Joash (1 Ch. ii. 31 sq.). [AZARIAH, 13; ZABAD.] Some, however (cp. Speaker's Comm. in loc.), consider Ahlai the name of a son who died before the daughter was married to Jarha. It may be noticed as an undesigned coincidence that Jarha the Egyptian was living with Sheshan, a Jerahmeelite, and that the Jerahmeelites had their possessions on the side of Judah nearest to Egypt (1 Sam. xxvii. 10: cp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, 21; Josh. xv. 21; 1 Ch. iv. 18). [JERAHMEEL; JEHUDIJAH.] The etymology of Jarha's name is quite unknown. [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JA'RIB (יָרִיב = adhering; B. 'Iapelin, A. 'Iapelβ; Jarib). 1. Named in the list of 1 Ch. iv. 24 only, as a son of Simeon. He occupies the same place as JACHIN in the parallel lists of Gen. xlvii., Ex. vi., and Num. xxvi., and the name is possibly a corruption from that (see Burrington, i. 55).

2. (A. 'Iapib; B. 'Apēβ.) One of the "chief men" (רֹאשֵׁי הַבָּיִת, "heads") who accompanied Ezra on his journey from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 16); whether Levite or layman is not clear. In 1 Esdra the name is given as JORIBAS.

3. (A. 'Iapib; B. 'Iapelμ, R. 'Iapelμ.) A priest of the house of Jeshua the son of Jozadak, who had married a foreign wife, and was compelled by Ezra to put her away (Ezra x. 18). In 1 Esdra the name is JORIBUS.

4. ('Iapib, A. 'Iwapib; 1 Macc. xiv. 29.) A contraction or corruption of the name JOARIB, which occurs correctly in ii. 1.

JARIMOTH (יָרִימוֹת, B. 'Iapeimōth; Larimoth), 1 Esd. ix. 28. [JEREMOTH.]

JAR-MUTH (יָרִימוֹת = height; Jarimuth). 1. B. in Josh. x. and xii. 'Iepeimōth; A. in Josh. xii. 11, 'Iepimōth; in Neh. BA. 'Irimōth; Jerimoth, Jerimuth). A town in the Shefelah or low country of Judah, named in the same group with Adullam, Socoh, and Azekah (Josh. xv. 35). Its king, PIRAM, was one of the five who conspired to punish Gibeon for having made alliance with Israel (Josh. x. 3, 5), and who were routed at Beth-horon and put to death by Joshua at Makedah (v. 23). In this narrative, and also in the catalogue of the "royal cities" destroyed by Joshua, Jarmuth is named next to Hebron, which, however, was quite in the mountains. In Neh. xi. 29 it is named as having been the residence of some of the children of Judah after the return from the Captivity. Eusebius and Jerome either knew two places of this name, or an error has crept into the text of the Onomasticon; for under 'Iaβeiv, Jarimuth, they state it to be near Esh-taal, 4 miles from Eleutheropolis (OS. p. 267, 24; p. 164, 16); while under 'Iepimōv, Jermus, they gave it as 10 miles from Eleutheropolis, on the road going up to Jerusalem, and state that it was then called 'Iepimōxōs, Jermucha (OS. p. 268, 38; p. 164, 31). It is now Kh. el-Yarmūk, a mass of shapeless ruins, with cisterns, about 8 miles N. of Beit Jibrin, Eleutheropolis, and close to Shuweikeh, Socoh, and Zakariyah, Azekah. Its distance from Eshtaal is 5½ miles (Robinson, ii. 17; PEF. Mem. iii. 128; Guérin, Judéc. ii. 371 sq.; Tobler, Dritte Wanderung, pp. 120, 162-3; Riehm, HWB. s. v.).

2. (B. 'Pepimōth, A. 'Iepimōth; Jaramoth). A city of Issachar, allotted with its suburbs to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxi. 29). In the specification of the boundaries of Issachar, no mention is made of Jarmuth (see Josh. xix. 17-23), but a REMETH is mentioned there (v. 20); and in the duplicate list of Levitical cities (1 Ch. vi. 73) RAMOTH occupies the place of Jarmuth. The two names are modifications of the same root, and might without difficulty be interchanged. This Jarmuth does not appear to have been yet identified. Conder proposes er-Rāmeḥ, a village 5½ miles N. of Samaria, near which, at Noby Hazkin, there is a Samaritan tradition that Issachar was buried (PEF. Mem. ii. 154-5, 219). Riehm, however, considers an identification with er-Rāmeḥ impossible, and that a more probable though doubtful site is el-Mazār, on the summit of Mount Gilboa and not far from Engannim, with which it is named (HWB. s. v.). [RAMOTH.] [G.] [W.]

JARO'AH (יָרוֹאֵה; B. 'Idāa, A. 'Aḏaa; Jara), a chief man of the tribe of Gad (1 Ch. v. 14).

JA'SAEL (BA. 'Aσαῆλος; Azabus), 1 Esd. ix. 30. [SHEAL.]

JASHEN (יָשֵׁן; 'Aśan; Jasen). Bene-Jashen—"sons of Jashen"—are named in the catalogue of the heroes of David's guard in 2 Sam. xxiii. 32. In the Hebrew, as accented by the Masorets, the words have no necessary connexion with the names preceding or following them; but in the A. V. they are attached to the latter—"of the sons of Jashen, Jonathan." The passage has every appearance of being imperfect, and accordingly, in the parallel list in Chronicles, it stands, "the sons of Hashem the Gizonite" (1 Ch. xi. 34). Kennicott has examined it at length (Dissertation, pp. 198-203. Cp. Driver, Heb. Text of the BB. of Samuel, in loco), and has shown good cause for believing that a name has escaped, and that the genuine text was, "of the Bene-Hashem, Gouni; Jonathan ben-Shamha." In the list given by Jerome in his Questiones Hebraicae, Jashen and Jonathan are both omitted. [W. A. W.] [F.]

JA'SHER, BOOK OF (שֵׁשׁר הַיָּשָׁר), or, as the margin of the A. V. and R. V. gives it, the book of "the upright," is a record alluded to in two passages only of the O. T. (Josh. x. 13 and 2 Sam. i. 18), and the subject of much dispute. The former passage is omitted in the LXX., while in the latter the expression is rendered βιβλίον τοῦ εὐθούς: the Vulgate has liber justorum in both instances. The Peshito in Joshua has "the book of praises or hymns," reading הַשִּׁיר הַיָּשָׁר for הַיָּשָׁר, and a similar transposition will account for the rendering of the same Version in Samuel, "the book of Ashir." The Targum interprets it "the book of the law," and this is followed by Jarchi, who gives, as the passage alluded to in Joshua, the prophecy of Jacob with regard to the future greatness of Ephraim (Gen. xlviii. 19), which was fulfilled when the sun stood still at Joshua's bidding. Further diversity of opinions proves, if it prove nothing more, that no book was known to have survived which could lay claim to the title of the book of Jasher.

That the book of Jasher was one of the writings which perished in the Captivity was held by R. Levi ben Gershom, and his opinion has been adopted by Junius, Hottinger (Theol. Phil. ii. 2, § 2), and other writers (Wolfii Bibl. Heb. ii. 223). What the nature of the book may have been can only be inferred from the two passages in which it is mentioned and their context; and, this being the case, there is clearly wide room for conjecture.* Lowth (Praelect. pp. 306, 307) imagined that the book was a collection of national songs (cp. Ex. xv. 1); and his view of the question, that of the Syriac and Arabic translators, was adopted by Herder. The more general opinion is that it was this and something more, a book containing also deeds of valour recorded of brave Israelites, and put together somewhere about the time of Solomon (see Dillmann² on Joshua, l. c., and the authorities named there). Dr. Donaldson, in the preface to his Jasher, or Fragmenta Archetypa Carminum Hebraicorum in Masorethico Veteris Testamenti textu passim tessellata, advanced a scheme for the restoration of this ancient record, in accordance with his own idea of its scope and contents. The attempt has been universally condemned as a failure needing no refutation.^b

There are also extant, under the title of "the Book of Jasher," two Rabbinical works (cp. Davidson, op. cit.): one a moral treatise, written in A. D. 1394 by R. Shabbatai Carmuz Levita, of which a copy in MS. exists in the Vatican

* It is superfluous to repeat these conjectures. Many of them are enumerated in the 1st ed. of this work.

^b His scheme is briefly but sufficiently described by Dr. Wright in the 1st ed. of this work, and by Dr. Davidson in Kitto's Cyclop. of Bib. Lit. 3 s. n.

Library; the other, by R. Tham, treats of the laws of the Jews in eighteen chapters, and was printed in Italy in 1544, and at Cracow in 1586. An anonymous work, printed at Venice and Prague in 1625, and said to have made its first appearance at Naples, was believed by some Jews to be the record alluded to in Joshua. It contains the historical narratives of the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, with many fabulous additions. R. Jacob translated it into German, and printed his version at Frankfort-on-the-Maine in 1674. It is said in the preface to the first edition to have been discovered at the destruction of Jerusalem, by Sidrus, one of the officers of Titus, who, while searching a house for the purpose of plunder, found in a secret chamber a vessel containing the Books of the Law, the Prophets, and Hagiographa, with many others, which a venerable man was reading. Sidrus took the old man under his protection and built for him a house at Seville, where the books were safely deposited. The book in question is probably the production of a Spanish Jew of the 13th cent. (Abicht, De libr. Recti, in Theol. Nov. Theol. Phil. i. 525-534). A clumsy forgery in English, which first appeared in 1751 under the title of "the Book of Jasher," deserves notice solely for the unmerited success with which it was palmed off upon the public. It professed to be a translation from the Hebrew into English by Alcuin of Britain, who discovered it in Persia during his pilgrimage. It was reprinted at Bristol in 1827 and again in 1833, in each case accompanied by a fictitious commendatory note by Wiclif. [W. A. W.] [F.]

JASHOBE'AM (יְשׁוּבָעָם: B. Ἰεσοβαδά, Ζοβοδάμ, Ζοβδά; N. Ἰεσσαίβαδ; A. Ἰσβαίμ, Ἰεσβαίμ, Ἰσβόμ; Jesboam, Jesboam). It is possibly one and the same follower of David, bearing this name, who is described as a Hachmonite (or son of Hachmon, marg.), who slew three hundred, and was first of the mighty men (1 Ch. xi. 11); as a Korhite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch. xii. 6), and as son of Zabdiel, captain of the first monthly course of soldiers, numbering 24,000 (1 Ch. xvii. 2). Hachmonite would denote his descent from Hachmon, Korhite his family (Jehiel, 5). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8, his name seems to be erroneously transcribed, יְשׁוּבָעָם (B. Ἰεσοβάμ, i. e. בִּשְׁתֵּי אֵי. Cp. Luc. Ἰεσοβὰμ, i. e. אִישׁ בַּעַל). The original name was probably יְשׁוּבָעָל or אִישׁ (בַּעַל) being altered into יְשׁוּבָעָם, the name being otherwise obscured in 1 Ch. xix. xxvii. Cp. Driver, Heb. Text of the BB. of Sam. and the summary of Kennicott's view in the Speaker's Comm. on 2 Sam. l. c. [W. T. B.] [F.]

JA'SHUB (יָשׁוּב: he who returns; in the Kethib of 1 Ch. vii. 1 it is יָשׁוּב, in the Samaritan Cod. of Num. xxvi. יְשׁוּב; B. in 1 Ch. Ἰασούβ; Jasub). 1. The third son of Issachar, and founder of the family of the Jashubites (Num. xxvi. 24; 1 Ch. vii. 1). In the list of Gen. xli. the name is given (possibly in a contracted or erroneous form, Gesen. Thes. p. 583) as JOB; but in the Samaritan Codex—followed by the LXX.—Jashub.

2. (B. Ἰασούδ.) One of the sons of Bani, a layman in the time of Ezra who had to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 29). In Esdras the name is JASUBUS.

JASHUB'BI-LE'HEM (יהשיב בן להם), in some copies יהשיב; καὶ ἀπέστρεψεν αὐτοὺς; et qui reversi sunt in Lahem), a person or a place named among the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah by Bath-shua the Canaanite (1 Ch. iv. 22). The name does not occur again. It is probably a place, and we should infer from its connexion with Maresha and Chozeba—if Chozeba be Chezib or Achzib—that it lay on the western side of the tribe, in or near the Shefelah. The Jewish explanations of this and the following verse are very curious. They may be seen in Jerome's Quaest. Hebr. on this passage, and, in a slightly different form, in the Targum on the Chronicles (ed. Wilkins, 29, 30). The mention of Moab gives the key to the whole. Chozeba is Elimelech; Joash and Saraph are Mahlon and Chilion, who "had the dominion in Moab" from marrying the two Moabite damsels: Jashubi-Lehem is Naomi and Ruth, who returned (Jashubi, from ישיב, "to return") to bread, or to Beth-lehem, after the famine: and the "ancient words" point to the Book of Ruth as the source of the whole. [G.] [W.]

JASHUBITES, THE (יהשיבים; Samaritan, יהישבי; A. δ' Ἰασουβί, B. -βει; familia Jasubitarum). The family founded by Jashub the son of Issachar (Num. xxvi. 24). [JASHUB, 1.]

JASIEL (יאשיאל = God creates; B. Ἐσσεήλ, A. Ἐσσηλ; Jasiel), the last named on the increased list of David's heroes in 1 Ch. xi. 47. He is described as the MESOBAITE. Nothing more is known of him.

JA'SON (Ἰάσων; Jason), a common Greek name which was frequently adopted by Hellenizing Jews as the equivalent of Jesus, Joshua (Ἰησοῦς; cp. Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, § 1), probably with some reference to its supposed connexion with īāshau (i.e. the Healer). A parallel change occurs in Alcinus (Eliakim); while Nicolaus, Dositheus, Menelaus, &c., were direct translations of Hebrew names.

1. JASON THE SON OF ELEAZER (cp. Ecclus. l. 27, Ἰησοῦς υἱὸς Σιπράχ Ἐλεάζαρ, Cod. A.) was one of the commissioners sent by Judas Maccabæus to conclude a treaty with the Romans B.C. 161 (1 Macc. viii. 17; Joseph. Ant. xii. 10, § 6).

2. JASON THE FATHER OF ANTIPATER, which last was an envoy to Rome at a later period (1 Macc. xii. 16, xiv. 22), is probably the same person as No. 1.

3. JASON OF CYRENE, a Jewish historian who wrote "in five books" a history of the Jewish war of liberation, which supplied the chief materials for the Second Book of Maccabees. His name and the place of his residence seem to mark Jason as a Hellenistic Jew, and it is probable on internal grounds that his history was written in Greek. This narrative included the wars under Antiochus Eupator, and Jason must therefore have written after B.C. 162; but nothing more is known of him than can be gathered from 2 Macc. ii. 19-23.

4. JASON THE HIGH-PRIEST, the second son of Simon II., and brother of Onias III. He succeeded in obtaining the high-priesthood from Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 175 B.C.) to the exclusion of his elder brother (2 Macc. iv. 7-26), and changed his name from Jesus to Jason (Joseph. Ant. xii. 5, § 1). He laboured in every way to introduce Greek customs among the people, and that with great success (2 Macc. iv.; Joseph. l. c.). In order to give permanence to the changes which he designed, he established a gymnasium at Jerusalem, and even the priests neglected their sacred functions to take part in the games (2 Macc. iv. 9, 14), and at last he went so far as to send a deputation to the Tyrian games in honour of Hercules. [HERCULES.] After three years (c. B.C. 172), being in turn supplanted in the king's favour by his own emissary Menelaus [MENELAUS], who obtained the office of high-priest from Antiochus by the offer of a larger bribe, Jason was forced to take refuge among the Ammonites (2 Macc. iv. 26). On a report of the death of Antiochus (c. 170 B.C.) he made a violent attempt to recover his power (2 Macc. v. 5-7), but was repulsed, and again fled to the Ammonites. Afterwards he was compelled to retire to Egypt, and thence to Sparta, whither he went in the hope of receiving protection "in virtue of his being connected with them by race" (2 Macc. v. 9; cp. 1 Macc. xii. 7; Frankel, Monatschrift, 1853, p. 456), and there "perished in a strange land" (2 Macc. l. c.; cp. Dan. xii. 30 sq.; 1 Macc. i. 12 sq.). [B. F. W.] [C. H.]

5. JASON THE THESSALONIAN, who entertained Paul and Silas, and was in consequence attacked by the Jewish mob (Acts xvii. 5, 6, 7, 9). He is probably the same as the Jason mentioned in Rom. xvi. 21, as a companion of the Apostle, and one of his kinsmen (συγγενεῖς) or fellow-tribesmen. Jason and the other disciples had to give security (τὸ ἱκανόν), which probably means that they became bound against all further disturbance, and that explains the departure of the Apostles during the night. Chrysostom on the other hand considers that Jason answered for the production of the Apostles; so that, by sending them away, he in fact endangered his own life on their behalf (37th Homily on the Acts, § 2, p. 283, in Pat. Gr. lx. 265). [W. A. W.] [C. H.]

JASPER (Ἰάσπις; iaspis; iaspis), a precious stone mentioned in the O. and N. T. In the high-priest's breastplate it stands, under its Hebrew and English names, last of the twelve, third in the fourth row (Ex. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13), and under both names it adorns the robe of the king of Tyre (Ezek. xxviii. 13).

Plato mentions as among highly-prized stones σάρδια, ιδωσίδες, σμάραγδοι (Phaed. p. 110 s. f.); and Theophrastus specifies the σάρδιον, the ἰάσπις, the σάσπερος, as stones engraved for seals and as beautiful to the eye (de Lapid., sect. iv. § 23, p. 343, ed. Wimmer). Before B.C. 285, subsequently to the two last-named writers, the Septuagint Version was begun, in which ἰάσπις occurs twice, viz. in the high-priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 18) and in the Tyrian royal robe (Ezek. xxviii. 13). But only in one of these places does it correspond in position with the Hebrew, Yāshēphēh (A. V. jasper); namely, in the robe, where it stands sixth. In the breastplate, where it again stands sixth, the corresponding Hebrew is Yahalom (A. V. diamond); while twelfth, where the Hebrew is Yāshēphēh (A. V. jasper), the Greek is δρύχιον. But it does not follow that the LXX. translated Yahalom by Yasaris and Yāshēphēh by δρύχιον; for the order of the words may have got misplaced.

* Jason and Jesus occur together as Jewish names in the history of Aristæus (Hody, De Test. p. vii.).

Its earliest Latin occurrence is, we believe, in Virgil (Aen. iv. 261), and here also we find it for the first time described in appearance. Aeneas wears a sword stellatus iaspide fulvā, in which words we see a sparkling gold-coloured gem.

To about the same period belongs an epistle quoted by Macrobius, wherein Augustus addressed Maecenas as Pearl of the Tiber, Emerald of the Cilnii, Iaspis of Potters (Iaspi figulorum), Beryl of Porsena (Macrob. ii. 4, § 12).

In the apostolic and sub-apostolic period this stone is further mentioned and described. In the Apocalypse the Divine Being on the throne was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone (iv. 3). The luminary (φωστῆρ) of the New Jerusalem resembled the jasper, a stone most precious (τιμιώτατος), clear as crystal (κρυστάλλινος, xxi. 11). The wall of the city was of jasper (v. 18), as was also its first foundation (v. 19). Josephus in his two accounts of the breastplate (Ant. iii. 7, § 5; B. J. v. 5, § 7) puts Yasaris in the fifth place, where the Hebrew is sappir (A. V. sapphire), though it does not follow again that he was translating sappir by Yasaris.

Pliny (N. H. xxxvii., § 115, Sillig), treating of Gemmae, says, "viret et saepe translucet iaspis;" but there was much variety of colour, such as emerald-like, bluish grey, air-like, caerulean, purple, turbid, according to where the stone was found, the best kind being purplish, the second best rather rose-coloured, the third somewhat of emerald tint. For magnitude Pliny had seen an iaspis of fifteen (al. lec. eleven) unciae carved into a breastplated figure of Nero.

Martial said that Stella wore on his finger sardonyxes, emeralds, diamonds, iaspides (v. 11, 1). Another was seeking out genuine sardonyxes and fixing the value of great iaspides (ix. 60, 19, 20).

Dioscorides (v. 159, al. 160) described the Yasaris as of various kinds, resembling emerald, or crystal, or air, smoky, having bright white veins, resembling turpentine. Dionysius Periegetes (vv. 724, 782, 1120) describes it as of the colour of air and of water (ἡερδέσσα, ὑδάδεσσα), and mentioning it after the diamond makes it pale green and translucent (χλωρὰ διαγυζουσαν).

Epiphanius describes the iaspis thus, in Rosenmüller's translation: "The colour of some has a greenish shade; these are more soft and imperfectly transparent. The internal mass is green; it resembles the rust of the nobler metals and has several rows of strata. Another species is of a light sea-green colour, with a paler lustre. A third . . . its bluish red is somewhat diaphanous, and has also a wine and amethyst colour . . . There is also a green jasper having no lustre; and another still, resembling snow and lithomarge, which is called the old jasper" (Epiphanius. De XII. Gemmis, sect. vi. in Pat. Gr. xliii. 297, 332; E. F. C. Rosenmüller, Mineralogy and Botany of the Bible, p. 41). Epiphanius, enumerating the twelve stones in the order of the LXX., places the iaspis sixth.

Coming now to the jasper of the moderns, we notice that Andreas Bacciis, 1603, describes its beautiful combination of many excellent greens and whites (De Gemmis, c. 8, p. 70). A. R. Millin de Grandmaison makes it the chief of the opaque silicious stones, coloured green, yellow, brown, black, grey; and he notices the blood jasper, a green sort spotted with red (Archéologie des Pierres Gravées, ed. 1826, p. 134). Madame Barrera speaks of its lustreless fracture, its complete lack of transparency, its advantageous use in mosaics on account of its variety of colour (Gems and Jewels, 1860, p. 201).

Augusto Castellani describes jasper as a dark quartz, very compact and capable of receiving a beautiful polish; white, brown, black jasper being rare; red, blue, violet, green, abundant; green the most common; blood jasper much sought for engraving (Gems, tr. by Mrs. Brogden, 1871, p. 102). Streeter says it is found in compact kidney-shaped masses, and in pebbles; its colours, green, yellow, red, rarely blue; near Cairo it occurs in masses; in the Vatican there are a vase of red jasper with white veins, and one of black jasper with yellow veins (Precious Stones and Gems, 1877, p. 201). At South Kensington there are amorphous specimens of porcelain jasper, polished agate jasper, and riband jasper.

Mr. C. W. King draws the following general conclusion:—"Greenness and more or less transparency were (according to Pliny) the two essential characters of the ancient jaspis. According to all ancient testimony, the ancient jaspis was exactly the opposite to the modern jasper, the latter being always opaque and corresponding to the achates of the Romans. The jaspis of the ancients was our chalcodony (silica and alumina); in its primary sense the variety coloured green by nickel, now called plasma, but in after-times embracing the blue, the purple, the yellow, and white-brown shades of the same substance" (Precious Stones, 1865, pp. 202, 203, 206). It must be observed that if the jaspis of the ancients was our chalcodony, this latter could not have been the ancient chalcodony, since both jaspis and chalcodony are named in the New Jerusalem. [C. JASU'BUS (Ἰασούβος; Jasub), 1 Esd. ix. 30. [JASHUB, 2.]

JAT'AL (BA. Ἰάτᾱρ; Azer), 1 Esd. v. 28. The form in A. V. is adopted from the Aldine Version, after the Bishops' Bible. [ATER, 1.]

JATHNI'-EL (Ἰαθνι'ηλ) = whom God bestows; B. Ἰεθούηλ; Jathanazēl, a Korhite Levite, and a doorkeeper (A. V. "porter") to the House of Jehovah, i. e. the Tabernacle; the fourth of the family of Meshelemiah (1 Ch. xxvi. 2).

JAT'TIR (Ἰαττῖρ), in Josh. xv. 48; elsewhere Ἰαττῖρ = very great, eminent; B. Ἰεθέρ; Elethér; Jether, a town of Judah in the mountain district (Josh. xv. 48), one of the group containing Socoh, Eshtemoth, &c.; it was among the nine cities which with their suburbs were allotted out of Judah to the priests (xxi. 14; 1 Ch. vi. 57), and was one of the places in the south which David used to haunt in his freebooting days, and to his friends in which he sent gifts from the spoil of the enemies of Jehovah (1 Sam. xxx. 27). By Eusebius and Jerome (OS. p. 268, 42; p. 165, 3) it is spoken of as a very large place, inhabited only by Christians, in the middle of Daroma, near Malatha, and 20 miles from Eleutheropolis. It is named by Hap-Parchi, the Jewish traveller; but the passage is defective, and little can be gathered from it (Zunz in Asher's Benj. Tudela, ii. 442). By Robinson (i. 494-5) it is identified with 'Attir, 9½ miles N. of Molada, Kh. el-Mih, and 12 miles S.S.W. of Hebron, and having the probable sites of Socoh, Eshtemoh, and other southern towns within short distances. This identification may be accepted, notwithstanding the discrepancy in the distance of 'Attir from Eleutheropolis, which is by road much more than 20 Roman miles, though in a direct line it is about that distance. Possibly Eusebius may have confounded 'Attir with Yuttah, which, by road, is about 20 miles from B. Jbrin. There are many caves, foundations, and masses of stones, and a kubbeh standing on a knoll (PEF. Mem. iii. 404, 408; Guérin, Judee, iii. 197; Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 383 sq.). Robinson notices that it is not usual for the Jod with which Jattir commences to change into the Ain of 'Attir (Bib. Res. i. 494, note).

The two Ithrite heroes of David's guard were probably from Jattir, living memorials to him of his early difficulties. [G.] [W.]

JAVAN (𐤎): in Gen. יָוָן; in Is. and Ezek. Ἰάβαν; in Dan. and Zech. Ἰάβαν; Græcia, Graeci, Javan). 1. A son of Japheth, and the father of Elishah and Tarshish, Kittim and Dodanim (Gen. x. 2, 4). The name appears in Is. lxxvi. 19, where it is coupled with Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, and more particularly with Tubal and the "isles afar off," as representatives of the Gentile world; again, in Ezek. xxvii. 13, where it is coupled with Tubal and Meshech, as carrying on considerable commerce with the Tyrians, who imported from these countries slaves and brazen vessels; in Dan. viii. 21, x. 20, xi. 2 (A. V. Græcia, R. V. Greece), in reference to the Macedonian empire; and, lastly, in Zech. ix. 13 (A. V. and R. V. Greece), in reference to the Graeco-Syrian empire. From a comparison of these various passages there can be no doubt that Javan was regarded as the representative of the Greek race: the similarity of the name to that branch of the Hellenic family with which the Orientals were best acquainted, viz. the Ionians, particularly in the older form in which their name appears (Ἰάβαν), is too close to be regarded as accidental: and the occurrence of the name in the cuneiform inscriptions of the time of Sargon (about B.C. 709), in the form of Jāvanu [M.V.¹¹], as descriptive of the isle of Cyprus, where the Assyrians first came in contact with the power of the Greeks, further shows that its use was not confined to the Hebrews, but was widely spread throughout the East. The name * was probably introduced into Asia by the Phoenicians, to whom the Ionians were naturally better known than any other of the Hellenic races, on account of their commercial activity and the high prosperity of their towns on the western coast of Asia Minor. The extension of the name westward to the general body of the Greeks, as they became known to the Hebrews through the Phoenicians, was but a natural process. The discovery of the name of a "Yivana" or Ionian in the Tel-el-Amarna tablets, serving "in the country of Tyre," points to acquaintance between Greek and Canaanite a century before the Exodus; and it is illustrative of the communication which existed between the Greeks and the East, that among the artists who contributed to the ornamentation of Esarhaddon's palaces, the names of several Greek artists appear in one of the inscriptions (Rawlinson's Herod. i. 483). At a later period the Hebrews must have gained considerable knowledge of the Greeks through the Egyptians. Psammetichus (B.C. 664-610) employed Ionians and Carians as mercenaries, and showed them so much favour that the war-caste of Egypt forsook him in a body: the Greeks were settled near Bubastis, probably at Tahpanhes, Tell Defenneh, in a part of the country with which the Jews were familiar (Herod. ii. 154). It is possible that the Greek garrison of Tahpanhes accompanied Pharaoh Necho and took part in the fight at Megiddo (Jer. ii. 16). At any rate, during the troubled period 607-587 B.C., when there was a large migration to Egypt, there must have been constant intercourse between the Jews and the Greek frontier garrison at Tahpanhes, under circumstances that would give opportunity for the permeation of Greek words and Greek ideas among the upper classes of the Jewish nation (Flinders Petrie, Egypt Explor. Fund, 4th Memoir, p. 48 sq.). The policy of Psammetichus was followed by the succeeding monarchs, especially Amasis (571-525), who gave the Greeks Naucratis as a commercial emporium. The Greeks themselves were very slightly acquainted with the southern coast of Syria until the invasion of Alexander the Great. The earliest notices of Palestine occur in the works of Hecataeus (B.C. 549-486), who mentions only the two towns Canytis and Cardytus; the next are in Herodotus, who describes the country as Syria Palaestina, and notices incidentally the towns Ascalon, Azotus, Ecbatana (Batanaea?), and Cadytis, the same as the Canytis of Hecataeus, probably Gaza. These towns were on the border of Egypt, with the exception of the uncertain Ecbatana; and it is therefore highly probable that no Greek had, down to this late period, travelled through Palestine.

2. (BA. omit; Græcia.) A town in the southern part of Arabia (Yemen), whither the Phoenicians traded (Ezek. xxvii. 19): the connexion with Uzal decides in favour of this place rather than Greece, as in the Vulg. For conjectures as to the origin of the name, see Orelli in loco (in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Komm.); and Rüetschi in Herzog, *RE.*², s. v.

JAVAN, SONS OF (𐤎) 𐤎 𐤎; ἰσὶ τῶν Ἰάβανων; filii Graecorum); in A. V. "the Grecians," in R. V. and A. V. marg. the sons of the Grecians (Joel iii. 6). The view generally adopted is that the Ionians or Greeks are here intended. [GREECE; GREEKS; GRECIANS.] [W.]

JAVELIN. [ARMS.]

JA'ZAR (B. 'Iaζήρ, A. 'Iaζήν; Gazer), 1 Macc. v. 8. [JAAZER.]

JA'ZER ('Iaζήρ; 2 Sam. 'Eλιέζερ; in 2 Sam. A. 'Eλιαζής; in 1 Ch. B. Γαζήρ, 'Ριαζήρ, A. Γαζήρ; Jazer, Jaser, Jezer), Num. xxiii. 1, 3; Josh. xxi. 39; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5; 1 Ch. vi. 81, xxvi. 31; Is. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 32. [JAAZER.]

JA'ZIZ (יִזִּיז = shining; B. 'Iaζεῖς, A. 'Iωσ-ζιζ; Jaziz), a Hagarite who had charge of the "flocks," i.e. the sheep and goats (צֹמֶרֶת), of king David (1 Ch. xxvii. 31), which were probably pastured on the east of Jordan, in the nomad country where the forefathers of Jaziz had for ages roamed (cp. v. 19-22).

JEAR'IM, MOUNT (יְעָרִים; B. πόλις 'Iapeiv, A. 'Iapίμ; Mons Jarim), a place named in specifying the northern boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 10). The boundary ran from Mount Seir to "the shoulder of Mount Jearim, which is Chesalon"—that is, Chesalon was the landmark on the mountain. Kesla stands, 9½ miles due west of Jerusalem, "on a high point on the north slope of the lofty ridge between Wady Ghuráb and W. Ism'ain. The latter of these is the south-western continuation of W. Beit Hannina, and the former runs parallel to and northward of it, and they are separated by this ridge, which is probably Mount Jearim" (Rob. iii. 154). If Jearim be taken as Hebrew, it signifies "forests." Forests in our sense of the word there are none: but we have the testimony of one traveller that "such thorough woods, both for loneliness and obscurity, he had not seen since he left Germany" (Tobler, Wand-derung, 1857, p. 178; see also PEF. Mem. iii. p. 25; and Conder, Hbk. p. 259). Kirjath-Jearim—whether it be Kuryet el-'Enab, towards the north, or Kh. 'Erma, towards the south—is not far distant. [CHESALON.] [G.] [W.]

JEAT'ERAI (יְעָתְרַי; A. 'Iεθρί, B. 'Iεθρεί; Jethrai), a Gershonite Levite, son of Zerah (1 Ch. vi. 21); apparently the head of his family at the time that the service of the Tabernacle was instituted by David (cp. v. 31). In the reversed genealogy of the descendants of Gershom, Zerah's son is stated as ETHNI (יְתְנִי, v. 41). The two names have quite similarity enough to allow of the one being a corruption of the other, though the fact is not ascertainable.

JEBERECHI'AH (יְבֵרֵכִי אֵה = whom Jehovah blesses; Bapaxias; Barachias), probably the same name as Berechiah. Nothing is known of him. [F.]

JEBU'S (יְבוּס; 'Iεβούς; Jebus), one of the names of Jerusalem, the city of the Jebusites, also called JEBUSI. It occurs only twice. first in connexion with the journey of the Levite and his unhappy concubine from Bethlehem to Gibeah (Judg. xix. 10, 11); and secondly, in the narrative of the capture of the place by David in 1 Ch. xi. 4, 5. In 2 Sam. v. 6-9 the name Jerusalem is employed. By Gesenius (Thea. p. 189, דָּבִד) and Furst (Handb. p. 477) Jebus is interpreted to mean a place dry or down-trodden like a threshing-floor; an interpretation which by Ewald (iii. 155) and Stanley (S. & P. p. 177) is taken to prove that Jebus must have been the south-western hill, the "dry rock" of the modern Zion, and "not the Mount Moriah, the city of Solomon, in whose centre arose the perennial spring." But in the great uncertainty which attends these ancient names, this is, to say the least, very doubtful. Jebus was the city of the Jebusites. Either the name of the town is derived from the name of the tribe, or the reverse. If the former, then the interpretation just quoted falls to the ground. If the latter, then the origin of the name of Jebus is thrown back to the very beginning of the Canaanite race—so far at any rate as to make its connexion with a Hebrew root extremely uncertain. [G.] [W.]

JEBU'SI (יְבוּסִי = the Jebusite; Jebusæus, Jebus), the name employed for the city of JEBUS, only in the ancient document describing the landmarks and the towns of the allotment of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 8 [BA. 'Iεβούς], xviii. 16 [B. 'Iεβουαί, A. 'Iεβούς], 28 [BA. 'Iεβούς]). In the first and last place the explanatory words, "which is Jerusalem," are added. In each place R. V. reads "the Jebusite"; A. V. in the first only.

A parallel to this mode of designating the town by its inhabitants is found in this very list in Zemaraim (xviii. 22), Avim (v. 23), Ophni (v. 24), and Japhletite (xvi. 3), &c. [G.] [W.]

JEBUSITE, JEBUSITES, THE. Although these two forms are indiscriminately employed in the A. V. and R. V., yet in the original the name, whether applied to individuals or to the nation, is never found in the plural; always singular. The usual form is יְבוּסִי; but in a few places—viz., 2 Sam. v. 6, xxiv. 16, 18; 1 Ch. xxi. 18 only—it is יְבוּסִי. Without the article, יְבוּסִי, it occurs in 2 Sam. v. 8; 1 Ch. xi. 6; Zech. ix. 7. In the first two of these the force is much increased by removing the article introduced in the A. V., and reading "and smiteth a Jebusite." We do not hear of a progenitor to the tribe, but the name which would have been his had he existed has attached itself to the city in which we meet with the Jebusites in historic times. [JEBUS.] The LXX. A. gives the name 'Iεβουαῖος in Judg. xix. 11, B. 'Iεβουασεῖν; in Ezra ix. 1, BA. -σαι; Vulg. Jebusæus.

1. According to the table in Genesis x. "the Jebusite" is the third son of Canaan. His place in the list is between Heth and the Amorites (Gen. x. 16; 1 Ch. i. 14), a position which the tribe maintained long after (Num. xiii. 29; Josh. xi. 3); and the same connexion is traceable in the words of Ezekiel (xvi. 3, 45), who addresses Jerusalem as the fruit of the union of an Amorite with a Hittite. But in the formula by which the Promised Land is so often designated, the Jebusites are uniformly placed last, which may have arisen from their small number, or their quiet disposition. See Gen. xv. 21; Ex. iii. 8, 17, xiii. 5, xxiii. 23, xxxiii. 2, xxxiv. 11; Deut. vii. 1, xx. 17; Josh. iii. 10, ix. 1, xii. 8, xxiv. 11; 1 K. ix. 20; 2 Ch. viii. 7; Ezra ix. 1; Neh. ix. 8.

2. Our first glimpse of the actual people is in the invaluable report of the spies—"the Hittite, and the Jebusite, and the Amorite dwell in the mountain" (Num. xiii. 29). This was forty years before the entrance into Palestine, but no change in their habitat had been made in the interval; for when Jabin organised his rising against Joshua, he sent amongst others "to the Amorite, the Hittite, the Perizzite, and the Jebusite in the mountain" (Josh. xi. 3). A mountain-tribe they were, and a mountain-tribe they remained. "Jebus, which is Jerusalem," lost its king in the slaughter of Beth-horon (Josh. x. 1, 5, 26; cp. xii. 10)—was sacked and burnt by the men of Judah (Judg. i. 21), and its citadel finally scaled and occupied by David (2 Sam. v. 6); but still the Jebusites who inhabited Jerusalem, the "inhabitants of the land," could not be expelled from their mountain-seat, but continued to dwell with the children of Judah and Benjamin to a very late date (Josh. xv. 8, 63; Judg. i. 21, xix. 11). This obstinacy is characteristic of mountaineers, and the few traits we possess of the Jebusites show them to have been a warlike people. Before the expedition under Jabin, Adoni-zedek, the king of Jerusalem, had himself headed the attack on the Gibeonites, which ended in the slaughter of Beth-horon, and cost him his life on that eventful evening under the trees at Makkedah (Josh. x.).^a That they were established in the strongest natural fortress of the country in itself says much for their courage and power; and when they lost it, it was through bravado rather than from any cowardice on their part. [JERUSALEM.]

After this they emerge from the darkness but once, in the person of Araunah^b the Jebusite, "Araunah the king" (אֲרָאֻנָה הַמֶּלֶךְ), who appears before us in true kingly dignity in his well-known transaction with David (2 Sam. xxiv. 23; 1 Ch. xxi. 23). The picture presented us in these well-known passages is a very interesting one. We see the fallen Jebusite king and his four sons on their threshing-floor on Mount Moriah, treading out their wheat (שָׁרַף; A. V. "threshing") by driving the oxen with the heavy sledges (סִבְּכָה; A. V. "threshing instruments") over the corn, round the central heap. We see Araunah on the approach of David fall on his face on the ground, and we hear him ask, "Wherefore is my lord the king come to his slave?" followed by his offer of all his property. But this reveals no traits peculiar to the Jebusites, or characteristic of them more than of their contemporaries in Israel, or in the other nations of Canaan. The early judges and kings of Israel threshed wheat in the wine-press (Judg. vi. 11), followed the herd out of the field (1 Sam. xi. 5), and were taken from the sheepcotes (2 Sam. vii. 8); and the courtesy of Araunah is closely paralleled by that of Ephron the Hittite in his negotiation with Abraham.

We are not favoured with further traits of the Jebusites, nor with any clue to their religion or rites; but these last were no doubt very similar to those of the CANAANITES and HITTITES, with whom they were closely allied.

Two names of individual Jebusites are preserved. In ADONIZEDEK the only remarkable thing is its Hebrew form, in which it means "Lord of justice."

That of ARAUNAH is much more uncertain—so much so as to lead to the belief that we possess it more nearly in its original shape. In the short narrative of Samuel alone the Hebrew name is given in three forms—"the Avranah" (v. 16, Qeri; the Aravnah, K'hethib); Araneah (v. 18, Qeri; Aravnah, K'hethib); Aravnah (v. 20, 21). In 1 Ch. xxi. 15 it is Ornan, while with the LXX. it is Opva, and with Josephus Opovva. [ARAUNAH; ORNAN.]

To these, if Jerusalem be Salem, may perhaps be added MELCHIZEDEK.

In the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles the ashes of St. Barnabas, after his martyrdom in Cyprus, are said to have been buried in a cave, "where the race of the Jebusites formerly dwelt;" and previously to this is mentioned the arrival in the island of a "pious Jebusite, a kinsman of Nero" (Act. Apost. Apocr. p. 72, 73, ed. Tisch.). [G.] [W.]

JECAMIAH (יְעָמִיָּאֵה = may Jehovah set up, i.e. Jekamiah, as the name is elsewhere given; BA. Iekemid; Jecemia), one of a batch of seven, including Salathiel and Pedaiah, who were introduced into the royal line, on the failure of it in the person of Jehoiachin (1 Ch. iii. 18). They were all apparently sons of Neri, of the line of Nathan, since Salathiel certainly was so (Luke iii. 27). [GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, p. 1148 a.] [A. C. H.]

JECHOLIAH (יְחֹלִיָּאֵה, with the final ú, = Jehovah is powerful: B. Kaleid, A. I'xema; Joseph. Ant. ix. 10, § 3, 'Axielas: Jechelia), wife of Amaziah king of Judah, and mother of Azariah or Uzziah his successor (2 K. xv. 2). Both this queen and Jehoaddan, the mother of her husband, are specified as "of Jerusalem." In the A. V. of Chronicles her name is given as JECOLLAH.

JECHONIAS (I'echonias; Jechonias). 1. The Greek form of the name of king JECHONIAH, followed by the translators in the books rendered from the Greek, viz. Esth. xi. 4; Bar. i. 3, 9; Matt. i. 11, 12.

2. 1 Ed. viii. 92. [SHECHANIAH.]

3. 1 Ed. i. 9. The same as CONANIAH.

JECOLIAH (יְחֹלִיָּאֵה; B. Kaaid, A. I'xelaia; Jechelia), 2 Ch. xxvi. 3 [R. V. Jechiliah]. In the original the name differs from its form in the parallel passage in Kings, only in not having the final ú. [JECHOLIAH.]

^a In v. 5 the king of Jerusalem is styled one of the "five kings of the Amorites." But the LXX. (both MSS.) have τῶν Ἰεβουσαίων of the Jebusites.

^b By Josephus (Ant. vii. 13, § 9) Araunah is said to have been one of David's chief friends (ἐν τοῖς μέγιστα Δαυίδου), and to have been expressly spared by him when the citadel was taken. If there is any truth in this, David no doubt made his friendship during his wanderings, when he also acquired that of Uriah the Hittite, Ahimelech, Sibbechai, and others of his associates who belonged to the old nations.

JECONIAH (יְחֹנָיָה; excepting once, יְחֹנָיָה, with the final ú, Jer. xxiv. 1; and once in Khetib, יְחֹנָיָה, Jer. xxvii. 20: Ἰεχωνίας: Jechonias), an altered form of the name of JEHOIACHIN, last but one of the kings of Judah, which is found in the following passages:—1 Ch. iii. 16, 17; Jer. xxiv. 1, xxvii. 20, xxviii. 4, xxxi. 1; Esth. ii. 6. It is still further abbreviated to Coniah. See also JECHONIAS and JOACIM.

JECONIAS (Ἰεχωνίας; Jechonias), 1 Esd. i. 9. [CONANIAH.]

JEDAI'AH [3 syll.] (יְדַיָּא = Jehocah hath known: B. Ἀναδειά, Ἰαδδαί, Ἰεουδά, Δαδειά, Ἰεδδούς; A. Ἰδαί, Ἰδαί, Ἰαδία, Ἰεδδούδ; N. Ἰδαίς, Δαλειδ: Idaia, Jedaia, Jadaia, Joiada, Jedei, Jeddu). 1. Head of the second course of priests, as they were divided in the time of David (1 Ch. xxiv. 7). Some of them survived to return to Jerusalem after the Babylonian Captivity, as appears from Ezra ii. 36, Neh. vii. 39—"the children of Jedaiah, of the house of Jeshua, 973." The addition "of the house of Jeshua" indicates that there were two priestly families of the name of Jedaiah, which it appears from Neh. xii. 6, 7, 19, 21, was actually the case. If these sons of Jedaiah had for their head JESHUA, the high-priest in the time of Zerubbabel, as the Jewish tradition says they had (Thos. Lewis's Orig. Heb. bk. ii. ch. vii., Lond. 1724, Oxf. 1835), this may be the reason why, in 1 Ch. ix. 10 and Neh. xi. 10, the course of Jedaiah is named before that of Joiarib, though Joiarib's was the first course. But perhaps Jeshua was another priest descended from Jedaiah, from whom this branch sprung. It is certainly a corrupt reading in Neh. xi. 10 which makes Jedaiah son of Joiarib. 1 Ch. ix. 10 preserves the true text. In Esdras the name is JEDDU.

2. (of ἑνεργητόρες; Idaia.) A priest in the time of Jeshua the high-priest (Zech. vi. 10, 14). [A. C. H.]

JEDAI'AH (יְדַיָּא = he praiseth or confesseth Jah). This is a different name from the last, though the two are identical in the A. V.

1. (B. Ἰδαί, A. Ἰδαί; Idaia.) A man named in the genealogies of Simeon as a forefather of Ziza, one of the chiefs of the tribe, apparently in the time of king Hezekiah (1 Ch. iv. 37).

2. (B. Ἰεδαί, N. Ἰεδδειδ; Jedaiah.) Son of Harumaph; a man who did his part in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

JED'DU (Ἰεδδους; Jeddu), 1 Esd. v. 24.

JEDE'US (Ἰεδαίος; Jeddeus), 1 Esd. ix. 30. [ADAI'AH, 5.]

JEDI'A-EL (יְדִי'אֵל = known of God: B. Ἰασηλ, Ἀσνβήρ, Ἰασηλ, Ἀρηλ, Σαβά; A. Ἰασηλ, Ἀσβήλ: Jadihel). 1. A chief patriarch of the tribe of Benjamin, from whom sprang many Benjamite houses of fathers, numbering 17,200 mighty men of valour, in the days of David (1 Ch. vii. 6, 11). It is usually assumed that Jediael is the same as Ashbel (Gen. xli. 21; Num. xxvi. 38; 1 Ch. viii. 1). But though this may be so, it cannot be affirmed with certainty. [BECHER; BELA.] Jediael might be a later descendant of Benjamin not mentioned in the Pentateuch, but who, from the fruitfulness of his house and the decadence of elder branches, rose to the first rank.

2. (B. Ἰασηλ, A. Ἰασηλ; Jadihel.) Second son of Mesheliah, a Levite, of the sons of Ebiasaph the son of Korah. One of the doorkeepers of the Temple in the time of David (1 Ch. xxvi. 1, 2). [A. C. H.]

3. (B. Ἰασηλ, A. Ἰασηλ; Jadihel.) Son of Shimri; one of the heroes of David's guard in the enlarged catalogue of Chronicles (1 Ch. xi. 45). In the absence of further information, we cannot decide whether or not he is the same person as

4. (B. Ἰασηλ, A. Ἰασηλ; Jadihel.) One of the chiefs (lit. "heads") of the thousands of Manasseh who joined David on his march from Aphek to Ziklag when he left the Philistine army on the eve of the battle of Gilboa, and helped him in his revenge on the marauding Amalekites (1 Ch. xii. 20; cp. 1 Sam. xxix. xxx.).

JEDI'DAH (יְדִידָה = beloved; B. Ἰεδαί, A. Ἰεδδαί; Idida), queen of Amon, and mother of the good king Josiah (2 K. xxii. 1). She was a native of Bozkath near Lachish, the daughter of a certain Adai'ah. By Josephus (Ant. x. 4, § 1) her name is given as Ἰεβίς.

JEDID'AH (יְדִידָה = beloved of Jehovah

[cp. the Sabaeen name, יְדִידָה, MV.¹¹]; B. Ἰεδδαί, A. Ἰεδδαί; Anabibis Domino), the name bestowed, through Nathan the prophet, on David's son Solomon (2 Sam. xii. 25).

Bathsheba's first child had died—"Jehovah struck it" (v. 15). A second son was born, and David—whether in allusion to the state of his external affairs, or to his own restored peace of mind—called his name Shelómôh ("Peaceful"); and Jehovah loved the child. And David sent by the hand of Nathan, to obtain through him some oracle or token of the Divine favour on the babe, and the babe's name was called JEDID-JAH. It is then added that this was done "for the Lord's sake" (R. V.). The clue to the meaning of these last words, and indeed of the whole circumstance, seems to reside in the fact that "Jedid" and "David" are both derived from the same root, or from two very closely related (see Gesen. Thees. p. 565 a—"דָּד", idem quod דָּדָה"). To us these plays on words have little or no significance; but to the old Hebrews, as to the modern Orientals, they were full of meaning. To David himself, the "darling" or "beloved" of his family and his people, no more happy omen, no more precious seal of his restoration to the Divine favour after his late fall, could have been afforded than this announcement by the prophet, that the name of his child was to combine his own name with that of Jehovah—JEDID-JAH, "darling of Jehovah."

The practice of bestowing a second name on children, in addition to that given immediately on birth—such second name having a religious bearing, as Nûr ed-Dîn, Saleh ed-Dîn (Saladin), &c.—still exists in the East. [G.] [W.]

JEDITHIN. [JEDUTHUN.]

JEDUTHUN (יְדֻתָּוִן (?) = praise; with the final ן, except in 1 Ch. xvi. 38, Neh. xi. 17,

Ps. xxx. title, and lxxvii. title, where it is יְדֻתָּן, i.e. Jeduthun: B. יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם; א. יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם; ס. יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם, יְדֵיבוֹטָם: Idithun, Idithum, a Levite, of the family of Merari, who was associated with Heman the Kohathite, and Asaph the Gershonite, in the conduct of the musical service of the Tabernacle, in the time of David; according to what is said in 1 Ch. xxiii. 6, that David divided the Levites "into courses among the sons of Levi, namely, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari." The proof of his being a Merarite depends upon his identification with Ethan in 1 Ch. xv. 17, who, we learn from that passage as well as from the genealogy in vi. 44 (A. V.), was a Merarite [HEMAN]. But it may be added that the very circumstance of Ethan being a Merarite, which Jeduthun must have been (since the only reason of there being three musical chiefs was to have one for each division of the Levites), is a strong additional proof of this identity. Another proof may be found in the mention of Hosah (xvi. 38, 42), as a son of Jeduthun* and a gatekeeper, compared with xxvi. 10, where we read that Hosah was of the children of Merari. Assuming then that, as regards 1 Ch. vi. 44, xv. 17, 19, יְדֻתָּן is a mere clerical variation for יְדֻתָּן—which a comparison of xv. 17, 19 with xvi. 41, 42, xxv. 1, 3, 6, 2 Ch. xxxv. 15, makes almost certain—we have Jeduthun's descent as son of Kishi, or Kushaiah, from Mahli, the son of Mushi, the son of Merari, the son of Levi, being the fourteenth generation from Levi inclusive (1 Ch. vi. 44–47). His office was generally to preside over the music of the Temple service, consisting of the nebel, or nablum, the cimbor, or harp, and the cymbals, together with the human voice (the trumpets being confined to the priests). But his peculiar part, as well as that of his two colleagues Heman and Asaph, was "to sound with cymbals of brass," while the others played on the nablum and the harp (1 Ch. xv. 16, 17). This appointment to the office was by election of the chiefs (דִּבְרֵי) of the Levites at David's command, each of the three divisions probably choosing one. The first occasion of Jeduthun's ministering was when David brought up the Ark to Jerusalem. He then took his place in the procession, and played on the cymbals (1 Ch. xv. 17, 19, Ethan). But when the division of the Levitical services took place, owing to the Tabernacle being at Gibeon and the Ark at Jerusalem, while Asaph and his brethren were appointed to minister before the Ark, it fell to Jeduthun and Heman to be located with Zadok the priest, to give thanks "before the Tabernacle of the Lord in the high place that was at Gibeon," still by playing the cymbals in accompaniment to the other musical instruments (1 Ch. xvi. 39–42, cp. Ps. cl. 5). In the account of Josiah's Passover reference is made (2 Ch. xxxv. 15) to the singing as conducted in accordance with the arrangements made by David, and by Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun the king's seer (יְדֻתָּן הַיָּהוָה). [HEMAN.] Perhaps the phrase rather means the king's adviser in matters connected with the musical service. The sons of Jeduthun were employed (1 Ch. xxv. 1, 3, 6) partly in music, viz. six of them, who prophesied with the harp—Gedaliah, head of the 2nd ward; Zeri, or Izri, of the 4th; Jeshaiiah of the 8th, Shimei of the 10th,^b Hashabiah of the 12th, and Mattithiah of the 14th—and partly as gatekeepers (A. V. "porters") (xvi. 42), viz. Obed-Edom and Hosah (v. 38), which last had thirteen sons and brothers (xxvi. 11). The triple division of the Levitical musicians seems to have lasted as long as the Temple, and each to have been called after their respective leaders. At the dedication of Solomon's Temple "the Levites which were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jeduthun," performed their proper part (2 Ch. v. 12). In the reign of Hezekiah, again, we find the sons of Asaph, the sons of Heman, and the sons of Jeduthun, taking their part in purifying the Temple (2 Ch. xxix. 13, 14); they are mentioned, we have seen, in Josiah's reign, and so late as in Nehemiah's time we still find descendants of Jeduthun employed about the singing (Neh. xi. 17; 1 Ch. ix. 16). His name stands at the head of the 39th, 62nd, and 77th Psalms, indicating probably that they were to be sung by his choir. [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JEE'LI (B. Ἰεηλαί, A. Ἰεηλί; Celi), 1 Esd. v. 33. [JAALAH.]

JEE'LUS (B. Ἰηλος, A. Ἰηλή; Jehelus), 1 Esd. viii. 92. [JEBIEL, 9.]

JE-EZER (יְהִיזְקִיָּהּ (?) = father of help; Ἰαχιάζερ; Jizer), the form assumed in the list in Numbers (xxvi. 30 [LXX. v. 34]) by the name of a descendant of Manasseh, eldest son of Gilead, and founder of one of the chief families of the tribe. [JEEZERITES.] In parallel lists the name is given as ABI-EZER, and the family as the ABIEZRITES—the house of Gideon. Whether this change has arisen from the accidental addition or omission of a letter, or is an intentional variation, akin to that in the case of Abiel and Jehiel, cannot be ascertained. The LXX. perhaps read יְהִיזְקִיָּהּ.

JEEZERITES, THE (יְהִיזְקִיָּהּ; Ἰαχιάζερ), B. Ἰαχιάζερ; familia Hezeritarum), the family of the foregoing (Num. xxvi. 30).

JEGAR SAHADUTHA (גִּבְעַת הַתְּשׁוּבָה; Ἰαχιάζερ), "Mound of the testimony"; Bovnds tñs μαρτυρίας, but A. Bovnds μαρτυς; testimulm testis), the name said (Gen. xxxi. 47) to have been given by Laban the Aramean to a heap of stones which he erected as a memorial of the compact between Jacob and himself, while Jacob commemorated the same by setting up a "pillar" (μαρξέβδλ; v. 45). Galeed, "Mound of testimony" (cp. Ex. xx. 16), is given as the Hebrew equivalent of the western Aramaic yēgar sādā-dūthā. The fluctuation of the LXX. shows that some doubt was felt about the exact rendering of the Heb. גִּלְעָד , which means both "testifier" and "testimony," like our own term "witness." The Vulgate, oddly enough, has rightly translated Galeed by acervum testimonii, and Jegar Sahadutha wrongly by tumulum testis (but cp. v. 48). In the mind of the Hebrew writer the two names were evidently identical in meaning. It should perhaps be added that Galeed (Heb. גִּלְעָד) appears to convey a characteristic allusion to the name of the hill-country of Gilead (Heb. גִּלְעָד), which was the scene of the meeting between Jacob and Laban. Ewald even supposes that in the original story "the mound was the rocky mountain-range of Gilead itself" (H. I. i. 347). [C. J. B.]

* The reason why "son of Jeduthun" is especially attached to the name of Obed-Edom in this verse, is to distinguish him from the other Obed-Edom the Gittite (2 Sam. vi. 10) mentioned in the same verse, who was probably a Kohathite (Josh. xxi. 24).

^b Omitted in v. 3, but necessary to make up the six sons.

JEHAL'EL-EEL (יְהוֹאֵל־עֵל) = he praises God; R. V. Jehalleel; B. יְהוֹאֵל־עֵל , A. Ἰαλλεῖλ ; Jalleel). Four men of the Bene-Jehalleel are introduced abruptly into the genealogies of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 16). The name is identical with that rendered in the A. V. JEHALELEEL. The more correct form is given by R. V.

JEHAL'EL-EEL (יְהוֹאֵל־עֵל) = he praises God; R. V. Jehalleel; B. Ἰαλλεῖλ , A. Ἰαλλεῖλ ; Jalleel), a Merarite Levite, whose son Azariah took part in the restoration of the Temple in Hezekiah's time (2 Ch. xxix. 12).

JEHDEI'AH (יְחֵדַי־אַחַב , i.e. Yechde-yahu = Jehovah is glad). 1. (B. Ἰεδεία , A. Ἰαδαία , Apaðala; Jehedia). The representative of the Bene-Shubael—descendants of Gershom, son of Moses—in the time of David (1 Ch. xxiv. 20). But in xxvi. 24, a man of the name of Shebuel or Shubael is recorded as the head of the house; unless in this passage the family itself, and not an individual, be intended.

2. (Ἰαδίας ; Jadias). A Meronothite who had charge of the she-asses—the riding and breeding stock—of David (1 Ch. xxvii. 30).

JEHEZ'EKEL (יְהֵזְקֵל ; R. V. Jehezkel; δ Ἰεζεχὴλ ; Hezechiel), a priest to whom was given by David the charge of the twentieth of the twenty-four courses in the service of the House of Jehovah (1 Ch. xxiv. 16).

The name in the original is the same as that rendered EZEKIEL.

JEHI'AH (יְהִי־אַחַב) = Jehovah lives; B. Ἰεῖα , N. Εἰά , A. Ἰεαία ; Jehias). He and Obed-edom were "doorkeepers for the Ark" (דֹּרְשָׁיִם), the word elsewhere expressed by "porters" at the time of its establishment in Jerusalem (1 Ch. xv. 24). The name does not recur, but it is possible it may be exchanged for the similar JEHIEL or JEIEL in xvi. 5.

JEHI'EL (יְהִי־עֵל) = God lives. 1. (B. Ἰεθῆλ , Εἰθῆλ , Εἰεθῆλ ; A. Ἰθῆλ , Ἰεθῆλ ; Jahiel, Jehiel). One of the Levites appointed by David to assist in the service of the house of God (1 Ch. xv. 18, 20; xvi. 4).

2. (B. Ἰήλ , A. Ἰεθῆλ ; Jahiel). One of the sons of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, who was put to death by his brother Jehoram shortly after his becoming king (2 Ch. xxi. 2).

3. (Ἰεθῆλ ; Jahiel). One of the rulers of the house of God at the time of the reforms of Josiah (2 Ch. xxxv. 8). [SYEULUS.]

4. (B. Ἰήλ , Βεεθῆλ ; A. Ἰεθῆλ ; Jahiel). A Gershonite Levite, head of the Bene-Laadan in the time of David (1 Ch. xxiii. 8), who had charge of the treasures (xxix. 8). His family—JEHIELI, i.e. Jehielite, or, as we should say now, Jehielites—is mentioned in xxvi. 21.

5. (B. Ἰεθῆλ , A. Ἰεθῆλ ; Jahiel). Son of Hachmoni, or of a Hachmonite, named in the list of David's officers (1 Ch. xxvii. 32) as "with (בְּיָד) the king's sons," whatever that may mean. The mention of Ahithophel (v. 33) seems to fix the date of this list as before the revolt. In Jerome's Questiones Hebraicae on this passage, Jehiel is said to be David's son Chileab or Daniel; and "Achamoni," interpreted as Spicantissimus, is taken as an alias of David himself. His being called a son of a Hachmonite brings him into some connexion with Jashobeam (1 Ch. xi. 11).

6. (In the original text, Ἰηουῖλ , Jehuel—the A. V. follows the alteration of the Qeri; Ἰεθῆλ ; Jahiel). A Levite of the Bene-Heman, who took part in the restorations of king Hezekiah (2 Ch. xxxix. 14).

7. (B. Εἰθῆλ , A. Ἰεθῆλ ; Jahiel). Another Levite at the same period (2 Ch. xxxi. 13), one of the "overscers" (דֹּרְשָׁיִם) of the offerings dedicated to Jehovah. His parentage is not mentioned.

8. (B. Ἰεμῶ , A. Ἰεεθῆλ ; Jahiel). Father of Obadiah, who headed 218 men of the Bene-Joab in the return from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 9). In 1 Esd. viii. 35 the name is JEZEULUS, and the number of his clan is stated at 212.

9. (B. Ἰεθῆλ , A. Ἰεεθῆλ ; Jahiel). One of the Bene-Elam. His son Shechaniah encouraged Ezra to put away the foreign wives of the people (Ezra x. 2). In 1 Esd. viii. 92, it is JEELUS.

10. (B. Ἰεθῆλ , N. Ἰεεθῆλ , A. Αλεθῆλ ; Jehiel). A member of the same family, if not the same person, who had himself to part with his wife (Ezra x. 26). [HIEREULUS.]

11. (B. Ἰεθῆλ , A. Ἰεθῆλ ; Jehiel). A priest, one of the Bene-Harim, who also had to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 21). [HIEREEL] [C. H.]

JEHI'EL,* a perfectly distinct name from the last, though the same in the A. V. 1 (Ἰηῖλ ; R. V. Jeiel; so the Qeri, but the Ethib has Ἰηουῖλ , i.e. Jeuel; B. Ἰήλ , N. Ἰεθῆλ , A. Ἰεθῆλ ; Jehiel), a man described as Abi-Gibeon, father of Gibeon; a forefather of king Saul (1 Ch. ix. 35). His wife was Maachah. In viii. 29 the name is omitted. The presence of the stubborn letter Ain in Jehiel seems to forbid our identifying it with Abiel in 1 Sam. ix. 1, as some have been tempted to do.

2. (In Hebrew the same two variations. B. Ἰεῖδ , N. Εἰά , A. Ἰεθῆλ ; Jehiel). One of the sons of Hotham the Aroerite; a member of the guard of David, included in the extended list of 1 Ch. xi. 44. [C. H.]

* Here the A. V. represents Ain by H, unless simply follows the Vulgate. Cp. JEHOSH, MEHUSIM.

JEHI-ELI (יְהִי־אֵלִי); B. יֵחִיָּא, A. יֵחִיָּא; Jehieli), according to the A. V. a Gershonite Levite of the family of LAADAN. The Bene-Jehieli had charge of the treasures of the house of Jehovah (1 Ch. xxvi. 21, 22). In other lists it is given as JEHIEL (4). The name appears to be strictly a patronymic—Jehielite. For a discussion of the text and a proposed slight emendation of the Hebrew, see Speaker's Comm. in loco. [C. H.]

JEHIZKI'AH (יְהִיזְכִּיָּאח, i.e. Yechizki-yahu; same name as Hezekiah: יְהִיזְכִּיָּא; Ezechias; Ezechias), son of Shallum, one of the heads of the tribe of Ephraim in the time of Ahaz, who at the instance of Oded, the prophet, nobly withstood the attempt to bring into Samaria a large number of captives and much booty, which the Israelite army under king Pekah had taken in the campaign against Judah. By the exertions of Jehizkiah and his fellows the captives were clothed, fed, and tended, and returned to Jericho en route for Judah (2 Ch. xxviii. 12; cp. vs. 8, 13, 15).

JEHO-AD'AH (יְהוֹאָדָאֵה = Jehovah is the adornment, i.e. Jehoaddah [R. V.]; B. יֹאדָא, A. יֹאדָא; Joada), one of the descendants of Saul (1 Ch. viii. 36); great grandson to Meribbaal, i.e. Mephibosheth. In the duplicate genealogy (ix. 43) the name is changed to JARAH.

JEHO-AD'DAN (יְהוֹאָדָאֵדָן, Chron.; but in Kings the original text has יְהוֹאָדָאֵדָן; B. יֹאדָאֵדָן, A. יֹאדָאֵדָן; Joadan, Joaden). "Jehosddan of Jerusalem" was queen to king Joash, and mother of Amaziah of Judah (2 K. xiv. 2; 2 Ch. xxv. 1). [C. H.]

JEHO-AHAZ (יְהוֹאָחָז = Jehovah preserves; B. יֹאחָז, A. יֹאחָז; Joachaz). 1. The son and successor of Jehu; reigned 17 years (B.C. 856-840; al. 815-799) over Israel in Samaria. His inglorious history, commencing in the 23rd year of Joash king of Judah, is given in 2 K. xiii. 1-9. Josephus (Ant. ix. 8, § 5) puts his accession in the 21st of Jehoash. Throughout his reign (v. 22) he was kept in subjection by Hazael king of Damascus, who, following up the successes which he had previously achieved against Jehu, compelled Jehoash to reduce his army to 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 infantry. His submission to Syria continued under Benhadad (v. 3). Jehoahaz maintained the idolatry of Jeroboam; but in the extremity of his humiliation he besought Jehovah; and Jehovah gave Israel a deliverer—probably either Jehoash (vs. 23 and 25), or Jeroboam II. (2 K. xiv. 24, 25; see Keil, Commentary on Kings). The prophet Elisha survived Jehoahaz; and Ewald (Gesch. Isr. iii. 357) is disposed to place in his reign the incursions of the Syrians mentioned in 2 K. v. 2, vi. 8, and of the Ammonites mentioned in Amos i. 13.

2. Jehoahaz, otherwise called SHALLUM, the fourth (acc. to 1 Ch. iii. 15), or third, if Zedekiah's age be correctly stated (2 Ch. xxxvi. 11), son of Josiah, whom he succeeded as king of Judah. He was chosen by the people in preference to his elder (cp. 2 K. xxiii. 33, 36) brother,

B.C. 610, and he reigned three months in Jerusalem. His anointing (v. 30) was probably some additional ceremony, or it is mentioned with peculiar emphasis, as if to make up for his want of the ordinary title to the throne. He is described by his contemporaries as an evil-doer (2 K. xxiii. 32) and (under the figure of a lion's whelp) as an oppressor (Ezek. xix. 3), and such is his traditional character in Josephus (Ant. x. 5, § 2); but his deposition seems to have been lamented by the people (Jer. xxii. 10, and Ezek. xix. 1). Pharaoh-necho on his return from Carchemish, perhaps resenting the election of Jehoahaz, sent to Jerusalem to depose him, and to fetch him to Riblah. There he was cast into chains, and from thence he was taken into Egypt, where he died (see Prideaux, Connection, anno B.C. 610; Ewald, Gesch. Isr. iii. 719; Rosenmüller, Schol. in Jerem. xxii. 11).

3. (B. Ὀχοσίελας, A. Ὀχοσας; Johachaz.) The name given (2 Ch. xxi. 17) during his father's lifetime (Bertheau) to the youngest son of Jehoram king of Judah. As king he is known by the name of AHAZIAH, which is written Azariah in the present Hebrew text of 2 Ch. xxii. 6, perhaps through a transcriber's error. The Hebrew components of Jehoahaz (יְהוֹאָחָז) and Ahaziah (אֲחַזְיָהוּ) are identical, but stand in inverse order. [W. T. B.] [C. H.]

JEHO'ASH (יְהוֹאָשׁ, of uncertain meaning [see MV.¹¹]; יֹאָשׁ; Joas), the original uncontracted form of the name which is more commonly found compressed into JOASH. The two forms appear to be used quite indiscriminately; sometimes both occur in one verse, in Hebrew as well as in English (e.g. 2 K. xiv. 17).

1. The seventh king of Judah after Solomon; son of AHAZIAH (2 K. xi. 21; xii. 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 18; xiv. 13). [JOASH, 1.]

2. The twelfth king of Israel; son of JEHO-AHAZ (2 K. xiii. 10, 25; xiv. 8, 9, 11, 13, 15, 16, 17). [JOASH, 2.] [C. H.]

JEHO-HA'NAN (יְהוֹחָנָן = Jehovah is gracious, answering to Theodore; יֹחָנָן; Johanan), a name much in use, both in this form and in the contracted shape of JOHANAN in the later periods of Jewish history. It has come down to us as JOHN, and indeed is rendered by Josephus יωαννης (Ant. viii. 15, § 2).

1. (B. יֹחָנָן, A. יֹחָנָן.) A Levite, one of the doorkeepers (R. V.; in A. V. "porters") to the house of Jehovah, i.e. the Tabernacle, according to the appointment of David (1 Ch. xxvi. 3; cp. xxv. 1). He was the sixth of the seven sons of Meshelemiah; a Korhite,—that is, descended from Korah, the founder of that great Kohathite house. He is also said (v. 1) to have been of the Bene-Asaph; but this Asaph is a contraction for Ebiasaph, as is seen from the genealogy in ix. 19. The well-known Asaph, too, was not a Kohathite, but a Gershonite.

2. (יֹחָנָן.) One of the principal men of Judah, under king Jehoshaphat; he commanded 280,000 men, apparently in and about Jerusalem (2 Ch. xvii. 15; cp. vs. 13 and 19). He is named second on the list, and is entitled יְצִיָּה, "the captain" (A. V. and R. V.), a title also given to Adnah in the preceding verse, though there rendered "the chief" in A. V., but "captain" 5 F in R. V. The Hebrew is often rendered "prince." He is probably the same person as

3. (Iowadv.) Father of Ishmael, Ishmael being one of the "captains" (יְהוֹדָי, as before) of hundreds—evidently residing in or near Jerusalem—whom Jehoiada the priest took into his confidence about the restoration of the line of Judah (2 Ch. xxiii. 1).

4. (Iowadv.) One of the Bene-Bebai, a lay Israelite who was forced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 28). In 1 Esd. ix. 29 the name is JOHANNES.

5. (Iowadv.) A priest (Neh. xii. 13), the representative of the house of Amariah (cp. v. 2), during the high-priesthood of Joiakim (v. 12); that is to say, in the generation after the first return from Captivity.

6. (LXX. B. omits; N. Iowadv.) A priest who took part in the musical service of thanksgiving, at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42).

In two other cases this name is given in the A. V. as JOHANAN.

JEHOI'ACHIN (יְהוֹיָכִן) = Jehovah estab-

Iowaxem; Joseph. Iowdymos: Joachim). Else-

CONIAH. See also JECHONIAS, JOIAKIM, and JOACIM.

Son of Jehoiakim and Nehushta, and for three months and ten days (B.C. 599) king of Judah, after the death of his father, being the nineteenth king from David, or twentieth, counting Jehoahaz. According to 2 K. xxiv. 8, Jehoiachin was eighteen years old at his accession; but 2 Ch. xxxvi. 9, as well as 1 Esd. i. 43, has the far more probable reading eight years,* which fixes his birth to the time of his father's captivity, according to Matt. i. 11.

Jehoiachin came to the throne at a time when Egypt was still prostrate in consequence of the victory at Carchemish, and when the Jews had been for three or four years harassed and distressed by the inroads of the armed bands of Chaldeans, Ammonites, and Moabites, sent against them by Nebuchadnezzar in consequence of Jehoiakim's rebellion. [JEHOIAKIM.] Jerusalem at this time, therefore, was quite defenceless, and unable to offer any resistance to the regular army which Nebuchadnezzar sent to besiege it in the eighth year of his reign, and which he seems to have joined in person after the siege had commenced (2 K. xxiv. 10, 11). In a very short time, apparently, and without any losses from famine or fighting which would indicate a serious resistance, Jehoiachin surrendered at discretion; and he, and the queen-mother, and all his servants, captains, and officers, came out and gave themselves up to Nebuchadnezzar, who carried them, with the harem and the eunuchs,

* Many commentators prefer the reading "eighteen," as agreeing better with the language of Jeremiah. But the words יְהוֹיָכִן and יְהוֹיָכִין, applied to Jehoiachin in Jer. xxii. 28, 30, imply sex rather than age, and are both actually used of infants. See Gesen. Theo. s. vv. The words "his seed" may also be taken in the wider sense of family or kindred (Dan. i. 3). And so Josephus seems to have understood it, rendering it τοῦ συγγενεῖς (Ant. x. 7, § 1).

to Babylon (Jer. xxix. 2; Ezek. xvii. 12, xix. 9). All the king's treasures, and all the treasure of the Temple, were seized; and the golden vessels of the Temple, which the king of Babylon had left when he pillaged it in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, were now either cut up or carried away to Babylon, with all the nobles, and men of war, and skilled artisans, none but the poorest and weakest being left behind (2 K. xxiv. 13; 2 Ch. xxxvi. 19). According to 2 K. xxiv. 14, 16, the number taken at this time into captivity was 10,000, viz. 7000 soldiers, 1000 craftsmen and smiths, and 2000 whose calling is not specified. But, according to Jer. lii. 28 (a passage which is omitted in the LXX.), the number carried away captive at this time (called the seventh of Nebuchadnezzar, instead of the eighth, as in 2 K. xxiv. 12) was 3023. Whether this difference arises from any corruption of the numerals, or whether only a portion of those originally taken captive were actually carried to Babylon, the others being left with Zedekiah upon his swearing allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar, cannot perhaps be decided. The numbers in Jeremiah are certainly very small, only 4,600 in all, whereas the numbers who returned from captivity, as given in Ezra ii. and Neh. vii., were 42,360. However, Jehoiachin was himself led away captive to Babylon, and there he remained a prisoner, actually in prison (נֶגְבַּי לַמֶּלֶךְ), and wearing prison garments, for thirty-six years, viz. till the death of Nebuchadnezzar, when Evil-Merodach, succeeding to the throne of Babylon, treated him with much kindness, brought him out of prison, changed his garments, raised him above the other subject or captive kings, and made him sit at his own table. Whether Jehoiachin outlived the two years of Evil-Merodach's reign or not does not appear, nor have we any particulars of his life at Babylon. The general description of him in 2 K. xxiv. 9, "He did evil in the sight of Jehovah, according to all that his father had done," seems to apply to his character at the time he was king, and but a child; and so does the prophecy of Jeremiah (xxii. 24-30; cp. Ezek. xix. 5-9). We also learn from Jer. xxviii. 4, that four years after Jehoiachin had gone to Babylon, there was a great expectation at Jerusalem of his return, but it does not appear whether Jehoiachin himself shared this hope at Babylon. [HANANIAH, 4.] The tenor of Jeremiah's letter to the elders of the Captivity (xxix.) would, however, indicate that there was a party among the Captivity, encouraged by false prophets, who were at this time looking forward to Nebuchadnezzar's overthrow and Jehoiachin's return; and perhaps the fearful death of Ahab the son of Koliah (ib. v. 22), and the close confinement of Jehoiachin through Nebuchadnezzar's reign, may have been the result of some disposition to conspire against Nebuchadnezzar on the part of a portion of those of the Captivity. But neither Daniel nor Ezekiel, who were Jehoiachin's fellow-captives, make any further allusion to him, except that Ezekiel dates his prophecies by the year of king Jehoiachin's captivity (i. 2, viii. 1, xxi. 1, xxiv. 1, xxvi. 1, xxix. 1, xxx. 1, xxxii. 1, xl. 1); the latest date being "the twenty-seventh year" (xxix. 17). We also learn from Esth. ii. 6, that Kish, the ancestor of Mordecai, was Jehoiachin's fellow-captive. But the apocryphal books are more communicative. Thus the author of the book of Baruch (i. 3; see Speaker's Comm. in loco) introduces "Jechonias the son of Joachim king of Judah" into his narrative, and represents Baruch as reading his prophecy in his ears, and in the ears of the king's sons, and the nobles and elders and people at Babylon. At the hearing of Baruch's words, it is added, they wept and fasted and prayed, and sent a collection of silver to Jerusalem to Joachim the son of Hilkiah, the son of Shallum the high-priest, with which to purchase burnt-offerings and sacrifice and incense, bidding them pray for the prosperity of Nabuchodonosor and Balthasar his son. The history of Susanna and the Elders also apparently makes Jehoiachin an important personage; for, according to the author, the husband of Susanna was Joacim, a man of great wealth, and the chief person among the captives, to whose house all the people resorted for judgment, a description which suits Jehoiachin (see Ball's note on Hist. Sus. v. 1, and Introd. to that book, p. 328 in Speaker's Comm. on the Apocrypha, 1888). Africanus (Ep. ad Orig.; Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 113) expressly calls Susanna's husband king, and says that the king of Babylon had made him his royal companion (σύντροφος). He is also mentioned in 1 Esd. v. 5, but the text seems to be corrupt. It probably should be "Zorobabel, the son of Salathiel, the son of Joacim," i.e. Jehoiachin. It does not appear certainly from Scripture, whether Jehoiachin was married or had any children. That Zedekiah, who in 1 Ch. iii. 16 is called "his son," is the same as Zedekiah his uncle (called "his brother," 2 Ch. xxxvi. 10), who was his successor on the throne, seems certain. But it is not impossible that Assir (Ἄσιρ = captive), who is reckoned among the "sons of Jechoniah" in 1 Ch. iii. 17, may have been so really, and either have died young or been made an eunuch (Is. xxxix. 7). This is quite in accordance with the term "childless," יָרֵבָה, applied to Jechoniah by Jeremiah (xxii. 30). [GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.]

Jehoiachin was the last of Solomon's line; and on its failure in his person, the right to succession passed to the line of Nathan, whose descendant Shealtiel, or Salathiel, the son of Neri, was consequently inscribed in the genealogy as of "the sons of Jehoiachin." Hence his place in the genealogy of Christ (Matt. i. 11, 12). For the variations in the Hebrew forms of Jechoniah's name, see HANANIAH, 8; and for the confusion in Greek and Latin writers between Jehoiachim and Jehoiachin, Ἰωαχὲμ and Ἰωακὴμ, see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, and Hervey's Genealogy, pp. 71-73.

N.B. The compiler of 1 Esd. gives the name of Jechonias to Jehoahaz the son of Josiah, who reigned three months after Josiah's death, and was deposed and carried to Egypt by Pharaoh-Necho (1 Esd. i. 34; 2 K. xxiii. 30). He is followed in this blunder by Epiphanius (vol. i. p. 21), who says "Josiah begat Jechoniah, who is also called Shallum. This Jechoniah begat Jechoniah, who is called Zedekiah and Joakim." It has its origin doubtless in the confusion of the names when written in Greek by writers ignorant of Hebrew. [A. C. H.]

JEHOI'ADA (Ἰωαθὰμ) = Jehovah knows; Joseph. Ἰώαδος; Joiada). In the later Books the name is contracted to JOIADA.

1. (B. Ἰωδᾶς, Ἰανὰ, Ἀρχιλοῦθ; A. Ἰωαδᾶς, Ἰωδᾶς.) Father of David's well-known warrior BENAIAH (2 Sam. viii. 18, xx. 23, xxiii. 20, 22; 1 K. i. 8, 26, 32, 36, 38, 44, ii. 25, 29, 30, 34, 35, 46; 1 Ch. xi. 22, xviii. 17, xxvii. 5). The "son of a mighty man" in 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, 1 Ch. xi. 22, means, according to a well-known Hebrew usage, simply "a mighty man," and refers to Benaiah. From 1 Ch. xxvii. 5, where a chief priest is rather the chief priest (R. V. and the Heb.), we learn that Benaiah's father was the chief priest (not to be understood as high-priest, cp. No. 5), and he is therefore doubtless identical with—

2. (B. Ἰωαδᾶς, N. Ἰωαδᾶς, A. Ἰωαδᾶς.) Leader (ἡγούμενος) of the Aaronites (accurately "of Aaron"), i.e. the priests; who joined David at Hebron, bringing with him 3,700 priests (1 Ch. xii. 27).

3. (B. Ἰωδᾶς, A. Ἰωαδᾶς.) According to 1 Ch. xxvii. 34, son of Benaiah, and one of David's chief counsellors, apparently having succeeded Ahithophel in that office. Many suppose that Benaiah the son of Jehoiada is meant, by a transposition similar to that which has arisen with regard to Ahimelech and Abiathar (1 Ch. xviii. 16, 2 Sam. viii. 17). Others however see no reason why a son of Benaiah named after his grandfather may not be intended.

4. (B. Ἰωδᾶς; A. Ἰωαδᾶς, Ἰωαδᾶς, Ἰωαδᾶς.) High-priest at the time of Athaliah's usurpation of the throne of Judah (B.C. 884-878; al. 843-838), and during the greater portion of the forty years' reign of Joash. It does not appear when he first became high-priest, but it may have been as early as the latter part of Jehoshaphat's reign. Anyhow, he probably succeeded Amariah. [HIGH-PRIEST.] He married JEHOSHEBA, or Jehoshabeath, daughter of king Jehoram, and sister of king Ahaziah (2 Ch. xxii. 11); and when Athaliah slew all the seed royal of Judah after Ahaziah had been put to death by Jehu, he and his wife stole Joash from among the king's sons, and hid him for six years in the Temple, and eventually placed him on the throne of his ancestors (2 K. xi. 3; 2 Ch. xxii. 12). [JOASH; ATHALIAH.] In effecting this happy revolution, by which both the throne of David and the worship of the true God according to the Law of Moses were rescued from imminent danger of destruction, Jehoiada displayed great ability and prudence. Waiting patiently till the tyranny of Athaliah, and, we may presume, till her foreign practices and preferences, had produced disgust in the land, he at length, in the seventh year of her reign, entered into secret alliance with the chief supporters of the house of David and of the true religion. He also collected at Jerusalem the Levites from the different cities of Judah and Israel, probably under cover of providing for the Temple services, and then concentrated a large and concealed force in the Temple, by the expedient of not dismissing the old courses of priests and Levites when their successors came to relieve them on the Sabbath. By means of the consecrated shields and spears which David had taken in his wars, and which were preserved in the treasury of the Temple

(cp. 1 Ch. xviii. 7-11, xxvi. 20-28; 1 K. xiv. 26, 27), he supplied the captains of hundreds with arms for their men. Having then divided the priests and Levites into three bands, which were posted at the principal entrances, and filled the courts with people favourable to the cause, he produced the young king before the whole assembly, and crowned and anointed him, and presented to him a copy of the Law according to Deut. xvii. 18-20. [HILKIAH.] The excitement of the moment did not make him forget the sanctity of God's House. None but the priests and ministering Levites were permitted by him to enter the Temple; and he gave strict orders that Athaliah should be carried without its precincts before she was put to death. In the same spirit he inaugurated the new reign by a solemn covenant between himself, as high-priest, and the people and the king, to renounce the Baal-worship which had been introduced by the house of Ahab, and to serve Jehovah. This was followed by the immediate destruction of the altar and temple of Baal, and the death of Mattan his priest. He then took measures for the due celebration of the Temple service, and at the same time for the perfect re-establishment of the monarchy (2 K. xi. 17-21; 2 Ch. xxiii. 16-21); all which seems to have been effected with great vigour and success, and without any cruelty or violence. For Joash, as he grew to man's estate, Jehoiada selected two wives (2 Ch. xxiv. 3), having had probably in view the extermination of the royal lineage of which Athaliah had been guilty. The young king himself, under this wise and virtuous counsellor, ruled his kingdom well and prosperously, and was forward in works of piety, during the lifetime of Jehoiada. The reparation of the Temple in the twenty-third year of his reign, of which a full and interesting account is given in 2 K. xii. and 2 Ch. xxiv., was one of the most important works at this period. At length, however, Jehoiada died, and, though far advanced in years, too soon for the welfare of his country and the weak unstable character of Joash. The text of 2 Ch. xxiv. 15, supported by the LXX. and Josephus, makes him 130 years old when he died. But supposing him to have lived to the thirty-fifth year of Joash (which leaves only five years for all the subsequent events of the reign), he would in that case have been ninety-five at the time of the insurrection against Athaliah; and fifteen years before, when Jehoram, whose daughter was his wife, was only thirty-two years old, he would have been eighty: than which nothing can be more improbable. There must therefore be some early corruption of the numeral. Perhaps we ought to read קל"ה (83), instead of קל"ג .

Even 103 (as suggested, Geneal. of our Lord, p. 304) would leave an improbable age at the two above-named epochs. If eighty-three at his death, he would have been thirty-three years old at Joram's accession. For his signal services to his God, his king, and his country, which have earned him a place among the very foremost well-doers in Israel, he had the unique honour of burial among the kings of Judah in the city of David. He was probably succeeded by his son Zechariah. In Josephus' list (Ant. x. 8, § 6) the name of ΙΩΔΕΑΣ by an easy corruption is transformed into ΙΔΕΑΣ , and in the Seder Olam into Phadaa. It has been thought that Jehoiada's alliance with the royal house, and his tenure of supreme authority as regent for so many years during the minority, left its mark in time to come on the high-priesthood itself, bringing it into greater civil prominence, and even increasing the authority in public life of the entire Levitical order. See Notes in the Speaker's Comm. on 2 K. xii. 2, 10.

In Matt. xxiii. 35, Zechariah the son of Jehoiada is mentioned as the "son of Barachias," i.e. Berechiah. This is omitted in Luke (xi. 51), and has probably been inserted from a confusion between this Zechariah and the prophet, who was son of Berechiah; or with the son of Berechiah (Is. viii. 2).

5. Second priest, or (as the Rabbins entitle him) sagan, to Seraiah the high-priest. He was deposed at the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, probably for adhering to the prophet Jeremiah; when Zephaniah was appointed sagan in his room* (Jer. xxix. 25-29; 2 K. xxv. 18). This is a clear instance of the title "the priest" being applied to the second priest. The passage in Jeremiah shows the nature of the sagan's authority at this time, when he was doubtless "ruler of the house of Jehovah" (רֹאשׁ הַבַּיִת). [HIGH-PRIEST.] Winer (Realw.) has quite misunderstood the passage, and makes Jehoiada the same as the high-priest in the reign of Joash.

6. (שֵׁרַיָא), i.e. Joiada; B. Ioead, A. Ioead; Joiada), son of Paseach, who assisted to repair the "old gate" of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6).

[A. C. H.]

JEHOIAKIM (יְהוֹאָכִיָם) = Jehovah raises up; Ἰωακίμ, Joseph. Ἰοακίμος; Joakim). 18th (or, counting Jehoahaz, 19th) king of Judah from David inclusive; twenty-five years old at his accession, and originally called ELIAKIM. He was the son of Josiah and Zebudah, daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah, possibly identical with Arumah of Judg. ix. 41 (where the Vulg. has Rumah), and in that case in the tribe of Manasseh. His younger brother Jehoahaz, or Shallum, as he is called in Jer. xxii. 11, was in the first instance made king by the people of the land on the death of his father Josiah, probably with the intention of following up Josiah's policy, which was to side with Nebuchadnezzar against Egypt, being, as Prideaux thinks, bound by oath to the kings of Babylon (Conn. i. 57, ann. B.C. 610, ed. 1838). Pharaoh-Necho, therefore, having borne down all resistance with his victorious army, immediately deposed Jehoahaz, and had him brought in chains to Riblah—where, it seems, he was—on his way to Carchemish (2 K. xxiii. 33, 34; Jer. xxii. 10-12). He then set Eliakim his elder brother upon the throne, changing his name to Jehoiakim; and having charged him with the task of collecting a tribute of 100 talents of silver, and 1 talent of gold—nearly 40,000*l.*, in which he mulcted the land for the part Josiah had taken in the war with Babylon, he eventually returned to Egypt, taking

* It is, however, possible that Jehoiada vacated the office by death.

Jehoahaz with him, who died there in captivity (2 K. xxiii. 34; Jer. xxii. 10-12; Ezek. xix. 4).^a Pharaoh-Necho also himself returned no more to Jerusalem, for after his great defeat at Carchemish in the fourth year of Jehoiakim he lost all his Syrian possessions (2 K. xxiv. 7; Jer. xlvi. 2), and his successor Psammis (Herod. ii. 161) made no attempt to recover them. Egypt, therefore, played no part in Jewish politics during the seven or eight years of Jehoiakim's reign. After the battle of Carchemish Nebuchadnezzar invaded Palestine as one of the Egyptian tributary kingdoms, the capture of which was the natural fruit of his victory over Necho. He found Jehoiakim quite defenceless. After a short siege he entered Jerusalem, took the king prisoner, bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon, and took also some of the precious vessels of the Temple and carried them to the land of Shinar to the temple of Bel his god. It was at this time, in the fourth, or, as Daniel (i. 1; see *Speaker's Comm.*² in loco) reckons, in the third year of his reign, that Daniel, and Hananiah, Mishaël, and Azariah, were taken captives to Babylon; but Nebuchadnezzar seems to have changed his purpose as regarded Jehoiakim, and to have accepted his submission, and reinstated him on the throne, perhaps in remembrance of the fidelity of his father Josiah. What is certain is, that Jehoiakim became tributary to Nebuchadnezzar after his invasion of Judah, and continued so for three years, but at the end of that time broke his oath of allegiance and rebelled against him (2 K. xxiv. 1; 2 Ch. vi. 7). What moved or encouraged Jehoiakim to this rebellion it is difficult to say, unless it were the restless turbulence of his own bad disposition and the dislike of paying the tribute to the king of Babylon, which he would have rather lavished upon his own luxury and pride (Jer. xxii. 13-17), for there is nothing to bear out Winer's conjecture, or Josephus's assertion, that there was anything in the attitude of Egypt at this time to account for such a step. It seems more probable that seeing Egypt entirely severed from the affairs of Syria since the battle of Carchemish, and the king of Babylon wholly occupied with distant wars, he hoped to make himself independent. But whatever was the motive of this foolish and wicked proceeding, which was contrary to the repeated warnings of the Prophet Jeremiah, it is certain that it brought misery and ruin upon the king and his country. Though Nebuchadnezzar was not able at that time to come in person to chastise his rebellious vassal, he sent against him numerous bands of Chaldeans, with Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, who were all now subject to Babylon (2 K. xxiv. 2, 7), and who cruelly harassed the whole country. It was perhaps at this time that the great drought described in Jer. xiv. 1-6 (cp. Jer. xv. 4 with 2 K. xxiv. 2, 3) occurred. In his fourth year Israel's seventy years' Captivity was predicted by Jeremiah (xxv. 1-11). The closing years of this reign must have been a time of extreme misery. The Ammonites appear to have overrun the land of Gad (Jer. xlix. 1), and the other neighbouring nations to have taken advantage of the helplessness of Israel to ravage their land to the utmost (Ezek. xxv.). There was no rest or safety out of the walled cities. We are not acquainted with the details of the close of the reign. Probably as the time approached for Nebuchadnezzar himself to come against Judaea, the desultory attacks and invasions of his troops became more concentrated. Either in an engagement with some of these forces, or else by the hand of his own oppressed subjects, who thought to conciliate the Babylonians by the murder of their king, Jehoiakim came to a violent end in the eleventh year of his reign. His body was cast out ignominiously on the ground; perhaps thrown over the walls to convince the enemy that he was dead; and then, after being left exposed for some time, was dragged away and buried "with the burial of an ass," without pomp or lamentation, "beyond the gates of Jerusalem" (Jer. xxii. 18, 19; xxxvi. 30). Within three months of his death Nebuchadnezzar arrived, and put an end to his dynasty by carrying Jehoiachin off to Babylon. [JEHOIACHIN.] All the accounts we have of Jehoiakim concur in ascribing to him a vicious and irreligious character. The writer of 2 K. xxiii. 37 tells us that "he did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah," a statement which is repeated in xxiv. 9 and in 2 Ch. xxxvi. 5. The Chronicler uses the yet stronger expression, "the acts of Jehoiakim, and the abominations which he did" (c. 8). But it is in the writings of Jeremiah that we have the fullest portraiture of him. If, as is probable, the sixth chapter of Jeremiah belongs to this reign, we have a detail of the abominations of idolatry practised at Jerusalem under the king's sanction, with which Ezekiel's vision of what was going on six years later, within the very precincts of the Temple, exactly agrees: incense offered up to "abominable beasts;" "women weeping for Thammuz;" and men in the inner court of the Temple, "with their backs towards the Temple of the Lord," worshipping "the sun towards the east" (Ezek. viii.). The vindictive pursuit and murder of Urijah the son of Shemaiah, and the indignities offered to his corpse by the king's command, in revenge for his faithful prophesying of evil against Jerusalem and Judah, are samples of his irreligion and tyranny combined. Jeremiah only narrowly escaped the same fate (Jer. xxvi. 20-24). The curious notice of him in 1 Esd. i. 38, that he put his nobles in chains and caught Zaraces his brother in Egypt^b and brought him up thence (to Jerusalem), also points to his cruelty. His daring impiety in cutting up and burning the roll containing Jeremiah's prophecy, at the very moment when the national fast was being celebrated, is another specimen of his character, and drew

^b The passage seems to be corrupt. The words τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ seem to be repeated from the preceding line but one, and Ζαράκης is a corruption of Οὐρίαν. συναλβῶν ἐξήγαγεν is a paraphrase of the Alexandrian Codex of Jer. xxxiii. 23 (xxvi. 23, A. V.), συναλβῶσας αὐτὸν, καὶ ἐξήγαγον. See the note on 1 Esd. i. 38, in the Speaker's Comm. on the Apocrypha, 1888.

^a It does not appear from the narrative in 2 K. xxiii. (which is the fullest) whether Necho went straight to Egypt from Jerusalem, or whether the calamitous campaign on the Euphrates intervened.

down upon him the sentence, "He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David" (Jer. xxvii. 23, 30. Cp. Stanley's Hist. of the Jewish Church, ii. 452, &c. [1883]). His oppression, injustice, covetousness, luxury, and tyranny, are most severely rebuked (xxii. 13-17); and it has been frequently observed, as indicating his thorough selfishness and indifference to the sufferings of his people, that at a time when the land was so impoverished by the heavy tributes laid upon it by Egypt and Babylon in turn, he should have squandered large sums in building luxurious palaces for himself (xxii. 14, 15). Josephus's history of Jehoiakim's reign is consistent neither with Scripture nor with itself. His account of Jehoiakim's death and Jehoiachin's accession appears to be only his own inference from the Scripture narrative. According to Josephus (Ant. x. 6, § 1), Nebuchadnezzar came against Judaea in the eighth year of Jehoiakim's reign, and compelled him to pay tribute, which he did for three years, and then revolted in the eleventh year, on hearing that the king of Babylon had gone to Egypt.* He then inserts the account of Jehoiakim's burning Jeremiah's prophecy in his fifth year, and concludes by saying, that a little time afterwards the king of Babylon made an expedition against Jehoiakim, who admitted Nebuchadnezzar into the city upon certain conditions, which Nebuchadnezzar immediately broke; that he slew Jehoiakim and the flower of the citizens, and sent three thousand captives to Babylon, and set up Jehoiachin for king, but almost immediately afterwards was seized with fear lest the young king should avenge his father's death, and so sent back his army to besiege Jerusalem; that Jehoiachin, being a man of just and gentle disposition, did not like to expose the city to danger on his own account, and therefore surrendered himself, his mother, and kindred, to the king of Babylon's officers on condition of the city suffering no harm; but that Nebuchadnezzar, in direct violation of the conditions, took 10,832 prisoners, and made Zedekiah king in the room of Jehoiachin, whom he kept in custody (Ant. x. 7, § 1)—a statement the principal portion of which seems to have no foundation whatever in fact. The account given above is derived from the various statements in Scripture, and seems to agree perfectly with the probabilities of Nebuchadnezzar's movements and with what the most recent discoveries have brought to light concerning him. [NEBUCHADNEZZAR.] The reign of Jehoiakim extends from B.C. 609 to B.C. 598, or as some reckon 599.

* Nothing can be more improbable than an invasion of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar at this time. All the Syrian possessions of Egypt fell into the power of Babylon soon after the victory at Carchemish, and the king of Egypt retired thenceforth into his own country. His Asiatic wars seem to have engrossed Nebuchadnezzar's attention for the next seven years; and in like manner the king of Egypt seems to have confined himself to Ethiopian wars. The first hint we have of Egypt aiming at recovering her lost influence in Syria is at the accession of Pharaoh-Hophra, in the 4th of Zedekiah. [HANANIAH, 4.] He made several abortive attempts against Nebuchadnezzar in Zedekiah's reign, and detached the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, Tyrians, and Zidonians from the Babylonish alliance (Jer. xxvii.). In consequence, Nebuchadnezzar, after thoroughly subduing these nations, and devoting thirteen years to the siege of Tyre, at length invaded and subdued Egypt in the thirty-fifth year of his reign (Ezek. xxix. 17).

The name of Jehoiakim appears in a contracted form in JOIAKIM, a high-priest. [A. C. H.]

JEHO-IA'RIB (יְהוֹיָרִיב, (?) = Jehovah will plead, 1 Ch. ix. 10, xxiv. 7, only; elsewhere, both in Hebrew and A. V., the name is abbreviated to JOIARIB: B. Iowapeliu, Iapeliu; A. Iowapeliβ, Iapeβ: Joiarib), head of the first of the twenty-four courses of priests, according to the arrangement of king David (1 Ch. xxiv. 7). Some of his descendants returned from the Babylonish captivity, as we learn from 1 Ch. ix. 10, Neh. xi. 10. [JEDAIAH.] Their chief in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua was Mattenai (Neh. xii. 6, 19). They were probably of the house of Eleazar. To the course of Jehoiarib belonged the Asmonean family (1 Macc. ii. 1; Jos. Ant. xii. 6, § 1) and Josephus, as he informs us (Life, § 1). [HIGH-PRIEST.] Prideaux indeed (Connection, i. 149, ann. B.C. 536, ed. 1838), following the Jewish tradition, affirms that only four of the courses returned from Babylon, Jedaiah, Immer, Pashur, and Harim—for which last, however, the Babylonian Talmud has Joiarib—because these four only are enumerated in Ezra ii. 36-39, Neh. vii. 39-42. He accounts for the mention of other courses, as of Joiarib (1 Macc. ii. 1) and Abiah (Luke i. 5), by saying that those four courses were subdivided into six each, so as to keep up the old number of twenty-four, which took the names of the original courses, though not really descended from them. But this is probably an invention of the Jews, to account for the mention of only these four families of priests in the list of Ezra ii. and Neh. vii. However difficult it may be to say with certainty why only those four courses are mentioned in that particular list, we have the positive authority of 1 Ch. ix. 10 and Neh. xi. 10 for asserting that Joiarib did return; and we have two other lists of courses, one of the time of Nehemiah (Neh. x. 2-8), the other of Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 1-7); the former enumerating twenty-one, the latter twenty-two courses; and the latter naming Joiarib as one of them,* and adding, at v. 19, the name of the chief of the course of Joiarib in the days of Joiakim. So that there can be no reasonable doubt that Joiarib did return. The notion of the Jews does not receive any confirmation from the statement in the Latin version of Josephus (cont. Apion. ii. 7), that there were four courses of priests, as it is a manifest corruption of the text for twenty-four, as Whiston and others have shown (note to Life of Josephus, § 1). The subjoined table gives the three lists of courses which returned, with the original list in David's time to compare them by:—

* It is, however, very singular that the names after Shemalah in Neh. xii. 6, including Joiarib and Jedaiah, have the appearance of being added on to the previously existing list, which ended with Shemalah, as does that in Neh. x. 2-8. For Joiarib's is introduced with the copula "and;" it is quite out of its right order as the first course; and, moreover, these names are entirely omitted in the LXX. till we come to the times of Joiakim at vv. 12-21. Still the utmost that could be concluded from this is, that Joiarib returned later than the time of Zerubbabel.

For the courses, see Lewis's Orig. Hebr. ii. ch. vii.; Schürer, Gesch. d. Jud. Volkes, ii. 182 sq. In 1 Esd. i. 44, ix. 19, the name is given as JORIBAS, JORIBUS. [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JEHO-NA'DAB, and JON'ADAB (the longer form, יְהוֹנָדָב) = Jehovah hath incited, is employed in 2 K. x. and Jer. xxxv. 8, 14, 16, 18; in the shorter one, יְהוֹנָדָב, in Jer. xxxv. 6, 10, 19: יְהוֹנָדָב, the son of Rechab, founder of the Rechabites. It appears from 1 Ch. ii. 55, that his father or ancestor Rechab ("a rider") belonged to a branch of the Kenites; the Arabian tribe which entered Palestine with the Israelites. One settlement of them was to be found in the extreme north, under the chieftainship of Heber (Judg. iv. 11), retaining their Bedouin customs under the oak which derived its name from their nomadic habits. The main settlement was in the south. Of these, one branch had nested in the cliffs of Engedi (Judg. i. 16; Num. xxiv. 21). Another had returned to the frontier of their native wilderness on the south of Judah (Judg. i. 16). A third was established, under a threefold division, at or near the town of Jabez in Judah (1 Ch. ii. 55). To these last belonged Rechab and his son Jehonadab [RECHABITES]. The Bedouin habits, which were kept up by the other branches of the Kenite tribe, were inculcated by Jehonadab with the utmost minuteness on his descendants; the more so, perhaps, from their being brought into closer connexion with the inhabitants of the settled districts. The vow or rule which he prescribed to them is preserved to us: "Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye nor your sons for ever. Neither shall ye build houses, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any: but all your days ye shall dwell in tents; that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers" (Jer. xxxv. 6, 7). This life, partly monastic, partly Bedouin, was observed with the tenacity with which from generation to generation such customs are continued in Arab tribes; and when, many years after the death of Jehonadab, the Rechabites (as they were called from his father) were forced to take refuge from the Chaldean invasion within the walls of Jerusalem, nothing would induce them to transgress the rule of their ancestor; and in consequence a blessing was pronounced upon him and them by the Prophet Jeremiah (xxxv. 19): "Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before Me for ever." [RECHABITES.]

Bearing in mind this general character of Jehonadab as an Arab chief, and the founder of a half-religious sect, perhaps in connexion with the austere Elijah, and the Nazarites mentioned in Amos ii. 11 (see Ewald, Alterthümer, p. 118, 3rd ed. 1869; p. 88 of Solly's Engl. tr., 1876), we are the better able to understand the single occasion on which he appears before us in the historical narrative.

Jehu was advancing, after the slaughter of Beth-eked, on the city of Samaria, when he suddenly met the austere Bedouin coming towards him (2 K. x. 15). It seems that they were already known to each other (Jos. Ant. ix. 6, § 6). The king was in his chariot; the Arab was on foot. It is not clear, from the present state of the text, which was the first to speak. The Hebrew text—followed by the A. V.—implies that the king blessed (A. V. "saluted") Jehonadab. The LXX. and Josephus (Ant. ix. 6, § 6) imply that Jehonadab blessed the king. Each would have its peculiar appropriateness. The king then proposed their close union. "Is thy heart right, as my heart is with thy heart?" The answer of Jehonadab is slightly varied. In the Hebrew text he vehemently replies, "It is, it is: give me thine hand." In the LXX., and in the A. V. and R. V., he replies simply, "It is;" and Jehu then rejoins, "If it is, give me thine hand." The hand, whether of Jehonadab or Jehu, was offered and grasped (see QPB.). The king lifted him up to the edge of the chariot, apparently that he might whisper his secret into his ear, and said, "Come with me, and see my zeal for Jehovah." It was the first indication of Jehu's design upon the worship of Baal, for which he perceived that the stern zealot would be a fit coadjutor. Having entrusted him with the secret, he (LXX., or his attendants, Heb., A. V., R. V.) causes Jehonadab to proceed with him to Samaria in the royal chariot.

So completely had the worship of Baal become the national religion, that even Jehonadab was able to conceal his purpose under the mask of conformity. No doubt he acted in concert with Jehu throughout; but the only occasion on which he is expressly mentioned is when (probably from his previous knowledge of the secret worshippers of Jehovah) he went with Jehu through the temple of Baal to turn out any that there might happen to be in the mass of Pagan worshippers (2 K. x. 23). [Jehu.] This is the last we hear of him (Stanley, Lectures on the Jewish Church, ii. 287 [1883]). [A. P. S.]

JEHO-NA'THAN (יהונתן) = Jehovah hath given; יְהוָה נָתַן; Jonathan): the more accurate rendering of the Hebrew name, which is most frequently given in the A. V. as JONATHAN. It is ascribed to three persons:—

1. Son of Uzziah; superintendent of certain of king David's storehouses (תְּצִרָא: the word rendered "treasures" earlier in the verse [R. V. "treasuries"], and in vs. 27, 28 "cellars"); 1 Ch. xxvii. 25.

2. One of nine Levites who, along with five princes and two priests, were sent by Jehoshaphat, in the third year of his reign, through the cities of Judah, with a book of the Law, to teach the people (2 Ch. xvii. 8).

3. A priest (Neh. xii. 18): the representative of the family of Shemaiah (v. 6), when Joiakim was high-priest; that is, in the next generation after the return from Babylon under Zerubbabel and Jeshua.

JEHO'RAM (יהורם) = Jehovah is exalted.

Cp. the Phoen. יְהוָה רָם [MV.¹¹]; Ἰωραμ; Joseph. Ἰόραμος: Joram). The name is more often found in the contracted form of JORAM.

1. Son of Ahab king of Israel. In the second year of Jehoram king of Judah (2 K. i. 17), and in the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat king of Judah (2 K. iii. 1), he succeeded his brother Ahaziah (who had no son) upon the throne at Samaria, B.C. 896-884 (Riehm, 855-844). His history is related in the Second Book of Kings, there being but a passing mention of him in 2 Ch. xxii. 5-7. During the first four years of his reign his contemporary on the throne of Judah was Jehoshaphat, and for the next seven years and upwards Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat, and for the last year, or portion of a year, Ahaziah the son of Jehoram, who was killed the same day that he was (2 K. ix. 27). The alliance between the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, commenced by his father and Jehoshaphat, was very close throughout his reign. We first find Jehoram associated with Jehoshaphat and the king of Edom, at that time a tributary of the kingdom of Judah, in a war against the Moabites (2 K. iii.). Mesha their king, on the death of Ahab, had revolted from Israel, and refused to pay the customary tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams. Jehoram asked and obtained Jehoshaphat's help to reduce him to his obedience, and accordingly the three kings, of Israel, Judah, and Edom, marched through the wilderness of Edom to attack him. The three armies were in the utmost danger of perishing for want of water. The piety of Jehoshaphat suggested an inquiry of some prophet of Jehovah, and Elisha the son of Shaphat, at that time and since the latter part of Ahab's reign Elijah's attendant (2 K. iii. 11; 1 K. xix. 19-21), was found with the host. When the three kings went down to him, Jehoram received a severe rebuke, and was bidden to inquire of the prophets of his father and mother, the prophets of Baal. Nevertheless for Jehoshaphat's sake Elisha inquired of Jehovah, and received the promise of an abundant supply of water, and of a great victory over the Moabites: a promise which was immediately fulfilled. The same water which, filling the valley and the trenches dug by the Israelites, supplied the whole army and all their cattle with drink, appeared to the Moabites, who were advancing, like blood, when the morning sun shone upon it. Concluding that the allies had fallen out and slain each other, they marched incautiously to the attack, and were put to the rout. The allies pursued them with great slaughter into their own land, which they utterly ravaged and destroyed with all its cities. Kirhareth alone remained, and there the king of Moab made his last stand. An attempt to break through the besieging army having failed, he resorted to the desperate expedient of offering up his eldest son, the heir to his throne, as a burnt-offering, upon the wall of the city, in the sight of the enemy. Upon this the Israelites retired and returned to their own land (2 K. iii.). It was perhaps in consequence of Elisha's rebuke, and of the above remarkable deliverance granted to the allied armies according to his word, that Jehoram, on his return to Samaria, put away the image of Baal which Ahab his father had made (2 K. iii. 2). For in 2 K. iv. 13 we have an evidence of Elisha's being on friendly terms with Jehoram, in the offer made by him to speak to the king in favour of the Shunammite. The impression on the king's mind was probably strengthened by the subsequent incident of Naaman's cure, and the temporary cessation of the inroads of the Syrians, which doubtless resulted from it (2 K. v.). Accordingly when, a little later, war broke out between Syria and Israel, we find Elisha befriending Jehoram. The king was made acquainted by the prophet with the secret counsels of the king of Syria, and was thus enabled to defeat them (2 K. vi. 8-12); and on the other hand, when Elisha had led a large band of Syrian soldiers, whom God had blinded, into the midst of Samaria, Jehoram reverentially asked him, "My father, shall I smite them?" and, at the prophet's bidding, not only forbore to kill them, but made a feast for them, and then sent them home unhurt. This procured another cessation from the Syrian invasions for the Israelites (2 K. vi. 19-23). What happened after this to change the relations between the king and the prophet we can only conjecture. But in view of the general bad character given of Jehoram (2 K. iii. 2, 3), together with the fact of the prevalence of Baal-worship at the end of his reign (2 K. x. 21-28), it seems probable that when the Syrian inroads ceased, and he felt less dependent upon the aid of the prophet, he—relapsing into idolatry—was rebuked by Elisha, and threatened with a return of the calamities from which he had escaped. Upon his refusing to repent, a fresh invasion by the Syrians, and a close siege of Samaria, actually came to pass (2 K. vi. 24, 25), according probably to the word of the prophet. Hence, when the terrible incident arose, in consequence of the famine, of a woman boiling and eating her own child, the king^a immediately attributed the evil to Elisha the son of Shaphat, and determined to take away his life (cv. 26–31). The message which he sent by the messenger whom he commissioned to cut off the prophet's head, "Behold, this evil is from Jehovah; why should I wait for Jehovah any longer?" coupled with the fact of his having on sackcloth at the time (2 K. vi. 30, 33), also indicates that many remonstrances and warnings, similar to those given by Jeremiah to the kings of his day, had passed between the prophet and the weak and unstable son of Ahab. The providential interposition by which both Elisha's life was saved and the city delivered is narrated in 2 K. vii., and Jehoram appears to have returned to friendly feelings towards Elisha (2 K. viii. 4). His life, however, was now drawing to its close. It was very soon after the above events that Elisha went to Damascus, and predicted the revolt of Hazael, and his accession to the throne of Syria in the room of Benhadad; and it was during Elisha's absence, probably, that the conversation between Jehoram and Gehazi, and the return of the Shunammite from the land of the Philistines, recorded in 2 K. viii. 1–6, took place. Jehoram seems to have thought the revolution in Syria, which immediately followed Elisha's prediction, a good opportunity to pursue his father's favourite project of recovering Ramoth-Gilead from the Syrians. He accordingly made an alliance with his nephew Ahaziah, who had just succeeded Jehoram on the throne of Judah, and the two kings proceeded to occupy Ramoth-Gilead by force. The expedition was an unfortunate one. Jehoram was wounded in battle, and obliged to return to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds (2 K. viii. 29; ix. 14, 15), leaving his army under Jehu to hold Ramoth-Gilead against Hazael. Jehu, however, and the army under his command, revolted from their allegiance to Jehoram (2 K. ix.), and, hastily marching to Jezreel, surprised Jehoram, wounded and defenceless as he was. Jehoram, going out to meet him, fell pierced by an arrow from Jehu's bow on the very "plat" of ground which Ahab had wrested from Naboth the Jezreelite; thus fulfilling to the letter the prophecy of Elijah (1 K. xxi. 21–29). With the life of Jehoram ended the dynasty of Omri.

Jehoram's reign was rendered very remarkable by the two eminent prophets who lived in it, Elijah and Elisha. The former seems to have survived till the sixth year of his reign; the latter to have begun to be conspicuous quite in the beginning of it. For the famine which Elisha foretold to the Shunammite^b (2 K. viii. 1), and which seems to be the same as that alluded to iv. 38, must have begun in the sixth year of Jehoram's reign, since it lasted seven years, and ended in the twelfth year. In that case his acquaintance with the Shunammite must have begun not less than five or at least four years sooner, as the child must have been as much as three years old when it died; which brings us back at latest to the beginning of the second year of Jehoram's reign. Elisha's appearance in the camp of the three kings (2 K. iii. 11) was probably as early as the first year of Jehoram. With reference to the very entangled chronology of this reign, it is important to remark that there is no evidence whatever to show that Elijah the prophet was translated at the time of Elisha's first prophetic ministrations. The history in 2 K., at this part of it, having much the nature of memoirs of Elisha, and the active ministrations of Elijah having closed with the death of Ahaziah, it was very natural to complete Elijah's personal history with the narrative of his translation in ch. ii. before beginning the series of Elisha's miracles. But it by no means follows that ch. ii. is really prior in order of time to ch. iii., or that, though the raising from the dead of the Shunammite's son was subsequent, as it probably was, to Elijah's translation, therefore all the preliminary circumstances related in ch. iv. were so likewise. Neither again does the expression (2 K. iii. 11), "Here is Elisha," which poured water on the hands of Elijah,"* imply that this ministration had at that time ceased, and still less that Elijah was removed from the earth. We learn, on the contrary, from 2 Ch. xxi. 12, that he was still on earth in the reign of Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat, who did not begin to reign till the fifth of Jehoram (2 K. viii. 16); and it seems highly probable that the note of time in 2 K. i. 17, "in the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat," which is obviously and certainly out of its place where it now is, properly belongs to the narrative in ch. ii. With regard to the other discordant dates at this epoch, it must suffice to remark that all attempts to reconcile them are vain. That which is based upon the supposition of Jehoram having been associated with his father in the kingdom for three or seven years, is of all perhaps the most unfortunate, as being utterly inconsistent with the history, annihilating his independent reign, and after all failing to produce even a verbal consistency. The table given below is framed on the supposition that Jehoshaphat's reign really lasted only twenty-two years, and Ahab's only nineteen, as appears from the texts cited; that the statement that Jehoshaphat reigned twenty-five years is caused by the probable circumstance of his having taken part in the government during the last three years of Aha's reign, when his father was incapacitated by the disease in his feet (2 Ch. xvi. 12); and that three years were then added to Ahab's reign, to make the whole Elisha had spoken." The narrative goes back seven years, merely to introduce the woman's return at this time. The king's conversation with Gehazi was doubtless caused by the providential deliverance related in ch. vii.

* The use of the perfect tense in Hebrew often implies the habit or the repetition of an action, as e.g. Ps. i. 1, ii. 1, &c.

^a Some prefer to consider "the king" to have been not Jehoram, but Jehoahaz the son of Jehu.

^b The "then" of the A. V. of 2 K. viii. 1 is a thorough misrepresentation of the order of the events. Instead of "Then spake Elisha," the R. V. reads "Now number of the years of the kings of Israel agree with the whole number of those of the kings of Judah, thus unduly lengthened by an addition of three years to Jehoshaphat's reign. This arrangement, it is believed, reconciles the greatest number of existing texts, agrees best with history, and especially coincides with what is the most certain of all the elements of the chronology of this time, viz. that the twelve years' reign of Jehoram son of Ahab, and the few months' reign of Ahaziah, the successor of Jehoram son of Jehoshaphat, ended simultaneously at the accession of Jehu.⁴

2. King of Judah, the eldest son of Jehoshaphat, in whose lifetime, and in the fifth year of Jehoram king of Israel, he began to reign, at the age of thirty-two, and he reigned eight years (2 K. viii. 16, 17; 2 Ch. xxi. 1-5), from B.C. 893-2-885-4 [Riehm, 852-845]. [JEHORAM, 1.] Jehosheba his daughter was wife to the high-priest Jehoiada. The ill effects of his marriage with Athaliah the daughter of Ahab (2 K. viii. 18; 2 Ch. xxi. 6), and the influence of that second Jezebel upon him, were immediately apparent. As soon as he was fixed on the throne, he put his six brothers to death, with many of the chief nobles of the land (2 Ch. xxi. 4, 13). He then proceeded to establish the worship of Baal and other abominations, and to enforce the practice of idolatry by persecution. A prophetic writing from the aged Elijah (2 Ch. xxi. 12), the last recorded act of that prophet, reproving him for his crimes and his impiety, and foretelling the most grievous judgments upon his person and his kingdom, failed to produce any good effect upon him. This was in the first or second year of his reign. The remainder of it was a series of calamities. First the Edomites, who had been tributary to Jehoshaphat, revolted from his dominion, and established their permanent independence (2 K. viii. 20-22; 2 Ch. xxi. 8-10). It was as much as Jehoram could do, by a night-attack with all his forces, to extricate himself from their army, which had surrounded him. Next, the priestly city Libnah, one of the strongest fortified cities in Judah (2 K. xix. 8), indignant at his cruelties, and abhorring his apostasy, rebelled against him (2 K. viii. 22; 2 Ch. xxi. 10). Then followed invasions of armed bands of Philistines and of Arabians (the same who paid tribute to Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch. xvii. 11), who burst into Judaea, stormed the king's palace, put his wives and all his children, except his youngest son Ahaziah, to death (2 Ch. xxii. 1), or carried them into captivity, and plundered all his treasures (2 Ch. xxi. 16, 17). To crown all, a terrible and incurable disease in his bowels fell upon him, of which after two years of misery he died, unregretted. He went down to a dishonoured grave in the prime of life, without either private or public mourning, and, though buried in the city of David, without a resting-place in the sepulchres of his fathers (2 Ch. xxi. 18-20). He died early in the twelfth year of his brother-in-law Jehoram's reign over Israel, and was succeeded by his son Ahaziah. [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

3. (B. 'Iapdā, A. 'Iapdu; Joran.) One of two priests sent by king Jehoshaphat in the third year of his reign, along with nine Levites and five princes, to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (2 Ch. xvii. 8). [C. H.]

JEHOSHABE'ATH (יהושבת); B. 'Iosa-Bed, A. 'Iosaβēθ; Joabeth): the form in which the name of JEHOSEBEA is given in 2 Ch. xxii. 11, where only we are informed that she was the wife of Jehoiada the high-priest. [JEHOSEBEA.]

JEHO-SHA'PHAT (יהושפט) = Jehovah hath judged; 'Iosaφat; Josaphat). 1. King of Judah; the son of Asa and Azubah (1 K. xxii. 42; 2 Ch. xx. 31). He succeeded Asa, in the fourth year of Ahab king of Israel (1 K. xxii. 41), when he was thirty-five years old and reigned twenty-five years (Riehm, B.C. 877-853). His history is to be found among the events recorded in 1 K. xv. 24, xxii.; 2 K. iii. 7-14, xii. 18; and in a continuous and fuller narrative in 2 Ch. xvii.-xxi. The rest of his acts were recorded in the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah (1 K. xxii. 45) and in the Book of Jehu the son of Hanani (1 Ch. xx. 34). He was contemporary with Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram, kings of Israel. At first he strengthened himself against Israel by fortifying and garrisoning the cities of Judah and the Ephraimite conquests of Asa. But soon afterwards the two Hebrew kings, perhaps appreciating their common danger from Damascus and the tribes on their eastern frontier, came to an understanding. Israel and Judah drew together (1 K. xxii. 2-4; 2 Ch. xviii. 2, 3) for the first time since they parted at Shechem sixty years previously. Jehoshaphat's eldest son Jehoram married Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel (1 K. viii. 18; 2 Ch. xxi. 6). A comparison of dates and ages shows that the marriage occurred in the lifetime of Jehoshaphat, but it does not appear how far he encouraged it. The closeness of the alliance between the two kings is shown by many circumstances:—Elijah's reluctance when in exile to set foot within the territory of Judah (Blunt, Und. Coinc. ii. § 19, p. 199); the identity of names given to the children of the two royal families; the admission of names compounded with the name of Jehovah into the family of Jezebel, the zealous worshipper of Baal; and the extreme slacrity with which Jehoshaphat afterwards accompanied Ahab to the field of battle.

But in his own kingdom Jehoshaphat ever showed himself a zealous follower of the commandments of God: he tried, it would seem not quite successfully, to put down the high places in which the people of Judah used to burn incense (1 K. xxii. 43; 2 Ch. xix. 3, xx. 33). The Chronicler adds much that is interesting, and which is not to be set aside as the projection of later ideas on early times. In his third year, apprehending perhaps the evil example of Israelitish idolatry, and considering that the Levites were not fulfilling satisfactorily their function of teaching the people, Jehoshaphat sent out a commission of certain princes, priests, and Levites, to go through the cities of Judah, teaching the people out of the Book of the Law (2 Ch. xvii. 7-9). He made separate provision for each of his sons as they grew up, perhaps with a foreboding of their melancholy end (2 Ch. xxi. 4). Riches and honours increased around him. He received tribute from the Philistines and Arabians, and kept up a large standing army in Jerusalem (2 Ch. xvii. 10-19).

It was probably about the 16th year of his reign when he went to Samaria to visit Ahab and to become his ally in the great battle of Ramoth-gilead (1 K. xxii. 2-33; 2 Ch. xviii. 2-32)—not very decisive in its result, and fatal to Ahab. From thence Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem in peace; and, after receiving a rebuke from the prophet Jehu, went himself through the people "from Beersheba to Mount Ephraim," reclaiming them to the Law of God (2 Ch. xix. 1-4). He also took measures for the better administration of justice, ecclesiastical and civil, throughout his dominions (cp. 5-11); on which see Selden, De Synedris, ii. cap. 8, § 4. Turning his attention to foreign commerce, he built at Ezion-geber, with the help of Ahaziah, a navy designed to go to Tarshish (cp. Speaker's Comm., Keil, and Oettli on 2 Ch. xx. 36); but in accordance with a prediction of a prophet Eliezer, it was wrecked at Ezion-geber (2 Ch. xx. 35-37); and Jehoshaphat resisted Ahaziah's proposal to renew their joint attempt.

Before the close of his reign he was engaged in two additional wars. He was miraculously delivered from a threatened attack of the people of Ammon, Moab, and Seir (2 Ch. xx. 1-28); the result of which is thought by some critics to be celebrated in Pss. xlviii. and xcii., and to be alluded to by the Prophet Joel (iii. 2, 12). Those invaders coming by the ascent of Ziz must have entered Judah from the Salt Sea at Engedi; and the Israelite army, advancing from Jerusalem some ten miles southward towards the Wilderness of Tekoa, saw them dead in the valley of Berachah midway between Bethlehem and Hebron. After this, perhaps, must be dated the war which Jehoshaphat, in conjunction with Jehoram king of Israel and the king of Edom, carried on against the rebellious king of Moab (2 K. iii. 4-27). The kings of Israel and Judah reached Moab, not at the north of that country, at the Arnon border, but at the south of it, arriving by way of Hebron and round the lower bay of the Salt Sea at the Wady Kurahy or Ahsy at the S.E. corner, where they would unite with Edom, which was there divided from Moab. After this the realm of Jehoshaphat was quiet. In his declining years the administration of affairs was placed in the hands of his son Jehoram; to whom, as Ussher conjectures, the same charge had been temporarily committed during Jehoshaphat's absence at Ramoth-gilead.

Like the prophets with whom he was brought into contact, we cannot describe the character of this good king without a mixture of blame. Eminently pious, gentle, just, devoted to the spiritual and temporal welfare of his subjects, active in mind and body, he was wanting in firmness and consistency.

2. (B. Ἰωσαφάτ, Ἰωσαφάθ; A. Ἰωσαφάτ, Ἰωσαφάτ.) Son of Ahilud, who filled the office of recorder or annalist in the court of David (2 Sam. viii. 16, xx. 24; 1 Ch. xviii. 15), and afterwards of Solomon (1 K. iv. 3). The marginal alternatives of "recorder" are in A. V. "remembrancer," "writer of chronicles;" in R. V. "chronicler." [RECORDER.] Such officers are found not only in the courts of the Hebrew kings, but also in those of ancient and modern Persia, of the Eastern Roman Empire (Gesenius), of China, &c. (Keil). An instance of the use made of their writings is given in Esth. vi. 1.

3. (Ἰωσαφάτ.) One of seven priests (1 Ch. xv. 24) appointed by David to blow trumpets before the Ark in its transit from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem.

4. (B. omits, A. Ἰωσαφάτ.) Son of Paruah; one of the twelve purveyors of king Solomon (1 K. iv. 17), his district being Issachar.

5. (B. Ἰωσαφάθ, A. Ἰωσαφάτ.) Son of Nimshi, and father of king Jehu (2 K. ix. 2, 14).

[W. T. B.] [C. H.]

JEHO-SHA'PHAT, VALLEY OF (Ἰεϋσάφάθ; Κοιλὰς Ἰωσαφάτ; Vallis Josaphat), a valley mentioned by the prophet Joel only, as the spot in which, after the return of Judah and Jerusalem from captivity, Jehovah would gather all the heathen (Joel iii. 2; Heb. iv. 2), and would there sit to judge them for their misdeeds to Israel (iii. 12; Heb. v. 4). The passage is one of great boldness, abounding in the verbal turns in which Hebrew poetry so much delights, and in particular there is a play between the name given to the spot—Jehoshaphat, i.e. "Jehovah's judgment"—and the "judgment" there to be pronounced. The Hebrew Prophets often refer to the ancient glories of their nation: thus Isaiah speaks of "the day of Midian," and of the triumphs of David and of Joshua in "Mount Perazim" and in the "Valley of Gibeon;" and in like manner Joel, in announcing the vengeance to be taken on the strangers who were annoying his country (iii. 14), seems to have glanced back to that triumphant day when king Jehoshaphat, the greatest king the nation had seen since Solomon, and the greatest champion of Jehovah, led out his people to a valley in the wilderness of Tekoa, and was there blessed with such a victory over the hordes of his enemies as was without a parallel in the national records (2 Ch. xx.).

But though such a reference to Jehoshaphat is both natural and characteristic, it is not certain that it is intended (cp. Orelli in Strack u. Zöckler's Xyf. Komm. on Joel i. c.). The name may be only an imaginary one conferred on a spot which existed nowhere but in the vision of the Prophet. Such was the view of some of the ancient translators. Thus Theodotion renders it χώρα κρήναις; and so the Targum of Jonathan—"the plain of the division of judgment." Michaelis (Bibel für Ungelernten, Remarks on Joel) takes a similar view, and considers the passage to be a prediction of the Maccabean victories. By others, however, the Prophet has been supposed to have the end of the world in view. And not only this, but the scene of "Jehovah's judgment" has been localised, and the name has come down to us attached to the deep ravine which separates Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives. At what period the name was first applied to this spot is not known. There is no trace of it in the Bible or in Josephus. In both the only name used for this gorge is KIDRON (N. T. CEDRON). We first encounter its new title in the middle of the 4th century in the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome (s. v. Κοιλὰς Ἰωσαφάτ, OS. p. 272, 89; p. 145, 13); in the Commentary of the latter Father on Joel; and in the Ilin. Hierosol. Eucherius (c. A.D. 440) has Geennon site vallis Josaphat, and in the 6th cent. it was also known as the "Valley of Gethsemane" (Ant. Mart. xvii.). Since that time the name has been recognised and adopted by travellers of all ages and all faiths. It is used by Christians—as Arculf about 670 (Early Trav. p. 4), the author of the Citez de Jerusalem in 1187 (Rob. ii. 562), and Maundrell in 1697 (E. Trav. p. 469); and by Jews, as Benjamin of Tudela, about 1170 (Asher, i. 71; and see Reland, Pal. p. 356). By the Muslims it is called Wādī Jahannum, but it is commonly known as the W. Sitti Maryam, from the "Tomb of the Virgin"; or W. el-Jōs, possibly an abbreviation of Jehoshaphat. According to Seetzen (ii. 23, 26) it bears the name of W. Jūshafat or Shafat. Both Muslims and Jews believe that the last judgment is to take place there. To find a grave there is the dearest wish of the latter (Briggs, Heathen and Holy Lands, p. 290); and the former show—as they have shown for certainly two centuries—the place on which Muhammad is to be seated at the Last Judgment, a stone jutting out from the east wall of the Haram area near the south corner, one of the pillars which once adorned the churches of Helena or Justinian, and of which multitudes are now embedded in the rude masonry of the more modern walls of Jerusalem. The steep sides of the ravine, wherever a level strip affords the opportunity, are crowded—in places almost paved—by the sepulchres of the Muslims, or by the simpler slabs of the Jewish tombs, alike awaiting the assembly of the Last Judgment.

So narrow and precipitous^b a glen is quite unsuited for such an event; but this inconsistency does not appear to have disturbed those who framed, or those who hold, the tradition. It is however implied in the Hebrew terms em-

^a This pillar is said to be called et-Tarik, "the road" (De Saulcy, Voyage, ii. 199). From it will spring the Bridge of es-Sirāt, the crossing of which is to test the true believers. Those who cannot stand the test will drop off into the abyss of Gehenna in the depths of the valley (All Bey, 224-5; Mejr. ed-Dīn in Rob. i. 269). According to Muslim tradition, all mankind will be assembled for judgment on the plain es-Sākirāh, near the Church of the Ascension (Mukadassi) or to the north of Jerusalem (Mejr. ed-Dīn).

^b St. Cyril (of Alexandria) either did not know the spot, or has another Valley in his eye; probably the former. He describes it as not many stadia from Jerusalem; and says he is told (φῆσι) that it is "bare and apt for horses" (ψαδὸν καὶ ἱερῆαρον, Comm. on Joel, quoted by Reland, p. 355). Perhaps this indicates that the tradition was not at that time quite fixed.

ployed in the two cases. That by Joel is 'Emek (עֵמֶק), a word applied to spacious valleys, such as those of Esdraelon or Gibeon (Stanley, S. & P. App. § 1). On the other hand the ravine of the Kidron is invariably designated by Nachal (נַחַל), answering to the modern Arabic Wādī. There is no instance in the O. T. of these two terms being convertible, and this fact alone would warrant the inference that the tradition of the identity of the Emek of Jehoshaphat and the Nachal Kedron did not arise until Hebrew had begun to become a dead language.^c The grounds on which it did arise were probably two:—1. The frequent mention throughout this passage of Joel of Mount Zion, Jerusalem, and the Temple (ii. 32; iii. 1, 6, 16, 17, 18), may have led to the belief that the locality of the great judgment would be in their immediate neighbourhood. This would be assisted by the mention of the Mount of Olives in the somewhat similar passage in Zechariah (xiv. 3, 4).

2. The belief that Christ would reappear in judgment on the Mount of Olives, from which He had ascended. This was at one time a received article of Christian belief, and was grounded on the words of the Angels, "He shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven"^d (Adrichomius, Theatr. Ter. Sanctae, Jerusalem, § 192; Corn. à Lapide on Acts i.).

There is the alternative that the valley of Jehoshaphat was really an ancient name of the Valley of the Kedron; and that, from the name, the connexion with Joel's prophecy and the belief in its being the scene of Jehovah's last judgment have followed. This may be so; but then we should expect to find some trace of the existence of the name before the 4th century after Christ. It was certainly used as a burying-place as early as the reign of Josiah (2 K. xxiii. 6), but no inference can fairly be drawn from this.

But whatever originated the tradition, it has held its ground most firmly. (a.) In the valley itself, one of the four remarkable monuments which exist at the foot of Olivet was at a very early date connected with Jehoshaphat. At Arculf's visit (about 670) the name appears to have been borne by that now called "Absalom's tomb," but then the "tower of Jehoshaphat;" whilst the present "tomb of Jehoshaphat" was assigned to Simeon and Joseph (E. Trav. p. 4). In the time of Maundrell the "tomb of Jehoshaphat" was, what it still is, an excavation, with an architectural front, in the face of the rock behind "Absalom's tomb" (E. Trav. p. 469). A photograph of the tomb has been published in the series of the Palestine Exploration Fund. The name may, as already observed, really point to Jehoshaphat himself, though not to his tomb, as he was buried, like the other kings, in the city of David (2 Ch. xxi. 1). (b.) One of the gates of the city in the east wall, opening on the valley, bore the same name. This is plain from the Citez de Iherusalem, where the present St. Stephen's Gate is called the Porte de Josafas, and the street leading westward from it the Rue de Josafas (§§ 22-24; cp. J. of Würzburg, xvi.). Mention is also made in the Citez de I. (§ 13) of a "postern," called the Porte de Josafas, which was to the left, or north of the Golden Gate, and probably the same gate as that just mentioned. It cannot be the supposed walled-up doorway, 50 ft. south of the Golden Gate, to which M. de Sauley has given the name Pôterne de Josaphat. This "postern," if it be a doorway, is of comparatively modern date, and perhaps marks the position of the Bab el-Burak of Mejr ed-Din (Notes to O. S. of Jerusalem, p. 25; and PEF. photograph).

^c It appears in the Targum on Cant. viii. 1.

^d In Sir John Maundeville a different reason is given for the same. "Very near this"—the place where Christ wept over Jerusalem—"is the stone on which our Lord sat when He preached; and on that same stone shall He sit on the day of doom, right as He said Himself." Bernard the Wise, in the 8th century, speaks of the church of St. Leon, in the Valley, "where our Lord will come to judgment" (Early Trav. p. 26).

The name would seem to be generally confined by travellers to the upper part of the glen, from about the "Tomb of the Virgin" to the south-east corner of the wall of Jerusalem. [TOMBS.] [G.] [W.]

JEHO-SHEBA (יהושבעה); LXX. Ἰωσάβη, Joseph. Ἰωσαβηθ), daughter of Jehoram king of Israel, and wife of Jehoiada the high-priest (2 K. xi. 2; 2 Ch. xxii. 11). Her name in the Chronicles is given JEHOHABEATH. It thus exactly resembles the name of the only two other wives of Jewish priests who are known to us, viz. ELISHEBA (LXX. and N. T. Ἐλισαβή, whence our Elisabeth), the wife of Aaron, Ex. vi. 23, and the wife of Zechariah, Luke i. 7. In the former case the word signifies "Jehovah's oath;" in the second, "God's oath."

As she is called (2 K. xi. 2) "the daughter of Joram, sister of Abaziah," it has been conjectured that she was the daughter, not of Athaliah, but of Jehoram, by another wife; and Josephus (Ant. ix. 7, § 1) calls her Ὀχοζία ἀδελφή. This may be; but it is also possible that the omission of Athaliah's name may have been occasioned by the detestation in which it was held,—in the same way as modern commentators have, for the same reason, eagerly embraced this hypothesis. That it is not absolutely needed is shown by the fact that the worship of Jehovah was tolerated under the reigns both of Jehoram and Athaliah—and that the name of Jehovah was incorporated into both of their names.

She is the only recorded instance of the marriage of a princess of the royal house with a high-priest. On this occasion it was a providential circumstance ("for she was the sister of Abaziah," 2 Ch. xxii. 11), as inducing and probably enabling her to rescue the infant Joash from the massacre of his brothers. By her, he and his nurse were concealed in the palace, and afterwards in the Temple (2 K. xi. 2, 3; 2 Ch. xxii. 11), where he was brought up probably with her sons (2 Ch. xxxiii. 11), who assisted at his coronation. One of these was Zechariah, who succeeded her husband in his office, and was afterwards murdered (2 Ch. xxiv. 20). The "bed-chamber" of this narrative is explained as the "chamber of mattresses" in the palace, a room belonging to an Eastern abode at this day, wherein those articles and what pertained to them were stored, a convenient refuge for the child in the first moments of danger (Keil, Comm. in loc.; Ewald, Hist. of Isr. in loc.; Stanley, Jewish Ch. ii. 39 [1883]). "With her hid in the house of the Lord," may refer to the high-priest's abode in the Temple precincts (Keil), or to some building in the high-priest's charge adjoining the Temple (Ewald).

[A. P. S.] [C. H.]

JEHO-SHU'A (יהושוע; Ἰησοῦς; Josue). In this form—contracted in the Hebrew, but fuller than usual in the A. V.—is given the name of Joshua in Num. xiii. 16, on the occasion of its bestowal by Moses. The addition of the name of Jehovah probably marks the recognition by Moses of the important part taken in the affair of the spies by him, who till this time had been Hoshea, "help," but was henceforward to be Jeho-shua, "Jehovah is help" (Ewald, ii. 306). Once more only the name appears in its full form in the A. V.—this time with a redundant letter—

JEHO-SHU'AH (the Heb. is as above; Ἰησοῦε, in both MSS.; Josue), in the genealogy of Ephraim (1 Ch. vii. 27). We should be thankful to the translators of the A. V. for giving the first syllables of this great name their full form, if only in these two cases; though why in these only it is difficult to understand. Nor is it easier to see whence they got the final h in the latter of the two. [G.]

JEHOVAH (יהוה); so the word is usually pointed, with the vowels of יהוה; but when the two occur together, the former is pointed יהוה—that is, with the vowels of יהוה, as in Obad. i. 1, Hab. iii. 19. The LXX. generally render it by Κύριος, the Vulgate by Dominus; and in this respect they have been followed by the A. V., where it is translated "The LORD". The true pronunciation of this Name, which, strictly speaking, is the proper Name of the God of Israel, has been entirely lost, the Jews themselves scrupulously avoiding every mention of it, and reading in its stead one or other of the words with whose proper vowel-points it may happen to be written. This custom, which had its origin in reverence, but degenerated into a superstition, was founded upon an erroneous construction of Lev. xxiv. 16 (see Targ. Onk. ad loc.), from which it was inferred that the mere utterance of the Name constituted a capital offence. In the Rabbinical writings it is distinguished by various euphemistic expressions; as simply "the Name," or "the Name of four letters" (the Greek tetragrammaton); "the great and terrible Name;" "the peculiar Name," i.e. appropriated to God alone; "the separate Name," i.e. either the Name which is separated or removed from human knowledge, or, as some render, "the Name which has been interpreted or revealed" (שם המפורש, shem hamme'phorash). The Samaritans followed the same custom, and in reading the Pentateuch substituted for Jehovah יהוה, shemá, "the Name," at the same time perpetuating the practice in their alphabetical poems and later writings (cp. Geiger, Urschrift, p. 262). According to Jewish tradition, it was pronounced but once a year by the high-priest on the day of Atonement when he entered the Holy of Holies; but on this point there is some doubt, Maimonides (Mor. Neb. i. 61) asserting that the use of the word was confined to the blessings of the priests, and restricted to the sanctuary, without limiting it still further to the high-priest alone. On the same authority we learn that its use ceased with Simeon the Just (Yad. Chaz. c. 14, § 10), having lasted through two generations, that of the men of the Great Synagogue and the age of shemod (i.e. apostasy or persecution); while others include the generation of Zedekiah among those who possessed the use of the shém hammephôrâish (Midrash on Ps. xxxvi. 11, quoted by Buxtorf in Reland's Decas Exercit.). But even after the destruction of the second Temple we meet with reports of individuals who were credited with knowledge of the secret. A certain Bar Kamzar is mentioned in the Mishna (Yoma, iii. § 11) who was able to write this Name of God; but even on such evidence we may conclude, that after the second siege of Jerusalem, and probably at an earlier period, the Divine Name had passed altogether out of popular use. Josephus, who was a priest, professes a religious scruple about revealing this holy Name (Ant. ii. 12, § 4); and Philo states (de Vit. Mos. iii. p. 519) that for those alone whose ears and tongue were purged by wisdom was it lawful to hear or utter it. It is evident therefore that no reference to Jewish writers can be expected to decide the question of its exact sound. At the same time the discussion of the probable ancient pronunciation may prove to be interesting; and as it is one in which great names are ranged on both sides, it would for this reason alone be impertinent to dismiss it with a cursory notice. In Reland's Decade of Dissertations, Fuller, Gataker, and Leuden do battle for the pronunciation Jehovah, against such formidable antagonists as Drusus, Amama, Cappellus, Buxtorf, and Alting, who, it is scarcely necessary to say, fairly beat their opponents out of the field; the only argument, in fact, of any weight, which is employed by the advocates of the pronunciation of the word as it is written, being that derived from the form in which it appears in proper names, such as Jehoshaphat, which, however, is simply due to the shifting of the accent. Their antagonists make a strong point of the fact that, as has been noticed above, two different sets of vowels are applied to the same consonants according to circumstances. To this Leuden, of all the champions on his side, but feebly replies. The same may be said of replies to the argument derived from the fact that the letters מוֹכֵלֵךְ, when prefixed to יהוה, take, not the vowels which they would regularly receive were the present punctuation true, but those with which they would be written if אֲדֹנָי, 'adônâi, were the reading; and that the letters ordinarily taking dajesh lene when following יהוה would, according to the rules of the Hebrew points, if Jehovah were correctly vocalized, be written without dagesh, whereas it is uniformly inserted. Whatever, therefore, be the true pronunciation of the word, the usage of the Masorets themselves indicates that it is not Jehovah.

In Greek writers it appears under the several forms of 'Iaô (Diod. Sic. i. 94; Irenæus, i. 4, § 1), 'Ieuvé (Porphyry in Eusebius, Præp. Evæ. i. 9, § 21), 'Iaou (Clem. Alex. Strom. v. p. 666), and in a catena to the Pentateuch in a MS. at Turin 'Id obé. Both Theodoret (Quæst. 15 in Exod.) and Epiphanius (Adv. Hæc. 20) give 'Iaβé, the former distinguishing it as the pronunciation of the Samaritans, while 'Id represented that of the Jews. Of these forms, 'Iaô and 'Iaou may both have arisen from יהוה ('yâhû), the second element in so many Hebrew proper names; 'Ieuvé is perhaps an attempt to render a pronunciation יהוהי ('Yehwéh) which might have succeeded יהוהי ('Yahwâh); cp. אֲיָהּ, Jehu, Assyrian יא-ו-א. 'Id has the look of a Greek imitation of יהוה ('âhyâh or 'ehyéh), "I am" (Ex. iii. 14), but another MS. reads 'Id, that is, apparently, יה, Jah ('Yâh), which occurs in the O. T. as an independent Name; while 'Iaβé seems to preserve the pronunciation יהוהי ('Yahwâh or 'Yahwéh), as nearly as Greek writing allows. Epiphanius, in fact, expressly states that 'Iaβé was the Name interpreted by God Himself to Moses (Ex. vi. 3). Lastly, the Jako of pseudo-Jerome (Brev. in Psal. Ps. viii.) seems to be only a Latin modification of 'Iaô.

The conjectures of the moderns may next be reviewed. It will be better perhaps to ascend from the most improbable hypotheses to those which carry with them more show of reason, and thus prepare the way for the considerations which will follow.

I. Von Bohlen unhesitatingly asserts that beyond all doubt the word Jehovah is not Semitic in its origin. Pinning his faith upon the Abraxas gems of the Gnostics, in which he finds it in the form Jao, he connects it with the Sanscrit devis, the Greek Dios, and Latin Jovis or Diovis. But, apart from the consideration that his authority is at least questionable, he omits to explain the striking phenomenon that the older form which has the d should be preserved in the younger languages, the Greek and ancient Latin, while not a trace of it appears in the Hebrew. It would be desirable also, before a philological argument of this nature is admitted, that the relation between the Semitic and Aryan families of speech should be more clearly established. In the absence of this, any inferences which may be drawn from apparent resemblances (the resemblance in the present case not being even apparent) will lead to certain error. That the Hebrews learned the Name of their God from the Egyptians is a theory which has found some advocates. The foundations for this theory are sufficiently slight. As has been mentioned above, Diodorus (i. 94) gives the Greek form 'Iaô; and from this it has been inferred that 'Iaô was a deity of the Egyptians, whereas nothing can be clearer from the context than that the historian is speaking specially of the God of the Jews. Again, in Macrobius (Sat. i. c. 18), a line is quoted from an oracular response of Apollo Clarius, ἀπόθεο δὲν πάτρων ὑπερὸν θεῶν ἱεραὶν 'Iaô.

which has been made use of for the same purpose. But Jablonsky (Panth. Aeg. ii. § 5) has proved incontestably that the author of the verses from which the above is quoted, was one of the Judaizing Gnostics, who were in the habit of making the names 'Iaō and Σεβασθ the subjects of mystical speculations. The Ophites, who were Egyptians, are known to have given the name 'Iaō to the moon (Neander, Gnost. 252), but this, as Tholuck suggests, may have arisen from the fact that in Coptic the moon is called ioh (Verm. Schriften, Th. i. 385); just as the absurd fable that the Jews worshipped an ass or the head of an ass probably arose from the fact that ioh is Coptic for ass. Movers (Phoen. i. 540), while defending the genuineness of the passage of Macrobius, connects 'Iaō, which denotes the Sun or Dionysus, with the root יָהוּ, so that it signifies "the life-giver" (?). In any case, the fact that the name 'Iaō is found among the Greeks and Egyptians, or among the Orientals of Further Asia, in the 2nd or 3rd century, cannot be made use of as an argument that the Hebrews derived their knowledge of the Name of their own God from any one of these nations. On the contrary, there can be but little doubt that the process in reality was reversed, and that in this case the Hebrews were, not the borrowers, but the lenders. We have indisputable evidence that it existed among them, whatever may have been its origin, many centuries before it is found in other records; of the contrary we have no evidence whatever.

Rémusat supposed that a Chinese phonetic spelling of "Jehovah" was actually to be found in the 14th chapter of the Tao Teh King of Lao Tszé, the contemporary of Confucius (Mém. sur la Vie et les Opinions de Láo-Tszé, Paris, 1823). M. Rémusat translates the passage as follows:—"Celui que vous regardez et que vous ne voyez pas, se nomme j; celui que vous écoutez et que vous n'entendez pas, se nomme Hi; celui que votre main cherche et qu'elle ne peut pas saisir, se nomme Wei. Ce sont trois êtres qu'on ne peut comprendre, et qui, confondus, n'en font qu'un." This strange misapplication of three technical terms of Chinese metaphysics, which appears to have originated with certain Romish missionaries in the 17th century, was exploded by Stanislas Julien in his version of the Tao Teh King (Le Livre de la Voie et de la Vertu, Paris, 1842. See Legge, Encyc. Britann. s. v. Lao-Tszé). Equally groundless is the identification suggested in a letter from the missionary Plaisant to the Vicar Apostolic Boucho, dated 18th Feb. 1847, which mentions a tradition existing among a tribe in the jungles of Burmah, that the divine being was called Joa or Kara-Joa, and that the peculiarities of the Jehovah of the Old Testament were attributed to him (Reinke, Beitrag, iii. 65). The inscription in front of the temple of Isis at Saïs quoted by Plutarch (de Is. et Os. § 9), "I am all that hath been, and that is, and that shall be," which has been employed as an argument to prove that the Name Jehovah was known among the Egyptians, is mentioned neither by Herodotus, Diodorus, nor Strabo; and Proclus, who does allude to it, says it was in the adytum of the temple. But, even if it be genuine, its authority is worthless for the purpose for which it is adduced. For, supposing that Jehovah is the Name to which such meaning is attached, it follows rather that the Egyptians borrowed it and learned its significance from the Jews, unless it can be proved that both in Egyptian and Hebrew the same combination of letters conveyed the same idea. Without, however, having recourse to any hypothesis of this kind, the peculiarity of the inscription is sufficiently explained by the Pantheism which is known to have characterised the decline of Egyptian religion (Renouf, Hübner Lect., pp. 230 sqq.). The advocates of the Egyptian origin of the Name have shown no lack of ingenuity in summoning to their aid authorities the most unpromising. A passage from a treatise on interpretation (περί ἑρμηνείας, § 71), written by one Demetrius, in which it is said that the Egyptians hymned their gods by means of the seven vowels, has been tortured to give evidence on the point. Scaliger was in doubt whether it referred to Serapis, called by Hesychius "Serapis of seven letters" (τὸ ἑπταγράμματον Σαράπης), or to the exclamation ἦ ἦ ἦ, ἡὺ' γελῶν, "He is Jehovah." But the gloss in Hesychius is Ἐπταγράμματον. τὸ ὄργανον. ἢ σκληρόν. καὶ Σάραπης; which may be explained like the Latin phrase homo trium literarum (i. e. fur). Serapis, like the two disparaging epithets which precede it in the gloss, is a heptagram or word of seven letters, including vowels and consonants. The citation, therefore, has clearly no bearing on our subject. Gesner took the seven Greek vowels, and, arranging them in the order ΙΕΗΩΩΤΑ, found therein Jehovah. But he was triumphantly refuted by Didymus, who maintained that the vowels were merely used for musical notes, and in this very probable conjecture he is supported by the Milesian inscription elucidated by Barthélemy and others. In this the invocation of God is denoted by the seven vowels five times repeated in different arrangements, Αηιουω, Εηιουωα, Ηιουωα, Ιουωαη, Οουωαη: each group of vowels precedes a "holy" (ἅγιε), and the whole concludes with the following: "The city of the Milesians and all the inhabitants are guarded by Archangels." Müller, with much probability, concludes that the seven vowels represented the seven notes of the octave. Another argument for the Egyptian origin of Jehovah is found in the circumstance that Pharaoh changed the name of Eliakim to Jehoiakim (2 K. xliii. 34), which it is asserted is not in accordance with the practice of conquerors towards the conquered, unless the Egyptian king imposed upon the king of Judah the name of one of his own gods. But the same reasoning would prove that the origin of the word was Babylonian, for the king of Babylon changed the name of Mattaniah to Zedekiah (2 K. xxiv. 17). Of late, again, it has been suggested that ἦ ἦ ἦ, "He Who Is" or "Becometh," is a Hebrew version of the Egyptian Cheperá, the god who is always "becoming," i. e. the Sun, symbolised by the scarabæus, which in Egyptian was also called cheperá. But evidence of connexion between the two names is entirely wanting; apart from the fact that the original meaning of the Hebrew Name is far from certain (see also Renouf, Hüb. Lect. pp. 243 sqq.).

But many, abandoning as untenable the theory of an Egyptian origin, have sought to trace the Name among the Phœnicians and Canaanitish tribes. In support of this, Hartmann brings forward a passage from a pretended fragment of Sanchoniathon quoted by Philo Byblius, a writer of the age of Nero. But it is now generally admitted that the so-called fragments of Sanchoniathon, the ancient Phœnician chronicler, are inpuudent forgeries concocted by Philo Byblius himself. Besides, the passage to which Hartmann refers is not found in Philo Byblius, but is quoted from Porphyry by Eusebius (Præp. Evæ. i. 9, § 21), and, genuine or not, evidently alludes to the Jehovah of the Jews. It is there stated that the most trustworthy authority in matters connected with the Jews was Sanchoniathon of Beyrouth, who received his information from Hierombalos (Jerubbaal), the priest of the god 'Ieuó. From the occurrence of Jehovah as a compound in the proper names of many who were not Hebrews, Hamaker (Misc. Phœn., p. 174, &c.) contends that it must have been known among heathen peoples. But such knowledge, if it existed, was no more than might have been obtained by their necessary contact with the Hebrews. The names of Uriah the Hittite, of Araunah or Aranjah the Jebusite, of Tobiah the Ammonite, and of the Canaanitish town Bizjothjah, may thus be all explained without having recourse to Hamaker's hypothesis. Besides, Araunah is doubtful, as its variants show, and Bizjothjah is a mere corruption of בְּנֵי־וֹרֵי, "and her daughters," as the LXX. shows (Josh. xv. 28). No certain instance, in fact, can be adduced of Jah compounded with a local name. Of as little value is his appeal to 1 K. v. 7, where we find the Name Jehovah in the mouth of Hiram, king of Tyre. Apart from the consideration that Hiram would necessarily be acquainted with the Name as that of the Hebrews' national God, its occurrence is sufficiently explained by the tenor of Solomon's message (1 K. v. 3-5). Another point on which Hamaker relies for support is the name 'Αβδαϊός, which occurs as that of a Tyrian suffete in Menander (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 21), and which he identifies with Obadiah (עֲבַדְיָה). But both Fürst and Hengstenberg represent it in Hebrew characters by עֲבַדַי, 'abdai, which even Hamaker thinks more probable.* While, however, it must be admitted that no trace of יהוה, as a Canaanitish deity, can be specified, and while therefore we agree with Kuenen and others that this Name, in fact, designates the national God of Israel as distinct from the gods of Canaan, the same can hardly be affirmed of יה and יהו, which are usually regarded as contractions of the fuller form יהוה. Already in the tablets of Tell al-Amarna (15th cent. B.C.) we meet with such names as Arzau-ya, Wid(?)-ya (governor of Ashkelon), and Bi-i-ya (i.e. perhaps Abi-yah), which seem to imply that Yahu or Yah really was a Divine name known to the peoples of Canaan before the Exodus. The evidence of numerous Babylonian contract tablets of a later period points likewise to the conclusion that this Name was known to other Semitic nations besides Israel. It is difficult to suppose that all such names as Kittia or Kittiya, "son of Ea's priest"—to cite a tablet in the writer's collection (PSBA. Feb. 1892)— are those of Jews settled in Babylonia. Kittiya, from kittu, "righteousness," is an exact Babylonian parallel to the Hebrew Zedekiah (Sidqya). Quite recently Mr. Pinches has found the name Bel-Yau in one of these documents, which means, apparently, "Bel is Yah," like the Heb. בְּלֵיָהּ, "Baal is Jah." (See PSBA. Nov. 1892.)

II. Such are the principal hypotheses which have been constructed in favour of a non-Hebraic origin of Jehovah. To attribute much value to them requires a large share of faith. It remains now to examine the theories on the opposite side; for on this point authorities are by no means agreed, and have frequently gone to the contrary extreme. S. D. Luzzatto (Anim. in Jes. Vat. in Rosenmüller's Compend. xxiv.) advanced with singular simplicity the extraordinary statement that Jehovah, or rather יהוה divested of points, is compounded of two interjections, הוּ, vah, of pain, and יָהּי, of joy, and denotes the author of good and evil. Such an etymology, from one who was unquestionably among the first of modern Jewish scholars, is a remarkable phenomenon. Ewald, referring to Gen. xix. 24, suggested as the origin of Jehovah, the Arab. هَوَا, which signifies "the air;" a not impossible suggestion, in view of the fact that the atmospheric phenomena of storm and thunder and lightning were looked upon as special manifestations of His Presence (e.g. Hab. iii.; Ps. xix.). Ewald refers to Gen. xix. 24 (אֲנַחְתָּ יְהוָה) and to Micah v. 7, and cites the later designation of Jehovah as "The God of Heaven" (HI. ii. 157, Eng. Trans.). But most have taken for the basis of their explanations, and the different modes of punctuation which they propose, the passage Ex. iii. 14; according to which, when Moses received his commission to be the deliverer of Israel, the Almighty, Who appeared in the burning bush, communicated to him the Name which he should give as the credentials of his mission: "And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM (אֲנִי הָאֵלֹהִים אֲנִי הָאֵלֹהִים, 'ehyeh 'elohim 'ehyeh); and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." That this passage was intended to indicate the etymology of Jehovah, as understood by the Hebrews, no one has ventured to doubt. According to this view then, יהוה must be formed from the 3rd sing. masc. impf. of the substantive verb יהיה, the older form of which was יהוה, still found in the Chaldee יהוה, and Syriac ܝܫܘܝ, a fact which will be referred to hereafter in discussing the antiquity of the Name. If this etymology be correct, and there seems little reason to call it in question, one step towards the true punctuation and pronunciation is already gained. Many learned men, and among them Grotius, Galatinus, Crusius, and Leusden, in an age when such fancies were rife, imagined that, reading the Name with the vowel-points usually attached to it, they discovered an indication of the eternity of God in the fact that the Name by which He revealed Himself to the Hebrews was compounded of the Present Participle, and the Future and Praeterite tenses of the substantive verb. The idea may have been suggested by the expression in Rev. iv. 8 (ὁ ἄγιος καὶ ὁ θς καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος), and received apparent confirmation from the Targ. Jon. on Deut. xxiii. 39, and Targ. Jer. on Ex. iii. 14. These passages, however, throw no light upon the composition of the Name, and merely assert that in its significance it embraces past, present, and future. But having agreed to reject the present punctuation, it is useless to discuss any theories which may be based upon it, had they even greater probability in their favour than the one just mentioned. As one of the forms in which Jehovah appears in Greek characters is 'Iaō, it was proposed by Cappellus to punctuate it יְהוָה, yahvāh, which is clearly contrary to the analogy of הָלַךְ verbs. Gussetius suggested יְהוֹוָה, yehōvāh, or יְהוֹוֵה, yāhvāh, in the former of which he is supported by Fürst; and Mercer and Corn. à Lapidè read it יְהוֹוֵה, yehvāh: but on all these suppositions we should have הָיָה for יָהָה in the terminations of compound proper names. The suffrages of others are divided between יְהוֹוָה, or יְהוֹוֵה, supposed to be represented by the 'Iaō of Epiphanius above mentioned, and יְהוֹוָה or יְהוֹוֵה, which Fürst wrongly holds to be the 'Ieōs of Porphyry, or the 'Iaōb of Clemens Alexandrinus. Caspari (Micha, p. 5, &c.) decides in favour of the former on the ground that this form only would give rise to the contraction יָהָה in proper names, and opposes both Fürst's punctuation יְהוֹוָה or יְהוֹוֵה, as well as that of יְהוֹוָה or יְהוֹוֵה, which would naturally be contracted into יָהָה. Gesenius punctuates the word יְהוֹוָה, from which, or from יְהוֹוֵה, may be derived the abbreviated form יְהָ, used in poetry, and the form יְהוּ = יְהוֹ = יְהוֹ (so יְהוֹ becomes יְהוֹ), which occurs at the commencement of compound proper names (Hitzig, Jesaja, p. 4). Delitzsch once maintained that, whichever punctuation be adopted, the quiescent sheva under ה is ungrammatical, and Chateph Pathach is the proper vowel. He therefore wrote it יְהוֹוָה, yahōvāh, with which he compared the 'Aid of Theodoret; the last vowel being Kametz instead of Segol, according to the analogy of proper names derived from הָלַךְ verbs (e.g. יִמְנָה, יִמְרָה, יִמְכָה, and others). Afterwards, he adopted the pronunciation Jahve (i.e. Yahōe), as agreeing best with patristic and Talmudic tradition (Comm. über den Psalter, Einl.). There remains to be noticed the suggestion of Gesenius that the form יְהוֹוָה, which he adopted, might be the Hiph. impf. of the substantive verb. Of the same opinion was Reuss. The objection is that a Hiphil of this verb does not exist. Others again would make it Piel, and read יְהוֹוָה, against which a similar objection may be urged. Fürst (Handv. s. v.) mentions some other etymologies which affect the meaning rather than the punctuation of the name; such, for instance, as that it is derived from a root הָוָה, "to overthrow," and signifies "the destroyer or storm-sender" (cp. the Arabic هوى, "to fall from a height," causative "to throw down," "ruin," used of God's overthrow of Sodom, Qur'ān, Sūrah, 53, 54, cited by W. H. Green), or that it denotes "the light or heaven," from a root הוה = הוה, "to be bright," or "the life-giver," from the root = הוה, "to live." We have practically to decide between יְהוֹוָה or יְהוֹוֵה. The former, that is, Jahvoh or Yahvoh, has been very generally adopted by modern scholars. But perhaps Jahvoh or Jahvāh has a better claim, if, as seems most probable, the names Gamar-ya-a-wa, Aqabi-ya-a-wa, recently found on Babylonian tablets in the British Museum, are really transcriptions of the Hebrew Gemariah and Akabiah (Aboth, iii. 1).

III. The next point for consideration is of vastly more importance: what is the meaning of Jehovah, and what does it express of the Being and Nature of God, more than or in distinction from the other Names applied to the Deity in the O. T.? That there was some distinction in these different appellations was early perceived, and various explanations were employed to account for it. Tertullian (adv. Hermog. c. 3) observed that God was not called Lord (κύριος) till after the Creation, and in consequence of it; while Augustine found in it an indication of the absolute dependence of man upon God (de Gen. ad lit. viii. 2). Chrysostom (Hom. xiv. in Gen.) considered the two Names, Lord and God, as equivalent, and the alternate use of them arbitrary. But all their arguments proceed upon the supposition that the κύριος of the LXX. is the true rendering of the original, whereas it is merely the translation of אֲדֹנָי, 'adōnāi, whose points it bears. With regard to אֱלֹהִים, 'Elohim, the other chief Name by which the Deity is designated in the O. T., it has been held by many, and the opinion does not even now want supporters, that in the plural form of the word was shadowed forth the plurality of Persons in the Godhead, and the mystery of the Trinity was inferred therefrom. Such, according to Peter Lombard, was the true significance of Elohim. But Calvin, Mercer, Drusius, and Bellarmine have given the weight of their authority against an explanation so fanciful and arbitrary. Among the Jewish writers of the Middle Ages the question much more nearly approached its solution. R. Jehuda Hallevi (12th cent.), the author of the book Cozri, found in the usage of Elohim a protest against idolaters, who call each personified power אֱלֹהִים, 'Eloah, and all collectively Elohim. He interpreted it as the most general Name of the Deity, distinguishing Him as manifested in the exhibition of His power, without reference to His personality or moral qualities, or to any special relation which He bears to man. Jehovah, on the contrary, is the revealed and known God. While the meaning of the former could be evolved by reasoning, the true significance of the latter could only be apprehended "by that prophetic vision by which a man is, as it were, separated and withdrawn from his own kind, and approaches to the angelic, and another spirit enters into him." In like manner Maimonides (Mor. Neb. i. 61, Buxt.) saw in Jehovah the Name which teaches of the substance of the Creator, and Abarbanel (quoted by Buxtorf, de Nom. Dei, § 39) distinguishes Jehovah, as denoting God according to what He is in Himself, from Elohim which conveys the idea of the impression made by His power. In the opinion of Astruc, a Belgian physician, with whom the documentary hypothesis of Genesis originated, the alternate use of the two Names was arbitrary, and determined by no essential difference. Hasse (Entdeckungen) considered them as historical Names, and Sack (de usu nom. dei, &c.) regarded Elohim as a vague term denoting "a certain infinite, omnipotent, incomprehensible existence, from which things finite and visible have derived their origin;" while to God, as revealing Himself, the more definite title of Jehovah was applied. Ewald, in his tract on the composition of Genesis (written when he was nineteen), maintained that Elohim denoted the Deity in general, and is the common or lower Name, while Jehovah was the national God of the Israelites. But in order to carry out his theory he was compelled in many places to alter the text, and was afterwards induced to modify his statements, which were opposed by Gramberg and Stähelin. Doubtless Elohim is used in many cases of the gods of the heathen, who included in the same title the God of the Hebrews, and denoted generally the Deity when spoken of as a supernatural being, and when no national feeling influenced the speaker. It was Elohim who, in the eyes of the heathen, delivered the Israelites from Egypt (1 Sam. iv. 8), and the Egyptian had adjured David by Elohim, rather than by Jehovah, of Whom he would have no knowledge (1 Sam. xxx. 15). So Ehud announces to the Moabitish king a message from Elohim (Judg. iii. 20); to the Syrians the Jehovah of the Hebrews was only their national God, one of the Elohim (1 K. xx. 23, 28), and in the mouth of a heathen the Name Jehovah would convey no more intelligible meaning than this. It is to be observed also that when a Hebrew speaks with a heathen he uses the more general term Elohim. Joseph, in addressing Pharaoh (Gen. xli. 16), and David, in appealing to the king of Moab to protect his family (1 Sam. xxii. 3), designate the Deity by the less specific title; and on the other hand the same rule is generally followed when the heathen are the speakers, as in the case of Abimelech (Gen. xxi. 23), the Hittites (Gen. xxiii. 6), the Midianite (Judg. vii. 14), and Joseph in his assumed character as an Egyptian (Gen. xliii. 18). But, although this distinction between Elohim, as the general appellation of Deity, and Jehovah, the national God of the Israelites, contains some superficial truth, the real nature of their difference must be sought for far deeper, and as a foundation for the arguments which will be adduced recourse must again be had to etymology.

IV. With regard to the derivation of אֱלֹהִים, 'Elohim, the pl. of אֱלֹהִים, etymologists are divided in their opinions; some connecting it with אָל, 'el, and the unused root אָל, 'ul, "to be strong" ("vorn sein," Nöldeke), while others refer it to the Arabic أَلِي, 'aliha, أَلِي, 'alaha, "to worship, adore;" Elohim thus denoting the Supreme Being Who was worthy of all worship and adoration, the dread and awful One. Fürst takes the noun in this case as the primitive from which is derived the idea of worship contained in the verb, and gives as the true root אָל = אָל, "to be strong." Delitzsch would prefer a root אָל = אָל = אָל (Symb. ad Psalm. illustr. p. 29). The connexion with אָל seems doubtful, in view of forms like אָל, אָל; cp. also the Assyrian ilu, ilu, "god," "goddess," with l. From whatever root, however, the word may be derived, most are of opinion that the primary idea contained in it is that of strength, power; so that Elohim is the proper appellation of the Deity, as manifested in His creative and universally sustaining agency, and in the general divine guidance and government of the world. Hengstenberg, who adheres to the derivation above-mentioned from the Arab., 'aliha, 'alaha, deduces from this etymology his theory that Elohim indicates a lower and Jehovah a higher stage of the knowledge of God, on the ground that "the feeling of fear is the lowest which can exist in reference to God, and merely in respect of this feeling is God marked by this designation." But the same inference might also be drawn on the supposition that the idea of simple power or strength is the most prominent in the word; and it is more natural that the Divine Being should be conceived of as strong before He became the object of fear and adoration. To this view Gesenius accedes, when he says that the notion of worshipping and fearing is rather derived from the power of the Deity which is expressed in His Name. The question now arises, What is the meaning to be attached to the plural form of the word? As has been already mentioned, some have discovered here the mystery of the Trinity, while others maintain that it points to polytheism. The Rabbis generally explain it as the plural of majesty; Rabbi Bechai, as signifying the lord of all powers. Abarbanel and Kimchi consider it a title of honour, in accordance with the Hebrew idiom, of which examples will be found in Is. liv. 5, Job xxxv. 10, Gen. xxxix. 20, xlii. 30. In Prov. ix. 1, the plural חִכְמוֹת, chokmôth, "wisdoms," is used for wisdom in the abstract, as including all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Hence it is probable that the plural form Elohim, instead of pointing to polytheism, is applied to God as comprehending in Himself the fulness of all power, and uniting in a perfect degree all that which the Name signifies, and all the high attributes which the heathen ascribe to the several divinities of their pantheon. The singular אֱלֹהִים, 'Eloah, with few exceptions (Neh. ix. 17; 2 Ch. xxxii. 15), occurs only in poetry. It will be found, upon examination of the passages in which Elohim occurs, that it is chiefly in places where God is exhibited only in the plenitude of His power, and where no especial reference is made to His unity, personality, or holiness, or to His relation to Israel and the theocracy (see Pa. xvi. 1; xix. 1, 7, 8). Hengstenberg's etymology of the word is disputed by Delitzsch (Symb. ad Pss. illustr. p. 29), who refers it, as has been mentioned above, to a root indicating power or might, and sees in it an expression not of what men think of God, but of what He is in Himself, in so far as He has life omnipotent in Himself, and according as He is the beginning and end of all life. For the true explanation of the Name he refers to the revelation of the mystery of the Trinity. But it is at least extremely doubtful whether to the ancient Israelites any idea of this nature was conveyed by Elohim; and in making use of the more advanced knowledge supplied by the New Testament, there is some danger of discovering more meaning and a more subtle significance than was ever intended to be expressed.

V. But while Elohim exhibits God displayed in His power as the Creator and Governor of the physical universe, the Name Jehovah designates His nature as He stands in relation to man, as the only, almighty, true, personal, holy Being, a Spirit, and "the Father of spirits" (Num. xvi. 22; cp. John iv. 24), Who revealed Himself to His people, made a covenant with them, and became their Lawgiver, and to Whom all honour and worship are due. If the etymology above given be accepted, and the Name be derived from the impf. tense of the substantive verb, it would denote, in accordance with the general analogy of proper names of a similar form, "He that is," "the Being," Whose chief attribute is eternal existence. Jehovah is represented as eternal (Gen. xxi. 33; cp. 1 Tim. vi. 16), unchangeable (Ex. iii. 14; Mal. iii. 6), the only Being (Josh. xxii. 22; Ps. l. 1), Creator and Lord of all things (Ex. xx. 11; cp. Num. xvi. 22 with xxvii. 16; Is. xlii. 5). It is Jehovah Who made the covenant with His people (Gen. xv. 18; Num. x. 33, &c.). In this connexion Elohim occurs but once (Ps. lxxviii. 10); and even with the article, Ha-Elohim, which expresses more personality than Elohim alone, is found but seldom (Judg. xx. 27; 1 Sam. iv. 4). The Israelites were enjoined to observe the commandments of Jehovah (Lev. iv. 27, &c.), to keep His Law, and to worship Him alone. Hence the phrase "to serve Jehovah" (Ex. x. 7, 8, &c.) is applied to denote true worship, whereas "to serve Ha-Elohim" is used but once in this sense (Ex. iii. 12), and Elohim occurs in the same association only when the worship of idols is spoken of (Deut. iv. 28; Judg. iii. 6). As Jehovah, the only true God, is the only object of true worship, to Him belong the sabbaths and festivals, and all the ordinances connected with the religious services of the Israelites (Ex. x. 9, xii. 11; Lev. xxiii. 2). His are the altars on which offerings are made to the true God; the priests and ministers are His (1 Sam. ii. 11, xiv. 8), and so exclusively that a priest of Elohim is always associated with idolatrous worship. To Jehovah alone are offerings made (Ex. viii. 8); and if Elohim is ever used in this connexion, it is always qualified by pronominal suffixes, or some word in construction with it so as to indicate the true God; in all other cases it refers to idols (Ex. xxii. 20, xxxiv. 15). It follows naturally that the Temple and Tabernacle are Jehovah's; and if they are attributed to Elohim, the latter is in some manner restricted as before. The prophets are the prophets of Jehovah, and their announcements proceed from Him, seldom from Elohim. The Israelites are the people of Jehovah (Ex. xxvii. 20), the congregation of Jehovah (Num. xvi. 3), as the Moabites are the people of Chemosh (Jer. xlvi. 46). Their king is the anointed of Jehovah; their wars are the wars of Jehovah (Ex. xiv. 25;

1 Sam. xviii. 17); their enemies are the enemies of Jehovah (2 Sam. xii. 14); it is the hand of Jehovah that delivers them up to their foes (Judg. vi. 1, xiii. 1, &c.), and He it is Who raises up for them deliverers and judges, and on whom they call in times of peril (Judg. ii. 18, iii. 9, 15; Josh. xxiv. 7; 1 Sam. xvii. 37). In fine, Jehovah is the Divine King of His people (Judg. viii. 23); by Him their kings reign and achieve success against the national enemies (1 Sam. xi. 13, xiv. 23). Their heroes are inspired by His Spirit (Judg. iii. 10, vi. 34), and their hand steered against their foes (2 Sam. vii. 23); the watchword of Gideon was "The Sword of Jehovah, and of Gideon!" (Judg. vi. 20.) The day on which God executes judgment on the wicked is the day of Jehovah (Is. ii. 12, xxiv. 8; cp. Rev. xvi. 14). As the Israelites were in a remarkable manner distinguished as the people of Jehovah, Who became their Lawgiver and Supreme Ruler, it is not strange that He should be put in strong contrast with Chemosh (Judg. xi. 24), Ashtaroth (Judg. x. 6), and the Bealim (Judg. iii. 7), the national deities of the surrounding nations, and thus be pre-eminently distinguished as the tutelary Deity of the Hebrews in one aspect of His character. [For the Moabite view of Chemosh, see the Stone of Dibon.] Such and no more was He to the heathen (1 K. xx. 23); but all this and much more to the Israelites, to whom Jehovah was the living God, Who reveals Himself to man by word and deed, helps, guides, saves, and delivers, in all the exigencies of life. Jehovah was no abstract Name, but thoroughly practical, and stood in intimate connexion with the religious life of the people. While Elohim represents God only in His most outward relation to man, and distinguishes Him as recognised in His omnipotence, Jehovah describes Him according to His innermost being. In Jehovah the moral attributes are presented as constituting the essence of His nature; whereas in Elohim there is no reference to personality or moral character. The relation of Elohim to Jehovah has been variously explained. The former, in Hengstenberg's opinion, indicates a lower, and the latter a higher, stage of consciousness of God; Elohim becoming Jehovah by an historical process, and to show how He became so, being the main object of the sacred history. Kurtz considers the two names as related to each other as power and evolution: Elohim the God of the beginning, Jehovah of the development; Elohim the Creator, Jehovah the Mediator. Elohim is God of the beginning and end, the Creator and the Judge; Jehovah the God of the middle, of the development which lies between the beginning and end (Die Einheit der Gen.). That Jehovah is identical with Elohim, and not a separate Being, is indicated by the joint use of the names Jehovah-Elohim (see also Kuenen, HL. i. 39 sqq.; W. R. Smith, Prophets, pp. 33, 49 sq.).

VI. The antiquity of the Name Jehovah among the Hebrews has formed the subject of much discussion. That it was not known before the age of Moses has been inferred from Ex. vi. 3; while Von Bohlen assigned to it a much more recent date, and contended that we have "no conclusive proof of the worship of Jehovah anterior to the ancient hymns of David" (Int. to Gen. i. 150, Eng. tr.). But, on the other hand, we might be inclined to infer from the traditional etymology of the word that it originated in an age long prior to that of the Pentateuch, in which the root יהוה has already been displaced by יהי. From the Aramaic form in which it appears (cp. Chald. יהוה; Syr. ܝܘܗܘ), Jahn refers to the earliest times of Abraham for its date, and to Mesopotamia or Ur of the Chaldees for its birthplace. [It is now known that Ur was in S. Babylonia, and that the language of Ur was not Aramaic but Accadian first, and then Assyrio-Babylonian.] Its usage in Genesis cannot be explained, as Le Clerc suggests, by supposing it to be employed by anticipation, for it is introduced where the persons to whom the history relates are speaking, and not only where the narrator adopts terms familiar to himself; and the same difficulty remains whatever hypothesis be assumed with regard to the original documents which formed the basis of the history.^b At the same time it is distinctly stated in Ex. vi. 3, that to the patriarchs God was not known by the Name Jehovah. If, therefore, this passage has reference to the first revelation of Jehovah simply as a Name and Title of God, there is clearly a discrepancy which requires to be explained. In renewing His promise of deliverance from Egypt, "God spake unto Moses and said unto him, I am Jehovah; and I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by (the name of) God Almighty ('El Shaddai, יְהוָה אֱלֹהִים), but by My Name Jehovah was I not known to them." It follows then that, if the reference were merely to the Name as a Name, the passage in question would prove equally that before this time Elohim was unknown as an appellation of the Deity, and God would appear uniformly as El Shaddai in the patriarchal history. [This assumes that 'Elôhim is a "Name" in the same sense as Yahvah or the obscure 'El Shaddai, which is hardly the case.] But although it was held by Theodoret (Quaest. 15 in Ex.) and many of the Fathers, who have been followed by a long list of moderns, that the name was first made known by God to Moses, and then introduced by him among the Israelites, the contrary was maintained by Cajetan, Lyranus, Calvin, Rosenmüller, Hengstenberg, and others, who deny that the passage in Ex. vi. alludes to the introduction of the Name. Calvin saw at once that the knowledge there spoken of could not refer to the syllables and letters, but to the recognition of God's glory and majesty. It was not the Name, but the true depth of its significance which was unknown to and uncomprehended by the Patriarchs. They had known God as 'El Shaddai (Gen. xvii. 1, xxviii. 3), the Ruler of the physical universe, and of man as one of His creatures; as a God eternal, immutable, and true to His promises He was yet to be revealed. In the character expressed by the Name Jehovah He had not hitherto been fully known; His true attributes had not been recognised (cp. Rashi on Ex. vi. 3) in His working and acts for Israel. Aben Ezra explained the occurrence of the Name in Genesis as simply indicating the knowledge of it as a proper name, not as a qualificative expressing the attributes and qualities of God. Referring to other passages in which the phrase "the Name of God" occurs, it is clear that something more is intended by it than a mere appellation, and that the proclamation of the Name of God is a revelation of His moral attributes, and of His true character as Jehovah (Ex. xxxiii. 19; xxxiv. 6, 7), the God of the covenant. Maimonides (Mor. Neb. i. 64, ed. Buxtorf) explains the Name of God as signifying His essence and His truth, and Olshausen (on Matt. xviii. 20) interprets "name" (ὄνομα) as denoting "personality and essential being, and that not as it is incomprehensible or unknown, but in its manifestation." The name of a thing represents the thing itself so far as it can be expressed in words. That Jehovah was not a new Name Hävernick concludes from Ex. iii. 14, where "the Name of God Jehovah is evidently presupposed as already in use, and is only explained, interpreted, and applied . . . It is certainly not a new Name that is introduced; on the contrary, the יהוה אֱלֹהִים (I am that I am) would be unintelligible, if the Name itself were not presupposed as already known. The old Name of antiquity, whose precious significance had been forgotten and neglected by the children of Israel, here as it were rises again to life, and is again brought home to the consciousness of the people" (Introd. to the Pent. p. 61). The same passage supplies an argument to prove that by "name" we are not to understand merely letters and syllables, for Jehovah appears at first in another form, 'ehyeh (יהיִה). The correct collective view of Ex. vi. 3. Hengstenberg conceives to be the following:—"Hitherto that Being, Who in one aspect was Jehovah, in another had always been Elohim. The great crisis now drew nigh in which Jehovah Elohim would be changed into Jehovah. In prospect of this event God solemnly announced Himself as Jehovah."

Great stress has been laid, by those who deny the antiquity of the Name Jehovah, upon the fact that proper names compounded with it occur but seldom before the age of Samuel and David. It is undoubtedly true that, about this period, proper names so compounded did become more frequent; but if it could be shown that prior to the time of Moses any such names existed, it would be sufficient to prove that the Name Jehovah was not entirely unknown. Among those which have been quoted for this purpose are Jochebed the mother of Moses, and daughter of Levi, and Moriah, the mountain on which Abraham was commanded to offer up Isaac. Against the former it is urged that Moses might have changed her name to Jochebed after the Name Jehovah had been communicated by God, as he changed Hoshea to Joshua; but this is very improbable, as he was at this time eighty years old, and his mother in all probability dead. If this only be admitted as a genuine instance of a name compounded with Jehovah, it takes us at once back into the patriarchal age, and proves that a word which was employed in forming the proper name of Jacob's granddaughter could not have been unknown to that patriarch himself. [Ewald, on the ground of the name Jochebed, and the language of Ex. xv.

2, supposed that Jahveh was a Name of God current in the family of Moses. König agrees with him (Hauptprobl. p. 27). Stade, Tiele, and Wellhausen think that Jahveh may have been originally the god of the Kenites. The evidence, upon the whole, appears to justify a suspicion that at least in the forms Yahu, Yah, the name was once current among Israel's heathen neighbours.] The name Moriah (מֹרְיָה) is of more importance, for in one passage in which it occurs it is accompanied by an etymology intended to indicate what was then understood by it (2 Ch. iii. 1). Hengstenberg regarded it as a compound of מֹרְיָה, the Hoph. Part. of מָרָה, and אֵי, the abbreviated form of יְהוָה; so that, according to this etymology, it would signify "shown by Jehovah." [It is, however, a serious objection, that מֹרְיָה could hardly become מֹרְיָה, and, moreover, a place-name compounded with אֵי is otherwise unknown.] Gesenius, adopting the meaning of מָרָה in Gen. xxii. 8, renders it "chosen by Jehovah," but suggests at the same time what he considers a more probable derivation, according to which Jehovah does not form a part of the compound word. But there is reason to believe from various allusions in Gen. xxii. that the former was regarded as the true etymology. [ISAAC.]

Having thus considered the origin, significance, and antiquity of the Name Jehovah, the reader will be in a position to judge how much of truth there is in the assertion of Schwind (quoted by Reinke, Beitr. iii. 135, n. 10) that the terms Elohim, Jehovah Elohim, and then Jehovah alone applied to God, show "to the philoepic inquirer the progress of the human mind from a plurality of gods to a superior god, and from this to a single Almighty Creator and Ruler of the world."

JEHOVAH-JIREH (יְהוָה יִרְאֶה); Kúpios εἶδεν; Dominus videt, i.e. "Jehovah will see," or provide, the name given by Abraham to the place on which he had been commanded to offer Isaac, commemorating the interposition of the Angel of Jehovah, who prevented the sacrifice (Gen. xxii. 14) and provided another victim. The immediate allusion is to the expression in the 8th verse, "God will look out for Himself a lamb for a burnt offering," but it is not unlikely that there is at the same time a covert reference to Moriah, the scene of the whole occurrence. The play upon words is followed up in the latter clause of v. 14, which appears in the form of a popular proverb: "as it is said this day, In the mountain of Jehovah, He will be seen," or "provision shall be made." Such might be the rendering if the received punctuation be accepted, but on this point there is a division of opinion. The de t. q. d. rei Kúrios εἶδεν of the LXX. implies מֹרְיָה יְהוָה יִרְאֶה, "on the mountain Jehovah appeareth;" and the same, with the exception of יְהוָה for the last word, must have been the reading of the Vulgate and Syriac. The Targum of Onkelos is obscure. [ISAAC.]

[W. A. W.] [C. J. B.]

JEHOVAH-NIS'SI (יְהוָה נִסִּי); Kúpios καταφυγή μου; Dominus exaltatio mea, i.e. "Jehovah is my banner," the name given by Moses to the altar which he built in commemoration of the discomfiture of the Amalekites by Joshua and his chosen warriors at Rephidim (Ex. xvii. 15). It was erected either upon the hill overlooking the battle-field, upon which Moses sat with the staff of God in his hand, or upon the battle-field itself. According to Aben Ezra, it was on the Mount Horeb. The Targum of Onkelos paraphrases the verse thus:—"Moses built an altar and worshipped upon it before Jehovah, Who had wrought for him miracles" (נִסִּי, nissin). Such too is Rashi's explanation of the name, as referring to the miraculous interposition of God in the defeat of the Amalekites. The LXX. in their translation, "the Lord my refuge," evidently supposed nissi to be derived from the root נָס, nās, "to flee," and the Vulgate traced it to נָשָׂא, "to lift up" (cp. Ps. iv. 7, Heb.). The significance of the name is probably contained in an allusion to the staff which Moses held in his hand as a banner during the engagement, and the raising or lowering of which turned the fortune of battle in favour of the Israelites or their enemies. God is thus recognised in the memorial altar as the deliverer of His people, Who leads them to victory, and is their rallying-point in time of peril. [The Hebrew of v. 16, which assigned the reason for the name, is corrupt (see R. V., which follows the Jewish expositors). We may perhaps restore: "And he said הַמַּלְחָמָה כִּי יִדְנָל נָס, The banner of warfare shall be lifted up unto Jahvah against Amalek from generation to generation" (cp. Cant. v. 10, vi. 4; Ps. xx. 5).] On the figurative use of "banner," see Ps. lx. 4, la. xi. 10. [W. A. W.] [C. J. B.]

JEHOVAH-SHALOM (יְהוָה שָׁלוֹם); εἰρήνη Kuplov; Domini pax, i.e. "Jehovah is peace," or, with the ellipsis of שָׁלוֹם, "Jehovah is the God of peace." The altar erected by Gideon in Ophrah was so called in memory of the salutation addressed to him by the Angel of Jehovah, "Peace be unto thee" (Judg. vi. 24). The LXX. and Vulg. appear to have inverted the words as they stand in the present Hebrew text, and to have read שָׁלוֹם יְהוָה, but they are supported by no MS. authority.

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH (יהוה שׁממח);

A. Κύριος ἐκεῖ, B. om.; Dominus ibidem), "Jehovah is there" (sh'ammah, "illic" for "illic," as in Jer. xviii. 2); the name of the New Jerusalem of Ezekiel's prophetic visions (Ezek. xlvi. 35; marg. A. V.); cp. Rev. xviii. 3.

JEHOVAH-TSIDKE'NU (יהוה צדקנו);

AB. 'Iwsedek, S*. 'Iwsukeim; Dominus justus noster = יהוה צדקנו, defective), "Jehovah is our Righteousness": (1) The name of the Messianic king, whose coming is announced in Jer. xxiii. 5, 6. There appears to be an allusion to the name of Zedekiah (צדקיהו), "Righteousness of Jah," the last native sovereign of Judah; not in the sense that the Prophet ever expected such a glorious future for that unhappy prince, but rather by way of suggesting that the Divine Righteousness which required the imminent or already realized overthrow of his kingdom would not rest there, but would in its own time accomplish the promises as well as the menaces of prophecy. The LXX. translation connects יהוה with the preceding verb as its subject: "And this is his name, whereby the Lord will call him: Josedek." It may be that the last two letters of צדקנו were effaced in the translator's MS., or that the name was abbreviated thus, יהוה צדק, or thus, יהוה צדק. The vocalisation 'Iwsedek [see JEHOZADAK] implies a Hebrew punctuation, יהוה צדק or צדק יהוה, a form like Melchizedek, and essentially like Zedekiah.

(2) The name of the restored Jerusalem, in the similar prophecy, Jer. xxxiii. 16. [C. J. B.]

JEHO-ZA'BAD (יהוה צבד = Jehovah hath given; Jozabad). 1. (B. 'Iw(a)bad; A. 'Iw(a)bad).

A Korahite Levite, second son of Obed-edom, and one of the porters or doorkeepers of the south gate of the Temple, and of the storehouse there (צבד ית' צבד), in the time of David (1 Ch. xxvi. 4, 15, compared with Neh. xii. 25).

2. ('Iw(a)bad; Joseph. Οχόβαρος.) A Benjamite, captain of 180,000 armed men, in the days of king Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xvii. 18; Joseph. Ant. viii. 15, § 2).

3. ('Iw(a)bad, Ζωαβὰδ; A. 'Iw(a)bad; Josabad.) Son of Shomer or Shimrith, a Moabitish woman, and possibly a descendant of the preceding, who with another, Jozachar or Zabad, conspired against king Joash and slew him in his bed (2 K. xii. 21; 2 Ch. xxiv. 26). [JOASH.] The similarity in the names of both conspirators and their parents is worth notice.

This name is commonly abbreviated in the Hebrew to JOZABAD. [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JEHO-ZA'DAK (יהוה צדק; B. 'Iwsaddak, A. 'Iwsedek; Josedec), son of the high-priest

SERAI AH (1 Ch. vi. 14, 15) in the reign of Zedekiah. When his father was slain at Riblah by order of Nebuchadnezzar, in the 11th of Zedekiah (2 K. xxv. 18, 21), Jehozadak was led away captive to Babylon (1 Ch. vi. 15), where he doubtless spent the remainder of his days. He himself never attained the high-priesthood, the Temple being burnt to the ground, and so continuing, and he himself being a captive all his life. But he was the father of JESHUA the high-priest who with Zerubbabel headed the Return from Captivity, and in whom the succession continued till the pontificate of Alcimus (Ezra iii. 2, 8, v. 2, x. 18; Neh. xii. 26; Hagg. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 2, 4; Zech. vi. 11). [HIGH-PRIEST.] Nothing more is known about him. It is perhaps worth remarking that his name is compounded of the same elements, and has nearly the same meaning, as that of the contemporary king Zedekiah (צדקיהו, צדקיהו)—"Jehovah is righteous;" and that the righteousness of Jehovah was signally displayed in the simultaneous suspension of the throne of David and the priesthood of Aaron, on account of the sins of Judah. This remark perhaps acquires weight from the fact of his successor Jeshua, who restored the priesthood and rebuilt the Temple, having the same name as Joshua, who brought the nation into the land of promise, and JESUS, a name significant of salvation.

In Haggai and Zechariah, though the name in the original is exactly as above, yet the A. V., following the Greek form, presents it as JOSEDECH. In the R. V. it is JEHOZADAK.

In Ezra and Nehemiah it is abbreviated, in Hebrew, A. V., and R. V., to JOZADAK.

JEHU. 1. (יהוה, probably = יהוה) =

Jehovah is He; B. Eiol, A. 'Iho, Joseph. 'Iho; Jehu.) The founder of the fifth dynasty of the kingdom of Israel (Riehm, B.C. 843-816). His history* was told in the lost "Chronicle of the Kings of Israel" (2 K. x. 34). His father's name was Jehoshaphat (2 K. ix. 2, 14); his grandfather's (which, as being better known, was sometimes affixed to his own—2 K. ix.) was Nimshi. In his youth he had been one of the guards of Ahab. His first appearance in history is when, with a comrade in arms, Bidkar, or Bar-Dakar (Ephrem Syr. Explan. in is. Regum, cap. iv. sec. 2, Op. t. ii. 125, ed. Caillan, 1842), he rode behind Ahab on the fatal journey from Samaria to Jezreel, and heard, and laid up in his heart, the warning of Elijah against the murderer of Naboth (2 K. ix. 25). But he had already, as it would seem, been known to Elijah as a youth of promise, and, accordingly, in the vision at Horeb he is mentioned as the future king of Israel, whom Elijah is to anoint as the minister of vengeance on Israel (1 K. xix. 16, 17). This injunction, for reasons unknown to us, Elijah never fulfilled. It was reserved long afterwards for his successor Elisha.

Jehu meantime, in the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, had risen to importance. The same activity and vehemence which had fitted him for his earlier distinctions still continued, and he was known far and wide as a charioteer whose b The Hebrew word is צדקיהו; usually employed for the coupling together of oxen. This the LXX. understands as though the two soldiers rode in separate chariots—καθ' ἑαυτοὺς ἐν ἑξήρῳ (2 K. ix. 25); Josephus (Ant. ix. 6, § 3) as though they sat in the same chariot with the king (καθ' ἑαυτοὺς ὄπισθεν τοῦ ἀρματός τοῦ 'Αχάβου).

rapid driving, as if of a madman* (2 K. ix. 20), could be distinguished even from a distance. He was, under the last-named king, captain of the host in the siege of Ramoth-Gilead. According to Ephrem Syrus (who omits the words "saith the Lord" in 2 K. ix. 26, and makes "I" refer to Jehu) he had, in a dream the night before, seen the blood of Naboth and his sons (see Ephr. Syr. u. s.). Whilst in the midst of the officers of the besieging army a youth suddenly entered, of wild appearance (2 K. ix. 11), and insisted on a private interview with Jehu. They retired into a secret chamber. The youth uncovered a phial of the sacred oil, as Josephus puts it (Ant. ix. 6, 1; Stanley, Jewish Ch. ii. 283 [1883]), which he had brought with him, poured it over Jehu's head, and after announcing to him the message from Elisha, that he was appointed to be king of Israel and destroyer of the house of Ahab, rushed out of the house and disappeared (2 K. ix. 1-10; 2 Ch. xxiii. 7).

Jehu's countenance, as he re-entered the assembly of officers, showed that some strange tidings had reached him. He tried at first to evade their questions, but then revealed the situation in which he found himself placed by the prophetic call. In a moment the enthusiasm of those present took fire. They threw their garments—the large square Begeg, similar to a wrapper or plaid—under his feet, so as to form a rough carpet of state, placed him on the top of the stairs,⁴ as on an extempore throne, blew the royal salute on their trumpets, and thus proclaimed him king. He then cut off all communication between Ramoth-Gilead and Jezreel, and set off, full speed, with his ancient comrade Bidkar, whom he had made his chief officer (Stanley, Jew. Ch. ii. 285 [1883]), and a band of horsemen. From the tower of Jezreel a watchman saw the cloud of dust (ΠΥΡΡΕΪ, κοριοτόν; A. V. and R. V. "company") and announced his coming (2 K. ix. 17). The messengers that were sent out to him he detained, on the same principle of secrecy which had guided all his movements. It was not till he had almost reached the city, and was identified by the watchman, that alarm was taken. But even then it seems as if the two kings in Jezreel anticipated news from the Syrian war rather than a revolution at home. It was not till, in answer to Jehoram's question, "Is it peace, Jehu?" that Jehu's fierce denunciation of Jezebel at once revealed the danger. Jehu seized his opportunity, and taking full aim at Jehoram, with the bow which, as captain of the host, he had always with him, shot him through the heart (ix. 24). The body was thrown out on the fatal field, and whilst his soldiers pursued and killed the king of Judah (2 K. ix. 27, 28; 2 Ch. xxiii. 9) at Beth-gan (A. V. and R. V., "the garden-house," LXX. Baβθαν), probably Engannim, Jehu advanced to the gates of Jezreel and fulfilled the divine judgment on Jezebel as already on Jehoram. [JEZEABEL.] He then entered on a work of extermination hitherto unparalleled in the history of the Jewish monarchy. All the descendants of Ahab that remained in Jezreel, together with the officers of the court and hierarchy of Astarte, were swept away. His next step was to secure Samaria. Every stage of his progress was marked with blood. At the gates of Jezreel he found the heads of seventy princes of the house of Ahab, ranged in two heaps, sent to him as a propitiation by their guardians in Samaria, whom he had defied to withstand him, and on whom he thus threw the responsibility of destroying their own royal charge. Next, at "the shearing-house" (or Bethked, LXX. Βαβδάκαθ) between Jezreel and Samaria he encountered forty-two sons or nephews (2 K. x. 13, 14; 2 Ch. xx. 8) of the late king of Judah, and therefore connected by marriage with Ahab, on a visit of compliment to their relatives, of whose fall, seemingly, they had not heard. These also were put to the sword at the fatal well, as in the later history, of Mizpah (2 K. x. 14), and, in our own days, of Cawnpore. [ISHMAEL, 6.] As he drove on he encountered a strange figure, such as might have reminded him of the great Elijah. It was Jehonadab, the austere Arabian sectary, the son of Rechab. In him his keen eye discovered a ready ally. He took him into his chariot, and they concocted their schemes as they entered Samaria (x. 15, 16). [JEHONADAB.]

Some stragglers of the house of Ahab in that city still remained to be destroyed. But the great stroke was yet to come; and it was conceived and executed with that union of intrepid daring and profound secrecy which marks the whole career of Jehu. Up to this moment there was nothing which showed anything beyond a determination to exterminate in all its branches the personal adherents of Ahab. Jehu might still have been at heart, as he seems up to this time to have been in name, disposed to tolerate, if not to join in, the Phœnician worship. "Ahab served Baal a little, but Jehu shall serve him much." There was to be a new inauguration of the worship of Baal. A solemn assembly, sacred vestments, innumerable victims, were ready. The vast temple at Samaria raised by Ahab (1 K. xvi. 32; Joseph. Ant. ix. 7, § 6) was crowded from end to end. The chief sacrifice was offered, as if in the excess of his zeal, by Jehu himself. Jehonadab joined in the deception. There was some apprehension lest worshippers of Jehovah might be found in the temple; such, it seems, had been the intermixture of the two religions. As soon, however, as it was ascertained that all, and none but, the idolaters were there, the signal was given to eighty trusted guards, and a sweeping massacre removed at one blow the male heathen population of the kingdom of Israel. The innermost sanctuary of

* This is the force of the Hebrew word which the LXX. translate ἐν παραλαίῳ. Josephus (Ant. ix. 6, § 3) says σχαλαίτερον δὲ καὶ μετ' εὐραχίας ὄσενον.

on the very stairs themselves—if סִלְוֹת be stairs—without any seat or chair below him. The stairs doubtless ran round the inside of the quadrangle of the house, as they do still, for instance, in the ruin called the house of Zacchæus at Jericho, and Jehu sat where they joined the flat platform which formed the top or roof of the house. Thus he was conspicuous against the sky, while the captains were below him in the open quadrangle. The LXX. repeats the Hebrew word, ἐπὶ τῷ γόμφῳ τῶν ἀναβάθμων, which Lucian's Version renders intelligible by ἐπὶ μίαν τῶν ἀναβαθμίδων. By Josephus it is avoided.

the temple (A. V. and R. V. "the city of the house of Baal") was stormed, the great stone statue of Baal was demolished, the wooden figures of the inferior divinities sitting round him were torn from their places and burnt (Ewald, Gesch. iii. 526), and the site of the sanctuary itself became the public resort of the inhabitants of the city for the basest uses. This is the last public act recorded of Jehu. The remaining twenty-seven years of his long reign are passed over in a few words, in which two points only are material:—He did not destroy the calf-worship of Jeroboam: the Transjordanic tribes suffered much from the ravages of Hazael (2 K. x. 29–33). With reference to this second point, cuneiform discovery has much to suggest. Jehu's name is found on the Black Obelisk discovered at Nimrud (Layard, Nineveh, i. 396) and now in the British Museum, amongst the kings who are bringing tribute (in this case gold and silver, and articles manufactured in gold) to Shalmaneser II. His name is given as "Yahua the son of Khumri" (Omri) (Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser, tr. by Sayce in Records of the Past, v. 41, 1875. Cp. Schrader, KAT. 2 p. 208 sq.; Keilinschriftl. Bibliothek, i. 151). This substitution of the name of Omri for that of his own father may be accounted for, either by the importance which Omri had assumed as the second founder of the northern kingdom, or by the name of "Beth-Khumri," only given to Samaria in these monuments as "the House or Capital of Omri" (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 613, ed. 1853; Rawlinson's Herodot. i. 469, 3rd ed. 1875).*

Jehu's appearance in this may be thus explained. Under Jehoram Israel had held its own against its Syrian foes. In B.C. 842, Shalmaneser directed an expedition against Damascus and Hazael; and when he did so, Jehu lost no time in sending his ambassadors, bearing tribute, to enlist the protection of the Assyrian. He had but just ascended the throne, and every step had been marked in blood; and he may have felt that Assyrian protection was needed by himself personally, even more than by his people. For a time his policy probably secured the desired end; but the Assyrian expedition was practically unsuccessful. On the retirement of the Assyrians, the Syrians once more turned against the Israelites, and the havoc and cruelty foretold by Elisha (2 K. viii. 12), and so summarily stated by the historian (2 K. x. 32–3), took place.

* The Black Obelisk is figured large in Layard's Monuments of Nineveh (fol., Ser. I., 1849, No. 53), small in Layard's Nineveh (1849, 8vo, p. 347); and in both volumes there are descriptions, but not translations. The name JEHU was first discovered on this monument in 1851 by Dr. Hincks. His name is also found, according to Norris, upon an unpublished fragment of another inscription of Shalmaneser (Norris, Assyr. Dict., Pt. II. p. 487). It was for some while the earliest in Scripture history yielded by the Assyrian records, and was so represented in the former edition of this Dictionary. But about 1867 the earlier king AHAB was found in the Monolith Inscription of Shalmaneser from Kurkh (see its entire translation by Sayce in Records of the Past, III., 1874; cp. Norris, Assyr. Dict., Pt. I. p. 26), and he now holds the priority, as noticed by Prof. Sayce (Witness of Ancient Monuments, 1884, p. 9; see also the Introductions to his above translations).

The character of Jehu is not difficult to understand, if we take it as a whole, and judge it from a general point of view.

He must be regarded, like many others in history, as an instrument for accomplishing great purposes rather than as great or good in himself. In the long period during which his destiny—though known to others and perhaps to himself—lay dormant; in the suddenness of his rise to power; in the ruthlessness with which he carried out his purposes; in the union of profound silence and dissimulation with a stern, fanatic, wayward zeal,—he has not been without his likeness in modern times. The Scripture narrative, although it fixes our attention on the services which he rendered to the cause of religion by the extermination of a worthless dynasty and a degrading worship, yet on the whole leaves the sense that it was a reign barren in great results. His dynasty, indeed, was firmly seated on the throne longer than any other royal house of Israel (2 K. x. 30), and under Jeroboam II. it acquired a high name amongst the Oriental nations. But Elisha, who had raised him to power, as far as we know never saw him. In other respects it was a failure; the original sin of Jeroboam's worship continued; and in the Prophet Hosea there seems to be a retribution exacted for the bloodshed by which he had mounted the throne: "I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu" (Hos. i. 4), as in the similar condemnation of Baasha (1 K. xvi. 2). See a striking poem to this effect on the character of Jehu in the Lyra Apostolica.

2. (B. Εἰσὸς, 'Ἰσὺ, 'Ἰησοῦ; A. Εἰσοῦ, 'Ἰσοῦ.) Jehu, son of Hanani; a prophet of Judah, but whose ministrations were chiefly directed to Israel. His father was probably the seer who reproved Asa (2 Ch. xvi. 7). He must have begun his career as a prophet when very young. He first denounced Baasha, both for his imitation of the dynasty of Jeroboam, and also (as it would seem) for his cruelty in destroying it (1 K. xvi. 1, 7), and then, after an interval of thirty years, reappears to denounce Jehoshaphat for his alliance with Ahab (2 Ch. xix. 2, 3). He survived Jehoshaphat and wrote his life (xx. 34). From an obscurity in the text of 1 K. xvi. 7, the Vulgate has represented him as killed by Baasha. But this is not required by the words, and (except on the improbable hypothesis of two Jehus, both sons of Hanani) is contradicted by the later appearance of this prophet.

3. (B. Ἰησοῦς, A. Ἰησοῦ; Jehu.) A man of Judah of the house of Hezron (1 Ch. ii. 38). He was the son of a certain Obed, descended from the union of an Egyptian, JARHA, with the daughter of Sheshan, whose slave Jarha was (cp. v. 34).

4. (Ἰησοῦ.) A Simeonite, son of Josiah (1 Ch. iv. 35). He was one of the chief men of the tribe, apparently in the reign of Hezekiah (cp. v. 41).

5. (Ἰησοῦλ.) Jehu the Antothite (A. V.; Anathothite, R. V.), i.e. native of Anathoth, was one of the chief of the heroes of Benjamin, who forsook the cause of Saul for that of David when the latter was at Ziklag (1 Ch. xiii. 3). He does not appear in any of the later lists.

[A. P. S.] [C. H.]

JEHUB'BAH (יְהוּבָה), (?) = hidden; B. 'Ωβββ, A. 'Oβd; Haba, a man of Asher; son of Shamer or Shomer, of the house of Beriah (1 Ch. vii. 34).

JEHU'CAL (יְהוּכָל), perhaps a contraction of יְהוּכָל = Jehovah is able [MV.¹¹]; B. 'Ιωχάλ, A. 'Ιωχάδ; Juchal, son of Shelemiah, sent with Zephaniah by king Zedekiah to Jeremiah, to entreat his prayers and advice (Jer. xxxvii. 3). His name is also given as JUCAL, and he appears to have been one of the "princes of the king" (cp. xxxviii. 1, 4).

JEHUD (יְהוּד); B. 'Αζόρ, A. 'Ιοθθ; Jud, one of the towns of the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 45), named between Bealath and Bene-berak, Ibn Ibrak. By Eusebius and Jerome Jehud is not named. It has been identified by Robinson (ii. 242) and Schwarz (p. 110) with el-Yehūdīyeh, a large mud village, surrounded by palm trees, on the plain about 8 miles east of Jaffa. According to the Samaritans, it is the burial-place of Noby Hūdah, Judah (P.E.F. Mem. ii. 258). Possibly Jehud, and not Jerusalem, as Prof. Sayce has suggested, may be the Judah-Melek of Shishak's inscription at Karnak. [G.] [W.]

JEHUDI (יְהוּדִי) = Jew; BN. om. v. 14; A. 'Ιουδελ, BNA. 'Ιουδελ in cv. 21, 23; Judi, son of Nethaniah, employed by the princes of Jehoiakim's court to bring Baruch before them with the roll of Jeremiah's denunciation. When this had been read to them by Baruch and afterwards laid up in the chamber of Elishama, Jehudi fetched it therefrom by command of the king and read it to him and the princes; but after Jehudi had read three or four leaves the king cut the roll and cast it into the fire (Jer. xxxvi. [LXX. xliiii.] 14, 21, 23).

JEHUDI'JAH (יְהוּדִי'יָה); B. 'Αδευδ, A. 'Ιδιδ; Judaia. There is really no such name in the Hebrew Bible as that which our A. V. exhibits in 1 Ch. iv. 18. It is rather an appellative, "the Jewess," as in the A. V. margin, the R. V. text, and modern commentators generally. As far as an opinion can be formed on so obscure and apparently corrupt a passage, Mered, a descendant of Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and whose towns (Gedor, Socho, and Eshtemoa) lay in the south of Judah, married two wives; one a Jewess, the other an Egyptian, a daughter of Pharaoh. The Jewess was sister of Naham, the founder of the cities of Keilah and Eshtemoa. The descendants of Mered by his two wives are given in cv. 18, 19, and perhaps in the latter part of v. 17. Hodijah in v. 19 may be a corruption of Ha-jehudijah, "the Jewess," though the R. V. and modern critics retain it as a proper name. If the full stop at the end of v. 18 be removed, the passage may be read, "These are the sons of Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh, which Mered took (for his wife), and the sons of his wife, the Jewess, the sister of Naham (which Naham was), the father of Keilah, whose inhabitants are Garmites, and of Eshtemoa, whose inhabitants are Maachathites;" the last being named possibly from Maachah, Caleb's concubine, as the Ephrathites were from Ephrathah. Bertheau (Chronik) arrives at the same general result, by proposing to place the closing words of v. 18 before the words "And she bare Miriam," &c., in v. 17, and with him agree Keil, Oettli, &c. in loco. See also Vatablus in loco in Bp. Pearson's Critici Sacri, 1660, t. ii. col. 2661.

[A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JEHU'SH, R. V. JEUSH (יְהוּשׁ); 'Idis, B. Γάγ, A. 'Ιδιδ; Jehus, son of Eshak, a remote descendant of Saul (1 Ch. viii. 39). The parallel genealogy in ch. ix. 43, 44 stops short of this man.

JEI'EL (יְהִיֵּל; Jehiel). 1. (Ιωήλ) A chief man among the Reubenites, one of the house of Joel (1 Ch. v. 7).

2. (Ιειήλ; A. once 'Ιθηλ) A Merarite Levite, one of the gate-keepers (D' יהויה; A. V. "porters" and "doorkeepers") to the sacred tent, at the first establishment of the Ark in Jerusalem (1 Ch. xv. 18). His duty was also to play the harp (v. 21), or the psaltery and harp (xvi. 5), in the service before the Ark.

3. (Ελειήλ, B. 'Ελαλεήλ, A. 'Ελεήλ) A Gershonite Levite, one of the Bene-Asaph, forefather of JAHAZIEL in the time of king Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. xx. 14).

4. (Ιουήλ, i.e. Jeuel, but the A. V. and R. V. follow the correction of the Qeri; 'Ιειήλ) The scribe (שֹׁרֵט) who kept the account of the numbers of king Uzziah's irregular predatory warriors (D' יהויה, A. V. "bands," 2 Ch. xxvi. 11).

5. (Jeuel, as in the preceding, but the A. V. again follows the Keri, whilst R. V. reads Jeuel; 'Ιειήλ; Jahiel.) A Gershonite Levite, one of the Bene-Elizaphan, who assisted in the restoration of the house of Jehovah under king Hezekiah (2 Ch. xxix. 13).

6. (B. 'Ιωήλ, A. 'Ιειήλ) One of the chiefs of (יהויה) the Levites in the time of Josiah, and an assistant in the rites at his great Passover (2 Ch. xxxv. 9).

7. (Jeuel as above, but in Qeri and A. V. Jeiel; in R. V. Jeuel; 'Ιειήλ; B. Ebeid, A. Eiēh.) One of the Bene-Adonikam who formed part of the caravan of Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 13). In Esdras the name is JEUEL.

8. (Ιαήλ, A. 'Ιειήλ) A layman, of the Bene-Nebo, who had taken a foreign wife and had to relinquish her (Ezra x. 43). In Esdras it is omitted from the Greek and A. V., though the Vulgate has Idelus.

JEKAB-ZE-EL (יְכָבֶזֶעֶל; B. omits, A. Kab-sehā; Cabseel), a fuller form of the name of KABZEEL, the most remote city of Judah on the southern frontier. This form occurs only in the list of the places re-occupied after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 25). Its site is unknown.

[G.] [W.]

JEKAM-EAM (יְכָמֵאם; (?)= [God] raises up the people: B. 'Ιεκάμεις, 'Ιοκόμ; A. 'Ιεκάμει; Jecnaam, Jecnaam), a Levite in the time of king David: fourth of the sons of Hebron, the son of Kohath (1 Ch. xxiii. 19; xxiv. 23).

JEKAMIAH (יְכָמִיָּה; (?)= May Jehovah up-raise; B. 'Ιεχέμιας, A. 'Ιεκομίς; Isamia), son of Shallum, in the line of Ahlai, about contemporary with king Ahaz. In another passage the same name, borne by a different person, is given as JECAMIAH (1 Ch. ii. 41). [JARHA.] [A. C. H.]

JEKU'THIEL (יְכֻחִיֵּל, (?)) = the protection of God [M.V.¹¹]; B. δ Χερύθλ, A. Ἰνθουήλ; Icutiel, a man recorded in the genealogies of Judah (1 Ch. iv. 18) as the son of a certain Ezrah by his Jewish wife (A. V. Jehudijah), and in his turn the father, or founder, of the town of Zanoah. This passage in the Targum is not without a certain interest. Jered is interpreted to mean Moses, and each of the names following are taken as titles borne by him. Jekuthiel—"trust in God"—is so applied "because in his days the Israelites trusted in the God of heaven for forty years in the wilderness."

In a remarkable prayer used by the Spanish and Portuguese Jews in the concluding service of the Sabbath, Elijah is invoked as having had "tidings of peace delivered to him by the hand of Jekuthiel." This is explained to refer to some transaction in the life of Phineas, with whom Elijah is, in the traditions of the Jews, believed to be identical (see the quotations in Modern Judaism, p. 229).

JEMÍ'MA (יְמִימָה); 'Hμέρα; Dies, as if from ἡμέρα, "a day:" cp. ἡμέρα, imānā, day, the eldest of the three daughters born to Job after the restoration of his prosperity (Job xlii. 14). Gesenius and Dillmann identify the name with an Arabic word signifying "dove." [W. T. B.]

JEM'NAAN (Ἰεμνάδ; Vulg. omits), mentioned among the places on the sea-coast of Palestine to which the panic of the incursion of Holofernes extended (Judith ii. 28). No doubt Jabneel—generally called Jamnia by the Greek writers—is intended. The omission of Joppa, however, is remarkable. [G.] [W.]

JEMU'EL (Ἰεμουήλ; B. Ἰεμουήλ, Ἰεμύηλ; A. Ἰεμουήλ; Jemuel, Jamuel), the eldest son of Simeon (Gen. xlii. 10; Ex. vi. 15). In the lists of Num. xxvi. and 1 Ch. iv. the name is given as NEMUEL, which Gesenius decides to be the corrupted form.

JEPHTHĀ'E (Ἰεφθάε; Jephthe), Heb. xi. 32. The Greek form of the name JEPHTHAH.

JEPHTHAH (Ἰεφθά; [God] opens or makes free [M.V.¹¹] or = the breaker through [Eldersheim]; Ἰεφθάε; Jephthe), a judge. His history is contained in Judg. xi. 1-xii. 7. He was a Gileadite, the son of Gilead and a concubine. Driven by the legitimate sons from his father's inheritance, he went to Tob, and became the head of a company of freebooters in a debatable land probably belonging to Ammon (2 Sam. x. 6). The idolatrous Israelites in Gilead were at that time smarting under the oppression of an Ammonitish king; and Jephthah was led, as well as by the unsettled character of the age as by his own family circumstances, to adopt a kind of life unrestrained, adventurous, and insecure as that of a Scottish border-chieftain in the Middle Ages. It was not unlike the life which David afterwards led at Ziklag, with this exception, that Jephthah had no friend among the heathen in whose land he lived. His fame as a bold and successful captain was carried back to his native Gilead; and when the time was ripe for throwing off the yoke of Ammon, the Gileadite elders sought in vain for any leader who in an equal degree with the base-born outcast could command the confidence of his countrymen. Jephthah consented to become their captain, on the condition—solemnly ratified before the Lord in Mizpeh—that in the event of his success against Ammon he should still remain as their acknowledged head. Messages, urging their respective claims to occupy the trans-Jordanic region, were exchanged between the Ammonitish king and Jephthah. Then the Spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah. He collected warriors throughout Gilead and Manasseh, the provinces which acknowledged his authority. And then he vowed his vow unto the Lord, "Whatsoever cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me, when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, it shall be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering" (R. V.). The Ammonites were routed with great slaughter. Twenty cities, from Arer on the Arnon to Minnith and to Abel Keramim, were taken from them. But as the conqueror returned to Mizpeh there came out to meet him a procession of damsels with dances and timbrels, and among them—the first person from his own house—his daughter and only child. "Alas! my daughter, thou hast brought me very low," was the greeting of the heart-stricken father. But the high-minded maiden was ready for any personal suffering in the hour of her father's triumph. Only she asked for a respite of two months to withdraw to her native mountains, and in their recesses to weep with her virgin-friends that she was to die unmarried. When that time was ended, she returned to her father; and "he did unto her his vow."

But Jephthah had not long leisure, even if he were disposed, for the indulgence of domestic grief. The proud tribe of Ephraim challenged his right to go to war, as he had done without their concurrence, against Ammon; and they proceeded to vindicate the absurd claim by invading Jephthah in Gilead. They did but add to his triumph which they envied. He first defeated them, then intercepted the fugitives at the fords of Jordan, and there, having insultingly identified them as Ephraimites by their peculiar pronunciation, he put forty-two thousand men to the sword.

The eminent office for which Jephthah had stipulated as the reward of his exertions, and the glory which he had won, did not long abide with him. He judged Israel six years and died.

It is generally conjectured that his jurisdiction was limited to the trans-Jordanic region.

That the daughter of Jephthah was really offered up to God in sacrifice, slain by the hand of her father and then burned, is a horrible conclusion; but one which it seems impossible to avoid (cp. Wordsworth, Holy Bible, with notes, in loco). This was understood to be the meaning of the text by Jonathan the paraphrast, and Rashi, by Josephus (Ant. v. 7, § 10), and by perhaps all the early Christian fathers, as Origen, in Joanncm. tom. vi. cap. 36; Chrysostom, Hom. ad pop. Antioch. xiv. 3, Opp. ii. 145; Theodoret, Quest.

in Jud. xx.; Jerome, Ep. ad Jul. 118, Opp. i. 791, &c.; Augustine, Quaest. in Jud. viii. § 49, Opp. iii. 1, p. 610. For the first eleven centuries of the Christian era this was the current, perhaps the universal, opinion of Jews and Christians. Yet none of them extenuate the act of Jephthah. Josephus calls it neither lawful nor pleasing to God. Jewish writers say that he ought to have referred it to the high-priest; but either he failed to do so, or the high-priest culpably omitted to prevent the rash act. Origen strictly confines his praise to the heroism of Jephthah's daughter.

Another interpretation was suggested by Joseph Kimchi. He supposed that, instead of being sacrificed, she was shut up in a house which her father built for the purpose, and that she was there visited by the daughters of Israel four days in each year so long as she lived. This interpretation has been adopted by many eminent men, as by Levi ben Gersom and Bechai among the Jews, and by Drusus, Grotius, Estius, de Dieu, Bishop Hall, Waterland, Dr. Hales, and others. And this opinion has found favour with many modern critics (cp. Cassel in Hersog, R.E. s. n. "Iefta"; Köhler, König, Hauptprobl. p. 74; Ederheim, Bible History, ii. 159, &c.). Support for these opinions respectively is deduced from the original text and the customs of the day (see them stated in the first edition of this work), and theological opinions have sometimes had the effect of leading men to prefer one view of Jephthah's vow to another. The act itself is, however, one which the Scripture relates in all its baldness, and leaves judgment upon it unpronounced. There is no necessity to turn in explanation of it to foreign analogies, such as have been sought in the sacrifice of his son by Idomeneus or in the intention of Agamemnon to offer Iphigenia; still less is the act to be set aside as mythological and unhistorical. The commendation of Jephthah's faith (Heb. xi. 32) leaves unaffected acts which, if reprobed to-day, are not incompatible with the belief of the age in which they are alleged to have occurred (cp. Mozley, Ruling Ideas in Early Ages and their relation to O. T. faith, Lectures ii., iii. and xi.).

The views of the modern school upon the sources and text of Jephthah's history may be seen summed up in Kittel, Gesch. d. Hebräer, ii. 80 sq., 1892. [W. L. B.] [F.]

JEPHUN'NE (Ἰεφουννή; Jephone), Ecclus. xli. 7. [JEPHUNNEH.]

JEPHUN'NEH (יֵפֹונֶה; Jephone). 1. (Ἰεφουνή.) Father of Caleb the spy, who is usually designated as "Caleb the son of Jephunneh." He appears to have belonged to an Edomitish tribe called Kenezites, from Kenaz their founder; but his father or other ancestors are not named. [CALEB, 2; KENAZ.] (See Num. xiii. 6, &c., xxxii. 12, &c.; Josh. xiv. 14, &c.; 1 Ch. iv. 15.)

2. (B. Ἰφυνά, A. Ἰεφρή.) A descendant of Asher, eldest of the three sons of Jether (1 Ch. vii. 38). [A. C. H.]

JE'RAH (יֵרָח, Yerach: in Gen. A. Ἰδραδ, F. Ἰδρεδ; Jare), the fourth of the thirteen sons of Joktan (Gen. x. 26; 1 Ch. i. 20 [BA. om.]), who appear to represent the eponymous ancestors or founders of a group of related tribes in Western and Southern Arabia. The name Jerah, however, has not been certainly identified, either locally or in Arab genealogical traditions. Bochart, indeed, suggested that יֵרָח was not the actual name of the Joktanide clan in question, but a Hebrew translation of it, and that the clan was, in fact, the Banū Hilāl, "Sons of the New Moon," in Northern Yemen, whom he further identified with the Alilaei mentioned by Agatharchides (ap. Diod. Sic. iii. 45). But the assumption of a translation instead of a transcription of the name is unsatisfactory; and, in any case, יֵרָח is not Heb. for "New Moon" (יָרֵחַ), nor even "moon," but "month."

And it is known that the Banū Hilāl got their name from an ancestor of the Prophet, belonging to the tribe of Kais, and therefore have nothing to do with the Alilaei (Caussin de Perceval, Essai, Tab. XA; Abul-Fidā, p. 194, ed. Fleischer, cited by E. S. Poole).

In the Hebrew list, Jerah follows Hazar-maveth, the modern Hadhramaut. J. D. Michaelis, therefore, while adopting Bochart's main idea, compared غب القمر Ghubul-Kamar, "The Coast of the Moon," and جبل القمر G'abalul-Kamar, "The Mountain of the Moon," both E. of Hadhramaut.

Mr. E. S. Poole compared יֵרָאֵחַ Yarākḥ, a fortress of the Nig'ad, in Mahrah (Marāsīd, s. v. Yarākḥ); Prof. D. H. Müller, Warākḥ, an inhabited mountain in the district of al-'Awd, W. of Hadhramaut (Hamdān, G'azīrat al-'Arab, pp. 178 sq.). But we can hardly feel assured of the Hebrew reading of the name, in face of the LXX. variant Jarad or Jared; and it is possible that K. Niebuhr's hesitating comparison of יֵרִים Jarim, a very ancient town of Hadhramaut, is correct (Arabien, p. 291). [C. J. B.]

JERAHME-EL (יהרמיהל = God hath mercy: B. Ἰραμεήλ, Ἰερεμεήλ, Ἰεραμεήλ, Ἰαμεήλ; A. Ἰερεμεήλ, Ἰερεμηήλ; Jerameel). 1. First-born son of Hezron, the son of Pharez, the son of Judah (1 Ch. ii. 9). His wives and descendants are given at length in ru. 25-33, and nowhere else. [AZABIAH, 13; ZABAD.] They inhabited the southern border of Judah. [JERAHMEELITES.]

2. (Ἰραμηήλ.) A Merarite Levite; the representative, at the time of the organisation of the Divine service by king David, of the family of Kish the son of Mablī (1 Ch. xxiv. 29; cp. xxiii. 21).

3. (Ἰερεμεήλ.) Son of Hammelech, or as the LXX., R.V., A.V. margin, render it, "son of the king," i.e. a prince of the blood. He was employed by Jehoiakim to make Jeremiah and Baruch prisoners, after the roll of Jeremiah's prophecy had been burnt (Jer. xxxvi. [LXX. xliii.] 26). [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

* The kindred term יֵרָח is "moon;" although, like the Assyrian arḫū, its formal equivalent, יֵרָח doubtless originally denoted "moon," and then "month."

JERAH'MEELITES, THE (יְרַחְמֵאֵלִים: 'Ιερσημεί, ὁ 'Ιερσημείλ; B. in xxx. 29, 'Ισραήλ; A. 'Ισραμηλεί, 'Ιερσημεί: Jerameel). The tribe descended from the first of the foregoing persons (1 Sam. xvii. 10). Their cities were also named amongst those to which David sent presents from his Amalekite booty (xxx. 29), although to Achish he had represented that he had attacked them.

JERECHUS (Ἰερέχος, B. 'Ιερέχου; B. 'Ιερεϊχού; Ericus), 1 Esd. v. 22. [JERICHO.]

JE'RED, R. V. JARED (יָרֵד=descent; 'Ιπέδ; Jared). 1. One of the patriarchs before the Flood, son of Mahalaleel and father of Enoch (1 Ch. i. 2). In Genesis the name is given as JARED.

2. (Jaret). One of the descendants of Judah signalled as the "father—i.e. the founder—of Gedor" (1 Ch. iv. 18). He was one of the sons of Ezrah by his wife Ha-Jehudijah, i.e. the Jewess. The Jews, however, give an allegorical interpretation to the passage, and treat this and other names therein as titles of Moses—Jered because he caused the manna to descend. Here—as noticed under Jabez—the pun, though obvious in biblical Hebrew, where Jared (the root of Jordan) means "to descend," is concealed in the rabbinical paraphrase, which has יָרַדְתִּי, —a word with the same meaning, but without any relation to Jered, either for eye or ear. [G.] [W.]

JERE'MAI (יֵרֵמַי; B. 'Ιεραμείμ, A. 'Ιερεμί, N. 'Ιεραμεί; Jermai), a layman; one of the Bene-Hashum, who was compelled by Ezra to part away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 33). In the lists of Esdras it is omitted.

JEREMI'AH, BOOK OF. 1. Title.—יְרֵמְיָהּ the usual form, but יֵרֵמְיָהּ occurs, besides the heading to the Book, in xxvii. 1, xxviii. 5, 10, 11, 15, xxix. 1; so Dan. ix. 2: LXX. 'Ιερεμίας; Vulg. Jeremias; St. Jerome and others, Hieremias. Conjectures as to the meaning of the name are (a) "the Lord's exalted one" (St. Jerome, and so Simonis, Onomast. p. 535); (b) "the Lord's appointed one" (Gesen. Theas. s. v., "jecit, id est, collocavit, constituit," referring it to the sense of the root which appears probably in Dan. vii. 9, "placed," marg. cast down, R. V.); (c) "the Lord throws (down)" (Hengst. Christologicus des A. B., Clark's Library, ii. 361, tracing this use of the root to Ex. xv. 1, and making the application in Jeremiah's case to be to the work spoken of in i. 10). This last perhaps accords most closely with the analogues יְרַחְמֵאֵל, יְרֵמְיָהּ; yet the ill omen which it suggests is hardly in accordance with the fact that the name was far from uncommon.

2. Authorship and Authenticity.—An unvarying tradition ascribes the Book to Jeremiah the Prophet, and the strong impress of the writer's individuality, which is apparent throughout the greater part, confirms us in this conclusion.*

We must however at once except ch. lii. because of (i.) the last words of li.; (ii.) a certain peculiarity of style, e.g. the use of the name Jehoia-chin instead of Coniah or Jeconiah; (iii.) the contents of vv. 31-34. Other portions in which the authorship has been doubted or denied are viii. 10-12;^b x. 1-16;^c xv. 11-14; xvii. 19-27; xxv. 12-14; xxvii. 7,^d 16-22; xxx.-xxxiii.; xxxix. 1, 2; xlvi., l., li.

The chief of those who have denied or doubted the genuineness of one or more of the above passages are Berthold, Cheyne, Ewald, Graf, Hitzig, Kuobel, Meier, Movers, Naegelsbach, Schnurrer, Struensee, Venema; while amongst their defenders are Hengstenberg, Keil, and Payne Smith.

It would seem unlikely that Baruch was in any sense the author of portions of the Book, with the possible exception of the historical appendix (lii.), carefully distinguished (see li. 64) from Jeremiah's own words.

Parts of the LXX. in this Book present startling exceptions to its general rule of adherence with tolerable fidelity to the Massoretic text. Hence has arisen the question, whether the Heb. or the Greek text of Jeremiah is to be considered the more authentic. We may conveniently classify their divergencies under two heads.

(1.) Matter.—In the LXX., besides a certain amount of alteration of a kind to affect the sense, while little is added, there is an immense number of trifling omissions besides some of more importance. The longest of these last—none of them, we may observe, of a character to be easily omitted by accident—are xxix. 16-20; xxxiii. 14-26; xxxix. 4-13; liii. 28-30. On the whole about an eighth of the Heb. text is wanting.

(2.) Arrangement.—The position of the prophecies against foreign nations differs.⁴ In the LXX. instead of coming near the end of the Book (xlii.-li.) they follow upon xxv. 13, and therefore immediately precede the section of kindred subject-matter which begins at xxv. 15. Also the order of sequence of these prophecies among themselves⁵ differs.

It is not a case of two independent recensions, for then (a) the striking differences would not be confined to certain parts of the Book, and (b) we should not find the peculiar form of Introduction (i. 1-3),^f virtually the same, and lii. added in both. Further we must suppose both forms of the Book to have existed very early, as it would be impossible that one already for any length of time in possession (a thing which would naturally take place in a very vol. iv.), and Maurice Vernes, Précis d'Histoire Juive depuis les Origines jusqu'à l'Époque Persane, 1890.

^f Implying repeated alteration from the original shape. Vs. 1, 2 are the natural heading of a prophecy including only the utterances of Josiah's reign. V. 3 is evidently added with a further group, but still does not cover xl.-xlv.

* For the strange view which places the writing of this and of the other Prophetic Books in the 2nd cent. B.C., see E. Havet in Revue des deux Mondes, 1899, lv. p. 516, &c. (answered by De Lagarde, Mittheilungen, brief period with a Prophet, illustrious and honoured as Jeremiah became) should admit another so different to be on anything like an equal footing.

Views as to the causes of variation may be thus classified: * (a) errors of copyists (St. Jerome, Grabe), (b) negligence or caprice of LXX. (Spohn, Naegelsbach, Wichelhaus, Keil, Graf), (c) two or more recensions of the Hebrew (J. D. Michaelis, Movers, Hitzig, Bleek, and Workman^b holding that that followed by the LXX. is nearer the original text, while Ewald, Hävernick, Schrader, and Kuenen consider that, while on the whole the Massoretic text is to be preferred, the Greek translation, in spite of manifold errors and caprices, now and then gets nearer to the original). Against the LXX. are pleaded (a) the arbitrary character of an immense number of the renderings, alike affecting letters, syllables, words, and verses; (b) the omissions, especially those which do not materially affect the sense, viz. the words "the prophet," "saith the Lord," "the Lord of hosts the God of Israel," &c. Hence it has been suggested that Baruch, desiring on the death of Jeremiah to return to Palestine and to carry with him the original writings, allowed several persons to transcribe the prophecies in all haste, and that the LXX. preserves for us this form of the Book.¹ On behalf of the LXX. are pleaded (a) its more important omissions (see above) as not of a character to be accidentally left out; (b) the use of cipher^k in the Heb. text (not recognised in the LXX.); (c) the position given in the Greek text to the prophecies directed against foreign nations, as one which they are more likely to have occupied in Jeremiah's roll.¹ On the whole it would appear that the text which formed the basis of the Greek translators' work was, both in accuracy and in the arrangement of its matter, superior to the Massoretic text, while the numerous errors which disfigure the LXX. Version of the Book are to be charged (we know not with what precise distribution of blame) to slips on their own part, and to errors, obscurities, lacunae, &c. in the Heb. MSS. on which they worked.

3. Date and Place.—This subject has been of necessity discussed already under the heading of authenticity. Either before, or very soon after Jeremiah's death in Egypt (? A.D. 575^m), Baruch, we may conjecture, put together the Prophet's writings, and, as well through dislike of the princes who had brought him thither as in deference to his master's unvarying opinion (ii. 36; xxxvii. 7; xlii. 9-22), returned with the Book to Palestine.

4. Persons addressed.—A. His own nation. Even the reformation-work of Josiah seems to have been but superficial. Jeremiah was called upon to seek to convince of sin and stir up to a sense of the requirements of the Divine Law the followers of Baal and Astarte (i. 16; ii. 5, 11, 13, 20, 23, 27, 28; iii. 1 sq.; vii. 18; ix. 14), and of the unholy pleasures to which that worship ministered (v. 7, 8),—men devoted to magical arts (xxvii. 9) and steeped in habits of dishonesty (v. 1, 26-28; vi. 13; vii. 8; ix. 3-6, 8), false swearing (v. 2; xxiii. 10), violence (vi. 7; vii. 5, 6; xxi. 12), and infanticide (viii. 31; xix. 5; xxxii. 35).ⁿ

Many of his rebukes are directly addressed to the priests and false prophets. For Jeremiah, unlike certain of his predecessors, had to meet the united hostility of these two classes,^o who, as we see (v. 31; vi. 13; viii. 10; xxiii. 11), played into each other's hands.^p The main object of the former was to ensure the external prosperity of the Temple, as the substantial symbol of the theocracy, and the source of their own gains; while the prophets, closely joined with them by a common interest in the maintenance of the status quo, supported the priesthood by their optimistic teachings, which were delivered with an air of the utmost confidence and bolstered up by pretended revelations obtained by incantation and magical arts (which Deut. xviii. 10-14 had stringently forbidden), and uncontrolled by the Spirit of God (Jer. xiv. 14). Jeremiah, "by each of his callings naturally led to sympathize with both, was the doomed antagonist of both."^q For his language towards them, besides the passages given above, see ii. 8, 26; vi. 14 sq.; viii. 1, 13; xiii. 13; xiv. 13-17; xviii. 18; xxvi. 7, 12-15; xxvii. 9, 14, 16; xxix. 21-32; xxxii. 32; xxxiv. 19; xxxvii. 19.

On the other hand, the "princes"^r were friendly to Jeremiah in his earlier time (xxvi.), and not unfriendly even in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (xxvi.). Later (xxxvii. 15 sq.) they were decidedly hostile.

Lastly, from none of the kings did the Prophet meet with any active or continuous opposition, although the fate of the roll (xxvi. 23) and the treatment to which Zedekiah allowed the Prophet to be subjected, show that the warnings which he addressed to Jehoiakim and his successors by no means always induced them to bow to the authority which he claimed.

B. Heathen nations. Jeremiah addresses the nations^s through their ambassadors both by word and acted symbol, warning them of the crushing power of the growing empire of Babylon (xxvii. 1-11). This was early in the reign of Zedekiah. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim he had addressed to the nations similar warnings, emphasized by the symbol of the wine-cup (xxv. 8-38), and to the same date belongs the greater part of the prophecies relating to foreign nations, which are comprised in xvi.-xlix. The prophecy against Babylon (l., li.) is probably later.

5. Contents and character.—A. Contents. (i.) Jeremiah's early life. He was a priest and son of Hilkiah (i. 1). If with some (e.g. St. Clem. Alex., St. Jer., Theodoret, Kimchi, Abarbanel, Eichhorn, Von Bohlen, Umbreit) we assume that his father is identical with the high-priest¹ who five years (cp. i. 2 with 2 K. xxii. 3-8) after Jeremiah's call "found the book of the law in the house of the Lord," we can the more clearly picture to ourselves the Prophet's training as son of the man who held not only the chief position in religious matters, but also the foremost place in Josiah's reformation. In favour of this view are (i.) the respect with which the Prophet was treated by the kings and the princes of Judah, and (ii.) the fact that Baruch, a man of good birth,² and brother of Seraiah, a prince (li. 59), was willing to be his scribe. Against it is the fact that Hilkiah was descended from Eleazar (1 Ch. vi. 4-13), but the priests of Anathoth through Abiathar from Ithamar (1 K. ii. 26; 1 Ch. xxiv. 3). It is however not impossible, nor even, for aught we know, very improbable, that members of both lines of descent should reside in the same priestly city, and it is certainly likely that the dominant family would secure for its high-priest a dwelling in a place so conveniently near ("three Roman miles," St. Jer. on i. 1; "twenty Roman stadia," Jos. Ant. x. 7, § 3) to Jerusalem.³

Jeremiah speaks of himself at the time of his call as "a child" (יָלֵד, i. 6). The same word is used of Joshua (Ex. xxxiii. 11) at a time when he appears to have been forty-five years of age.⁴ In the case of Jeremiah, however, the length of his prophetic ministry shows that he must have been very youthful at its commencement. The period from about B.C. 626 (thirteenth year of Josiah) till B.C. 586 (destruction of Jerusalem) gives us forty years, while he survived for a considerable time the fall of the city.

That he was a Nazarite has been inferred by some, but hardly with sufficient reason, from (a) the reverence with which he regards the Rechabites (xxxv.); (b) the improbability that one trained in the house of a devout priest would be unmindful of such passages as Is. xxviii. 7, Amos ii. 11, 12; (c) Lam. iv. 7. In this connexion it has been pointed out also that a Rechabite is named Jeremiah (xxxv. 3).

The Biblical narrative suggests that Jeremiah was prepared for his life-work rather by the instruction and associations of Anathoth than by any formal training in the "schools of the prophets," and that he was thence called direct to the task of declaring the will of God to His disobedient people.⁵

(ii.) His relations to Josiah (B.C. 638-608). His attachment to the person of Josiah, as shown by his lamentation⁶ over his death in battle (2 Ch. xxxiv. 25), as well as the strong sympathy with which he regarded the war waged by the king against idolatry and its attendant defilements, neither hindered him from looking with disquietude upon the traditional policy of seeking an alliance with Egypt (ii. 36), nor yet prevented him from seeing that hitherto it was but the surface of the nation's pollutions which had been touched. In fact, as far as his extant prophecies are concerned, Josiah's work of reformation might have been wholly non-existent, while on the other hand there is no mention of Jeremiah in the historical record. The mass of the people, and even the main body of the priests and prophets themselves, were unmoved, and it therefore behoved him unceasingly to preach the message with which he was charged.

During the gradual progress of this outward and partial reformation, and five years before its sudden and great development in connexion with the discovery of "the book of the law," the Prophet's actual call occurred, and in a form evidently altogether unlooked for (cp. Is. vi.; Ezek. i.). He shrinks from the prospect, but the Lord reassures him, touches his mouth and sends him forth as His Prophet.⁷ The more important portion of his task is to consist in rebuke and threatening, "to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down" (i. 10), while out of the ruins a better and more hopeful state of things shall spring, "to build and to plant" (ibid.).

Now and to the end of his ministry idolatry is the foundation sin that he denounces. In the valley of Hinnom, close to Jerusalem, at any rate up to the time of Josiah's reforms, children were offered to Baal or Molech (vii. 31; xix. 5; xxxii. 35; the two being identified in this last passage); while "the queen of heaven" (vii. 18; xlv. 17, 18, 19, 25), the Atar-Samain of Assurbanipal's inscription,⁸ received moon-shaped cakes from female worshippers. The Prophet dwells with perpetual iteration upon this indictment, and upon the overthrow that must ensue. Tokens of that overthrow are already to be seen in the shape of drought and famine (v. 25; xiv. 1). The power "from the north" (i. 13 sq.; iii. 18; iv. 6; vi. 22; x. 22; xiii. 20; xvi. 15; xxiii. 8),⁹ subsequently defined as the Chaldeans

³ Hilkiah is not the only name common to the historical and prophetic record. We have also Shallum (xxxiii. 7; 2 K. xxiii. 14) and Abikam (xxvi. 24; 2 K. xxii. 12).

(xv. 9), shall consummate the work of destruction. Nevertheless, for the people of God, redemption shall at length succeed punishment (iv. 27; v. 18; xvi. 14, 15; xxiii. 8; xv. 12; xxvii. 22; xxix. 10; xxx. 3; xxxii. 37); while for their enemies victory shall be followed by judgment (li.).

(iii.) His relations to the kings subsequent to Josiah. There was now no longer even a semblance of observance paid to Josiah's covenant; while those who attributed the king's death to the anger of the gods, whose shrines he had overthrown at the Prophet's instigation, were naturally full of wrath against Jeremiah for the supposed results of his policy.

Of Shallum's brief reign Jeremiah speaks with kindness and sorrow (xxii. 10-12). Contrast the stern rebuke administered to his successor (cc. 13-19).

Jehoiakim, hitherto called Eliakim, the eldest son, succeeds (2 K. xiii. 34), and now Jeremiah occupies a very important position. The favour of the court was no longer, as in the days of Josiah, on the side of the godly. Self-indulgence, covetousness, the shedding of innocent blood, violence, the exaction of forced labour and of exorbitant tribute, these (xxii. 13, 14, 17) were Jehoiakim's characteristics. The Prophet, in charging him with these sins, exasperates also the priests and false prophets. Between him and them it is henceforth war à outrance. Persecution from his own people (xi. 19) is now (xxvi. 7-24, probably = vii.) followed by an attempt at his judicial murder in Jerusalem.

Jeremiah illustrated his declaration that "all these lands are given into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar," God's "servant" (xxv. 9, xxvii. 6; cp. xliii. 10 and Ezek. xxix. 18-20), by the symbol of the moulding and remoulding of the potter's clay, and by the solemn breaking of an earthen vessel in the valley of Hinnom, in presence of the chief of the priests and people (xviii., xix.). This excited the wrath of Pashur, son of Immer (to be distinguished from the Pashur son of Melchiah, of xxi. 1), who had assumed to himself the functions of a prophet, but "prophesied lies" (xx. 6) in the name of the Lord. At his hands Jeremiah underwent ignominious treatment (xx. 2), including apparently imprisonment for a time.

In regard both to the history of the East and to Jeremiah's prophetic life, the fourth year of Jehoiakim (B.C. 604), as the year of Nebuchadnezzar's victory over Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish, was a turning-point.* There are few things in history so remarkable as the rapidity of the rise of the Chaldean power (Hab. i. 5, 6). "In B.C. 609 Babylon had still two seemingly vigorous rivals, Assyria and Egypt; in B.C. 604 it had the undisputed mastery of the East."[†] seeing that Babylon is not north, but rather south-east of Palestine. That invasion, however, was too early (circ. B.C. 635) to be referred to here, as is also shown by the language of iii. 18, v. 19. The recollection of these incursions, and those of other savage bands, more or less subject to the Assyrian and Babylonian powers, may, however, have affected the form ("from the north") of his prophecy.

† Cheyne, Introd. to Jer., Pulpit Comm. p. v.

Ch. xxv., Jeremiah's earliest closely dated prophecy (v. 1), was delivered apparently between the news of the victory and the arrival of the Chaldean army beneath the walls of Jerusalem. The special detail which marks the introduction to xxv., the definite date, the application to himself of the title Prophet (נָבִיא) for the first time, and the comprehensive glance which he casts at his whole previous ministry, all show that he considers this to form a decided crisis.[‡] Accordingly he apparently reckons the seventy years' servitude (xxv. 11, xxix. 10; cp. xxvii. 7) as beginning from this time.

Nebuchadnezzar plunders the Temple of its sacred vessels, carries away Daniel and others to Babylon (2 Ch. xxxvi. 6, 7; Dan. i. 3), and then, hearing of his father's illness, hastens his return, in order to secure the throne. The Jews failed to profit by the warning, and in the fifth year (B.C. 593) of Jehoiakim (xxxvi.) Jeremiah, himself hidden in some retreat from the expected wrath of the king, sent his trusted follower Baruch with a roll[§] to be read in the Temple on a fast day in the ears of all the people. The substance of it was reported to the king; the roll was fetched by his order, and read before him: whereupon, in spite of the intercession of certain of the princes, Jehoiakim burned it piece by piece. Baruch then at the Prophet's dictation wrote and communicated to the king another roll, containing in addition to the contents of the former a rebuke to him for his impious act, and further announcements of God's vengeance.

To this time is most fitly to be referred the acted symbol of the linen girdle (xliii.).[¶] Commentators differ on the question whether Jeremiah on this occasion actually visited the Euphrates or not. On behalf of the former view, which on the whole appears the more probable (so Keil, Naegelsbach, Orelli), it is pointed out that (i.) the narrative is apparently quite straightforward and meant to be taken literally; (ii.) in fact Jeremiah may well have been at or near Babylon in the later years of

* See remarks in Naegelsbach's Introd. p. 5.

† The LXX. reads "eighth," which agrees with the statement of Josephus that Jehoiakim paid tribute to Nebuchadnezzar in his eighth year, written in connexion with 2 K. xxiv. 1. "In his days Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came up, and Jehoiakim became his servant three years," i.e. till his rebellion towards the close (eleventh year) of his reign. That rebellion was naturally followed by the siege, which, however, actually fell in the short reign of his successor. See Cheyne, Pulpit Comm. on xxxvi. 9 (where, however, the order of the vase-lage and rebellion is accidentally transposed), and Grätz, Monatschrift. &c., Bd. xxiii. p. 300.

‡ The word (נָבִיא) occurs only in Jeremiah and later

Books (Ezek. ii. 9, iii. 1; Zech. v. 1, 2). Ps. xl. 8 is a possible exception. The prophecy as read on this occasion probably consisted of the main part of ch. xxv. Cp. the contents of that chapter with the statement in xxxvi. 29. So Cheyne, and Grätz, Monatsch. Bd. xxiii. 298 sq.

¶ The date (at the close or immediately after the reign of Jehoiakim) is also certainly settled by the mention in v. 18 of "the queen (mother)," Nebushta, carried captive to Babylon with her son Jehoiachin (xxix. 2). Some, however, take her to be Jeddah (2 K. xxii. 1), mother of Josiah.

Jehoiakim's reign, as we have no account of him during that period; (iii.) Jonah and probably Nahum had been there; (iv.) Jeremiah may have desired for his country's sake to become acquainted with its destined conquerors; (v.) if his visit was subsequent to the first deportation of Jews (third year of Jehoiakim, Dan. i. 1), he may have had the further object of visiting Ezekiel or Daniel. The former Prophet, as associated with Jeremiah at Jerusalem during the earlier part of Jehoiakim's reign, shows in his teaching many traces of Jeremiah's influence; (vi.) the kindly feeling shown towards him by Nebuchadnezzar at the capture of Jerusalem points to an earlier acquaintance. Against the view are pleaded (by Graf, Rosenmüller, and others), (i.) the absence of the usual prefix "the river"; (ii.) the silence of the narrative as to the length of the journey; (iii.) the absence of rocks on the Euphrates; (iv.) the needlessness of going so far merely to prove that a girdle buried in the ground would become unfit for use. Hence Ewald and Birch have both suggested, instead of Euphrates, Forah (involving however a change of the text from פְּרָה to פְּרָה), a few miles N.E. of Jerusalem and of Anathoth, Birch (Quart. Statement, PEF. Oct. 1880, p. 236) identifying it with the Parah of Josh. xviii. 23. Others (e.g. Bochart, Venema, Dathe, Hitzig) hold that פְּרָה = בֵּית־לֶחֶם = Bethlehem, or the Bethlehem district with its limestone hills. It is best, however, to take the word in its literal sense. The river which runs through Babylon, about to be the city of exile, is naturally chosen as that on the banks of which the girdle should rot. Jeremiah and Baruch probably found it unsafe to return till the close of the reign of Jehoiakim, who came to a violent end and a dishonoured burial in accordance with Jeremiah's prophecy (xxii. 18, 19; cp. xxxvi. 30).

Jehoiachin (= Jeconiah of xxiv. 1, xxvii. 20, xxviii. 4, xxix. 2; 1 Ch. iii. 16; Esth. ii. 6, and = Coniah¹ of xxii. 24, 28, xxvii. 1), his son, succeeded to the throne (B.C. 597) at the age of eighteen² (2 K. xxiv. 8), and, like Jehoahaz, reigned but three months. Of Jeremiah's prophecies undoubtedly relating to this reign (excluding therefore xliii.), we have only his lament over the king's fate in xxii. 24-30.

Mattaniah, Josiah's youngest son, was placed on the throne by the king of Babylon, and assumed the name of Zedekiah, "the righteousness of the Lord," apparently meant to identify him with the teaching of xliii. 6, however sad and pathetic was to be the contrast with such aspirations which was afforded by the history of his reign. He was well meaning, but utterly weak, a "poor roi fainéant."³ His whole reign was spent in a policy of vacillation between the course urged by the Prophet and the suggestions of the princes. To this time belongs Jeremiah's letter of advice (xxix. 4-23) to the exiles, in which he counsels them to submit, and await restoration. The letter is received at Babylon with much indignation on the part of the false prophets (see xxix. 25-32, and cp. iii. 24; 2 K. xxv. 18). There was an impression prevalent both at Jerusalem (xxviii. 1-11) and at Babylon (xxix.), that Jehoiachin and the rest would soon return from exile. It was probably in consequence of this, and as an act of homage to Nebuchadnezzar, that Zedekiah in the fourth year of his reign (B.C. 593) visited Babylon (li. 59, but the LXX. text does not make him visit that city). On that occasion Jeremiah sends by Seraiah, Baruch's brother (cp. xxiii. 12), the prophecy (I., li. 1-58) of the overthrow of the city that now holds his countrymen captive.

A Chaldean army now (B.C. 589) approached Jerusalem. The wealthiest of the people (in particular probably those in the rural parts), who had apparently long taken advantage of the distressed condition of their land to enslave their brethren, consented under this pressure (xxiv. 8-10) to release them. But on the departure of the besieging army to meet that of Pharaoh-Hophra, which was thought to be about to attempt the raising of the siege, the princes withdrew their boon from the manumitted (v. 11), an act which Jeremiah denounced in the strongest terms (vv. 17-22). The Prophet had already several years previously (xxvii. 2) appeared in the streets with a yoke upon his neck to symbolize the impending servitude of the nation; and when Hananiah, who had prophesied deliverance in two years (xxviii. 3), had broken the yoke, Jeremiah foretold his speedy death (v. 16, 17). His attempt during a temporary absence of the besiegers, by a visit to Anathoth, to secure himself in the possession of a portion of land near that town (xxxvii. 12),⁴ gave his enemies the opportunity of seizing him and putting him in prison as a deserter (v. 13-16). There he was visited by Zedekiah, and after "many days" set at liberty, and given a daily supply of food (v. 21). Although still declaring the speedy overthrow of Jerusalem, he also foretold plainly its restoration (xxiii. 15; xxxiii. 11, 15-18), and gave practical proof of his belief that brighter days were in store for his countrymen.⁵ But the captains, unmoved by these distant prospects, cast the Prophet into a dirty cistern, to be presently rescued by Ebed-melech, an Ethiopian eunuch (v. 7-13), whose foreign birth kept him clear of all temptation to hostile feelings. Another interview followed, first with the feeble-minded king (xxxviii. 14), and then with Pashur (son of Melchiah, to be distinguished from the son of Immer of xx. 1), and Zephaniah (xxi. 1 sq.), sent by the king to ask for a further declaration of the future. To this date belong the utterances of mingled warnings and hope contained in chs. xxi.-xxiv.

At length in the eleventh year of Zedekiah (B.C. 586) the city was sacked, the Temple burnt, and the king and his attendants taken prisoners while in the act of flight (xxxix.: cp. liii.; 2 K. xxv.). At Riblah (xxxix. 5; cp. xxxii. 4 and xxxiv. 3) Zedekiah's sons are slain in his presence, and, his eyes being then put out (xxxix. 6, 7; cp. Ezek. xii. 13), he is brought to Babylon and immured in a dismal dungeon, apparently till his death.^r As for Jeremiah, he was rescued from the court of the guard (A. V. "prison"), taken in chains with the other captives to Ramah, and offered his choice of remaining under Gedaliah, the new governor, or living in an honourable captivity at Babylon. The Prophet adopted the former course, as we should expect, inasmuch as Gedaliah was son of Ahikam and grandson of Shaphan, the friend of Hilkiah the high-priest (xl. 5; cp. xxxvi. 10; 2 K. xxii. 12). But within two months^s Gedaliah was murdered by Ishmael, a prince of the blood royal.

From Tahpanhes, a town near the E. border of Lower Egypt, whither he had evidently been carried by his fellow-countrymen, we draw the last certain notice which we possess of his life (between B.C. 585 and 572). He declares that Nebuchadnezzar's throne shall be set up at the entry of Pharaoh's house (xliii. 9, 10),^t and makes a dying protest (xliv.) against the idolatrous moon-worship practised by his countrymen. We have no notice in the Scriptures of his death.^u

(iv.) Arrangement of the Contents. The prophecies of Jeremiah cover a period of at least some thirty years, and, in the shape in which they have come down to us, in the main approximate to a chronological order, but with some very marked exceptions, where the grouping of prophecies of various dates may be accounted for by resemblances in subject-matter or other considerations. Prophecies uttered in the reign of Zedekiah occur in the midst of those relating to Jehoiakim. The Jewish captives carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar are addressed in words of comfort several chapters earlier than the mention of the announcement made to Jehoiakim that that exportation is imminent, while most, if not all, of the prophecies concerning foreign nations (xvi.-li.) were delivered before the final overthrow of the city and kingdom.

The following is an approximation to a chronological arrangement of the contents of the Book^v :—

Such being the arrangement of the contents, we are supplied by xxxvi. 2, 32 with a clue to the explanation, and shown the nucleus of the present Book, although, as we see from the above Table, i.-xxxvi. cannot have been wholly contained in the roll. It is probable that at some earlier period than that treated of in xxxvi., Jeremiah had written the substance of one or more discourses, which would no doubt be incorporated by him with what was new in the roll.^w Again, by the close of Zedekiah's reign, much fresh matter was ready to be introduced into the Book. The circumstances of the times might well prevent it from being inserted in chronological order. The duty of compiling and issuing the prophecies fell, we may conjecture, to Baruch, and so we have certain portions of Jeremiah's later prophecies (xiii., xxi., &c.) inserted in the earlier roll. Thus the very lack of order, so far as it exists, serves a valuable end, as making it at least probable that we possess the Prophet's words, not as modelled and fitted to men's notions by a subsequent generation, but as they fell from the inspired lips themselves, and as put together in the same troublous days in which they were spoken.

B. Character.—Jeremiah may well be considered as the most interesting of the Prophets, because, unlike the others, he opens to us the inmost recesses of his mind.^x The various qualities which made up the man are quickly and easily gathered from his own lips. His office was to utter and reiterate warnings, though all the time sensible that the sentence of condemnation was passed and intercession of no avail (vii. 16; xiv. 11, 12; xv. 1). His work was not to persuade, but rather to testify. And yet he was by nature of a shy and timid disposition; and, further, he seems, at one time at least, to have asked himself, had he the credentials granted to his predecessors and marking a true Prophet? No miracle was wrought to attest his words. No prediction of his was fulfilled with speed. Such is the bitterness of his sufferings that he resolves to keep silence, and yet he cannot (xx. 8, 9). He has been likened (a) to Cassandra, whose predictions, though always true, failed to gain credence; (b) to Phocion and to Demosthenes, who maintained that, if Athens were to escape worse evils, she must submit to the growing power of Macedon; (c) to Dante, inasmuch as Florence was in relation to France and the Empire as Palestine to Egypt and Babylon, while the poet, like the Prophet, could only protest without effect; (d) to Milton and (e) to Savonarola.* Yet throughout all he heartily loved his people (viii. 21, 22; cp. 2 Macc. xv. 14), even extending this affection to the northern kingdom a century after their exile (iii. 11).^d

His style corresponds closely with what we should expect from his nature and position. It displays (a) absence of ornament; (b) frequent repetition; (c) numerous parallels in thought and phraseology with prophetic and other Books, especially with Deuteronomy; (d) frequent use of images by way of illustration, including sometimes a peculiar way of mingling the image and the thing signified; (e) onomatopoeia and play on words; (f) insertion of a bright thought among gloomy ones.

The following passages of Jeremiah either are quoted in the N. T. (distinguishing by italics), or contain germs of N. T. thoughts:—iv. 3, Matt. xiii. 7 sq.; vii. 11, Matt. xxi. 13 (cp. Luke xix. 46); viii. 8, Matt. xxiii. 3 sq.; viii. 13, Luke xiii. 6-9 (cp. Matt. xxi. 19); ix. 4, Matt. x. 36; ix. 20, Luke xxiii. 27, 28; i. 24, 1 Cor. i. 31, 2 Cor. x. 17; ix. 25, 26, Rom. ii. 25-29; xi. 20, Rev. ii. 23; xiii. 6, Matt. xiii. 57 (cp. Luke iv. 24, John iv. 44); xiii. 16, John xi. 10, xii. 35; xiv. 8, Acts xxviii. 20; xvii. 16 (possibly, though with change in application of the figure), Matt. iv. 19; xvii. 13, John viii. 6; xxv. 10, Rev. xviii. 22, 23; xxxi. 15, Matt. ii. 18; xxxi. 31-34, Heb. viii. 8-12 (cp. Matt. xxvi. 28; John vi. 45, 1 Cor. xi. 25, 2 Cor. iii. 3-6); i. 8, li. 6, 45, Rev. xviii. 4; li. 7, Rev. xiv. 8, xvii. 4, 5; li. 25, Rev. viii. 8.^e

In our Lord's time one of the phases which Messianic hope had assumed was the belief that Jeremiah's work on earth was not yet done, and Deut. xviii. 18 seems to have been thought to refer to him. See Matt. xvi. 14, and cp. John i. 21, vi. 14, vii. 40.

Jeremiah's attitude to the Ceremonial Law and the Sabbath.—His unvarying theme is that in God's sight the Moral always takes precedence of the Ceremonial Law.^b This he applies to the people's reverence for the Ark (iii. 16) and the Tables of the Law (xxi. 31 sq.; cp. xxiii. 40), to circumcision (iv. 4, vi. 10, ix. 26), to the Temple (vii. 4, 10 sq.; xi. 15; xvii. 3; xxvi. 6, 9, 12; xxvii. 16), to sacrifices (vi. 20, vii. 21 sq., xi. 15, xiv. 12). His language in reference to these last in vii. 21, 22 has been thought by some (e.g. Graf, Kuenen) inconsistent with the traditional date of their institution. But (i.) regularly instituted sacrifices are expressly mentioned, xxiii. 18 (vs. 14-26 of this ch. are however omitted in LXX.), as well as referred to in the passages quoted above and in xvii. 26, xxxi. 14, xxxiii. 11; (ii.) Hosea (iv. 8, vi. 6, viii. 11-13) and Amos (iv. 4, 5; v. 21-25) and Micah (vi. 6), all Prophets prior in date to Jeremiah, testify the same; (iii.) the frequent censure of sacrifice, when offered as a perfunctory task, shows that an institution, on the efficacy of which men placed such reliance, was a powerful one; (iv.) the discovery of the "book of the law" (whatever portion of the "Books of Moses" it may have included) some, probably many, years before this prophecy, together with the feeling which it produced, is opposed to such a supposition. The passage is therefore, like vi. 20 a, an exaggeration for the sake of rhetorical effect. Jeremiah's phraseology¹ seems to make it clear that he had in his mind the promulgation of the Decalogue. There we find no direction concerning sacrifice, and, moreover, it was the only body of precepts which was treasured in the Ark, and thus from the first received the place of honour. Cp. further for the thought of this passage, 1 Sam. xv. 22; Ps. xl. 6 sq., l. 8-15, li. 18, 19; Prov. xxi. 27; Is. lviii. 3 sq., lxvi. 3.

Other references in Jeremiah to the enactments of the Law are: xvi. 6 (see also vi. 29, xli. 5), cp. Lev. xix. 28, xxi. 5, Deut. xiv. 1; xxxii. 7, cp. Lev. xxv. 24, 25; xxxiv. 8, cp. Ex. xxi. 2, Lev. xxv. 39-55, Deut. xv. 12. To these may be added xxvii. 18, 9, cp. Gen. xv. 10.

We may further note that in many of the passages where the Law is mentioned, the Prophet is more or less certainly describing the oral teaching given by priests (Deut. xvii. 11) and prophets to those who consulted them on points of ritual or practice.² See for this sense ii. 8, ix. 13, xviii. 18, xxvi. 4, 5.

The Messianic passages.—The most striking illustration of the Prophet's tendency (remarked on above) to insert a bright thought among gloomy ones, is undoubtedly to be found in the fact that at the most terrible period of his country's fortunes his Messianic hopes are clearest in their expression. Those hopes are gathered round (a) the Davidic house, (b) Jerusalem.¹

"In those days" (iii. 16, v. 18, xxxiii. 16, l. 20) was the ordinary phrase for the times of the Messiah. Cp. "the days come" in xxiii. 5 sq.

The chief Messianic passages are deserving of close study, as indicating the gradually increasing clearness of the hope. They are as follows: (i.) xvii. 25, 26; (ii.) xxiii. 5-8^m; (iii.) xxx. 9;

^h Laxity, however, in Sabbath observance (cp. Ezek. xx. 12-24, Neh. xiii. 15-22) is sharply rebuked in xvii. 19-27.

(iv.) xxx. 21, (v.) xxxiii. 14-18 (not however in LXX.). A passage inadmissible to this list is xxxi. 31-44 (so, too, xxxi. 22), except in so far as its thought attains completion only in the incarnation of the Divine Son.^a

Jeremiah viewed as a type of Christ.—St. Jerome (on Jer. xxiii. 9) says that this Prophet prefigured Christ (i.) as leading a single life, (ii.) as a Prophet, (iii.) as sanctified from the womb, (iv.) in his name, the Lord's exalted one. To state the parallel further in the words of a modern writer:—"In both there is the same early manifestation of the consciousness of a Divine mission (Luke ii. 49) . . . His protests against the priests and prophets are the forerunners of the woes against the scribes and Pharisees (Matt. xxiii.). His lamentations over the coming miseries of his country answer to the tears that were shed over the Holy City by the Son of Man. His sufferings come nearest, of those of the whole army of martyrs, to those of the Teacher, against Whom princes and priests and elders and people were gathered together. He saw more clearly than others that New Covenant, with all its spiritual gifts of life and power, which was proclaimed and ratified in the death upon the Cross."^b

[A. W. S.]

JEREMI'AH. Seven other persons bearing the same name as the Prophet are mentioned in the O. T.

1. ('Isepielas; Jeremias.) Jeremiah of Libnah, father of Hamutal, wife of Josiah (2 K. xxiii. 31).

2, 3, 4. The Greek MSS. vary much in the spelling of the name (see Swete in loco). Three warriors—two of the tribe of Gad—in David's army (1 Ch. xii. 4, 10, 13).

5. (B. 'Isepiela.) One of the "mighty men of valour" of the trans-Jordanic half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Ch. v. 24).

6. (BA. 'Isepiud; in xii. 34, A. 'Isepielas.) A priest of high rank, head of the second or third of the twenty-one courses which are apparently enumerated in Neh. x. 2-8. He is mentioned again, i.e. the course which was called after him is, in Neh. xii. 1; and we are told at v. 12 that the personal name of the head of this course in the days of Joiakim was HANANIAH. This course, or its chief, took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 34).

7. ('Isepeulv.) The father of Jazaniah the Rechabite (Jer. xxxv. 3).

JEREMI'AS ('Isepielas, in Ecclus. A. 'Isepielas; Jeremias, Hieremias). 1. The Greek form of the name of Jeremiah the Prophet, used in the E. V. of Ecclus. xlix. 6; 2 Macc. xv. 15; Matt. xvi. 14 (R. V. Jeremiah). [JEREMIAH; JEREMY.]

2. 1 Esd. ix. 34. [JEREMAI.]

JEREMOTH (חִימֹת = heights). 1. (B. 'Iapeimoth, A. 'Iapimoth; Jerimoth). A Benjaminite chief, a son of the house of Beriah of Elpaal, according to an obscure genealogy of the age of Hezekiah (1 Ch. viii. 14; cp. vs. 12 and 18). His family dwelt at Jerusalem, as distinguished from the other division of the tribe, located at Gibeon (v. 28).

2. (B. 'Apeimoth, A. 'Iapimoth; Jerimoth). A Merarite Levite, son of Mushi (1 Ch. xxiii. 23) and in xxiv. 30 called Jerimoth [JERIMOTH (4)].

3. (B. 'Isepiemoth, 'Epeimoth; A. 'Isepiemoth, 'Isepiemoth; Jerimoth). Son of Heman; head of the 15th of the twenty-four courses of musicians in the Divine service (1 Ch. xxv. 22). In v. 4 the name is Jerimoth [JERIMOTH (5)].

4. (B. 'Iapeimoth, A. 'Isepiemoth, N. 'Iapimoth; Jerimoth). One of the sons of Elam, and, 5. (B. 'Amón, A. 'Iapimoth, N. 'Amón; Jerimoth), one of the sons of Zattu, who had taken strange wives; but put them away, and offered each a ram for a trespass offering, at the persuasion of Ezra (Ezra x. 26, 27). In 1 Esd. ix. 27, 28 the names are respectively HIEREMOTH and JARIMOTH.

6. (B. Mymón, N. Mymón, A. 'Pnymoth; Ramoth). The name which appears in the same list (Ezra x.) as "and RAMOTH" (v. 29)—following the correction of the Qeri—is in the original text

Jeremoth, in which form also it stands in 1 Esd. ix. 30, Ἰερεμῶθ, A. V. HIEREMOTH. [A. C. H.]

JEREMY (Ἰερεμίας; in 2 Macc. ii. 7, A. Ἰερεμίας; Jeremias, Hieremias), the Prophet Jeremiah (1 Esd. i. 28, 32, 47, 57, ii. 1; 2 Esd. ii. 18; 2 Macc. ii. 1, 5, 7; Matt. ii. 17, xxvii. 9, R. V. Jeremiah). [JEREMIAH; JEREMIAS.] These abbreviated forms were much in favour about the time that the A. V. was translated. Elsewhere we find ESAY for Isaiah; and in the Homilies such abbreviations as Zachary, Toby, &c., are frequent.

JEREMY, EPISTLE OF. [BARUCH, THE BOOK OF.]

JER'IAH (יהריהו, i.e. Yeri-yahu, (?)=foundation of Jehovah: B. Ἰδούθ, Ἰηρειαμῶς; A. Ἰερῖα, Ἰερῖου: Jeriau), a Kohathite Levite, chief of the great house of Hebron when David organised the service (1 Ch. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23: in the latter passage the name of Hebron has been omitted both in the Hebrew and LXX.). The same man is mentioned again, though with a slight difference in his name, as JERIAH.

JERIBAI (יריבאי, if=יריבא=Jehovah defends; יריבא, B. Ἰαριβελ, A. Ἰαριβατ; Jeribai), one of the Bene-Elnaam, named among the heroes of David's guard in the supplemental list of 1 Ch. (xi. 46).

JER'ICHO (יריחו, Jrecho, Num. xxii. 1; also יריחו, Jricho, Josh. ii. 1, 2, 3; and יריחו, Jrichoh, 1 K. xvi. 34; יריח, *Erihā; "place of fragrance," from ריח, Ruach, "to breathe," ריח, "to smell;" older commentators derive it from ריח, Jareach, "the moon"; also from ריח, Ravach, "to be broad," as in a wide plain: Ἰεριχώ; B. Ἰεριχώ, exc. Ezra ii. 34, Ἰεριά; A. Ἰεριχώ, in 1 Ch. vi. 78, Ezra ii. 34, Neh. iii. 2, vii. 38; Josephus, Ἰεριχούς; Strabo, Ἰεριχούς: Jericho), a city of high antiquity and, for those days, of considerable importance, situated near the foot of the mountains, in the valley of the Jordan, and exactly over against the point at which that river was crossed by the Israelites under Joshua (Josh. iii. 16, xxiv. 11). Such was either its vicinity, or the extent of its territory, that Gilgal, which formed their primary encampment, stood in its east border (iv. 19). That it had a king is a very secondary consideration, for almost every small town had one (xii. 9-24); in fact monarchy was the only form of government known to those primitive times—the government of the people of God presenting a marked exception to prevailing usage. But Jericho was further enclosed by walls—a fenced city; its walls were so considerable that at least one person (Rahab) had a house upon them (ii. 15), and its gates were shut, as throughout the East still, "when it was dark" (v. 5). Again, the spoil that was found in it betokened its affluence—Ai, Makkedah, Libnah, Lachish, Eglon, Hebron, Debir, and even Hazor, evidently contained nothing worth mentioning in comparison: besides sheep, oxen, and asses, we hear of vessels of brass and iron. These possibly may have been the first-fruits of those brass foundries "in the plain of Jordan" of which Solomon afterwards so largely availed himself (2 Ch. iv. 17). Silver and gold were found in such abundance that one man (Achan) could appropriate stealthily 200 shekels (100 oz. avoird.: see Lewis, Heb. Rep. vi. 57) of the former, and "a wedge of gold of 50 shekels (25 oz.) weight." "A goodly Babylonish garment," purloined in the same dishonesty, may be adduced as evidence of a then existing commerce between Jericho and the far East (Josh. vi. 24, vii. 21). In fact, its situation alone—at the edge of a fertile plain, and close to an abundant supply of water—would bespeak its importance in a country where these natural advantages have been always so highly prized, and in an age when people depended so much more upon the indigenous resources of nature than they are compelled to do now. It was also close to the entrance to the important passes leading up through the hills to Jerusalem and Bethel. But for the curse of Joshua (vi. 26) doubtless Jericho might have proved a more formidable counter-charm to the city of David than even Samaria.

Jericho is first mentioned in the formula "in the plains of Moab by the Jordan at Jericho" (Num. xxii. 1, xxvi. 3, 63, xxxi. 12, xxxiii. 48, 50, xxxv. 1, xxxvi. 13; Josh. xiii. 32, cp. xx. 8; 1 Ch. vi. 78); it was on the opposite side of the Jordan to the inheritance of the two and a half tribes (xxxiv. 15), over against Mount Nebo (Deut. xxxii. 49; xxxiv. 1), and was seen by Moses from the top of Pisgah (xxxiv. 3). Joshua sent two spies to the city from Shittim: they were lodged in the house of Rahab the harlot upon the wall, and departed, having first promised to save her and all that were found in her house from destruction (ii. 1-21). In the annihilation of the city that ensued this promise was religiously observed. Her house was recognised by the scarlet line bound in the window from which the spies were let down, and she and her relatives were taken out of it, and "lodged without the camp" (v., vi.); but it is nowhere said or implied that her house escaped the general conflagration. That she "dwelt in Israel" for the future; that she married Salmon, son of Naasson, "prince of the children of Judah," and had by him Boaz, the husband of Ruth and progenitor of David and of our Lord; and lastly, that she is the first and only Gentile name that appears in the list of the faithful of the O. T. given by St. Paul (Josh. vi. 25; 1 Ch. ii. 10; Matt. i. 5; Heb. xi. 31), all these facts surely indicate that she did not continue to inhabit the accursed site: and, if so, and in absence of all direct evidence from Scripture, how could it ever have been inferred that her house was left standing? From Jericho, after its capture, spies were sent to Ai (Josh. vii. 2), which was to be destroyed as that city had been (viii. 2). The fall of those two places produced a profound impression upon the princes of the country (ix. 3; x. 1), of whom several were to share the fate of the king of Jericho (x. 28, 30).

* Erihā comes from the Hebrew by weakening of the first letter, as in the case of Zerin from Jezreel, and Sesimeh from Jesimoth.

† In which case it would probably be a remnant of the old Canaanitish worship of the heavenly bodies, which has left its traces in such names as Cheil, Bethabemesh, and others (see IDOLATRY, p. 1433), which may have been the head-quarters of the worship indicated in the names they bear.

Jericho is mentioned in connexion with the boundary of the children of Joseph (Josh. xvi. 1, 7) and of Benjamin, to which tribe it was allotted by Joshua (xviii. 12, 21). From this time a long interval elapses before it appears again upon the scene. It is only incidentally mentioned in the life of David in connexion with his embassy to the Ammonite king (2 Sam. x. 5; 1 Ch. xix. 5). And the solemn manner in which its second foundation under Hiel the Bethelite is recorded—upon whom the curse of Joshua is said to have descended in full force (1 K. xvi. 34)—would certainly seem to imply that up to that time its site had been uninhabited. It is true that mention is made of “a city of palm-trees” (Judg. i. 16 and iii. 13) in existence apparently at the time when spoken of; and that Jericho is twice—once before its first overthrow, and once after its second foundation—designated by that name (see Deut. xxiv. 3, and 2 Ch. xxviii. 15). But the city mentioned in the Book of Judges was probably not built on the site of the town destroyed by Joshua. However, once actually rebuilt, Jericho rose again slowly into consequence. In its immediate vicinity the sons of the prophets sought retirement from the world; Elisha “healed the spring of the waters;” and over and against it, beyond Jordan, Elijah “went up by a whirlwind into heaven” (2 K. ii. 1–22). In its plains Zedekiah fell into the hands of the Chaldeans (2 K. xxv. 5; Jer. xxxix. 5, lii. 8). By what may be called a retrospective account of it, we may infer that Hiel’s restoration had not utterly failed; for in the return under Zerubbabel the “children of Jericho,” 345 in number, are comprised (Ezra ii. 34; Neh. vii. 36); and it is even implied that they removed thither again, for the men of Jericho assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding that part of the wall of Jerusalem that was next to the sheep-gate (Neh. iii. 2). Jericho was one of the places to which messengers were sent by the Jews of Judaea on the approach of Holofernes (Judith iv. 4); and its fort was repaired by Bacchides after his fight with Jonathan Maccabaeus on the banks of the Jordan (1 Macc. ix. 50). It was whilst visiting Jericho that Simon Maccabaeus was treacherously murdered at Docus (1 Macc. xvi. 11, 14). We now enter upon its more modern phase. The Jericho of the days of Josephus was distant 150 stadia from Jerusalem, and 50 from the Jordan. It lay in a plain, overhung by a barren mountain whose roots ran northwards towards Scythopolis, and southwards in the direction of Sodom and the Dead Sea. These formed the western boundaries of the plain. Eastwards, its barriers were the mountains of Moab, which ran parallel to the former. In the midst of the plain—the great plain, as it was called—flowed the Jordan, and at the top and bottom of it were two lakes: Tiberias, proverbial for its sweetness, and Asphaltites for its bitterness. Away from the Jordan it was parched and unhealthy during summer; but during winter, even when it snowed at Jerusalem, the inhabitants here wore linen garments. Hard by Jericho—bursting forth close to the site of the old city, which Joshua took on his entrance into Canaan—was a most exuberant fountain, whose waters, before noted for their contrary properties, had received, proceeds Josephus, through Elisha’s prayers, their then wonderfully salutary and prolific efficacy. Within its range—70 stadia (Strabo says 100) by 20—the fertility of the soil was unexampled; palms of various names and properties, some that produced honey scarce inferior to that of the neighbourhood—opobalsamum, the choicest of indigenous fruits—cyprus (Ar. el-henna) and myrobalanum (sakkâm) thrrove there beautifully, and were thickly dotted about in pleasure-grounds (B. J. iv. 8, §§ 2, 3). Wisdom herself did not disdain comparison with “the rose-plants of Jericho” (Ecclus. xxiv. 14). Well might Strabo (Geogr. xvi. 2, § 41, ed. Müller) conclude that its revenues were considerable. By the Romans Jericho was first visited under Pompey: he encamped there for a single night, and subsequently destroyed two forts, Threx and Taurus, that commanded its approaches (Strabo, ibid. § 40). Gabinius, in his re-settlement of Judaea, made it one of the five seats of assembly (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 5, § 4; B. J. i. 8, § 5). With Herod the Great it rose to still greater prominence; it had been found full of treasure of all kinds, as in the time of Joshua, so by Herod’s Roman allies who sacked it (ibid. i. 15, § 6); and its revenues were eagerly sought, and rented by the wily tyrant from Cleopatra, to whom Antony had assigned them (Ant. xv. 4, § 2). Not long afterwards he built a fort there, which he called “Cypros” in honour of his mother (ibid. xvi. 5, § 2; B. J. i. 21, § 9); several palaces, some of which he named after his friends (B. J. i. 21, § 4), and perhaps also an amphitheatre (Ant. xvii. 6, § 5), and other public buildings. There were also reservoirs for water, in one of which he caused Aristobulus to be drowned (Ant. xv. 3, § 3). If he did not make Jericho his habitual residence, he at least retired to it to die—and to be mourned, if he could have got his plain carried out—and it was in the amphitheatre of Jericho that the news of his death was announced to the assembled soldiers and people by Salome (B. J. i. 33, § 8). Soon afterwards the palace was burnt, and the town plundered by one Simon, a revolutionary who had been slave to Herod (Ant. xvii. 10, § 6); but Archelaus rebuilt the former sumptuously—founded a new town in the plain, that bore his own name—and, most important of all, diverted water from a village called Neaera, to irrigate the plain which he had planted with palms (Ant. xvii. 13, § 1). Thus Jericho was once more “a city of palms” when our Lord visited it; such as Herod the Great and Archelaus had left it, such He saw it. As the city that had so exceptionally contributed to His own ancestry—as the city which had been the first to fall, amidst so much ceremony, before “the captain of the Lord’s host, and His servant Joshua”—we may well suppose that His eyes surveyed it with unwonted interest. It is supposed to have been on the rocky heights overhanging it (hence called by tradition the Quarantana) that He was assailed by the Tempter; and over against it, according to tradition likewise, He had been previously baptized in the Jordan. Here He restored sight to the blind (two certainly, perhaps three, St. Matt. xx. 30; St. Mark x. 46: this was on leaving Jericho. St. Luke says, “As He was come nigh unto Jericho,” &c., xviii. 35). Here the descendant of Rahab did not disdain the hospitality of Zacchaeus the publican—an office which was likely to be lucrative enough in so rich a city. Finally, between Jerusalem and Jericho was laid the scene of His story of the good Samaritan, which, if it is not to be regarded as a real occurrence throughout, at least derives interest from the fact, that robbers have ever been the terror of that precipitous road; and so formidable had they proved only just before the Christian era, that Pompey had been induced to undertake the destruction of their strongholds (Strabo, as before, xvi. 2, § 40; cp. Joseph. Ant. xx. 6, § 1 et seq.). Dagon, or Docus (1 Macc. xvi. 15; cp. ix. 50), where Ptolemy assassinated his father-in-law, Simon the Maccabee, may have been one of these.

Posterior to the Gospels the chronicle of Jericho may be briefly told. After their victory over Cestius, the Jews appointed Joseph son of Simon governor of Jericho (B. J. ii. 20, § 4). Vespasian found it one of the toparchies of Judæa (B. J. iii. 3, § 5), but deserted by its inhabitants in a great measure when he encamped there (ib. iv. 8, § 2). He left a garrison on his departure—not necessarily the 10th Legion, which is only stated to have marched through Jericho—which was still there when Titus advanced upon Jerusalem. Is it asked how Jericho was destroyed? Evidently by Vespasian; for Josephus, rightly understood, is not so silent as Dr. Robinson (Bibl. Res. i. 566, 2nd ed.) thinks. The city pillaged and burnt in B. J. iv. 9, § 1, was clearly Jericho with its adjacent villages, and not Gerasa, as may be seen at once by comparing the language there with that of c. 8, § 2, and the agent was Vespasian. Eusebius and St. Jerome (OS. p. 267, 10; p. 163, 31) say that it was destroyed when Jerusalem was besieged by the Romans. They further add that it was afterwards rebuilt—they do not say by whom—and still existed in their day; nor had the ruins of the two preceding cities been obliterated. Could Hadrian possibly have planted a colony there when he passed through Judæa and founded Aelia? (Dio Cass. Hist. lix. c. 11, ed. Sturz; more at large Chron. Paschal. 254, ed. Du Fresne). The discovery which Origen made there of a version of the O. T. (the 5th in his Hexapla), together with sundry MSS., Greek and Hebrew, suggests that it could not have been wholly without inhabitants (Euseb. E. H. vi. 16; S. Epiph. Lib. de Pond. et Mensur. circa med.); or again, as is perhaps more probable, did a Christian settlement arise there under Constantine, when Baptisms in the Jordan began to be common? That Jericho became an episcopal see about that time under Jerusalem appears from more than one ancient Notitia (Geograph. S. a Carolo Paulo, 306, and the Parergon appended to it; cp. William of Tyre, Hist. lib. xxiii. ad f.). Its Bishops subscribed to various councils in the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries (ibid. and Le Quien's Oriens Christian. iii. 654). Justinian, we are told, restored a hospice there, and likewise a church dedicated to the Virgin (Procop. De Aedif. v. 9). As early as A.D. 333, when the Bordeaux Pilgrim (ed. Wesseling) visited it, a house existed above the fountain at Old Jericho which was pointed out, after the manner of those days, as the house of Rahab. This was roofless when Arculfus saw it; and not only so, but the third city was likewise in ruins, and the site was planted with corn and vines (ii. § 12).^{*} Had Jericho been visited by an earthquake, as Antoninus reports (xiii. xiv.), and as Syria certainly was, in the 27th year of Justinian, A.D. 553? If so, we can well understand the restorations already referred to; and when Antoninus adds that the house of Rahab had now become a hospice and oratory, we might almost pronounce that this was the very hospice which had been restored by that emperor (cp. Theodosius, § 16). Again, it may be asked, did Christian Jericho receive no injury from the Persian Romizan, the ferocious general of Chosroes II. A.D. 614? (Bar-Hebraei Chron. 99, Lat. v. ed. Kirsch). It would rather seem that there were more religious edifices in the 7th than in the 6th century round about it. According to Arculfus, one church marked the site of Gilgal; another the spot where our Lord was supposed to have deposited His garments previously to His Baptism; a third within the precincts of a vast monastery dedicated to St. John, situated upon some rising ground overlooking the Jordan (Arculfus, ii. §§ 12-14; cp. Antoninus, xi.-xv., and App. to Eng. ed. pub. by the P. P. Text Soc.). Under the Muslims Jericho became a place of some importance. Ya'k'abi (891 A.D.) calls it the capital of the Ghor, or Jordan Valley. Mukaddasi (985 A.D.) identifies it with the "City of the Giants," mentioned in the Kur'ân. Excellent indigo was grown there; bananas, date palms, and flowers of fragrant odour were plentiful; snakes, scorpions, and fleas abounded; and the serpent whose flesh was used in the preparation of the celebrated antidote for venomous bites (Theriack) was common. The heat was excessive, and the people, spoken of by Arculfus as "diminutive men of the race of Canaan," were brown-skinned and swarthy. Yâkût (1225 A.D.) alludes to the number of palm-trees, and adds that sugar-cane was largely grown, and that the best sugar in the Ghor was made there (Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, pp. 396, 397). The beauty of the gardens and the palms are also mentioned in 1294 A.D. by Riccoldus de Monte Crucis.

Jericho does not seem to have been ever restored as a town by the Crusaders; it is called by the Abbot Daniel (1106-7 A.D.) "only a Saracen village, in which was the house of Zacchæus," probably the "square tower or castle" first distinctly mentioned by Willibrord in 1211 A.D. Its plains, however, had not ceased to be prolific, and were extensively cultivated and laid out in vineyards and gardens by the monks (Phocas ap. Leon. Allat. Συμμετ. c. 20, p. 31). They seem to have been included in the domains of the patriarchate of Jerusalem, and as such were bestowed by Arnulf upon his niece as a dowry (Wm. of Tyre, Hist. xi. 15). Twenty-five years afterwards we find Melisendis, wife of king Fulco, assigning them to the convent of Bethany, which she had founded A.D. 1137. After the fall of the Latin kingdom, Jericho is described as a "vile place" (Brocardus, A.D. 1230), and as a "poor nasty village" (Maundrell, A.D. 1697), and such it has since remained.

The site of ancient (the first) Jericho is at Tell es-Sultân, not quite 1½ m. north of the mouth of Wâdy Kelt. The mound is from 20 ft. to 30 ft. high, and at its foot well up the waters of Ain es-Sultân, Elisha's fountain. The mound, according to Sir C. Warren, is formed, for the most part, of a light yellow clay, which, on being touched, crumbles into an impalpable powder; there were large quantities of pottery, and "two layers of bituminous stuff ½ to 2 in. thick." The fountain runs out into a shallow reservoir, and then flows away in numberless channels to irrigate the plain to the east. North of the mound are many traces of ruins, some of which show that the place was occupied in early Christian times; and to the E. and S.E. there are extensive ruins on the way to Eriha, which is 1½ m. distant. Behind Tell es-Sultán rises Jebel Kuruntul, the "Mons Quarantana," or "Mount of Temptation,"—a precipitous cliff, 1000 ft. high, which is honeycombed with the cells and chapels of early and mediæval anchorites. The second or Roman Jericho (the city of the N. T. and of Josephus) was at the foot of the hills close to the mouth of W. Kelt (see Itin. Hierosol.). There are here mounds and a large reservoir, but the palaces and other buildings of Herod, having apparently been constructed of soft friable stone, have completely disappeared. The mounds were excavated by Sir C. Warren, but nothing of importance was discovered. The third or mediæval Jericho, now Eriha, is 1½ m. east of the last, and lies on the N. bank of W. Kelt. It is a miserable mud hamlet, with a few black tents pitched among the houses, which are surrounded by hedges of the thorny nebk. The inhabitants are a mixed and very degraded race, and have not sufficient energy to cultivate their own lands. Here is the square tower, known as the "House of Zacchæus," and in its vicinity was at one time shown the tree into which he had climbed (Luke xix. 1–10). 1½ m. eastward of Eriha is Birket Siljulich, marking the site of Gilgal. The plain of Jericho was formerly irrigated by an elaborate system of conduits and aqueducts. The water was derived from six large springs, and there were twelve separate aqueducts, of which some are late Roman or Byzantine, and others are either in whole or in part the work of Crusaders or Saracens. Most of the water now runs to waste, and the site of the celebrated gardens is occupied by a dense jungle, covering an area 1½ miles square. The palm, the opobalsamum, and the sugar-cane have disappeared, but the natural fertility of the soil has not changed. Figs, pomegranates, vines, indigo, cotton, wheat, and barley grow luxuriantly where cultivated: and amongst other shrubs and plants are the Zizyphus spina Christi, the Z. Lotus, the Balanites Aegyptiaca (Zakkâm) from which the false "balm of Gilead" or "oil of Zacchæus" is extracted; the sweet-smelling Acacia Farnesiana, the Acacia vera, the beautiful parasite Loranthus indicus, the Agnus casti, a large flowering bamboo, and the "Apple of Sodom," Solanum Melongena, with its potato blossom, and its bright yellow but poisonous fruit. All these are products of a sub-tropical climate, such as that which prevails in the Jordan Valley, which at Jericho is 800 ft. below the Mediterranean. Several curious native traditions relating to the capture of Jericho by Joshua have been collected by M. Clermont-Ganneau (PEF. Mem. iii. 172, 173, 179, 201, 222 sq.; Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 201 sq.; Guérin, Samarie, i. 33–53, 132–149; Sepp, Jer. u. d. H. Land, i. 720 sq.; Baedeker-Socin, Hbk.). [E. S. F.] [W.]

JERICHO, PLAINS OF. 2 K. xxv. 5; Jer. xxxix. 5, lii. 8. The part of the Jordan Valley extending from the mountains behind Jericho to the Jordan. [JERICHO.]

JERIEL (יְרִיעֵל) = foundation of God; B. Ἰερῖελ, A. Ἰερεήλ; Jeriel), a man of Issachar, one of the six heads of the house of TOLA at the time of the census in the time of David (1 Ch. vii. 2).

JERIJAH (יְרִיָּה) = foundation of Jehovah; B. Ἰουδέλας, A. Ἰαρίας; Jerjá), in 1 Ch. xxvi. 31. The same person as JERIAH.

JERIMOTH (יְרִימוֹת) = heights. 1. (B. Ἀρειμῶθ, A. Ἰεριμῶθ; Jerimoth.) Son or descendant of Bela, according to 1 Ch. vii. 7, and founder of a Benjamite house, which existed in the time of David (v. 2). He is perhaps the same as

2. (B. Ἀρειμῶθ, A. Ἰαριμῶθ, Ἄ. Ἀρμῶθ; Jerimúth), who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch. xii. 5). [BELA.]

3. (יְרִימֹת), i.e. Jeremoth; B. Ἀβρημῶθ, A. Ἰεριμῶθ; Jerimoth.) A son of Becher (1 Ch. vii. 8), and head of another Benjamite house. [BECHER.]

4. (B. Ἀρειμῶθ, A. Ἰεριμῶθ; Jerimoth.) Son of Mushi, the son of Merari, and head of one of the families of the Merarites which were counted in the census of the Levites taken by David (1 Ch. xxiv. 30). [See JEREMOTH, 2.]

5. (B. Ἰερεμῶθ, Ἐρειμῶθ; A. Ἰεριμῶθ, Ἰεριμῶθ; Jerimoth.) Son of Heman, head of the 15th ward of musicians (1 Ch. xxv. 4, 22). In the latter verse he is called Jeremoth. [HEMAN; JEREMOTH (3).]

6. (B. Ἐρειμῶθ, A. Ἰεριμῶθ; Jerimoth.) Son of Azriel, "ruler" (רִיָּץ) of the tribe of Naphtali in the reign of David (1 Ch. xxvii. 19). The same persons, called rulers, are in v. 22 called "princes" (רִיָּצִים) of the tribes of Israel.

7. (B. Ἰεριμῶθ, A. Ἐριμῶθ; Jerimoth.) Son of king David, whose daughter Mahalath was one of the wives of Rehoboam, her cousin Abihail being the other (2 Ch. xi. 18). As Jerimoth is not named in the list of children by David's wives in 1 Ch. iii. or xiv. 4–7, it is fair to infer that he was the son of a concubine, and this in fact is the Jewish tradition (Jerome, Questiones, ad loc.). It is, however, questionable whether Rehoboam would have married the grandchild of a concubine even of the great David. The passage 2 Ch. xi. 18 is not quite clear, since the word "daughter" is a correction of the Keri: "the Keri, LXX., and Vulg. read יָד, i.e. "son."

8. (B. Ἰερεμῶθ, A. Ἰεριμῶθ; Jerimoth.) A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah, one of the overseers of offerings and dedicated things placed in the chambers of the Temple, who were under Cononiah and Shimei the Levites, by command of Hezekiah, and Azariah the high-priest (2 Ch. xxxi. 13). [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JERIOTH (יְרִיעוֹת) = curtains; B. Ἰερίωθ, A. Ἰεριώθ; Jerioth), according to our A. V. and the LXX., one of the elder Caleb's wives (1 Ch. ii. 18); but, according to the Vulgate, she was his daughter by his first wife Azubah. The Hebrew text seems evidently corrupt, and will not make sense; but the probability is that Jerioth was a daughter of Caleb the son of Hezron. (In this case we ought to read יְרִיעוֹת מִן עֲזוּבָה הוּלִידָהּ אֶת אֲזוּבָה.) The Latin Version of Santes Pagninus, which makes Azubah and Jerioth both daughters of Caleb, and the note of Vatablus, which makes Ishah (A. V. "wife") a proper name and a third daughter, are clearly wrong, as it appears from v. 19 that Azubah was Caleb's wife. Cp. Oettli in Strack u. Zöckler's Kgf. Hdbk. in loco. [A. C. H.] [C. H.]

JEROBOAM (יְרוֹבָאָם) = Yarob'am; Ἰεροβόαμ, Joseph. Ἰεροβόαμος; Jeroboam). The name, if taken to mean whose people is many, has nearly the same meaning as REHOBOAM, enlarger of the people. MV.¹¹ prefers pleader for the people. Both names appear for the first time in the reign of Solomon, and were perhaps suggested by the increase of the Jewish people at that time.

1. The first king of the divided kingdom of Israel (Riehm, B.C. 938-917). The ancient authorities for his reign and his wars were "the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel" (1 K. xiv. 19), and "the visions of Iddo the seer against Jeroboam the son of Nebat" (2 Ch. ix. 29). The extant account of his life is given in two versions, very different from each other. The one usually followed is that contained in the Hebrew text, and in one portion of the LXX. The other is given in a separate account inserted by the LXX. at 1 K. xi. 43 and xii. 24. The latter was preferred by Ranke, the historian, to the former, and is—in this article—taken as the basis of the biography of this remarkable man. Modern scholars prefer the Hebrew narrative (cp. Kittel, Gesch. d. Hebräer, ii. 178).

1. He was the son of an Ephraimite of the name of Nebat; * his father had died whilst he was young; but his mother, who had been a person of loose character (LXX. πόρνη, v. 24 b), lived in widowhood, trusting apparently to her son for support. Her name is variously given as ZERUAH (Heb.), or Sarira (LXX. Σαρειρά, v. 24 b), and the place of their abode on the mountains of Ephraim is given either as ZEREDA, or (LXX. Σαρειρά, v. 24 b) as Sarira: in the latter case, indicating that there was some connexion between the wife of Nebat and her residence.

At the time when Solomon was constructing the fortifications of Millo underneath the citadel of Zion, his sagacious eye discovered the strength and activity of a young Ephraimite who was employed on the works, and he raised him to the rank of superintendent over the taxes and labours exacted from the tribe of Ephraim (1 K. xi. 28). This was Jeroboam. He made the most of his position. He completed the fortifications, and was long afterwards known as the man who had "enclosed the city of David" (1 K. xi. 24; LXX. xii. 24 b). He then aspired to royal state. Like Absalom before him, in like circumstances, though now on a grander scale, in proportion to the enlargement of the royal establishment itself, he kept 300 chariots and horses (LXX. xii. 24 b), and at last was perceived by Solomon to be aiming at the monarchy.

These ambitious designs were probably fostered

* According to the old Jewish tradition preserved by Jerome (Quaest. Hebr. 2 Sam. xvi. 10), Nebat, the father of Jeroboam, was identical with Shimei of Gera, who was the first to insult David in his flight, and the "first of all the house of Joseph" to congratulate him on his return.

by the sight of the growing disaffection of the great tribe over which he presided, as well as by the alienation of the Prophetic order from the house of Solomon. According to the version of the story in the Hebrew text (Joseph. Ant. viii. 7, § 7), this alienation was made evident to Jeroboam very early in his career. He was leaving Jerusalem, and he encountered on one of the black-paved roads which ran out of the city, Ahijah, "the prophet" of the ancient sanctuary of Shiloh. Ahijah drew him aside from the road into the field (LXX.), and, as soon as they found themselves alone, the prophet, who was dressed in a new outer garment, stripped it off, and tore it into twelve shreds, ten of which he gave to Jeroboam, with the assurance that on condition of his obedience to His laws, God would establish for him a kingdom and a dynasty equal to that of David (1 K. xi. 29-40).

The attempts of Solomon to cut short Jeroboam's designs occasioned his flight into Egypt. There he remained during the rest of Solomon's reign—in the court of Shishak (LXX. Σουσακίμ, xii. 24 c), or Sheshonq, the founder of a new Egyptian dynasty, and therefore not allied with Solomon, who is here first named in the sacred narrative. On Solomon's death, he demanded Shishak's permission to return. The Egyptian king seems, in his reluctance, to have offered any gift which Jeroboam chose, as a reason for his remaining, and the consequence was the marriage with Anō (Ἀνώ), the elder sister of the Egyptian queen, Tahpenes (LXX. Thekemina, Θεκεμείνα, v. 24 e), and of another princess (LXX.) who had married the Edomite chief, Hadad. A year elapsed, and a son, Abijah (Ἀβιά, v. 24 e) (or Abijam), was born. Then Jeroboam again requested permission to depart, which was granted; and he returned with his wife and child to his native place, Sarira or Zereda, which he fortified, and which in consequence became a centre for his fellow tribesmen (1 K. xi. 41, LXX. xii. 24 f). Still there was no open act of insurrection, and it was in this period of suspense (according to the LXX. xii. 24 g) that a pathetic incident darkened his domestic history. His infant son fell sick. The anxious father sent his wife to inquire of God concerning him. Jerusalem would have been the obvious place to visit for this purpose. But no doubt political reasons forbade. The ancient sanctuary of Shiloh (Σηλὸς) was nearer at hand; and it so happened that a prophet was now residing there, of the highest repute. It was Ahijah (Ἀχιδ, v. 24 h)—the same who, according to the common version of the story, had already been in communication with Jeroboam, but who, according to the authority we are now following, appears for the first time on this occasion. He was sixty years of age—but was prematurely old, and his eyesight had already failed him. He was living, as it would seem, in poverty, with a boy who waited on him, and with his own little children. For him and for them, the wife of Jeroboam brought such gifts as were thought likely to be acceptable; ten loaves, and two rolls (κολλύρια) for the children (LXX. v. 24 h), a bunch of raisins (LXX. σταφυλήν, ἰδ.), and a jar of honey. She had disguised herself, to avoid recognition; and perhaps these humble gifts were part of the plan. But the blind prophet, at her first approach, knew who was coming; and bade his boy go out to meet her, and invite her to his house without delay. There he warned her of the uselessness of her gifts. There was a doom on the house of Jeroboam, not to be averted; those who grew up in it and died in the city would become the prey of the hungry dogs; they who died in the country would be devoured by the vultures. This child alone would die before the calamities of the house arrived: "They shall mourn for the child, Woe, O Lord, for in him there is found a good word regarding the Lord" (LXX. c. 24 m)—or, according to the Hebrew version, "all Israel shall mourn for him, and bury him; for he only of Jeroboam shall come to the grave, because in him there is found some good thing toward Jehovah the God of Israel in the house of Jeroboam" (1 K. xiv. 13). The mother returned. As she re-entered the town of Sarira (Heb. Tirzah, 1 K. xiv. 17), the child died. The loud wail of her attendant damsels greeted her on the threshold (LXX. c. 24 n). The child was buried, as Ahijah had foretold, with all the state of the child of a royal house. "All Israel mourned for him" (1 K. xiv. 18). This incident, if it really occurred at this time, seems to have been the turning point in Jeroboam's career. It drove him from his ancestral home, and it gathered the sympathies of the tribe of Ephraim round him. He left Sarira and came to Shechem (Σικιμα, c. 24 n). The Hebrew text describes that he was sent for. The LXX. speaks of it as his own act. However that may be, he was thus at the head of the northern tribes, when Rehoboam, after he had been on the throne for somewhat more than a year, came up to be inaugurated in that ancient capital. Then (if we may take the account already given of Ahijah's interview as something separate from this), for the second time, and in a like manner, the Divine intimation of his future greatness is conveyed to him. The prophet Shemaiah (Σαμαίας) the Enlomite (?) (δ' Ἐνλαμαί, LXX. c. 24 o) addressed to him the same acted parable, in the ten shreds of a new unwashed garment (LXX.). Then took place the conference with Rehoboam (Jeroboam appearing in it, in the Hebrew text, but not^b in the LXX.), and the final revolt; which ended (expressly in the Hebrew text, in the LXX. by implication) in the elevation of Jeroboam to the throne of the northern kingdom. Shemaiah remained on the spot and deterred Rehoboam from an attack. Jeroboam entered at once on the duties of his new situation, and fortified Shechem as his capital on the west, and Penuel (close by the old Transjordanic capital of Mahanaim) on the east (1 K. xii. 25).

II. Up to this point there had been nothing to disturb the anticipations of the Prophetic Order and of the mass of Israel as to the glory of Jeroboam's future. But from this moment one fatal error crept, not unnaturally, into his policy, which undermined his dynasty and tarnished his name as the first king of Israel.

The political disruption of the kingdom was complete; but its religious unity was as yet unimpaired. He feared that the yearly pilgrimages to Jerusalem would undo all the work which he had effected, and he took the bold step of rending it asunder. Two sanctuaries of venerable antiquity existed already—one at the southern, the other at the northern, extremity of his dominions. These he elevated into seats of the national worship, which should rival the newly established Temple at Jerusalem. As Abderrahman, caliph of Spain, arrested the movement of his subjects to Mecca, by the erection of the holy place of the Zecca at Cordova, so Jeroboam trusted to the erection of his shrines at Dan and Bethel. But he was not satisfied without another deviation from the Mosaic idea of the national unity. His long stay in Egypt had familiarised him with the outward forms under which the Divinity was there represented; and now, for the first time since the Exodus, was an Egyptian element introduced into the national worship of Palestine. A golden figure of Mnevis, the sacred calf of Heliopolis, was set up at each sanctuary, with the address, "Behold thy God ('Elohim'—cp. Neh. ix. 18) which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." The sanctuary of DAN, as the most remote from Jerusalem, was established first (1 K. xii. 30) with priests from the distant tribes, whom he consecrated instead of the Levites (xii. 31; xiii. 33). The more important one, as nearer the capital and in the heart of the kingdom, was BETHEL. The worship and the sanctuary continued till the end of the northern kingdom. The priests were supplied by a peculiar form of consecration—any one from the non-Levitical tribes could procure the office on sacrificing a young bullock and seven rams (1 K. xiii. 33; 2 Ch. xi. 15, xiii. 9). For the dedication of this he copied the precedent of Solomon in choosing the Feast of Tabernacles as the occasion; but postponing it for a month, probably in order to meet the vintage of the most northern parts. On the fifteenth day of this month (the 8th), he went up in state to offer incense on the altar which was before the calf. It was at this solemn and critical moment that a prophet from Judah suddenly appeared, whom Josephus with great probability identifies with Iddo the Seer (he calls him Iadôn, Ἰαδών, Ant. viii. 8, § 5; and see Jerome, Qu. Hebr. on 2 Ch. x. 4), who denounced the altar, and foretold its desecration by Josiah, and violent overthrow. It is not clear from the account whether it is intended that the overthrow took place then or in the earthquake described by Amos (ix. 1). Another sign is described as taking place instantly. The king stretching out his hand to arrest the prophet felt it withered and paralysed, and only at the prophet's prayer saw it restored, and acknowledged his Divine mission (xiii. 6). Josephus adds, but probably in conjecture from the sacred narrative, that the prophet who seduced Iddo on his return, did so in order to prevent his obtaining too much influence over Jeroboam, and endeavoured to explain away the miracles to the king, by representing that the altar fell because it was new, and that his hand was paralysed from the fatigue of sacrificing. A further allusion is made to this incident in

^b This omission is however borne out by the Hebrew text, 1 K. xii. 20, "when all Israel heard that Jeroboam was come again."

^c The cry of revolt, 1 K. xii. 16, is the same as that in 2 Sam. xx. 1.

the narrative of Josephus (Ant. viii. 15, §4), where Zedekiah is represented as contrasting the potency of Iddo in withering the hand of Jeroboam with the powerlessness of Micaiah to wither the hand of Zedekiah. The visit of Anō to Ahijah, which the common Hebrew text (1 K. xiv. 18) places after this event, and with darker intimations in Ahijah's warning only suitable to a later period, has already been described.

Jeroboam was at constant war with the house of Judah, but the only act distinctly recorded is a battle with Abijah, son of Rehoboam; in which—in spite of a skillful ambush made by Jeroboam, and of much superior force—he was defeated, and for the time lost three important cities, Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephraim.⁴ The calamity was severely felt; he never recovered the blow, and soon after died, in the twenty-second year of his reign (2 Ch. xiii. 20), and was buried in his ancestral sepulchre (1 K. xiv. 20). His son Nadab, or (LXX. Ναβδρ) Nebat (named after the grandfather), succeeded, and in him the dynasty was closed. The name of Jeroboam long remained under a cloud as the king who “had caused Israel to sin.” At the time of the Reformation, it was a common practice of Roman Catholic writers to institute comparisons between his separation from the sanctuary of Judah, and that of Henry VIII. from the see of Rome.

[In his Lectures on the Jewish Church (ii. 239, 1883) Dean Stanley analyses the intention of Jeroboam in establishing his rites at Dan and Bethel. He considers that the golden calves were honestly designed as visible representations of the Supreme Deity, with a view to preserving the belief in the unity of God; but that with every desire thus to uphold the sanctity of the First Commandment, he violated the Second, tampering with the spiritual conception of the national worship, and thus accustoming the Israelites to the very sin against which it was his object to provide a safeguard. So likewise Ewald understands (*Hist. Isr.*² iv. 26, 1878). The Speaker's Comm. (Notes on 1 K. xii. 26, 28) gives Jeroboam unqualified blame; and Keil in his comments on this reign (Clark's F. T. L. xxxiii., 185, 186) credits him with the sole design of securing his own throne.—C. H.]

2. JEROBOAM II., the son of his predecessor Joash and the fourth of the dynasty of Jehu. The most prosperous of the kings of Israel. The contemporary accounts of his reign are, (1) in the “Chronicles of the Kings of Israel” (2 K. xiv. 28), which are lost, but of which the substance is given in 2 K. xiv. 23–29; (2) in the contemporary Prophets—Hosea and Amos, and (perhaps) in the fragments found in Is. xv., xvi. It had been foretold in the reign of Jehohaz that a great deliverer should come, to rescue Israel from the Syrian yoke (cp. 2 K. xiii. 4, xiv. 26, 27), and this had been expanded into a distinct prediction of Jonah, that there should be a restoration of the widest dominion of Solomon (xiv. 25). This “saviour” and

“restorer” was Jeroboam. He not only repelled the Syrian invaders, but took their capital city Damascus (2 K. xiv. 28; Amos i. 3–5), and recovered the whole of the ancient dominion from Hamath to the Dead Sea (xiv. 25; Amos vi. 14). Ammon and Moab were reconquered (Amos i. 13, ii. 1–3); the Transjordanic tribes were restored to their territory (2 K. xiii. 5; 1 Ch. v. 17–22).

But it was merely an outward restoration. The sanctuary at Bethel was kept up in royal state (Amos vii. 13), but drunkenness, licentiousness, and oppression prevailed in the country (Amos ii. 6–8, iv. 1, vi. 6; Hos. i. 2, iv. 12–14), and idolatry was united with the worship of Jehovah (Hos. iv. 13, xiii. 6).

Amos prophesied the destruction of Jeroboam and his house by the sword (Amos vii. 9, 17), and Amaziah, the high-priest of Bethel, complained to the king (Amos vii. 10–13). The effect does not appear. Hosea (Hos. i. 1) also denounced the crimes of the nation. The prediction of Amos was not fulfilled as regarded the king himself. He was buried with his ancestors in state (2 K. xiv. 29).

Ewald (*Hist. of Isr.*² iv. 124, note, 1878) supposes that Jeroboam was the subject of Ps. xlv. [A. P. S.]

JERO'HAM (דְּרֹחַם) = beloved; Jeroham. 1.

(B. Ἰερομήα, Ἰδαρά, Ἰαδὰ; A. Ἰεροῦμ, Ἰεροῦμ, Ἰεροβοῦμ.) Father of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, of the house of Kohath. His father is called Eliab at 1 Ch. vi. 27, Eliel at v. 34, and Elihu at 1 Sam. i. 1. Jeroham must have been about the same age as Eli. [A. C. H.]

2. (Ἰροῦμ, B. Ἰραῦμ, A. Ἰεποῦμ.) A Benjamite, and the founder of a family of Bene-Jeroham (1 Ch. viii. 27). They were among the leaders of that part of the tribe which lived in Jerusalem, and which is here distinguished from the part which inhabited Gideon. Probably the same person is intended in

3. (Ἰεποβούμ, B. Ἰραῦμ, A. Ἰεποῦμ.) Father (or progenitor) of Ibneiah, one of the leading Benjamites of Jerusalem (1 Ch. ix. 8; cp. v. 3 and 9).

4. (Ἰραῦμ, A. Ἰεραῦμ; in Neh. B. omits, A. Ἰεποῦμ.) A descendant of Aaron, of the house of Immer, the leader of the sixteenth course of priests; son of Pashur and father of Adaiah (1 Ch. ix. 12). He appears to be mentioned again in Neh. xi. 12 (a record curiously and puzzlingly parallel to that of 1 Ch. ix., though with some striking differences), though there he is stated to belong to the house of Malchiah, who was leader of the fifth course (and cp. Neh. xi. 14).

5. (Ἰροῦμ, B. Ἰραῦμ, A. Ἰεποῦμ.) Jeroham of Gedor (דְּרֹחַם גְּדוֹר), some of whose “sons” joined David when he was taking refuge from Saul at Ziklag (1 Ch. xii. 7). The list purports to be of Benjamites (see v. 2, where the word “even” is interpolated, and the last five words belong to v. 3). But then how can the presence of Korhites (v. 6), the descendants of Korah the Levite, be accounted for?

6. (Ἰροῦβ, BA. Ἰεραῦμ.) A Danite, whose son or descendant Azareel was head of his tribe in the time of David (1 Ch. xxvii. 22).

7. (Ἰεραῦμ.) Father of Azariah, one of the “captains of hundreds” in the time of Athaliah; one of those to whom Jehoiada the priest confided his scheme for the restoration of Joash (2 Ch. xxiii. 1). [G.] [W.]

JERUB'BAAL (יְרֻבְבָאֵל), probably = he that striveth with Baal. Cp. the Phoen. יְרֻבְבָאֵל [M.V. 11]: B. chiefly 'Ιεροβάβαλ, but also once each 'Ιεροβάβαλ, 'Ιαρβάλ, 'Αρβάδα, and in 1 Sam. xii. 11 'Ιεροβοόμ; A. δικαστήριον τοῦ Βαδλ, Judg. vi. 32, 'Ιροβάβαλ in vii. 1: Jerobaal, the surname of Gideon which he acquired in consequence of destroying the altar of Baal, when his father defended him from the vengeance of the Abi-ezrites. In the A. and R. V. of Judg. vi. 32, “he called him Jerubbaal,” implying that the surname was given by Joash, means, in accordance with a well-known Hebrew idiom, “one called him,” i.e. he was called by the men of his city. The LXX. in the same passage have ἐκάλεσεν αὐτό, “he called it,” i.e. the altar mentioned in the preceding verse; but as in all other passages they recognise Jerubbaal as the name of Gideon, the reading should probably be αὐτόν. In Judg. viii. 35 the Vulg. strictly follows the Heb., Jerobaal Gedeon. The Alex. Version omits the name altogether from Judg. ix. 57. The name is also found in Judg. vii. 1, viii. 29, ix. 1, 5, 16, 19, 24, 28, and 1 Sam. xii. 11. It is not a little remarkable that Josephus (Ant. v. 6) omits all mention both of the change of name and of the event it commemorates. Gideon's act was one of putting away all sin and rebellion against God from his own house, before he entered upon the holy war to which God had called him. [W. A. W.] [C. H.]

JERUB'BESHETH (יְרֻבְבֶשֶׁת; 'Ιεροβοδμ; Jerobaal), a name of Gideon (2 Sam. xi. 21). A later generation probably abstained from pronouncing the name (Ex. xxiii. 13) of a false god (Baal), and therefore changed Gideon's name (Judg. vi. 32) of Jerubbaal = he that striveth with Baal, into Jerubbesheth = he that striveth with shame (= the idol). Cp. similar changes (1 Ch. viii. 33, 34) of Eshbaal for Ishbosheth, and Meribbaal for Mephibosheth. See Ewald in loco. [W. T. B.] [C. H.]

JERU'EL, THE WILDERNESS OF (יְרֻאֵל; ἡ ἐρήμος 'Ιερὺελ; Jeruel), the place in which Jehoshaphat was informed by Jahaziel the Levite that he should encounter the hordes of Ammon, Moab, and the Mehunim, who were swarming round the south end of the Dead Sea to the attack of Jerusalem: “Ye shall find them at the end of the valley (waddy), facing the wilderness of Jernel” (2 Ch. xx. 16). The “wilderness” contained a watch-tower (v. 24), from which many a similar incursion had probably been descried. It was a well-known spot, for it has the definite article. Or the word (יְרֻאֵל) may mean a commanding ridge,* below which the “wilderness” lay open to view. The name has not been met with, but the “wilderness” was apparently a part of the JESHIMON in the neighbourhood of Tekoa and

Berachah (perhaps Bereikât), east of the road between Urtás and Hebron. [G.] [W.]

JERU'SALEM (יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, i.e. Yērūshā'āim; or, in the more extended form, יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, in 1 Ch. iii. 5, 2 Ch. xxv. 1, xxxii. 9, Esth. ii. 6, Jer. xxvi. 18, only; in the Chaldee passages of Ezra and Daniel, יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, i.e. Yērūshā'āim: LXX. 'Ιερουσαλήμ; N. T. apparently indifferently 'Ιερουσαλήμ and τὰ 'Ιεροσόλυμα: Vulg. Cod. Amiat. Hierusalem and Hierosolyma, but in other old copies Jerusalem, Jerusolyma. In the A. V. of 1611 it is “Ierusalem,” in O. T. and Apoc.; but in N. T. “Hierusalem”).*

* Other names borne by Jerusalem are as follows: 1. ARIEL, the “lion of God,” or, according to another interpretation, the “hearth of God” (Is. xxix. 1, 2, 7; cp. Ezek. xliii. 16). For the former signification cp. Pa. lxxvi. 1, 2 (Stanley, S. & P. p. 171). 2. ἡ ἁγία πόλις, “the holy city,” Matt. iv. 5 and xxvii. 53 only. Both these passages would seem to refer to Zion—the sacred portion of the place, in which the Temple was situated. It also occurs—ἡ σ. ἡ ἁγ.—Rev. xii. 2. 3. ÆLIA CAPITOLINA, the name bestowed by the Emperor Hadrian (Ælius Hadrianus) on the city as rebuilt by him, A.D. 135-136. These two names of the emperor are inscribed on the well-known stone in the south wall of the Mosque el-Aksa, one of the few Roman relics about which there can be no dispute. This name is usually employed by Eusebius (Αἰλία) and Jerome, in their Onomasticon. By Ptolemy it is given as Καπιτωλιὰς (Beland, Pal. p. 462). 4. The Arabic names are el-Kuds, “the holy,” or Beit el-Mukaddas or Beit el-Mukdis, “the holy house,” “the sanctuary.” The first is that in ordinary use at present. The latter is found in Arabic chronicles. It is also called Hiyâ (Yâkût, iv. 592), and is referred to in poetry as el-Baldât, “the court” (Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, p. 84). The name esh-Sherif, “the venerable,” or “the noble,” is also quoted by Schultens in his Index Geogr. in Vit. Salad. 5. Yâkût mentions (i. 402, iii. 315, iv. 590) the forms Urishallum, Urt-

* ἐν τῆς ἀναβάσεως, λεγομένης δ' ἔφοχης, Joseph. Ant. ix. 1, § 2.

On the derivation and signification of the name considerable difference exists among the authorities. The Rabbis state that the name Shalem was bestowed on it by Shem (identical in their traditions with Melchizedek), and the name Jireh by Abraham, after the deliverance of Isaac on Mount Moriah,⁴ and that the two were afterwards combined, lest displeasure should be felt by either of the two Saints at the exclusive use of one (Beresh. Rab. in Otho, Lex. Rab. s. v., also Lightfoot). Others, quoted by Reland (p. 833), would make it mean "fear of Salem," or "sight of peace." The suggestion of Reland himself, adopted by Simonis (Onom. p. 467) and Ewald (Gesch. iii. 155, note), is שָׁלוֹם, "inheritance of peace," but this is questioned by Gesenius (Thez. p. 628b) and Fürst (Handb. p. 547b), who prefer שְׁלֵמָה יְרֵי, the "foundation of peace."⁵ Another derivation, proposed by the fertile Hitzig (Jesaja, p. 2), is named by the two last great scholars only to condemn it. Others again, looking to the name of the Canaanite tribe who possessed the place at the time of the conquest, would propose Jebus-salem (Reland, p. 834), or even Jebus-Solomon, as the name conferred on the city by that monarch when he began his reign of tranquillity.

Another controversy relates to the termination of the name—Jerushalaim—the Hebrew dual; and which, by Simonis and Ewald, is unhesitatingly referred to the double formation of the city, while reasons are shown against this by Reland and Gesenius. It is certain that on the two occasions where the latter portion of the name appears to be given for the whole (Gen. xiv. 18; Ps. lxxvi. 2), it is Shalem, and not Shalaim; also that the five places where the vowel-points of the Masorets are supported by the letters of the original text, are of a late date, when the idea of the double city, and its reflection in the name, would have become familiar to the Jews. In this conflict of authorities the suggestion will perhaps occur to a bystander that the original formation of the name may have been anterior to the entrance of the Israelites on Canaan, and that this was the case seems clear from the cuneiform tablets found in the ruins of Tell el-Amarna. Most of these letters were written towards the close of the reign of Amenôphis IV., a century before the Israelites entered Canaan; and some of them are from Ebed-tob (Abdu-ahabba), the priest-king of Uru-salim, Jerusalem. It would appear that Jerusalem was the seat of the worship and oracle of the god 'Salim, whose shalum, and Shallum as the names of the Holy City in the days of the Jews. Edrisi also once gives it the name Aurashalim (ed. Jaubert, i. 345). 6. In the cuneiform inscriptions one form of the name appears as Ur-sa-ll-im-mu (Schrader, D. Keilschriften u. d. A. T. p. 161).

^b The question of the identity of MORIAH with Jerusalem will be examined under that head.

^c Such mystical interpretations as those of Origen, τὸ πνεῦμα χάριτος αὐτῶν (from שָׁלוֹם and שְׁלֵמָה), or ἱερὸν εἰρήνης, where half the name is interpreted as Greek and half as Hebrew, curious as they are, cannot be examined here. (See the catalogues preserved by Jerome.)

temple stood on "the mountain" of Moriah, and that the word signifies "the city of the god 'Salim," i.e. "of the god of Peace" (Records of the Past, New Series, v. 60, 61). Jerushalaim then may be regarded as the Hebrew form of the original archaic name. Centuries afterwards, when Hebrews in their turn gave way to Greeks, attempts were made to twist Jerushalaim into a shape which should be intelligible to Greek ears.⁴ Ἱεροσόλυμα, "the holy Solyma" (Joseph. B. J. vi. 10), Ἱερὸν Σαλομώνος, "the holy place of Solomon" (Eupolemus, in Euseb. Pr. Ev. ix. 34), and the curious fancy quoted by Josephus (c. Ap. i. 34, 35) from Lyzimachus—Ἱερόσυλα, "spoilers of temples."

The subject of Jerusalem naturally divides itself into three heads:—

I. The place itself: its origin, position, and physical characteristics.

II. The annals of the city.

III. The topography of the town; the relative localities of its various parts; the sites of the "Holy Places," ancient and modern, &c.

I. THE PLACE ITSELF.

The arguments—if arguments they can be called—for and against the identity of the "Salem" of Melchizedek (Gen. xiv. 18) with Jerusalem—the "Salem" of a late Psalmist (Ps. lxxvi. 2)—are almost equally balanced. In favour of it are the unhesitating statement of Josephus (Ant. i. 10, § 2; vii. 3, § 2; B. J. vi. 10^c) and Eusebius (*OS*² p. 267, 18, Ἱεροσόλυμα), the recurrence of the name Salem in the Psalm just quoted, where it undoubtedly means Jerusalem,⁵ and the general consent in the identification. On the other hand is the no less positive statement of Jerome, grounded on more reason than he often vouchsafes for his statements⁶ (Ep. ad Evangelium, § 7), that "Salem was not Jerusalem, as Josephus and all Christians (nostris omnes) believe it to be, but a town near Scythopolis, which to this day is called Salem, where the magnificent ruins of the palace of Melchizedek are still seen, and of which mention is made in a subsequent passage of Genesis—'Jacob came to Salem, a city of Shechem'⁷ (Gen. xxiii. 18)." Elsewhere (*OS*² p. 282, 84; p. 180, 15) Eusebius and he identify it with Shechem itself. This question will be discussed under the head of ⁴ Other instances of similar Greek forms given to Hebrew names are Ἱερὸς and Ἱερομαξί.

⁷ A contraction analogous to others with which we are familiar in our own poetry; e.g. Edin, or Edina, for Edinburgh.

⁸ Winer is wrong in stating (RWE ii. 79) that Jerome bases this statement on a Rabbinical tradition. The tradition that he quotes, in § 5 of the same Ep. is as to the identity of Melchizedek with Shem.

⁹ R. V. translates "Jacob came in peace to the city of Shechem"

SALEM. Here it is sufficient to say (1) that Jerusalem suits the circumstances of the narrative as well as any place further north, or more in the heart of the country. It would be quite as much in Abram's road from the sources of Jordan to his home under the oaks of Hebron, and it would be quite as suitable for the visit of the king of Sodom. (2) It is perhaps some confirmation of the identity, at any rate it is a remarkable coincidence, that the king of Jerusalem in the time of Joshua should bear the title Adoni-zedek—almost precisely the same as that of Melchi-zedek.¹

The question of the identity of Jerusalem with "Cadytis, a large city of Syria," "almost as large as Sardis," which is mentioned by Herodotus (ii. 159, iii. 5) as having been taken by Pharaoh-Necho, need not be investigated in this place.¹ It is examined in Rawlinson's Herod. ii. 246; Blakesley's Herod.—Excursus on Bk. iii. ch. 5 (both against the identification); and in Kenrick's Egypt, ii. 406, and Dict. of Gk. and Rom. Geogr. ii. 17 (both for it).

Nor need we do more than refer to the traditions—if traditions they are, and not mere individual speculations—of Tacitus (Hist. v. 2) and Plutarch (Is. et Osir. ch. 31), of the foundation of the city by a certain Hierosolymus, a son of the Typhon (see Winer's note, i. 545). All certain information as to the early history of Jerusalem must be gathered from the books of the Jewish historians alone.

It is during the conquest of the country that Jerusalem first appears in definite form on the scene in which it was destined to occupy so prominent a position. The earliest notice is probably that in Josh. xv. 8 and xviii. 16, 28, describing the landmarks of the boundaries of Judah and Benjamin. Here it is styled Ha-Jebusi, i.e., as in R. V., "the Jebusite" (A. V. Jebusi), after the name of its occupiers, just as is the case with other places in these lists. [JEBUSI.] Next, we find the form JEBUS (Judg. xix. 10, 11)—"Jebus, which is Jerusalem . . . the city of the Jebusites;" and lastly, in documents which profess to be of the same age as the foregoing, we have Jerusalem (Josh. x. 1, &c., xii. 10; Judg. i. 7, &c.).² To this we have a parallel in Hebron, the other great city of Southern Palestine, which bears the alternative title of Kirjath-Arba in these very same documents.

It is one of the obvious peculiarities of Jerusalem—but to which Dean Stanley appears to have been the first to call attention—that it did not become the capital till a comparatively late date in the career of the nation. Bethel, Shechem, Hebron, had their beginnings in the earliest periods of national life; but Jerusalem was not only not a chief city, it was not even possessed by the Israelites till they had gone through one complete stage of their life in Palestine, and the second—the monarchy—had been fairly entered on (see Stanley, S. & P. p. 169).

The explanation of this is no doubt in some measure to be found in the fact that the seats of the government and the religion of the nation were originally fixed farther north—first at Shechem and Shiloh; then at Gibeah, Nob, and Gibeon; but it is also no doubt partly due to the natural strength of Jerusalem. The heroes of Joshua's army who traced the boundary-line which was to separate the possessions of Judah and Benjamin, when, after passing the spring of En-rogel, they went along the "ravine of the son of Hinnom," and looked up to the "southern shoulder of the Jebusite" (Josh. xv. 7, 8), must have felt that to scale heights so great and so steep would have fully tasked even their tried prowess. We shall see, when we glance through the annals of the city, that it did effectually resist the tribes of Judah and Simeon not many years later. But when, after the death of Ishbosheth, David became king of a united and powerful people, it was necessary for him to leave the remote Hebron and approach nearer to the bulk of his dominions. At the same time it was impossible to desert the great tribe to which he belonged, and over whom he had been reigning for seven years. Out of this difficulty Jerusalem was the natural escape, and accordingly at Jerusalem David fixed the seat of his throne and the future sanctuary of his nation.

The boundary between Judah and Benjamin, the north boundary of the former and the south of the latter, ran at the foot of the hill on which the city stands, so that the city itself was actually in Benjamin, while by crossing the narrow ravine of Hinnom you set foot on the territory of Judah.³ That it was not far enough to the north to command the continued allegiance of the tribe of Ephraim, and the others which lay above him, is obvious from the fact of the separation which at last took place. It is enough for the vindication of David in having chosen it to remember that that separation did not take place during the reigns of himself or his son, and was at last precipitated by misgovernment, combined with feeble shortsightedness. And if not actually in the centre

² Kadytis may perhaps be Kadesh on the Orontes, which would be on the road from Megiddo to Carchemish.

of Palestine, it was yet virtually so. "It was on the ridge, the broadest and most strongly marked ridge of the backbone of the complicated hills which extend through the whole country from the Plain of Esdraelon to the Desert. Every wanderer, every conqueror, every traveller who has trod the central route of Palestine from N. to S. must have passed through the table-land of Jerusalem. It was the watershed between the streams, or rather the torrent-beds, which find their way eastward to the Jordan (correctly Dead Sea), and those which pass westward to the Mediterranean" (Stanley, S. & P. p. 176).

This central position, as expressed in the words of Ezekiel (v. 5), "I have set Jerusalem in the midst of the nations and countries round about her," led in later ages to a definite belief that the city was actually in the centre of the earth—in the words of Jerome, "umbilicus terræ," the central boss or navel of the world^o (see the quotations in Reland, Pal. pp. 52 and 838; Joseph. B. J. iii. 3, § 5; also Stanley, S. & P. p. 116).

At the same time it should not be overlooked that, while thus central to the people of the country, it had the advantage of being remote from the great high road of the nations which so frequently passed by Palestine, and therefore enjoyed a certain immunity from disturbance. The only practicable route for a great army, with baggage, siege-trains, &c., moving between Egypt and Assyria, was by the low plain which bordered the sea-coast from Pelusium to Tyre. From that plain the central table-land on which Jerusalem stood was approached by valleys and passes generally too intricate and precipitous for the passage of large bodies. Two roads there were less rugged than the rest—that from Jaffa and Lydda up the pass of the Bethhorons to Gibeon, and thence over the hills to the north side of Jerusalem; and that from Gaza and Bethahemesh up the long ascent to Solomon's Pools, and thence by Rachel's Tomb, and the Plain of Rephaim to the west side of the city. By these routes, with few, if any, exceptions, armies seem to have approached the city.^p On the other hand, we shall find, in tracing the annals of Jerusalem, that great forces frequently passed between Egypt and Assyria, and battles were fought in the plain by large armies, nay, that sieges of the towns on the Mediterranean coast were conducted, lasting for years, without apparently affecting Jerusalem the least.

Jerusalem stands in latitude 31° 46' 43" North, and longitude 35° 13' 44" East of Greenwich. It is 33 miles distant from the sea, and 18½ from the Jordan; 19 from Hebron, and

^o This is prettily expressed in a Rabbinical figure quoted by Otho (Lez. 266):—"The world is like to an eye: the white of the eye is the ocean surrounding the world; the black is the world itself; the pupil is Jerusalem; and the image in the pupil, the Temple."

^p The principal roads from the maritime plain, and the valley of the Jordan, to the hill-country, avoided the narrow beds of the deep ravines, and, for obvious motives of precaution against hostile attack and winter torrents, followed the crests of the Intervening spurs.

^q This position is from the triangulation of the P.E.F. Survey, and depends on the Admiralty longitude of Jaffa.

35 from Samaria. It is emphatically a mountain city. Situated in the heart of the hill-country, which extends from the plain of Esdraelon to the southern limit of the Promised Land, surrounded on all sides by limestone hills that are seamed by countless ravines, and only approached by rough mountain roads, its position is one of great natural strength. The importance attached to the surrounding hills as a protection from hostile attack may be inferred from the words of Ps. cxv. 2: "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about His people." "In several respects," says Dean Stanley, "its situation is singular among the cities of Palestine. Its elevation is remarkable: occasioned not from its being on the summit of one of the numerous hills of Judæa, like most of the towns and villages, but because it is on the edge of one of the highest table-lands of the country." From the north and from the south the approach to Jerusalem is by a slight descent. But "to the traveller approaching the city from the E. or W. it must always have presented the appearance beyond any other capital of the then known world—we may say beyond any important city that has ever existed on the earth—of a mountain city; breathing, as compared with the sultry plains of Jordan, a mountain air; enthroned, as compared with Jericho or Damascus, Gaza or Tyre, on a mountain fastness" (S. & P. pp. 170-1).

The elevation of Jerusalem is a subject of constant reference and exultation by the Jewish writers. Their fervid poetry abounds with allusions to its height,^r to the ascent thither of the tribes from all parts of the country. It was the habitation of Jehovah, from which "He looked upon all the inhabitants of the world" (Ps. xxxiii. 14); its kings were "higher than the kings of the earth" (Ps. lxxxix. 27). In the later Jewish literature of narrative and description this poetry is reduced to prose, and in the most exaggerated form. Jerusalem was so high that the flames of Jamnia were visible from it (2 Macc. xii. 9). From the tower of Psephinus, at the N.W. corner of the walls, could be discerned on the one hand the Mediterranean Sea, on the other the country of Arabia (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 3). Hebron could be seen from the roofs of the Temple (Lightfoot, Chor. Cent. xlix.). The same thing can be traced in Josephus's account of the environs of the city, in which he has exaggerated what is in truth a remarkable ravine, to a depth so enormous that the head swam and the eyes failed in gazing into its recesses (Ant. xv. 11, § 5).

In exemplification of these remarks it may be said that the highest point within the walls of the city is 2,582 feet above the level of the sea. The Mount of Olives rises slightly above this—2,647 feet. Beyond the Mount of Olives, however, the descent is remarkable; Jericho—14½ miles off—being no less than 3,467 feet below, viz. 820 feet under the Mediterranean. On the north, Bethel, at a distance of 10½ miles, is 308 feet above Jerusalem. On the west Ramleh—25 miles—is 2,230 feet below. On the south, Hebron is 458 feet above. A table of the heights of the various parts of the city and environs is given further on.

The situation of the city in reference to the rest of Palestine has been described by Dr. Robinson in a well-known passage, which is so complete and graphic a statement of the case, that we take the liberty of giving it entire.

"Jerusalem lies near the summit of a broad mountain ridge. This ridge or mountainous tract extends, without interruption, from the plain of Esdraelon to a line drawn between the south end of the Dead Sea and the S.E. corner of the Mediterranean: or more properly, perhaps, it may be regarded as extending as far south as to Jebel 'Arâif in the desert; where it sinks down at once to the level of the great western plateau. This tract, which is everywhere not less than from 20 to 25 geographical miles in breadth, is in fact high uneven table-land. It everywhere forms the precipitous western wall of the great valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea; while towards the west it sinks down by an offset into a range of lower hills, which lie between it and the great plain along the coast of the Mediterranean. The surface of this upper region is everywhere rocky, uneven, and mountainous; and is moreover cut up by deep valleys which run east or west on either side towards the Jordan or the Mediterranean. The line of division, or watershed, between the waters of these valleys,—a term which here applies almost exclusively to the waters of the rainy season,—follows for the most part the height of land along the ridge; yet not so but that the heads of the valleys, which run off in different directions, often interlap for a considerable distance. Thus, for example, a valley which descends to the Jordan often has its head a mile or two westward of the commencement of other valleys which run to the western sea.

"From the great plain of Esdraelon onwards towards the south, the mountainous country rises gradually, forming the tract anciently known as the mountains of Ephraim and Judah; until in the vicinity of Hebron it attains an elevation of nearly 3,000 Paris feet* above the level of the Mediterranean Sea. Further north, on a line drawn from the north end of the Dead Sea towards the true west, the ridge has an elevation of only about 2,500 Paris feet; and here, close upon the water-shed, lies the city of Jerusalem.

"Six or seven miles N. and N.W. of the city is spread out the open plain or basin round about el-Jib (Gibeon), extending also towards el-Bireh (Beeroth); the waters of which flow off at its S.E. part through the deep valley here called by the Arabs Wâdy Beit Hanîna; but to which the monks and travellers have usually given the name of the Valley of Turpentine, or of the Terebinth, on the mistaken supposition that it is the ancient Valley of Elah. This great valley passes along in a S.W. direction an hour or more west of Jerusalem; and finally opens out from the mountains into the western plain, at the distance of 6 or 8 hours S.W. from the city, under the name of Wâdy es-Surâr. The traveller, on his way from Ramleh to Jerusalem, descends into and crosses this deep valley at the village of Kulónieh on its western side, an hour and a half from the latter city. On again reaching the high ground on its eastern side, he enters upon an open tract sloping gradually downwards towards the south and east; and sees before him, at the distance of a mile and a half, the walls and domes of the Holy City, and beyond them the higher ridge or summit of the Mount of Olives.

"The traveller now descends gradually towards the city along a broad swell of ground,† having at some distance on his left the shallow northern part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat; and close at hand on his right the basin which forms the beginning of the Valley of Hinnom. Upon the broad and elevated promontory within the fork of these two valleys, lies the Holy City. All around are higher hills: on the east, the Mount of Olives; on the south, the Hill of Evil Counsel, so called, rising directly from the Vale of Hinnom; on the west, the ground rises gently, as above described, to the borders of the great Wâdy; while on the north, a bend of the ridge connected with the Mount of Olives bounds the prospect at the distance of more than a mile. Towards the S.W. the view is somewhat more open; for here lies the plain of Rephaim, already described, commencing just at the southern brink of the Valley of Hinnom, and stretching off S.W. where it runs to the western sea. In the N.W., too, the eye reaches up along the upper part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat; and from many points can discern the mosque of Nebî Samu'el, situated on a lofty ridge beyond the great Wâdy, at the distance of two hours" (Robinson's Bibl. Researches, i. 258-260).

So much for the local and political relation of Jerusalem to the country in general. To convey an idea of its individual position, we may say roughly, and with reference to the accompanying plan (Plate I.), that the city occupies the lower extremity of a small plateau which slopes gently southward from the ridge that parts the waters of the Mediterranean from those of the Dead Sea. The little table-land is not more than 1000 acres in extent, and on its west, south, and east sides it is cut off from the surrounding country by ravines more than usually deep and precipitous. These ravines take their rise, within a short distance of each other, in the higher ground to the north-west of the city, and falling, at first gradually, then rapidly, form a junction below its south-east corner. The eastern one—the Valley of the Kedron, commonly known as the Valley of Jehoshaphat—after running eastward for a mile and a half, changes its direction and runs nearly due south. The western one—the Valley of Hinnom—which, at its head, widens out into a broad shallow basin, follows a southerly course for a mile and a quarter, and then turns eastward to meet the Valley of the Kedron. After their junction the two valleys, now called the Wâdy en-Nar, "Valley of Fire," run off through the Wilderness of Judaea to the Dead Sea. How rapid is their descent may be gathered from the fact that the point of junction is 872 feet below the starting-point, though the two points are scarcely one and three quarter miles apart. Thus, while on the north there is no material difference between the general level of the country outside the walls and that of the highest parts of the city; on the other three sides the ravines fall so steeply, their character is so trench-like, and they keep so close to the promontory, at whose feet they run, that they leave upon the beholder almost the impression of a ditch at the foot of a fortress.

* The "broad swell of ground" is now, in great part, covered with houses; but the features so clearly described by Dr. Robinson can still be easily recognised.

* The altitude of Heikal, near Hebron, is 3,270 feet.

The plateau thus encircled is itself intersected by a ravine which, rising to the north of the city, runs southward to join the Kedron Valley at Siloam, and divides the central mass into two spurs of unequal size that terminate in abrupt broken slopes. Of these two spurs, that on the west—the Upper City of the Jews, the Mount Zion of modern tradition—is the higher and more massive; that on the east—Mount Moriah, the “Akra” or “Lower City” of Josephus, now occupied by the great Muhammadan sanctuary with its mosques and domes—is at once considerably lower and smaller, so that, to a spectator from the south, the city appears to slope sharply to the east.^a About 700 yards above Siloam this central valley is joined, almost at right angles, by a smaller one, which falls rapidly in its course eastward from the vicinity of the present Jaffa Gate. Opinions differ as to whether the straight valley north and south, or its southern half, with the branch just spoken of, was the “Tyropoeon valley” of Josephus. The question will be examined in Section III. under the head of the Topography of the Ancient City.

A fourth valley, the rugged nature of which was only disclosed by excavation, rises in the eastern half of the plateau, and falls into the Kedron a short distance north of the Golden Gate. Part of this depression—apparently “the valley called Kedron,” of Josephus—is still preserved in the large reservoir, Birket Israil, usually called the Pool of Bethesda, near the St. Stephen’s Gate.

The Tyropoeon and the fourth valley are so filled with the debris of ancient Jerusalem that neither their form nor their true course can now be distinguished. The bed of the former is sometimes more than 90 feet, and that of the latter, where it underlies the north-east corner of the Harām esh-Sherif, no less than 125 feet below the present surface of the ground. The rocky sides of the Kedron and Hinnom valleys, which, below the city walls, were cut away in cliffs from 10 to 20 feet high to give additional security, are now so concealed by debris that they present the appearance of steep continuous slopes, broken only by a few terraced gardens.

This rough sketch of the terrain of Jerusalem will enable the reader to appreciate the two great advantages of its position. On the one hand the ravines which entrench it on the west, south, and east—out of which, as has been said, the rocky slopes of the city rise almost like the walls of a fortress out of its ditches—must have rendered it impregnable on those quarters to the warfare of the old world. On the other hand, its junction with the more level ground on its north and north-west sides afforded an opportunity of expansion, of which we know advantage was taken, and which gave it remarkable superiority over other cities of Palestine, and especially of Judah, which, though secure on their hill-tops, were unable to expand beyond them (Stanley, S. & P., pp. 174–5).

The heights of the principal points in and round the city, above the Mediterranean Sea, as determined by the Ordnance Survey* in 1864–65, are as follows:—

	Feet.
Water-parting N.W. of city	2670
N.W. corner of the city (Kalat el-Jalād)	2670
Church of Holy Sepulchre	2473
Upper City (Armenian Monastery)	2544
Mount Moriah (Harām esh-Sherif)	2419
Bridge over the Kedron, near Gethsemane	2270
Pool of Siloam	2087
Bir Eyyūb , at the confluence of Hinnom and Kedron	1979
Mount of Olives, Church of Ascension on summit	2641
Hill of Evil Counsel	2549

From these figures it will be seen that the spur on which the western half of the city is built, is tolerably level from north to south; that the eastern hill is more than a hundred feet lower; and that from the latter the descent to the floor of the valley at its feet—the Bir Eyyūb—is a drop of 440 feet.

The Mount of Olives overtops even the highest part of the city by nearly 100 feet, and the Temple-hill by no less than 220. Its northern and southern outliers—the Viri Galilaei, Scopus, and Mount of Offence—bend round slightly towards the city, and give the effect of “standing round about Jerusalem.” Especially would this be the case to a worshipper in the Temple. “It is true,” says Dean Stanley, “that this image is not realised, as most persons familiar with European scenery would wish and expect it to be realised. . . . Any one facing Jerusalem westward, northward, or southward, will always see the city itself on an elevation higher than the hills in its immediate neighbourhood, its towers and walls standing out against the sky, and not against any high background, such as that which encloses the mountain towns and villages of our own Cumbrian or Westmoreland valleys. Nor again is the plain on which it stands enclosed by a continuous, though distant, circle of mountains like Athens or Innsbruck. The mountains in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem are of unequal height, and only in two or three instances—Neby-Samūil, er-Rām, and Tuleil el-Fūl—rising to any considerable elevation. Still they act as a shelter; they must be surmounted before the traveller can see, or the invader attack, the Holy City; and the distant line of Moab would always seem to rise as a wall against invaders from the remote east. It is these mountains, expressly including those beyond the Jordan, which are mentioned as ‘standing round about Jerusalem’ in another and more terrible sense, when, on the night of the assault of Jerusalem by the Roman armies, they ‘echoed back’ the screams of the inhabitants of the captured city, and the victorious shouts of the soldiers of Titus. The situation of Jerusalem was thus not unlike, on a small scale, to that of Rome, saving the great difference that Rome was in a well-watered plain, leading direct to the sea, whereas Jerusalem was on a bare table-land, in the heart of the country. But each was situated on its own cluster of steep hills; each had room for future expansion in the surrounding level; each, too, had its nearer and more remote barriers of protecting hills—Rome its Janiculum hard by, and its Apennine and Alban mountains in the distance; Jerusalem its Olivet hard by, and on the outposts of its plain, Mizpeh, Gibeon, and Ramah, and the ridge which divides it from Bethlehem” (S. & P. pp. 174–5).

^a The character of the ravines and the eastward slope of the site are well shown in the Ordnance Survey photographs of Jerusalem; and in Section 1, Plan No. 2, P. 1637.

* The levels are given on the O.S. maps of Jerusalem on the 25 in. and 6 in. scales.

Geology.—The strata of the limestone plateau on which Jerusalem stands have a general easterly dip of about 10 degrees, and there is therefore an ascending series from the western hill to the Mount of Olives. Dr. Fraas (Aus dem Orient., p. 50 sq.) has shown that the strata consist of the following in descending order:—1. Nummulitic limestone, composed of soft white limestone with bands of flints and fossils, locally known as Kakûli. 2. Upper Hippurite limestone, or Nerinaean marble, composed of beds of hard reddish and grey stone, capable of taking a good polish, called Misesh. 3. Lower Hippurite limestone, a soft easily-worked stone, called Melekeh, a name which recalls the banc royal of French quarrymen; and 4. Zone des Ammonites rhotomagensis, composed of pink and white strata of indurated chalk.

The Melekeh bed, which is from 30 to 40 feet thick, underlies the whole city, and has played an important part in its history. All the great subterranean reservoirs, nearly all the tombs, the Siloam aqueduct, and the caverns at the village of Siloam have been hewn out of it; and the extensive underground quarries near the Damascus Gate show that it was largely used for building purposes. Many of the large blocks in the walls of the Temple enclosure are from this bed, and the stone where free from flaws and not exposed to rain has worn well. The Misesh beds, however, have yielded most of the material for these walls, and the edges of the stones are frequently as sharp and perfect as when they left the mason's hands. The stone from both beds weathers a dull grey, and this gives the whole city an appearance of antiquity which harmonizes well with its history (Lartet, Géologie de la Palestine, pp. 175, 176).

Roads.—There appear to have been four main approaches to the city. 1. From the Jordan valley by Jericho and the Mount of Olives. This was the route commonly taken from the north and east of the country—as from Galilee by our Lord (Luke xvii. 11; xviii. 35; xix. 1, 29, 45, &c.), from Damascus by Pompey (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 3, § 4; 4, § 1), to Mahanaim by David (2 Sam. xv., xvi.). It was also the route from places in the central districts of the country, as Samaria (2 Ch. xviii. 15). The latter part of the approach, over the Mount of Olives, as generally followed at the present day, is identical with what it was, at least in one memorable instance, in the time of Christ. A road there is over the crown of the hill, to the north of the Church of the Ascension, but the common route still runs more to the south, round the shoulder of the principal summit (see S. & P. p. 193). The insecure state of the Jordan valley has thrown this route very much into disuse, and has diverted the traffic from the north to a road along the central ridge of the country. 2. From Joppa, and the northern portion of the great maritime plain. This road led by the two Bethhorons up to the high ground at Gibeon, whence it turned south, and came to Jerusalem by Gibeah, and over the ridge north of the city. This route is still much used, though a shorter but more precipitous road is usually taken by travellers between Jerusalem and Jaffa. In tracing the annals we shall find that it was the route by which large bodies, such as armies, always approached the city from Caesarea and Ptolemais on the north, and sometimes from Gaza on the south. 3. From Egypt and the Plain of Philistia. This road ran by Bethshemesh, and thence up the long slope to "Solomon's Pools," where it turned northwards and, after passing Bethlehem, crossed the Plain of Rephaim to Jerusalem. Another road followed the Valley of Elah to Socoh, and there branched off on the one hand to Bethlehem, and on the other to Bethzur, on the road from Hebron to Jerusalem. These roads were frequently followed by the Philistines, who camped on the Plain of Rephaim, and, at one time, garrisoned Bethlehem. During the wars of the Maccabees the contending armies appear to have followed the more southerly road, passing by Bethzur. 4. From Samaria and Shechem. This road kept closely to the line of the water-parting from N. to S., and passed by Bethel. It was apparently followed by the kings of Israel in their campaigns against Judah. 5. The communication with the mountainous districts of the south was less complete. But there was a road by Hebron and Beersheba to Egypt, which seems to have been at one time much used.

The roads out of Jerusalem were a special subject of Solomon's care. He paved them with black stone—possibly the basalt of the Transjordanic districts, or the bituminous limestone from the hills between the city and the Dead Sea (Joseph. Ant. viii. 7, § 4).

Gates.—The situation of the various gates of the city is examined in Section III. It may, however, be desirable to supply here a complete list of those which are named in the Bible and Josephus, with the references to their occurrences:—

1. Gate of Ephraim. 2 K. xiv. 13; 2 Ch. xxv. 23; Neh. viii. 16, xii. 39. This is perhaps the same as the
2. Gate of Benjamin. Jer. xx. 2, xxxvii. 13, xxxviii. 7; Zech. xiv. 10. If so, it was 400 cubits distant from the
3. Corner gate. 2 K. xiv. 13; 2 Ch. xxv. 23, xxvi. 9; Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. xiv. 10.
4. Gate of Joshua, governor of the city. 2 K. xxiii. 8.
5. Gate between the two walls. 2 K. xv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4, lii. 7.
6. Horse gate. Neh. iii. 28; 2 Ch. xxxiii. 15; cp. 2 K. xi. 16; Jer. xxxi. 40; Joseph. Ant. ix. 7, § 3, gate of the king's mules.
7. Ravine gate (i.e. opening on the ravine of Hinnom). 2 Ch. xxvi. 9; Neh. ii. 13, 15, iii. 13.
8. Fish gate. 2 Ch. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 3, xii. 39; Zeph. i. 10.
9. Dung gate. Neh. ii. 13; iii. 13, 14; xii. 31. Cp. the "place called Bethso" (B. J. v. 4, § 2).
10. Sheep gate. Neh. iii. 1, 32, xii. 39; John v. 2 in R. V.
11. East gate. Neh. iii. 29.
12. Miphkad (R. V. Ham-miphkad). Neh. iii. 31.
13. Fountain gate (Siloam?). Neh. ii. 14; iii. 15; xii. 37.

7 One of the gates on the east side of the future Jerusalem was to be called the Gate of Benjamin (Ezek. xlvi. 32).

- 14. Water gate. Neh. iii. 26, viii. 1, 3, 16 ; xii. 37.
- 15. Old gate. Neh. iii. 6 ; xii. 39.
- 16. Prison gate (R. V. Gate of the guard). Neh. xii. 39.
- 17. Gate Harsith (sun gate, or R. V. marg. *the gate of potsherd*s ; A. V. East gate). Jer. xix. 2.
- 18. First gate. Zech. xiv. 10.
- 19. Middle gate. Jer. xxxix. 3.
- 20. Gate Gennath (garden). Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 2.
- 21. Essenes' gate. Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 2.
- 22. Gate where water was brought into the tower Hippicus (B. J. v. 7, § 3). Perhaps the same as the
- 23. Obscure gate, near Hippicus (B. J. v. 6, § 5).

To these should be added the following gates of the Temple:—

- Gate Sur. 2 K. xi. 6. Called also
- Gate of the foundation. 2 Ch. xxiii. 5.
- Gate of the guard, or behind the guard. 2 K. xi. 6, 19. Called the - High (R. V. upper) gate. 2 Ch. xxiii. 20, xxvii. 3 ; 2 K. xv. 35 : cp. Joseph. Ant. ix. 7, § 2.
- Gate Shallecheth (R. V. marg. casting forth). 1 Ch. xxvi. 16.
- East gate. Ezek. x. 19 ; xi. 1.
- New gate. Jer. xxvi. 10, xxxvi. 10.

The following gates of Herod's Temple are mentioned in the Bible, Josephus, and the Mishna:—

- Beautiful gate. Acts iii. 2, 10.
- East gate. Ant. xv. 11, § 7.
- Gate leading to the king's palace. Ant. xv. 11, § 5.
- Gates leading to the suburbs. Ant. xv. 11, § 5.
- Gate leading to the other city. Ant. xv. 11, § 5.
- Huldah gates. Mid. i. 3, cp. Ant. xv. 11, § 5.
- Gate Kippanus. Mid. i. 3.
- Gate Tadi. Mid. i. 3.
- Gate Shushan. Mid. i. 3.
- Gate Nicanor. Mid. i. 4.

Burial-grounds.—The main cemetery of the city seems from an early date to have been where it is still—on the steep slopes of the valley of the Kedron. Here it was that the fragments of the idol abominations, destroyed by Josiah, were cast on the “graves of the children of the people” (2 K. xxiii. 6), and the valley was always the receptacle for impurities of all kinds. There Maachah's idol was burnt by Asa (1 K. xv. 13) ; there, according to Josephus, Athaliah was executed ; and there the “filthiness” accumulated in the sanctuary, by the false-worship of Ahaz, was discharged (2 Ch. xxix. 5, 16). But in addition to this, and although there is only a slight allusion in the Bible to the fact (Jer. vii. 32), many of the tombs now existing in the face of the ravine of Hinnom, on the south of the city, must be as old as Biblical times ; and, if so, show that this was also used as a cemetery. The monument of Ananus the high-priest (Joseph. B. J. v. 12, § 2) would seem to have been in this direction.

The tombs of the kings were in the city of David, which, as will be shown in the concluding section of this article, was on the eastern hill, Moriah. The royal sepulchres were probably chambers containing separate recesses for the successive kings ; and it is possible that the chambers were, as in many Phœnician tombs, at the bottom of a deep shaft. [TOMBS.] Of some of the kings it is recorded that, not being thought worthy of a resting-place there, they were buried in separate or private tombs in the city of David (2 Ch. xxi. 20, xxiv. 25 ; 2 K. xv. 7). Ahaz was not admitted to the city of David at all, but was buried in Jerusalem (2 Ch. xxviii. 27) ; and Manasseh and Amon were buried in the garden of Uzza (2 K. xxi. 18, 26). Other spots also were used for burial. Somewhere to the north of the Temple, and not far from the wall, was the monument of king Alexander (Joseph. B. J. v. 7, § 3). Near the north-west corner of the city was the monument of John the high-priest (Joseph. v. 6, § 2, &c.), and to the north-east the “monument of the fuller” (Joseph. B. J. v. 4, § 2). On the north, too, were the monuments of Herod (v. 3, § 2) and of queen Helena (v. 2, § 2 ; 3, § 3), the former close to the “Serpent's Pool.”

Excepting in the Kedron and Hinnom valleys, where the ancient tombs form large cemeteries, the custom of burying in gardens appears to have been very general. There are large numbers of ancient tombs, isolated or in small groups, on the plateau to the north of the city, on the slopes of Olivet, and in the W. en-Nur, below Bir Eyûb. The only known rock-hewn tombs within the city are those in and near the Church of the Holy Sepulchre ; none have yet been found on the eastern and western hills.

Woods ; Gardens.—We have very little evidence as to the amount of wood and of cultivation that existed in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. The king's gardens of David and Solomon seem to have been in the bottom formed by the confluence of the Kedron and Hinnom (Neh. iii. 15 ; Joseph. Ant. vii. 14, § 4 ; ix. 10, § 4). The gardens of Uzza (2 K. xxi. 18) and of Joseph of Arimathea (John xix. 41) are mentioned without any indication of position. The Mount of Olives, as its name and those of various places upon it seem to imply, was a fruitful spot. At its foot was situated the Garden of Gethsemane. At the time of the final siege the space north of the wall of Agrippa was covered with gardens, groves, and plantations of fruit-trees, enclosed by hedges and walls ; and to level these was one of Titus's first operations (B. J. v. 3, § 2). We know that the gate Gennath (i.e. “of the garden”), in the first wall, opened on this side of the city (B. J. v. 4, § 2). The Valley of Hinnom was, in Jerome's time, “a pleasant and woody spot, full of delightful gardens watered from the fountain of Siloah” (Comm. in Jer. vii. 30). In the Talmud mention is made of a certain rose-garden outside the city, which was of great fame, but no clue is given to its situation (Otho, Lex. Rab. p. 266). [GARDEN.] The sieges of Jerusalem were too frequent during its later history to admit of any considerable growth of wood near it, even if the thin soil which covers the rocky substratum would allow of it. And the scarcity of earth again necessitated the cutting down of all the trees that could be found for the banks and mounds with which the ancient sieges were conducted. This is expressly said in the accounts of the sieges of Pompey and Titus. In the latter case the country was swept of its timber for a distance of 8 or 9 miles from the city (B. J. vi. 8, § 1, &c.).

Water Supply.—Numerous traces remain of the works connected with the ancient water supply of the city. This supply was derived from springs, wells, rain-water collected during the rainy seasons and stored in reservoirs and cisterns, and water brought from a distance by aqueducts and preserved in tanks.

(1.) The only known spring is the 'Ain umm ed-leraj, or "Virgin's fountain," in the Kedron Valley close to the village of Siloam. The water from this spring, which has an intermittent flow, now passes through a rock-hewn tunnel, that dates from the time of the Kings, to the Upper Pool of Siloam. But the remains of a rock-hewn conduit in the valley seem to indicate that, at an earlier period, the water was carried along the foot of the hill to the Lower Pool of Siloam (Birket el-Hamma), where it was probably stored for the irrigation of the king's gardens [SILOAM]. At three other places,—outside the Damascus Gate, and near the Hammâm esh-Shefa, in the Tyropoeon Valley; and in the fourth valley, near the Church of St. Anne,—the topographical features and the geological formation favour the existence of small springs; and at each water is known to run to waste, during several months of the year, beneath the rubbish that fills the valleys.

(2.) The principal well is Bir Eyûb, "Job's well," which is situated a little below the junction of the Kedron and Hinnom valleys, and is 125 ft. deep. It rarely runs dry, and occasionally, after four or five days' continuous rain, its waters overflow and run a few yards down the valley. The esh-Shefa well, near the Sûk el-Kattanin, is only a shaft in the rubbish, that gives access to a small basin in which the water running down the Tyropoeon Valley, Jerusalem and Siloam.

perhaps from a small spring, collects, and is not an ancient well. On the western hill there are several very old wells; but as they derived their supply of water from infiltration and are not deep, they could never have been of much importance. On the eastern hill, beneath the Sakhrâh, there is the so-called Bir el-Arwah, "well of spirits," but whether it be a well or not is uncertain.

(3.) The chief supply of the early inhabitants must have been rain-water, collected as at present within the area of the town and stored in cisterns. There seems to be an allusion to this in 2 K. xviii. 31; and the remains of cisterns are found in every part of the city. The quantity preserved in this way would not, however, have been sufficient for all purposes, and the question of improving the water supply must soon have forced itself upon the attention of the people. The first step would naturally be to construct reservoirs (κολυμβήθραι, piscinæ) for catching the surface drainage of the valleys that embrace and intersect the plateau; and sites would, where possible, be selected whence the water could run down to the city by the force of gravity alone. This plan appears to have been adopted. Near the head of the Valley of Hinnom is the Birket Mamilla, which still holds water, and lower down in the same valley is the B. es-Sultan. In the upper part of the Kedron Valley, to the north of the "Tombs of the Kings," there is a reservoir, now filled with soil; and there was probably a pool, below the Virgin's Fountain, in which the flood-waters of the Kedron were stored for the irrigation of gardens at a lower level. At the mouth of the Tyropoeon Valley there are the Upper and Lower Pools of Siloam, and there are some slight grounds for supposing that there was a reservoir a little higher up the valley, and another near its head outside the Damascus Gate. In the fourth valley are the B. Israël, and the pool near the Church of St. Anne which was formerly called Bethesda. There are also, without the walls, the B. Sitti Miriam, near St. Stephen's Gate; and within the walls the B. Hammâm el-Batrak, "Hezekiah's Pool," which receives the surplus water of the B. Mamilla, the "Twin Pools," beneath the street at the N.W. corner of the Haram esh-Sherif, and the B. el-Burak constructed in the rubbish beneath "Wilson's Arch." Tradition has also preserved the sites of two other pools—near the Bâb el-Kattanin in the west wall of the H. esh-Sherif, and near the Jaffa Gate—but both appear to have been of much later date than the Roman siege.
